Demers v. Austin, 746 F.3d 402, 406, 411, 412, 417 (9th Cir. 2014) (denying pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc) (“We hold that Garcetti does not apply to “speech related to scholarship or teaching.” Rather, such speech is governed by Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968). In Demers's case, we conclude that the short pamphlet was related to scholarship or teaching, and that it addressed a matter of public concern under Pickering. We conclude, further, that there is insufficient evidence in the record to show that the in-progress book triggered retaliation against Demers. Finally, we conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, given the uncertain state of the law in the wake of Garcetti. . . . Demers presents the kind of case that worried Justice Souter. Under Garcetti, statements made by public employees ‘pursuant to their official duties’ are not protected by the First Amendment. . . . But teaching and academic writing are at the core of the official duties of teachers and professors. Such teaching and writing are ‘a special concern of the First Amendment.’ . . . We conclude that if applied to teaching and academic writing, Garcetti would directly conflict with the important First Amendment values previously articulated by the Supreme Court. One of our sister circuits agrees. See Adams v. Trs. of the Univ. of N.C.-Wilmington, 640 F.3d 550, 562 (4th Cir.2011) (“We are ... persuaded that Garcetti would not apply in the academic context of a public university as represented by the facts of this case.”). . . . We conclude that Garcetti does not—indeed, consistent with the First Amendment, cannot—apply to teaching and academic writing that are performed ‘pursuant to the official duties’ of a teacher and professor. We hold that academic employee speech not covered by Garcetti is protected under the First Amendment, using the analysis established in Pickering. . . . Until the decision in this case, our circuit has not addressed the application of Garcetti to teaching and academic writing. . . . [B]ecause there is no Ninth Circuit law on point to inform defendants about whether or how Garcetti might apply to a professor's academic speech, we cannot say that the contours of the right in this circuit were ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood’ that this conduct violated that right. . . We therefore hold that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Compare Brown v. Chicago Bd. of Educ., 824 F.3d 713, 714-16 (7th Cir. 2016) (“The Chicago Board of Education has a written policy that forbids teachers from using racial epithets in front of students, no matter what the purpose. Lincoln Brown, a sixth grade teacher at Murray Language Academy, a Chicago Public School, caught his students passing a note in class. The note contained, among other things, music lyrics with the offensive word ‘nigger.’ Brown used this episode as an opportunity to conduct what appears to have been a well-intentioned but poorly executed discussion of why such words are hurtful and must not be used. The school principal, Gregory Mason, happened to observe the lesson. Brown was soon suspended and brought this suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the Board and various school personnel. . . . In the case before us, Brown himself has emphasized that he was speaking as a teacher—that is to say, as an employee—not as a citizen. . . . The question remains whether the Garcetti rule applies in the same way to ‘a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.’ . . The Supreme Court had no need to address that issue, and so left it for another day. This is not our first opportunity, however, in which to confront that question. See Mayer v. Monroe Cnty. Cmty. Sch. Corp., 474 F.3d 477 (7th Cir. 2007). In Mayer, we concluded that a teacher’s in-classroom speech is not the speech of a ‘citizen’ for First Amendment purposes. . . The core of the teacher’s job is to speak in the classroom on the subjects she is expected to teach. This meant, we thought, that in-classroom instruction necessarily constitutes ‘statements pursuant to [the teacher’s] official duties.’ . . Here, Brown gave his impromptu lesson on racial epithets in the course of his regular grammar lesson to a sixth grade class. His speech was therefore pursuant to his official duties. That he deviated from the official curriculum does not change this fact. . . .Brown argues that we should ignore Mayer and instead follow the Ninth Circuit by understanding the Supreme Court’s reservation as a hint that Garcetti should not apply ‘in the same manner to a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.’ Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 425; see Demers v. Austin, 746 F.3d 402, 411 (9th Cir. 2014). But Demers addressed speech in a university setting, not a primary or secondary school. It relied on the long-standing recognition that academic freedom in a university is ‘a special concern of the First Amendment’ because of the university’s unique role in participating in and fostering a marketplace of ideas. . . In fact, in the primary and secondary school context, the Ninth Circuit follows Mayer’s approach. See Johnson v. Poway Unified Sch. Dist., 658 F.3d 954, 962–63 (9th Cir. 2011) (holding in-classroom instruction is pursuant to teacher’s official duties and unprotected employee speech). So do the Third and Sixth Circuits. Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Educ. of Tipp City Exempted Vill. Sch. Dist., 624 F.3d 332 (6th Cir. 2010); Edwards v. Cal. Univ. of Pa., 156 F.3d 488, 491 (3d Cir. 1998) (Alito, J.) (pre-Garcetti). Only the Fourth Circuit has adopted the position that Brown advocates, and it did so without analysis. Lee v. York Cnty. Sch. Div., 484 F.3d 687, 694 n.11 (4th Cir. 2007). We see no reason to depart here from our decision in Mayer. Brown made his comments as a teacher, not a citizen, and so his suspension does not implicate his First Amendment rights.”)

Acosta v. City of Costa Mesa, 718 F.3d 800, 824-26 & n.14 (9th Cir. 2013) (“Acosta presents two arguments that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for seizing or arresting him: (1) he was arrested in retaliation for questioning the officers about why his time to speak was cut short and why he was asked to leave the council meeting; and (2) the officers lacked the requisite level of suspicion to seize or arrest him. Resolution of both contentions turns on whether probable cause existed to seize Acosta. Assuming Acosta’s contention accurately reflects why he was arrested, Acosta’s claim still fails under prong two of Saucier. . . In Reichle, the Supreme Court held that it had never recognized, nor was there a clearly established First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Furthermore, at the time of the Council meeting, our precedent had previously upheld restrictions on speech at city council meetings where the speech was actually disruptive and this remains the law. . . Thus, if Acosta’s seizure and arrest were supported by probable cause, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . [W]e find that probable cause existed to arrest Acosta for a violation of § 2–61 and summary judgment was properly granted in favor of the officers on this claim. . . Thus, even assuming that Acosta was arrested in retaliation for his remarks, because probable cause existed for a violation of § 2–61, the officers are still entitled to qualified immunity, not only for the removal of Acosta from the chambers, but also for his subsequent arrest. Summary judgment was properly granted in favor of the officers. . . . We note that if we were to find that no probable cause existed, the officers would still be entitled to qualified immunity. An officer is entitled to immunity where a reasonable officer would believe that probable cause existed, even if that determination was a mistake. . . Here, given the Mayor’s repeated directives to cease speaking, the fact that the council meeting was now in recess, and the undisputed fact that Acosta remained at the podium addressing both the audience and the council, a reasonable officer would have believed that probable cause existed to arrest Acosta for a violation of § 2–61.”)

Mueller v. Aufer, 700 F.3d 1180, 1188 (9th Cir. 2012) (“Idaho law permits a police officer to place a child in shelter care without a court order when necessary to prevent serious physical injury. I.C. § 16–1612(since renumbered as I.C. § 16–1608). The Muellers’ late assertion in their reply brief that this law is ‘obviously unconstitutional’ is of no help to them on this issue, because at the time the disputed decisions were made, no clearly established law existed to that effect. Moreover, the existence of a state statute authorizing an official’s disputed conduct weighs in that official’s favor, so long as the statute itself does not offend the Constitution, and I.C. § 16–1612 does not.”)

Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748, 750, 755, 757-68 & n.16 (9th Cir. 2012) (“Under recent Supreme Court law . . . we are compelled to conclude that, regardless of the legality of Padilla’s detention and the wisdom of Yoo's judgments, at the time he acted the law was not 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he [wa]s doing violate[d]' the plaintiffs' rights. . . We therefore hold that Yoo must be granted qualified immunity, and accordingly reverse the decision of the district court. . . . [W]e reach this conclusion for two reasons. First, although during Yoo's tenure at OLC the constitutional rights of convicted prisoners and persons subject to ordinary criminal process were, in many respects, clearly established, it was not 'beyond debate' at that time that Padilla—who was not a convicted prisoner or criminal defendant, but a suspected terrorist designated an enemy combatant and confined to military detention by order of the President—was entitled to the same constitutional protections as an ordinary convicted prisoner or accused criminal. . . Second, although it has been clearly established for decades that torture of an American citizen violates the Constitution, and we assume without deciding that Padilla's alleged treatment rose to the level of torture, that such treatment was torture was not clearly established in 2001–03. . . . The crux of the district court's decision for purposes of this appeal is its assumption that any reasonable official would have understood in 2001–03 that United States citizen enemy combatants in military detention must be afforded at least the constitutional and statutory rights afforded to ordinary prison inmates. . . . The outcome of this appeal is governed by the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011), decided subsequent to the district court's ruling against Yoo. . . . Significant here, under the second prong, a 'Government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, "[t]he contours of [a] right[are] sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."' . . . Padilla and Lebron acknowledge that at the time Yoo served as Deputy Assistant Attorney General at OLC, there did not exist a 'single judicial opinion,' . . . holding that a United States citizen held in military detention as an enemy combatant possessed rights against the kind of treatment to which Padilla was subjected. They argue, however, that it was clearly established that Padilla possessed such rights because any reasonable official would have understood during 2001 to 2003 that a citizen detained as an enemy combatant had to be afforded at least the constitutional protections to which convicted prisoners and ordinary criminal suspects were entitled. That argument is foreclosed by al-Kidd, which compels us 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . Here, of course, the Supreme Court had not, at the time of Yoo's tenure at OLC, declared that American citizens detained as enemy combatants had to be treated at least as well, or afforded at least the same constitutional and statutory protections, as convicted prisoners. On the contrary, the Supreme Court had suggested in Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), the most germane precedent in existence at the time of Yoo's tenure at OLC, that a citizen detained as an unlawful combatant could be afforded lesser rights than ordinary prisoners or individuals in ordinary criminal proceedings. . . . Hamdi . . . was not decided until 2004, so it could not have placed Yoo on clear notice of Padilla's constitutional rights in 2001–03 when Yoo was at the Department of Justice. Even after Hamdi, moreover, it remains murky whether an enemy combatant detainee may be subjected to conditions of confinement and methods of interrogation that would be unconstitutional if applied in the ordinary prison and criminal settings. Although Hamdi recognized that citizens detained as enemy combatants retain constitutional rights to due process, the Court suggested that those rights may not be coextensive with those enjoyed by other kinds of detainees. . . . In sum, the plaintiffs did not, through their reliance on either Hamdi or cases involving ordinary prison and criminal settings, allege violations of constitutional and statutory rights that were clearly established in 2001–03. During that relevant time frame, the constitutional rights of convicted prisoners and persons subject to ordinary criminal process were, in many respects, clearly established. But Padilla was not a convicted prisoner or criminal defendant; he was a suspected terrorist designated an enemy combatant and confined to military detention by order of the President. . . . In light of Padilla’s status as a designated enemy combatant, . . . we cannot agree with the plaintiffs that he was just another detainee—or that it would necessarily have been ‘apparent’ to someone in Yoo’s position that Padilla was entitled to the same constitutional protections as an ordinary convicted prisoner or accused criminal. . . . The same is true of Padilla’s RFRA claim. As the Fourth Circuit held, the application of RFRA to enemy combatants in military detention was not clearly established in 2001–03. . . . The absence of a decision defining the constitutional and statutory rights of citizens detained as enemy combatants need not be fatal to the plaintiffs’ claims. The Supreme Court has long held that ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . The plaintiffs invoke this principle here. They argue that, even if there is no specific judicial decision holding that the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition on government conduct that ‘shocks the conscience’ is violated when the government tortures a United States citizen designated as an enemy combatant, torture of a United States citizen is the kind of egregious constitutional violation for which a decision ‘directly on point’ is not required. Al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083.[footnote omitted] We agree with the plaintiffs that the unconstitutionality of torturing a United States citizen was ‘beyond debate’ by 2001. . . . Yoo is entitled to qualified immunity, however, because it was not clearly established in 2001–03 that the treatment to which Padilla says he was subjected amounted to torture. In 2001–03, there was general agreement that torture meant the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental. [footnote omitted] The meaning of ‘severe pain or suffering,’ however, was less clear in 2001–03. . . . Here, Padilla alleged that he was subjected to prolonged isolation; deprivation of light; exposure to prolonged periods of light and darkness, including being ‘periodically subjected to absolute light or darkness for periods in excess of twenty-four hours’; extreme variations in temperature; sleep adjustment; threats of severe physical abuse; death threats; administration of psychotropic drugs; shackling and manacling for hours at a time; use of ‘stress’ positions; noxious fumes that caused pain to eyes and nose; loud noises; withholding of any mattress, pillow, sheet or blanket; forced grooming; suspensions of showers; removal of religious items; constant surveillance; incommunicado detention, including denial of all contact with family and legal counsel for a 21-month period; interference with religious observance; and denial of medical care for ‘serious and potentially life-threatening ailments, including chest pain and difficulty breathing, as well as for treatment of the chronic, extreme pain caused by being forced to endure stress positions.’. . . The complaint also alleged, albeit in conclusory fashion, that Padilla ‘suffered and continues to suffer severe mental and physical harm as a result of the forty-four months of unlawful military detention and interrogation.’. . . It also alleged that Padilla suffered ‘severe physical pain’ and ‘profound disruption of his senses and personality.’. . . We assume without deciding that Padilla’s alleged treatment rose to the level of torture. [footnote omitted] That it was torture was not, however, ‘beyond debate’ in 2001–03. There was at that time considerable debate, both in and out of government, over the definition of torture as applied to specific interrogation techniques. In light of that debate, as well as the judicial decisions discussed above, we cannot say that any reasonable official in 2001–03 would have known that the specific interrogation techniques allegedly employed against Padilla, however appalling, necessarily amounted to torture. Thus, although we hold that the unconstitutionality of torturing an American citizen was beyond debate in 2001–03, it was not clearly established at that time that the treatment Padilla alleges he was subjected to amounted to torture. . . . For these reasons, we hold that Yoo is entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiffs’ claims. . . . We have discretion to decide which of the two prongs of qualified immunity analysis to address first. . . Here, we consider only the second prong. . . . Because we reverse on that basis, we do not address Yoo’s alternative arguments that the complaint does not adequately allege his personal responsibility for Padilla’s treatment and that a Bivens remedy is unavailable.”)

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 616 (9th Cir. 2012) (“We conclude, like the district court, that Carona could have reasonably but mistakenly believed that Hunt’s demotion was not unconstitutional, given the unique nature of his job as Chief of Police Services for the City of San Clemente. Although Hunt’s position had no department-wide policy-making responsibility, influence, or control, as the jury found, Hunt exercised discretion over the implementation of OCSD policy within San Clemente, influenced OCSD policy as it affected San Clemente, and formulated plans to implement OCSD policy in San Clemente. While Hunt had to secure authority before speaking with the public, when he did so, it was on behalf of the OCSD. We have carefully analyzed the development of the policymaker exception, its underlying purpose, the high burden on the government to prove that political fidelity was a necessary requirement of Hunt’s job, and balanced the nine-factor Fazio analysis that requires a fact-dependent inquiry. Even if Carona engaged in the appropriate analysis and wrongly concluded that Hunt was a policy-maker such that demoting him was constitutional, we cannot say that he acted objectively unreasonably in concluding he could demote Hunt without violating his constitutional rights.”)

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 617 (9th Cir. 2012) (Leavy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Pursuant to the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan. . . we need not decide whether a constitutional violation exists before we reach the question of qualified immunity. Because the majority has chosen to reach the issue whether Carona’s conduct violated Hunt’s constitutional rights, I am compelled to concur in only Sections II. D., III and IV of the opinion. I dissent from the majority’s holding that Hunt was not a ‘policymaker.’”)

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 440, 443-48 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (“Here, we follow the Saucier order as recited above, because this ‘two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent’ in an area where this court’s guidance is sorely needed. . . .We begin by considering the nature and quality of the force used against Brooks: a taser in drive-stun mode. . . . Here, the record is not sufficient for us to determine what level of force is used when a taser is deployed in drivestun mode. We follow the Supreme Court’s guidance in Scott, however, and need not decide this issue in order to assess the reasonableness of the tasing. . . Instead, we proceed to determine whether Jones's use of the taser against Brooks in this case was reasonable, keeping in mind the magnitude of the electric shock at issue and the extreme pain that Brooks experienced. . . . In sum, Brooks's alleged offenses were minor. She did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. She actively resisted arrest insofar as she refused to get out of her car when instructed to do so and stiffened her body and clutched her steering wheel to frustrate the officers' efforts to remove her from her car. Brooks did not evade arrest by flight, and no other exigent circumstances existed at the time. She was seven months pregnant, which the officers knew, and they tased her three times within less than one minute, inflicting extreme pain on Brooks. A reasonable fact-finder could conclude, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Brooks, that the officers' use of force was unreasonable and therefore constitutionally excessive. . . . In sum, when the defendant officers tased Brooks, there were three circuit courts of appeals cases rejecting claims that the use of a taser constituted excessive force; there were no circuit taser cases finding a Fourth Amendment violation. Russo, Hinton, and Draper are factually distinguishable from Brooks. Indeed we have concluded that—unlike the plaintiffs in those cases—Brooks has alleged a Fourth Amendment violation. We cannot conclude, however, in light of these existing precedents, that 'every "reasonable official would have understood" ... beyond debate' that tasing Brooks in these circumstances constituted excessive force. . . . Moreover, the violation was not so obvious that we can 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' finding that Graham alone renders the unconstitutionality of Brooks's tasing clearly established. . . . We therefore follow the example of our court's three-judge panel in Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805 (9th Cir.2010). In Bryan, we held that the use of a taser constituted excessive force, but we concluded that the defendant officer was entitled to qualified immunity. The tasing in Bryan took place in 2005, and we observed that in that year 'there was no Supreme Court decision or decision of our court addressing' the use of a taser in dart mode. . . . As a result, we concluded that 'a reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances' confronted. . . . Thus, we conclude that, although Brooks has alleged an excessive force claim, the law was not sufficiently clear at the time of the incident to render the alleged violation clearly established. Accordingly, the defendant officers are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity against Brooks's § 1983 excessive force claim.") Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 451, 452 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) ("To summarize, Aikala used the intermediate force of a taser in dart-mode on Jayzel after he and the other officers arrived to ensure her safety. Her offense was minimal at most. She posed no threat to the officers. She minimally resisted Troy's arrest while attempting to protect her own body and to comply with Agarano's request that she speak to him outside, and she begged everyone not to wake her sleeping children. She bears minimal culpability for the escalation of the situation. The officers were faced with a potentially dangerous domestic dispute situation in which they reasonably felt that Troy could physically harm them if he chose to, but there was no indication that Troy intended to harm the officers or that he was armed. When Aikala encountered slight difficulty in arresting Troy because Jayzel was between the two men, Aikala tased her without warning. Considering the totality of these circumstances, we fail to see any reasonableness in the use of a taser in dart-mode against Jayzel. When all the material factual disputes are resolved in Jayzel's favor and the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to her, we conclude that she has alleged a Fourth Amendment violation. That is, a reasonable fact finder could conclude that the officers' use of force against Jayzel, as alleged, was constitutionally excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Even though the facts in Mattos are readily distinguishable from the facts in Russo, Hinton, and Draper, the violation was not so obvious that we can rely on the Graham factors and define the contours of clearly established law at a high level of generality. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity for tasing Jayzel.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 453 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Schroeder, J., concurring) ("[T]he Supreme Court's opinion in al-Kidd appears to require us to hold that because there was no established case law recognizing taser use as excessive in similar circumstances, immunity is required.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 453, 454 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) Kozinski, C.J., joined by Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("By asking police to serve and protect us, we citizens agree to comply with their instructions and cooperate with their investigations. Unfortunately, not all of us hold up our end of the bargain. . . . Brooks and Mattos breached the covenant of cooperation by refusing to comply with police orders. When citizens do that, police must bring the situation under control, and they have a number of tools at their disposal.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 460 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Silverman, J., joined by Clifton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Ashcroft v. al-Kidd instructs courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011); however, al-Kidd should not be read to require a DNA-match between our precedent and the cases before us. . . . Precedent already on the books in August 2006 provided officers and courts with enough guidance to know that a taser in dart mode is not a toy and presents a level of force on par with other implements 'used to subdue violent or aggressive persons.' . . . Because the district court correctly found that the circumstances facing Officer Aikala are disputed, summary judgment was properly denied. I would affirm the district court and, therefore, respectfully dissent.")

C.F. ex rel. Farnan v. Capistrano Unified School Dist., 654 F.3d 975, 978, 986 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In this case, a former public high school student alleges that his history teacher violated his rights under the Establishment Clause by making comments during class that were hostile to religion in general, and to Christianity in particular. Mindful that there has never been any prior reported case holding that a teacher violated the Constitution under comparable circumstances, we affirm the district court's conclusion that the teacher is entitled to qualified immunity. Because it is readily apparent that the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question, and because we may resolve the appeal on that basis alone, we decline to pass upon the constitutionality of the teacher's challenged statements. . . . We have little trouble concluding that the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question there has never been any reported case holding that a teacher violated the Establishment Clause by making statements in the classroom that were allegedly hostile to religion. Because the district court’s judgment must be affirmed on that basis, we decline to consider the constitutionality of Corbett’s statements, and we vacate the district court’s decision to the extent it decided the constitutionality of any of Corbett’s statements.”)

Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. County of Los Angeles, 648 F.3d 986, 997 (9th Cir. 2011) (“Under the facts alleged, plaintiffs Wilkinson and Sherr have made out a constitutional violation. They had a right to a post-suspension hearing which Defendants denied them. The district court held that this right was not clearly established, however. The court stated that after the California Court of Appeal’s decision in Zuniga, a reasonable official would have believed that denying jurisdiction over the appeals of retired deputies was lawful. We agree with the district court as to the individually named Civil Service Commissioners, who after Zuniga had no authority to hear Wilkinson’s and Sherr’s appeals. . . But Zuniga does not protect the County Supervisors and the Sheriff. Zuniga interpreted the County Charter and Civil Service Rules as denying the Commission jurisdiction. . . Given the holdings of Loudermill, Mallen, and Gilbert, a reasonable official in the position of the Sheriff and the Supervisors should have concluded that, because the Commission was stripped by the state appellate court of its ability to adjudicate the suspensions of retired employees, those suspensions would be constitutionally suspect. The onus would be on County officials to address this constitutional defect, for example by providing an alternative hearing for the retired employees. Zuniga merely points out a jurisdictional flaw in the County’s civil service procedures; Zuniga does not excuse the unconstitutionality of that flaw. Thus, as to the claims brought by Wilkinson and Sherr, we hold that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to the Sheriff and the Board of Supervisors, but did not err in granting qualified immunity to the Civil Service Commissioners.”)

Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. County of Los Angeles, 648 F.3d 986, 998 (9th Cir. 2011) (“Under the facts alleged, the hearings Defendants provided for Debs and O’Donoghue may have been unconstitutional. We hold, however, that to the extent Debs and O’Donoghue were entitled to a more substantial hearing, this right was not clearly established at the time of the violation. As the Second Circuit recently noted, it is an unresolved question whether due process is satisfied by a post-suspension hearing that sustains a suspension based solely on the fact of a pending criminal proceeding. See Nnebe v. Daus, __ F.3d __, No. 09-4305, 2011 WL 2149924, at *12 (2d Cir. May 31, 2011). Although Gilbert and Mallen make clear that post-suspension procedures are constitutionally required when employees are suspended after being charged with felonies, those cases do not specifically define what must be included in those procedures. A reasonable official would not necessarily infer from existing case law that a post-suspension hearing limited to the question of whether a felony charge has been filed is unconstitutional. Thus, all individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Debs’s and O’Donoghue’s claims.”)

Noble v. Adams, 646 F.3d 1138, 1142, 1143, 1148 (9th Cir. 2011) (“We conclude pursuant to what is now known as prong 2 of the Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S.194 (2001) test . . . that it was not clearly established in 2002—nor is it established yet—precisely how, according to the Constitution, or when a prison facility housing problem inmates must return to normal operations, including outside exercise, during and after a state of emergency called in response to a major riot, here one in which inmates attempted to murder staff. According to Norwood, we defer to prison officials' judgment so long as that judgment does not manifest either deliberate indifference or an intent to inflict harm. . . . In summary, in 2002 it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that his or her conduct vis à vis the declaration of an emergency, the lockdown, or the curtailment of use of the exercise yard was unlawful in the situation he or she confronted.”)

Smith v. Almada, 640 F.3d 931, 941-45 (9th Cir. 2011) (Gwin, District Judge, specially concurring) (“With the motion for rehearing, Judge Gould has withdrawn his concurrence in the holding that a Brady claim cannot be made where there has not been a conviction. Some wisdom supports avoiding constitutional questions where cases can be decided on other grounds. . . . Until recently, however, we would have been required to address the constitutional issue before addressing any Section 1983 immunity issue. . . . And, deciding the materiality issue somewhat begs the question: material to what constitutional right? . . . Because Plaintiff Smith must show both a violation of a constitutional right and that the failure to disclose was material, I believe we should have addressed whether a constitutional right was impaired before moving to whether any violation was material. In addition to finding that the non-disclosed evidence was insufficiently important to undermine confidence in the outcome of Smith’s trial, I would also find that Smith cannot make a Brady claim where there has been no conviction. . . . Three of our sister circuits have found that a defendant who is ultimately acquitted cannot maintain a Brady claim. . . . Moreover, although the Seventh Circuit has not completely foreclosed Brady-based § 1983 claims without a conviction, it requires the plaintiff to show that no trial would have occurred if police had disclosed the exculpatory or impeachment evidence. . . . Recognizing Brady as a post-conviction right does not foreclose all constitutional remedies where a defendant has been tried but not convicted. Where a criminal defendant believes that withheld exculpatory evidence has caused charges to be brought and maintained against him, but no conviction has resulted, his remedy would flow from a false arrest or malicious prosecution claim, and not from Brady. . . . In sum, allowing Brady-based § 1983 claims without a conviction is not compelled by our circuit’s case law, conflicts with other circuits’ case law and the central purpose of Brady, would render Brady’s materiality standard significantly less workable, and lacks a limiting principle. I would therefore not allow § 1983 claims for alleged Brady violations by a defendant who is ultimately acquitted.”)

Bardzik v. County Of Orange, 635 F.3d 1138, 1144, 1145 & n.6, 1149 (9th Cir. 2011) (“Resolving all factual disputes in Bardzik’s favor, we determine whether Carona is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . Under our de novo standard of review and resolving disputes of material fact in Bardzik’s favor, Bardzik was a policymaker as Reserve Division Commander. Thus, under Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), and Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 815-16, 818 (2009), there was no constitutional violation and Carona is entitled to qualified immunity for his allegedly retaliatory demotion of Bardzik. . . . We have the option to address only the clearly-established step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . However, we elect to address whether there was a constitutional violation because the policymaker analysis is fact intensive and unsettled . . . In these circumstances, it is proper to address Saucier's first step first. . . . Because Bardzik was a 'policymaker,' Carona did not violate the Constitution by demoting Bardzik and transferring him to Court Operations, and Carona is entitled to qualified immunity.") Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 825-33 (9th Cir. 2010) (superseding opinion and denial of reh'g en banc) ("We, along with our sister circuits, have held that tasers and stun guns fall into the category of non-lethal force. . . Non-lethal, however, is not synonymous with non-excessive; all force—lethal and non-lethal—must be justified by the need for the specific level of force employed. . . Nor is 'non-lethal' a monolithic category of force. A blast of pepper spray and blows from a baton are not necessarily constitutionally equivalent levels of force simply because both are classified as non-lethal. Rather than relying on broad characterizations, we must evaluate the nature of the specific force employed in a specific factual situation. . . . We recognize the important role controlled electric devices like the Taser X26 can play in law enforcement. The ability to defuse a dangerous situation from a distance can obviate the need for more severe, or even deadly, force and thus can help protect police officers, bystanders, and suspects alike. We hold only that the X26 and similar devices when used in dart-mode constitute an intermediate, significant level of force that must be justified by the governmental interest involved. . . . Officer MacPherson relies heavily on the Eleventh Circuit opinion in Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir.2004), which addressed the use of a taser during the arrest of an aggressive, argumentative individual. Although we do not adopt Draper as the law of this circuit, the present case is clearly distinguishable from the one before the Eleventh Circuit. . . . [T]he officer in Draper was confronting a belligerent, argumentative individual who was angrily pacing within feet of his position. Officer MacPherson, by contrast, was confronted with a half naked, unarmed, stationary, apparently disturbed individual shouting gibberish at a distance of approximately twenty feet. The only similarity to the factual circumstances in Draper is that both Draper and Bryan were stopped for a traffic violation, were loud, and were tasered by the police. . . . [T]here was no substantial government interest in using significant force to effect Bryan's arrest for these misdemeanor violations that even the State of California has determined are minor. . . . Officer MacPherson now argues that use of the taser was justified because he believed Bryan may have been mentally ill and thus subject to detention. To the contrary: if Officer MacPherson believed Bryan was mentally disturbed he should have made greater effort to take control of the situation through less intrusive means. . . . Thus, whether Officer MacPherson believed that Bryan had committed a variety of nonviolent misdemeanors or that Bryan was mentally ill, this Graham factor does not support the deployment of an intermediate level of force. . . . [W]e have held that police are 'required to consider A[w]hat other tactics if any were available' to effect the arrest.' Headwaters, 240 F.3d at 1204 (quoting Chew, 27 F.3d at 1443). . . . We do not challenge the settled principle that police officers need not employ the 'least intrusive' degree of force possible. . . . We merely recognize the equally settled principle that officers must consider less intrusive methods of effecting the arrest and that the presence of feasible alternatives is a factor to include in our analysis. . . . [W]hile by no means dispositive, that Officer MacPherson did not provide a warning before deploying the X26 and apparently did not consider less intrusive means of effecting Bryan's arrest factor significantly into our Graham analysis. . . . We thus conclude that the intermediate level of force employed by Officer MacPherson against Bryan was excessive in light of the governmental interests at stake. Bryan never attempted to flee. He was clearly unarmed and was standing, without advancing in any direction, next to his vehicle. Officer MacPherson was standing approximately twenty feet away observing Bryan's stationary, bizarre tantrum with his X26 drawn and charged. Consequently, the objective facts reveal a tense, but static, situation with Officer MacPherson ready to respond to any developments while awaiting back-up. Bryan was neither a flight risk, a dangerous felon, nor an immediate threat. Therefore, there was simply 'no immediate need to subdue [Bryan]' before Officer MacPherson's fellow officers arrived or less-invasive means were attempted. . . Officer MacPherson's desire to quickly and decisively end an unusual and tense situation is understandable. His chosen method for doing so violated Bryan's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . .All of the factors articulated in Graham—along with our recent applications of Graham in Deorle and Headwaters—placed Officer MacPherson on fair notice that an intermediate level of force was unjustified. . . . However, as of July 24, 2005, there was no Supreme Court decision or decision of our court addressing whether the use of a taser, such as the Taser X26, in dart mode constituted an intermediate level of force. Indeed, before that date, the only statement we had made regarding tasers in a published opinion was that they were among the 'variety of non-lethal "pain compliance" weapons used by police forces.' . . And, as the Eighth Circuit has noted, '[t]he Taser is a relatively new implement of force, and case law related to the Taser is developing.' Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 498 n. 5 (8th Cir.2009). Two other panels have recently, in cases involving different circumstances, concluded that the law regarding tasers is not sufficiently clearly established to warrant denying officers qualified immunity. Mattos v. Agarano, 590 F.3d 1082, 1089-90 (9th Cir.2010); Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018, 1031 n.18 (9th Cir.2010). Based on these recent statements regarding the use of tasers, and the dearth of prior authority, we must conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances Officer MacPherson confronted in July 2005. Accordingly, Officer MacPherson is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 809, 810 (9th Cir. 2010) (9th Cir. 2010) (Wardlaw, J., joined by Judges Pregerson, Reinhardt, and W. Fletcher, concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc) (“Although the panel’s original opinion affirmed the district court’s denial of qualified immunity, Officer MacPherson and amici curiae League of California Cities and California State Association of Counties suggested we reconsider given that two other taser cases arising from incidents that occurred about the same time as Bryan’s tasing were pending in our circuit. We did so, and, although we did not alter our holding that Officer MacPherson used excessive force on Bryan, we concluded that, based on ‘recent statements [in other circuit opinions] regarding the use of tasers, and the dearth of prior authority,’ a ‘reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson’s position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances Officer MacPherson confronted in July 2005.’ . . After the panel filed its amended opinion, only Bryan petitioned for panel rehearing or rehearing en banc. Officer MacPherson opposed Bryan’s petition, arguing that the panel had correctly applied the law of qualified immunity. In other words, our current decision is a denial of Bryan’s—and not Officer MacPherson's—petition for rehearing en banc. After mischaracterizing the record, misstating our holding, and attacking our opinion for language it does not in fact contain, Judge Tallman ultimately bases his dissent to our decision against rehearing en banc upon the largely unsupported and nonsensical belief that use of a device designed to fire a dart up to one-half inch into bare skin and deliver a 1200 volt charge somehow does not constitute an intermediate use of force. He cites no intra-circuit conflict created by our decision, but instead asserts that we erred by quoting binding circuit precedent. He cites no inter-circuit conflict created by our decision, but instead faults us for joining the growing national judicial consensus that tasers in dart mode constitute an intermediate level of force. More strikingly, he fails to tell the public that our court has simultaneously chosen to rehear the two other taser cases en banc—not because those opinions disagreed with the intermediate-level-of-force conclusion in Bryan, for they did not—but instead to reconsider how best to balance ‘the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests’ against ‘the countervailing governmental interests at stake’ as required by Graham, 490 U.S. at 396. See Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir.2010), reh’g en banc granted by 623 F.3d 911, 2010 WL 3896202 (9th Cir. Sep 30, 2010); Mattos v. Agarano, 590 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir.2010), reh’g en banc granted by ___ F.3d ___, 2010 WL 3931122(9th Cir. Oct 04, 2010).”)

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 817, 819 (9th Cir. 2010) (Tallman, J., with whom Judges Callahan and N.R. Smith join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“The panel’s revised opinion correctly determines that the law on whether an officer’s use of a taser to control an aggressive and noncompliant subject violated the subject’s Fourth Amendment rights was not clearly established, and thus holds that Officer MacPherson is entitled to qualified immunity. Having reached that conclusion, the panel’s work should have been done. Instead, the panel goes on to examine whether use of the taser constitutes unconstitutional excessive force. In concluding that it does, the Bryan panel mischaracterizes the facts, relies on bad law, and uses contested facts to set future use-of-force policy for all law enforcement officers in the Ninth Circuit. . . . In apparent recognition of the fact that the Deorle standard is faulty, the panel has again amended its opinion—a single sentence of its opinion—this time to delete the above-quoted language [“[T]he degree of force used by [law enforcement] is permissible only when a strong governmental interest compels the employment of such force.” 272 F.3d at 1280.] and to state instead that tasers ‘constitute an intermediate, significant level of force that must be justified by the governmental interest involved.’ . . . The panel’s amendment does not go far enough. The mere deletion of a single reference to Deorle does not overrule it; we must go en banc to do so. Moreover, the panel’s repeated citations to Deorle throughout the rest of the opinion suggest that it considers Deorle to present a more preferable standard than the one the Supreme Court has chosen. Indeed, by amending its opinion to more accurately reflect the correct standard without actually applying it, the panel attempts to disguise the fact that it has applied Deorle yet again. In so doing, it has ensured that the judgment of the officer on the street, who is not afforded the luxury of time, will nearly always be supplanted by the more ponderous judgment of this Court.”)

Costanich v. Department of Social and Health Services, 627 F.3d 1101, 1108, 1109 n.12, 1113-16 (9th Cir. 2010) (“We conclude that deliberately fabricating evidence in civil child abuse proceedings violates the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment when a liberty or property interest is at stake, . . . and that genuine issues of material fact exist on the question of deliberate fabrication. We further conclude, however, that, because it was not clear at the time these events took place that this right applied in the context of proceedings adjudicating a foster care license and termination of guardianship, Duron did not deprive Costanich of a constitutional right that was ‘clearly established.’ Accordingly, Duron is entitled to qualified immunity for the alleged evidence fabrication and declaration in support of the guardianship termination proceedings. . . . We proceed to apply the Saucier two steps in sequence because we have discretion to do so, and because we find such application to be beneficial. . . . We . . . conclude that Costanich had a Fourteenth Amendment due process right to be free from deliberately fabricated evidence in a civil child abuse proceeding, and that, because genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether Duron deliberately fabricated evidence, which led to the termination proceedings and license revocation, the district court erroneously concluded that ‘Plaintiff has not provided evidence showing that Defendants deliberately made false statements and fabricated evidence to make a false finding of abuse.’ . . . We agree with the district court’s conclusion that Duron did not violate Costanich’s ‘clearly established’ rights. Although we conclude that, going forward, officials who deliberately fabricate evidence in civil child abuse proceedings which result in the deprivation of a protected liberty or property interest are not entitled to qualified immunity, this right had not previously been clearly established in the civil context. . . . Under Devereaux, charging an individual with criminal child abuse based on false information violates the Constitution. . . . Although Devereaux does not specifically address civil child abuse proceedings, the right not to be accused based upon deliberately fabricated evidence is sufficiently obvious, and Devereaux is sufficiently analogous to the facts here, that government officials are on notice that deliberately falsifying information during civil investigations which result in the deprivation of protected liberty or property interests may subject them to § 1983 liability. . . . Further, because social workers, like prosecutors, are entitled to absolute immunity for instituting child removal proceedings, social workers, like prosecutors, must refrain from deliberately falsifying evidence during investigations and in sworn testimony or declarations to the court. . . . Thus, going forward, reasonable government officials are on notice that deliberately falsifying evidence in a child abuse investigation and including false evidentiary statements in a supporting declaration violates constitutional rights where it results in the deprivation of liberty or property interests, be it in a criminal or civil proceeding. However, given the distinctions between criminal prosecutions and civil foster care proceedings, we cannot say that this right was clearly established as of 2001, when the conduct at issue in this case occurred. The special duties of prosecutors and the unique interests at stake in a criminal action do not parallel the duties and interests at stake in a civil child custody proceeding. Washington’s ‘paramount concern’ for safeguarding and protecting the health and safety of foster children, for example, places a special duty on DSHS officials to vigorously investigate allegations of child abuse. . . . Furthermore, it is clear that Washington foster care licensees’ and custodial guardians’ interests do not rise to the level of a criminal defendant’s interests, which are clear and long-established. While these factors do not excuse deliberate fabrication of evidence, there are sufficient distinctions between criminal prosecutions and civil foster care proceedings that the right had not yet been clearly established in the civil context.

Because we conclude that the right not to be accused based on deliberately falsified evidence during civil investigations which could result in the deprivation of protected liberty or property interests was not clearly established when the conduct at issue in this case occurred, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

James v. Rowlands, 606 F.3d 646, 652-56 (9th Cir. 2010) ("First, James contends that the defendants' failure to notify him of the molestation investigation violated his constitutional rights. In support of this claim, James points to no authority establishing that any parent-even a parent with full legal and physical custody-has a constitutional right to be informed when officials investigate allegations that his or her child has been molested. . . . Exercising our discretion under Pearson, we decline to decide here whether parents have such a right, and whether officials have a correlative constitutional duty to notify a minor's parent when they investigate allegations that the minor has been molested. . . . Instead, we affirm the grant of summary judgment for the defendants on the ground that such a right, if it exists, was not clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . . Second, James contends that the defendants violated his rights by failing to notify him of the investigation into Blair's alleged attempts to coerce C.J. to change her testimony. Again, James points to no authority suggesting that state actors such as the defendants here have a constitutional duty to inform a minor's parent of such allegations, or more generally of allegations that someone is mistreating the child. We decline to decide here whether or under what circumstances parents have a right to such information. Instead, we affirm the grant of qualified immunity to the defendants on this claim because such a right, if it exists, was not clearly established. . . . [A] reasonable jury could find that the CPS officials violated James's rights by taking C.J. into protective custody and placing her with her grandmother without notifying him or giving him the opportunity to take C.J. into his care. . . . On the factual record, a jury could conclude that the CPS officials' failure to notify James that they were taking C.J. into protective custody was not 'reasonably necessary' to avert any danger to C.J. and that the CPS officials therefore violated James's rights. . . . Thus, James's allegations, taken as true, establish that the CPS officials violated his constitutional rights. Nonetheless, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. Burke extended for the first time Wallis's rule to protect parents without physical custody. . . . Burke recognized that, before it addressed the issue, it was not clearly established that detaining a child without notifying a parent who had only shared legal custody would violate that parent's constitutional rights. . . . Because James's rights were therefore not clearly established in 2003, the time of the relevant events here, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . We therefore hold that the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of parents' rights requires officials to notify a parent with shared legal custody of a transfer in a minor's physical custody when the officials have encouraged and facilitated that transfer. . . . Following Wallis's example, we hold that public officials may encourage and facilitate a transfer of a minor's physical custody without notifying a parent with shared legal custody only if they have reasonable cause to believe that such notification would put the child in imminent danger of serious bodily injury. . . . The defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. As discussed above, Burke, decided in 2009, was the first case in this circuit to establish that interfering with a child's physical custody can violate the rights of a parent who does not have physical custody. . . Failing to contact James about the voluntary agreement was therefore not clearly unlawful at the time, and the CPS defendants are entitled to summary judgment on this claim.”).

Ewing v. City of Stockton, 588 F.3d 1218, 1231 (9th Cir. 2009) (“[W]e need not determine whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Heather for murder because the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009) (authorizing courts to determine whether right at issue was clearly established before deciding whether it was violated). The Ewings do not establish that the unlawfulness of charging Heather with murder on the facts in question was clearly established.”) .

Phillips v. Hust, 588 F.3d 652, 654-58 (9th Cir. 2009) (on remand from Supreme Court) (“We are confronted with two questions in this remanded case. First, did Hust’s actions violate the Constitution? Second, assuming a constitutional violation, is Hust nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the relevant constitutional right was not ‘clearly established’ at the time she acted? Until this year, the Supreme Court required us to resolve those issues in a rigid two-step ‘order of battle.’ That is, we were required, first, to determine whether the defendant’s actions violated a constitutional right and second, whether that right was clearly established. . . The so-called ‘Saucier two-step’ was designed to promote the Constitution’s ‘elaboration from case to case’ and to prevent ‘constitutional stagnation,’ but generated considerable criticism from academics and judges. . . . Keeping Pearson in mind, we turn to the case now before us. This case is about the First Amendment right of access to the courts. . . . Therefore, for Phillips to prevail, he must show that use of the comb-binding machine was necessary to allow him ‘meaningful access’ to the courts. . . . Before answering that question, however, we pause to discuss Pearson’s impact on this case. Because the qualified immunity issue is straightforward, this is an appropriate case to bypass the more difficult question of whether Hust violated Phillips’s constitutional rights. . . Moreover, this is a case ‘in which the constitutional question is so fact-bound that the decision [would] provide [] little guidance for future cases.’ . . Thus, gladly exercising our newfound authority, we do not decide whether Hust’s actions violated Phillips’s constitutional rights. Rather, we proceed directly to ask whether Hust is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he precise question before us is whether a reasonable prison official would believe that denying access to the comb-binding machine would violate an inmate’s right of meaningful access to the Supreme Court of the United States. . . .In light of the Supreme Court’s flexible rules for pro se filings, which do not require and perhaps do not even permit comb-binding, we have no difficulty concluding that Hust is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Burke v. County of Alameda, 586 F.3d 725, 733, 734 (9th Cir. 2009) (“The intrusion on Farina’s right of familial association presents us with a question of first impression because B.F. did not reside with Farina. In Brittain v. Hansen, this circuit recognized that non-custodial parents have a reduced liberty interest in the companionship, care, custody, and management of their children. . . . Although Melissa and Farina shared joint legal custody of B. F., the record indicates that Melissa had sole physical custody. However, even if Farina’s interest in B.F.’s companionship was somehow reduced, he was not without any interest in the custody and management of B.F. We therefore extend the holding in Wallis to parents with legal custody, regardless of whether they also possess physical custody of their children. . . . We now expressly extend our holding in Wallis, 202 F.3d at 1138, to parents with only legal custody. . . . Against this legal backdrop, we cannot say that failing to contact Farina, who did not have physical custody of B.F., was clearly unlawful. Accordingly, Foster is entitled to immunity, and we affirm the grant of summary judgment in his favor.”).

Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 918 n.8, 919, 920 (9th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion) (“Before the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009), courts addressing an official’s claim of qualified immunity were required to follow the two-step sequential inquiry established in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001), asking first whether the plaintiff alleged a violation of a constitutional right and, second, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. Pearson relieved courts of their obligation always to follow this sequence. . . . Although rigid adherence to the Saucier protocol is no longer required, the Court was careful to note that Saucier’s two-step procedure is ‘often beneficial,’ as it ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent.’. . . Such is the case here, where we have not previously addressed whether a police officer may rely solely on the statements of a very young victim of alleged sexual abuse to establish probable cause to seize a potential suspect. . . . We hold that Jensen could not rely solely on the uncorroborated, inconsistent statements of this very young child to establish probable cause to arrest Paul. Given A.B.’s age at the time of the purported events and at the time she reported them, as well as the inconsistencies noted above, A.B.’s statements, standing alone, were insufficient to establish probable cause to seize Paul. . . . Although we disagree with his assessment of A.B.’s credibility and read the applicable case law as consistent with our conclusion, none of the cases cited by the Stoots put him directly on notice that his decision to rely on A.B.’s statements, without any corroboration, was unlawful. We therefore affirm the district court’s judgment that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the Stoots’ Fourth Amendment claim.”).

Mueller v. Aufer, 576 F.3d 979, 994, 995, 1000 (9th Cir. 2009) (“With all respect to the district court’s conclusion to the contrary, this kaleidoscopic set of facts and circumstances creates without doubt a classic genuine issue of material fact on the central issue of whether Rogers reasonably perceived imminent danger to Taige. . . . Thus, if a factfinder were to decide that Rogers was indeed confronted with exigent circumstances, his failure to contact Eric would not have violated Eric’s rights. On the other hand, a factual decision to the contrary would produce an opposite constitutional result. This case, therefore, presents the type of situation as contemplated by the Supreme Court where a constitutional decision is inappropriate and unwise. . . . Thus we proceed to the next prong. . . . [V]iewing here the facts in the light most favorable to the Muellers, and assuming without deciding that Eric Mueller in the circumstances presented, had constitutional rights to both pre- and post-deprivation notice which were not honored, we determine whether those rights were clearly established. Specifically, was it clearly established that Detective Rogers had to give pre-deprivation notice not only to the parent in the hospital present with and exercising judgment with respect to her child's medical situation, but also to a parent absent from the scene of his decision? Further, was it clearly established that Eric Mueller had a constitutional right to post-deprivation notice, which Detective Rogers had the responsibility to deliver? . . . Detective Rogers has successfully shown he is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he violated Eric Mueller's constitutional right to pre-deprivation notice. It was not clearly established at the time that he removed Taige from her parents' custody that he was required to give Eric Mueller notice of his decision. Thus, we reverse both the district court's denial of summary judgment on Rogers's claim and the district court's grant of summary judgment to Eric Mueller on the underlying issue. In addition, Detective Rogers has successfully shown he is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he violated Eric Mueller's constitutional right to post-deprivation notice. Accordingly, we remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Mueller v. Aufer, 576 F.3d 979, 1006, 1007 (9th Cir. 2009) (Wallace, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I disagree with the majority's decision to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the district court's partial summary judgment in favor of Eric on his procedural due process claims. I would instead refrain from hearing the appeal at this interlocutory stage of the proceedings. . . I turn next to Detective Rogers' appeal from the district court's denial of his qualified immunity claim. This appeal is undoubtedly subject to immediate review under Mitchell, and I agree that the district court should be reversed. However, I am concerned with how the majority reaches that conclusion. As the majority recounts, the Supreme Court in Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009) held that courts now have discretion to determine 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis [prescribed in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001)] should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' In this case, the majority reasons, '[b]ecause we have concluded after reviewing the factual evidence on this issue in the light most favorable to Rogers—or for that matter to Eric Mueller—that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Rogers was confronted with imminent danger to Taige at the time in question, we see no useful purpose in pursuing[the first step of Saucier].' The majority's reasoning is deficient in the context of qualified immunity. The first step of Saucier asks whether, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the allegedly injured party, the record establishes a constitutional violation. 533 U.S. at 201. Nothing about this inquiry requires this court to resolve factual disputes in the record. In fact, the Supreme Court has clarified that the first step of the Saucier inquiry in no way requires courts to assume a fact-finding capacity; rather, a court generally just adopts the version of the facts set forth by the party challenging immunity. . . Thus, contrary to the majority's reasoning, the existence of a factual dispute as to the 'imminent danger' does not justify skipping the first step of Saucier. . . . At this stage in the dispute, we are required only to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the injured party—no factual findings are required. The majority's reference to this factual dispute as reason to skip step one of Saucier is therefore misplaced. . . . Unlike the majority, I would hold that this is a case where the court can 'rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law,' while the question at step one of Saucier is more difficult. . . . Indeed, the first step inquiry asks us to determine whether due process requires a state official to give an absent parent notice of his decision to assume custody of a child for emergency medical purposes. We need not resolve this complicated constitutional issue, however, because both the majority and the dissent agree that even if such rights existed, they were not clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct. Thus, this case presents a prime example of a case where skipping the first step of Saucier is advisable because ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’”).

Tibbetts v. Kulongoski, 567 F.3d 529, 535, 536, 539, 540 (9th Cir. 2009) (“Under the circumstances of this case, we adopt Pearson’s more flexible approach and proceed directly to an analysis of Saucier’s second prong, to determine whether the right asserted in this case was ‘clearly established’ when the alleged stigmatizing statements were made. . . . As permitted by Pearson and required by Saucier, we analyze the merits of the Governor’s qualified immunity claim by addressing whether the parameters of Plaintiffs’ right to a name clearing hearing were clearly established at the time of the Releases. . . . Although cases need not be ‘fundamentally similar’ in order to put an official on notice that his conduct violates established law, Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002), if the parameters of the right are not clearly established by case law, the official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Here, it cannot be said that a reasonable person in Governor Kulongoski’s position would have known that he was violating Plaintiffs’ Fourteenth Amendment due process rights under the circumstances of this case. Even if we assume, arguendo that the statements in the Releases were stigmatizing to Plaintiffs, it was not then established whether the stigmatizing statements satisfied the ‘temporal nexus’ requirement of Campanelli, nor that the Governor could be found to have ‘caused’ Plaintiffs’ terminations. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment to Governor Kulongoski.”).

Ramirez v. City of Buena Park, 560 F.3d 1012, 1022-24 (9th Cir. 2009) (“Because Montez could not have reasonably suspected Ramirez had a weapon, we hold his pat-down of Ramirez violated the Fourth Amendment. Having determined the existence of a constitutional violation, we consider whether the right violated was clearly established at the time of its occurrence. . . At the time of Ramirez’s pat-down, it was clearly established that every pat-down is unreasonable unless it is supported by the officer’s reasonable suspicion that the person to be frisked is armed and dangerous. . . .Bypassing the constitutional question in the qualified immunity analysis, we exercise our discretion in reaching Saucier’s second prong first, see Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818, as it will ‘satisfactorily resolve’ the arrest issue without having ‘unnecessarily to decide difficult constitutional questions.’. . . [W]e conclude that a reasonable officer in Montez’s position would not have clearly known that his conduct was unlawful under these circumstances. . . Although we do not decide whether the facts allege a constitutional violation, we do find that Montez’s actions were reasonable in light of the qualified immunity analysis. Thus, Montez is entitled to summary judgment on this issue.”).

Rodis v. City, County of San Francisco, 558 F.3d 964, 968-70 (9th Cir. 2009) (“In Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 200 (2001), the Supreme Court mandated a two step sequence for resolving qualified immunity claims. First, a court must decide whether the alleged facts make out a violation of a constitutional right. . . If the plaintiff satisfies the first step, the court must then decide whether the right at issue was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . More recently, however, the Supreme Court revisited Saucier and concluded that ‘while the sequence set forth there is often appropriate, it should no longer be regarded as mandatory.’ . . Accordingly, we first turn to the question of whether the right asserted in this case was ‘clearly established.’ . . In evaluating the totality of the circumstances in this case, however, we embark on uncharted waters. Defendants assert that they had probable cause as to Rodis’s intent based solely on the evidence suggesting that the bill might have been fake. Rodis contends that without specific evidence of his intent to defraud, above and beyond the tender of a potentially counterfeit bill, the arrest was unlawful. This circuit has never addressed this issue. . . All of the other circuits to have answered this question, however, have found that ‘[t]he passing of a counterfeit note coupled with an identification of the person who passed the note furnishes probable cause to arrest the individual identified as passing the note.’ . In Pearson, the Supreme Court noted that ‘where the divergence of views on ... [the constitutionality of the alleged misconduct] [i]s created by the decision of the Court of Appeals in th[e] case, it is improper to subject petitioners to money damages for their conduct.’ . Thus, regardless of whether we determine that evidence beyond the tender of a counterfeit bill was required, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Were we to decide that there was a violation, we would create a circuit split and Defendants would not have been on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Were we to decide that this evidence was not required, Rodis’s claim would fail in the first instance. Because it is unnecessary to disposition of this case, we decline to decide this question.”).

Reid v. City of Beverly Hills, No. 07-56059, 2009 WL 367397, at *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 13, 2009) (“We do not decide whether probable cause was lacking, see Pearson v. Callahan . . . , for, even assuming the officers were mistaken, there is no law that would have made it clear to a reasonable police officer in these officers’ position that their assessment of probable cause violated Reid’s constitutional rights. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity based on their objectively reasonable, albeit mistaken, belief that there was probable cause.”).

Barnard v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., 310 F. App’x 990, 2009 WL 277044, at 1-3 (9th Cir. Feb. 4, 2009) (“Under Pearson, the decisional sequence required by Saucier is no longer mandatory. . . . We thus proceed in our analysis under the Supreme Court’s new guidance. . . . The district court correctly granted summary judgment as to Charles’ mistaken arrest claim. For the purposes of our analysis we assume, without deciding, that the mistaken arrest constituted a violation of his constitutional rights. . . . Even assuming a constitutional violation, however, we conclude that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . The district court erred in granting summary judgment as to Charles’ excessive force claim as against the officers. Under Saucier, we first analyze whether Charles has alleged a viable claim that his constitutional rights were violated. . . . We now turn to whether a reasonable officer would have known that the use of force here was unlawful, that is, whether the right to be free of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . [A]t the time of the incident at issue here, a reasonable officer would have known that it violated clearly established law to use a choke hold on a non-resisting arrestee who had surrendered, pepper-spray him, and apply such knee pressure on his neck and back that it would cause the collapse of five vertebrae in his cervical spine. Thus, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as we must at this stage, we conclude that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Gohranson v. Snohomish County, NO. C16-1124RSL, 2018 WL 5921012, at *1-2 & n.2 (W.D. Wash. Nov. 13, 2018) (“Until 2015, a detainee alleging that the government had been deliberately indifferent to her medical needs had to show that defendants were subjectively aware of a substantial risk of serious harm when they failed to provide medical care. The Court previously found that plaintiffs’ medical care claim would fail under that standard ‘because they have not produced evidence that any of the corrections officers or nurses who interacted with Ms. Kronberger in the week before her death recognized that her medical condition had transitioned from the horror that is opiate withdrawal to a life-threatening electrolyte imbalance.’. . . The contours of a pretrial detainee’s medical care claims under the Due Process Clause have changed since 2015, however, such that custodians can now be liable in the absence of subjective knowledge if a ‘reasonable official in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved.’. . . That fact is dispositive of the claims against the individual defendants. . . . As discussed above, defendants’ conduct was not unconstitutional in 2014 because they were not subjectively aware that Ms. Kronberger was suffering from life-threatening dehydration and electrolyte imbalance. The announcement of an objective standard for judging defendants’ conduct post-dated the events that gave rise to this litigation and imposed additional requirements on defendants. Previously, custodial and medical staff were required to respond to the facts of which they were aware: now they must consider the possibility that additional inquiry, evaluation, or testing is necessary to ensure that they are correctly apprehending the risks involved and are being reasonably responsive to those risks. Because there was no clearly established right to medical attention from jail staff who did not actually perceive the need for such attention in 2014, qualified immunity bars plaintiffs’ Fourteenth Amendment claim for lack of adequate medical care. . . . The Court declines to decide the first part of the qualified immunity analysis, namely whether the individual defendants’ conduct violated Ms. Kronberger’s constitutional rights under Kingsley and Gordon. Individual defendants made efforts to monitor Ms. Kronberger’s situation and responded to her needs with differing degrees of care. Taken together, those efforts were insufficient to avert the detainee’s death, but determining whether a particular defendant was simply negligent or was objectively and deliberately indifferent in the context of a not-enough-medical-care claim is extremely challenging on both the facts and the law. The Court therefore exercises its discretion to address the ‘clearly established’ prongs of the qualified immunity analysis first.”)

Nichols v. Brown, 945 F.Supp.2d 1079, 1098-1101 (C.D. Cal. 2013) (“The Court exercises its discretion to address the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether the right Plaintiff asserts to openly carry a firearm, whether loaded or unloaded, in a public park was ‘clearly established’ under the Second Amendment as of May 21, 2012, when Plaintiff was stopped by Officer Heywood and Officer Doe. Even assuming, without deciding, for the limited purpose of the qualified immunity analysis only, that a constitutional violation occurred in the warrantless inspection and confiscation of Plaintiff's long gun, the Court concludes that the right to openly carry a firearm in a public park was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation and that the individually-named Redondo Beach defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's claim for money damages. . . . In light of the continued uncertainty as to the scope of the rights accorded by the Second Amendment following the Supreme Court's recent decisions in Heller and McDonald, the Court concludes that the right to openly carry a firearm in a public park was not 'beyond debate' at the time of the alleged violation such that a reasonable official would understand that enforcing a city ordinance that prohibits carrying a firearm in specified public areas was unconstitutional.")

Mann v. County of San Diego, No. 3:11-cv-0708-GPC-BGS, 2013 WL 4046642, *10 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 8, 2013) ("Plaintiff's assert that, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's vacatur of the Fourth Amendment portion of the Ninth Circuit's decision in Greene, Cisneros' interview of N.G.P.M. was unconstitutional. While the interview of N.G.P.M. may have been unconstitutional, the Court first addresses whether a right to be free from such interviews was clearly established at the time of the interview. In that regard, Plaintiffs provide no additional authority demonstrating that, at the time of the interview, it was clearly established that a social worker's brief, voluntary interview of a suspected child-abuse victim at school (with the option of having a school official present) violates the Constitution. Thus, the Court finds Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the interview of N.G.P.M. at school.")

Skurdal v. Federal Detention Center, No. C12-706 RSM, 2013 WL 3897772, *1, *2 (W.D. Wash. July 29, 2013) ("[T]he Court declines to adopt Part III(D)(3)(a) of the Report and Recommendation. The Ninth Circuit has not expressly held that a plaintiff can bring a Bivens claim for alleged Free Exercise Clause violations. In Resnick v. Adams, the Ninth Circuit considered a Free Exercise challenge brought as a Bivens claim, but ultimately dismissed it for failure to state a constitutional violation, without holding that Bivens was the proper vehicle to bring such a claim if it were valid. . . . Therefore, whether or not the Bivens claim was proper was immaterial to the decision. . . . Although the unpublished decision in Panagacos v. Towery allowed a free-speech claim to proceed under Bivens, 501 Fed. App'x 620, 623 (9th Cir.2012), this does not mean that Bivens also encompasses Free Exercise claims since the Supreme Court considers each type of First Amendment claim on its own merits, rather than the Amendment as a whole when determining whether a Bivens action can be brought. . . . At least three other circuits have also explicitly reserved this question, assuming without deciding that such a claim can be brought. [citing cases] While the Ninth Circuit may find that such a claim can be brought, the Court finds it more prudent at this time, in the absence of an explicit Ninth Circuit holding, to assume without deciding the issue because it may be unnecessary to answer should the Court grant the individual-capacity defendants' properly supported motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Mendez v. City of Scottsdale, Ariz., No. CV-12-285-PHX-GMS, 2012 WL 3870364, *6 (D. Ariz. Sept. 6, 2012) (“Plaintiff alleges that he was arrested in retaliation for questioning Officer Bolin regarding Bolin’s demand that Plaintiff show identification, in violation of his speech rights. As Plaintiff concedes in his Response, however, at the time Officer Bolin took action based on Plaintiff’s speech, he already had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for failure to obey his orders. . . Plaintiff contends, citing Houston v. Hill, that the First Amendment ‘protects the rights of citizens to criticize and even challenge the police.’ . . Hill, however, was a case in which the Court reversed the conviction of a defendant who was arrested and convicted solely for verbally challenging police under a statute which the Court deemed unconstitutional. . . In this case, Officer Bolin had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff on independent grounds. And the Supreme Court recently implied that an arrest made in retaliation for one’s exercise of protected speech is not unlawful so long as the officer has probable cause for the arrest on other grounds. [citing Reichle v. Howards] The Court will dismiss Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment wrongful arrest/imprisonment claim and First Amendment freedom of speech claim.”)

Guzman-Martinez v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. CV 11-02390-PHX-NVW, 2012 WL 2873835, *8, *9 (D. Ariz. July 13, 2012) (“Without considering any limitation of Plaintiff’s rights under the Fourteenth Amendment because she is a detained alien, housing transgender women inmates among male inmates monitored by male detention officers would violate the Fourteenth Amendment if the practice imposes some harm to the transgender women inmates that significantly exceeds the inherent discomforts of confinement and is not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective, such as maintaining security and order and operating the detention facility in a manageable fashion. To determine whether Kane, Scalet, Campbell, and Leal are shielded by qualified immunity, it is not necessary to decide the first prong of the qualified immunity standard, i.e., whether the practice violates the Fourteenth Amendment, because the constitutional standard is not clearly established, which satisfies the second prong for establishing qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff primarily alleges that Defendants should have known that transgender women inmates are vulnerable to victimization and that housing them with male inmates monitored by male detention officers would subject them to serious risk of substantial harm. Plaintiff also alleges inadequate training and supervision of detention officers and supervision of inmates, but does not allege, even generally, the training and supervision needed to prevent serious risk of substantial harm to transgender women. . . . Plaintiff has not identified any legal authority holding that a transgender woman, who is biologically male, has a constitutional right to be housed in an immigration detention facility for females and to only have contact with female detention officers. . . . Therefore, Plaintiff does not have a clearly established constitutional right to be housed in a women’s detention facility or in a single-occupancy cell in a men’s detention facility or to be released from detention based solely on her status as a transgender woman.”)

J.C. ex rel. R.C. v. Beverly Hills Unified School Dist., 711 F.Supp.2d 1094, 1124-26 (C.D. Cal. 2010) (“Here, although the Court has found that a violation of J.C.’s First Amendment rights has occurred, the second Saucier step unequivocally resolves the issue of qualified immunity in Defendants’ favor. . . . Here, there is no binding Supreme Court precedent that governs J.C.’s conduct. The Supreme Court has yet to address whether off-campus speech posted on the Internet, which subsequently makes its way to campus either by the speaker or by any other means, may be regulated by school officials. . . . Additionally, while numerous recent cases have applied the Supreme Court’s student speech precedents to cases involving student speech over the Internet, see Beussink, Emmett, Killion, O.Z., Wisniewski, Doninger, and Bethlehem, none have done so in a factually analogous setting. The Court has yet to find a student-speech case addressing hurtful and embarrassing speech directed at a student’s classmate, which emanated outside the school grounds. . . . Certainly, the contours of a student’s First Amendment right to make a potentially defamatory and degrading video about a classmate, which is almost immediately thereafter brought to the School’s attention, are not clearly established.”)

Wieber v. Porter, No. 23-1158, 2025 WL 635753, at *6 (10th Cir. Feb. 27, 2025) (not reported) (“Here, we resolve the warrantless arrest claim solely on Mr. Wieber’s failure to meet prong two of qualified immunity—clearly established law. But with respect to the unlawful search claim we examine both prongs of qualified immunity, ultimately concluding that while Mr. Wieber has established a constitutional violation at prong one of qualified immunity, his claim fails at prong two because he has not established that every reasonable officer would have known the warrant was overbroad. . . . The warrant in this case. . . is a far cry from the obviously and facially deficient warrant in Groh—specifically, the particularity defect in the warrant here is not of the type ‘that “just a simple glance” would have revealed.’. . . Rather, the warrant contains substantially more specificity than a mere description of Mr. Wieber’s cell phone, instead listing in detail the types of information appropriately searched. And we cannot say that all but the plainly incompetent would have, upon reviewing the affidavit and warrant in tandem, both homed in on the warrant’s imperfect incorporation of the affidavit and thereby concluded that the cabining language—‘this investigation’—did not adequately constrain the warrant’s scope. Further, Officer Barron submitted the warrant and supporting affidavit to his supervisor, who reviewed and approved them. To hold that Officer Barron’s conduct was not objectively reasonable ‘would mean not only that [he] w[as] “plainly incompetent,” but that [his] supervisor ... and the Magistrate were as well.’. . . That neither his supervisor nor the magistrate judge who issued the warrant ‘expressed concern about its validity demonstrates that any error was not obvious.’. . . In short, we cannot say that our conclusion on the merits of Mr. Wieber’s unlawful search claim—that the warrant was not adequately particularized—was so glaringly apparent that it falls within the ‘narrow exception’ to the rule that a neutral magistrate judge’s issuance of the warrant is ‘the clearest indication’ that an officer acted objectively reasonably. Id. at 547–48. Officer Barron is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, and we thus affirm the summary judgment entered in his favor.”)

Griffith v. El Paso County, Colorado, 129 F.4th 790, 807, 820-29 (10th Cir. 2025) (“This appeal presents only the antecedent questions relevant at the motion to dismiss stage: does a sex classification exist, and has Ms. Griffith plausibly stated an Equal Protection claim? We answer yes to both. While we find Ms. Griffith plausibly alleged an Equal Protection violation, we must

affirm as to all but one defendant—Sheriff Elder, sued in his official capacity—because the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . [W]e find Ms. Griffith has stated a plausible claim that the Housing and Commissary Policies violate the Equal Protection Clause. We now explain what our conclusion means for each defendant. Recall, on this claim, Ms. Griffith sued all defendants, including seven people in their individual capacities and Sheriff Elder also in his official capacity. . . We start with all defendants sued in their individual capacities. These defendants ‘raised the qualified immunity defense to Griffith’s constitutional claims’ and maintain it on appeal. . . To overcome that defense, Ms. Griffith must show ‘(1) the officers’ alleged conduct violated a constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established at the time of the violation, such that “every reasonable official would have understood,” that such conduct constituted a violation of that right.’ . Appellees argue both prongs of the defense. They first maintain ‘Griffith did not establish that a constitutional violation occurred.’ . For the reasons above, as to the Equal Protection claim, that is wrong. They next allege Ms. Griffith could not ‘show a clearly established right.’ . On that, we are persuaded. Our analysis of the Equal Protection claim applies this court’s decision in Fowler, a 2024 case. All actions pertinent to this appeal occurred well before that year. Appellees correctly observe, ‘Before Fowler, neither the Supreme Court nor this Court had imported Bostock’s Title VII reasoning to an equal protection claim brought under the Fourteenth Amendment.’ . While Appellees seem to agree intermediate scrutiny applies after Fowler, they are also correct that ‘they had not been given fair notice that intermediate scrutiny would apply to their classification decisions made with respect’ to Ms. Griffith. . . . Commander Gillespie and Deputies Elliss and Mustapick are entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court properly determined. But, unlike the district court, we conclude Ms. Griffith has plausibly alleged Deputy Mustapick committed a constitutional violation by conducting a cross-gender strip search. For this reason, we must reinstate the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment cross-gender search claims against Sheriff Elder in his official capacity. Those claims had previously been dismissed for lack of a constitutional violation by a subordinate. Finally, we reverse the grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Mustapick on Ms. Griffith’s Fourth Amendment abusive search claim. . . Ms. Griffith’s Fourth Amendment claim implicates her right to be free from unreasonable searches. . . . Ms. Griffith’s Fourteenth Amendment claim implicates her right to personal privacy. . . . The Constitution protects a prisoner from being forced to unnecessarily expose their naked body which, as we have held, ‘is a severe invasion of personal privacy.’ . . And a plaintiff can state a Fourteenth Amendment claim by alleging facts supporting the inference that ‘the exposure of [her] body was “not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or [was] excessive in relation to that purpose.”’ . . Whether analyzed under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments, we must balance the intrusiveness of the search against the government’s reason for conducting it. . . We therefore evaluate Ms. Griffith’s Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims together. . . . To overcome the qualified immunity defense, Ms. Griffith must show ‘(1) the officers’ alleged conduct violated a constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established at the time of the violation, such that “every reasonable official would have understood,” that such conduct constituted a violation of that right.’ . . On appeal, Ms. Griffith concedes the Jail could subject her to a strip search before she entered general population. She contends only that assigning a male deputy to perform that strip search had no ‘relationship to legitimate penological concerns’ and thus violated the Constitution.

. .As we explain, the district court’s qualified-immunity ruling must be affirmed. Though we conclude Ms. Griffith has plausibly alleged a constitutional violation, the law was not clearly established that Deputy Mustapick’s participation as alleged violated the Constitution. . . . According to the district court, it was not ‘ “sufficiently clear” that every “reasonable official would understand”’ at the time of Ms. Griffith’s strip search that a male deputy could not strip search a transgender female detainee. . . We agree with the district court. The relevant question is whether ‘the law put officials on fair notice that the described conduct was unconstitutional.’ . . True, our law is clear that cross-gender strip searches must be motivated by some penological interest. . . But as Appellees persuasively point out, we have not previously applied this principle to searches of transgender inmates. . . Only one case, Farmer v. Perrill, involved a transgender inmate. . . But the Farmer plaintiff challenged the overall justification for strip searches conducted in view of other inmates. . . Unlike here, the constitutional challenge in Farmer did not concern whether the person who searched the transgender detainee was male or female. These cases therefore could not have provided guidance to a reasonable officer in Deputy Mustapick’s position. Ms. Griffith insists no factually analogous case is required to show the law was clearly established. According to Ms. Griffith, ‘common sense tells us conducting a cross-gender strip search of a psychologically vulnerable transgender detainee, over vociferous protestations ... violates the constitutional protections against punishment and unreasonable searches.’ . . Ms. Griffith relies on Colbruno, where we recognized an obvious violation of the Fourteenth Amendment when a pretrial detainee was paraded naked through a hospital. Colbruno acknowledged we ‘can occasionally rely on the general proposition that it would be “clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted ... even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.”’ . Ms. Griffith is correct that ‘[e]ven when no precedent involves facts “materially similar” to ours, [a] right can be clearly established if a precedent applies with “obvious clarity.”’ . But that standard is not met on the facts before us. Accordingly, in the absence of clearly established law, we affirm the grant of qualified immunity to Deputy Mustapick on the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims concerning the cross-gender nature of the strip search.”)

Works v. Byers, 128 F.4th 1156, 1160-67 (10th Cir. 2025) (“Whether sexual acts between a prison guard and an inmate violate the inmate’s constitutional rights turns on the inmate’s consent. Although the coercive nature of prison makes consent a difficult inquiry, we do not presume non-consent in our circuit. . . .By shifting the burden and requiring Byers to produce ‘overwhelming evidence of consent’ and by suggesting that it must find a lack of consent ‘beyond a reasonable doubt,’ the district court incorrectly applied the principles set forth in Graham[.] . . There, we held that consensual sexual conduct between a guard and a prisoner does not rise to a constitutional violation. . . We discussed the Ninth Circuit’s presumption of non-consent. . . The Ninth Circuit created a rebuttable presumption of non-consent between guards and inmates and placed the burden on the guard to rebut the presumption through evidence that the sexual conduct ‘involved no coercive factors.’ . . But after reviewing the presumption, we declined to adopt it. . . Thus, in this circuit, the burden remains on the plaintiff—not the defendant—to establish that sexual conduct is nonconsensual. . . . To satisfy her burden under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, Works must establish a constitutional violation based on facts a reasonable jury could accept as true. . . Byers argues that Works has not met her burden in establishing a constitutional violation. We disagree. . . . After reviewing the evidence, including the video, we conclude a reasonable jury could accept as true that Byers used nonconsensual force to invade Works' bodily integrity. Thus, Works met her burden in showing that Byers' conduct was objectively harmful. We turn to the second requirement in establishing an excessive force claim and conclude that Works met her burden in demonstrating that Byers acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . . Works contends that the district court properly determined that the law was clearly established. But Byers asserts that the district court erred in finding the law clearly established. We conclude that on November 13, 2017, the law clearly established that a guard's nonconsensual sexual assault of an inmate, including inserting a finger or penis into an inmate's vagina, violates the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . A reasonable official is on notice that a guard's nonconsensual sexual assault against an inmate would violate that inmate's constitutional rights. Byers, therefore, violated a clearly established constitutional right, and Works overcomes the second prong of qualified immunity.") Lowther v. Children Youth & Family Department, 101 F.4th 742, 764-66 (10th Cir. 2024) ("Our decision in Roska required an 'immediate threat' of harm under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . This is consistent with Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment caselaw requiring an imminent threat of harm to support exigent circumstances. . . These decisions are consistent with the concept that, by definition, circumstances qualify as 'exigent' only if there is a need for 'immediate action.' . . Gomes, however, injected some ambiguity into our precedent. There, we stated the Fourteenth Amendment requires 'a reasonable suspicion of an immediate threat to the safety of the child if he or she is allowed to remain' at home. . . But we also purported to adopt an approach that requires only 'a reasonable and articulable suspicion that the child has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse.' . . The disjunctive phrasing in 'has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse' suggests an imminent threat of harm is not required. . . Arredondo and Silvan W. contributed to the ambiguity by similarly articulating the standard to require that the child 'has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse.' . . Given the disjunctive phrasing, reasonable officials could have concluded that under the Fourteenth Amendment, exigent circumstances were present if there was reasonable suspicion of past abuse, even in the absence of reasonable suspicion of imminent harm. Reasonable officials could have also translated this incorrect understanding to the Fourth Amendment. . . . A reasonable official could conclude that if one set of facts constituted an exigency under the Fourteenth Amendment, those same facts also constituted an exigency under the Fourth Amendment. Indeed, requiring separate analyses under each Amendment would be wholly impracticable. Because the disjunctive phrasing in Gomes is unclear, we take this opportunity to clarify our precedent. Although Gomes, Arredondo, and Silvan W. may reasonably be read as not requiring a threat of imminent harm, that reading is divorced from the context of the standard. Gomes adopted the phrasing 'has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse' as a definition of 'emergency circumstances which pose an immediate threat to the safety of a child.' . . And Gomes, Arredondo, and Silvan W. still considered whether there was a threat of imminent harm despite evidence of past abuse. . . To be sure, evidence of past abuse may demonstrate a threat of imminent harm, but it will not always do so. Factors important to assessing the risk of imminent harm include, but are not limited to, the strength of the evidence indicating prior abuse, the severity of the prior abuse, the temporal proximity to the prior abuse, the identity of the alleged abuser, the alleged abuser's access to the child, and whether there is time to obtain a warrant or judicial authorization. . . For the circumstances to justify warrantless entry and seizure based on exigent circumstances, there must be a threat of imminent harm under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. Careful review reveals that our decisions do not depart from that requirement in application, even when using the disjunctive 'or' in stating the standard. . . Today we clarify that even in the child welfare context, there must be a threat of imminent harm when officials enter a home or seize children without a warrant or judicial authorization. . . Nevertheless, Defendants here did not have the benefit of this clarification. Accordingly, they could have reasonably, but incorrectly, believed that under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, exigent circumstances were present if there was reasonable suspicion of past abuse, even in the absence of imminent harm. This means Defendants did not violate clearly established law so long as they had reasonable suspicion of past abuse.”)

Palacios v. Fortuna, 61 F.4th 1248, 1261-63 (10th Cir. 2023) (“While it is possible that an initial reasonable decision to use deadly force may become unreasonable later, these facts do not support that conclusion. . . The mere fact that a suspect has fallen does not mean it is unreasonable to continue to fire. . . Plaintiff maintains there is a genuine dispute of material fact on whether Mr. Palacios was surrendering once he was on the ground. It is unclear the exact motion that Mr. Palacios made, however, this is immaterial. The clear video evidence shows that as Mr. Palacios fell to the ground, he then began to roll over and move his hands near his waist. Plaintiff concedes that it is undisputed that he is moving. . . A reasonable officer would not perceive that the threat had ended and that Mr. Palacios was effectively subdued merely because he fell, given that he repeatedly maintained possession of a gun. Even if Officers Iversen and Fortuna were mistaken as to what Mr. Palacios was doing, it is not unreasonable to conclude that hand motions near the waist, as he rolled over, could indicate that Mr. Palacios was preparing to shoot. Mr. Palacios still had possession of his gun and was not immobile, thus a changed circumstances analysis is inapplicable. Plaintiff's third argument is that officers could have used a taser, supported by Sergeant Schneider's suggestion to tase Mr. Palacios. Again, Sergeant Schneider was behind and to the right of Officers Iversen and Fortuna, at least 10 or 15 yards away, when he yelled to tase Mr. Palacios, and testified he could not see 100% of what Mr. Palacios was doing. . . Thus, his suggestion does not mean that it was unreasonable for Officers Iversen and Fortuna to use deadly force. Moreover, the least intrusive or restrictive means possible are not required, only reasonable means. . . Plaintiff also argues that the location of the shooting would allow a jury to conclude that it was unreasonable to use deadly force because pedestrians may have been in the area and bullets were found in a surrounding building. . . The test for reasonableness accounts for the fact that officers are often ‘forced to make split-second judgments — in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’ . To be clear, pursuing a fleeing felon does not automatically mean that a decision to use deadly force is objectively reasonable. . . Rather, under the totality of circumstances, here a reasonable officer would know that Mr. Palacios was suspected of involvement in two violent felonies where bystanders were threatened with a gun, fled police, continually ignored warnings to drop his gun, was running around corners where it was possible to ambush officers, had his gun out, and picked up his gun repeatedly after being told to drop it. Thus, under the totality of the circumstances it was reasonable for the officers to use deadly force. . . . Having determined that there is no constitutional violation, it is unnecessary to consider whether the law was clearly established at the time of the incident.”)

Bledsoe v. Carreno, 53 F.4th 589, 616-17 (10th Cir. 2022) (“Here, Bledsoe alleged all the necessary elements of a failure-to-intervene claim. First, he alleged that Defendants violated his constitutional rights in several ways, including fabricating false evidence against him, suppressing exculpatory evidence, and maliciously prosecuting him without probable cause to believe he was guilty. Second, Bledsoe alleged that each Appellant knew of the ongoing constitutional deprivations. Third, the conspiracy at issue here to frame Bledsoe unfolded over months and months, giving each Appellant a reasonable opportunity to intervene to prevent harming Bledsoe, yet no Appellant did so. Appellants argue that failure-to-intervene claims are limited to situations involving excessive force claims. We disagree. It is true that Tenth Circuit case law has frequently addressed failure-to-intervene claims in the context of officers failing to step in when another officer is using excessive force. . . . Moreover, most other circuits recognize that failure-to-intervene claims can involve failing to stop constitutional deprivations beyond just the use of excessive force. See Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 360 (8th Cir. 2012) (noting, in case addressing claims alleging defendants fabricated evidence, suppressed exculpatory evidence and maliciously prosecuted plaintiff, that Second, Fourth, Seventh, and Tenth Circuits, in the unpublished Reid decision, ‘have recognized a duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context’ but the Eleventh Circuit declined to find that a duty to intervene to stop other constitutional violations was clearly established, citing cases). We hold that a failure-to-intervene claim is not limited to excessive force violations, but can involve other underlying constitutional violations. Specifically, here, Bledsoe adequately alleged a violation of his constitutional rights premised on Defendants’ failure to intervene in the alleged fabrication of evidence against Bledsoe, the suppression of exculpatory evidence that would have proven his innocence, and the malicious arrest, prosecution, and conviction of Bledsoe without probable cause to believe he was guilty. Appellants nevertheless contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Bledsoe’s failure-to-intervene claim because such a claim was not clearly established in 1999. . . . On this point, we agree. See Shaw v. Schulte, 36 F.4th 1006, 1020–21 (10th Cir. 2022) (holding claim alleging failure to intervene to stop unreasonable seizure during a traffic stop was not clearly established as of date of the incident). Moreover, while Bledsoe might have argued that the duty to intervene in the situation alleged here would have been obvious to any objectively reasonable law enforcement officer, . . . Bledsoe has not made such an argument. We, therefore, reverse the district court’s decision to deny Appellants qualified immunity on Bledsoe’s failure-to-intervene theory of recovery.”)

Bledsoe v. Carreno, 53 F.4th 589, 619-20 (10th Cir. 2022) (Eid, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment in part) (“The majority additionally—and needlessly—decides that ‘a failure-to-intervene claim is not limited to excessive force violations, but can involve other underlying constitutional violations.’ . . This court recently looked at the issue of whether failure-to-intervene claims extend beyond the excessive force context in Shaw. . . There, the plaintiff’s theory was that the defendant officer failed to intervene when other officers improperly prolonged a traffic stop to enable a K-9 sweep. . . The plaintiff based his argument on Vondrak v. City of Las Cruces, 535 F.3d 1198 (10th Cir. 2008), which observed that ‘all law enforcement officials have an affirmative duty to intervene to protect the constitutional rights of citizens from infringement by other law enforcement officers in their presence.’ . . But we rejected the plaintiff’s reliance on the ‘general proposition’ of Vondrak, noting that its statement was made ‘in the context of an excessive force claim.’ . . We concluded that ‘where the intrusion and permanency of harm from the use of excessive force may exceed that from the relatively brief prolongation of a traffic stop, Vondrak does not clearly establish that an officer must intervene to prevent an illegal search and seizure.’ . . The majority cites Shaw, without further elaboration, to hold that Appellants ‘are entitled to qualified immunity on Bledsoe’s failure-to-intervene claim because such a claim was not clearly established in 1999.’ . . I agree with this holding. But the majority fails to cite Shaw’s skepticism toward extending Vondrak beyond the excessive force context. Instead, it cites Vondrak’s general proposition,’ as Shaw put it, that officers have an affirmative duty to intervene to protect against constitutional violations committed in their presence. . . And while the majority cites to an unpublished Tenth Circuit case and an Eighth Circuit case (which cites our unpublished case and cases from other circuits) for why such an extension is warranted, . . . none of this authority is binding. It goes on to conclude, based on the cited cases, that Bledsoe ‘adequately alleged a violation of his constitutional rights premised on Defendants’ failure to intervene in the alleged fabrication of evidence against Bledsoe, the suppression of exculpatory evidence that would have proven his innocence, and the malicious arrest, prosecution, and conviction of Bledsoe without probable cause to believe he was guilty.’ . . We should be hesitant in this case to extend Vondrak beyond its boundaries given Shaw’s skepticism and the lack of binding precedent on the issue. Moreover, there is no reason to do so here, where the majority concludes the failure-to-intervene right was not clearly established in any event. To overcome the presumption of qualified immunity, Bledsoe must show that (1) the defendants’ actions violated a constitutional or statutory right, and (2) the right was clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct. . . Courts ‘have discretion to decide the order in which they address these two prongs and thus may address the clearly established prong first.’ . . In fact, the Supreme Court has encouraged the lower courts not to examine both prongs of the inquiry when one is dispositive of the issue, as this ‘results in a substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources on difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case.’ . . Here we should heed the Court’s advice and narrowly hold that, assuming without deciding that there is a failure-to-intervene right in this context, it was not clearly established.”) Surat v. Klamser, 52 F.4th 1261, 1275-80 (10th Cir. 2022) (“Accepting the facts assumed by the district court in denying summary judgment, Officer Klamser’s use of the takedown maneuver during Ms. Surat’s arrest was objectively unreasonable. Ms. Surat was arrested for two misdemeanor offenses, committed in a particularly harmless manner. She did not pose a threat to Officer Klamser or others after he initiated the arrest. Although she did minimally resist arrest,

Officer Klamser’s alleged use of force against Ms. Surat—using a takedown maneuver to slam her face into the ground—was not proportionate given her level of resistance. We therefore hold that the use of the takedown maneuver to slam to the ground a nonviolent misdemeanor who poses no immediate threat to the officer or others based on minimal resistance to arrest is unreasonable and constitutes excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [T]he question is whether Ms. Surat’s right not to be thrown to the ground while she was resisting arrest but did not pose a danger to Officer Klamser was clearly established by April 2017. Unlike the district court, we answer this question in the negative. . . . In April 2017, a reasonable officer would not have known that using a takedown maneuver to throw Ms. Surat to the ground while she was resisting arrest for a nonviolent misdemeanor and not posing an immediate danger to Officer Klamser would violate the Fourth Amendment. Ms. Surat maintains she has met her burden on the second qualified immunity prong by (1) identifying an on-point published Tenth Circuit decision, (2) relying on out-of-circuit authority and a handful of unpublished cases from this circuit to meet the weight of authority standard, and (3) demonstrating this is an obvious case where the unlawfulness of Officer Klamser’s conduct is sufficiently clear. We disagree. In denying Officer Klamser’s motion for summary judgment, the district court cited one published case from this circuit: Morris v. Noe, 672 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2012). We are not persuaded this case would have alerted a reasonable officer that the takedown of Ms. Surat during her arrest was unconstitutional. In Morris, this court considered an appeal from the denial of qualified immunity in a case where officers threw a suspected misdemeanor to the ground with no warning after he backed toward them with his hands up, offering no resistance. . . . We concluded the plaintiff had met his burden on the first qualified immunity prong because the decedent ‘posed no threat to [the officer] or others, nor did he resist or flee.’ . . . We concluded in Morris that the arrestee did not resist arrest. . . . To the contrary, Ms. Surat had ‘attempted to pry [Officer] Klamser’s fingers off of her arm and pawed at [his] arms’ before Officer Klamser threw her to the ground. . . . The existence of some level of resistance to arrest meaningfully distinguishes Morris from the case at hand such that it does not ‘squarely govern,’ . . . the facts of this case and did not ‘put an objective officer in [Officer Klamser’s] position on notice that he was violating [Ms. Surat]’s Fourth Amendment rights[.]’ . . . Because Ms. Surat has not identified a Supreme Court or other published Tenth Circuit case addressing facts sufficiently similar to those surrounding Ms. Surat’s arrest, we next turn to her reliance on out-of-circuit decisions and a handful of unpublished cases from this circuit to satisfy the weight of authority approach. . . . Because the factual scenarios present in the five out-of-circuit cases are sufficiently distinguishable, they fail to provide the weight of authority necessary to clearly establish Officer Klamser’s conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, the unpublished cases from this circuit cannot satisfy the weight of authority approach for demonstrating the law is clearly established. . . . Finally, this is not one of the ‘rare obvious case[s]’ where reliance on Graham alone is sufficient under Supreme Court precedent. . . . Although we hold that Officer Klamser exceeded the level of force necessary to respond to Ms. Surat’s resistance to arrest, this is not one of the ‘rare and obvious cases’ where the degree of force rises to a level justifying reliance on Graham itself to clearly establish the law. . . . None of the precedent identified by Ms. Surat would have made it clear to every reasonable officer that throwing Ms. Surat to the ground in response to her minimal resistance would violate the Fourth Amendment. As a result, Officer Klamser is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Soza v. Demsich, 13 F.4th 1094, 1100-07 (10th Cir. 2021) (“The Tenth Circuit in Mr. Soza’s direct criminal appeal held that the Officers’ use of forceful measures was unreasonable, resulting in an unconstitutional arrest. But that holding is not binding here because the individual Officers were not parties to or in privity with a party in that case. . . . In any event, the Tenth Circuit opinion on Mr. Soza’s direct appeal obviously came after the operative events here and a later opinion (as the prior Tenth Circuit case obviously was) cannot by itself . . . clearly establish the law at the time of the earlier conduct in question. In fact, as discussed more below, here the Tenth Circuit opinion in the criminal case instead suggests that the law was not clearly established. In this appeal, we decide this case on the second prong of qualified immunity and find that the law was not clearly established at the time of the underlying events even though the Tenth Circuit after the operative events determined that this detention violated Mr. Soza’s Fourth Amendment rights as an unlawful arrest without probable cause. . . . [B]oth an arrest and an investigative stop with forceful measures involve a nonconsensual restraint of freedom, except that the former requires probable cause—which all parties agree was not present here—and the latter merely requires reasonable suspicion predicated on facts sufficient to persuade a reasonable officer that the use of force was necessary for the safety of the officers or others during the Terry investigation. We conclude that there were sufficient facts in this record to support reasonable suspicion. . . . We next turn to whether the use of a forceful detention for investigation purposes was warranted. This requires us first to consider whether reasonable police officers in Officer Demsich’s and Officer Melvin’s positions could have believed that safety concerns authorized them to apply force to accomplish a protective investigative detention. Or, more precisely, would all reasonable police officers in these circumstances have known that the forceful measures used here were clearly unreasonable (thereby requiring probable cause) predicated upon existing clearly established law? We hold the answer is no, and that the law establishing the unconstitutionality of these officers’ conduct was not clearly established, for three reasons. First, the facts go both ways, some suggesting a low and others suggesting a high likelihood of danger to the Officers. Second, Mr. Soza does not identify and we cannot find a sufficiently on-point case to clearly establish a Fourth Amendment violation under these circumstances. Third, after careful analysis, the district court and the Tenth Circuit in the criminal case came to opposite—but reasonable—conclusions as to whether the Officers’ actions were unreasonable. Significantly, the Tenth Circuit in the criminal appeal explicitly acknowledged that this case presented a middle ground. . . . Considering, as we must, the totality of the circumstances, . . . regardless of whether the Officers’ conduct was in fact unreasonable, reasonable police officers in the same position as Officers Demsich and Melvin could have thought that forceful measures were necessary for their safety. In other words, the Officers cannot be said to be ‘plainly incompetent[]’ . . . for acting as they did. . . . Given these conflicting facts, Mr. Soza has not come up with, and we cannot find, caselaw that clearly established the Officers’ conduct as unreasonable at the time of the events. . . . Because we know that the Officers had reasonable suspicion to believe Mr. Soza committed the home invasion, they are entitled to qualified immunity if reasonable police officers in the same circumstances would have thought there was an articulable basis to fear for their safety—justifying the use of appropriate forceful measures. At a minimum, the totality of the circumstances in this case could reasonably reveal such a basis, and this Court has not found any on-point caselaw clearly establishing that the conduct was otherwise unreasonable. Thus, we cannot say that every reasonable officer in the position of Officers Demsich and Melvin would have understood that their conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Finally, for law to be clearly established it must be ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Yet, in Mr. Soza’s criminal case, the District of New Mexico and the Tenth Circuit recognized and emphasized the difficulty of the issue. . . . Neither court felt that its position was clearly the correct outcome from the beginning. In other words, the answer was not beyond debate. Yet here Mr. Soza is asking us to hold that the Officers, in the heat of the moment, should have known from existing caselaw that the use of handcuffs and guns were clearly unreasonable even when learned judges, after taking time to consider the issue in the comfort of their chambers, were divided. Although the Tenth Circuit did ultimately conclude that the use of handcuffs and the display of guns in this case were unreasonable, . . . we cannot ignore that, in its analysis, the Tenth Circuit recognized that this case ‘provides an interesting middle-ground.’ . . . For the reasons already discussed, we agree. Regardless of whether Officers Demsich and Melvin in fact acted unreasonably when they handcuffed Mr. Soza at gunpoint, in a ‘middle-ground’ case such as this one, the law was certainly not clearly established at the time of the encounter. . . . For all these reasons, we affirm the grant of summary judgment as to the Officers’ use of handcuffs, display of guns, and pat down. . . . Mr. Soza lastly argues that, regardless of whether the forceful measures used by the Officers were unreasonable, they nonetheless violated his Fourth Amendment rights when they entered his front porch without a warrant to seize him. We again decline to resolve whether Officers Demsich and Melvin in fact violated the Fourth Amendment in regards to the front porch entry because, regardless, the law regarding any such violation was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. . . . To be sure, much concerning this issue is clearly established. A warrantless search or seizure within the home is presumptively unreasonable, . . . subject to certain exceptions such as consent or where there exists exigent circumstances and probable cause[.] . . . And Fourth Amendment protections apply to curtilage, defined as ‘the area to which extends the intimate activity associated with the sanctity of a man’s home and the privacies of life,’ as curtilage is ‘considered part of home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.’ . . . The front porch—the area at issue here—is undoubtedly curtilage. . . . It is also clearly established that a warrantless search of curtilage is unconstitutional. . . . But all cases in the Tenth Circuit and Supreme Court addressing seizures only involve warrantless entry into a suspect’s home itself, rather than the curtilage of the home. . . . We have found no case that addresses both 1) warrantless entry onto a front porch or other curtilage, rather than into the home, for 2) the purpose of a seizure, rather than a search—except, arguably, one: United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38, 96 S.Ct. 2406, 49 L.Ed.2d 300 (1976). . . . In sum, although Santana’s foundation has been eroded by subsequent curtilage cases like Jardines, its decision upholding the constitutionality of a warrantless seizure at the threshold of a suspect’s home remains binding Supreme Court precedent. At the very least, considering Santana, we hold that reasonable minds could differ as to the constitutionality of a warrantless front porch seizure and we cannot say the law was clearly established in Mr. Soza’s favor. The ultimate touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness. . . . Officers Demsich and Melvin could have reasonably relied on Santana for the proposition that warrantless entry onto a front porch for the purpose of detaining a suspect is constitutional. They are, consequently, entitled to qualified immunity.”) Estate of Valverde by & through Padilla v. Dodge, 967 F.3d 1049, 1060-68 (10th Cir. 2020) (“Dodge does not dispute that Valverde was discarding the gun and raising his hands before being shot. The thrust of Dodge’s argument is that his own actions must be assessed from his perspective of what was happening, and that his actions were reasonable in light of his reasonable beliefs at the time. His argument may or may not be legally valid, but it is within our appellate jurisdiction to consider it. We now turn to that task. Our review is consistent with Plaintiff’s version of events, but we supplement that version with clear evidence from the synchronized video that enables us to assess the events from Dodge’s perspective. . . . [T]he decisive question is whether Dodge was reasonable in believing that Valverde was going to fire his gun at Dodge or other officers. We conclude that Dodge’s belief was reasonable. He had been informed that Valverde was involved in high-violence criminal enterprises—dealing guns and large quantities of drugs. Dodge saw the barrel of a gun as Valverde pulled it from his waistband or pocket. To wait to see what Valverde would do with the weapon could be fatal. Dodge fired immediately. The sound of his first shot was less than a second after Valverde pulled out his gun. The sound of his last shot was a mere second after the first. The district court denied Dodge’s motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity because it said that the evidence could support a finding that Valverde was not shot until after he had disposed of his gun and was raising his hands in surrender. This ruling, however, overlooked two fundamentals of the necessary analysis. First, the district court failed to consider that allowance needs to be made for the fact that the officer must make a split-second decision. The Constitution permits officers to make reasonable mistakes. Officers cannot be mind readers and must resolve ambiguities immediately. . . Perhaps a suspect is just pulling out a weapon to discard it rather than to fire it. But waiting to find out what the suspect planned to do with the weapon could be suicidal. . . The district court’s second error was that it failed to appreciate that the facts must be viewed from the perspective of the officer. For purposes of this appeal, we accept as true the district court’s view that the evidence could support a finding that by the time Dodge fired his gun Valverde had dropped his gun and was raising his hands. But the court expressed no view on what the jury could find regarding what Dodge had observed when he made his decision to fire. Yet that is absolutely critical to resolving the legal issue before us. Therefore, it is left for this court to determine what a reasonable jury could find on that score. . . And, we should add, even if one were to interpret the district court’s ruling as, in some way, addressing events from Dodge’s perspective, we are not bound by that ruling to the extent that it is blatantly contradicted by the video. . . Viewing the video, no jury could doubt that Dodge made his decision to fire before he could have realized that Valverde was surrendering (by dropping his gun and raising his hands). The concurrence objects to our use of the video on the ground that it was taken from a significant distance and is grainy, so it does not clearly depict Valverde’s right hand or his hand movements. But an HDTV-quality image is not necessary for our purposes. There is no question that Valverde pulled out a gun. What then matters (as will be explained in more detail as we review the relevant case law) is when it should have been clear to Dodge that Valverde was no longer a threat because he had disposed of his gun and was raising his arms in surrender (in particular, not raising his arm to fire at the officers). We have already noted that the video shows that Dodge fired his first shot less than a second after Valverde pulled out his gun. It is also clear from the video that Valverde did not extend his right arm away from his body (apparently to drop the weapon) until about half a second before the first shot was fired and he did not begin to raise his hands toward his head until about a quarter-second before Dodge fired. The law permitted Dodge to fire as soon as he saw the gun in Valverde's hand. This is not a case where the officer had sufficient time to appreciate that the suspect was no longer a danger before the officer decided to fire. This court has repeatedly held that officers in similar circumstances acted constitutionally, even when the actions of the person shot were ambiguous. . . . Several decisions illustrate that an officer does not violate the Fourth Amendment even when in retrospect it is clear that the officer made a mistake in shooting someone who did not pose a threat at the precise moment of the shot. . . . In short, Dodge's decision to shoot Valverde once he observed him draw a gun is exactly the type of split-second judgment, made in 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' circumstances, 'that [courts] do not like to second-guess using the 20/20 hindsight found in the comfort of a judge's chambers.' . The above discussion disposes of most of Plaintiff's arguments that Dodge acted unreasonably in using deadly force. . . . Plaintiff contends that even if Dodge was entitled to use deadly force based on the situation at the time of the shooting, he still violated the Fourth Amendment because his reckless conduct during the operation unreasonably precipitated his need to use deadly force. She argues that three of Dodge's pre-shooting actions were reckless: (1) his decision to disregard the tactical plan, which had assigned him the less lethal 40-millimeter gun (rather than the carbine he used) and had him providing backup support (rather than deploying out of the van directly toward Valverde); (2) his failure to identify himself as law enforcement, an error magnified by the fact that the officers drove up in an unmarked van, were wearing green uniforms, and used a flash-bang device that likely confused Valverde; and (3) his failure to provide verbal warnings or commands before shooting. To resolve Plaintiff's first issue, we relied on the first prong of qualified immunity, holding that Dodge did not violate Valverde's Fourth Amendment rights when he decided to shoot. On this issue we rely on the second prong of qualified immunity, the absence of clearly established law to support Plaintiff's claim. . . Plaintiff's general proposition is a correct statement of the law of this circuit. 'Our precedent recognizes that the reasonableness of the use of force depends not only on whether the officers were in danger at the precise moment that they used force, but also on whether the officers' own reckless or deliberate conduct during the seizure unreasonably created the need to use such force.' . Nevertheless, Dodge is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this theory of liability. It is unnecessary for us to consider whether his conduct was in fact reckless because Plaintiff has not shown that Dodge violated clearly established law. In this circuit, to satisfy the burden of showing that the officer's conduct violated clearly established law, 'the plaintiff must point to a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.' . The SWAT team was called in to make the arrest specifically because it could act with great speed and overwhelming force. Perhaps that is a poor strategy. This court is hardly qualified to determine whether this approach is, as testified to by the SWAT team members, designed to reduce violence. What we can say, however, is that the officers were not on notice that such tactics are unconstitutional. Simply put, we are aware of no case that would have advised Dodge that what he was doing would violate Valverde’s Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Estate of Valverde by & through Padilla v. Dodge, 967 F.3d 1049, 1068-72 (10th Cir. 2020) (Matheson, J., concurring) (“I concur in reversing the district court’s grant of summary judgment. But I would not decide whether Sergeant Dodge was entitled to qualified immunity based on prong one—that his conduct violated the Constitution. I have concerns about our interlocutory jurisdiction to review his arguments on that issue. I would reverse instead based on prong two—whether the Estate has shown that Sergeant Dodge’s shooting of Mr. Valverde violated clearly established law. . . .Because the majority’s legal error points are at least debatable, and Sergeant Dodge’s factual arguments jurisdictionally suspect, I would move to the more straightforward analysis under prong two. . . . The Estate’s cases . . . do not ‘place[] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . It has ‘failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances’ violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . It inadequately heeds the Supreme Court’s instruction that clearly established law must ‘not be defined at a high level of generality.’. . . Although we may lack interlocutory jurisdiction to review the district court’s factual findings, the Estate has failed to show clearly established law. It thus has not carried its burden to overcome Sergeant Dodge’s summary judgment defense of qualified immunity. I concur in the reversal of the district court’s denial of summary judgment.”)

Hunt v. Board of Regents of the University of New Mexico, 792 F. App’x 595, ____ (10th Cir. 2019) (“Mr. Hunt and the amici contend that (1) the district court should have addressed the first prong of qualified immunity; and (2) this court should address the first prong. But the Supreme Court has afforded both district courts and courts of appeals the discretion to ‘decid[e] which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.’. . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has admonished courts to ‘think hard, and then think hard again, before’ addressing both prongs of qualified immunity. . . . And we have found addressing both prongs ‘should be the exception’ because of the doctrine of constitutional avoidance. . . .Off-campus, online speech by university students, particularly those in professional schools, involves an emerging area of constitutional law. . . . Accordingly, we find no fault with the district court’s exercise of its discretion. And we, too, decline Mr. Hunt’s request to address the first prong. . . . Here, we are faced with a medical student’s free speech challenge to sanctions from his school in response to his off-campus, online speech. Based upon the case law as of 2012-2013, which the parties agree is the relevant time period, we cannot say that ‘every reasonable official’ in the position of the defendants here would have known their actions violated the First Amendment. . . . Like the Supreme Court, our student speech cases mainly concern on-campus speech by K-12 students. . . . We have extended Hazelwood to ‘speech that occurs in a [university] classroom as part of a class curriculum.’. . . But we have not yet decided whether Hazelwood applies to ‘university students’ extracurricular speech,’. . . . or non-curricular speech. Mr. Hunt insists that because Fraser, Hazelwood, and Morse do not apply, ‘Tinker is the applicable standard,’ . . . and establishes that his ‘right to free speech was violated[.]’. . . However, in Morse, Justice Thomas observed the Court has not ‘offer[ed] an explanation of when [Tinker] operates and when it does not,’ . . . and the majority itself acknowledged ‘[t]here is some uncertainty at the outer boundaries as to when courts should apply school speech precedents[.]’ . . . Additionally, none of the Court’s cases involved online speech. . . . Moreover, though at first blush they might appear favorable to Mr. Hunt, even viewed in isolation, the Supreme Court’s university cases of Healy and Papish fail to supply clearly established law. . . . Healy and Papish appear to leave space for administrators to operate as the circumstances demand when confronted with speech by students in professional schools that appears to be at odds with customary professional standards. And neither decision would have sent sufficiently clear signals to reasonable medical school administrators that sanctioning a student’s off-campus, online speech for the purpose of instilling professional norms is unconstitutional. Nor has Mr. Hunt shown that the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits supports his position. . . . Mr. Hunt’s Facebook post also occurred months after a state high court found a university had not violated a mortuary science student’s free speech rights when it imposed sanctions, including a writing assignment, in response to Facebook posts the school deemed, inter alia, unprofessional. Tatro v. Univ. of Minn., 816 N.W.2d 509, 511-24 (Minn. 2012). . . . Against this backdrop, we conclude that the Supreme Court’s K-12 cases of Tinker, Fraser, Hazelwood, and Morse and its university cases of Papish and Healy fail to supply the requisite on-point precedent. Moreover, decisions from our court and other circuits have not bridged the unmistakable gaps in the case law, including whether: (1) Tinker applies off campus; (2) the on-campus/off-campus distinction applies to online speech; and (3) Tinker provides an appropriate framework for speech by students in graduate-level professional programs, such as medical schools[.] . . . In the end, Mr. Hunt has ‘failed to identify a case where [a medical school administrator] acting under similar circumstances as [the defendants in this case] was held to have violated the [First] Amendment.’ . . . Mr. Hunt and the amici have provided a patchwork of cases connected by broad legal principles, but the law in late 2012 and 2013 would not have given the defendants notice that their response to the Facebook post was unconstitutional. . . . Accordingly, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.”) Bishop v. Szuba, 739 F. App’x 941, ____ (10th Cir. 2018) (“Here, the district court found that Szuba’s conduct satisfied the first prong of the qualified-immunity test. . . . We have some doubts about that conclusion. Specifically, we question whether there exists an affirmative link between Bishop’s injuries and Szuba’s conduct. . . . Nevertheless, we assume without deciding that Szuba indeed violated Bishop’s constitutional right ‘to be kept reasonably safe from harm.’ . . . We pursue this route because we conclude, for the reasons discussed below, that Bishop fails to satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity test. That is, he fails to show the law was clearly established. Accordingly, we need not resolve the constitutional question. . . . Here, the district court did exactly what the Supreme Court has said not to do: it (1) ‘define[d] clearly established law at a high level of generality,’ . . . and (2) failed to discuss the “‘particularized” . . . facts of th[is] case[.]’ . . . Specifically, it stated that foster children have a clearly established right to ‘be kept reasonably safe from harm’ while in foster care and that this general right ‘has been clearly established since at least 1985.’ . . . The district court did cite two cases to support this conclusion. But it neither discussed the facts of those cases nor explained whether or how those facts are sufficiently similar to the ones before us to place the constitutional question here ‘beyond debate.’. . . And our independent review of those two cases convinces us that neither one clearly established the contours of the right at issue. In Yvonne L. ex rel. Lewis v. New Mexico Department of Human Services, 959 F.2d 883 (10th Cir. 1992), we held that, as a general matter, foster children indeed have a right ‘to protection while in foster care.’. . . And we also set forth the standard for determining whether a defendant has violated that right. . . But we didn’t apply that standard to the defendants’ conduct. . . Instead, we remanded to the district court to determine, in the first instance, whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . Thus, because we didn’t find a constitutional violation in Yvonne L., it doesn’t clearly establish the contours of the constitutional right at issue here. . . Neither does Schwartz, which we decided more than 13 years after Szuba’s investigation. . . In short, even if we assume that Szuba violated Bishop’s Fourteenth Amendment rights, neither Schwartz nor Yvonne L.—the only two cases the district court cited below—clearly establishes as much. And Bishop doesn’t identify on appeal any additional authorities that might. . . Accordingly, Szuba is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Lincoln v. Maketa, 880 F.3d 533, 537-39, 541-44 (10th Cir. 2018) (“We have discretion to resolve an issue of qualified immunity on either of the two prongs, and we need not decide whether a violation occurred if we conclude that the right was not ‘clearly established.’. . . Here, we choose to address the second prong, concluding that none of the underlying rights were clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation. . . . The law was not clearly established on whether Lt. Peck’s duties included her discussion with the media. As head of Internal Affairs, Lt. Peck spoke to the media about an Internal Affairs matter at the explicit direction of her supervisor. The speech therefore seems to have been “‘commissioned” by her employer. . . .Lt. Peck contends that her speech was not made in the course of her official duties because

- her job duties did not require her to speak to the media and
- she disobeyed Sheriff Maketa’s instructions on what to say.

We reject both contentions.

First, Lt. Peck notes that speaking to the media was not part of her job duties. But an employee’s formal job duties are not dispositive; speech can be considered ‘official’ even when it ‘concerns an unusual aspect of an employee’s job that is not part of his everyday functions.’. . . Second, Lt. Peck spoke to the media because of a directive, but she disobeyed the order to lie. In some circuits, Lt. Peck’s disobedience might affect whether she was speaking as part of her official duties. See Dahlia v. Rodriguez, 735 F.3d 1060, 1075 (9th Cir. 2013) (“[W]hen a public employee speaks in direct contravention to his supervisor’s orders, that speech may often fall outside of the speaker’s professional duties.”); Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 241–42 (2d Cir. 2011) (holding that an employee spoke as a citizen when he disobeyed his superiors’ orders to retract a truthful report and substitute a false one). But this approach is not universal. See Nixon v. City of Houston, 511 F.3d 494, 498–99 (5th Cir. 2007) (holding that a uniformed officer’s media statement constituted official speech regardless of whether it was ‘in contravention of the wishes of his superiors’). The Tenth Circuit has not spoken on this issue. In the absence of applicable precedent, Sheriff Maketa lacked clear guidance on whether Lt. Peck was speaking as part of her official duties. See Mocek v. City of Albuquerque, 813 F.3d 912, 929 n.9 (10th Cir. 2015) (“A circuit split will not satisfy the clearly established prong of qualified immunity.”). As a result, the alleged retaliation would not have violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .Sgt. Stone and the district court relied only on general standards, noting that an adverse employment action is one that would deter reasonable persons from exercising their First Amendment rights. But the analysis of qualified immunity is based on specific facts, not abstract principles. White v. Pauly, — U.S. —, 137 S.Ct. 548, 552, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Sgt. Stone does not direct us to any on-point cases from this court, the Supreme Court, or other courts; and he has not demonstrated that the criminal investigation would ‘obviously’ constitute an adverse employment action. . . . Thus, Sheriff Maketa is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . In short, neither we nor other circuits have established any clear guidance on where to draw the line between adverse and non-adverse paid administrative leave. . . .Without any guidance, we do not regard placement on paid administrative leave as a clearly established adverse employment action. . . .Thus, Sheriff Maketa and Undersheriff Presley were entitled to dismissal of this claim. . . . Third, general principles are insufficient for a clearly established right. Instead, the Commanders must point to precedent establishing that the particular conduct at issue here is unlawful. . . . And as noted, the Commanders do not identify any such precedents, relying only on Annett’s general standard. Thus, the Commanders have not demonstrated that their alleged humiliation would clearly constitute an adverse employment action. . . .The assertion of qualified immunity imposes a heavy burden on the plaintiffs, requiring them to point to existing precedent or the clear weight of authority establishing the existence of a constitutional violation. None of the plaintiffs has met that burden. Lt. Peck has not demonstrated that her statement to the media was clearly made as a private citizen rather than as a public employee. Nor has Sgt. Stone or the Commanders shown that the defendants’ alleged conduct would clearly constitute adverse employment actions. Accordingly, Sheriff Maketa and Undersheriff Presley were entitled to qualified immunity on all of the claims.”) Pyle v. Woods, 874 F.3d 1257, 1263-64 (10th Cir. 2017) (“The matters before this court involve a situation ‘in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . Accordingly, under the circumstances, we will . . . address only the second prong of the qualified immunity test. . . .Here, Plaintiffs allege Detective Woods violated their Fourth Amendment rights by searching the Database for their prescription drug information without a warrant. Plaintiffs concede that this court has never directly addressed whether a warrantless search by law enforcement of a patient’s prescription records in a state database violates the Fourth Amendment but they are correct that ‘a case directly on point’ is not required. . . . Plaintiffs must only identify existing precedent that ‘place[s] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . They assert two legal propositions, taken together, provided a clear answer to the Fourth Amendment question at the time Woods conducted the warrantless search of the Database, namely: (1) individuals have a constitutionally protected privacy right in their prescription drug records and (2) warrantless searches violate the Fourth Amendment absent an exception. This argument is unavailing. . . .Because, as we have held, the right to privacy in prescription drug records is not absolute, Plaintiffs’ two-part paradigm does not provide an answer to the constitutional question. Instead, resolution of the issue will involve a determination of the scope of the constitutionally protected privacy right. At the time Detective Woods accessed the Database to search Plaintiffs' records, no court had conducted the necessary analysis and no judicial opinion held that a warrantless search of a prescription drug database by state law enforcement officials is unconstitutional. . . Our precedent makes clear that any right to privacy in prescription drug records is not absolute under the circumstances present here. Neither Plaintiffs' two-part paradigm nor existing precedent places the Fourth Amendment question beyond debate. Accordingly, Plaintiffs cannot show Detective Woods acted contrary to clearly established law and Woods is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim he violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights by accessing the Database without a warrant.")

Scott v. City of Albuquerque, 711 F. App'x 871, 877 n.6, 879, 882 n.9 (10th Cir. 2017) ("In A.M., where an officer arrested a student under section 30-20-13(D) for 'repeatedly fake-burping, laughing, and (later) leaning into the classroom,' 830 F.3d at 1148, we held in analyzing the clearly-established-law question that there were 'no Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decisions' that squarely addressed 30-20-13(D)'s probable-cause requirements in 2011[.] . . The same necessarily must be true for Officer Hensley's violation, which occurred almost two years before the challenged conduct in A.M. . . . In short, Scott has not identified any clearly-established law that would have given Officer Hensley 'fair notice that his conduct would be unlawful in the circumstances he confronted.' . . Accordingly, Scott cannot satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard; his Fourth Amendment unlawful-arrest claim necessarily fails. . . And, second, our conclusion that Officer Hensley could not claim a reasonable mistake of law does not mean that he cannot demonstrate that he satisfies the qualified-immunity standard on the clearly-established-law element, and indeed we conclude infra that he has. In this regard, Heien stressed that 'qualified immunity ... depends on an inquiry distinct from whether an officer has committed a constitutional violation' and that 'the [constitutional-violation] inquiry is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.' . . Therefore, under the less stringent qualified-immunity inquiry, we may conclude (as we do) that Officer Hensley is entitled to qualified immunity because his 'conclusions rest[ed] on an objectively reasonable, even if mistaken, belief that probable cause exist [ed].' . . We are not blind to the obvious facts: At the time of the arrest, Scott was thirteen years old. The psychological effects of an arrest on somebody that young are bound to be more severe than they would be for an adult. . . However, we have held that there is 'no case law ... applying a different standard when the victim of the alleged excessive force is a minor.'" . . And we are bound to apply the law of excessive force as it is—not as we might wish it to be—even when, as here, the results might seem troubling.")

Dahn v. Amedei, 867 F.3d 1178, 1186-91 & n.12 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The question here is whether a foster child in the custody of one state can, after being placed by a private adoption agency with a foster father in a different state, establish a special custodial relationship with that second state when the second state takes on the duties to investigate evidence suggesting abuse. . . . We decide here only whether Dahn can show that his special relationship with Amedei and Cramer was clearly established under existing law. . . . We do not resolve whether Dahn established a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer; we address only whether that relationship was clearly established under existing precedent. Even if Dahn had a special custodial relationship with Amedei and Cramer—employees of Colorado—Schwartz doesn't clearly establish this relationship based on our facts. Here, Dahn was in Oklahoma's custody up until his adoption. The district court extended Schwartz in finding that Dahn sufficiently alleged a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer.⁸ [Fn 8 Because we conclude under the facts of this case that clearly established law did not create a special relationship between Dahn and the caseworkers, we need not and do not address the remaining factors of his claim. For this reason, we do not comment on whether Amedei and Cramer violated Dahn's constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by failing to exercise their professional judgment.] Whether or not he was correct to do so, the law up to that point did not clearly establish the requisite special relationship. In Schwartz, a young foster child, Chandler, died at the hands of his abusive foster family. . . Chandler's biological parents alleged under § 1983 that employees of the Denver County Department of Human Services (DCDHS) violated, among other laws, Chandler's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights. . . The employees claimed that they had no special relationship with Chandler because a different county had placed him in foster care. . . We concluded that the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond the employees in the county that initially placed a child in foster care and reaches county employees actually exercising custody over the child. . . We also noted that even though the Jefferson County Department of Human Services (JCDHS) initially placed Chandler into foster care, its doing so made him dependent on the state for his basic human needs, not just that one department. . . Here, Dahn asks us to affirm the district court's extension of Schwartz to his claim and hold that even though Oklahoma placed him in foster care and Adoption Alliance monitored his placement, Colorado exercised custody over him because he lived there and because Colorado employees investigated his school's suspected-abuse reports. . . [T]he second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis determines the outcome of this case. Schwartz is the closest case to ours, but no court has extended it so far. In certain circumstances, it would be reasonable and even logical to extend the special-relationship doctrine across state lines as well as county lines, as in Schwartz, but our case law doesn't clearly establish this extension. . . . Here, Oklahoma and Colorado are two separate sovereigns. So, Amedei and Cramer argue, it is not enough that Dahn was a ward of a state. To overcome qualified immunity and survive their motion to dismiss, Dahn had to allege sufficient facts to show that he had a special relationship with the state whose employees he alleged knew of the danger to him or failed to exercise professional judgment. We can't deem it clearly established under Schwartz that a state employee's investigating reports of abuse of a child is enough to create a special custodial relationship with that child. . . Though DeShaney is factually distinct from Dahn's case, it illustrates that the Supreme Court is wary of finding a special relationship whenever a social worker responds to child-abuse reports. So DeShaney supports the conclusion that the law doesn't clearly permit extending the special-relationship doctrine to Dahn's circumstances—at least not yet. In sum, the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond just those actors who placed Dahn in Lovato's custody; it includes all state officials in the state with whom he had a special relationship. But, for now, the law doesn't clearly extend constitutional liability under the special-relationship doctrine to employees of a state that didn't deprive Dahn of his liberty or supply his basic needs, even though they were social workers in the county where he resided. . . We note, however, that Amedei and Cramer owed some duty to Dahn, and this duty might very well expose them to tort liability. . . .Schwartz would not notify Amedei and Cramer that their failure to protect Dahn under the factual circumstances of this case would violate Dahn's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights under the special-relationship doctrine. Thus, even accepting all of Dahn's factual allegations as true, Dahn presents no clearly established law creating a special, custodial relationship between him and Colorado or its employees, and therefore the district court should have awarded Amedei and Cramer qualified immunity on Dahn's special-relationship claims against them.¹² [fn12: Because we conclude, based on this case's facts, that Dahn has failed to show clearly established law creating a special relationship between him, Amedei and Cramer, we decline to address whether the special-relationship doctrine could ever cross state borders. We also decline to address the other element of such claims, which is whether Amedei and Cramer acted in an unprofessional and conscience-shocking manner.]")

Estate of Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1107, 1113-15 (10th Cir. 2016) ("When determining whether qualified immunity applies, we may choose 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.' . . . Although Lockett's Estate urges us to decide each of the constitutional-violation questions first, we decline to do so. . . . [W]e see no cases announcing clearly established law that the Eighth Amendment commands, in these circumstances, that Appellees hasten Lockett's death more quickly than the 30 minutes it took. Again, as did the district court, we choose to affirm the dismissal of this claim on the clearly-established-law prong. . . . Although we accept that Lockett's execution was 'unnecessarily prolonged and horribly painful,' . . . the problems during Lockett's execution fit under Baze's 'isolated mishap' exception for events that, 'while regrettable, do[] not suggest cruelty, or that the procedure at issue gives rise to a substantial risk of serious harm.' . . . Thus, Appellees violated no clearly established law despite Lockett suffering pain during his execution. The IV infiltration was an 'isolated mishap,' not something designed to cause additional pain. Because Oklahoma has changed its execution protocol to incorporate several procedures Baze spoke favorably about,. . . we likely will never confront another Oklahoma execution presenting the same circumstances as Lockett's execution. . . . Lockett's Estate claims that 'a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the failure to promulgate basic policies to protect against painful, barbaric, and torturous executions violate[s] the Eighth Amendment.' . . . But this provides nothing beyond the 'high level of generality' that the Supreme Court has concluded will not suffice to show clearly established law. . . . As in al-Kidd, where the plaintiff tried to rely on the 'broad history and purposes of the Fourth Amendment' as clearly established law, Lockett's Estate's general pronouncement is too broad to show clearly established law.")

Estate of Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1118, 1120-21 (10th Cir. 2016) (Moritz, J., concurring) ("[W]hile I agree with the majority's professed intent to resolve the qualified immunity issues on the clearly-established prong, I do not agree with those portions of the opinion that conflict with that professed intent. . . . Because the Estate cites no authority that would have put defendants on notice that their particular conduct violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on torture, the Estate fails to satisfy the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis.

Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's conclusion that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the Estate's torture claim on that basis alone, without addressing whether defendants violated Lockett's Eighth Amendment right to be free from torture. I therefore do not join the portion of the majority opinion addressing the Estate's torture claim.")

Estate of Reat v. Rodriguez, 824 F.3d 960, 964-67 (10th Cir. 2016) (amending and superceding opinion on den'l of reh'g en banc) ("Because there are cases where we can more readily decide the law was not clearly established before reaching the more difficult question of whether there has been a constitutional violation, we may exercise discretion in deciding which prong to address first. . . This is such a case. . . At the most general level, the parties agree that the state-created danger doctrine is clearly established in this circuit. . . Though the elements of the state-created danger test are clearly established, it also must be clear to which fact scenarios and government actors we apply the test, and what types of conduct are 'conscience shocking' under the sixth factor. . . Here, Reat's Estate alleges Rodriguez violated the Fourteenth Amendment by knowingly sending the victims, who had called 911 to report an assault, back into the path of their armed attackers. It contends Rodriguez knew the attackers last had been seen speeding northward on Sheridan Boulevard only minutes earlier, yet he instructed Pal to stop on that road. He then told Pal to pull over and activate his hazard lights at a location nineteen blocks north of the place of the assault. Even after Rodriguez knew the attackers had brandished a gun, he did not suggest that Pal relocate to a less conspicuous place, nor did he send police protection. The district court held 'these factual allegations, accepted as true, are sufficiently shocking to the conscience to state a plausible claim for violation of plaintiffs' substantive due process rights under the state-created danger theory.' . . For a number of reasons, we conclude Rodriguez's conduct does not violate the clearly defined contours of the state-created danger doctrine. First, Reat's Estate cannot point to a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case involving misconduct by 911 operators. . . . In all of [the] cases where we found it appropriate to apply the doctrine of state-created danger, the victims were unable to care for themselves or had had limitations imposed on their freedom by state actors. . . Rodriguez is unlike any of the defendants in our state-created danger cases. Rodriguez was not a police officer, firefighter, or other similar first responder. . . As a 911 operator, he was not present at the scene of the attack, nor could he take physical action in response to the unfolding event. He did not impose any limitation on Reat's freedom to act. Rodriguez merely informed the victims, however incompetently, that to get help from the police, they would have to return to Denver. It cannot be said that any of Rodriguez's actions, as foolish as they were, 'limited in some way the liberty of a citizen to act on his own behalf.' . . Furthermore, Reat is unlike the victims in other state-created danger cases. He was not in the custody of the state in the way that prisoners are, and thus was not deprived in that manner of his freedom to act. Unlike children in school or under the care of social workers, Reat and his companions were not incapable of acting in their own interest at the time of the shooting. Though the state-created danger doctrine itself may be clearly established, it is far from clear that it applies to Rodriguez's conduct in this particular situation. In sum, all cases cited by Reat's Estate 'are simply too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here.' Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 312. No reasonable 911 operator could have known that these actions would have resulted in liability under the Fourteenth Amendment.”), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1434 (2017).

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1139-43, 1149 (10th Cir. 2016) (“[I]n the qualified-immunity context, Officer Acosta’s commission vel non of a constitutional violation need not be the focus of our inquiry. This is because A.M. ‘must demonstrate on the facts alleged both that [Officer Acosta] violated [F.M.’s] constitutional ... rights, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged unlawful activity.’ . . . We elect to center our analysis on the clearly-established-law question. . . . We conclude that A.M. has not demonstrated that, under extant clearly established law, a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta’s position would have had fair warning that he lacked probable cause to arrest F.M. for interfering with the educational process in violation of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D). Put another way, in our view, such an officer could have reasonably believed—even if mistakenly—that the officer possessed probable cause under section 30–20–13(D) to arrest F.M. . . . At the outset, we note that there are no Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decisions addressing the contours of probable cause to arrest under New Mexico’s interference-with-educational-process statute. . . . A.M. insists that Officer Acosta’s arrest of F.M. for his burping and other horseplay in Ms. Mines–Hornbeck’s classroom violated clearly established law because F.M.’s conduct patently did not rise to the level of seriousness envisioned by N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) and ‘no case [was] necessary to alert him [i.e., Officer Acosta] to this fact.’ . . . As germane here, in assessing whether Officer Acosta had fair notice that his conduct would be unlawful in the circumstances he confronted (i.e., when he was deciding whether to arrest F.M.), we are guided, first, by the text of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) and, then, by any relevant state and federal decisions interpreting its import. . . . We believe the text of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) manifests the New Mexico legislature’s intent to prohibit a wide swath of conduct that interferes with the educational process. . . . The ordinary meaning of these statutory terms would seemingly encompass F.M.’s conduct because F.M.’s burping, laughing, and leaning into the classroom stopped the flow of student educational activities, thereby injecting disorder into the learning environment, which worked at cross-purposes with Ms. Mines–Hornbeck’s planned teaching tasks. More to the point, we cannot conclude that the plain terms of subsection (D) would have given a reasonable law-enforcement officer in Officer Acosta’s shoes fair warning that if he arrested F.M. for engaging in his classroom misconduct he (i.e., the officer) would be violating F.M.’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from an arrest lacking in probable cause. . . . The body of relevant caselaw is very limited. . . . In making its clearly-established-law argument, A.M. principally relies on a decision of the New Mexico Court of Appeals, State v. Silva, 86 N.M. 543, 525 P.2d 903 (N.M. Ct. App. 1974). We conclude, however, that Silva does not get A.M. over her clearly-established-law hurdle. . . . In sum, if a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta’s shoes had sought guidance from Silva, we do not believe that it would have given the officer fair warning that, if he elected to arrest F.M., he would be doing so without probable cause in violation of F.M.’s Fourth Amendment rights. Put another way, even if Silva was the controlling touchstone, Officer Acosta’s belief that he had probable cause to arrest F.M. under section 30–20–13(D) was objectively reasonable—even if mistaken. Therefore, we conclude that A.M. cannot satisfy her clearly-established-law burden by relying on Silva.

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1151-56 (10th Cir. 2016) (“Although we agree with the district court’s ultimate disposition regarding the excessive-force claim—viz., we conclude that the court properly awarded qualified immunity to Officer Acosta—we expressly ground our decision on the second prong of the qualified-immunity rubric. Specifically, we conclude that the clearly established law in existence in May 2011 would not have apprised a reasonable police officer similarly situated to Officer Acosta that he could be held liable under § 1983 for a Fourth Amendment violation based on handcuffing a minor pursuant to a lawful arrest. . . . Graham, though certainly an excessive-force lodestar, provides no guidance concerning whether an officer, when effecting an arrest supported by probable cause, must refrain from using handcuffs because the arrestee is a minor (lest he open himself up to potential § 1983 liability). . . . In light of these post-Atwater decisions, we confidently conclude here that a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta’s position would have understood Atwater’s general acceptance of handcuffing incident to a lawful arrest to indicate that, in the ordinary course, handcuffing any arrestee—absent some injury specifically caused by the application of the cuffs—is lawful. . . . Of course, we recognize that neither Atwater nor Fisher involved the distinguishable, critical factor of minor-child status. However, it appears that no subsequent published Tenth Circuit decision has taken that variable into consideration in the excessive-force calculus. . . . Along these same lines, we have not uncovered any cases extant at the time of F.M.’s arrest that describe the state of the law and the right at issue as A.M. does. In fact, our study of the relevant caselaw cuts against any reasonable conclusion that a minor’s purported right to avoid handcuffing during a lawful arrest was clearly established in May 2011. . . . In short, we hold that the then-extant clearly established law would not have apprised a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta’s position that F.M.’s minor-child status should have negated his time-honored right to use handcuffs in effecting F.M.’s arrest. For these reasons, we conclude that the district court correctly awarded qualified immunity to Officer Acosta on this Fourth Amendment claim.”)

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1157-61 (10th Cir. 2016) (“A.M. first contends with respect to Ms. Holmes that ‘the district court erred in finding that F.M.’s Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established’ under extant caselaw as of November 8, 2011 (the date of the in-school search). . . . Although the district court did base this aspect of its ruling on its determination that any constitutional right would not have been clearly established, in the exercise of our discretion, . . . we elect to resolve the issue on the first prong of the qualified-immunity standard. . . . We conclude that the court correctly granted qualified immunity to Ms. Holmes on the unreasonable-search claim because, on A.M.’s version of the facts (insofar as they are borne out by the record), the search of F.M. was supported by reasonable suspicion. Thus, we rest our affirmance regarding this claim on our specific conclusion that A.M. has failed to carry her burden of demonstrating that Ms. Holmes committed a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Though for purposes of qualified immunity we ordinarily do accept the facts that a plaintiff like A.M. alleges, we do so only insofar as those facts have a basis in the record—as relevant here, only insofar as A.M.’s account of the search does not patently conflict with the record’s video footage. . . . The video demonstrates that F.M. was first asked to remove his shoes and his jeans, leaving him in a short-sleeved shirt, a longsleeved shirt, two pairs of athletic shorts, and boxer-shorts underwear. He then flipped down the waistband of his outer pair of athletic shorts, but he left undisturbed the waistbands of his other pair of athletic shorts and his boxer shorts. Finally, he removed his outer pair of athletic shorts and his outer (short-sleeved) shirt so that when the search concluded, he was still wearing a long-sleeved shirt, a pair of athletic shorts, and underwear. Soon afterward, he got dressed as he had been prior to the search. Based on this sequence of events, we believe A.M. stretches the term ‘strip search’ beyond recognition in her attempt to apply it here. . . The video unequivocally shows that F.M. was only prompted to remove outer clothing and that he was wearing additional layers of non-intimate street clothing underneath the removed items. Thus, because the scope of the search at all times remained reasonable, the search satisfied the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.”)

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1169-70 (10th Cir. 2016) (Gorsuch, J., dissenting) (“If a seventh grader starts trading fake burps for laughs in gym class, what’s a teacher to do? Order extra laps? Detention? A trip to the principal’s office? Maybe. But then again, maybe that’s too old school. Maybe today you call a police officer. And maybe today the officer decides that, instead of just escorting the now compliant thirteen year old to the principal’s office, an arrest would be a better idea. So out come the handcuffs and off goes the child to juvenile detention. My colleagues suggest the law permits exactly this option and they offer ninety-four pages explaining why they think that’s so. Respectfully, I remain unpersuaded. The simple fact is the New Mexico Court of Appeals long ago alerted law enforcement that the statutory language on which the officer relied for the arrest in this case does not criminalize ‘noise[s] or diversion[s]’ that merely ‘disturb the peace or good order’ of individual classes. State v. Silva, 86 N.M. 543, 525 P.2d 903, 907 (N.M. Ct. App. 1974). Instead, the court explained, the law requires ‘a more substantial, more physical invasion’ of the school’s operations—proof that the student more ‘substantially interfered’ with the ‘actual functioning’ of the school. . . What’s more, other state courts have interpreted similar statutes similarly. They’ve sustained criminal convictions for students who created substantial disorders across an entire school. [citing cases] But they’ve also refused to hold students criminally liable for classroom antics that ‘momentarily divert[ed] attention from the planned classroom activity’ and ‘require[d] some intervention by a school official.’ . . Respectfully, I would have thought this authority sufficient to alert any reasonable officer in this case that arresting a now compliant class clown for burping was going a step too far. In response, my colleagues suggest that Silva is distinguishable because it interpreted not the state statute addressing misconduct in public schools on which the officer here relied, see N.M. Stat. Ann § 30–20–13(D), but another statute dealing with protests at colleges, see N.M. Stat. Ann. § 40A–20–10(C) (1972). And that much is true enough. But the unobscurable fact remains that the relevant language of the two statutes is identical—requiring the government to prove that the defendant ‘commit[ed] any act which would disrupt, impair, interfere with or obstruct the lawful mission, processes, procedures or functions’ of a school. Silva expressly held that this language does not criminalize conduct that disturbs ‘merely the peace of the school session’ but instead requires proof that the defendant more substantially or materially ‘interfere[d] with the actual functioning’ of the school. . . Neither do my colleagues offer any reason why a reasonable officer could have thought this same language carried an entirely different meaning when applied to public school burps rather than college sit-ins—and the parties supply none. . . My colleagues likewise dismiss the authority from other states interpreting similar statutes similarly. . . But again it's hard to see why. After all, these cases draw the same distinction suggested by Silva—between childish pranks and more seriously disruptive behaviors—and hold that only the latter are prohibited by statutes like the one before us today. . . . Often enough the law can be 'a ass—a idiot,' Charles Dickens, Oliver Twist 520 (Dodd, Mead & Co. 1941) (1838)—and there is little we judges can do about it, for it is (or should be) emphatically our job to apply, not rewrite, the law enacted by the people's representatives. Indeed, a judge who likes every result he reaches is very likely a bad judge, reaching for results he prefers rather than those the law compels. So it is I admire my colleagues today, for no doubt they reach a result they dislike but believe the law demands—and in that I see the best of our profession and much to admire. It's only that, in this particular case, I don't believe the law happens to be quite as much of a ass as they do. I respectfully dissent.”)

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1247 (10th Cir. 2015) (“Like Sheriff Glanz does in his arguments before us, we elect to focus on the second prong—wherein we inquire whether, under Ms. Cox’s version of the facts, then-extant clearly established law would have given Sheriff Glanz fair warning that he could be held liable for his conduct under a supervisory-liability theory for violating Mr. Jernegan’s Eighth Amendment rights. . . We conclude that the right that Ms. Cox’s claim implicates—i.e., generally, an inmate’s right to proper prison suicide screening procedures during booking—was not clearly established in July 2009. . . . Significantly, Ms. Cox has not directed our attention to any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision (published or otherwise) that would indicate that this right was clearly established in 2009. . . and the district court likewise did not rely on any such law. Nor, for that matter, has Ms. Cox attempted to shoulder her burden by showing that ‘the clearly established weight of authority from other courts ... ha[s] found the law to be as [she] maintains.’ . . On this basis alone, we could hold that Ms. Cox has not properly laid the groundwork to defeat Sheriff Glanz’s assertion of qualified immunity. In the interest of thoroughness, however, we have surveyed the then-extant caselaw that would have guided the Sheriff’s endeavors to conform his supervisory conduct to constitutional norms. The results of our survey are detailed infra. Viewing the clearly-established-law question in this survey’s light, we confidently conclude that the extant clearly established law in July 2009 would not have put a reasonable official in Sheriff Glanz’s position on notice that his supervisory conduct would effect an Eighth Amendment violation.”)

Moral v. Hagen, 553 F. App’x 839, No. 13–3129, 2014 WL 341440, *1, *2 (10th Cir. Jan. 31, 2014) (“Only recently the Supreme Court explained that it remains unsettled under current law whether an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by initiating an arrest for retaliatory reasons when the arrest itself happens to be supported, as an objective matter, by probable cause. See Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088 (2012). Because this scenario (retaliatory animus but objective probable cause) does not offend clearly established law, the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity to the officers in Reichle. Id. We see no lawful way the district court could have reached a different result in this case. . . .Ms. Moral complains that the district court did not resolve the first question in the qualified immunity sequence (whether an arrest objectively supported by probable cause but allegedly made with a retaliatory motive violates the Constitution) before proceeding to the second question in that sequence (whether any such violation was clearly established at the time of Agent Hagen's actions) and resolving it against her. But district courts are generally free to proceed directly to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis where, as here, it is sufficient to dispose of the case.”)

Becker v. Bateman, 709 F.3d 1019, 1022-25 (10th Cir. 2013) (“In reviewing the grant of summary judgment to Officer Bateman, we decline to consider whether the district court erred in concluding no constitutional violation occurred and instead opt to address whether the rights at issue were clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . In Novitsky v. City of Aurora, 491 F.3d 1244, 1255–56 (10th Cir.2007), this court considered whether an officer’s application of a ‘twist lock’ maneuver to a potentially intoxicated individual found in the backseat of a vehicle constituted a violation of clearly established law. The court concluded a reasonable jury could have concluded the officer’s use of the twist lock was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The court nonetheless concluded the officer was entitled to qualified immunity, however, because ‘the risks presented by potentially intoxicated individuals are inherently fact-dependent and the extent to which an officer may use force in such situations has not been definitively answered by this circuit.’ . . . The court reached this conclusion notwithstanding authority in other circuits discussing at greater length ‘the extent to which law enforcement officers may use forceful techniques to protect themselves from the risks presented by potentially intoxicated individuals.’ . . . Novitsky thus indicates there was no clearly established law as of 2007 regarding the appropriate level of force which may be used to arrest a potentially intoxicated person during a stop. Accordingly, because the conduct in Becker’s complaint took place in 2005, Becker cannot carry his burden under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The only case published before the incident here involving analogous facts is Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 853–54 (9th Cir.2002). In Santos, the Ninth Circuit concluded there existed a disputed issue of material fact whether the police used excessive force in taking an intoxicated plaintiff to the ground and thereby breaking his back. . . . This single published decision from another circuit, however, falls short of demonstrating ‘the clearly established weight of authority from other courts [has] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.’ . . . Moreover, the summary judgment record does not establish Officer Bateman’s conduct was so obviously egregious as to diminish the specificity needed from prior case law to clearly establish the violation. . . . Because Becker has thus failed to carry his burden to show the law was clearly established at the time of the incident, the district court properly concluded Officer Bateman was entitled to qualified immunity for Becker’s excessive force claim.”)

Becker v. Bateman, 709 F.3d 1019, 1025-27 (10th Cir. 2013) (“The district court disposed of Becker’s claim against both Officer Bateman and the City based on its conclusion that Officer Bateman did not violate Becker’s constitutional rights. While it was unnecessary to review that conclusion in reviewing the district court’s grant of summary judgment to Officer Bateman, it is necessary to review that conclusion with respect to the City. . . . Citing Mecham v. Frazier, 500 F.3d 1200, 1203 (10th Cir.2007), the district court concluded there were no disputed issues of material fact because the events giving rise to his claim were recorded on Officer Bateman's dash cam. It therefore undertook to consider whether Officer Bateman's actions were objectively reasonable, considering the severity of the underlying offense, whether Becker posed an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Bateman or others, and whether Becker was actively resisting arrest. . . The district court resolved the first two of these factors in Becker's favor, noting that "[t]he underlying offense—a cracked windshield—was not severe" and "nothing in the video suggests that [Becker] was going to act violently or intended to flee." . . The court also concluded, however, that the video made clear Becker was resisting arrest, and Becker's size, obstinance, and intoxication all created a situation "permeated with unknowns." . . It therefore concluded Officer Bateman's actions were objectively reasonable and did not violate Becker's constitutional rights. . . . Here, however, notwithstanding the dash cam video, the relevant facts are controverted, and the evidence construed in the light most favorable to Becker would establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. That is, reasonable jurors could conclude Becker was not resisting arrest at the time he was taken to the ground by Officer Bateman. . . To be sure, reasonable jurors could agree with the district court's assessment of the video. That is, reasonable jurors could agree that Becker's language and actions after Officer Bateman told him he was under arrest. . . "indicate a clear resistance of arrest" which made the amount of force used objectively reasonable. . . . Because there exist disputed issues of material fact which, when construed in the light most favorable to Becker, establish Officer Bateman used excessive force, the district court erred in concluding as a matter of law Officer Bateman's actions did not violate Becker's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Allstate Sweeping, LLC v. Black, 706 F.3d 1261, 1268(10th Cir. 2013) ("As stated previously, we will assume, without deciding, that hostile-work-environment claims are proper under both § 1981 and the Equal Protection Clause. But Allstate cites to no cases, nor can we find any, holding that the harassment endured by the principals of an artificial entity can give rise to a racial- or gender-discrimination claim on behalf of the entity itself, absent independent injury to the entity. Indeed, it is not clear to us that an artificial entity could ever prevail on a hostile-work-environment claim. Such a claim has a subjective, as well as an objective, component; there must be proof that 'the plaintiff was offended by the work environment.' . . Being offended presupposes feelings or thoughts that an artificial entity (as opposed to its employees or owners) cannot experience. Perhaps Allstate had a right not to be injured because of hostility directed at its owners or employees—for example, by losing money because its employees had lower morale or quit. . . But Allstate has made no such claim. Black was therefore entitled to summary judgment on Allstate's hostile-work-environment claim.")

Lynch v. Barrett, 703 F.3d 1153, 1159-63 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The problem with Defendant Officers argument is that at this stage of the litigation we have no jurisdiction to resolve 'fact-related disputes about the pretrial record, namely, whether ... the evidence in the pretrial record was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial.' . . Yet this is precisely what Defendant Officers propose we resolve. . . . We choose to belabor this matter no further. Instead we now simply assume (1) a police cover-up designed to hinder pursuit of a legal claim may violate an individual's constitutional right to court access and (2) the facts set forth in the district court's order are sufficient to warrant a finding that Defendant Officers violated Plaintiff's right in this case. This allows us to broach the more manageable question of whether Plaintiff's right to court access was clearly established in the specific context of this case. . . . To overcome Defendant Officers' claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiff must show the scope of his right to court access was sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer would have understood Defendant Officers' refusal to name those responsible for exercising excessive force against him was not merely ill-advised, but violated that right. . . . [S]imply to say the Constitution recognizes a right to court access casts too high a level of generality over our inquiry. To show his alleged right to court access was clearly established in the proper sense, Plaintiff should identify 'cases of controlling authority ... at the time of the incident ... [or] a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' clearly establishing the scope of the right encompasses the facts presented, 'such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were [consistent with that right].'. . . In 2002, the Supreme Court in Harbury 'was careful not to endorse the validity of ... backwards looking [right to access] claims.'. . . Henceforth, the Supreme Court has never defined the right of court access to include a backwards looking claim based on a 'conspiracy of silence' aimed at interfering with an individual's ability to procure evidence of official misconduct. Nor have we ever endorsed such constitutional claim. . . . At least in the Tenth Circuit, the question of whether an evidentiary cover-up by police officials may violate an individual's constitutional right to court access was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. A reasonable officer might not have understood what Defendant Officers did (or refused to do) violated that right. . . . In other words, whether the scope of the right to access extended as far as Plaintiff claims was 'far from obvious.'. . . What is obvious is that such right as defined by Plaintiff was not clearly established.")

Estate of Bleck ex rel. Churchill v. City of Alamosa, Colo., 540 F. App'x 866 (10th Cir. 2013) ("We ultimately conclude that, even assuming that Officer Martinez's conduct amounted to a seizure of Mr. Bleck under the Fourth Amendment (based on the current state of the law), that legal outcome would not have been forecasted by clearly established law at the time. Consequently, Officer Martinez is entitled to qualified immunity. And, on this basis, we uphold the district court's judgment as to him. . . . Brower, and in particular, its gun hypothetical, could not have provided adequate notice to Officer Martinez of the assumed unlawfulness of his conduct. . . . Furthermore, Mr. Bleck has cited no cases—nor have we been able to locate any—where a court, in ruling on a fact pattern like the one at issue here, has found a Fourth Amendment violation. In sum, viewed objectively, we do not believe that it would have been clear and beyond debate to Officer Martinez that, when he elected to keep his gun in his hand as a show of authority, he could be found to have intentionally effected a Fourth Amendment seizure of Mr. Bleck when the gun accidentally discharged. Accordingly, we conclude that Officer Martinez cannot be found to have violated clearly established law and is entitled to qualified immunity.") Elwell v. Byers, 699 F.3d 1208, 1213, 1217-19 (10th Cir. 2012) ("The concurrence would not have us address the constitutional question. We conclude that the question is appropriately considered for two reasons. First, the district court's legal ruling was that a protected liberty interest exists, and that is the issue before us on appeal. We can affirm a lower court's ruling on any grounds adequately supported by the record, even grounds not relied upon by the district court. . . The statutory basis of the district court's conclusion does not foreclose our review of the constitutional question. Second, . . . both the Supreme Court in Smith v. Organization of Foster Families for Equality & Reform, 431 U.S. 816 (1977) (hereinafter 'OFFER'), and we in Spielman v. Hildebrand, 873 F.2d 1377 (10th Cir.1989), dodged the constitutional issue presented in this case. As the Court recently reaffirmed, addressing the constitutional issue is often 'advantageous' under such circumstances. . . . By passing over the constitutional issue on multiple occasions, courts have failed to clarify the law with the result that these tragedies continue to occur without legal recourse to the victims. Accordingly, we proceed to the constitutional question. . . . We recognize that the typical foster care arrangement generally does not create a liberty interest in familial association. . . . But the Elwells, who had cared for T.S. nearly his entire life and were on the verge of adopting him, fall closer to the status of adoptive parents than in the ordinary, temporary foster arrangement. Thus, we do not need to define precisely where the liberty interest threshold falls on this spectrum, but conclude that the Elwells fall on the protected side of that line under the facts of this case. . . . The Elwells claim entitlement to the bare minimum of process—notice. We have no difficulty concluding that the Elwells' interest entitled them to this 'elementary and fundamental requirement.' . . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that the Elwells' constitutional rights were violated when T.S. was removed from their home without any advanced notice. . . . Spielman is the only Tenth Circuit decision on point, and given its assumed-but-not-decided conclusion as to whether preadoptive parents possess a liberty interest, . . . it surely cannot have rendered a violation clearly established. The effect of that decision was just the opposite: Spielman left the law unclear. The Elwells claim that a single case decided by the Eastern District of Pennsylvania clearly established that certain foster parents possess a liberty interest in maintaining their family structure. . . . Although the precise quantum of case law sufficient to clearly establish a violation is a matter of some dispute, we think it quite evident that a single case from an out-of-circuit district court cannot clearly establish the law in the Tenth Circuit. Moreover, McLaughlin's holding was grounded in state law, making it inapplicable in light of our conclusion that Kansas law did not give rise to the Elwells' protected interest. The district court concluded that the Kansas statute itself clearly established the constitutional violation. But as explained in § II.B.1, supra, we conclude that the statute did not create a constitutionally cognizable liberty interest, let alone clearly establish one. Although Kan. Stat. Ann. § 38–2258 (2007) might have apprised the defendants that their conduct was contrary to state law, it could not have established that removal of T.S. without notice was unconstitutional for qualified immunity purposes. . . . A violation of state law does not necessarily violate the constitution. And on the constitutional question, no court had answered whether preadoptive parents in the Elwells' position possessed a liberty interest in familial association. The Elwells suffered a devastating violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights, and we are not insensitive to their plight. But given the state of the case law, we must reverse the district court's qualified immunity determination.”) Toeys v. Reid, 685 F.3d 903, 910, 914-16 (10th Cir. 2012) (“This is one of those cases in which it is appropriate for the court to exercise its discretion to avoid avoidance. As shown by Mr. Toeys’s seven-year placement in the QLLP [Quality of Life Level Program], prison officials' actions here are of a longstanding nature. . . .We are neither mandating the implementation of a stratified behavior- modification program nor imposing any particular structure on any such program. We simply hold that, if a prison system wishes to encourage better behavior by implementing a stratified incentive program that involves an atypical and significant hardship, it must provide meaningful individualized reviews to prisoners to help them progress through the program. . . . In these circumstances (and given that the defendants have waived any argument about the existence of a liberty interest), we have no hesitation in concluding that the failure to give Mr. Toevs any reviews at Levels 4, 5, and 6 violated his right to due process. . . . Even though Mr. Toevs did not receive meaningful periodic reviews, we conclude that defendants are entitled to judgment based on qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in 2005 through 2009 that the review process was inadequate. . . .Since Hewitt, it has been clearly established that prisoners cannot be placed indefinitely in administrative segregation without receiving meaningful periodic reviews. . . . This court, however, has not previously interpreted 'meaningful' to require officials to inform prisoners placed in a stratified behavior-modification program of the reasons for their continued placement, so as to provide a guide for future behavior. Moreover, this court has never considered the due-process implications of the QLLP. Accordingly, we cannot conclude that the state of the law from 2005 to 2009 gave defendants fair warning that the QLLP review process was not meaningful, or that the lack of reviews at QLLP Levels 4 through 6 was a due-process violation. Because the law was not clearly established, defendants are entitled to judgment based on qualified immunity.") Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173,1180-82 (10th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he Supreme Court has recently instructed that courts should proceed directly to, 'should address only,' and should deny relief exclusively based on the second element, Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2032 (2011), in seven particular circumstances outlined in [Pearson]. . . . With respect to the last consideration, constitutional avoidance, the Supreme Court has told us that courts may 'avoid avoidance'—and so answer the first qualified immunity question before proceeding to the second—in cases involving a recurring fact pattern where guidance on the constitutionality of the challenged conduct is required and the conduct is only likely to be challenged within the qualified immunity regime. . . . But the Court has also told us that this should be the exception, not the rule—that as a general matter, constitutional avoidance considerations trump and 'courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.' . . .[T]he district court's opinion addressed only the first part of the two part test for qualified immunity. What to do when the district court fails to address the second, clearly established law, element? If it were clear that no constitutional violation took place, as the defendants urge, we might simply reverse the district court and grant qualified immunity. But the answer to that question isn't so clear in this case. Faced with that problem we usually do well—as Pearson and Camreta remind us—to proceed directly to the clearly established law question when we're sure it yields immunity anyway. But there again the answer isn't so obvious in this case. So it is that we are left in a situation without obvious answers to either qualified immunity question and risk confronting difficult constitutional questions without the benefit of a full analysis from the district court. In these circumstances, there remains, however, another course available to us—remanding the matter back to the district court to finish the work of answering the second qualified immunity question. . . . That course bears the advantage of allowing the adversarial process to work through the problem and culminate in a considered district court decision, a decision that will minimize the risk of an improvident governing appellate decision from this court. And that course is especially prudent where, as here, the issue is close and the briefing on appeal less than entirely satisfactory. Indeed, many of the same considerations that Pearson and Camreta identify as counseling in favor of proceeding directly to the second qualified immunity element—the possibility of avoiding a needless constitutional question, the quality of briefing, and the desire to avoid the risk of a poor decision—also counsel in favor of remanding to ensure the district court addresses the second element before we begin to tangle with a case on appeal. And it is for these very reasons that we reserve decision on both aspects of the qualified immunity question in this case until after the district court, on remand, has finished its work on the clearly established law prong.”) Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173, 1183-87 (10th Cir. 2011) (“Mr. Kerns submitted only that, whoever owned the records and whatever other laws may say about how and when they might be shared with law enforcement, he had a constitutionally protected expectation that the hospital would keep its records shielded from the Sheriff absent a warrant. The district court analyzed both aspects of the qualified immunity test before agreeing. On appeal, the Sheriff disputes whether he violated Mr. Kerns’s constitutional rights by asking a hospital to share its records voluntarily—and, if he did, whether those rights were clearly established at the time. Because we agree with Sheriff White on the latter (clearly established law) question, we reverse without addressing the former (constitutional violation) question. And we pursue this course because doing so allows us to avoid rendering a decision on important and contentious questions of constitutional law with the attendant needless (entirely avoidable) risk of reaching an improvident decision on these vital questions. . . . Given this court’s express recognition of the uncertain state of the law in 2005 regarding the very circumstances we now face, we are hardly in a position to say that the proper resolution of the issue was simultaneously beyond doubt. . . . To be sure, Mr. Kerns cites two cases in which this court held that government officials violated plaintiffs’ substantive due process privacy rights by accessing their records without public disclosure. But both of those cases involved another element not present here: the government officials involved accessed the plaintiffs’ confidential information as part of an unlawful campaign of sexual harassment. . . . Of course, a case on point isn’t required if the impropriety of the defendant’s challenged conduct is clear from existing case law. If we could be sure that the distinction between public disclosure or government access without a valid purpose, on the one hand, and more limited government access for otherwise legitimate purposes, on the other, is a trivial one we would rule in Mr. Kerns’s favor. . . . The difficulty is that the Supreme Court in Whalen and NASA and the logic of our own cases preclude such a conclusion and acknowledge instead that such a distinction might make a constitutional difference. . . . The dissent eloquently argues that if the scope of Mr. Kerns’s Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments rights in third party held medical records isn’t clear enough then we should use this case to address the matter definitively. But to voice this argument is to confirm that the issue we confront today hasn’t yet been clearly resolved—and why qualified immunity is unavoidable. The Supreme Court has warned us that small qualified immunity appeals are rarely the right place to decide large new issues of constitutional law. We always do well to abide its warnings. And perhaps especially so here, where the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment questions surrounding medical records are complex, the third party overlay adds another dimension to the problem, the parties' briefing unhelpfully skates past many of the important issues, and the lack of clearly established law is readily apparent from our case law and that of the Supreme Court. So it is we leave the bigger questions for another day and today rest our decision on a much humbler premise, reversing the district court's entry of summary judgment against Sheriff White and ordering the entry of summary judgment in his favor only because Mr. Kerns has failed to identify clearly established law rendering beyond debate that the Sheriff's conduct was unlawful as of 2005.")

Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173, 1198 (10th Cir. 2011) (Holloway, J., dissenting) ("Sheriff White's asking the VA for Mr. Kerns's private medical records in the circumstances existing here is so far out of the realm of constitutional behavior that we should not hesitate to hold that it was unlawful, even if we did not have precedents closely on point that mandate that result. But the precedents that do exist are easily close enough on point that any reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that constitutionally protected medical records cannot be obtained simply because a possibility exists that the information would be helpful. Constitutional protection means that such records cannot be routinely obtained without a warrant, without consent, without probable cause, and without exigent circumstances.")

[See also Kerns v. Board of Com'rs of Bernalillo County, 888 F.Supp.2d 1176, 1222 n.35 (D.N.M. 2012) (Browning, J.) ("While the Court is, of course, obligated to follow faithfully the Supreme Court's decisions and opinions, the Court has always been unenlightened and even troubled by Justice Elena Kagan's comments in Camreta v. Greene about 'large' and 'small' cases. . . As a trial judge, the Court has tried assiduously to avoid thinking about or categorizing some cases as 'large' and some as 'small.' It usually is not mentally healthy for a judge to put all his or her energy into 'large' cases and slight 'small cases'; to the litigants, their case is the most important case on the Court's docket, and it is usually wise for the judge to treat each case on which he or she is working—at that moment—as the most important case at that moment. Getting the decision 'right,' i.e. getting the law and facts correct and accurate, is obviously important, but getting it right is only one-half of a judge's task, particularly a trial judge's job. The other half of dispensing justice is the appearance of justice—did the Court listen to the litigant's arguments, wrestle with those arguments, and deal with them in an intellectually honest way. Americans are pretty good about accepting a judicial decision—even an adverse one—and cease obsessing over an issue, if they are convinced that an authority figure has dressed up, taken them seriously, listened patiently and politely, wrestled with the arguments, addressed them, and accurately stated the facts. The Court believes that, if it starts looking at some cases before it as 'large' and some as 'small,' it begins a slippery slope that does not accomplish both halves of the task of dispensing justice. The justice system depends so much on the nation respecting and accepting the courts' proceedings and decisions, because courts have very little 'power' that does not depend on that acceptance. Thus, Justice Kagan's comments are not only not self-defining, but they are disturbing. If, perhaps, a 'large' case is a Supreme Court case or one that comes from the East Coast or California, rather than one in a district court in New Mexico, then it helps to look at what cases the Supreme Court has decided for the plaintiff. The three most recent qualified immunity cases, the Supreme Court dealt with are: (i) Reichle v. Howards, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012); (ii) Filarsky v. Delia, —U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 182 L.Ed.2d 662 (2012); and (iii) Messerschmidt v. Millender, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 182 L.Ed.2d 47 (2012). In Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court determined that secret service agents were entitled to qualified immunity for arresting a protestor who touched the Vice President and held that it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could give rise to a First Amendment violation. . . In Filarsky v. Delia, the Supreme Court held that a private individual that the government hires to do its work, an internal affairs review, is entitled to seek qualified immunity for Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. . . In Messerschmidt v. Millender, the Supreme Court held that police officers in Los Angeles, California were entitled to qualified immunity when they relied on an invalid warrant to search a home, because a reasonable officer would not have realized the error. . . The Supreme Court has not denied qualified immunity since 2004 in Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 124 S.Ct. 1284, 157 L.Ed.2d 1068 (2004), where it held that an officer unreasonably relied on a deficient warrant. . . The Court does not think those presumably 'large' cases (they are Supreme Court cases, after all) are any different—substantively, legally, or factually—than this case involving the search of a citizen's home after someone shot down a police helicopter and then detained that suspect for nine months until the United States realized that J. Kerns could not have shot down the helicopter. On the flip side, treating large cases like they are large cases can create an appearance problem to the public and to the litigants—that only big cases deserve the Court's attention. A trial judge can overwork a 'large' case. It is better to treat even 'large' cases like every other case; large cases and their litigants need to know and appreciate that they are not the only case on the court's docket, and realize that the scarcity of judicial resources applies to them too.”)] Whittington v. Lawson, No. 10-1299, 2011 WL 2144549, at *3, *4 (10th Cir. June 1, 2011) (not published) (“Penrod involved a prisoner's allegation that he was denied hygiene items by an intentional and retaliatory decision by prison officials to punish him for filing grievances and for seeking relief in court. Whittington's claim, by contrast, is not presented as a retaliation claim. Penrod did not establish a general rule that a prison could never, even without a retaliatory motive, apply existing policies that had the incidental effect of compelling an inmate to choose between hygiene items and payment of litigation costs. As we have now recognized, see Whittington, 307 F. App'x at 189, such policies may indeed violate the constitutional rights of inmates, but our case law did not clearly establish that rule during the time period relevant to Whittington's complaint. In sum, we conclude that at the pertinent time the law was not clearly established that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by requiring an inmate to use funds in his prison account to purchase hygiene products, even if he did not have sufficient funds to purchase these products because of the payment of expenses for constitutionally protected litigation. Hence, the district court properly granted qualified immunity on Whittington’s claims against the defendants in their individual capacities.”).

Leverington v. City of Colorado Springs, 643 F.3d 719, 732, 733 (10th Cir. 2011) (“The Supreme Court in Pearson made clear that courts have discretion to decide ‘which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . . In this case, it was not clearly established that Ms. Leverington’s statement to Peters did not constitute a ‘true threat’ unprotected by the First Amendment. . . . Here, even drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Ms. Leverington, it is debatable whether a reasonable officer in Peters’s position would have considered her statement to be a threat. Accordingly, Ms. Leverington’s free-speech rights in this context were not clearly established, and Peters is entitled to qualified immunity on this basis. In addition, it was not clearly established that Ms. Leverington’s statement was ‘protected’ for another reason—as discussed above, it was not on a matter of public concern. . . . [W]e need not—and do not—decide here whether the public-concern test applies in the context of a Worrell inquiry. It is sufficient that the law was not clearly established on this point, and thus that Peters is entitled to qualified immunity on this basis as well.”)

PJ ex rel. Jensen v. Wagner, 603 F.3d 1182, 1197, 1198 (10th Cir. 2010) (“The district court concluded that the Jensens failed to show that any defendant violated their right to direct P.J.’s medical care. Because the district court decided this issue under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it did not have occasion to consider whether the Jensens’ right to direct P.J.’s medical care in the circumstances presented in this case was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. Furthermore, on appeal, the Jensens confine their argument to the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis and assume that under the circumstances of this case their right to direct P.J.’s medical care is clearly established. We reject this assumption and conclude that the Jensens’ right to direct P.J.’s medical care in this case—if any right indeed exists in such circumstances—was not clearly established at the time the Jensens allege the right was violated. [Discussing case law] Here, the state was endowed with. . . broad authority, and the Jensens do not direct us to a clearly established constitutional line that defines what a state can and cannot do to protect a child whose life is compromised by his parents’ refusal to obtain medical care. . . . Accordingly, under the circumstances of this case, the Jensens’ asserted right to direct P.J.’s medical care was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violations; therefore, they cannot overcome the defendants’ claims of qualified immunity. . . . In contrast to the Jensens’ purported right to direct P.J.’s medical care in this case, we resolve their claims regarding their substantive due process right to familial association and their procedural due process rights on the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—namely, that the Jensens have not shown a violation of their constitutional rights.”)

Chavez-Rodriguez v. City of Santa Fe, 596 F.3d 708, 713 (10th Cir. 2010) (“When a defendant asserts qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment, the burden shifts to the plaintiff who must satisfy a heavy two-part burden. . . . The plaintiff must show the defendant’s conduct violated a constitutional right, and the right was clearly established at the time of the defendant's conduct. Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 815-16 (2009). Though it is often helpful, the court need not resolve the inquiry in this particular order. Id. at 818. Here, the court opts to proceed with the constitutional inquiry first." (goes on to hold public employee's speech was pursuant to official duties and not protected by First Amendment)).

Weise v. Casper, 593 F.3d 1163, 1167, 1170 (10th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) ("In their discretion, courts are free to decide which prong to address first 'in light of the circumstances of the particular case at hand.' . The Pearson Court recognized that skipping the constitutional violation question may conserve judicial resources in 'cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.' . Some cases are so fact-bound that deciding the constitutional question offers 'little guidance for further cases.' . Further, proceeding directly to the 'clearly established' question may avoid the risk of deciding a case incorrectly given insufficient briefing on the constitutional violation question. . . Although it is unclear whether Defendants' alleged conduct violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, it is obvious that the rights were not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . In sum, no specific authority instructs this court (let alone a reasonable public official) how to treat the ejection of a silent attendee from an official speech based on the attendee's protected expression outside the speech area. To be sure, in some obvious situations, general authority may put a reasonable public official on notice that his or her conduct is violative of constitutional rights. This is not one of them. Because it is plain that the constitutional right claimed was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, we need not reach the question of whether Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.")

Weise v. Casper, 593 F.3d 1163, 1172-74 (10th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) (Holloway, J., dissenting) ("I am persuaded that this is a case in which the issue of whether a right has been violated should be addressed at the outset. In recent years there have been several cases across the nation in which citizens have sought redress for alleged infringement of their fundamental liberties under somewhat similar circumstances. . . Because the right of free speech on matters of public concern is so vital to our democracy, these are important cases, and the judiciary has a valid and vital role in our society's response. The importance of the issues raised in this appeal should weigh heavily in favor of our consideration of them on the merits. . . . The issue thus framed is stark: Defendants excluded Plaintiffs from the President's public speech—after they had obtained tickets, cleared security screening and been seated in the audience—due to the protected expression by one of them outside the event. . . The question, then, is whether the Constitution permitted Defendants to take this action against Plaintiffs for this reason. The answer, informed by decades of free speech jurisprudence—must be a resounding 'no.'").

Nieler v. The Board of County Com'rs, 582 F.3d 1155, 1166, 1169 (10th Cir. 2009) ("We are permitted to address whether the law is clearly established before addressing whether a constitutional violation has occurred. Pearson, __ U.S. at __, 129 S.Ct. at 818. . . . To make clear, we are not holding that qualified immunity is appropriate whenever there is an underlying question of historical fact (in this case, what Mr. Nielander actually said). Rather, we are holding that where a question of ultimate fact (in this case, whether a reasonable officer would be unreasonable in concluding that statement two was a true threat under clearly established federal law) cannot be resolved as a matter of law, the law is not clearly established and qualified immunity is appropriate. . . . Thus, Deputy Perez is entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Nielander's First Amendment retaliation claim.”).

Swanson v. Town of Mountain View, Colo., 577 F.3d 1196, 1199, 1200, 1203, 1204 (10th Cir. 2009) (“Because we conclude the conduct here did not violate clearly established constitutional rights, we take the advice of Pearson and address that issue first. . . . Before turning to the relevant precedent, we want to emphasize that the alleged conduct is, to say the least, troubling. The plaintiffs assert the Mountain View police department established a policy of allowing its officers to perform routine traffic stops outside its town boundaries, and then prosecuted the violations as if they had occurred within the town itself. Whether as a matter of administrative convenience or revenue generation, enforcing traffic laws outside city limits where not specifically authorized by state law raises serious legal concerns. . . . Nevertheless, for us to rule in this appeal on the precise contours of the constitutional question raised by the town's policy is unnecessary because Tenth Circuit law did not clearly establish a Fourth Amendment violation at the time of the conduct. . . . [E]ven assuming a constitutional violation, a reasonable police officer would not have known in 2006 that the extra-jurisdictional, but within the same state, traffic stops constituted a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law, when no dispute exists that the officer observed traffic violations before effectuating the stops.”).

Cordova v. Aragon, 569 F.3d 1183, 1188-95 (10th Cir. 2009) (“[W]e accept the district court's findings that a reasonable juror could find that Officer Aragon was not in immediate danger at the time of the shooting, and we ask only whether the potential risk to third parties created by Mr. Cordova's driving was alone sufficient to justify Officer Aragon's shooting him. . . . Scott strongly suggests that the reasonableness balancing must take into account that there is a spectrum of ‘deadly force,’ and that just because a situation justifies ramming does not mean it will justify shooting a suspect in the head. . . . We are therefore forced to consider whether the substantial but not imminent risk imposed on innocent bystanders and police by a motorist's reckless driving justifies a reasonable officer to use a level of force that is nearly certain to cause the motorist's death. This is not an easy question, or one that any court could feel confident in answering. . . . We do not believe it would be reasonable for an officer to shoot any motorist who ran a red light or swerved through lanes, simply because reckless driving poses some threat of physical harm to a bystander who might be down the road. Car chases inherently risk injury to persons who might happen along their course, and if that risk alone could justify shooting the suspect, every chase would end much more quickly with a swiftly-fired bullet. . . . When an officer employs such a level of force that death is nearly certain, he must do so based on more than the general dangers posed by reckless driving. . . . To the extent that the district court held that the hypothetical risk Mr. Cordova posed to fellow motorists who might happen along was itself enough to render the shooting reasonable, it was in error. The threat must have been more than a mere possibility. . . . The law in our circuit and elsewhere has been vague on whether the potential risk to unknown third parties is sufficient to justify the use of force nearly certain to cause death. Given that our precedent does authorize the use of deadly force when a fleeing suspect poses a threat of serious harm to others, Officer Aragon was not unreasonable in believing that a potential threat to third parties would justify such a level of force. . . . Because the law was not clear on how high the risk of harm to third parties must be before an officer can use a level of force nearly certain to cause death, however, we AFFIRM on qualified immunity grounds the district court’s grant of summary judgment as it applies to Officer Aragon.”)

Cordova v. Aragon, 569 F.3d 1183, 1204, 1205 (10th Cir. 2009) (O’Brien, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority should have followed the lead of the Supreme Court and stopped with a holding of no violation of clearly established law. We are now unnecessarily committed to a contrary, and in my view, erroneous path. . . . Like the future danger recognized in Scott, Cordova’s significant risk of future reckless behavior and dangerousness justified immediate action. Regardless of the justification provided by the imminent threat to Officer Aragon, the threat Cordova posed to the general public also provided an independent justification for the use of deadly force.”).

Callahan v. Millard County, 557 F.3d 1140, 1141 (10th Cir. 2009) (“The Supreme Court has now reversed our judgment, holding that courts no longer must decide qualified immunity based upon the sequence required by Saucier v. Katz. . . . The Supreme Court also held that the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . . Clearly established law did not show that the Defendants’ conduct violated the Fourth Amendment given general acceptance of the ‘consent once removed’ doctrine in 2002. . . . In view of the Supreme Court’s disposition, the judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.”)

Christensen v. Park City Mun. Corp., 554 F.3d 1271, 1276-78 (10th Cir. 2009) (“Until very recently, in a case of qualified immunity, district and appellate courts were required to resolve the issue of law before proceeding to whether it was clearly established. . . . Fortunately, very recently, while this opinion was being prepared, the Supreme Court jettisoned its prior holding that courts in qualified immunity cases must determine whether the plaintiff’s constitutional rights were violated before turning to whether the asserted right was clearly established. . . . This case is a prime example of when the discretion to avoid the first half of the Saucier two-step should be exercised. To attempt to answer Saucier’s first question would require us to opine on an open and significant issue of constitutional law on an inadequate record, without benefit either of a district court holding or of relevant briefing, even though the issue would have no effect on the outcome of the case. We therefore exercise our newfound discretion and move on. . . . Police officers are not constitutional lawyers, and they should not have to fear personal damages liability when they enforce the plain terms of an ordinance that has not been challenged in court, let alone overturned, unless its unconstitutionality is patent. There is no case law from the Supreme Court or the Tenth Circuit establishing—clearly or otherwise—that the conduct complained of by Mr. Christensen was unconstitutional in 2004, or even today. To be sure, the plaintiff cites a handful of decisions from courts in other circuits that lend support to his claim. Even setting aside the fact that two of the cases he cites post-date the incident, the cited decisions have not been so broadly accepted as to be considered the ‘weight of authority.’ Indeed, the decisions stand for somewhat different interpretations of the First Amendment as applied to sales of artwork on public property. We think it is too much to expect that law enforcement officers, however reasonable or well-informed, would have known in 2004 that it is unconstitutional to enforce a general ordinance prohibiting unlicensed outdoor business activity on public property against an artist wishing to sell his wares in a park. We therefore affirm the district court’s holding that the claims against the individual officers must be dismissed on qualified immunity grounds.”).

White v. City of Topeka, 489 F.Supp.3d 1209, 1232-42 (D. Kan. 2020) (“[V]iewing the facts and drawing inferences in plaintiffs’ favor, these facts present a triable issue whether it was reasonable for the officers to perceive Mr. White as reaching for the gun in his pocket when his left hand moved near his left side and remained there for less than one second, . . . but never reached into his pocket and never retrieved the firearm— particularly because Mr. White never had made any threats to the officers during their entire interaction. From these facts, the court can’t conclude—as a matter of law—that it was reasonable for the officers to perceive Mr. White as reaching for the gun, thus justifying the use of deadly force. . . . The court recognizes that Mr. White was armed, with a gun in his left pocket. But, as the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals has recognized, ‘the mere possession of a firearm by a suspect is not enough to permit the use of deadly force.’ . . . Cooper v. Sheehan, 735 F.3d 153, 159 (4th Cir. 2013). ‘[A]n officer does not possess the unfettered authority to shoot a member of the public simply because that person is carrying a weapon.’ . . . ‘Instead, deadly force may only be used by a police officer when, based on a reasonable assessment, the officer or another person is threatened with the weapon.’ . . . Officers Cruse and Mackey cite several cases which, they contend, support a finding that their use of deadly force was reasonable under the circumstances. But, each case presents a slightly different factual scenario than this one. And, importantly, each of the Tenth Circuit cases they cite (and one from our court) involve suspects who had brandished a firearm in the officers’ presence and had threatened the officers or others with the firearm, thereby justifying use of deadly force. . . . After considering all three Graham factors, the court finds that the first and second factors favor plaintiffs and the third factor favors the officers. These factors and the totality of the circumstances preclude the court from concluding on summary judgment—as a matter of law—that Officers Cruse and Mackey’s use of deadly force was reasonable under the facts here, and thus did not violate Mr. White’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . More specifically, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, a rational fact finder could conclude ‘from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, the totality of the circumstances’ didn’t support probable cause to believe that Mr. White had committed severe crimes or that he posed a threat of serious physical harm to the officers or others; and so, the court can’t conclude—as a matter of law—that Officers Cruse and Mackey were ‘justified [in] the use of force.’ . . . Thus, the court finds Officers Cruse and Mackey are not entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that no constitutional violation occurred under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The court recognizes that the Supreme Court

clearly has established that the use of deadly force on a fleeing suspect is ‘constitutionally unreasonable’ ‘[w]here the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others[.]’ Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 10 (1985). The court already has concluded in the above analysis that the summary judgment facts present triable issues whether Mr. White posed an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. But, the Supreme Court has warned that the test announced in Garner was ‘cast at a high level of generality.’. . . Instead, and as just discussed, the court must ask the question—and decide—whether the officers violated Mr. White’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights ‘in [a] more particularized sense.’. . . So then, the proper inquiry here asks whether existing precedent would have ‘place[d] [the officers] on notice that the use of deadly force under the circumstances presented here would result in the violation of a clearly established right.’. . . Officers Cruse and Mackey assert that ‘the law was not clearly established on September 28, 2017 that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to shoot a suspect of shots fired who runs from officers with a gun, who has failed to comply with commands to get on the ground and who has just overcome their efforts to manually control him to prevent his access to the weapon, regardless whether he was immediately reaching for the gun.’. . . To support the officers’ argument that the constitutional right at issue wasn’t clearly established, the officers cite cases where courts have granted qualified immunity to officers who used deadly force against fleeing suspects carrying firearms because, the courts concluded, an officer doesn’t have to wait until a suspect actually uses his weapon before the officers are justified in using deadly force. . . . The court understands that the facts in these cases differ somewhat from the summary judgment facts presented here. The officers rely on cases where suspects had brandished a firearm before the officers employed deadly force on the suspect. In contrast, here, Mr. White never brandished his firearm. And, he never threatened the officers with the weapon—either physically or verbally. Based on these facts, plaintiffs frame the clearly established Fourth Amendment question differently than the officers do. Plaintiffs pose the question as: ‘when a fleeing suspect possesses a handgun, but does not brandish or threaten with it, may officers use lethal force on that suspect?’. . . . Here, the court takes the clearly established question—framed differently by both parties—and crafts the issue based on the actual ‘situation [Officers Cruse and Mackey] confronted.’. . . Viewing the facts comprising that situation in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the court asks: In September 2017, was it a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation to use deadly force on a suspect who was carrying a firearm in the pocket of his pants, where the suspect had ignored officers’ orders to lie down and stop, resisted officers’ efforts to secure the gun, broke free from the officers as they attempted to secure the weapon, and ran from the officers with the gun still in his pocket, even though the suspect hadn’t brandished the weapon or otherwise threatened the officers with his weapon? The court hasn’t identified one case that put Officers Cruse and Mackey on notice that the law was clearly established in September 2017—when they used deadly force on Mr. White—that Mr. White didn’t present a risk to the officers or others based on these summary judgment facts. To the contrary, the court has identified cases where courts have held—before September 2017—that officers’ use of deadly force was justified where the officer reasonably believed the suspect possessed a gun and the suspect was resisting or fleeing from law enforcement, even if the suspect never threatened the officers. . . . After reviewing the relevant case law, the court concludes the law wasn’t clearly established that Officers Cruse and Mackey violated Mr. White's Fourth Amendments rights under the circumstances of this case. So, the court holds that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Favela v. City of Las Cruces, No. CIV 17-0568 JB\SMV, 2019 WL 2648322, at *38, *46 (D.N.M. June 27, 2019) ("The Court will follow the process that Saucier v. Katz outlined, first determining whether the Defendants' actions violated the Constitution and then, assuming any rights were violated, determining whether they were clearly established. . . Although the Court recognizes that this approach is no longer mandatory, it believes it will be 'beneficial' under the circumstances. . . Specifically, there 'would be little if any conservation of judicial resources' here by only addressing the clearly established prong, . . because it would be 'difficult to decide whether a right is clearly established without deciding precisely what the existing constitutional right happens to be[.]'. . In this case, it is difficult to decide precisely what law is or is not clearly established unless the Court determines, as best it can, whether there is even a constitutional right at issue, what it is, what its scope is, and whether -- under the facts and circumstances here -- it was violated. It is, in short, this is an appropriate case to 'avoid avoidance,' . . because the exercise of determining whether Dollar and Soto violated Favela's constitutional rights will help the Court determine whether the law was clearly established. The Court will thus address whether any constitutional violations occurred before discussing whether the law was clearly established. . . . Soto should not be held liable for the use of the catheter, because Memorial Medical staff, a third party, made the decision to catheterize Favela. Soto was not involved in that decision, and no fact provided reasonably indicates that Soto instructed Memorial Medical staff on what medical procedures to employ. Once Memorial Medical committed Favela, Soto did not have authority over Favela, and Soto certainly did not have authority over Favela at the time the decision was made to catheterize or at the time the procedure was implemented. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the catheterization is not a violation of Favela's constitutional rights and that even the catheterization was a violation, Soto did not proximately cause that violation. The Court therefore concludes that Soto did not violate Favela's constitutional rights as Count II alleges. . . . Even if the Court concluded, as a matter of law, on the record before it that the use of the catheter somehow constituted a violation of Favela's rights by Soto, the Court concludes that the law was not clearly established such that reasonable officer in Soto's position would have recognized the unlawfulness of medical staff catheterizing Favela. . . . Favela has not pointed the Court to any meaningful Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit caselaw that would suggest use of a catheter to extract urine from an individual is a constitutional violation. The Court's own research has been equally unavailing to find guidance from the Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit on the matter. Indeed, this dearth of caselaw spans beyond the Tenth Circuit. The Court's research yielded a handful of cases from other district courts confronting this issue. [collecting cases] While none of these cases are of binding precedent to the Court's qualified immunity analysis, the Court notes that interpretations from other jurisdictions would suggest the catheterization in this case did not violate Favela's clearly established rights. The Court reaches this conclusion because Soto was not involved in the procedure, Soto did not order the catheterization, nothing indicates the procedure was performed in a medically unacceptable manner, and the catheterization was performed for medical purposes and not for any criminal investigation. These observations are, of course, academic, because no binding caselaw establishes that the catheterization in this case violated Favela's clearly established rights. Without this showing of a clearly established right, Favela cannot proceed on Count II of his Complaint, and Soto is entitled to qualified immunity on Count II.")

Quintana v. Santa Fe County Bd. of Commissioners, No. CIV 18-0043 JB\LF, 2019 WL 452755, at *35 n.32 (D.N.M. Feb. 5, 2019) (Browning, J.) ("The appellate courts have little appreciation for how hard it is to do a clearly established prong review first without looking -- closely and thoroughly -- at whether there is a constitutional right and whether there is a violation. It is difficult to review the facts, rights, and alleged violations in the comparative cases without looking at the facts, rights, and alleged violations on the merits in the case before the Court. Pearson v. Callahan sounds like a good idea in theory, but it does not work well in practice. The clearly established prong is a comparison between the case before the Court and previous cases, and Pearson v. Callahan suggests that the Court can compare before the Court fully understands what it is comparing. In practice, Saucier v. Katz worked better."), affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded, 973 F.3d 1022 (10th Cir. 2020) (See also Favela v. City of Las Cruces, 398 F.Supp.3d 858, 891 n.9 (D.N.M. 2019) (same); Manzanares v. Roosevelt County Adult Det. Ctr., 331 F.Supp.3d 1260, 1294 n.9 (D.N.M. 2018) (same))

V.W. ex rel. Wybrow v. DaVinci Academy of Science and the Arts, No. 1:09-CV-127 TS., 2001 WL 4001150, at *5, *6 (D. Utah Sept. 8, 2011) ("Whether the strip search in this case was constitutional under the framework established by Safford presents a close question. However, the Court need not ultimately determine whether V.W.'s constitutional rights were violated. Determining whether an official is entitled to qualified immunity is a two step process. First, the court must determine whether the facts make out a constitutional violation. . . . Second, the court must decide whether the right at issue as 'clearly established' at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct. . . . The Supreme Court has made clear that courts have the discretion to determine 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . . In this matter, the Court finds it prudent to address whether the constitutional right allegedly violated here was clearly established at the time of the search. The search at issue here occurred in December 2008. Safford was not issued until June 2009. The Court in Safford acknowledged that lack of uniformity concerning strip searches in the school setting prior to its decision and, as a result of that uncertainty, found that the law had not been clearly established at the time of the search in that case. . . . Thus, the school officials in that case were entitled to qualified immunity. The same is true here. There was no controlling case law on the issue of strip searches in the school setting from either the Supreme Court or the Tenth Circuit at the time this search occurred. Therefore, the Court finds that Freeze and Raccuia are entitled to qualified immunity.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Swinford v. Santos, 121 F.4th 179, 189, 191 (11th Cir. 2024) (“We begin and end our qualified immunity analysis by addressing the first requirement. . . . Based on our precedent and the contents of the defendants’ body camera footage, we conclude that the individual officers’ use of deadly force was reasonable in light of the circumstances they faced. Once Thomas approached some of the officers and pointed his gun at them, the individual officers clearly had probable cause to believe that he posed a serious threat to the officers on scene. Accordingly, they did not use excessive force in shooting Thomas. . . . Because we conclude that the officers did not use excessive force—and thus did not commit a constitutional violation—they are entitled to qualified immunity, and we end our qualified immunity analysis.”)

Franklin v. Popovich, 111 F.4th 1188, 1194, 1196-97 (11th Cir. 2024) (“We conclude, contrary to the district court’s assessment, that there is no genuine dispute of fact that Popovich did not know Redding was unarmed. As the district court recognized, there is no evidence that Popovich knew Redding was unarmed. The mere fact that Redding was unarmed does not mean there is necessarily a fact dispute or credibility issue as to what Popovich knew, because a reasonable officer in Popovich’s position could still have believed—in the split-second between Redding’s sudden movement and the fatal shots—that Redding was still armed or had another weapon. Thus, Franklin has not shown a Fourth Amendment violation, and cannot point to any clearly established law holding that the use of deadly force was unreasonable in these circumstances. . . . Just moments before, and regardless of whether Redding continued to shoot while fleeing from police officers, Redding had exchanged gunfire with the police and possibly shot one of the officers. There is no evidence that Popovich knew that Redding was unarmed. Finally, and at the key moment, Redding could at least appear to a reasonable officer as resisting arrest by pulling his arms (voluntarily or involuntarily, and for whatever reason) away from the officers standing on them. Thus, the operative facts are that Redding made a sudden move after having engaged in a shootout and fled from police, at a time and place that Popovich could reasonably have believed Redding was still armed. That is not a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . The district court, for its part, reached the opposite conclusion on the theory that (for purposes of summary judgment) Popovich did know that Redding was still armed. The district court apparently thought that it was required to draw that inference simply because of ‘the mere fact that [Redding] was[, in fact,] unarmed[.]’ In particular, the district court thought this raised ‘a credibility issue’ that had to be resolved in Franklin’s favor. We see the logic, but that conclusion is incorrect. Once again—there is no indication Popovich knew that Redding had dropped the weapon with which he fired on the officers . . . and even if there were, Popovich had no way of knowing if Redding had another weapon before having searched him (which he had not yet done). Thus, exercising our discretion to consider either prong of the qualified immunity analysis as appropriate to the circumstances of this case, . . . we conclude that Franklin failed to show that Popovich violated Redding’s Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Gilmore v. Georgia Department of Corrections, 111 F.4th 1118, 1123-24, 1128-36 (11th Cir. 2024), reh’g en banc granted, 119 F.4th 839 (11th Cir. 2024) (“We conclude that the officers’ strip search violated Gilmore’s constitutional rights. But a line of Supreme Court precedent authorizes blanket strip searches of prisoners for security reasons, and no Supreme Court or

Eleventh Circuit precedent expressly prohibits blanket searches of prison visitors. And while our sister circuits have uniformly rejected suspicionless strip searches of prison visitors, our precedent precludes us from considering that precedent in the ‘clearly established’ inquiry. So we must agree with the district court that the law was not ‘clearly established’ when Gilmore’s strip search occurred. Therefore, after careful consideration, and with the benefit of oral argument, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment. . . . Until now, neither we nor the Supreme Court has explicitly defined the standard for strip searches of a free person visiting a jail or prison. We now hold that correctional officers must have at least reasonable suspicion that a visitor is concealing contraband (e.g., drugs or weapons) before they may strip-search that visitor. . . . Florence does not stand for the proposition that suspicionless strip searches aimed at detecting contraband in a jail or prison are per se lawful—even for arrestees, detainees, or prisoners. Rather, collectively, these opinions tell us that, for security reasons, arrestees, detainees, and prisoners may be searched without suspicion in certain circumstances. But none of these cases involved a free person. And a free person visiting a prison is in a different position for Fourth Amendment purposes than a prisoner or detainee. . . . Gilmore, of course, was a free person when the events here occurred. She was not an arrestee, a detainee, or a prisoner. And she was not bound for the jail’s general population. . . . Nor, accepting Gilmore’s version of the facts, did Defendants have reasonable suspicion to believe that she was carrying contraband. Defendants also did not strip-search Gilmore under a blanket policy. So Bell, Powell, and Florence are not instructive as to whether a suspicionless strip search of Gilmore was ‘reasonable’ under the Fourth Amendment. Since Bell, Powell, and Florence do not resolve this case, we consider cases from outside the prison context. Those cases support a reasonable-suspicion requirement. . . . [W]e require reasonable suspicion for strip searches of arrestees, students, and border entrants. We now extend that reasonable-suspicion requirement to searches of prison visitors. In doing so, we join the unanimous consensus reached by nine of our sister circuits. [citing cases] And, we note, two of those decisions postdate Florence, undermining any argument that Florence precludes a reasonable-suspicion standard for prison visitors. . . . We now apply this standard to the facts of Gilmore’s case. When we take the facts most favorably to Gilmore, Defendants lacked reasonable suspicion for the strip search. Gilmore denies consuming, possessing, or smelling like marijuana at any point before or during her visit. She also denies watching Officer Lupo during her visit. So at most, Gilmore ‘stared’ at Lieutenant Milton for ‘one to two minutes.’ That was not enough for Lieutenant Milton to reasonably suspect that Gilmore was concealing or smuggling contraband and to justify a strip search. . . . And it certainly did not justify a manual body-cavity search, as we discuss in further detail below. . . . We have already found that Defendants lacked reasonable suspicion that would justify a strip search. But that is only one half of the reasonableness inquiry. . . . We also conclude that Defendants’ manual body-cavity search was unreasonable in scope and violated Gilmore’s Fourth Amendment rights for that independent reason. . . . In sum, Defendants’ manual body-cavity search was search was neither ‘justified at its inception’ nor reasonable in scope. . . . So the search violated Gilmore’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . A ‘right can be clearly established in one of three ways.’. . . Gilmore ‘must point to either (1) “case law with indistinguishable facts,” (2) “a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law,” or (3) “conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.” . . . And in this Circuit, when we conduct this analysis, ‘we look to binding decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, this Court, and the highest court of the relevant state’—here, Georgia. . . . Precedent from other jurisdictions cannot clearly establish the law in our Circuit. . . . Gilmore suggests another path to ‘clearly established’ law: a ‘robust consensus of ... persuasive authority.’ . . . As we’ve pointed out, by 2017, when the search here occurred, seven circuits had required reasonable suspicion for a strip search of a prison visitor . . . That, Gilmore claims, was enough to put Defendants on notice that they were violating her constitutional rights. And ‘[t]he touchstone of qualified immunity is notice.’ . . . To be sure, both we and the Supreme Court have suggested that ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ may ‘place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . But in neither Carollo nor Glasscox did we actually consult persuasive authority when reaching our holding. . . . At most, then, those statements are dicta, which do not bind us. . . . What’s more, we expressly rejected a similar rule over a decade earlier. See Thomas ex rel. Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950, 955 (11th Cir. 2003). In Thomas, the plaintiffs seized on similar language regarding ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ from Wilson v. Layne[.]. . . . We ‘reaffirmed’ our pre-Wilson position because we did not read ‘Wilson to have held that a consensus of cases of persuasive authority would be able to establish law clearly.’ . . . And we cannot say that Wesby ‘demolish[ed]’ or ‘eviscerate[d]’ Thomas’s ‘fundamental props.’ . . . So Wesby did not undermine Thomas to the point of abrogation. . . . And to the extent that Carollo and Glasscox conflict with Thomas, Thomas controls. . . . So we do not look to persuasive authority—even a ‘robust consensus’ of it—to determine whether the law was ‘clearly established’ in this Circuit. And no precedent from the Supreme Court, our Circuit, or the Georgia Supreme Court ‘clearly established’ that reasonable suspicion was required for a strip search of a prison visitor in 2017. For these reasons, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Johnson v. City of Atlanta, 107 F.4th 1292, 1301-02 (11th Cir. 2024) (“We begin and end our qualified immunity analysis by addressing the first requirement. . . . Because we conclude that Rolfe did not use excessive force in tackling Johnson, there was no constitutional violation. We therefore conclude at the first step of our analysis that Rolfe was entitled to qualified immunity, and we do not address the second prong—whether the law was clearly established.”)

Seif v. Alabama Agricultural & Mechanical University, No. 22-13131, 2024 WL 2873817, at * (11th Cir. June 7, 2024) (not published) (“We need not decide whether the district court correctly found that Seif’s facts, taken as true, actually establish all three elements of a procedural due process claim. In determining whether Seif satisfied his burden, ‘courts have discretion to decide which of the two prongs of qualified-immunity analysis to tackle first.’ . . . There are ‘cases in which a court [can] rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law before turning to the more difficult question whether the relevant facts make out a constitutional question at all.’ . . . And this is one of those cases. No clearly established law gave Tarver-Ross ‘fair warning’ that Seif was entitled to grieve his salary dispute. . . . Unlike Barnes, . . . this case doesn’t involve a student’s right to enrollment or a university’s authority to expel students. This case is about whether a faculty member and department chair can grieve a salary dispute under faculty-specific policies. . . . Barnes did not establish ‘obvious clarity’ that university employees have a property interest in any and all internal dispute processes. . . . We said nothing in Barnes about university policies as applied to nonstudents, much less anything about university policies governing internal employment dispute procedures. . . . That leaves the third method of clearly establishing the law—showing that the defendant’s conduct ‘so obviously violates the Constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’ . . . Seif did not show that closing a university employee’s internal grievance is ‘so egregious’ such that it obviously violates the Constitution. . . . Because we cannot say Tarver-Ross acted in an objectively unreasonable manner, she is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Brooks v. Miller, 78 F.4th 1267, 1285 (11th Cir. 2023) (“On Brooks’s deliberate-indifference claim, we start with the ‘clearly established’ prong because it resolves the question of qualified immunity. In determining whether Officer Miller violated a clearly established constitutional right, we must focus on the specific facts and context of this case. . . . So we ask whether, when Officer Miller transported Brooks to the Jail on November 12, 2016, it was clearly established that an officer acted with deliberate indifference to a transported person’s complaints that his handcuffs were causing numbness and injury, if he drove about twenty-five minutes to a jail where the transported person could receive medical attention, instead of stopping on the road or driving to a nearby hospital for medical assistance. We conclude that, even if these facts state a constitutional violation, any such violation was not clearly established when Officer Miller transported Brooks. To support the opposite conclusion, Brooks relies on case law that establishes the general proposition that if an officer ‘actually know[s] about a condition that poses a substantial risk of serious harm and yet do[es] nothing to address it, [he] violate[s] the Constitution.’ . . . And to be sure, Patel states the general rule. But that case does not get to the heart of the allegations here. Even assuming without deciding that Brooks had a serious medical need, the general principle Brooks relies on does not provide clear notice to a reasonable officer in Officer Miller’s position. It does nothing to clarify whether driving about twenty-five minutes for medical attention in response to an arrestee’s statement that handcuffs are too tight, instead of stopping roadside to provide medical attention or finding a hospital and obtaining care in a local emergency room, would violate a detainee’s rights. And we do not see how Patel’s general principle would have provided Officer Miller with ‘ “fair warning” that his conduct was unlawful.’ . . . Because Brooks failed to point to any precedent or a generally established rule that would give Officer Miller fair warning that his specific conduct was unconstitutional, Officer Miller is entitled to qualified immunity on Brooks’s claim for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need.”)

Garcia v. Casey, 75 F.4th 1176, 1179, 1186-91 (11th Cir. 2023) (“This appeal is complicated by our inconsistent case law on qualified immunity for false arrest claims. Despite the Supreme Court clarifying the standards for assessing probable cause and qualified immunity in District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577 (2018), the courts in our Circuit have only sometimes applied that decision. Accordingly, we once again affirm that the test in Wesby should be applied to answer whether probable cause exists for an arrest or qualified immunity prevents liability for a false arrest claim. Under Wesby, we believe the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against the plaintiffs' false arrest claim. . . . [T]o establish the defense of qualified immunity for a false arrest claim, we have held that 'an officer need not have actual probable cause, but only "arguable" probable cause[.]' . . . An officer has arguable probable cause if 'a reasonable officer, looking at the entire legal landscape at the time of the arrests, could have interpreted the law as permitting the arrests.' . . . An officer lacks arguable probable cause only if 'the state of the law on the date of the alleged misconduct makes it obvious that the [officer's] acts violated the plaintiff's rights in the specific set of circumstances at issue.' . . . Accordingly, 'the dispositive question is whether it was already clearly established, as a matter of law, that at the time of Plaintiff's arrest, an objective officer could not have concluded reasonably that probable cause existed to arrest Plaintiff under the particular circumstances Defendants confronted.' . . . We have not often explained how the doctrine of 'arguable probable clause' relates to the defense of qualified immunity more generally. The touchstone of qualified immunity is that officers must be 'on notice their conduct is unlawful' before being held personally liable for a constitutional violation. . . . [T]he arguable probable cause inquiry in a false arrest case is no different from the clearly established law inquiry in any other qualified immunity case. Unless the law 'makes it obvious that the [officer's] acts violated the plaintiff's rights,' . . . the officer has qualified immunity. . . . Under the 'any-crime rule' an officer is 'insulate[d] from false-arrest claims so long as probable cause existed to arrest the suspect for some crime, even if it was not the crime the officer thought or said had occurred.' . . . Applying the 'any-crime rule' to qualified immunity, an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if he had arguable probable cause to arrest a suspect for any crime, even if that crime was not ' "the offense announced by the officer at the time of the arrest." ' . . . The defendants argue on appeal that actual or arguable probable cause existed to arrest Garcia and Revill for obstructing governmental operations. . . . The existence of actual or arguable probable cause 'depends on the elements of the alleged crime and the operative fact pattern.' . . . We will assume without deciding that the officers lacked actual probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs for obstructing governmental operations, but, examining the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that they had arguable probable cause. . . . For starters, the plaintiffs have not pointed us to an Alabama or federal court that has found an absence of probable cause to arrest under Alabama's obstruction statute in a similar situation. . . . For our part, we have examined Alabama's obstruction statute three times in the context of probable cause for an arrest, but our opinions in those cases do not support the plaintiffs. . . . None of these authorities provided notice to the defendants that arresting Garcia and Revill for obstruction would have violated their rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because there is no factually analogous case law that supports the plaintiffs' position, we ask whether the text of the obstruction statute itself clearly established that the defendants lacked probable cause on these facts. . . . In short, we think a reasonable officer 'could have interpreted,' . . . the obstruction statute to preclude hiding evidence of a crime and could have concluded from this unusual chain of events that the attorneys took their client's phone for that purpose. We concede, as the state court found in the state criminal action, that Garcia and Revill's conduct does not fit squarely within the obstruction statute. They did not, for example, destroy the phone or flee from the officers when confronted outside the courthouse. But our precedent makes clear that the eventual weakness of the criminal case against the plaintiffs does not preclude a finding that actual or arguable probable cause existed. . . . Lastly, despite the lack of materially similar case law or a mismatch between the facts and the text of the applicable statute, Garcia and Revill argue that the violation here was so clear and obvious that any reasonable officer would know that the arrest violated the law. Specifically, they argue that no reasonable police officer would believe that he could arrest someone just for refusing to provide consent for a search. We do not doubt that all reasonable officers know that it is unconstitutional to arrest someone merely because she refuses to consent to a search. . . But this argument ignores the context of the arrest. Garcia and Revill were arrested only after officers secured a warrant to seize a phone and witnessed them take possession of that phone in a way that would prevent its discovery by law enforcement. As explained above, it is not unreasonable for an officer to believe that the conduct the officers witnessed was criminal. Accordingly, we cannot say that this is ‘the rare “obvious case,” where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’. In summary, we do not decide whether hiding evidence violates the Alabama obstruction statute or whether the defendants had actual probable cause under that statute. We are confident that, even if the defendants did not have probable cause, their error did not violate clearly established law, entitling them to qualified immunity.”)

Watkins v. Azael, No. 22-11648, 2023 WL 4422527, at *6-8 (11th Cir. July 10, 2023) (not reported) (“Even assuming arguendo that Watkins has shown that Azael’s rape threats violated the Fourteenth Amendment, Azael is still entitled to qualified immunity because Watkins failed to demonstrate the constitutional violation was clearly established at the time Azael made the threats in 2016. A right is clearly established if ‘at the time of the officer’s conduct, the law was sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing [was] unlawful.’. . . To meet this ‘demanding standard,’ ‘existing law must have placed the constitutionality of the officer’s conduct “beyond debate.”’. . . A plaintiff can show that a constitutional right was clearly established in three ways: (1) ‘he can point us to a materially similar case that has already been decided’; (2) ‘he can point us to a broader, clearly established principle that should control the novel facts of the situation; or (3) he can show that the conduct involved “so obviously violate[d] the Constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’. . . ‘We look only to binding precedent at the time of the challenged conduct—that is, the decisions of the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state’ to see if the right was clearly established. . . . Claims involving the mistreatment of pretrial detainees, like Watkins, are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment’s Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, which applies to convicted prisoners. . . Although the source of the right differs, pretrial detainees, like prisoners, have a right to be free from excessive uses of force by guards. . . Because the district court’s order and the parties’ appellate briefs analyzed Watkins’s Fourteenth Amendment claim within the excessive force framework, we do as well. Nonetheless, in Watkins’s prior appeal, this Court concluded that Azael’s alleged demeaning homosexual comments and gestures were the type of verbal harassment or taunting that is not actionable under the Fourteenth Amendment (or even the Eighth Amendment). . . Thus, we focus our analysis on Azael’s alleged angry and repeated threats to rape Watkins, which are ‘objectively more serious than mere vulgar words or gestures,’ and allegedly caused Watkins severe mental distress. . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court in a published opinion has determined whether a correctional officer's verbal threats to physically harm an inmate alone violate the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment. In dicta, this Court has said that 'verbal taunts. . . [h]owever distressing' cannot establish a claim that guards violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . More recently (and after Azael's 2016 conduct alleged here), this Court has held that prisoners have an Eighth Amendment right to be free from sexual assault by corrections officers and have defined sexual assault to include various types of physical contact of a sexual nature. . . . Yet, in doing so, we have left open 'whether non-physical contact can constitute "sexual assault" for purposes of establishing an excessive-force claim under the Eighth Amendment.' . . . Elsewhere, at least three other courts have concluded that threats, in at least some situations, may be sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. [citing cases] But these courts do not bind the Eleventh Circuit. Nor did they address facts like those alleged here. And we are not aware of any court, much less this Court or the Supreme Court, that has previously concluded that threats of rape that occurred on a single day and not followed by additional threats or other action, stated a violation of a prisoner's right to be free from excessive force. Even if the facts alleged here do state a Fourteenth Amendment due process violation—a question we do not decide—we cannot say that any such violation was 'clearly established' in 2016, at the time of Azael's alleged conduct. As we have mentioned, in 2016, no binding precedent from this Court or the Supreme Court established 'beyond doubt,' either through materially similar facts or a broad statement of principle, that a corrections officer's verbal threats to sexually assault a pretrial detainee, without more, rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . And, in dicta in a published decision and in an unpublished decision, this Court had indicated that mere verbal threats were not cognizable constitutional violations. . . . Given the state of our decisional law in 2016, we cannot say Azael had 'fair notice' that his threats constituted a due process violation under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . [G]iven the binding precedents concerning verbal statements (in a single incident) without accompanying actions, we cannot say that such verbal threats present one of the exceptionally rare cases in which the conduct so obviously violates the Fourteenth Amendment that no prior case law was necessary to give a reasonable corrections officer fair notice.")

Benning v. Commissioner, Georgia Department of Corrections, 71 F.4th 1324, 1329 -34 & n.2 (11th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub nom Benning v. Oliver, No. 23-664 (U.S. Apr. 29, 2024) ("We hold that Mr. Benning had a protected liberty interest in his outgoing emails, and as a result he was entitled to notice and other procedural safeguards when the three emails to his sister were intercepted and withheld. But we agree with the district court that Ms. Edgar and Ms. Patterson are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Benning's due process claims for damages because the law to that effect was not clearly established in September and October of 2017.² [fn.2: We address the merits of the due process claims because, as explained later, Mr. Benning's requests for declaratory relief as to those claims are not barred by qualified immunity.]. . . . This case. . . involves the censoring of emails rather than physical letters. So, like the district court, we must decide whether emails are the equivalent of physical letters for purposes of a liberty interest. We conclude that under Martinez Mr. Benning had a protected liberty interest, grounded in the First Amendment, in the emails he generated and sought to send to his sister. . . . From the perspective of the GDC, emails are the functional equivalent of letters written or typed on paper. And we can think of no persuasive reason why prison officials should not be required to provide notice and other procedural safeguards when they intercept or otherwise censor emails sent by inmates. . . .As a result, whether Mr. Benning had a free-standing constitutional or statutory right to use the GDC email system does not affect or resolve the procedural due process question under Martinez. In any event, it is the First Amendment—and not state law—which creates a liberty interest here. . . . Mr. Benning had a protected First Amendment liberty interest in his outgoing emails, and a reasonable jury could find that he was not provided any notice of the interceptions or of his right to challenge the decisions. But that does not end the matter, for Ms. Edgar and Ms. Patterson asserted qualified immunity as to Mr. Benning’s claims for damages for the alleged procedural due process violations. We therefore turn to qualified immunity. . . .Although we have concluded that the Martinez due process requirements apply to email correspondence in the prison setting, before today there were no Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Georgia Supreme Court decisions on point. As far as we can tell, only two district courts have specifically ruled that the Martinez due process framework governs emails generated by inmates, and those courts issued their decisions in June of 2020 and November of 2018, well after Ms. Patterson and Ms. Edgar intercepted Mr. Benning’s emails. See, e.g., Tory, 2020 WL 2840163, at *4; Emery v. Kelley, 2018 WL 5779593, at *2 (E.D. Ark. Oct. 3, 2018), report and recommendation adopted, 2018 WL 5779505 (E. D. Ark. Nov. 2, 2018). So even if district court decisions from other jurisdictions could create clearly established law—they cannot and do not—those two cases do not help Mr. Benning overcome qualified immunity because they post-dated the events in this case. . . . In sum, at the time Ms. Patterson and Ms. Edgar acted there was no governing and materially similar precedent concerning the due process implications of confiscating, intercepting, or censoring outgoing emails generated by inmates. We recognize that a prior case on all fours (or nearly all fours) is not always necessary to give an official fair notice that his conduct is wrongful. . . . Although the issue is close, we conclude that this is not one of those cases where the lack of notice and procedural safeguards ‘so obviously violates [the] [C]onstitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’. . . The law, as it existed in September and October of 2017, did not place the constitutionality of the conduct at issue ‘beyond debate.’”)

Benning v. Commissioner, Georgia Department of Corrections, 71 F.4th 1324, 1338 (11th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub nom Benning v. Oliver, No. 23-664 (U.S. Apr. 29, 2024) (“We conclude that qualified immunity applies with respect to Mr. Benning’s claims for damages against Ms. Patterson and Ms. Edgar. In September and October of 2017, when Ms. Patterson and Ms. Edgar intercepted Mr. Benning’s emails, there was no clearly established law (in the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Georgia Supreme Court) holding or indicating that the forwarding policy or the inmate-information policy (or similar policies) violated the First Amendment when applied to outgoing emails from inmates. There was also no clearly established law addressing which First Amendment standard—the one in Martinez or the one in Turner—governs prison regulations like the ones at issue here. Mr. Benning cannot point to any materially similar cases—and we have not found any ourselves—but he argues that a reasonable prison official would have understood that emails are a form of outgoing correspondence under Martinez. . . . But we have already rejected Mr. Benning’s similar argument against qualified immunity with respect to the due process claims.

And the recognition that emails constitute correspondence for due process purposes says little about the constitutionality of the forwarding and inmate-information policies under the First Amendment. Under the circumstances, the unconstitutionality of those policies was not ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Thus, because the law was not clearly established, we affirm the district court’s ruling that Ms. Edgar and Ms. Patterson are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Benning’s First Amendment claims for damages. In light of our decision, we need not and do not address the constitutionality of the forwarding and inmate-information policies.”)

Myrick v. Fulton County, Georgia, 69 F.4th 1277, 1303-04 (11th Cir. 2023) (“Appellants argue that Officers Delacruz, Cook, Whitaker, Roache, and Jackson used excessive force when they placed additional restraints on May while he was in the restraint chair. We need not decide if one of May’s constitutional rights was violated by the additional restraints because, even if it was, that right was not clearly established. . . . Appellants can show that a constitutional right was clearly established in three ways: (1) citing case law with indistinguishable facts; (2) pointing to a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law; or (3) alleging conduct so egregious that everyone would know it violated the Constitution. . . . There is simply no case law with indistinguishable facts that would clearly establish this constitutional right, nor do Appellants point to any. In fact, most case law in this Circuit would tend to indicate that the use of restraints was permissible. . . . Similarly, Appellants do not point to a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that would establish the right. That leaves the third option—conduct so egregious that any person would know it was unconstitutional. Appellants argue that the preeminent case using egregious behavior to clearly establish a constitutional right—Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 122 S. Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002)—applies. In Hope, the defendant was placed in leg irons, handcuffed to a hitching post, and made to stand in the Alabama sun in June for seven hours with no shirt, no bathroom breaks, and only one glass of water. . . . His arms were above shoulder height the entire time. . . . The guards taunted him. But the situation in Hope is far removed from the type of behavior exhibited by the Officers here. Qualified immunity operates to make sure that ‘before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice their conduct is unlawful,’ and serves to give them ‘fair warning.’ . . . In the absence of case law or a broad statement or principle that clearly establishes a constitutional right, the behavior in question must be so obviously unconstitutional that any reasonable officer would have notice. That is just not the case here. We cannot say that using additional restraints to transport May from the holding cell to the shower and from the shower to the property room was so obviously unconstitutional that any officer would have fair warning that they were violating a detainee’s constitutional rights. Because it was not clearly established that the Officers’ actions would have violated May’s constitutional rights, we need not decide whether such a constitutional right existed. The District Court did not err in granting the Officers summary judgment with respect to the restraints.”)

Sheba Ethiopian Restaurant, Inc. v. DeKalb County, No. 21-13077, 2023 WL 3750710, at *6-9 (11th Cir. June 1, 2023) (not reported) (“Here, Sheba alleged that the defendants conspired to violate its rights under section 1981 by discriminating against it on the basis of race. So we ask whether it was clearly established that an official could be liable under section 1981 for discriminating against a corporation based on the corporation's race. It wasn't. . . .Sheba's claim fails because it wasn't clearly established—under the first prong—that Sheba was a 'member of a racial minority.' Long ago, the Supreme Court said in dicta that 'a corporation ... has no racial identity and cannot be the direct target of the [city's] alleged discrimination.' . . In light of this language from Arlington Heights—and the total absence of binding law in our circuit contradicting it—we can't say that 'every reasonable official would have understood that [discriminating against a corporation] violates' section 1981. . . Looking to the three ways a law can be clearly established only confirms this result. First, there is no 'materially similar case' that would support imposing liability on the officials. . . The closest case—and the one Sheba relies on—is Webster v. Fulton County, 283 F.3d 1254, 1256 (11th Cir. 2002). In that case, a corporation alleged that it had filed a 'lawsuit charging Fulton County with a custom or policy of disparate-treatment racial discrimination' and that Fulton County retaliated against the corporation by 'refus[ing] to award [government] contracts to [the corporation] in retaliation for having filed th[e] lawsuit.' . . We held—in addressing the corporation's section 1981 retaliation claim—that '[i]n a situation such as the one presented by [that] case, [s]ection 1981's protections extend to companies such as [the plaintiff]'. . . This case differs meaningfully from Webster because Sheba brought a discrimination claim, not a retaliation claim. . . . [W]e can't say that every reasonable official would've known that section 1981 prohibits racial discrimination against a corporation. It is not at all 'obvious' that corporations have a race or can suffer discrimination based on their race. . . . Indeed, as the district court observed, the 'federal circuit courts have wrestled with' this issue 'over the past several decades.' The Supreme Court has even suggested that corporations cannot state a race discrimination claim. . . . 'When the courts are divided on an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability.' . . . [T]he final way to show clearly established law is 'by convincing us that the case is one of those rare ones that fits within the exception of conduct which so obviously violates the [statute at issue] that prior case law is unnecessary.' . . . No one has argued that this case presents one of those rare instances—and for good reason. Section 1981 provides that '[a]ll persons ... shall have the same right ... to make and enforce contracts ... as is enjoyed by white citizens.' . . . We can't say it's obvious from the statute's text that corporations can state a race discrimination claim. For all of these reasons, Sheba hasn't met its burden of showing that the officials violated clearly established law. The officials are thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In sum, we do not address whether corporations can—or cannot—state a race discrimination claim under section 1981. We hold only that there was no clearly established law in our circuit determining that officials are liable under section 1981 for discriminating against a corporation. In this absence, the officials in our case were entitled to qualified immunity.”) Harris-Billups on behalf of Harris v. Anderson, 61 F.4th 1298, 1302-05 (11th Cir. 2023) (“Like the district court, we conclude that this case can be decided at the first step of the qualified-immunity analysis. For reasons we will explain, we hold that Officer Anderson did not violate the Fourth Amendment when she shot and killed Mr. Harris. . . . Bottom line: Officer Anderson was facing down a man who had been threatening to kill her for several minutes straight. He had held a gun to her head, separately pointed his gun at her and her partners, spurned repeated orders to drop his weapons and surrender, barricaded himself in his car, and, finally, opened fire. This man knew how to conceal guns; he was suicidal, dogged, and erratic; and he had shown no signs of backing down. And with the lurch, he seemed to be springing back into action. We have little trouble concluding that, in those circumstances, Officer Anderson could reasonably have believed that he posed a lethal threat. Her decision to neutralize that threat was ‘[]reasonable’ and therefore constitutional. . . . [P]olicing doesn’t occur in freeze-frames. It’s not just the positioning of Mr. Harris’s body parts that would have justified a reasonable officer in thinking his lurch threatening, but also the suddenness with which he began to shift from a prone, unmenacing posture to a potentially violent one. The video captures that suddenness in a way the freeze-frame images miss. . . . [W]e needn’t address whether Officer Anderson would have been justified in firing once more had Mr. Harris not suddenly lurched. Because he did. And that lurch changed things. At the very least, having witnessed Mr. Harris lurch, a reasonable officer could have concluded that he was once again on the move, and once again posed a threat. . . . Officer Anderson wasn’t contending with a defenseless man who had surrendered. She was up against a man who (or so a reasonable officer could have concluded) bore the means, and the ability, and the demonstrated intent to shoot her, a man who was acting erratically and violently, and who had shown no sign of giving up. Quite unlike the suspect in Hunter, Mr. Harris posed a real and immediate threat of grave harm. . . . For all these reasons, we hold that in firing the shot that tragically killed Mr. Harris, Officer Anderson did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, she is entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Harris-Billups’s § 1983 claim.”)

Charles v. Johnson, 18 F.4th 686, 701-02 (11th Cir. 2021) (“Under the totality of the circumstances, we cannot say that Deputy Brantley’s use of a taser only once, for not more than five seconds, in ‘stun’ mode, was excessive. Because this instance of taser use cannot be described as excessive, it logically could not have been ‘clearly established’ or ‘apparent’ to Deputy Brantley that use of the taser was excessive. Deputy Brantley is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Charles argues that a non-Graham factor should be injected into our qualified immunity analysis. Specifically, Charles cites Mercado v. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152 (11th Cir. 2005), for the proposition that a violation of department policy can defeat qualified immunity. Department policy in this case directs that a taser ‘should not be used against persons displaying passive resistance,’ and Charles argues that Deputy Brantley violated this policy. . . . We need not determine whether Deputy Brantley in fact violated the policy at issue in this case, though it is plain that Charles was actively resisting for more than five minutes. In Mercado, the violation of department policy did not govern our Graham analysis. After all, the ultimate question was whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, not whether they violated a department policy. In Mercado, none of the Graham factors weighed in favor of the use of force. Attempted suicide was not a crime under Florida law, Mercado had not demonstrated a flight risk and did not pose a danger to the officers, and he had failed to comply for only a few seconds. On those facts, we were compelled to conclude that the use of force was unreasonable. We found the department policy useful in Mercado for a different reason. Once we determined that the use of force was excessive, the next question in the qualified immunity analysis asks whether the officer violated clearly established law. We had to determine whether the officers had ‘fair warning’ that their actions were unconstitutional. . . A police handbook that directs an officer to avoid a particular unconstitutional activity can be evidence that the officer was so warned. In Mercado, for example, the restriction against firing a Sage Launcher at the head of a non-threatening suspect was tantamount to a codification of the general constitutional principle that deadly force cannot be used in non-deadly-force situations. Because we find that Deputy Brantley did not engage in unconstitutional excessive force, we need not consider the department policy.”)

Schantz v. DeLoach, No. 20-10503, 2021 WL 4977514, at *4-6, *9-12 (11th Cir. Oct. 26, 2021) (not reported) (“As discussed below, we agree with the district court’s decision to dispose of Plaintiff’s § 1983 claim on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Assuming Plaintiff’s motorcycle was not headed directly towards Defendant when Plaintiff was shot, reasonable minds could perhaps disagree as to whether his use of deadly force under the circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. But Plaintiff does not cite, and we have not found, any clearly established law that would have given Defendant fair warning that his use of deadly force to bring an end to Plaintiff’s high-speed chase was excessive or otherwise unreasonable given the events that immediately preceded the shooting. Defendant is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff testified that he was trying to flee rather than drive towards the officers, and that his motorcycle was pointed away from Defendant when he was shot. Assuming Plaintiff’s version of the facts is true, it is a closer question whether Defendant’s use of deadly force against Plaintiff violated the Fourth Amendment. As such, we proceed directly to the clearly established law prong of the analysis. . . . Even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff can point to some clearly established law that would have made it apparent to Defendant at the time of the shooting that his conduct was unconstitutional. As discussed, the ‘salient question’ on this prong of the analysis is whether the preexisting law at the time of the shooting gave ‘fair warning’ to Defendant that his use of deadly force was unconstitutional under the circumstances that confronted Defendant when he shot Plaintiff. . . Plaintiff does not cite, and we have not found, any such clearly established law. . . . [W]e assume that Plaintiff was not driving his motorcycle towards Defendant when he was shot, which clearly would have authorized Defendant’s use of deadly force to protect his own life. Nevertheless, a reasonable officer in Defendant’s position could have concluded at the time of the shooting that Plaintiff intended to resume the chase he had initiated earlier. Indeed, Plaintiff admitted that he was trying to flee from the officers when he was shot. The determinative question on the clearly established law prong of the analysis is thus whether an officer in Defendant’s position at the time of the shooting—with all the information Defendant possessed about Plaintiff’s conduct during the chase up to that point and with the reasonable belief that Plaintiff intended to continue the chase if allowed to escape—would have known, based on preexisting law, that it violated the Fourth Amendment to use deadly force against Plaintiff to bring an end to the chase. We think not. The most factually similar precedent from the Supreme Court is Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765 (2014). . . . Given the Supreme Court’s decisions in Plumhoff and Mullenix, we likewise find no basis for denying qualified immunity to Defendant in this case. Again, in Plumhoff, issued just two years prior to Plaintiff’s shooting, the Supreme Court held that an officer did not violate the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force to end the high-speed chase described in our discussion of that case above. There are a few differences between this case and Plumhoff: the suspect in Plumhoff was driving a car whereas Plaintiff was driving a motorcycle, the traffic in Plumhoff arguably was heavier, and the suspect in Plumhoff might have committed more traffic violations during the chase than Plaintiff. But there are many more similarities: (1) in this case and in Plumhoff, the initial stop was for a relatively minor offense. . . missing tag here and an inoperable headlight in Plumhoff; (2) in both cases, the initial stop quickly developed into a protracted high-speed car chase; (3) like the suspect in Plumhoff, Plaintiff indisputably committed several traffic violations during the chase that Defendant reasonably could have perceived as posing a threat to other motorists, officers, and bystanders in the area, including running a red light in a downtown area, zigzagging and swerving around patrol cars, making U-turns and popping wheelies, and driving on the wrong side of the road; (4) it is undisputed that Defendant heard reports that Plaintiff was weaving through and heading into oncoming traffic, and thus endangering other motorists as the chase continued through Wayne County and thereby presenting a threat similar to that posed by the driver in Plumhoff; and (5) finally, like the officer in Plumhoff, Defendant shot Plaintiff when he threatened to take off and resume the chase after momentarily stopping. In short, the Supreme Court in Plumhoff was faced with a scenario that is factually similar to this case in many respects. And presented with that factual scenario, the Supreme Court concluded that an officer's use of deadly force to terminate a high-speed car chase did not violate the Fourth Amendment because 'all that a reasonable police officer could have concluded was that [the suspect] was intent on resuming his flight and that, if he was allowed to do so, he would once again pose a deadly threat for others on the road.' . . The same could be said here. But at the very least, it would not be clear to an officer in Defendant's position, and aware of Plumhoff, that the use of deadly force against Plaintiff as he restarted his motorcycle and threatened to resume the lengthy and indisputably dangerous chase that preceded the shooting was unconstitutional. As for Mullenix, it is more easily distinguished from this case than Plumhoff. Most notably, the suspect in Mullenix claimed to have a gun and threatened to shoot officers if they did not abandon their pursuit, and that threat was relayed to Officer Mullenix and presumably factored into his decision to disable the suspect's car by shooting at it. The suspect in Mullenix thus arguably presented a greater threat than Plaintiff to the officers involved in the chase, if not to other motorists and bystanders. On the other hand, the officers in Mullenix had a less lethal option of stopping the suspect—namely, the tire spikes that were being set at the time of the shooting. There is no evidence suggesting that the officers in this case had any less lethal means of stopping Plaintiff available to them, arguably making Defendant's decision to shoot at Plaintiff when he threatened to resume the chase more reasonable than Officer Mullenix's. Nevertheless, and regardless of the factual differences between the two cases, the Supreme Court made a few points in Mullenix that are highly relevant to the qualified immunity analysis in this case, and that weigh heavily in favor of granting immunity to Defendant. First, we cannot (as Plaintiff would have us do) decide whether qualified immunity applies in this case by applying the clearly established but general rule—set out in Graham and Garner—that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing felon 'absent a sufficiently substantial and immediate threat.' . . The Supreme Court recently reaffirmed this principal in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822662, at *2 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021) (quoting Mullenix and emphasizing that “[s]pecificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts”) and City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021) (“We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.”). Instead, we must determine whether any preexisting law would have put Defendant on notice that his conduct under the particular circumstances that confronted him during the chase involving Plaintiff made it clear—‘beyond debate’—that it would be unreasonable for him to use deadly force when Plaintiff threatened to resume the chase. . . Second, and as noted above, as of the date Mullenix was decided, the Supreme Court had ‘never found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment.’. The Supreme Court has not decided any excessive force cases involving a high-speed car chase since Mullenix. It is thus apparent, based on Mullenix, that no Supreme Court authority could have put Defendant on notice that his use of deadly force against Plaintiff under the circumstances of this case violated the Fourth Amendment. Nor would any preexisting precedent from this Court have put Defendant on notice of the unlawfulness of his conduct, assuming it was unlawful. Most of the circuit precedent Plaintiff cites is so factually dissimilar from this case that it has no bearing on the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Finally, while it is true that factually identical precedent is not always required to overcome qualified immunity, we only dispense with the requirement in an excessive force case when an officer’s conduct ‘lies so obviously at the very core of what the Fourth Amendment prohibits’ that its unlawfulness was ‘readily apparent’ under the circumstances. . . The obvious clarity exception cannot apply here, given the Supreme Court’s decision in Plumhoff, from which an officer in Defendant’s position might reasonably have extrapolated that the use of deadly force to terminate a protracted high-speed chase, during which Plaintiff committed numerous traffic violations while driving at speeds of 100 to 130 miles per hour through two counties was a reasonable response to the threat presented by allowing Plaintiff to resume the chase. As such, and because Plaintiff fails to point to any other preexisting law that would have given Defendant fair warning of the unlawfulness of his conduct, we hold that Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s § 1983 Fourth Amendment claim.”) Schantz v. DeLoach, No. 20-10503, 2021 WL 4977514, at *12 (11th Cir. Oct. 26, 2021) (Jordan, J., concurring) (not reported) (“Given the Supreme Court’s recent qualified immunity decisions in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822662 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021), and City of Tahlequa v. Bond, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822664 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021), I reluctantly concur in the judgment. I say reluctantly because the Supreme Court’s governing (and judicially-created) qualified immunity jurisprudence is far removed from the principles existing in the early 1870s, when Congress enacted 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . For a Court that consistently tells us that federal statutes are interpreted according to ordinary public meaning and understanding at the time of enactment . . . and that § 1983 preserved common-law immunities existing at the time of its enactment, . . . that is a regrettable state of affairs. Viewing the evidence in light most favorable to Mr. Schantz, Sheriff DeLoach used deadly force against him twice. Sheriff DeLoach first fired his shotgun at Mr. Schantz when he had stopped his motorcycle. When that first blast missed and Mr.

Schantz understandably tried to drive away, Sheriff DeLoach fired at him again. This time the shot hit home, with the buckshot striking Mr. Schantz in the face and neck. The notion that Sheriff DeLoach can escape liability for using deadly force under these circumstances—against an unarmed joyrider who was at rest on his motorcycle—stands § 1983 on its head, and will lessen incentives for police departments to craft better policies for the use of deadly force. ‘Regardless of the formal relationship between the constitutional and state law standards and the administrative standard, it is clear that the administrative standard remains heavily informed by both.’ Seth W. Stoughton, Jeffrey J. Noble, & Geoffrey P. Alpert, Evaluating Police Uses of Force 104 (2020). See also Franklin E. Zimring, When Police Kill 219 (2017) (“[T]he main arena for the radical changes necessary to save many hundreds of civilian lives in the United States each year is the local police department, not the federal courts or Congress, not state government, not local mayors or city councils, not even the hearts and minds of the police officers on the streets. All of these people and institutions can help by influencing local police to create less destructive rules of engagement.”).

Underwood v. City of Bessemer, 11 F.4th 1317, 1328-32 (11th Cir. 2021) (“Considering the facts in the light most favorable to Underwood, we disagree with the district court’s finding that there was no constitutional violation. However, the district court alternatively explained that even if there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the Officers did not violate clearly established law. We agree with that conclusion, which is sufficient for us to affirm the district court’s order. . . . Just like in Morton and Vaughan, Underwood’s version of events indicates that he did not use his vehicle in a threatening way. Underwood claims the Officers began to shoot at him while he was still eight feet away from Officer Partridge and was not accelerating or driving aggressively but inching forward so slowly that it looked like he would stop. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Underwood, as we must, it was not until after the Officers began shooting that Underwood accelerated forward. Accepting these facts as true, a reasonable jury could find that Underwood did not pose a threat of serious physical harm to the Officers or others. . . . For these reasons, we find that a reasonable jury could accept Underwood’s version of the facts and find that the Officers violated Underwood’s Fourth Amendment rights when they shot him. Of course, a jury could instead credit some of the Officers’ testimony and come to the same conclusion as the district court—that the Officers’ actions were reasonable. But these sorts of issues should not be decided at the summary judgment stage. . . . In sum, we conclude that there are disputes of material fact—about Underwood’s rate of speed, when he accelerated, and how and why Officer Partridge was positioned—which could preclude a finding of summary judgment here. Accepting Underwood’s version of the facts as true, we find that the Officers’ use of deadly force violated Underwood’s Fourth Amendment rights. While Underwood was not obeying orders to stop and was evading talking to the police, Underwood was not driving aggressively or in a threatening way. Rather, his car was merely idling and inching forward slowly. Although Officer Partridge claims that he walked in front of the vehicle out of concern for Officer Asarisi’s safety, the car was still eight feet away, he did not warn Underwood that he would use deadly force, and there was no critical need to prevent a known dangerous person from escaping and harming others. . . . While we find that Underwood’s facts make out a constitutional violation, the Officers are still entitled to qualified immunity if the violation was not clearly established. . . . The Officers are entitled to qualified immunity because Underwood has not demonstrated that his rights were clearly established. . . . As an initial matter, Underwood does not point to a factually similar case, nor does he contend that a broader principle applies here. And probably for good reason, as this case is not directly analogous to other binding qualified immunity cases involving vehicles and the use of deadly force. We also find that the Officers' actions were not so obviously excessive, but rather within 'the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.' . . . That is, even though we hold that accepting Underwood's facts as true the Officers violated his constitutional rights, we recognize that the law was not clearly established at the time of this incident. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1250-52 & n.16 (11th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("We begin with the constitutional question.¹⁶ [fn 16: The Supreme Court has said that 'courts should think hard, and then think hard again' before addressing the merits of an underlying constitutional claim as well as whether the law is clearly established. . . . Having done our due diligence, we conclude that addressing the constitutional claim here will 'clarify the legal standards governing public officials.' . . . Paired with Patel, this case helps illustrate what kind of conduct does and doesn't cross a constitutional line in the context of hot-car cases.] Officer Beatty's alleged conduct wasn't objectively unreasonable. The Supreme Court has given us six factors to consider in making a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force determination, and although the Court cautioned that these factors aren't exhaustive or exclusive, they're sufficient here. . . . Considering all the Kingsley factors, it seems most important there was very little 'force' used and essentially no harm done. . . . [I]t's hard to imagine how we could find a constitutional violation here without making a federal case of just about every 'hot car' incident in Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, which we (once again) decline to do.")

Washington v. Warden, 847 F. App'x 734, ____ (11th Cir. 2021) ("Though we may begin the qualified immunity inquiry with either the constitutional question or the question of whether the violation was clearly established, the Supreme Court has admonished us to 'think hard, and then think again' before addressing the merits of the constitutional claim. . . . For each defendant here, we thus begin—and ultimately end—our analysis with the issue of whether the alleged constitutional violations here were contrary to clearly established law. . . . In sum, unit managers Farley and Warren and warden Taylor were entitled to qualified immunity because not every reasonable officer in their circumstances would have known that the risk of harm to Washington was 'substantial.' Correctional officer Milner may have known of a substantial risk of harm to Washington, but it was not clearly established that her actions were unreasonable, and thus deliberately indifferent. All four defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Patel v. Lanier County, Georgia, 969 F.3d 1173, 1181-91 (11th Cir. 2020) ("By adopting an objective-reasonableness criterion, the Kingsley Court indicated a connection between the Fourteenth Amendment's excessive-force standard and the Fourth Amendment's standard, rather than the Eighth Amendment's. . . . Notwithstanding Kingsley, the district court here pointedly distinguished Fourth Amendment precedent, citing our pre-Kingsley cases for the proposition that ‘[t]he standard for showing excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment ... is higher than that required to show excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.’. . . But as we clarified in Piazza—which came down after the district court here issued its decision—that’s no longer true. After Kingsley, the Fourteenth Amendment’s standard is analogous to the Fourth Amendment’s. Had the district court applied the correct standard—Kingsley’s Fourth-Amendment-like objective-reasonableness test, informed by several contextual considerations—we think it would have concluded, as we do, that Deputy Smith violated Patel’s Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . We haven’t directly confronted a ‘hot car’ case before now, but variations of this fact pattern are understandably common. To try to bring clarity to the law governing such circumstances, we’ll identify the considerations that inform our decision, but we can’t hope to lay down a neat rule; as the Supreme Court has explained—for better or worse—‘objective reasonableness turns on the “facts and circumstances of each particular case.”’. . . . Whenever the force used against a pretrial detainee consists in his subjection to hazardous conditions, the ‘amount of force used’ is a function of two component factors—(1) the severity of those conditions and (2) the duration of his subjection to them. These two considerations combine to create a sliding scale: The more severe the conditions, the shorter the detention need be before it amounts to excessive force—and vice versa. Now, how about ‘need’? In cases involving pretrial detainees, there is always (by definition) some need to detain, at least until a judge authorizes a release. But, it seems to us, the need for detention in relatively harsh conditions depends both on the threat that the detainee poses and on the feasibility of alternative means of holding him. Again, a sliding scale: Detention in harsher conditions may be justified where alternative modes of detention are not readily available, especially if the detainee poses a heightened risk of danger to police or the public; by contrast, where the detainee poses no particular risk or where an alternative is at hand, the ‘need’ for harsher modes of detention dissipates. Here, Patel was kept in a hot transport van—without any ventilation or air conditioning—for a period of approximately two hours. While those facts alone don’t entitle Patel to a trial on his excessive-force claim, we note that detentions of comparable duration and severity have been held to create jury questions. . . . Moreover, for nearly half of Patel’s detention—the 55 minutes during which he was left unattended in the sally port—Deputy Smith presumably could have moved him inside the Lowndes County jail while he made arrangements to transport Grant. Hence, it seems to us that a significant fraction of the force applied to Patel was not just harsh but also unnecessary. . . . Although Kingsley’s list isn’t ‘exclusive,’ its factors suffice to resolve the constitutional question here. Construing the facts and accompanying inferences in his favor, the Kingsley factors tilt decisively toward Patel. Accordingly, we conclude that in the particular circumstances of this case, Patel’s detention and transport were ‘more severe than [was] necessary to ... achieve a permissible governmental objective.’. . . . Because the force Deputy Smith applied was not ‘objectively reasonable,’ it violated Patel’s Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . . That’s the good news for Patel on excessive force. Now the bad: Although we conclude that Deputy Smith violated Patel’s constitutional rights, we cannot say that the underlying law applicable to Patel’s excessive-force claim was sufficiently ‘clearly established’ to defeat qualified immunity. Before explaining why, we must first address Patel’s threshold contention that, in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim, he doesn't have to show a clearly established right. . . . The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying his claim was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident in question. . . . It is true, as Patel says, that in Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321–22 (11th Cir. 2002), and Fennell, 559 F.3d at 1216–17, we articulated a sui generis exception to that general rule for Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. But that exception was justified only by an idiosyncrasy of those claims—an idiosyncrasy that, with respect to those arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, Kingsley eliminated. As a result, Patel can no longer rely on our previous holdings but, rather, must prove that his right not to be subjected to prolonged detention in the hot transport van was clearly established. . . . The Johnson/Fennel exception rested entirely on the 'extreme' subjective-intent element of Eighth and (then) Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Kingsley, though, expressly eliminated any subjective element for such claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment—at least as to the excessiveness of the force. . . . In so doing, the Supreme Court likewise eliminated the justification for the Johnson/Fennel exception itself—effectively undermining that special rule 'to the point of abrogation,' at least as to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. . . . And if that weren't enough, the Kingsley Court expressly acknowledged that the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry would govern such claims. . . . As a result, although the Johnson/Fennel exception continues to apply to Eighth Amendment claims, we must abandon it as applied in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . . Applying the ordinary qualified-immunity framework, we conclude that Patel's constitutional rights here were not clearly established at the time of his transport between Cook, Lowndes, and Lanier Counties. . . . At the time of the constitutional violation here, there existed no clearly established law that could have given Deputy Smith fair notice that confining Patel as he did amounted to excessive force. For starters, Patel can point to no 'materially similar case.' . . . [O]ur holding that the pepper-spray incident in Danley was unconstitutional didn't give Deputy Smith fair notice that his treatment of Patel was excessive. Although our precedent clearly establishes that environmental conditions can amount to excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, our previous cases would not have put Deputy Smith on notice that the particular conditions he caused were sufficiently harsh. We note that Danley cites Burchett—a Sixth Circuit case with facts quite similar to this one—for the proposition 'that confining ... an arrestee, in a "police car with the windows rolled up in ninety degree heat for three hours constituted excessive force" in violation of the Fourth Amendment.' . . . But a mere citation to an out-of-circuit decision—even with approval, and even with an accompanying factual précis—cannot clearly establish the law for qualified-immunity purposes. . . . Moreover, and in any event, even if Burchett—or Danley's citation of it—could clearly establish the law in general, it wouldn't clearly establish that Deputy Smith's particular conduct violated Patel's constitutional rights. The detention in Burchett was both (1) somewhat longer—three hours with no ventilation, as compared to two hours here, less than half of which was wholly unventilated—and (2) somewhat more severe—a 90 degree ambient temperature, as compared to 85 degrees. . . . Close, but not close enough—because all agree that confining a pretrial detainee in a hot vehicle for just a short time wouldn't be unreasonable, law-enforcement officials need some leeway in this area. Accordingly, we will not impute notice in a hot-car case unless the analogy to preexisting case law is clear. . . . Although Kingsley established that all objectively unreasonable applications of force against pretrial detainees violate the Fourteenth Amendment, . . . confining a prisoner in a hot transport van, even for a couple of hours, is not so obviously unreasonable that Deputy Smith should have known better in the absence of case law more closely on point. Patel doesn't point to any other case that established 'a broad[], clearly established principle that should govern the novel facts of the situation,' . . . and we aren't aware of any. Nor, finally, was Deputy Smith's conduct so egregious 'that prior case law is unnecessary' to establish a clear violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Although Patel's detention and transport were no doubt exceedingly uncomfortable—and as it turns out, dangerous—Deputy Smith's conduct was not akin to those instances 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the officer] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.' . . . The basic standards governing Patel's Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim are uncontested and, here, are 'identical to those under the Eighth.' . . . Here, the circumstantial evidence would allow a jury to infer 'subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm' because (1) Deputy Smith witnessed symptoms that even a layperson could recognize as indicating that risk and (2) Smith wasn't any ordinary layperson—he was trained as a medical first responder. . . . A jury could also find 'disregard' of the risk based on the fact that Deputy Smith provided no intervention until after he delivered Patel to the Lanier County Sheriff's Office, and then only reluctantly. . . . Finally, the conduct here was worse 'than gross negligence' because Deputy Smith utterly refused to respond to the severe symptoms that he saw. . . . Deputy Smith's total inaction is telling; he not only failed to enlist the help of a medical professional in the face of a serious medical need, but he failed even to provide water on request and made no attempt to treat Patel himself despite having first-responder training. And of course it was Deputy Smith's neglect—leaving Patel in a hot, unventilated, un-air-conditioned transport van—that created the danger in the first place. Finally, the evidence amply supports the conclusion that Deputy Smith's deliberate indifference caused Patel harm. Patel's hospitalization and diagnoses alone suffice to establish a jury question as to injury. And the very identity of his diagnosed conditions—heat exhaustion and heat syncope—indicate heat exposure as their most likely cause. . . . For all these reasons, we conclude that Patel has presented sufficient evidence to prove every element of a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim. . . . We turn once more, then, to the second step of qualified immunity—that is, whether the right that Patel alleges was clearly established. Although we haven't identified any controlling case with closely analogous facts, we think 'the novel facts of the situation' are obviously governed by a 'broader, clearly established principle.' . . . 'The knowledge of the need for medical care and intentional refusal to provide that care has consistently been held to surpass negligence and constitute deliberate indifference.' . . . Both aspects of this articulation—knowledge and intentional refusal—are on full display here. This broad principle has put all law-enforcement officials on notice that if they actually know about a condition that poses a substantial risk of serious harm and yet do nothing to address it, they violate the Constitution. No more notice was necessary because 'the assumed circumstances here are stark and simple, and the [preexisting] decisional language ... obviously and clearly applies.' . . . This is not a case in which a law-enforcement officer provided inadequate aid, the reasonableness of which can be fairly disputed. Here, at least on the facts as we must take them, Deputy Smith provided no timely aid—he was confronted with a serious medical need and did nothing. Because we have made clear that such complete abdication in the face of a known serious need is unconstitutional, Deputy Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Mar. 6, 2023) (“‘The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying [her] claim was “clearly established” at the time of the incident in question.’ . . . The purpose of this rule is to ‘ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice that their conduct is unlawful.’ . . . Before Kingsley, there was an exception to this requirement for excessive-force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment based on the simple fact that the old malicious-and-sadistic standard was ‘so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.’ . . . After Kingsley, however, this exception no longer applies. Patel, 969 F.3d at 1183 (“[A]lthough the Johnson/Fennel exception continues to apply to Eighth Amendment claims, we must abandon it as applied in the Fourteenth Amendment context.”).”)

Waldron v. Spicher, 954 F.3d 1297, 1304-11 & n.7 (11th Cir. 2020) (“Because we are assuming that Spicher was acting within the scope of his authority, to prevail, Waldron will have to prove not only that her substantive due process rights were violated (the first prong), but also that the substantive due process rights thus violated were clearly established (the second prong) at the time Spicher acted. Because Waldron can prevail only if she successfully establishes this second prong, and because if she does establish the second prong she necessarily will have established the first prong, we address in this opinion only whether Waldron can prove that Spicher’s actions violated clearly established substantive due process rights. This court has identified three different ways that a plaintiff can prove that a particular constitutional right is clearly established. First, a plaintiff can show that a materially similar case has already been decided. . . . This category consists of binding precedent tied to particularized facts in a materially similar case. In determining whether a right is clearly established under this prong, only materially similar cases from the United States Supreme Court, this Circuit, and/or the highest court of the relevant state can clearly establish the law. . . . Second, a plaintiff can also show that a broader, clearly established principle should control the novel facts of a particular case. . . . Put another way, ‘in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness must be apparent.’ . . . Third, a plaintiff could show that the case ‘fits within the exception of conduct which so obviously violates [the] Constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’ . . . This third test is a narrow category encompassing those situations where ‘the official’s conduct lies so very obviously at the very core of what the [relevant constitutional provision] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding lack of case law.’ . . . As is apparent from the above discussion of Lewis, context is significant. And the above description of the facts in Hamilton reveals that the facts of the instant case are very similar. The general context is identical: both cases involve a law enforcement officer called to the scene of an attempted suicide (in the instant case) or an accidental drowning (in Hamilton). In both cases, bystanders were performing lifesaving CPR when the officer arrived. In both cases, the officer ordered everyone away from the victim, thus terminating ongoing CPR efforts. In both cases, the bystanders objected, but the officer persisted in his order such that CPR terminated. In neither case did the officer himself undertake CPR efforts. In both cases, no CPR or other lifesaving efforts were undertaken (for a few minutes until paramedics arrived in our case and for five minutes in Hamilton[.] . . . In both cases, the victim died. As explained in Lewis, the context in which the officer's action occurs is important in determining the level of culpability required for a plaintiff to state a viable substantive due process violation. Our Hamilton decision holds that, in the context there, a 'reckless rescue attempt, or interference with a bystander's rescue attempt,' . . . does not rise to the level of a clearly established violation of substantive due process. Deputy Spicher in our case argues that the context in this case is materially similar to that in Hamilton, and therefore the plaintiff in our case must prove more than reckless interference with the bystanders' rescue attempt to demonstrate a clearly established violation of the Constitution. Waldron responds—and the district court apparently agreed—that Hamilton analyzed the substantive due process challenge there employing the now-superseded 'special relationship' or 'special danger' analysis, and therefore that Hamilton could provide little or no guidance to Spicher as to what the Constitution required—i.e., little or no indication of the content of a clearly established violation of substantive due process. Contrary to Waldron's position, we believe that our decision in Hamilton is a relevant part of the 'legal landscape' that would have informed Spicher with respect to the contours of the constitutional right. Binding case law in this Circuit holds that the 'relevant legal landscape'—including even cases from outside our Circuit and unpublished cases—are informative in a court's determination of whether a particular constitutional right is clearly established. . . . Thus, merely because a later Supreme Court case changed the legal analysis, we cannot expect every reasonable officer in Spicher's shoes to disregard the fact that the materially similar facts in Hamilton resulted in a holding that it takes more than a 'reckless ... interference with a bystander's rescue attempt' to constitute a clearly established violation of substantive due process. Moreover, even if Spicher had been aware that the Supreme Court changed the appropriate analysis after our Hamilton decision, we do not believe that would undermine the significance of Hamilton for this case. The new shock-the-conscience analysis is clearly at least as favorable to defendant governmental officers—and unfavorable to plaintiffs in suits like Waldron's—as had been the previous analysis; and very probably the new standard is more so. Thus, there being fair notice to reasonable officers in Spicher's shoes under the old standard that it takes more than reckless interference with a rescue attempt to violate clearly established substantive due process rights, we believe that there is at least as much fair notice to Spicher under the new standard. For the foregoing reasons, we believe that in this Circuit, Spicher's actions cannot be deemed to violate clearly established substantive due process rights, unless the jury finds that Spicher acted with a level of culpability more than reckless interference with bystanders' attempted rescue efforts. . . . In other words, with Hamilton as part of the relevant legal landscape guiding Spicher, we cannot conclude that he had fair notice or fair warning that reckless or deliberately indifferent actions on his part in these circumstances would violate substantive due process. . . . No case in the Supreme Court, or in this Circuit, or in the Florida Supreme Court has held that recklessness or deliberate indifference is a sufficient level of culpability to state a claim of violation of substantive due process rights in a non-custodial context. . . . We believe that it is a matter of obvious clarity, derived from principles set out in Lewis, that Waldron would have stated a violation of clearly established substantive due process rights if the jury finds that he intended to cause harm to Ybarra, which harm in the context of the facts of this case obviously would take the form of death or serious brain injury. . . . If the circumstances we assume in this summary judgment posture are found by the jury, and if the jury also finds that Spicher intended to cause harm to Ybarra in the form of death or serious brain injury, then we hold that it is a matter of obvious clarity, derived from the above principles, that Waldron would have proved a violation of clearly established substantive due process rights. . . . [B]ecause the Court in Lewis concluded there that a purpose to cause harm would violate substantive due process, we believe it is a matter of obvious clarity that, if the jury finds that Spicher intended to cause harm to Ybarra in the form of death or serious brain injury, and finds the other circumstances we assume in this summary judgment posture, then we hold that Waldron would have proved a violation of clearly established substantive due process rights. . . . In this opinion, we have held that—in this Circuit where Hamilton is part of the relevant legal landscape—Waldron cannot demonstrate that Spicher violated clearly established substantive due process rights without proving more than that Spicher acted with deliberate indifference or recklessness. But we have also held that, if the jury should find that Spicher acted for the purpose of causing harm to Ybarra, Waldron would have proved a violation of clearly established substantive due process rights. Because the district court analyzed this case under the erroneous assumption that a deliberate indifference level of culpability was sufficient under these circumstances, the district court of course has not evaluated whether a reasonable jury could find such a purpose of causing harm on this summary judgment record, and/or whether the parties should be permitted to further develop the summary judgment record in light of the standard which we announce today. We believe it is appropriate to remand this case to the district court to permit it to reconsider this case under the standard we announce in this opinion. . . . In this case, because we address only the issue of whether Waldron can prove that her clearly established substantive due process rights were violated, we need not—and we do not—decide the precise level of culpability which is required to state a violation of substantive due process in these circumstances. We do not rule out the possibility that there might be a level of culpability higher than recklessness and deliberate indifference, but lower than an intent to cause harm, that the Supreme Court might ultimately decide is sufficient. However, there is no case from the Supreme Court, from this Circuit, or from the Supreme Court of Florida so holding. Therefore, we are confident that—in this Circuit in light of Hamilton, to demonstrate a clearly established violation—Waldron would have to prove under these circumstances that Spicher acted for the purpose of causing harm to Ybarra. . . . There being no binding precedent fixing the precise level of culpability required in a similar non-custodial case, we conclude that the only way Waldron can prove a clearly established violation of substantive due process would be to prove that Spicher’s actions were for the purpose of causing harm to Ybarra. This is especially so in light of the Supreme Court’s decision in Lewis.”)

that Washington cannot show a violation of a clearly established Fourth Amendment right, we assume arguendo that Rivera violated the constitutional right and turn to the issue of whether that right was clearly established. . . . [I]n both Kingsland and Tillman, the defendant officers consciously ignored information they already possessed that cast significant doubt on whether a defendant was guilty. In Kingsland, the officers took no investigative measures, even though the evidence they possessed did not give rise to the narrative they included in their report and used to arrest the plaintiff. In Tillman, the sheriff willfully disregarded a large incongruity between what he knew about the suspect and what his undercover officer had told him. In both cases, the defendants possessed information giving rise to an exculpatory inference, and did nothing to examine ‘easily discoverable facts’ that would confirm or contradict that inference. . . . But the complaint here does not allege that Rivera intentionally disregarded pertinent exculpatory information about Washington. Because she never received a phone call indicating that Washington had paid his fine, she already possessed evidence that he had not paid. And she possessed no information that Washington had in fact paid. We cannot say that a review of the case law would have indicated to her that the Constitution required further investigation to confirm that the evidence she possessed was accurate.”)

Corbitt v. Vickers, 929 F.3d 1304, 1314-23 (11th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (“Given our conclusion that SDC was already seized when Vickers fired at the dog, we proceed by exercising our discretion to address only the qualified immunity issue as it relates to Corbitt’s claim that Vickers’s second shot at the dog violated SDC’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Although we have held that SDC was already seized at the time of the shot, SDC is best described as an innocent bystander. And although the commands of the officers that SDC and the other children lie face down on the ground were actions directed at SDC and the other children, Corbitt does not claim that those actions violated SDC’s Fourth Amendment rights; rather, she claims that the action of Vickers firing at the dog and accidentally hitting SDC violated the Fourth Amendment. We hold that Vickers’s action of intentionally firing at the dog and unintentionally shooting SDC did not violate any clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . First, we note that Corbitt failed to present us with any materially similar case from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of Georgia that would have given Vickers fair warning that his particular conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. Corbitt admitted as much during the hearing on Vickers’s motion to dismiss before the district court. Moreover, neither the district court’s order nor our own research has revealed any such case. Thus, the only way Corbitt can successfully overcome Vickers’s assertion of qualified immunity is to show either that ‘a broader, clearly established principle should control the novel facts’ of this case as a matter of obvious clarity, or that Vickers’s conduct ‘so obviously violates [the] constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’ . . . As our cases suggest, it is very difficult to demonstrate either. . . . [W]e conclude that the district court erred in relying on the general proposition that it is clearly established that the use of excessive force is unconstitutional. The unique facts of this case bear this out. Not only was SDC not the intended target of the arrest operation, he also was not the intended target of Vickers’s gunshot. Both of these facts take this case outside ‘a run-of-the-mill Fourth Amendment violation.’ . . . In other words, we are not dealing with ‘an obvious case,’ and no principles emerge from our decisions that speak with ‘obvious clarity’ to the unique and unfortunate circumstances that befell SDC. Indeed, we are unable to identify any settled Fourth Amendment principle making it obviously clear that volitional conduct which is not intended to harm an already-seized person gives rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . No case capable of clearly establishing the law for this case holds that a temporarily seized person—as was SDC in this case—suffers a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights when an officer shoots at a dog—or any other object—and accidentally hits the person. In other words, Corbitt is not claiming that the officers’ command that SDC and the other children lie face down on the ground violated Fourth Amendment rights. Nor is she claiming that any other action of the officers directed toward SDC and the other children violated Fourth Amendment rights. Rather, she is claiming SDC’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated by Vickers’s shot—an action targeting the dog, not SDC. Corbitt’s Fourth Amendment claim is based on a governmental action not directed toward SDC and which only accidentally harmed SDC. . . . In sum, not only is there no materially similar binding case that clearly establishes a Fourth Amendment violation; dicta from the Supreme Court and nonbinding case law indicates that reasonable jurists have found no Fourth Amendment violation in similar circumstances. . . . We conclude that the accidental shooting, as occurred here, does not constitute a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation as a matter of obvious clarity. . . . Thus, Corbitt has failed to demonstrate a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation, either by the first method (a materially similar, binding case), or the second method (the violation is a matter of obvious clarity from such a binding case). We turn therefore to the third method (the challenged conduct so obviously violates the Fourth Amendment that prior case law is unnecessary). This is not a case that so obviously violates the Fourth Amendment that prior case law is unnecessary to hold Vickers individually liable for his conduct. To find otherwise would require us to conclude that no reasonable officer would have fired his gun at the dog under the circumstances. This we are unable to do. With the benefit of hindsight, we do not doubt Vickers could have acted more carefully; the firing of a deadly weapon at a dog located close enough to a prone child that the child is struck by a trained officer’s errant shot hardly qualifies as conduct we wish to see repeated. However, even the underlying constitutional issue itself (which of course is easier for a plaintiff to prove than proving that particular circumstances violate clearly established constitutional law) is evaluated pursuant to a ‘calculus ... [that] must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’ . . . In the instant qualified immunity context, we are cognizant that several cases (some of which are mentioned above) have considered similar accidental shootings of bystanders, and that many, if not most, of the jurists involved have concluded that there was no clearly established Fourth Amendment violation. Indeed, we are aware of no case and no jurist indicating that such an accidental shooting (i.e., one resulting from volitional conduct indisputably intended to stop someone or something other than the plaintiff) so obviously violates the Fourth Amendment that prior case law is unnecessary to hold that the officer violated clearly established law. . . . Moreover, the facts alleged here involve ‘accidental effects’ of conduct directed toward something other than the plaintiff, not the kind of ‘misuse of power’ which Brower suggests is the focus of a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . We conclude that the circumstances alleged in this case do not so obviously violate the Fourth Amendment such that it would be apparent to every reasonable officer that his actions were in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The relevant question is not whether a reasonable officer would have refrained from shooting the dog. Instead, the relevant question is whether every reasonable officer would have inevitably refused to do so in light of the Fourth Amendment standards established by Graham and our own case law. Our answer to that relevant question is in the negative. Accordingly, Vickers’s qualified immunity defense must prevail in the absence of a materially similar case or a governing legal principle or binding case that applies with obvious clarity to the facts of this case. . . . Because we find no violation of a clearly established right, we need not reach the other qualified immunity question of whether a constitutional violation occurred in the first place. This opinion expressly takes no position as to that question.”)

Corbitt v. Vickers, 929 F.3d 1304, 1323-26 (11th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (Wilson, J., dissenting) (“Because no competent officer would fire his weapon in the direction of a nonthreatening pet while that pet was surrounded by children, qualified immunity should not protect Officer Vickers. Therefore, I dissent. . . . This conduct—discharging a lethal weapon at a nonthreatening pet that was surrounded by children. . . is plainly unreasonable. The nonthreatening nature of the pet is crucial to this conclusion. . . We have consistently denied qualified immunity when the defendant-officer exhibited excessive force in the face of no apparent threat. . . . It is also relevant that Officer Vickers was a mere foot and a half from S.D.C. and was only a few feet from several other children. Nonetheless, facing no apparent threat, Officer Vickers chose to fire his lethal weapon in the direction of these children. . . No reasonable officer would engage in such recklessness and no reasonable officer would think such recklessness was lawful. Therefore, I agree with the district court that Officer Vickers should not be entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Echols v. Lawton, 913 F.3d 1313, 1319-24 (11th Cir. 2019) (“We agree with the district court that Lawton enjoys qualified immunity from Echols’s complaint, but we do so for a different reason. In contrast with the district court, we conclude that Echols’s complaint states a valid claim that Lawton violated a right protected by the First Amendment. But even so, that right was not clearly established when Lawton allegedly violated it. . . . Echols’s complaint alleges facts that would constitute libel per se. It alleges that Lawton falsely stated in writing that Echols remained under indictment for kidnapping and rape. . . . That alleged statement was false because a Georgia court had dismissed the indictment against Echols four years earlier. By falsely stating that Echols ‘ha[d] a criminal case pending against him,’ Lawton allegedly committed libel per se. . . .

Because the complaint alleges that Lawton knew that Echols no longer remained under indictment for kidnapping and rape, Lawton’s alleged defamatory statement was made with actual malice. The First Amendment affords no protection to Lawton’s alleged libel of Echols, so no ‘balance must be struck’ here between the First Amendment rights of a plaintiff alleging retaliation for his speech and an official who allegedly retaliated through his own speech. . . We must instead determine only whether Lawton’s alleged libel violated Echols’s rights under the First Amendment. We acknowledge that some of our sister circuits have held that defamation is not actionable as retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, but their decisions do not persuade us. These circuits have held that an official’s defamatory speech by itself cannot constitute retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. . . The decisions of both the Fourth and the Fifth Circuits provide little explanation for their reasoning, but they appear to rest on a misreading of Paul v. Davis[.]. . .[I]n Paul, the Supreme Court addressed a distinct issue; it held that defamation standing alone cannot deprive a plaintiff of his right to due process. . . And whether defamation may constitute a violation of procedural due process does not dictate whether it can constitute retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. . . . We reject the notion that the First Amendment protects an official’s defamatory speech from a claim of retaliation. . . We agree with other circuits that sometimes ‘defamation inflicts sufficient harm on its victim to count as retaliation.’ . . To decide whether defamation in a particular case is retaliatory, the Sixth and Eighth Circuits apply the same test of ordinary firmness as they would for any other claim of retaliation. . . We agree with this approach and decline to create special rules for claims of retaliation based on an official’s defamation. . . . If a district attorney defamed a former prisoner for seeking legislative compensation for his wrongful convictions and derailed that legislative effort, a person of ordinary firmness would likely be deterred from speaking again on that matter lest the prosecutor continue to tarnish his reputation or, worse, initiate a wrongful prosecution. So Echols’s complaint states a claim of retaliation under the First Amendment. . . . [A] clearly established violation of state law cannot put an official on notice that his conduct would also violate the Constitution because ‘section 1983 protects only against violations of federally protected rights.’. . . Although Lawton clearly would have had fair notice that his alleged writing constituted libel per se under state tort law, he would not have understood that his alleged libel would have violated the First Amendment. No controlling precedent put Lawton’s alleged violation beyond debate.”)

Echols v. Lawton, 913 F.3d 1313, 1327 (11th Cir. 2019) (Gilman, J., concurring) (“I fully concur in the lead opinion’s holding that Echols’s complaint states a valid claim of retaliation under the First Amendment. Reluctantly, I also agree that Lawton is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because the then-existing law in the Eleventh Circuit did not clearly establish that Lawton’s egregious conduct violated Echols’s constitutional rights. Several pertinent cases from other circuits hold that defamatory speech by a public official does not constitute First Amendment retaliation ‘in the absence of a threat, coercion, or intimidation,’ . . . and none of these actions were attributed to Lawton in Echols’s complaint. And although authority exists to the contrary, . . . the Eleventh Circuit has not previously opined one way or the other on this issue. This lack of consensus supports the proposition that Lawton’s defamatory statement that Echols was still under indictment for kidnapping and rape, as vindictive and unjustified as that statement appears to be, was not a clearly established violation of Echols’s First Amendment rights. . . . My only comfort with this result is knowing that if another official in this circuit henceforth engages in conduct similar to Lawton’s, he or she will not be entitled to hide behind the doctrine of qualified immunity.”)

Montanez v. Carvajal, 889 F.3d 1202, 1208-09, 1211-12 & n.7 (11th Cir. 2018) (“[W]e hold that if police have probable cause to suspect a residential burglary—whether they believe the crime is currently afoot or has recently concluded—they may, without further justification, conduct a brief warrantless search of the home to look for suspects and potential victims. . . . Accordingly, whether the first two entries into Montanez's residence were constitutionally permissible turns on whether the officers had probable cause to suspect a burglary. If they did, then they could enter—and it seems clear to us that they did. . . .As already explained in detail, the officers' first two entries—during which they spotted the marijuana and paraphernalia—were justified under the exigent-circumstances doctrine. Once those entries occurred, Montanez lost any reasonable expectation of privacy in the areas already searched. The officers could thereafter enter and re-enter the residence to observe the contraband without separately violating the Fourth Amendment. . . .Because we conclude that the officers' entries didn't violate the Fourth Amendment, it goes without saying that no analogous precedent (or even obviously applicable general legal principle) 'clearly established' that their entries were unlawful. And indeed, the district court's order denying the officers qualified immunity never suggests otherwise. The court went to great lengths to distinguish cases authorizing warrantless entries in circumstances like those here, but it never pointed to (nor have we found) any law or precedent that even remotely clearly established a contrary rule. Accordingly, even if a case could be made that the officers' entries here violated the Constitution—and for reasons explained, we're confident that they didn't—the officers would still be entitled to summary judgment under the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard.”)

Mikko v. City of Atlanta, 857 F.3d 1136, 1143, 1146-48 (11th Cir. 2017) (“The Supreme Court has told us that a district attorney's decision to hire or fire assistant district attorneys, although often crucial to the efficient operation of the office, is not protected by absolute immunity. . . .It would be passing strange to hold that while a prosecutor is not immune from liability for firing his own employees, he is immune for getting others to fire their employees. . . . The question is: In June of 2013, was it clearly established law in this circuit that it violates the First Amendment for prosecutors to seek to have a government employer fire an employee because he had furnished an expert opinion to, and planned to testify as an expert witness for, the defense in a criminal case in another state? Mikko contends that our predecessor Court's decision in Rainey answers that question. See Rainey v. Jackson State Coll., 481 F.2d 347 (5th Cir. 1973). . . . The Rainey decision is sufficiently distinguishable from this case that it did not provide the prosecutors with 'fair warning' that their actions violated Mikko's First Amendment rights. For one thing, Rainey addressed the obligations that a public employer owes to its own employee. . . .It did not address the duties that a governmental official or entity owes to an employee of another governmental entity. In this case, the two prosecutor defendants are not Mikko's employers or his supervisors, nor did they work in the police department with him. Not only that, but in Rainey the plaintiff had testified before he was hired by the defendant college that fired him. . . .He was terminated for pre-employment conduct. Here, Mikko submitted his expert report and planned to testify while he was serving as an employee of the Atlanta Police Department, which is the entity that fired him. We do not mean to say that Mikko's report or his intended testimony was not protected by the First Amendment, which is an issue we need not decide. What we do mean to say is that the circumstances of the Rainey case and this one are different enough that Rainey did not put the constitutional issue in this case 'beyond debate.' . . . Even if those two distinctions did not exist, we would still know that neither the 1973 Rainey decision nor any other decision clearly established at the time the prosecutors acted in June 2013 that their actions violated Mikko's First Amendment rights. We would know that because of the Supreme Court’s 2014 decision in the Lane case, which arose in our circuit. See Lane v. Franks, 573 U.S. ___, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2378 (2014). In that case the Supreme Court held that a public employer did violate an employee’s First Amendment rights by firing him because of his truthful sworn testimony that was compelled by subpoena and occurred outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities. . . More importantly for present purposes, however, the Lane Court also held that at the time the plaintiff in that case was fired in 2009 the law of our circuit did not clearly establish that it was a First Amendment violation to fire him. . . . That means the Rainey decision, which our predecessor Court decided in 1973, did not clearly establish that it violates the First Amendment for a government employer to fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave, under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities. . . If it had, the Supreme Court would have decided the qualified immunity issue in Lane differently. It is true that the prosecutors’ conduct in this case occurred in June 2013, which was four-and-a-half years after the January 2009 conduct involved in the Supreme Court’s Lane decision. But Mikko has not cited, nor have we found, any binding decision issued between January 2009 and June 2013 that clearly establishes that what the prosecutors did in this case violated the First Amendment. . . . In order for the law to be clearly established to the point that qualified immunity does not apply, the unlawfulness of the defendant’s actions must be apparent in light of pre-existing law. . . No pre-existing law compelled that conclusion for the prosecutors under the circumstances of this case, and the Supreme Court’s Lane decision shows that the law of this circuit was not clearly established enough to do so. As a result, the prosecutors are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jones v. Fransen, 857 F.3d 843, 851-55 (11th Cir. 2017) (“Here, we address the ‘clearly established’ inquiry first. Because we conclude that Jones’s right was not clearly established in the specific context of the facts in this case, we do not reach the question of whether Defendants violated Jones’s constitutional rights. When we consider whether the law clearly established the relevant conduct as a constitutional violation at the time that Defendant Officers engaged in the challenged acts, we look for ‘fair warning’ to officers that the conduct at issue violated a constitutional right. . . ‘Fair warning’ comes in the form of binding caselaw from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state (Georgia, here) that ‘make[s] it obvious to all reasonable government actors, in the defendant’s place, that what he is doing violates a federal law.’. . A plaintiff may demonstrate in any one of three ways that a defendant had “fair warning” that the right he violated was clearly established. . . . In his complaint, Jones asserts that Defendant Officers violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . The facts in Jones’s case land somewhere between those involved in Priester and those in Crenshaw. The alleged crime arguably was more serious than Priester’s yet less so than Crenshaw’s. Jones purportedly stole a television from his former girlfriend’s residence. And while domestic-related crimes certainly have the potential to be extremely serious and dangerous, nothing about this particular incident indicated that it fell into that category. At the time Jones’s ex-girlfriend reported the theft, Jones was already out of the apartment, and his ex-girlfriend gave no indication that he had been violent or armed. On the other hand, when Jones fled police, unlike Priester, he did not ultimately overtly surrender himself. Instead, he led police into physically challenging terrain with brush and boulders, similar to the place where Crenshaw fled, and he did not respond in any way to Fransen's K-9 warnings. . . . Like the Crenshaw officers, a reasonable officer in one of Defendants' places could have been concerned, at the time Draco was released, about entering the heavy brush to apprehend Jones and being met by a potential ambush. So Jones's case is not directly on all fours with either Priester or Crenshaw. As a result, neither case alone could have provided Defendant Officers with the type of 'fair notice' necessary to breach qualified immunity. And considering the cases together helps no more since Priester and Crenshaw reached opposite conclusions concerning whether an excessive-force violation occurred. We therefore turn to the second method for proving that the right in this case was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The fact that the Fourth Amendment protects against the use of excessive force during an arrest does not provide an officer with any guidance as to what constitutes an excessive use of force. So this general principle is not the type of 'broader, clearly established principle [that] should control the novel facts [of the] situation' here. . . . Finally, Jones did not argue—and particularly in light of Priester and Crenshaw, we cannot find—that Defendants' actions in this case 'lie [] so obviously at the very core of what the [Fourth Amendment] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.' For these reasons, we must conclude that Jones's constitutional right was not clearly established when Defendant Officers engaged in the challenged behavior. As a result, Defendant Officers are entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court's ruling to the contrary must be reversed.”)

Militello v. Sheriff of Broward Sheriff's Office, 684 F. App'x 809, 812 n.7, 815 (11th Cir. 2017) (“Consideration of the first prong of qualified immunity is unwarranted here as this case presents at least two of the circumstances identified in Pearson. First, Militello's failure-to-intervene claim presents a fact-bound Fourth Amendment issue for which a particularized analysis by our court would provide little precedential value. . . . Second, we find that the second prong of qualified immunity presents a significantly easier question than the first prong. . . . We therefore do not address whether Morel and Polk violated Militello's Fourth Amendment rights by failing to intervene. . . . In sum, nothing in our prior precedent put Morel and Polk on notice that, under these circumstances, they were required to take any particular action that they failed to take after hearing Daly-England's statement. Nor did our precedent inform Morel and Polk precisely of what reasonable actions they should have taken to insulate themselves from liability under these facts. Because all of these factors distinguish this case from those where officers have been found liable for failing to intervene when excessive force was used, we hold that Deputies Morel and Polk did not violate clearly established law. Therefore, they are entitled to qualified immunity. To conclude, we emphasize that we have only addressed whether Deputies Morel and Polk violated clearly established law. We need not (and do not) express any opinion as to whether Deputies Morel and Polk violated Militello's Fourth Amendment rights under the facts presented to the district court.”)

Dukes v. Deaton, 852 F.3d 1035, 1042-44 (11th Cir. 2017) (“The facts construed in the light most favorable to Dukes establish that Deaton used excessive force. Deaton's conduct posed a significant risk of harm. He threw a flashbang that can generate heat in excess of 2,000 degrees

Celsius into a dark room in which the occupants were asleep. He also failed to inspect the room, as he was trained to do, to determine whether bystanders, such as Dukes, occupied the room or if other hazards existed. And there existed minimal need for Deaton's use of force. True, the warrant stated that an informant advised law enforcement that Ward kept a handgun on his person, and the applying officer attested that drug dealers are known to be violent. Perhaps this record could have supported the use of the two flashbangs contemplated by the operational plan to disorient the occupants of the apartment. We need not decide that question. Even if the record supports the use of the first two flashbangs, these earlier flashbangs made Deaton's deployment gratuitous. The break and rake and the detonation of the flashbang on the exterior wall diverted the attention of Ward and Dukes before Deaton deployed his flashbang. There is no evidence that Deaton was aware that Ward had drawn his gun or that Dukes or Ward resisted the officers. And the suspected crime that prompted the search was possession and sale of marijuana. Deaton deployed a dangerous device into a dark room for a de minimis return. The decisions of our sister circuits support our conclusion that Deaton's conduct was unconstitutional. Our sister circuits have held that an officer's failure to perform a visual inspection before throwing a flashbang into an area weighs against reasonableness. Estate of Escobedo v. Bender, 600 F.3d 770, 785 (7th Cir. 2010); Boyd v. Benton Cty., 374 F.3d 773, 779 (9th Cir. 2004). And they have held that the use of a flashbang in an area occupied by bystanders, like Dukes, similarly weighs against reasonableness. Bender, 600 F.3d at 786; Boyd, 374 F.3d at 779; cf. Krause v. Jones, 765 F.3d 675, 679 (6th Cir. 2014); Molina ex rel. Molina v. Cooper, 325 F.3d 963, 973 (7th Cir. 2003). The totality of the circumstances establishes that Deaton violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because no precedent of the Supreme Court, our Circuit, or the Supreme Court of Georgia has addressed the constitutionality of flashbangs, Dukes must establish that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity' to Deaton's conduct. . . . To satisfy this narrow exception, official conduct must be so egregious that 'every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law.' . . . When this exception for obvious clarity is 'properly applied, it protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' . . . We conclude that it was not clearly established that Deaton's conduct was unconstitutional when he acted. Although we recognize that the doctrine of excessive force makes some official conduct off limits even in 'novel factual circumstances,' . . . Deaton's conduct was not so lacking in justification that every reasonable officer would know that what he did constituted excessive force. The operational plan contemplated the use of flashbangs to disorient the residents, and there is no evidence Deaton intended to use his flashbang for any other purpose. And the application in support of the search warrant stated that 'drug dealers,' such as Ward, 'commonly utilize weapons, dogs, and barricades to hinder law enforcement in the execution of their duties.' The application also stated that an informant had advised law enforcement that Ward carried a handgun 'on his person.' To be sure, Deaton should have followed his training and checked the bedroom before he threw. But a reasonable officer could have found it 'difficult ... to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force,' would apply. . . . Dukes argues that 'no decisional law is necessary to inform a reasonable officer that he should not blindly throw a [flashbang] grenade into the bedroom of a small apartment, at 5:30 a.m., ... occupied[] by people who ... were doing nothing other than sleeping,’ but this portrait ignores facts stated in the warrant and the purpose of a flashbang. Ward carried a weapon. The warrant stated that drug trafficking occurred in his apartment. A flashbang is meant to disorient and avoid physical harm. And the operational plan permitted the officers to use a flashbang if needed. In the absence of binding caselaw to the contrary, Deaton, though badly mistaken, could have reasonably believed, based on the facts known to the officers on the morning of the search, that throwing a flashbang into Ward’s bedroom was not excessive force. Our conclusion that Deaton violated the Fourth Amendment, but that the contours of the right were not clearly established, also finds support in the decisions of our sister circuits. In Boyd, for example, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the detonation of a flashbang in a room with up to eight bystanders without first looking was unconstitutional, but that the right was not clearly established. . . In Bing ex rel. Bing v. City of Whitehall, the Sixth Circuit also decided that the use of a second flashbang violated the Fourth Amendment, but that the violation was not obvious. . . Consistent with these decisions, we affirm the ruling that Deaton is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hart v. Logan, 664 F. App’x 857, 861-62 (11th Cir. 2016) (“Because we may consider the prongs of the qualified immunity test in either order, we proceed directly to examining the qualified immunity test’s second prong. . . Plaintiff cites to several cases from this Circuit that she contends clearly establish that Defendant’s actions were unconstitutional. In each case, this Court held the use of deadly force in question was unreasonable. However, we conclude that each case is factually distinguishable because Defendant in this case faced a more dangerous situation than the officers in the cited cases. This is so even after construing the factual disputes in favor of Plaintiff, as required at the summary judgment stage. . . .Unlike in McKinney or Mercado, Defendant did not have a ten to twenty minute period of time to talk with Mr. Hart and calmly assess how dangerous he was. Instead Defendant faced a tense and rapidly-escalating situation at the time of the shooting, with Mr. Hart standing and then advancing towards Defendant, all the while ignoring Defendant’s repeated commands to stop and show his hands. Mr. Hart’s conduct rendered him a much more potentially dangerous threat to Defendant than were the seated and stationary victims in McKinney and Mercado. In addition, given Mr. Hart’s repeated demands that Defendant give him the gun, coupled with his approach toward Defendant, a concern by Defendant that Mr. Hart was trying to arm himself, by either getting his own gun back or taking Defendant’s gun, was not an unreasonable fear. . . .In sum, Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate that under the above circumstances, Defendant had fair notice that the use of deadly force would be deemed unconstitutional.”)

Fish v. Brown, 838 F.3d 1153, 1164-65 (11th Cir. 2016) (“[L]ike the district court, we need not determine whether defendants violated Fish’s Fourth Amendment rights by stepping into his sunroom without his explicit consent, because we find that they are entitled to qualified immunity on any such claim. . . Defendants followed Riesco, whom they knew was familiar with Fish’s home. She parked her automobile in the rear of the house, next to Fish’s SUV. No vehicles were parked in front of the house. Riesco walked confidently from her auto to and through the sunroom door without knocking, or checking to see if it was locked (as though she expected it to be unlocked). She proceeded to walk straight through the sunroom to the interior wood door and knocked. Reisco's authoritative demeanor caused Deputies Harrison and Loucks to conclude that was the customary route taken by guests entering the house, and they followed her lead. . . Those facts lead to a finding of qualified immunity for two reasons. First, the Deputies could reasonably have relied upon a variation of the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine, 'which permits a warrantless entry by police officers into a home when consent to enter has already been granted to an undercover officer or informant who has observed contraband in plain view.' Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 229 (2009). At the time of the seizure that led to the alleged Fourth Amendment violation in Pearson, only courts from a few federal Circuits (not including the Circuit in which the case arose) had considered the doctrine, but all courts that had considered it had adopted it. . . In the absence of law from their own Circuit, the officers who conducted the seizure were entitled to rely upon cases from other Circuits that allowed the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine; and, accordingly, they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . This court does not appear to have addressed the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine after the Supreme Court's 2009 decision in Pearson. Therefore, the doctrine is no more settled today than it was in 2009. Thus, if the Deputies were entitled to rely upon the doctrine in Pearson, they also were entitled to rely upon it here. Second, the Deputies reasonably could have believed that the sunroom was 'impliedly open to use by the public' for the purpose of gaining access to the principal, interior areas of the house. . . . In summary, the law was not sufficiently clearly established at the time of the alleged violation to give Harrison and Loucks fair warning that their entry into Fish's sunroom under the circumstances of this case would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. See Carroll v. Carman, — U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 348, 349 (2014) (holding that police officers should have been entitled to qualified immunity when they entered onto a ground-level deck on the back of a home to knock on a sliding-glass door, believing the door to be a "customary entryway").")

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1039-40, 1044, 1046-48 (11th Cir. 2015) (“[W]e hold today that, in the absence of exigent circumstances, the government may not conduct the equivalent of a Terry stop inside a person's home. We further hold that a person does not consent to entry into his home by an officer outside simply by following an officer's instructions to turn around and be handcuffed, while the person remains inside his home. But because the law on these points was not clearly established in this Circuit before our decision today, we affirm the district court's entry of summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds to Pederson. . . . Like the officer in McClish, Pederson did not have a warrant, and he lacked probable cause, exigent circumstances, and consent. He nonetheless breached Moore's home's threshold for the purpose of arresting Moore when he handcuffed Moore, who was standing inside his apartment's doorway at the time. As a result, Pederson violated Moore's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . . In the absence of probable cause and without a warrant, Pederson could not have lawfully entered Moore's premises for the purpose of arresting him. Because Pederson reached into Moore's home to arrest him, anyway, Pederson violated Moore's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. . . . Having determined that Pederson violated Moore's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure, we consider whether, as of November 15, 2008, when Pederson arrested Moore, the parameters of that right as it arose in this case were clearly established. We find that they were not. . . . Moore does not point to a particular Supreme Court, valid Eleventh Circuit, or Florida Supreme Court case that he contends clearly established that Terry-like stops may not be conducted in the home. Instead, he asserts that it was clearly established that a Terry stop could not occur inside the home because all cases approving of Terry stops involve temporary detentions in public places, not in homes. In further support of his argument, Moore points to a vacated Eleventh Circuit case and cases outside this Circuit where courts have opined that a Terry stop cannot occur in the home. We disagree that Moore has demonstrated that the law was clearly established in this case as of November 15, 2008, that an officer may not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home in the absence of exigent circumstances. First, the mere dearth of binding caselaw holding that a particular activity is constitutional cannot, in and of itself, clearly establish that that activity is unconstitutional or otherwise impermissible. Indeed, that Moore discovered no valid, binding caselaw that holds that a Terry-like stop can be conducted in a home does not somehow clearly establish the principle that a Terry-like stop cannot be executed in a home. Nor does Moore find the necessary support in the cases he cites. Moore relies on a vacated Eleventh Circuit case, two Ninth Circuit cases that were issued after November 15, 2008, and a Tenth Circuit case that was issued in May 2008. To state the obvious, United States v. Tobin, 890 F.2d 319, 327 (11th Cir.1989), vacated, 902 F.2d 821 (11th Cir.1990), the Eleventh Circuit case on which Moore relies, was vacated. That means it has no legal force, so it could not have clearly established the law. While Moore acknowledges as much, he suggests that the Eleventh Circuit's subsequent en banc opinion in Tobin, 923 F.2d 1506, 1511 (11th Cir.1991) (en banc) ("Tobin II"), clearly established that an in-home Terry-like stop violates the Fourth Amendment when it stated that 'reasonable suspicion cannot justify the warrantless search of a house.' Not only does the quotation that Moore cites address warrantless searches, not Terry-like stops, but review of the entire quotation—'Reasonable suspicion cannot justify the warrantless search of a house, but it can justify the agents' approaching the house to question the occupants,' 923 F.2d at 1511 (emphasis added) (citation omitted)—does not 'dictate[]', that is, truly compel[], the conclusion for all reasonable, similarly situated public officials that what Defendant was doing violated Plaintiff[s] federal rights in the circumstances.' . . . In fact, a panel of this Court, relying on the same quotation about 'warrantless search[es]' in Tobin II on which Moore hangs his hat, said only that '[w]e are skeptical that "reasonable suspicion" is the correct standard for justifying the officers' entry' into the home. . . . If, as recently as last year, a panel of this Court was, at worst, 'skeptical' that Terry-like stops could occur in the home, we cannot say that the law on that point was 'clearly established' for officers six-and-one-half years ago. For this reason, Moore's argument must fail, regardless of the caselaw from other jurisdictions. And we cannot conclude that in November 2008 the law was clearly established in this Circuit that a Terry-like stop cannot be conducted in the home, in the absence of exigent circumstances. As a result, the district court correctly found that Pederson was protected by qualified immunity with respect to the initial Terry-like stop. . . . [footnotes omitted])

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1048-55 (11th Cir. 2015) ("It is true that as of November 15, 2008, when the incident in this case occurred, the law was clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not conduct a warrantless arrest without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent. . . . And here, Pederson had no warrant, and he similarly lacked exigent circumstances and consent. But, as discussed above, none of the cases that stand for the principle that a warrantless arrest may not be conducted in the home without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent involved a Terry stop. When an officer lawfully conducts a Terry stop, Fla. Stat. § 843.02 authorizes the officer to arrest a person who refuses to provide identification in response to requests. . . Neither exigent circumstances nor probable cause is necessary. So Pederson suggests that, had he been correct in thinking that he could execute a valid Terry stop in the home, he would not have needed either exigent circumstances or consent to effect the arrest of Moore, even though he had to reach into Moore's home. . . . We need not determine whether Pederson's theory on this particular issue is correct because, in any case, we cannot find that, at the time of the events in this matter, the law was clearly established with respect to the bounds of consent to enter the home for the purpose of effecting an arrest. We recognize, of course, the clearly established general proposition that consent is not freely and voluntarily given when a person merely acquiesces to a claim of lawful authority. . . But '[o]bvious clarity cases' are 'rare.' . To rely on that "narrow exception," we must find that the officer's acts were 'so egregious that preexisting, fact-specific precedent was not necessary to give clear warning to every reasonable ... officer that what the defendant officer was doing must be "unreasonable" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.' . Here, we cannot do that. . . .[U]nder McClish, a reasonable officer would not be on clear notice before today that Moore's actions did not constitute the type of 'surrender' that can qualify as consent for the purpose of entering a home to effect an arrest. . . . [B]efore today, a reasonable officer could have understood Moore's actions in turning around and presenting his hands in response to the officer's instructions as surrender, and consequently, as consent under McClish. . . . To be clear, for the reasons we have already described, we strongly reject any suggestion that a person 'surrenders' and therefore 'consents' to arrest in his home simply because he recognizes the officer's authority or 'submit[s] to' or 'acquiesce[s]' in the arresting officer's commands or because he does not close the door of his home in response to an officer's announcement that he is under arrest. Today we clearly establish as the law of this Circuit that merely following an officer's commands—without any separate affirmative act or speech demonstrating voluntary and free consent—does not constitute 'surrender' and therefore consent to an officer's entry into the home to effect the arrest. Nor does failure to close the door. But we have 'emphasized that fair and clear notice to government officials is the cornerstone of qualified immunity.' . . And in light of McClish and Berkowitz, we cannot say that, as of November 15, 2008, Pederson had 'fair and clear notice' that a person does not 'surrender' and therefore consent to entry of his home for purposes of effecting an arrest, by 'acquiesc[ing]' in or 'submit[ting] to' the arresting officer's announcement that he is under arrest and by turning around and presenting hands for cuffing in response to instructions to do just that (and not closing the door of his home instead). As a result, qualified immunity shields Pederson from liability for his wrongful entry into Moore's home to arrest him. . . .Because the law was not clearly established until today that Pederson lacked probable cause to arrest Moore since he could not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home absent exigent circumstances, and further, because the law was not clearly established until today that Moore's actions in acquiescing to Pederson's instructions did not amount to consent to enter the home, the district court properly granted Pederson qualified immunity. . . .Home may be where the heart is, . . . but it cannot be where the government is—at least for purposes of conducting a Terry-like stop, in the absence of exigent circumstances. Today we clearly establish this as the law in this Circuit. But since the law was not clearly established on this point when Pederson engaged in the Terry-like stop of Moore while Moore was in his home, the district court did not err when it granted qualified immunity to Pederson on this issue. The district court likewise did not err in granting qualified immunity to Pederson regarding his arrest of Moore while Moore was in his home. The law was not clearly established at the time of the arrest that Moore's compliance with Pederson's demands that he turn around and present his hands for cuffing did not constitute consent.")

Denton v. Stokes, 620 F. App'x 712, 714 (11th Cir. 2015) ("At the time that Stokes seized, photocopied, and disclosed Denton's nonlegal correspondence, it was not clearly established that doing so violated the Fourth Amendment. We had held that both the Sixth Amendment and the 'right of access to the courts' limit the reading of correspondence from inmates with their attorneys. . . We had also held that the First Amendment limits efforts to control of the volume of nonlegal, 'general correspondence' that inmates send and receive. . . [W]e had not held (and still have not held) that the Fourth Amendment bars the reading, photocopying, and disclosing of inmates' nonlegal correspondence as part of an ongoing investigation. There are some indications that it may not. . . . In any event, we need not decide the merits of Denton's Fourth Amendment claim to resolve this appeal, so we express no view on it. It is enough that no precedent of the Supreme Court or this Court would have put Stokes on notice that the Fourth Amendment prohibited him from seizing Denton's nonlegal correspondence while he was incarcerated, photocopying it, and showing those copies to others as part of an ongoing investigation. . . That being the case, Stokes is entitled to qualified immunity from Denton's claim.")

Merricks v. Adkisson, 785 F.3d 553, 559-60, 563 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The salient question for this case, therefore, is whether the state of the law on August 11, 2008 gave Adkisson fair warning that his treatment of Merricks was unconstitutional. . . . Note that in ruling on this case, we will not decide if Adkisson's actions against Merricks amount to a constitutional violation for excessive force against her. Rather, the Court will only consider the clearly established law question as authorized by Pearson v. Callahan [B]ased on the facts in this case, it was reasonable for Adkisson to believe that he could stop Merricks and search her car and her person for contraband. It was also reasonable for him to believe that he could turn off the car, take the keys, and get her out of the car to search it. . . . And although we are not ruling on the reasonableness of the force he used to get her out of the car, Adkisson was in a tense and uncertain situation, faced with a suspect who refused to cooperate and who struggled to keep him from searching her car. . . . There is substantial case authority in the Supreme Court and this Circuit clearly establishing that harming a suspect after that suspect is compliant, cooperative, under control, or otherwise subdued is gratuitous and, therefore, constitutionally excessive. The three cases Merricks cites establish nothing more than that. On the other hand, there is little, if any, authority dealing with the force an officer can use when he has the undisputed right to search a vehicle, and the driver obstructs the search. For that reason, in analyzing excessive force cases, it is important to understand not only what force was applied but when it was applied. If gratuitous force was applied after the suspect was subdued or otherwise cooperating, qualified immunity will likely not apply, unless the force is de minimis. . . If, on the other hand, the force was applied when the officer was trying to take control of the suspect or the situation confronting him, the officer can make a much better claim to the qualified immunity defense. Merricks’s claim falls into the latter category. Consequently, she has failed to satisfy her burden of showing the clearly established nature of the alleged constitutional violation.”)

Mobley v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff Dep’t, 783 F.3d 1347, 1356 & n.10 (11th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) (“Our decisions demonstrate that the point at which a suspect is handcuffed and ‘pose [s] no risk of danger to the officer’ often is the pivotal point for excessive-force claims. We have held a number of times that severe force applied after the suspect is safely in custody is excessive. . . But force applied while the suspect has not given up and stopped resisting and may still pose a danger to the arresting officers, even when that force is severe, is not necessarily excessive. . . Mobley has not pointed to any circumstances before he quit resisting and was handcuffed that show the force applied against him was objectively unreasonable. Deputies Yoder, Johnson, and Elliott therefore are entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity because under the circumstances their conduct did not violate Mobley’s constitutional rights. . . .Because we hold that the officers did not violate Mobley’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force during his arrest, we need not decide whether they would be entitled to qualified immunity even if they had done so.”)

Jay v. Hendershott, 579 F. App’x 948, 950-54 (11th Cir. 2014) (“Here, because we conclude that Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim is one ‘in which it is plain that a constitutional right [was] not clearly established,’ . . . we address only the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis and do not reach the issue of whether the complaint sufficiently alleges a constitutional violation. . . .[W]e agree with the district court that no case from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court is ‘on all fours’ with the facts alleged in this case. Nor have Plaintiffs identified—and we could not find—any case materially similar to this one. In this Circuit, at one end of the spectrum, we have previously held that the use of a police canine to subdue a suspect is objectively reasonable where the suspect is wanted for the commission of a serious crime, actively flees from police, resists arrest, and is reasonably believed to be armed and dangerous. . . By contrast, at the other end, we have held that such force, when employed against an individual who presents no safety risk and is fully compliant with officers’ commands, is excessive under the Fourth Amendment. . . Here, however, we are faced with an individual who, though neither outwardly aggressive nor hostile, failed to comply with any instructions from law enforcement, was still actively evading police when the canine was released, and was approaching both an open garage with unknown items inside and a house with people inside. As we have never before addressed whether the deployment of a canine under these particular circumstances is unconstitutional, our case law is insufficient to put officers on notice as to whether the conduct alleged violates the Fourth Amendment. In denying Hendershott qualified immunity, the district court relied primarily on our decision in Priester, concluding that clearly established law at the time of Monell’s arrest would have informed a reasonable officer that the force allegedly employed was unconstitutional. We do not agree that Priester, which was decided on vastly different facts, compels this conclusion. . . . Nor do the facts of this case fall within the scope of the obviousness exception. . . . Plaintiffs appear to suggest that the absence of any overt aggression by Monell, coupled with the fact that Monell suffers from mental illness, somehow nullified this risk, but the facts do not lend themselves quite so easily to that conclusion. The officers on the scene were faced with an individual who led police on a lengthy pursuit, refused to pull over despite the arrival of multiple police cars with lights flashing and sirens blaring, ignored officers' numerous orders to halt, and attempted to enter an open garage that could have contained weapons and a residence that could have held potential hostages. Particularly when viewed against the background of Monell's extended unresponsive and unusual conduct, we cannot say that it should have been obvious to every reasonable officer that Monell's conduct and the potential danger of the situation did not call for the force used. While we do not opine at this juncture as to whether Hendershott's alleged use of force was unconstitutional, we do not believe that the conduct at issue was so 'wholly unnecessary' or 'grossly disproportionate' as to blatantly cross the line of constitutionality in the absence of any case law on point. . . . As a result, as the complaint is currently pled, qualified immunity should not have been denied to Hendershott.")

Gilmore v. Hodges, 738 F.3d 266, 269, 273 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Because the significant hearing loss alleged by Weinberg both is a serious medical need and could have been effectively treated with the use of hearing aids, we now hold that Weinberg stated a viable constitutional claim. An uncorrected, substantial inability to hear, much like an inability to see effectively without the aid of a corrective medical device, may place an inmate at risk of serious harm and substantially interfere with the inmate's ability to function in a penal environment. This holding, however, was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violations—not by this Court, not by the Florida Supreme Court, nor finally by the United States Supreme Court. Thus, because the state of the law did not provide the officers with 'fair warning' that their alleged conduct was unlawful, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In order to clarify the law for future cases, we begin with the first prong, although we could resolve the case on the second prong alone. We do so for several reasons. In the first place, as the Supreme Court explained in Pearson, although addressing the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is no longer required, it is nonetheless 'often appropriate' and 'often beneficial,' particularly 'with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.' . . . We are plainly confronted with such a question here. A claim of deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments necessarily arises only where the plaintiff is incarcerated, and a qualified immunity defense is generally available to the public official or officials against whom the plaintiff brings suit. While a qualified immunity defense is not available when a plaintiff seeks prospective injunctive relief, . . . the nature of a deliberate indifference to serious medical needs claim is such that an inmate will almost always be seeking damages to remedy claimed past injuries caused by the official's failure to provide the inmate with constitutionally adequate medical care. Thus, we see precious little reason to delay the resolution of the constitutional question until a later date, since any later case raising this question will almost surely be decided in the same context of qualified immunity. As we see it, addressing the first prong of qualified immunity in this case ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent,’ . . . and has the salutary effect of giving clear guidance to those officials entrusted with the important charge of providing medical care to incarcerated individuals. Moreover, the constitutional question at the heart of this case—whether a substantial hearing impairment that can be remedied by a hearing aid may amount to a serious medical need for purposes of the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments—is a relatively straightforward legal question that we are well equipped to resolve. Although future cases will surely involve factual disputes about whether a particular inmate’s hearing impairment is severe enough or poses a substantial enough risk of harm to amount to a serious medical need, or whether a hearing aid actually can remedy the inmate’s severe impairment, or indeed whether an official is aware of the inmate’s condition, we can provide guidance to courts and officials down the road by answering today the threshold constitutional question of whether a substantial hearing impairment that can be remedied by a hearing aid may present a serious medical need.”)

Maddox v. Stephens, 727 F.2d 1109, 1121, 1127 n.19 (11th Cir. 2013) (“A right may be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes in one of three ways: ‘(1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right; or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.’ . . . It is undisputed that only the third and final category is relevant to this appeal, and thus that Stephens is entitled to qualified immunity unless her conduct fits into this third category. This third category, however, is ‘narrow’ and ‘encompasses those situations where “the official’s conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the [relevant constitutional provision] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.”’ . . . We stress that, on appeal, only Maddox’s substantive due process claim is properly before us. And, after thorough review, we hold that, even assuming arguendo that Maddox has established a procedural due process violation and even assuming arguendo that Stephens violated Maddox’s substantive due process rights, Stephens is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established that Stephens’ actions were so conscience shocking as to violate Maddox’s liberty interest in the care, custody, and management of J.O. . . . Because we hold that there has been no violation of clearly established substantive due process law, we need not decide whether Stephens’ behavior actually violated Maddox’s substantive due process rights.”)

Loftus v. Clark-Moore, 690 F.3d 1200, 1204, 1205 (11th Cir. 2012) (“Because Loftus’s complaint is one ‘in which it is plain that a constitutional right [was] not clearly established,’ . . . our analysis begins and ends with the second inquiry of the test for qualified immunity. . . . [S]tate officials who act to investigate or to protect children where there are allegations of abuse almost never act within the contours of “clearly established law,” . . . so it should come as no surprise that no controlling case law establishes that it is unreasonable for a Florida social worker to interrogate a minor at her school during the course of an investigation of allegations of child abuse. Similarly, no controlling case law requires a showing of probable cause for a Florida social worker to interrogate a minor on school grounds if the minor is suspected of being a victim of child abuse. We have stated instead that a state official may seize a student at a school so long as the seizure is ‘justified at its inception’ and is ‘reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified interference in the first place.’. . . Although Gray involved a police officer who worked at public school officials’ behest to ensure the safety of the other students at that school, we have never limited the standard for evaluating the reasonableness of a seizure of a minor at a school. Loftus cites a decision from one of our sister circuits, Doe v. Heck, 327 F.3d 492 (7th Cir.2003), to support his argument, but that decision cannot provide ‘clearly established’ law in this Circuit. Loftus insists that the ‘notice of illegality ... should not have to come from cases in the district where the improper incident occurred,’ but Clark–Moore, as a Florida official performing a discretionary duty, ‘cannot be held to a standard of conduct which is unsettled by the Supreme Court[,] ... this circuit[,]’ or ‘the highest state court’ in Florida. . . Loftus argues too that the warrantless seizure of Savonna violated Florida law, which should have put Clark–Moore on notice that her actions were illegal,. . . but this argument fails because ‘section 1983 protects only against violations of federally protected rights.’. . . No controlling case law establishes that a social worker violates a parent’s right to due process by making threats to remove his children in the course of an investigation of child abuse that the parent invited, and Loftus fails to explain how Ferguson’s conduct otherwise obviously violated the Constitution. Loftus cites no decision of our Court, the Supreme Court, or the Florida Supreme Court to support his argument that Ferguson’s conduct violated his and his children’s clearly established constitutional rights.”)

Hoyt v. Cooks, 672 F.3d 972, 977-80 (11th Cir. 2012) (“The Supreme Court has stated that we have discretion in deciding which of those two prongs to address first. . . Because we find that the illegality of Cooks’s and Harkleroad’s behavior was not clearly established at the time, we need not decide whether there was a constitutional violation. . . In this case, there is no precedent that has staked out a bright line. Plaintiffs produce two cases, but both are inapposite. Plaintiffs’ first case is Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir.2004), where an officer used a single probe-style Taser stun on a truck driver who was ‘hostile, belligerent, and uncooperative.’. . . However, Draper did not establish that any particular behavior would violate the Constitution. Indeed, it found that the officer’s actions were constitutional. . . Also, Draper is distinguishable, primarily because the officers in that case were able to handcuff the suspect after just one use of the Taser, whereas Cooks and Harkleroad were unable to fully handcuff Allen even after repeated stuns. . . Accordingly, Draper did not give Cooks and Harkleroad fair warning that their behavior would constitute excessive force. . . The only other case Plaintiffs cite to support the argument that the illegality of Cooks’s and Harkleroad’s actions was clearly established is Oliver v. Fiorino, 586 F.3d 898 (11th Cir.2009). However, Oliver was issued in October 2009, and thus it cannot have put Cooks and Harkleroad on notice that their behavior in May 2007 could constitute excessive force. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs have produced no caselaw that put Cooks and Harkleroad on notice that their actions would violate a clearly established right. However, Plaintiffs are correct in arguing that a right can be clearly established even in the absence of caselaw. . . This would require that every reasonable officer in Cooks and Harkleroad’s position would inevitably conclude that the force was unlawful. . . This combination of an assault, battery, very unusual behavior, and threats to kill Cooks [footnote omitted] would weigh against a conclusion that Cooks's and Harkleroad's behavior was 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' that they had to know they were 'violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.' . . . [T]he facts in Oliver are so different from the instant facts that the obvious clarity holding in Oliver falls short of indicating obvious clarity in this case.”)

Roberts v. Spielman, 643 F.3d 899, 904-06 (11th Cir. 2011) (“Roberts appears to argue on appeal, that viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Roberts, Deputy Spielman exceeded the scope of his authority when he remained on Roberts’s property after he saw that she was alive and she asked him to leave. We do not agree. Deputy Spielman acted within his authority in remaining on the property and attempting to speak with and observe Roberts for a brief period of time to ensure that she had not attempted, nor was about to attempt, suicide. . . . We stress the limited scope of Deputy Spielman’s entry into the home and encounter with Roberts. Deputy Spielman opened the door and then stood in the doorway of Roberts’ home for about five minutes while he spoke with her. Deputy Spielman then escorted Roberts outside to the back steps of her garage, but only after she continued yelling and made her ambiguous ‘or I will-’ statement that a reasonable officer could have interpreted as a threat or at least as further cause for concern about Roberts’s mental state. Although the record is silent as to precisely how long Deputy Spielman spoke with Roberts as she sat on the steps, it does not appear to have been a very long time. When Deputy Spielman determined that Roberts was not threatening suicide, he determined that there was no longer an exigency justifying further action, and he left the property. We conclude that, under the particular factual circumstances of this case, Deputy Spielman’s conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Furthermore, even assuming arguendo a constitutional violation, a reasonable officer in Deputy Spielman’s shoes would not have known that his conduct was unlawful. Roberts has cited no binding precedent that clearly established that probable cause and exigent circumstances immediately evaporate once an officer performing a welfare check for a possibly suicidal person sees that the person is merely alive.”)

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1012-18 & n.16 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (“We need not decide in this case whether entering an open garage in order to utilize a passageway to gain access to a visible door to the home is a violation of the Fourth Amendment. We hold, however, that, under the totality of the circumstances, the Deputies’ entry into the Coffins’ garage was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The garage here is attached to the home itself, putting it in closer proximity to the home than an unattached garage. . . . Ms. Coffin also attempted to exercise her Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Under these circumstances and in light of Ms. Coffin’s indications that she intended to maintain privacy, we hold that entering the garage as Ms. Coffin attempted to close it was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We must next address whether, on the pertinent date, it was already clearly established by preexisting law that entering the Coffins open garage in the face of Ms. Coffins’ attempts to exercise her Fourth Amendment privacy rights, including her request that the Deputies leave the property and her attempt to close the garage door, would violate the Fourth Amendment. We hold that the Deputies did not violate clearly established Fourth Amendment law. [discussing cases] Having concluded that no binding case law clearly established the rule of law for this case, we are left with the question of whether the Deputies' entry of the attached garage was a violation of the Fourth Amendment as a matter of obvious clarity. . . . For a number of reasons, we are unable to conclude that, as a matter of obvious clarity, an open attached garage is either a part of the home, or entitled to the same level of protection as the home. . . . Only cases from the Supreme Court of the United States, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court can clearly establish the law in our Circuit, but opinions from other courts can suggest that reasonable jurists would not know that certain factual situations rise to the level of constitutional violations, and therefore reasonable officers would not either. . . . [T]he development of the law in other jurisdictions merely reflects the legal landscape, how reasonable jurists have interpreted relevant precedent, and, thus, how reasonable officers might. . . . Although we conclude that the officers did in fact violate the Fourth Amendment under the facts and circumstances of this case, we cannot conclude, in light of all the foregoing considerations, that the officers have violated clearly-established Fourth Amendment law.”)

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1018-29 & n.1 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Barkett, J., joined by Dubina, C.J., and Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“My concurrence with the majority is limited to its conclusion that the deputies violated the Coffins’ constitutional rights. . . . The majority’s opinion today does nothing less than eviscerate the once inviolate protections historically accorded the home by the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution. To accomplish this task, the majority ignores the most basic, bright-line principle of the Supreme Court’s Fourth Amendment jurisprudence: that warrantless searches and seizures occurring within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home are presumptively unconstitutional. The majority circumvents this fundamental precept occupying the very core of the Fourth Amendment by concluding, without any explanation, that an enclosed garage physically attached to a home—and sharing the home’s roof and walls—does not exist within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home. This conclusion rests on the faulty premise that ordinary people expect that deliverymen will come into their attached, enclosed garages and that deliverymen have a right to do so, and fails to recognize that an attached, enclosed garage is no different than any other room in the house, and is thus entitled to the same blanket Fourth Amendment protections as a living room, a den, or a bedroom. . . . While the majority finds a Fourth Amendment violation in this case, it does so, not by recognizing the garage’s obvious status as another room in the house, but rather by applying, without support and in conflict with Supreme Court precedent, a newly minted ‘totality of the circumstances’ test which looks to whether its door is open or closed and whether a person has repeatedly told officers to leave it. The majority opinion upends not only the law of search and seizure but the law of qualified immunity as well. . . . Payton unambiguously held that the Fourth Amendment prohibits law enforcement officials from entering the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home without a warrant, whether its door is open or shut. . . . Because the Coffins’ attached garage, like the Payton defendant’s bedroom, existed within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home, the Fourth Amendment protected it, as a matter of law, even though the deputies could see inside. The deputies, therefore, violated the Fourth Amendment by crossing its threshold and arresting Mrs. Coffin inside. . . . Not only does the majority erode the protections of the Fourth Amendment, but, in holding that the Coffins’ constitutional rights were not clearly established, it also distorts the law of qualified immunity in several ways. First, in relying upon dissents, even from other circuits, as well as opinions from intermediate state appellate courts, . . . the majority appears to abrogate, in a one-sided way, our well-established rule that limits the relevant universe of cases for qualified immunity purposes to those of the United States Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, and highest court of the pertinent state. . . While the majority appears to still require § 1983 plaintiffs to follow our prior rule to prove that their rights were clearly established, it now permits defendants to rely on the opinions of any jurist in any jurisdiction to prove that the law was not clearly established. . . This double standard makes no sense. . . . In this case, the applicable binding precedents are even more factually similar to the deputies' conduct than the precedents in Hope were to the prison officials' conduct, and thus gave the deputies fair warning that their conduct violated the Coffins' constitutional rights. The garage, like every other room in the Coffins' home, was within the confines of the home, and Payton says that officers cannot put one foot into the confines of a home without a warrant; Kyllo held that a warrantless search of a garage violates the Fourth Amendment; and Kauz, Sokolow, and Taylor held that entering a garage without a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment. There is nothing unclear or confusing about the straightforward holdings of these cases. . . . Simply put, the majority does exactly what the Supreme Court chastised this Court for doing in Hope. Reading these cases on their own, ordinary people, and especially reasonable officers, would understand clearly that an attached, enclosed garage is protected by the Fourth Amendment.”)

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1029, 1030 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Hull, J., joined by Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In my view this is an open-and-shut case, not an ‘open garage’ case. . . . In short, the deputies violated Mrs. Coffin’s Fourth Amendment rights when they entered her closed garage door, and the Fourth Amendment law was clearly established that the deputies could not enter Mrs. Coffin’s home after she closed the door.”)

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1030 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Martin, J., joined by Dubina, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I write separately only to emphasize that just as Mr. and Mrs. Coffin have been denied relief for this intrusion into their home, the ‘totality of the circumstances’ test established in the majority opinion does nothing to protect people in their homes from similar intrusions in the future. Specifically, the indefinite standard established by the court today reduces to one the clearly established circumstances under which a person can prevent law enforcement from entering her garage, attached to her home, even where the officer has no warrant, and where the homeowner actively protests the entry. . . . Before today, our binding precedent, which established that an attached garage is treated as part of the ‘house’ under the Fourth Amendment, drew a firm and bright line. But rather than apply Kyllo’s bright line rule, the majority now sets a standard that relies on a number of context-specific and circumstance-dependent factors. In doing so, this court has stripped the Coffins of the very rights that the Fourth Amendment was intended to protect. . . . The shifting standard established here not only muddles our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, but threatens to strip the home of its sanctity. Indeed, I fear that this case may present the first of many unconstitutional entries into homes that are no longer prohibited by clearly established law.”)

Youmans v. Gagnon, 626 F.3d 557, 562, 563, 565, 566 (11th Cir. 2010) (“Following the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson, we are free to consider these elements in either sequence and to decide the case on the basis of either element that is not demonstrated. . . In the present case, it seems best to proceed directly to the question of whether the applicable law was already clearly established when the incident took place. . . Whether or not Defendant’s conduct constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of Plaintiff’s Fourteenth Amendment rights, . . the law applicable to these circumstances was not already clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . [E]valuating the ‘objective legal reasonableness’ of an officer’s acts requires examining whether the right at issue was clearly established in a ‘particularized’ and ‘relevant’ way. . . When decisional law is required for prior notice, the law can be clearly established by decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state where the case arose. . . But in the absence of controlling precedent, cases decided outside this Circuit can buttress our view that the applicable law was not already clearly established. We must not hold police officers to a higher standard of legal knowledge than that displayed by the federal courts in reasonable and reasoned decisions; where ‘judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’ . . In the present case, that this Court had cited cases of longer delays for similar injuries further confirms for us that an objectively reasonable police officer in Defendant’s place would not have known that Defendant’s conduct would violate Plaintiff’s constitutional rights. . . . We conclude that it is not—and most important, was not in June 2007—clear from the preexisting law that all objectively reasonable policemen would have known that a four-hour delay for booking and interviewing a person with injuries of the kind asserted here is a constitutional violation.”)

Muhammad v. Sapp, 388 F. App’x 892, 898, 899 (11th Cir. 2010)(“Muhammad contends that the defendants violated the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment by failing to provide him with his requested Islamic dietary accommodations. We begin our qualified immunity analysis by addressing the second prong—whether the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The FDOC submitted an affidavit establishing that complying with Muhammad’s dietary requests was too costly because it would require the operation of special kitchens or food preparation facilities. Under those circumstances and in light of Martinelli, we cannot say that it would be it obvious to all reasonable correctional officials that denying Muhammad’s dietary request violated federal law.”)

Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 713-16 (11th Cir. 2010) (“Supreme Court and circuit precedent is not entirely clear regarding the degree of First Amendment protection for candidacy, however, every case addressing the issue has found at least some constitutional protection. . . . Since Scott’s interest in firing Randall was, as alleged in the complaint, for purely personal reasons, the state has no interest in preventing Randall from running for office. While we have not decided the level of scrutiny to be applied, Randall’s decision to run for office enjoys some First Amendment protection. Comparing this level of protection to the state’s interest—manifestly none—the dismissal of Randall’s complaint cannot be affirmed on the failure to state the denial of a First Amendment right. . . . In the case at hand, based on the scrupulous legal analysis required to determine whether Randall had a First Amendment right violated, we conclude that Randall's rights were not clearly established under broad case law. . . . Since we are aware of no precedential case with similar facts to those described here, we conclude that Randall's rights were not clearly established under materially similar facts. . . . We conclude that Scott's alleged unconstitutional act of working to prevent Randall from running for office was not "obviously" clear. It appears to us that any such right to run for office was not heretofore clearly established. Scott therefore enjoys individual qualified immunity protection for her alleged violation of Randall's First Amendment rights. Accordingly we affirm the district court's judgment on the qualified immunity issue regarding Randall's individual capacity claim against Scott.")

Reed v. Allen, No. 09-14493, 2010 WL 1959526, at *3 (11th Cir. May 18, 2010) (not published) ("We need not consider the constitutional issue. . . . Even assuming Reed's complaint states a constitutional violation, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the right Reed asserts was not clearly established. The state of law at the time the Defendants implemented the wristband policy was that, under Harris, complete segregation of HIV-positive prisoners was not a constitutional violation. The current policy at Limestone is less restrictive because it disposes of segregation, except for residence, and integrates HIV-positive inmates with the rest of the inmates. It was not then 'clearly established' to prison officials that requiring color-coded wristbands violated Reed's constitutional privacy right when full segregation did not. In light of Harris, Reed has not shown that his privacy right was 'clearly established.'")

Glenn v. City of Columbus, Ga., 375 F. App'x 928, 2010 WL 1558721, at *3-*7 (11th Cir. 2010) ("In Pearson, the Supreme Court recently held that we are no longer obliged to conduct the qualified immunity analysis in the sequence set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Accordingly, we may now exercise our discretion to decide which prong of the inquiry to address first. . . . In this case, we need not address the first question at all because, even if we were to assume that Zachary's shooting violated the Constitution, the plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the law was so clearly established as to give the officers fair warning that shooting a beanbag gun at Zachary under these circumstances would have been illegal. We, therefore, begin and end our analysis with an examination of the second prong. . . . To begin with, there is no case in either the United States Supreme Court, the Supreme Court of Georgia, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit that comes close to identifying the illegality of the officers' use of force in these factual circumstances. First, there is no case involving beanbag munitions in any of the relevant courts. . . . Nor is there any roughly analogous case law that would suffice to put the officers on notice of the illegality of their conduct in these 'tense, uncertain' circumstances. On April 4, 2005, there were no cases in the relevant jurisdictions on the use of less than deadly force (here a beanbag munition) to subdue a suspect who had threatened to shoot at officers who were in front of his house, spoke about killing children, and threatened suicide. . . . Here, the officers reasonably believed on the basis of the defendant's threats that he was equipped to commit and had contemplated homicide as well as suicide. Beyond that, and perhaps most importantly, the use of a bean bag munition, unlike a firearm, is not characterized as deadly force. The bean bag was classified by the Columbus Police Department as a Level 6, the highest level use of force below deadly force, and was authorized ‘when deadly force is not justified, but empty hand control and OC [pepper spray] is not sufficient in effecting an arrest.’ . . . Ultimately, this is one of those tragic, mistaken cases in the ‘hazy border between permissible and forbidden force.’ . . . Quite simply, there was no clearly established law at the time that would have put Officer Coats and Sergeants Hudson and Touchberry on notice that the use of a beanbag munition in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment.”)

Keating v. City of Miami, 598 F.3d 753, 765, 766 (11th Cir. 2010) (“Under the facts alleged in the Protesters’ complaint, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon violated the Protesters’ First Amendment rights in their supervisory capacities by directing the subordinate officers to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a large crowd of allegedly peaceful demonstrators and by failing to stop the subordinate officers from doing the same. Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon argue that their conduct in violation of the First Amendment was not clearly established. . . . Here, the Protesters had a clearly established right to assemble, protest, and demonstrate peacefully, and they sufficiently allege that they engaged in a peaceful demonstration on public property. . . . Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon violated clearly established law when, in their supervisory capacities, they directed their subordinate officers to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd at a large public demonstration and consequently failed to stop such conduct. The constitutional violation was clearly established because a broader, clearly established principle, that peaceful demonstrators have a First Amendment right to engage in expressive activities, should control the novel facts in this situation. . . . Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon, in directing their subordinates to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd of peaceful demonstrators, were aware that their orders to their subordinate officers would violate the Protesters’ First Amendment rights. Additionally, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon were aware that their failure to stop the use of less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd of peaceful demonstrators would violate the Protesters’ First Amendment rights. The direction of unlawful conduct and failure to stop such unlawful conduct in their supervisory capacities caused the violation of the Protesters’ clearly established constitutional rights because it should have been obvious to Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon that their conduct would violate the Protesters’ First Amendment rights. Therefore, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon are not entitled to qualified immunity as to the Protesters’ First Amendment claims for directing unlawful actions and failing to stop unlawful actions under a theory of supervisory liability.”).

Corey Airport Services, Inc. v. Decosta, 587 F.3d 1280, 1286, 1287 (11th Cir. 2009) (“The Supreme Court recently changed course . . . and withdrew the requirement of adherence to the Saucier protocol. . . . Because we conclude examination of the clearly established law question will ‘best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition’ of this case, we consider only this prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We do not reach the question whether Corey has presented sufficient evidence to show a constitutional violation. Corey claims to be the victim of political discrimination. It presents evidence purporting to show that the individual Defendants conspired to apply facially neutral procurement laws and policies to favor political-insider Clear Channel to the detriment of and with the intent to discriminate against Corey, a political-outsider. To support its claim that insider-outsider discrimination violates a clearly established constitutional right, Corey relies on three cases: Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U.S. 1, 64 S.Ct. 397 (1944); Strickland v. Alderman, 74 F.3d 260 (11th Cir.1996); and E & T Realty v. Strickland, 830 F.2d 1107 (11th Cir.1987). These cases all note the general proposition that the Equal Protection Clause may be violated by an unequal application of a facially neutral statute. . . . Because the circumstances of this case differ from the circumstances of the cited cases and because the courts in the cited cases did not hold that the defendants violated the Constitution, we cannot conclude that these decisions made it clear that the conduct at issue here violated the Constitution. Nor are we aware of any other relevant cases decided prior to 2002 finding a violation of a constitutional right based on facts similar to those in this case. Therefore, to hold that Defendants violated Corey's clearly established constitutional rights, we must conclude that a court's recitation of the highly general principle—that unequal application of facially neutral law with the intent to discriminate may violate the equal protection clause—in and of itself, offered the defendants 'fair warning that their [treatment of Corey] was unconstitutional.' . . . Our precedents cannot support this conclusion. For general principles to clearly establish the law, the case must be an obvious one. . . . Because this is not such a case, the Defendants did not violate a clearly established constitutional right and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Corey's claims of insider-outsider political discrimination present not only novel factual circumstances, but also a novel question of law. Corey cites no precedent holding that insider-outsider political discrimination violates the Constitution. Corey does not point to a single decision concerning political discrimination, let alone one that could control, 'with obvious clarity,' these factual circumstances and offer the defendants 'fair warning,' that is, made it clear, that their acts violated the Constitution.”).

Poulakis v. Rogers, No. 08-15425, 2009 WL 2447356, at *3-*5 (11th Cir. Aug. 10, 2009) (not published) (“Under Pearson, the federal courts are no longer obliged to conduct this qualified immunity analysis in the order articulated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001); rather, we are now ‘permitted to exercise [our] sound discretion’ to decide which prong of this inquiry to address first. . . . On the facts of this case, we begin and end our analysis with the second question—whether the unconstitutionality of the officers’ actions was clearly established at the time of the incident. We hold that it was not. . . . In wrongful arrest cases, we have frequently framed the ‘clearly established’ prong as an ‘arguable probable cause’ inquiry. In other words, we have said that when an officer violates the Constitution because he lacked probable cause to make an arrest, the officer’s conduct may still be insulated under the second prong of qualified immunity if he had ‘arguable probable cause’ to make the arrest. . . . In the instant case, no decision from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court has clearly established that a firearm found in a center console of a vehicle is ‘securely encased’ for the purposes of Florida’s penal code, Fla. Stat. ‘ 790.25(5). . . . The question then boils down to whether the statutory text itself is so clear and compelling in permitting Poulakis to maintain a concealed firearm in the closed center console of his automobile that no reasonable officer could have thought there was probable cause to effect an arrest under these circumstances.”).

Poulakis v. Rogers, No. 08-15425, 2009 WL 2447356, at *11, *13, *16, *17 (11th Cir. Aug. 10, 2009) (not published) (Quist, District Judge, dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent from the Court’s opinion. I agree with the district court that Officer Rogers and Sgt. Stender lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Poulakis for violating Florida’s concealed weapons law. I would reverse, however, because in my judgment the district court erred in concluding that advice of counsel could transform a patently unreasonable arrest into a reasonable one. My principal disagreement with the majority’s analysis is that it treats arguable probable cause as part of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis, when both Eleventh Circuit precedent and reason show that whether a federal constitutional right was clearly established is distinct from whether a police officer was objectively reasonable in making an arrest. Because, in my judgment, arguable probable cause is properly considered under the first step of the qualified immunity analysis, or at least separately from whether the law was clearly established, we may consider state intermediate appellate decisions construing the pertinent state statute. I also believe that there is no ambiguity in the statutory definition of ‘securely encased.’ . . . When a state law is at issue within the larger context of arguable probable cause in a Fourth Amendment claim, it makes good sense for a federal court to consider what all courts of that state have to say about that law, just as the police officers, prosecutors, and judges of that state must do. . . . Because I believe that our precedent reveals that arguable probable cause is part of the first, rather than the second, prong of the qualified immunity analysis, I see no principled basis for ignoring pertinent Florida appellate decisions. . . . Even accepting the majority’s argument that arguable probable cause is determined as part of the clearly established inquiry, I would reach the same conclusion based solely upon the plain language of the statute; no reasonable interpretation of the ‘securely encased’ exception supports Defendants’ arrest of Poulakis. . . . That is, a closed center console of a vehicle is plainly a ‘container which requires a lid or cover to be opened for access.’ . . . My larger concern is that this Court’s decision sends a signal to police officers that they are free to ignore the law of the intermediate state appellate courts by which they are otherwise bound, and an unambiguous statute, without concern for violating an individual’s federal constitutional rights. Therefore, I would reverse on qualified immunity and remand for consideration of the other defenses Defendants raised in their summary judgment motion.”).

Presley v. City of Blackshear, No. 09-10501, 2009 WL 2413061, at *2, *3 (11th Cir. Aug. 7, 2009) (“Because Presley has completely failed to demonstrate that the right she alleges was violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and need not decide whether there was a constitutional violation.. . . Presley cites no particularized case law that establishes that a reasonable police officer would have concluded that Antonio’s rights were violated by Officer Evans. Additionally, Presley cites no particularized case law that establishes a reasonable paramedic would have concluded Antonio’s rights were violated by Farrior. . . . None of the cases Presley cites . . . even address a pre-trial detainee’s right to emergency medical care, and thus none of the cases clearly establish the constitutional right at issue in this case.”).

Lewis v. City of West Palm Beach, Fla., 561 F.3d 1288, 1290-92 (11th Cir. 2009) (“The exact cause of death is unclear. At the district court level, the defendants relied on the testimony of Dr. Michael Bell, the county medical examiner who performed the autopsy of Lewis. Dr. Bell concluded that the cause of death was ‘sudden respiratory arrest following physical struggling restraint due to cocaine-induced excited delirium.’ Ms. Lewis offered the expert testimony of Dr. Michael Baden, who testified that the cause of death was asphyxia caused by neck compression. . . . The Supreme Court recently clarified the Saucier two-step process explaining that the order of the inquiry is fluid, providing the Court with the flexibility to focus on the determinative question. [citing Pearson v. Callahan] The Supreme Court recognized that discussion of a constitutional violation may become unnecessary for qualified immunity purposes when the right was not clearly established. . . . It is therefore not mandated that the Court examine the potential constitutional violation under Saucier step one prior to analyzing whether the right was clearly established under step two. Such analytical flexibility is certainly applicable here. Even if the officers’ actions violated Lewis’s Fourth Amendment rights, the appellant did not demonstrate that the officers’ conduct was an intrusion on a clearly established right. A right may be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes in one of three ways: (1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right . . . ; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right. . . . or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law. . . . Here, case law does not provide the necessary precedent, either specifically or through broad principles, to clearly establish the right. Thus, only if the officers’ conduct was so egregious and unacceptable so as to have blatantly violated the Constitution would qualified immunity be unavailable to them. However, to come within this narrow exclusion, ‘plaintiff must show that the official’s conduct was so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that the official had to know he was violating the Constitution even without case law on point.’. . . This standard is met when every reasonable officer would conclude that the excessive force used was plainly unlawful. . . . Appellant argues that because the officers further restrained Lewis with the hobble after the need for any use of force had passed and tightened it to form a hogtie, the officers’ conduct rose to this level of egregiousness. This is not the case. Even though most of the officers in this case testified that Lewis was not a danger to them and was merely resisting arrest, he was, as the district court described, ‘an agitated and uncooperative man with only a tenuous grasp on reality.’ Because of his refusal to sit upright and his inability to remain calm, Lewis remained a safety risk to himself and to others. As the district court observed, this was precisely the type of situation where the decisions of the officers confronted with ‘circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ should not be second-guessed. . . . Unlike many of the cases cited by plaintiff, Lewis did not remain compliantly restrained. . . . Even though he was not forcefully attacking the officers, Lewis continued to struggle. The application of the hobble may not have been entirely necessary; however, the officers’ attempts to restrain Lewis were not so violent and harsh to be considered an egregious violation of a constitutional right, and they are not an obstacle to the application of qualified immunity. Despite the unfortunate result that night, qualified immunity insulates the officers from liability for Lewis’s death.”).

Fennell v. Gilstrap, 559 F.3d 1212, 1216, 1217 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2009) (“The qualified immunity inquiry usually involves two prongs. First, a plaintiff must show that a constitutional or statutory right has been violated. Second, a plaintiff must show that the right violated was clearly established. . . Although the Supreme Court recently held that lower courts are no longer required to address these prongs in order, it recognized that it is ‘often beneficial’ to do so. . . Pearson, however, has no application in a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim because the qualified immunity analysis involves only the first prong. . . .We agree with Fennell, therefore, that the district court erred in granting summary judgment on the ground that Gilstrap’s use of excessive force was not a violation of clearly established law after holding that there was evidence of a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment through the use of excessive force. . . . Nonetheless, the district court’s grant of summary judgment is due to be affirmed because, as Gilstrap argues, Fennell has failed to show that Gilstrap’s use of force constituted excessive force violating the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . [O]ur precedent permits the use of force even when a detainee is not physically resisting. . . . The undisputed evidence is that Fennell had grabbed Huskey’s arm, and Fennell did not let go of Huskey’s arm despite being punched by other officers. Gilstrap was in the room for 15 seconds, during which time six officers were unable to secure and handcuff Fennell. Gilstrap’s decision to kick Fennell in the arm was not a malicious and sadistic escalation of force, even if the kick accidentally landed on Fennell’s face. Accordingly, the relationship between the need for force created by Fennell’s conduct and the force Gilstrap decided to use favors a conclusion that the force in this case was not malicious and sadistic, but rather ‘a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline in a difficult situation.’ . . . The undisputed evidence was that Gilstrap intended to kick Fennell in the arm, and not the face. . . No evidence in the record supports a contrary inference. Furthermore, Gilstrap kicked Fennell only once, and did not kick him again after the first kick landed on Fennell’s face. . . . In this case, considering all the factors, the undisputed evidence does not show that Gilstrap kicked Fennell maliciously and sadistically. Fennell insists that the kick was unnecessary, that Huskey was never in danger, and that Fennell had stopped struggling. But, Fennell did not testify to this effect, and the statement of every officer in the room during the struggle suggests otherwise. . . . In the absence of evidence that Gilstrap acted maliciously and sadistically, his use of force does not shock the conscience, and thus did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Fennell has therefore failed to show any constitutional violation. Gilstrap is entitled to qualified immunity, and summary judgment in his favor was appropriate.”)

McCullough v. Antolini, 559 F.3d 1201, 1205-08 (11th Cir. 2009) (“[U]nder Pearson, the federal courts are no longer required to conduct this qualified immunity analysis in the order articulated by Saucier. . . In this case, we begin and end our analysis with whether the law enforcement officers violated McCullough’s Fourth Amendment rights. We hold that they did not. . . . We have had occasion to review many excessive force claims against officers in the context of qualified immunity determinations where the decedent was driving an automobile at the time deadly force was used. In some of the cases, we have found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. In others, we have awarded qualified immunity. We have, however, consistently upheld an officer’s use of force and granted qualified immunity in cases where the decedent used or threatened to use his car as a weapon to endanger officers or civilians immediately preceding the officer's use of deadly force. . . . In short, the sheriff's deputies used deadly force in a split-second situation where a suspect late at night refused to pull over, engaged in a high-speed chase, and then, after pulling over, repeatedly refused to show his hands or respond to officers, revved his engine, and then drove his truck toward the deputy standing nearby in a parking lot. . . . Simply put, the force used against McCullough was not excessive under the Fourth Amendment and the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Because we can discern no constitutional violation, we need not address whether the constitutional right at issue had been clearly established when the incident arose.”)

Amnesty Intern., USA v. Battle, 559 F.3d 1170, 1181, 1182, 1184, 1185 (11th Cir. 2009) (“Although this two-step inquiry is no longer mandatory, we think it remains appropriate in this case. . . . The alleged violations of constitutional rights occurred when Amnesty was prevented from (1) distributing literature to people attending the various protests in the area, and (2) conducting a successful demonstration with an audience and media coverage. . . . Supreme Court caselaw makes clear that the First Amendment right to distribute pamphlets was clearly established prior to November 2003. . . . Thus, at this stage in litigation, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Amnesty's claim that its right to distribute leaflets was violated. It is a closer question whether Amnesty's right to have an audience and be heard at its demonstration was clearly established. All of the caselaw cited above, with the exception of Citizens for Peace in Space, is good authority that predates the November 20, 2003 incident. . . . None of these cases, however, are on all fours with the instant case, and do not clearly elucidate the fact-specific rule that police may not create a police cordon that makes a protest rally totally ineffective. Prior cases clearly establishing the constitutional violation, however, need not be ‘materially similar’ to the present circumstances so long as the right is ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . There need not, however, be a prior case wherein ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . . . Here, Defendants had fair warning that Amnesty had a clearly established right to assemble, to protest, and to be heard while doing so.”).

Case v. Eslinger, 555 F.3d 1317, 1326, 1327 (11th Cir. 2009) (“Although no longer mandatory, the two-part inquiry of Saucier provides the ‘better approach to resolving’ this appeal. . . . Bypassing the first inquiry in our resolution of whether Officer Davis was entitled to summary judgment would not conserve judicial resources because we must still consider the potential liability of Sheriff Eslinger and the City, which hinges on whether Case's rights were violated by Officer Davis. . . . Case failed to present evidence of a constitutional violation because the record, viewed in the light most favorable to him, establishes that Officer Davis had probable cause to arrest Case and seize his property.”).

R.F.J. v. Florida Department of Children and Families, No. 3:15-CV-1184-J-32JBT, 2019 WL 3207334, at *8-9 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2019) (“Although Brady committed a constitutional violation when he was deliberately indifferent to a serious risk of harm to the children, for Plaintiffs to defeat qualified immunity, they must demonstrate that the right was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Plaintiffs concede there is no controlling case where state actors have been held to have committed constitutional violations in a materially similar situation. . . . Plaintiffs have also failed to demonstrate that a broader established principle clearly controls this case. . . . That state officials are liable when they are deliberately indifferent to ongoing abuse does not make it ‘obvious...[to] every objectively reasonable government official’ that placing children with a relative with mental health issues also violates the Constitution. . . . Neither, in light of the limitations on state officials’ liability explained in Deshaney and other Supreme Court and Eleventh Circuit cases, can the Court find that Brady’s conduct ‘so obviously violate[s] the Constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’ . . . Thus, although Brady had an obligation to ensure a reasonably safe living environment, . . . there is no clearly established rule that placing the children with a relative, even one with a serious mental health history, would violate the children’s constitutional rights. . . . Of course, if this Court’s finding that Plaintiffs have properly alleged a constitutional violation is affirmed on appeal, thereafter, the right would become clearly established.”)

Aracena v. Gruler, No. 618CV932ORL40KRS, 2018 WL 5961040, at *8 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 14, 2018) (“In this case, Plaintiff can satisfy neither part of the two-part showing to establish that Officer Gruler is not entitled qualified immunity. As discussed supra Subsections III.A.1–3, Plaintiff has not alleged facts that make out a constitutional violation. . . . And even if Plaintiff had, there has been no showing that the constitutional right at issue was ‘clearly established.’. . . Plaintiff relies on Olson and Waldron to establish that the Pulse nightclub occupants had a ‘clearly established’ constitutional right to Officer Gruler’s assistance. . . . But as the Court’s analysis supra Subsection III.A.3 makes clear, neither Olson nor Waldron supports the proposition that Officer Gruler violated Plaintiff’s rights. Count I therefore fails to state a plausible claim against Officer Gruler, and even if it did, he is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

I. Increasing Judicial Criticism of the Doctrine

SUPREME COURT

Price v. Montgomery County, Kentucky, No. 23-649, 2024 WL 3260097, at *1 n.2 (U.S. July 2, 2024) (Statement of Justice Sotomayor respecting the denial of certiorari) (“Absolute prosecutorial immunity in theory is limited to ‘the immunity historically accorded ... at common law and the interests behind it.’. . . Further, as Judge Nalbandian discussed in his opinion below, recent scholarship details that the 1871 Civil Rights Act included language abrogating common-law immunities that was, for unknown reasons, omitted from the first compilation of federal law. 72 F.4th 711, 727, n. 1 (CA6 2023) (opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (“So, according to this recent scholarship, because the Civil Rights Act of 1871 explicitly abrogated the common-law immunities grounded in state law, those immunities are abrogated now sub silentio under the current version of § 1983” (citing Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 980 (CA5 2023) (Willet, J., concurring)); Civil Rights Act of 1871, 17 Stat. 13; A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Cal. L. Rev. 201, 235 (2023)). This new scholarship reinforces why, at a minimum, this immunity doctrine should be employed sparingly.”)

N.S. v. Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners, 143 S. Ct. 2422, 2422-24 (2023) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari) (“The evidence in this case, taken in the light required at this stage of litigation, tells a disturbing story. Ryan Stokes was an unarmed Black man in the process of surrendering to the police when Officer Thompson, without warning, shot him in the back and killed him. Stokes was only suspected of cell phone theft, there had been no reports he was violent or threatening, and the unarmed Stokes was peacefully surrendering to a different officer after a brief foot chase. This arresting officer, Officer Straub, had already holstered his gun because he could tell that Stokes did not present a risk. Indeed, Stokes was facing Straub and lifting his hands to surrender. Straub was therefore “shocked” when, without any warning, Stokes was shot from behind by Thompson. . .Stokes’ daughter sued over her father’s killing and sought a jury trial. The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, however, ensured that this case never made it to a jury. At the summary judgment stage, the court granted Thompson qualified immunity on the ground that it was not clearly established that Thompson had used excessive force when he shot and killed Stokes. The court reached this result through a two-step that is all too familiar. First, the Eighth Circuit improperly drew factual inferences in the police officer’s favor. It is the jury’s role to decide factual disputes over what happened and draw factual inferences from the evidence presented. Summary judgment deprives the jury of this crucial role, and thus ‘is appropriate only if “the movant shows that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.”’. . In assessing whether summary judgment is warranted, ‘a court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the opposing party’ and ‘adhere to the fundamental principle that at the summary judgment stage, reasonable inferences should be drawn in favor of the nonmoving party.’ [citing Tolan] This ensures that it is a jury that will hear evidence and determine which story is credible, not a judge reading a paper record. This role of the jury is particularly important in qualified immunity cases, where the stakes are not just about the parties involved, but whether there will be accountability when public officials violate the Constitution. . . Here, however, the Eighth Circuit did not follow this well-settled law. In this case, as in many qualified immunity cases, a key question at summary judgment was whether, resolving factual disputes in favor of Stokes’ daughter, ‘a jury could reasonably infer that [Stokes’ actions], in context, did not amount’ to a threat that he would ‘inflict harm’ on Straub. . .Yet in answering this question and in setting out the version of the facts most favorable to Stokes’ daughter, the Eighth Circuit failed to draw all factual inferences in the daughter’s favor. To be sure, the court below correctly acknowledged that the evidence showed the following when taking the daughter’s version of disputed facts: Stokes never had a gun, he was lifting his hands to surrender, and Thompson ‘fired without warning.’. . The Eighth Circuit then departed from the proper approach, however, when it somehow concluded that even viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to Stokes’ daughter, Thompson ‘faced a ... choice here: use deadly force or face the possibility that Stokes might shoot a fellow officer.’. . The court drew this inference from two facts: First, Stokes was raising his hands (while surrendering to Straub) with his back turned toward Thompson; and second, prior to surrendering, Stokes had briefly opened and then closed the door to his friend's car. Yet even assuming an inference of danger could reasonably be drawn in Thompson's favor (which is debatable), drawing such an inference here would still be inconsistent with 'the fundamental principle' that 'reasonable inferences should be drawn in favor' of Stokes' daughter. . . A jury could instead infer that an officer in Thompson's position did not have an objective reason to fear imminent violence from Stokes because: (1) no gun was seen; (2) there was no reason to suspect Stokes was violent, much less prepared to kill a police officer; (3) opening the car door could have multiple nonthreatening explanations, including hiding a stolen cell phone; and (4) Stokes was unwarned, not disobeying any orders, and his actions showed he was surrendering. A reasonable juror could have similarly placed greater weight on the facts that tended toward showing that Stokes' actions, even from Thompson's vantage point, were harmless. In other words, '[a] jury could well have concluded that a reasonable officer would have [seen Stokes' actions] not as a threat' of imminent deadly violence, but as what they were: the actions of an unarmed man surrendering to the police. . . The court below may have disagreed with that inference, but it was the jury's to make. Second, the Eighth Circuit compounded this error through its analysis of whether Thompson had violated Stokes' clearly established rights. This Court has clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force against an unarmed suspect who is not behaving violently and does not pose an immediate risk of serious physical injury or death to others. See Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 9–12, 105 S.Ct. 1694, 85 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985). Indeed, in Garner the suspect was at least refusing to follow a direct order, . . . while here Stokes was peaceably surrendering. Circuit precedent only further established that officers cannot, without warning and without an objective suspicion of imminent violence, shoot unarmed people who are not resisting arrest. See Nance v. Sammis, 586 F.3d 604, 610–611 (C.A.8 2009); Ngo v. Storlie, 495 F.3d 597, 599–601, 603–605 (C.A.8 2007). The court below dodged this precedent by identifying immaterial differences between the facts of cases. Yet factually identical cases are not required for law to be clearly established. . . The evidence here, when properly interpreted at this stage, matches the key holdings of those cases about the use of lethal force against unarmed, unwarned people who do not pose a danger to others. Instead, the Eighth Circuit analogized the facts here to a case involving 'an armed robbery,' 'a report of shots fired,' and an officer ordering the suspect to stop before firing. Thompson v. Hubbard, 257 F.3d 896, 898 (C.A.8 2001). . . Had the Eighth Circuit drawn the proper inferences in the daughter's favor, it simply could not have plausibly concluded as a matter of law that 'Officer Thompson faced a similar choice here.' . . These dual mistakes—resolving factual disputes or drawing inferences in favor of the police, then using those inferences to distinguish otherwise governing precedent—have become the calling card of many courts' qualified immunity jurisprudence. See, e.g., Lombardo v. St. Louis, 600 U.S. —, —, —, — S.Ct. —, —, — L.Ed.2d —, — (2023) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (slip op., at 2–4) 2023 WL 4278467, at *1–2; Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 597 U.S. —, —, —, —, 142 S.Ct. 2571, 2572–2573, 213 L.Ed.2d 1121 (2022) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari); James v. Bartelt, 595 U.S. —, —, —, —, 142 S.Ct. 4, —, —, 211 L.Ed.2d 145 (2021) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (slip op., at 1–2) 2021 WL 4507580, at *1; Kisela v. Hughes, 584 U.S. —, —, —, —, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1155, 1161, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting); Mullenix v. Luna, 577 U.S. 7, 23–25, 136 S.Ct. 305, 193 L.Ed.2d 255 (2015) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting). The result is that a purportedly ‘qualified’ immunity becomes an absolute shield for unjustified killings, serious bodily harm, and other grave constitutional violations. Officers are told ‘that they can shoot first and think later,’ because a court will find some detail to excuse their conduct after the fact. . . The public is told ‘that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished.’ . . And surviving family members like Stokes’ daughter are told that their losses are not worthy of remedy. I would summarily reverse the court below to break this trend. It is time to restore some reason to a doctrine that is becoming increasingly unreasonable. If this Court is unwilling to do so, then it should reexamine its judge-made doctrine of qualified immunity writ large.”)

Hoggard v. Rhodes, 141 S. Ct. 2421, 2421-22 (2021) (Statement of Justice Thomas respecting the denial of certiorari) (“As I have noted before, our qualified immunity jurisprudence stands on shaky ground. Ziglar v. Abbasi, 582 U. S. —, —, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1869-72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment); Baxter v. Bracey, 590 U. S. —, 140 S.Ct. 1862, 207 L.Ed.2d 1069 (2020) (opinion dissenting from denial of certiorari). Under this Court’s precedent, executive officers who violate federal law are immune from money damages suits brought under Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U. S. C. § 1983, unless their conduct violates a ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional righ[t] of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . But this test cannot be located in § 1983’s text and may have little basis in history. . . Aside from these problems, the one-size-fits-all doctrine is also an odd fit for many cases because the same test applies to officers who exercise a wide range of responsibilities and functions. . . This petition illustrates that oddity: Petitioner alleges that university officials violated her First Amendment rights by prohibiting her from placing a small table on campus near the student union building to promote a student organization. According to the university, petitioner could engage with students only in a designated ‘Free Expression Area’—the use of which required prior permission from the school. The Eighth Circuit concluded that this policy of restricting speech around the student union was unconstitutional as applied to petitioner. Turning Point USA at Ark. State Univ. v. Rhodes, 973 F.3d 868, 879 (2020). Yet it granted immunity to the officials after determining that their actions, though unlawful, had not transgressed “‘clearly established”” precedent. . . But why should university officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting? We have never offered a satisfactory explanation to this question. . . This approach is even more concerning because ‘our analysis is [not] grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted [§ 1983].’ . . It may be that the police officer would receive more protection than a university official at common law. . . Or maybe the opposite is true. . . Whatever the history establishes, we at least ought to consider it. Instead, we have ‘substitute[d] our own policy preferences for the mandates of Congress’ by conjuring up blanket immunity and then failed to justify our enacted policy. . . The parties did not raise or brief these specific issues below. But in an appropriate case, we should reconsider either our one-size-fits-all test or the judicial doctrine of qualified immunity more generally.”)

Baxter v. Bracey, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1862-64 & n.2 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari) (“Petitioner Alexander Baxter was caught in the act of burgling a house. It is undisputed that police officers released a dog to apprehend him and that the dog bit him. Petitioner alleged that he had already surrendered when the dog was released. He sought damages from two officers under Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U. S. C. § 1983, alleging excessive force and failure to intervene, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Applying our qualified immunity precedents, the Sixth Circuit held that even if the officers’ conduct violated the Constitution, they were not liable because their conduct did not violate a clearly established right. Petitioner asked this Court to reconsider the precedents that the Sixth Circuit applied. I have previously expressed my doubts about our qualified immunity jurisprudence. See Ziglar v. Abbasi, 582 U. S. —, —, —, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1869–1872, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). Because our § 1983 qualified immunity doctrine appears to stray from the statutory text, I would grant this petition. . . . The text of § 1983 ‘ma[kes] no mention of defenses or immunities.’. . . Instead, it applies categorically to the deprivation of constitutional rights under color of state law. . . . [I]n Harlow v. Fitzgerald, . . . the Court eliminated from the qualified immunity inquiry any subjective analysis of good faith to facilitate summary judgment and avoid the ‘substantial costs [that] attend the litigation of’ subjective intent[.] . . . The Court has subsequently applied this objective test in § 1983 cases. . . . In several different respects, it appears that ‘our analysis is no longer grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted the 1871 Act.’. . . There likely is no basis for the objective inquiry into clearly established law that our modern cases prescribe. Leading treatises from the second half of the 19th century and case law until the 1980s contain no support for this ‘clearly established law’ test. . . . There also may be no justification for a one-size-fits-all, subjective immunity based on good faith. . . . Although I express no definitive view on this question, the defense for good-faith official conduct appears to have been limited to authorized actions within the officer’s jurisdiction. . . . An officer who acts unconstitutionally might therefore fall within the exception to a common-law good-faith defense. Regardless of what the outcome would be, we at least ought to return to the approach of asking whether immunity ‘was “historically accorded the relevant official” in an analogous situation “at common law.”’. . . The Court has continued to conduct this inquiry in absolute immunity cases, even after the sea change in qualified immunity doctrine. . . . We should do so in qualified immunity cases as well.² [fn.2: Qualified immunity is not the only doctrine that affects the scope of relief under § 1983. In Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, 81 S.Ct. 473, 5 L.Ed.2d 492 (1961), the Court held that an officer acts “under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State” even when state law did not authorize his action[.] . . . Scholars have debated whether this holding is correct. . . . Although concern about revisiting one doctrine but not the other is understandable, . . . respondents—like many defendants in § 1983 actions—have not challenged Monroe.] I continue to have strong doubts about our § 1983 qualified immunity doctrine. Given the importance of this question, I would grant the petition for certiorari.”)

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1155, 1158-62 (2018) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (“Officer Andrew Kisela shot Amy Hughes while she was speaking with her roommate, Sharon Chadwick, outside of their home. The record, properly construed at this stage, shows that at the time of the shooting: Hughes stood stationary about six feet away from Chadwick, appeared ‘composed and content,’ . . . and held a kitchen knife down at her side with the blade facing away from Chadwick. Hughes was nowhere near the officers, had committed no illegal act, was suspected of no crime, and did not raise the knife in the direction of Chadwick or anyone else. Faced with these facts, the two other responding officers held their fire, and one testified that he ‘wanted to continue trying verbal command[s] and see if that would work.’ . . . But not Kisela. He thought it necessary to use deadly force, and so, without giving a warning that he would open fire, he shot Hughes four times, leaving her seriously injured. If this account of Kisela’s conduct sounds unreasonable, that is because it was. And yet, the Court today insulates that conduct from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity, holding that Kisela violated no ‘clearly established’ law. . . . I disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, as the Court must at summary judgment, a jury could find that Kisela violated Hughes’ clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by needlessly resorting to lethal force. In holding otherwise, the Court misapprehends the facts and misapplies the law, effectively treating qualified immunity as an absolute shield. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . Rather than defend the reasonableness of Kisela’s conduct, the majority sidesteps the inquiry altogether and focuses instead on the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . To be ‘“clearly established” . . . [t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . That standard is not nearly as onerous as the majority makes it out to be. As even the majority must acknowledge, . . . this Court has long rejected the notion that ‘an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful[.]’ . . . ‘[O]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . At its core, then, the ‘clearly established’ inquiry boils down to whether Kisela had ‘fair notice’ that he acted unconstitutionally. . . . The answer to that question is yes. This Court’s precedents make clear that a police officer may only deploy deadly force against an individual if the officer ‘has probable cause to believe that the [person] poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.’ . . . It is equally well established that any use of lethal force must be justified by some legitimate governmental interest. . . . Consistent with those clearly established principles, and contrary to the majority’s conclusion, Ninth Circuit precedent predating these events further confirms that Kisela’s conduct was clearly unreasonable. . . . Because Kisela plainly lacked any legitimate interest justifying the use of deadly force against a woman who posed no objective threat of harm to officers or others, had committed no crime, and appeared calm and collected during the police encounter, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he majority asserts that Hughes was ‘within striking distance’ of Chadwick, . . . but that stretches the facts and contravenes this Court’s repeated admonition that inferences must be drawn in the exact opposite direction, i.e., in favor of Hughes. [citing Tolan] The facts, properly viewed, show that, when she was shot, Hughes had stopped and stood still about six feet away from Chadwick. Whether Hughes could ‘stri[k]e’ Chadwick from that particular distance, even though the kitchen knife was held down at her side, is an inference that should be drawn by the jury, not this Court. . . . Both Curnow and Harris establish that, where, as here, an individual with a weapon poses no objective and immediate threat to officers or third parties, law enforcement cannot resort to excessive force. . . . If all that were not enough, decisions from several other Circuits illustrate that the Fourth Amendment clearly forbids the use of deadly force against a person who is merely holding a knife but not threatening anyone with it. [collecting cases] In sum, precedent existing at the time of the shooting clearly established the unconstitutionality of Kisela’s conduct. The majority’s decision, no matter how much it says otherwise, ultimately rests on a faulty premise: that those cases are not identical to this one. But that is not the law, for our cases have never required a factually identical case to satisfy the ‘clearly established’ standard. . . . It is enough that governing law places ‘the constitutionality of the officer’s conduct beyond debate.’ . . . Because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, it is ‘beyond debate’ that Kisela’s use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, he was not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . For the foregoing reasons, it is clear to me that the Court of Appeals got it right. But even if that result were not so clear, I cannot agree with the majority’s apparent view that the decision below was so manifestly incorrect as to warrant ‘the extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.’ . . . The relevant facts are hotly disputed, and the qualified-immunity question here is, at the very best, a close call. Rather than letting this case go to a jury, the Court decides to intervene prematurely, purporting to correct an error that is not at all clear. This unwarranted summary reversal is symptomatic of ‘a disturbing trend regarding the use of this Court’s resources’ in qualified-immunity cases. . . . As I have previously noted, this Court routinely displays an unflinching willingness ‘to summarily reverse courts for wrongly denying officers the protection of qualified immunity’ but ‘rarely intervene[s] where courts wrongly afford officers the benefit of qualified immunity in these same cases.’ . . . see also Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful? 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45, 82 (2018) (“[N]early all of the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity cases come out the same way—by finding immunity for the officials”); Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity: The Court’s Ever Increasing Limitations on the Development and Enforcement of Constitutional Rights and Some Particularly Unfortunate Consequences, 113 Mich. L.Rev. 1219, 1244–1250 (2015). Such a one-sided approach to qualified immunity transforms the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers, gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment. The majority today exacerbates that troubling asymmetry. Its decision is not just wrong on the law; it also sends an alarming signal to law enforcement officers and the public. It tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished. Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.”) Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1870–72 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“The Civil Rights Act of 1871, of which § 1985(3) and the more frequently litigated § 1983 were originally a part, established causes of action for plaintiffs to seek money damages from Government officers who violated federal law. . . . Although the Act made no mention of defenses or immunities, ‘we have read it in harmony with general principles of tort immunities and defenses rather than in derogation of them.’ . . . We have done so because ‘[c]ertain immunities were so well established in 1871 ... that ‘we presume that Congress would have specifically so provided had it wished to abolish’ them.’ . . . Immunity is thus available under the statute if it was ‘historically accorded the relevant official’ in an analogous situation ‘at common law,’ . . . unless the statute provides some reason to think that Congress did not preserve the defense[.] . . . In some contexts, we have conducted the common-law inquiry that the statute requires. . . . For example, we have concluded that legislators and judges are absolutely immune from liability under § 1983 for their official acts because that immunity was well established at common law in 1871. . . . We have similarly looked to the common law in holding that a prosecutor is immune from suits relating to the ‘judicial phase of the criminal process,’ . . . although not from suits relating to the prosecutor’s advice to police officers[.] In developing immunity doctrine for other executive officers, we also started off by applying common-law rules. In Pierson, we held that police officers are not absolutely immune from a § 1983 claim arising from an arrest made pursuant to an unconstitutional statute because the common law never granted arresting officers that sort of immunity. . . . Rather, we concluded that police officers could assert ‘the defense of good faith and probable cause’ against the claim for an unconstitutional arrest because that defense was available against the analogous torts of ‘false arrest and imprisonment’ at common law. . . . In further elaborating the doctrine of qualified immunity for executive officials, however, we have diverged from the historical inquiry mandated by the statute. . . . In the decisions following Pierson, we have ‘completely reformulated qualified immunity along principles not at all embodied in the common law.’ . . . Instead of asking whether the common law in 1871 would have accorded immunity to an officer for a tort analogous to the plaintiff’s claim under § 1983, we instead grant immunity to any officer whose conduct ‘does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . We apply this ‘clearly established’ standard ‘across the board’ and without regard to ‘the precise nature of the various officials’ duties or the precise character of the particular rights alleged to have been violated.’ . . . We have not attempted to locate that standard in the common law as it existed in 1871, however, and some evidence supports the conclusion that common-law immunity as it existed in 1871 looked quite different from our current doctrine. [citing Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?] Because our analysis is no longer grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted the 1871 Act, we are no longer engaged in ‘interpret [ing] the intent of Congress in enacting’ the Act. . . . Our qualified immunity precedents instead represent precisely the sort of ‘freewheeling policy choice[s]’ that we have previously disclaimed the power to make. . . . We have acknowledged, in fact, that the ‘clearly established’ standard is designed to ‘protec[t] the balance between vindication of constitutional rights and government officials’ effective performance of their duties.’ . . . The Constitution assigns this kind of balancing to Congress, not the Courts. In today’s decision, we continue down the path our precedents have marked. We ask ‘whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted,’ . . . rather than whether officers in petitioners’ positions would have been accorded immunity at common law in 1871 from claims analogous to respondents’. Even if we ultimately reach a conclusion consistent with the common-law rules prevailing in 1871, it is mere fortuity. Until we shift the focus of our inquiry to whether immunity existed at common law, we will continue to substitute our own policy preferences for the mandates of Congress. In an appropriate case, we should reconsider our qualified immunity jurisprudence.”)

Irish v. Fowler, 436 F.Supp.3d 362, 428 n.157 (D. Me. 2020) (Woodcock, J.), aff'd in part, vacated in part and remanded by Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) (“The terrible circumstances of this case give the Court pause as to whether the rationale underlying the doctrine of qualified immunity should be reexamined. Recently, qualified immunity has come under judicial and academic scrutiny. See, e.g., Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 474 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (reaffirming his “broader conviction that the judge-made immunity regime ought not to be immune from thoughtful reappraisal”); Russell v. Wayne Cty. Sch. Dist., No. 3:17-CV-154-CWR-JCG, 2019 WL 3877741, at *2 (S.D. Miss. Aug. 16, 2019); Ventura v. Rutledge, 398 F. Supp. 3d 682, 697 n.6 (E.D. Cal. 2019); Kong ex rel. Kong v. City of Burnsville, No. 16-cv-03634 (SRN/HB), 2018 WL 6591229, at *17 n.17 (D. Minn. Dec. 14, 2018); Manzanares v. Roosevelt Cty. Adult Det. Center, 331 F. Supp. 3d 1260, 1294 n.10 (D.N.M. 2018) (“Moreover, in a day when police shootings and excessive force cases are in the news, there should be a remedy when there is a constitutional violation, and jury trials are the most democratic expression of what police action is reasonable and what action is excessive”); Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975, at *11 (E.D.N.Y. June 26, 2018) (“The Supreme Court’s recent emphasis on shielding public officials and federal and local law enforcement means many individuals who suffer a constitutional deprivation will have no redress”); Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails, 127 YALE L.J. 2, 9-10, 26, 76 (2017); Judge Stephen R. Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity, 113 MICH. L. REV. 1219 (2015); Joanna C. Schwartz, Police Indemnification, 89 N.Y.U. L. REV. 885, 912-913 (2014). As the facts in this case demonstrate, these issues are complicated. The primary culprit is Anthony Lord, not Detective Perkins, not Detective Fowler. Despite the Court’s conclusions about some of the Detectives’ conduct, it is also true that Detectives Perkins and Fowler did not ignore Brittany Irish’s complaint and actively investigated her allegations into the very early hours of the morning. Further, the Court acknowledges that members of the public cannot expect the state or local police to act as a private security force, and there must be limits as to when upset citizens may force officers to trial because of something the officers did or did not do in the line of duty. Even if individual officers rarely personally pay damage awards, the filing of a claim can have repercussions against the officers’ careers and the prospect of a lawsuit may affect the willingness of officers to take risks for public safety that the public wants them to take. Even so, the current law of qualified immunity—in the Court’s mind—has it upside down, with the governmental entity and supervisors rarely facing liability and the front-line, lowest-level employees more directly exposed. This model contrasts with the principles of tort law where the employer is generally responsible for the tortious actions of an employee performed within the scope of employment. Using police as an example, the Court accepts as a premise that there will be an irreducible percentage of law enforcement interactions with the public that will result in potential claims with and without proper police work. Except where the actions of the officer were beyond the scope of employment, if the governmental entity, not the governmental employee, were legally responsible, the risk of harm from governmental actions could be distributed among the public at large, as occurs for privately insured employers, rather than placed on the individual governmental employee. The solutions are not easy and may be impossible given the current state of law at the federal level, particularly in light of the Eleventh Amendment; however, public skepticism of the adequacy of internal discipline proceedings and the need in cases of extreme untoward conduct to provide a mechanism for redress and individual deterrence suggest a new regime is necessary, perhaps with state legislation. The nub of the problem is that the summary disposition of this case will deprive the Plaintiffs of their day in court and runs counter to a fundamental and ancient precept of our legal system: ‘[W]here there is a legal right, there is also a legal remedy.’ Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 163 (1803) (quoting 3 WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, COMMENTARIES *23).”)

See also Lacy v. Coughlin, 177 N.E.3d 945, 960-63 (Mass. App. Ct. 2021) (Sullivan, J., dissenting, with whom Massing, J., joins) (“I fully agree with Justice Massing’s well-crafted dissent. I write separately to underscore the need for legislative action at either the State or Federal level to address the pervasive flaws in our current civil rights and qualified immunity jurisprudence. Relying on what it understands to be settled law, the majority states that there was no substantial risk of serious harm presented by the unsecured hot pot. In support of its analysis the majority points to the dearth of cases ‘that accept[] the theory that providing inmates with an unsecured hot pot constituted cruel and unusual punishment.’ . . . The relative lack of published authority as to what constitutes a constitutional violation under § 1983 is no accident. It is the direct result of U.S. Supreme Court cases which created the doctrine of qualified immunity and systematically curtailed the reach of § 1983. Until 2009, courts deciding claims of qualified immunity were directed to first decide whether there had been a deprivation of constitutional rights, and if so, whether the right had been clearly established at the time of the alleged infringement. . . . In 2009 the Supreme Court changed the rules. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009). It held that Federal court judges could first decide whether there was a clearly established right, and if there was, then address whether there was a constitutional violation. . . . ‘Thus, if a court decides to grant qualified immunity because there is no violation of clearly established law, it may never answer whether there was a constitutional violation.’ Watson, “Yes Harm, No Foul”: Recalibrating Qualified Immunity, 64 Wash. U. J.L. & Pol’y 231, 237 (2021). As a result, not only are cases routinely dismissed before trial, but the law has stagnated. Plaintiffs, including this plaintiff, face daunting prospects in proving the existence of a constitutional violation in a § 1983 case. See Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F. Supp. 3d 386, 408-409 nn.164-166 (S.D. Miss. 2020). This curtailment of an important civil rights statute is an exclusively judicial creation. The doctrine of qualified immunity does not appear anywhere in the Federal statute, see § 1 of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, c. 22, 17 Stat. 13 (1871), codified at 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and is not constitutionally derived. The defense of qualified immunity did not enter the legal lexicon for nearly a century. In 1961, the Supreme Court interpreted § 1983 to include suits against State actors for deprivation of constitutional rights as a result of violation of State law. [citing Monroe v. Pape] This resulted in a dramatic increase in § 1983 litigation in Federal court. . . . The doctrine of qualified immunity emerged in 1967, providing limited immunity from suit (not just a defense to liability) to State and municipal employees charged with civil rights violations who acted in good faith. [citing Pierson v. Ray] Subsequently, in Harlow v. Fitzgerald . . . the Supreme Court

deleted the good faith requirement and reformulated the standard for granting qualified immunity, resulting in the broader standard we apply today, a standard designed to ‘protect[] ... all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . On top of that expansion, the Supreme Court then delivered the coup de grace when it ruled that judges need no longer decide whether there had been a violation of a constitutional right. . . The Supreme Court has offered a variety of rationales for its vigorous expansion of the qualified immunity doctrine, and concomitant curtailment of § 1983, ranging from the protection of police officers from damage awards, to the costs and distractions attendant to litigation. . . Over time the Supreme Court’s reliance on the risk of damage awards against individuals has receded. There is scant evidence, for example, that police officers, as opposed to the municipalities themselves, ever pay § 1983 awards. . . Instead, the Supreme Court now focuses on policy arguments, that is, the need to shield government officials and employees from the time and expense of litigation and the ‘social costs’ of ‘insubstantial claims.’. . There has been longstanding criticism of these justifications. Voices as disparate as those of Justice Clarence Thomas. . . and Justice Sonia Sotomayor. . . have called for a reexamination of qualified immunity. In recent years the tide of commentators (of varying stripes) critical of the doctrine has risen. . . These critiques range from research-based papers designed to show that the doctrine does not meet its intended policy goals, to those which observe that ‘qualified immunity [has] developed as camouflage for civil rights policy decisions,’ Diana Hassel, Living a Lie: The Cost of Qualified Immunity, 64 Mo. L. Rev. 123, 123 (1999), to those which posit that the Supreme Court cases have, in effect, eroded § 1983 by (among other things) ensuring that cases are dismissed at the earliest stage possible without any consideration whether there was a constitutional right at stake. . . As a result, some constitutional rights may not ever become clearly established. While I agree with Justice Massing that the right was clearly established here, the current case is yet another example of the collateral damage done by a qualified immunity doctrine which aggressively terminates cases at the earliest stages of litigation without any development of the law. It also demonstrates the degree to which the effort to balance enforcement of basic civil rights with the interest of the State in avoiding unwarranted litigation has veered hopelessly off course. A fifty-five cup hot pot was left unsecured in a massively (and systematically) overcrowded jail. A pretrial detainee was maimed for life when scalding water was poured over his midsection, burning his arms, legs, buttocks, and genitals. The majority, adhering to what it understands Supreme Court precedent to require, posits that given the prevalence of inmate-on-inmate violence, this was the result of mere negligence, if that, and that there was no constitutional violation. Thus, if the majority is correct, the Supreme Court has declared, for all intents and purposes, that ‘these things happen.’ This turns § 1983 on its head. . . A statute designed to protect the rights of the marginalized from governmental deprivation of civil rights has been overwhelmed by the interests of the government, even where the government has caused grievous injury in what a jury found to be obvious disregard of well-known dangers. . . The most efficacious way out of this tangle is statutory. Any amendment to § 1983 lies in the hands of Congress. But as the majority opinion points out, . . . there was a State law claim in this case that was dismissed prior to trial. See Massachusetts Torts Claims Act, G. L. c. 258, § 4. See also Massachusetts Civil Rights Act, G. L. c. 12, §§ 11H & 11I. Our State statutes have their own complicated structure of exceptions and immunities.⁸ [fn. 8: Under current law, for example, the Federal qualified immunity doctrine is applied to State civil rights claims.] It is well within the powers of the General Court, however, to strengthen our civil rights statutes generally, or to modify the qualified immunity doctrine in particular. Such an endeavor is exactly the kind of policy decision a legislative body is suited to undertake. Legislative action would be vastly preferable to the slow pace and deep uncertainty of case-by-case adjudication, and could provide a measure of protection now denied to those whom the civil rights statutes were intended to safeguard. In 2020 the General Court enacted an Act Relative to Justice, Equity and Accountability in Law Enforcement in the Commonwealth, colloquially known as the ‘police reform bill.’ See St. 2020, c. 253. Chapter 253 established a special commission ‘to investigate and study the impact to the administration of justice of the qualified immunity doctrine in the commonwealth.’ St. 2020, c. 253, § 116 (a). The citizens of the Commonwealth can hope that the commissioners and the Legislature consider this case, and so many others like it, in formulating a legislative response to the doctrine of qualified immunity, and in taking a broader look at our civil rights statutes as a whole. This broader examination is critical because ‘using the immunity defense as the language of the debate over the proper limits of civil rights remedies obscures choices that are being made on the fundamental and divisive issue of what constitutional wrongs should be compensated.’ Hassel, 64 Mo. L. Rev. at 123. The difficulty of resolving important and competing policy considerations should not deter the effort. No one in this Commonwealth who has suffered grievous injury (or death) at the hands of State or municipal employees in circumstances such as these should be told that the violation of his or her civil rights is unworthy of consideration or redress.”)

SECOND CIRCUIT

United States v. Hagood, 78 F.4th 570, 585-86 (2d Cir. 2023) (Calabresi, J., dissenting) (“As I have written elsewhere, the exclusionary rule, though seemingly needed to control police misbehavior, has been the primary source of acceptance of dubious justifications of police playing hunches that turn out right. See Guido Calabresi, The Exclusionary Rule, 26 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol’y 111 (2003). Moreover, hunches that turn out wrong are rarely challenged. See, e.g., Joanna C. Schwartz, Civil Rights Without Representation, 64 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 641, 650 (2023) (illustrating, via interviews with civil rights attorneys, that they will ‘only accept cases with horrific facts [and] serious injuries’ and will turn down cases where they ‘cannot prove substantial medical costs or other damages’). This is not surprising since the dubious doctrine of qualified immunity makes such suits very likely to fail. See, e.g., Penate v. Sullivan, 73 F.4th 10, 18–20, 22 (1st Cir. 2023). . . . Unlike what happens under qualified immunity, the bad hunch under the writs of assistance was very costly to the searching officer and the government. Ultimately, if, as some have estimated, more than ninety percent of today’s hunches turn out wrong, . . . one might well think that the old English model would do a far better job of controlling police behavior than what we do today. After all, knowing that he could be liable for trespass, ‘no sensible ... officer would dare to search on a mere whim, thereby putting himself at risk of ruinous liability.’ . . . And, as is most likely, if the government indemnified the officers, the government would have a very strong incentive to find ways of controlling bad officer hunches. Let me be clear. I am not suggesting that we adopt such a rule. The rule creates a significant moral hazard: if officers behaving badly risked paying damages, they might be tempted to lie about their behavior. Officers who searched unsuccessfully might lie about finding evidence of a crime if their own liability was on the line. And that, since it would lead to innocent people being jailed, could be even worse than what happens now. Still, our nation's beginnings do suggest that our current exclusionary-rule/qualified-immunity scheme is deeply wrong. . . . I have elsewhere written criticizing the effect of the exclusionary rule on privacy and, there, as an academic, I offered a typically academic solution. Calabresi, The Exclusionary Rule, 26 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 111 (2003). My role as a judge, however, is not to advocate for a particular a solution. Rather, it is to say that our current precedents—in which courts again and again tie themselves in knots to hold that the fruits of officers' hunches cannot be suppressed when they turn out to be right—does not work and that we have to do better. . . I can only hope that sometime soon, after careful academic research, the legislative, judicial, and executive branches will come up with a way of controlling police behavior that is not as fruitless and offensive as what governs our law today!")

McKinney v. City of Middletown, 49 F.4th 730, 756-58 & n.9 (2d Cir. 2022) (Calabresi, J., dissenting) (Appendix) ("I dissent in this case because, as a prior panel held, a jury could find that the officers' use of force was excessive and because at least two such possible uses of excessive force violated clearly established law. But I would be remiss in not adding briefly why we should not be here at all, why the doctrine of qualified immunity—misbegotten and misguided—should go.⁹ [fn. 9: In its answer to my dissent, the majority takes issue with what I say about qualified immunity. That is certainly its right. Qualified immunity is the law and, unless and until the Supreme Court, Congress, or both alter that doctrine, I am bound by it. Therefore, in this appendix to my dissent I do what the majority suggests should be done and appeal to Congress. But I also appeal to the Supreme Court. Qualified immunity being a court-made doctrine, such an appeal is clearly proper as well. Stare decisis has its weight, but the Supreme Court is quite capable of overturning its past holdings when it has been convinced that they are wrong.] As scholars have made clear, and more and more judges have come to recognize, qualified immunity cannot withstand scrutiny.[collecting opinions and articles critical of the qualified immunity doctrine] The Supreme Court has offered two sets of justifications for adhering to qualified immunity: the first is wrong, and the second, to the extent it addresses a real problem, supports the wrong solution. First, the Court has sometimes grounded qualified immunity in what they said was the common law background to the statute imposing liability on state actors. . . But scholars have demonstrated that there was no common law background that provided a generalized immunity that was anything like qualified immunity. See Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Calif. L. Rev. at 55–61; Schwartz, The Case Against Qualified Immunity, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. at 1802; see also William Baude, Is Quasi-Judicial Immunity Qualified Immunity?, 74 Stan. L. Rev. Online 115, 124–25 (2022) (discussing Scott A. Keller, Qualified and Absolute Immunity at Common Law, 73 Stan. L. Rev. 1337 (2021)); see also Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity's Flawed Foundation, 111 Calif. L. Rev. 101, 165–87 (forthcoming). Second, the Court has turned more and more to justifying qualified immunity as good policy, even if Congress didn't enact it. In particular, the Court has argued that qualified immunity strikes a balance between 'the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably.’. But there is every reason to doubt that the Court’s created immunity from suit strikes the right balance. . . Much of the defense of qualified immunity focuses on the harm liability would do to individual officers. . . But, in fact, qualified immunity is largely irrelevant to officers’ individual financial liability. In general, individual officers do not pay for their defense or damages if a judgment is entered against them: indemnification is the general rule, and officers rarely pay anything. . . Moreover, as to any possible concerns about officer distraction due to the possibility of liability, there is a long-recognized better solution: formally make the employer the defendant and the only one who pays. Employer liability is the rule in most every other area of tort law, and it makes good sense. . . And sole employer liability is the rule as to federal employees acting in the scope of employment. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1346(b)(1), 2679(b)(1). And that also makes good sense: the employer is better positioned to prevent future misconduct and mistakes and to ensure violations of constitutional rights do not go uncompensated. See Kimberly Kindy, Insurers Force Change on Police Departments Long Resistant to It, Wash. Post (Sept. 14, 2022), <https://www.washingtonpost.com/investigations/interactive/2022/police-misconduct-insurance-settlements-reform> (describing how insurance companies are leading to better police practices through pressures on municipalities); see also, Harper, James, and Gray, The Law of Torts, § 29.15A; S. Rep. No. 93-588 (1973), as reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2789, 2790–91 (discussing need for government liability for intentional torts by federal law enforcement officers to ensure recovery). With the employer as the only defendant, there is absolutely no reason to make anything like qualified immunity an impediment to claims. . . Once that is done, we can engage in a serious discussion of when it is appropriate for defendant payment and victim compensation to occur. The standards for liability and compensation need not be the same as those that govern master-servant liability in ordinary tort law. But, in any case, the discussion should center on the real issue, on when we want a city or state to pay an injured victim, and not on the false issue of when officer liability is appropriate. The Supreme Court should do away with this ill-founded, court-made doctrine, and Congress should take up the important challenge of ensuring effective law enforcement, deterring misconduct, and providing for those injured while giving municipalities and states protections that might be appropriate.”)

But see McKinney v. City of Middletown, 49 F.4th 730, 746-49 (2d Cir. 2022) (“The dissent goes on to announce that the doctrine of qualified immunity is ‘misbegotten and misguided’ and should be overruled entirely. . . As the dissent agrees, we must apply the applicable precedents regardless of the arguments against maintaining those precedents. . . But we do not have as much confidence in those arguments as the dissent evidently does. First, the dissent asserts that, at the time § 1983 was enacted, the common law did not recognize ‘anything like qualified immunity,’ which renders the doctrine an illegitimate judicial invention. . . Some commentators support this view. . . But other commentators have concluded that historical sources ‘refute’ that position and ‘confirm[] that the common law around 1871 did recognize a freestanding qualified immunity protecting all government officers’ discretionary duties.’. . A survey of state tort cases and tort treatises from the mid-1800s concludes that ‘executive officials’ discretionary duties entailed a freestanding qualified immunity that plaintiffs could overcome only with clear evidence of subjective improper purpose.’. . We do not enter this debate over official immunities in 1871 except to note that the historical record ‘should give some pause’ to those ready to adopt the dissent’s approach without engaging in ‘additional historical examination and analysis.’. . In our system, ‘something more than ambiguous historical evidence is required before [the Supreme Court] will flatly overrule a number of major decisions.’. . Here, ‘the history is murky, which, under the law of precedent, counsels in favor of the status quo.’. . Second, the dissent derides qualified immunity as a ‘court-made doctrine.’. . But the reconsideration even of a court-made doctrine must account for the full extent of judicial intervention. In the case of qualified immunity, that analysis must include the possible court-made expansion of liability under § 1983. Justice Scalia, who also questioned whether qualified immunity was consistent with the common law, recognized this connection:

[O]ur treatment of qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 has not purported to be faithful to the common-law immunities that existed when § 1983 was enacted, and that the statute presumably intended to subsume. That is perhaps just as well. The § 1983 that the Court created in 1961 bears scant resemblance to what Congress enacted almost a century earlier. I refer, of course, to the holding of Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961), which converted an 1871 statute covering constitutional violations committed “under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State,” into a statute covering constitutional violations committed without the authority of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State, and indeed even constitutional violations committed in stark violation of state civil or criminal law. ... Monroe changed a statute that had generated only 21 cases in the first 50 years of its existence into one that pours into the federal courts tens of thousands of suits each year, and engages this Court in a losing struggle to prevent the Constitution from degenerating into a general tort law. ... Applying normal common-law rules to the statute that Monroe created would carry us further and further from what any sane Congress could have enacted.

Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 611 (1998) (Scalia, J., dissenting) (citations omitted). The dissent, in contrast to Justice Scalia, proposes a ‘one-sided approach to qualified immunity’ that ‘abandons the defense without also reconsidering the source and scope of officers’ liability in the first place.’. . . Third, the dissent insists that because ‘indemnification is the general rule, and officers rarely pay anything,’ there is no good policy reason for qualified immunity. . . But even assuming that indemnification is as universal as the dissent posits, . . . the pocketbooks of individual officers are not the only interests at stake. The doctrine of qualified immunity ‘reflects concerns about the states’ ability to enforce their laws without undue federal interference.’. . It ‘acts to safeguard government, and thereby to protect the public at large, not to benefit its agents.’. . . If almost all state officials are indemnified, then altering the doctrine would have significant consequences for state and local governments. ‘[E]very state has adopted and retained individualized statutory indemnification schemes against the uniform backdrop of qualified immunity’s existence.’. . In the absence of qualified immunity, ‘state and local governments operating in competitive employment markets would either pay officers more (to offset the increased risk of judgments) or require officers to do less (to eliminate the risk). In this way, overruling qualified immunity would not simply affect individual officers; it would affect the states as states.’. These reliance interests recommend adherence to stare decisis. . . Stare decisis ‘carries enhanced force’ when, as in the case of qualified immunity under § 1983, the relevant precedent ‘interprets a statute.’. . In such cases, ‘unlike in the context of constitutional interpretation, the legislative power is implicated, and Congress remains free to alter what we have done.’. . The dissent is unhappy with the state of our law, but ‘[t]he good news for anyone outraged by this state of affairs is that the American people have a remedy. Congress decides what our laws shall be.’. . And that is true of the statute we apply today.”)

United States v. Weaver, 9 F.4th 129, 175-77, 182-83 (2d Cir. 2021) (en banc) (Calabresi, J., joined by Pooler and Chin, JJ., dissenting) (“Persons wrongly seized or searched may well not know that they can bring a lawsuit, or they may be too disaffected to sue. But even if they go to a lawyer, the lawyer will tell them—ah yes, you have been mistreated, but you won’t recover; the case is fairly close and so the officer would surely have qualified immunity. . . Sue if you want, but I can’t take your case on a contingent fee because the odds are too great that, though the police behavior was wrong, the issue is a close one and therefore, under current precedents, we won’t win. And, by the way, you most likely will not even get a decision on whether the behavior was wrong, because the court is unlikely to reach that question given the operation of qualified immunity. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (eliminating the requirement that courts first decide whether a public official’s conduct violated the Constitution before reaching qualified immunity). There may well be thousands of situations in which a search or seizure like the one before us today turned up nothing. But hardly any will get to court. And even these will almost always get decided against the person subjected to potential police misconduct because of qualified immunity. This, then, is the cognitive problem our jurisprudence has created. In the relatively few cases of potentially unreasonable police behavior that come before us, the police have found something criminal, leaving us understandably predisposed to think that their suspicion was indeed reasonable. That predisposition is magnified by the exclusionary rule’s all-or-nothing stakes—limit police behavior only by releasing a wrongdoer—and results in a body of deferential, ‘close case’ precedents. These precedents in turn, and through qualified immunity, keep those cases—which might otherwise afford an opportunity to address potential police misconduct and vindicate Fourth Amendment rights—out of our sight. The cognitive bias created by the exclusionary rule and qualified immunity might not be so atrocious if courts had a way of cutting through it—if, perhaps, they understood directly and emotionally, from personal experience, the perspective of those innocents who are improperly and humiliatingly searched or seized. But we judges, and our children, families, and friends, are not likely to be the ones whom the police decide to search on a hunch, or simply because we looked at an unmarked car with tinted windows and pulled up our pants. We are not likely to be stopped for failing to signal at the correct time. And we are most unlikely to be made to bend over, spread eagled against the trunk of a car, even if stopped. Indeed, much as ordinary observers might, we judges, too, are likely to conceive of police misconduct as something that happens to others and not to us. This, in turn, makes it much easier to accept police conduct that is pretextual—in other words, not honest—simply because it also serves a useful purpose. That is one of the terrible problems with Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 116 S.Ct. 1769, 135 L.Ed.2d 89

(1996). Whren excuses an officer's stop of a car for a traffic infraction even when the traffic infraction is not the real reason for the stop. In other words, it permits pretextual stops, and—as such—it inevitably encourages stereotyping. When a pretextual stop results in the discovery of criminal activity—as it did here—we might feel that, on balance, such tactics are worth a cost that seems, to us, 'de minimis.' One fewer crook, one fewer gun, one fewer vial of cocaine on the streets. But such a rationalization is only possible because we ourselves do not feel the cost of that bargain. We are not the ones who are stopped and made to spread eagle. The price for what we believe to be greater public safety will be borne disproportionately by 'them,' whoever 'they' may be. As a result, we are only willing to say, 'stop,' in those situations in which the challenged police practices are ones that might make us the subjects of police actions. . . Do not misunderstand me. I am not saying the police are acting out of racist motives. Whren says that would violate the Equal Protection Clause. The police are trying to catch crooks. And they are permitted to use the most dubious of tactics not because courts are racist but because courts are 'care-less.' That is, we do not see, and so do not care, because we intuit that that kind of search or seizure won't happen to us. . . . The law in this area must balance the extremely important interest in police safety with the constitutionally mandated protection of citizens from demeaning and offensive searches and seizures. That balance is what the Fourth Amendment's requirement of reasonableness demands of us. I believe that the interplay of the exclusionary rule, qualified immunity, and the difficulty of envisioning ourselves in situations that, as a practical matter, are unlikely to affect us, has led courts to strike that balance in a most unfortunate way. I recognize that where that balance has been struck in previous cases makes this case a close one. Nevertheless, I believe the district court and the en banc majority have erred in both going beyond existing law and in reading too broadly what existing law requires. There is nothing in Whren and its sequelae that keeps us from requiring the district court to consider the pretextual nature of an original traffic stop when evaluating an officer's subsequent testimony as to whether ambiguous acts bespeak danger. And existing law, in other circuits and suggested by the Supreme Court, requires that demeaning additional seizures, such as entailed by orders to spread eagle, be justified on the basis of evidence then available. Because the district court failed to do either examination, and because the majority of this court affirms that failure, I respectfully but sadly dissent. I would vacate and remand the district court's judgment and order it to consider whether there was in fact sufficient, believable evidence, available at the time the order to spread eagle was issued, to justify ordering Weaver to so demean himself.")

See also United States v. Weaver, 9 F.4th 129, 184-86 (2d Cir. 2021) (en banc) (Chin, J., joined by Calabresi and Pooler, JJ., dissenting) ("It is apparent that from the moment they first saw him, the police officers were suspicious of Weaver, a Black man wearing a hoodie, even though he did not appear to be doing anything remotely illegal. They had a hunch that he was carrying a weapon or contraband or was otherwise up to no good, and while that hunch may have turned out to be correct, it was a hunch nevertheless. . . . And far more often, these hunches turn out to be baseless. . . . The officers here identified nothing particularized to warrant the intrusion on Weaver's liberty that followed, including ordering him to assume a demeaning spread-eagle position in the middle of a four-way street in full public view. . . . Judges Calabresi and Pooler have addressed a number of troubling concerns in their dissents, including the legacy of Whren v. United States . . . and pretextual stops; the notion that looking at an unmarked car allows a reasonable inference that a person is armed and dangerous; the use of the ‘high-crime area’ justification where reasonable suspicion is lacking; and the notion that an order to assume a spread-eagle position does not have certain Fourth Amendment implications. I share these concerns, and I join fully in their dissents. But even taking the law as it exists, without adopting any ‘novel’ theories of law, in my view the police officers here did not have reasonable suspicion that Weaver was armed and dangerous, and the police officers acted unreasonably in subjecting him to a spread-eagled search. . . . The majority makes the point that neither it nor the district court ‘even mention[s] Weaver’s race.’ . . . It concludes that there are ‘simply no grounds for believing that [Weaver’s race or racial bias] would have any bearing on the outcome of this case.’ . . . That race was not mentioned by the majority or the district court in their Fourth Amendment analyses does not mean that race did not impact the police officers’ actions. Was race a factor? Would the officers have considered Weaver’s staring at their car and hitching up his pants suspicious if he had been White? Would the officers have bothered to make a pretextual stop in the circumstances here -- stopping a car for failing to signal at least 100 feet before a corner where only a right turn could be made and the car did indeed signal once it reached the corner -- if the occupants of the vehicle had been White? Would the officers have ordered Weaver to exit the vehicle and assume a spread-eagle position with his hands against the trunk if Weaver had been White? Of course, we do not know for sure whether racial bias, implicit or otherwise, had any bearing on the outcome of the case. . . . We do know, however, that the officers repeatedly noted Weaver’s race and appearance in their contemporaneous reports as well as in their testimony. . . . We also know as a general matter that Blacks are stopped by police officers far more often than Whites . . . and that Blacks are arrested and incarcerated at far higher rates than Whites. . . . And we also know that the officers here grasped at straws, tugging at the thinnest of rationalizations -- including Weaver’s staring at their car, his hitching up of his pants, and the sedan’s failure to signal until it reached the corner -- to justify their actions. See Commonwealth v. Long, 485 Mass. 711, 152 N.E.3d 725, 735 (2020) (“This court has identified the discriminatory enforcement of traffic laws as particularly toxic. Years of data bear out what many have long known from experience: police stop drivers of color disproportionately more often than Caucasian drivers for insignificant violations (or provide no reason at all).” (internal quotation marks omitted)). I respectfully dissent.”)

Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975, at *2, *6-8, *11-13 (E.D.N.Y. June 26, 2018) (as amended) (Weinstein, J.) (“Qualified immunity is denied. Its grant, in the instant case, would be inconsistent with the purpose of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . The courts, police, and public, will benefit from a clarifying jury decision in this often replicated situation. . . . Qualified immunity has recently come under attack as over-protective of police and at odds with the original purpose of section 1983: ‘to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.’ . . . The Court’s expansion of immunity, specifically in excessive force cases, is particularly troubling. . . . The legal precedent and policy justifications of qualified immunity, it has been charged, fail to validate its expansive scope. The law, it is suggested, must return to a state where some effective remedy is available for serious infringement of constitutional rights. . . .The failure to address whether or not an act was constitutional prevents the creation of ‘clearly established’ law needed to guide law enforcement and courts on narrow issues not yet decided by the Supreme Court. . . . Although the Court is no longer constrained by a common law good faith defense, it continues to rely on the common law as precedent for granting immunity. . . . The Supreme Court’s recent emphasis on shielding public officials and federal and local law enforcement means many individuals who suffer a constitutional deprivation will have no redress; state governments are protected by sovereign immunity and municipalities are not liable under Monell unless individual liability can be first proven. . . . Courts should, when reasonable, follow Saucier’s guidance to first analyze whether a constitutional violation occurred, instead of skipping to whether the right at issue was ‘clearly established.’ . . . Turning to the application of qualified immunity, courts should, it has been suggested, return to the standard expressed in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and define ‘clearly established law’ at a ‘high level of generality.’ The key inquiry being whether officers are on ‘notice their conduct is lawful.’ . . . This allows courts to recognize ‘obvious’ constitutional violations, even if not yet specifically outlawed in a prior Supreme Court ruling. Such a standard is vital in a rapidly changing society, where any willing judge or jurist may distinguish precedent as not ‘clearly established’ because of slightly differing facts. . . . If courts, as instructed in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), decline to address constitutional issues by looking first to qualified immunity, and are instructed to rely on ‘existing precedent ... [established] beyond debate,’ government officials and officers may continue to operate in clear violation of constitutional standards without advise of what is constitutional and without fear of redress, because the law will continue to protect ‘all but the plainly incompetent.’ . . .The court declines to apply qualified immunity. Case precedent and policy rationale fail to justify an expansive regime of immunity that would prevent plaintiff from proving a serious constitutional violation.”)

THIRD CIRCUIT

Jefferson v. Lias, 21 F.4th 74, 87-94 (3d Cir. 2021) (McKee, J., with whom Restrepo and Fuentes, JJ., join, concurring) (“I join the Court’s opinion in its entirety and agree that we must vacate the District Court’s grant of summary judgment and remand for the reasons my colleagues explain. I write separately because I think it is important to explain that the deference to law enforcement that consistently results in qualified immunity in excessive force cases is inconsistent with the vast amount of research in such cases as well as the evolving national consensus of law enforcement organizations. . . . [G]iven numerous studies and policies of leading law enforcement organizations in the United States, including the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP), there is a growing consensus that it is simply unreasonable for officers to shoot at fleeing suspects. It stands to reason that police agencies like the IACP are much more aware than judges of the need to respect an individual officer’s ‘heat of the moment’ decision. Accordingly, as I will explain, given these studies and policies, it should by now be crystal clear that, except for a narrow set of circumstances that police agencies have already carefully defined, it is never reasonable for a police officer to open fire on a suspect fleeing in a motor vehicle. Far from being reasonable, it will almost always be reckless. And police recognize as much. . . . [I]n cases involving officers shooting at suspects fleeing in motor vehicles, one fact will be constant: opening fire creates a risk that police agencies themselves generally agree is almost always unreasonable; and it is a risk that is both unnecessary and avoidable. The chance of successfully apprehending the suspect in this manner is low and the risk to bystanders, including other police officers, is quite high. The low probability of hitting a moving target will therefore never justify the attendant risk, except in a narrow set of circumstances, which police agencies have already carefully defined. . . . Firearms are, of course, inherently lethal. Indeed, lethality is their very purpose. For reasons that should be readily apparent, the risk of lethality is especially high when an officer shoots at a fleeing suspect. Because of this high risk, a consensus has emerged among law enforcement agencies and police experts that is in tension with qualified immunity jurisprudence. This consensus is that, except for a very limited and identified set of circumstances, it is never reasonable for a police officer to shoot at a fleeing suspect. Courts need look no further than the National Consensus Policy and Discussion Paper on Use of Force to appreciate this. That is a model policy published by eleven ‘of the most significant law enforcement leadership and labor organizations in the United States,’ including the IACP and the Fraternal Order of Police[.] . . . This model policy bars police from firing at a suspect fleeing in a moving vehicle in almost all situations. . . . The narrow circumstances in which these organizations permit officers to even ‘consider’ shooting at a moving vehicle are limited to ‘when “a person in the vehicle is immediately threatening the officer or another person with deadly force by means other than the vehicle,” or when the vehicle is intentionally being used as a deadly weapon and “all other reasonable means of defense have been exhausted.”’ . . . It is realistic, practical, and reasonable to expect Officer Lias and police officers generally to be aware of the policy pronouncements of their own police departments. This is especially true given that qualified immunity jurisprudence currently rests on the faulty assumption that police are not only sufficiently informed about the maybe hundreds or even thousands of applicable court decisions, but also able to ‘assess, before acting, whether [these] prior court decisions clearly establish that their conduct would violate the Constitution.’ . . . This is little more than myth. Even a cursory examination would lead one to conclude that such an expectation is unrealistic, impractical, and unreasonable. . . . Yet, if we are to assume that police can stay abreast of the minutia of the law, then they certainly should be expected to know the policies of their own department as well as generally accepted police best practices. Not surprisingly, given the inaccuracy and danger endemic to shooting at moving vehicles, discussed in more detail below, some police departments have outright banned the practice. The New York City Police Department was likely one of the first to do so. It disallowed firing at a moving vehicle nearly half a century ago in 1972. . . . Since then, many other departments have enacted similar restrictions. . . . The Philadelphia Police Department policy, for example, prohibits the practice and explains why the prohibition is consistent with sound (i.e., ‘reasonable’) police practices. . . . Similarly, because of the high risk associated with shooting at a moving vehicle, the Chicago Police Department requires its officers to ‘move out of the vehicle’s path’ rather than shoot, even if the vehicle is headed right towards the officer. . . . The model policy on the use of force for police, mentioned above, similarly advises against discharging firearms at moving vehicles. . . . These policies and pronouncements illustrate how police departments across this country have essentially come to a consensus that shooting at fleeing suspects in vehicles is never reasonable and will always be very reckless, except for the rarest of circumstances specifically noted in those policies. The reasonableness standard by which we judge an officer's use of force should—at the very least—reflect and consider the stringency of these policies—promulgated by experts in policing and not by courts. . . . Examining the 'hit rates' of police officers supports the reasoning behind these policies and may well explain why police organizations have adopted them. Inquiries into reasonableness of force should consider the low rates of officers hitting their targets. Yet, even though police policies appear to consider this, courts do not even mention it. Despite most police officers receiving weapons training, . . . research shows that they are much more likely to miss their targets than to hit them. . . . Indeed, studies considering overall hit rates have consistently shown that police officers rarely achieve a 50% shooting-accuracy rate. . . . In a study examining the accuracy of 149 officer-involved shootings in the Dallas Police Department between 2003 and 2017, only 35% of rounds fired hit their targets. . . . Two conclusions follow from these and similar studies. First, the fleeing suspect will often not be apprehended, and others (including other officers) are placed in danger. . . . Second, if the suspect is fleeing in a car, and in the unlikely event that the officer does succeed in hitting the suspect, the officer creates an even deadlier risk to those nearby. The vehicle will be transformed into an out-of-control, 4,000-pound. . . 'unguided missile' careening through the street. . . . It should therefore not be surprising that a Department of Justice report concludes that shooting at moving vehicles 'creates greater risks than it eliminates.' . . . It is also no surprise that police agencies limit this use of deadly force to a very narrow set of carefully delineated circumstances discussed above, and then, only if 'all other reasonable means of defense have been exhausted.' . . . These studies reflecting a low level of accuracy are not outliers. Hit rates are consistently low among police departments. . . . As a more recent example, in 2019, officers in the Los Angeles Police Department hit their targets an underwhelming 28% of the time. . . . Between 1998 and 2006, the hit rate for the New York City Police Department averaged an even less impressive 18%. . . . To further compound this problem, police are even more likely to miss when their targets are moving. . . . This should not surprise anyone as common sense would suggest as much. Yet, in most cases involving qualified immunity and unnecessary force, the suspect will be moving away from the officer and doing so at considerable speed. One does not need to master Newton's laws of motion or probability theory to appreciate that all of these factors combine to greatly reduce the chances of apprehending a fleeing suspect by shooting at them. While the chances of a successful apprehension are extremely small, the concomitant risk to everyone in the vicinity, including other officers, is exceedingly high. Yet, the jurisprudence of qualified immunity in such cases consistently fails to address this reality. A reality which police are well aware of, have grappled with, and have taken steps to address. . . . It thus follows that the risk of danger and average hit rates associated with shooting at fleeing suspects should be part of the calculus when determining the reasonableness of an officer's use of force. It is simply no answer to this concern to merely defer to the officer on the scene because of the need for 'heat of the moment' decisions. Surely, the police agencies that have adopted the policies discussed above are much more aware than judges of the need to respect an individual officer's 'heat of the moment' decision. . . . The circumstances that justify the risk are encapsulated in these agencies' applicable policies. . . . Therefore, when an officer discharges a firearm at a suspect fleeing in a motor vehicle, as Officer Lias did here, the law needs to recognize that except in the rarest of circumstances (which have been delineated by police experts) it will be an unreasonable use of force to shoot at the fleeing suspect. . . Before concluding, it is worth noting that my colleagues' explanation of the dissimilarities between the circumstances here and those in Bland v. City of Newark further illustrates why so many researchers and law enforcement organizations now conclude that, except in very narrow circumstances not present here, it will always be unreasonable for police to shoot at a fleeing suspect. . . In Bland, in discussing the first encounter with the fleeing suspect, we noted: 'During this encounter, the six state troopers fired a total of 28 shots, none of which hit Bland.' . It is both understandable and reasonable that courts should give great deference to the need for split-second decisions in a qualified immunity analysis arising from allegations of excessive force. It is neither understandable nor reasonable for the law to continue to turn a blind eye to the fact that police agencies themselves have condemned the use of deadly force in certain situations. Nor is it understandable or reasonable for the law to continue to reward a police officer who ignores policy (or the risk inherent in discharging a firearm) with the cloak of qualified immunity. The law's failure to consider police agencies' own disavowal of deadly force in certain situations, while purporting to defer to the realities and needs of law enforcement, has birthed a cruel and unjust irony. As Justice Sotomayor so aptly wrote, the approach to qualified immunity has become so one-sided that it has 'transform[ed] the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers, gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment.' . The paradox that has evolved is that the perceived need to defer to the split-second decisions of trained professionals that is endemic to the jurisprudence in this area has failed to recognize the collective judgments of those very professionals and their administrative and governing agencies. I can only hope that this divergence will soon come to an end, so that the considered judgment of police agencies and the law of deadly force can coalesce into a more realistic legal framework: one that would allow those who deserve redress to get it without having to penetrate the practically impenetrable wall of qualified immunity.'") Diamond v. Pennsylvania State Education Association, 972 F.3d 262, 273-85 (3d Cir. 2020) (Fisher, J., concurring in the judgment) ("In April 1871, Congress passed, and President Grant signed, an extraordinary act, variously called the Ku Klux Klan Act, Third Force Act, or Civil Rights Act of 1871. On its face, the first section of that act—what we now know as 42 U.S.C. § 1983—provided its violators no immunities from or defenses to liability. . . Of course, the Supreme Court has since read immunities and defenses into § 1983, but it has done so principally on the conceit that they were available at common law in 1871, and implicitly incorporated into the statute. While this approach certainly limits the scope of liability, it also constrains judges from straying too far from the statutory text. In only one context has the Court invented a freestanding defense: the qualified immunity of certain state officials. Whatever might be said for that doctrine—and it is increasingly under scrutiny—I believe that the precedent of neither the Supreme Court nor our own Court warrants another divergence from the common-law approach in the present context. And however strongly considerations of equality and fairness might recommend such action, it is beyond our remit to invent defenses to § 1983 liability based on our views of sound policy. I must, therefore, respectfully disagree with the reasoning of JUDGE RENDELL's opinion announcing the Court’s judgment. Nevertheless, I concur in the affirmance of the District Courts’ orders. There was available in 1871, in both law and equity, a well-established defense to liability substantially similar to the liability the unions face here. Courts consistently held that judicial decisions invalidating a statute or overruling a prior decision did not generate retroactive civil liability with regard to financial transactions or agreements conducted, without duress or fraud, in reliance on the invalidated statute or overruled decision. Because this defense comports with the history and purposes of § 1983, I conclude that it is available to the unions here and supports the dismissal of the plaintiffs’ complaints. . . . Early on, the Court did refer to the common law. In Pierson, which concerned common-law and § 1983 claims against police officers, the Court held that because ‘the defense of good faith and probable cause’ was ‘[p]art of the background of tort liability[] in the case of police officers making an arrest,’ it was available to the officers in the § 1983 action as well as the common-law action. . . . Soon, however, as it confronted cases involving other executive officials, the Court generalized this defense without regard to its common-law moorings. ‘[T]he relevant question’ became ‘whether [the official] “knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of [the plaintiff], or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury to [the plaintiff].”’ . . . This drift culminated in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982), where ‘the Court completely reformulated qualified immunity along principles not at all embodied in the common law[.] . . . The Court abandoned any reference to a subjective good-faith standard, noting that such ‘[i]nquiries ... can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.’ . . . Instead, the question was now purely one of objective reasonableness, and it would apply ‘across the board,’ . . . to all ‘government officials performing discretionary functions[.]’ . . . JUDGE RENDELL’s opinion suggests that in rejecting the application of qualified immunity, Wyatt opened the door to another freestanding, judge-made defense. In my view, however, Wyatt stands for the proposition that the common-law approach must guide any limitation on private-party liability under § 1983. . . . In what follows, I describe an alternative basis for a defense, well established at both common law and equity in 1871, and providing a closer similarity to the facts that we confront. Resolving these cases on this ground would both avoid the knotty problems raised by a most-analogous-tort test and preserve the notion, accepted by six Justices in Wyatt, that Harlow was an exception that should not swallow the common-law rule. Indeed, in my view, that latter benefit is especially compelling, given the recent cogent critiques of qualified immunity as incongruent with the principles of statutory interpretation. See, e.g., Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1871-72 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment); Baxter v. Bracey, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1864 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari); William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Calif. L. Rev. 45 (2018). . . . When Congress in 1871 enacted the law that became § 1983, it was well established at both law and equity that court decisions that invalidated a statute or overruled a prior decision, and thereby affected transactional relationships—between private parties and government officials or representatives, or between private parties alone—established in reliance on that statute or decision, did not generate civil liability for repayment except where duress or fraud was present. Whatever the nature of the state action in the present cases—whether the state ‘act[ed] jointly with’ the unions or ‘compel[led] the [unions] to' collect the fees, . . . the factual circumstances underlying this doctrine bear a substantial similarity to those we confront here. Therefore, in my view the doctrine constitutes 'a previously existing, independent legal basis' sufficient to limit the unions' liability under § 1983. . . I know of no authority on '§ 1983's history or purposes' that might 'counsel against' recognition of this defense, . . . and the consistency of its application in law and equity safely permits the conclusion that Congress did not wish to 'impinge' on it 'by covert inclusion in the general language' of § 1983[.] . . It may be tempting, in cases like the present, to read precedent broadly, or appeal to freestanding principles such as the rule of law and basic notions of fairness. But we must interpret and apply § 1983 as we would any other statute, always prepared for the faithful execution of that duty to result in a seemingly extreme outcome. For even when that does not occur, there is value in adhering to the well-established principles of interpretation. Because the plaintiffs in these cases have not pleaded any facts, suggesting that their payments were either sufficiently involuntary or exacted on a fraudulent basis, . . . to permit a reasonable person to infer that the unions might be liable, I concur in the affirmance of the orders granting the unions' motions to dismiss.") Yost*, 63 F.4th 211, 226 n.12 (3d Cir. 2023) (collecting cases and articles). Recent scholarship has cast serious doubt on core premises underpinning the doctrine. See, e.g., Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity's Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 609-611 (2021) (finding that "qualified immunity doctrine does not accurately reflect how officers are educated about court opinions or the role these opinions play in officers' decisionmaking"); Alexander A. 'Reconsidering whether the doctrine should continue in its current form, however, is not within [this court's] purview.' Mack, 63 F.4th at 226.")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

<https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/2020/06/12/judge-i-have-follow-supreme-court-it-should-fix-this-mistake/> Judge Wynn (4th Cir.) ("Eliminating the defense of qualified immunity would improve our administration of justice and promote the public's confidence and trust in the integrity of the judicial system.")

But see Franklin v. City of Charlotte, 64 F.4th 519, 539-40 (4th Cir. 2023) (Wilkinson, J., concurring) ("I am pleased to concur in Chief Judge Gregory's fine opinion. I see nothing to dispel the impression that the police officers in this case were proceeding in good faith to discharge their duties. The test, however, is not one of subjective good faith but rather of objective reasonableness, and the confluence of the multiple factors the Chief Judge details warrants sending this case to a jury. In particular, the substantial evidence as to Franklin's passive demeanor throughout could lead a jury to conclude that his shooting was objectively disproportionate to any threat he posed. The understandable grief and outrage that has greeted unjustified police shootings and chokings has unfortunately been accompanied by a less understandable desire to impair the foundations of effective police work, most notably that of Qualified Immunity. Voices beyond number have urged the elimination of this doctrine. I write briefly to say it would be wrong to draw from this case a forecast of Qualified Immunity's demise. The immunity to be afforded is only qualified. Given the gravity of a police shooting, affording absolute immunity would be unthinkable. By the same token, the deprivation of even Qualified Immunity would be equally indefensible and deny officers the benefit of a discretionary call where their own lives may be on the line. Thus Qualified Immunity, far from being 'pro-police,' represents nothing more than a tenable compromise. The judicial process and law enforcement organizations have such different dynamics. The judicial process, thankfully, is deliberative. The law enforcement function is, often necessarily, reactive. The chance to deliberate, though essential, brings with it a temptation to second-guess. Qualified Immunity places a brake upon the judgment that days and hours may impose upon minutes and seconds, thus assuring that the different rhythms of the chambers and the street may be fruitfully reconciled. The touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is, of course, one of 'reasonableness.' And reasonableness in turn presupposes a variety of perspectives. One person's reason may be another's rashness. Qualified Immunity accommodates the fact that different eyes can see reason in different ways, thus preserving the anomaly that reasonable mistakes are not invariably actionable ones. . . The slogan 'law and order' emerged as a response to the apparent disorder of the 1960s. Many came to view the catchy phrase as repressive, and truth be known, 'order and opportunity' or 'ordered liberty,' . . . would have been a fairer, if less politically effective, way to go. 'Order' should, however, be a part of any formulation, because it is the gateway to the environment that upcoming generations will need to make the most of their lives. Qualified Immunity recognizes the indispensable nature of effective police work in preserving the order that removes the regimes of predation that would otherwise plague a community. While I support the denial of Qualified Immunity in the particular circumstances of this very close case, the demise of this important doctrine would be an incalculable social loss, one which the varied stakeholders in this wonderfully diverse country would come to regret.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Hall v. Trochessett, 105 F.4th 335, 343-45 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Hall argues that a reasonable officer in Trochessett's position would have known that probable cause did not exist because of the speech-only defense. This Court has held that the speech only defense exists pursuant to § 38.15. Voss v. Goode, 954 F.3d 234, 239 (5th Cir. 2020). This Court has further held, though, that an arrestee's command to another to disobey a police officer's lawful order does not fall within the speech defense. . . The facts show that Hall told Trochessett three times that his wife was not going to provide the requested information. Hall also instructed his wife not to comply with the requests of Trochessett, which led to her going inside the house and shutting the door on Trochessett. Thus, an officer in Trochessett's position could reasonably believe that Appellant's conduct did not fall within the speech defense. Accordingly, even if Hall's actions did fall within the clearly established law of the speech defense, which the facts indicate they did not, then Trochesset is still shielded by the independent intermediary doctrine. Thus, Hall has failed to state plausible claims against Trochesset that overcome his qualified immunity defense. . . . Hall argues that qualified immunity is a 'legal fiction' that came from a faulty interpretation of Section 1983 and describes modern qualified immunity as 'countertextual'. Specifically, Appellant states that decisions that are not the type of 'split-second, heat-of-the-moment choices' made by officers in a dangerous situation should not be afforded the same protections. Hall asserts that Trochesset had ample time to check the legality of his actions in this case and therefore should not avoid liability because he chose not to do so. Trochesset urges that this Panel should not exercise authority to overrule Supreme Court precedent to abolish the doctrine of qualified immunity. He argues that qualified immunity is an element of a claim against an executive branch official and should not be eliminated by any appellate court. Trochesset's argument is correct, and this Panel will continue to employ the use of the doctrine of qualified immunity. This panel is bound by the Fifth Circuit rule of orderliness, 'that one panel of this court may not overturn another panel's decision, absent an intervening change in the law, such as by a statutory amendment, or the Supreme Court, or en banc court.'") Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 94 F.4th 374, 406-09 & n.14 (5th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Willett, J., joined by Elrod, Graves, Higginson, Ho, and Douglas, JJ., dissenting), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663 (2024) (per curiam) ("For many of the reasons persuasively penned by my dissenting colleagues, I agree that the district court erred by dismissing Villarreal's claims on qualified-immunity grounds. I write separately to underscore three brief points. First, one of the justifications so frequently invoked in defense of qualified immunity—that law enforcement officers need 'breathing room' to make 'split-second judgments'—is altogether absent in this case. This was no fast-moving, high-pressure, life-and-death situation. Those who arrested, handcuffed, jailed, mocked, and prosecuted Priscilla Villarreal, far from having to make a snap decision or heat-of-the-moment gut call, spent several months plotting Villarreal's takedown, dusting off and weaponizing a dormant Texas statute never successfully wielded in the statute's near-quarter-century of existence. This was not the hot pursuit of a presumed criminal; it was the premeditated pursuit of a confirmed critic. Also, while the majority says the officers could not have 'predicted' that their thought-out plan to lock up a citizen-journalist for asking questions would violate the First Amendment—a plan cooked up with legal advice from the Webb County District Attorney's Office, mind you—the majority simultaneously indulges the notion that Villarreal had zero excuse for not knowing that her actions might implicate an obscure, never-used provision of the Texas Penal Code. In other words, encyclopedic jurisprudential knowledge is imputed to Villarreal, but the government agents targeting her are free to plead (or feign) ignorance of bedrock constitutional guarantees. In the upside-down world of qualified immunity, everyday citizens are demanded to know the law's every jot and tittle, but those charged with enforcing the law are only expected to know the 'clearly established' ones. Turns out, ignorance of the law is an excuse—for government officials. Such blithe 'rules for thee but not for me' nonchalance is less qualified immunity than unqualified impunity. The irony would be sweet if Villarreal’s resulting jailtime were not so bitter, and it lays bare the ‘fair warning’ fiction that has become the touchstone of what counts as ‘clearly established law.’ Second, just as officers can be liable for enforcing an obviously unconstitutional statute, they can also be liable for enforcing a statute in an obviously unconstitutional way. The majority opinion seems to rest its holding on the principle that the officers reasonably presumed that Penal Code § 39.06 was constitutional. Whatever one might think of that principle or the majority’s application of it, ending the analysis there stops a half-step short. It does not account for the possibility—indeed, the real-world certainty—that government officials can wield facially constitutional statutes as blunt cudgels to silence speech (and to punish speakers) they dislike, here in a vengeful, calculated fashion, including months to consult legal counsel. So while we may not impute to officers the foreknowledge of what a federal court may later say, neither should we impute to officers the ignorance of what the First Amendment already says. Third, this case illustrates (again) the one-sidedness of the modern immunity regime. The plain text of § 1983 declares that government officials ‘shall be liable’ for violating the Constitution if they were acting ‘under color of any [state] statute.’ But in the majority’s view, the officers evade liability under § 1983 precisely because they were acting pursuant to a state statute. However erroneous that holding might be under Monroe v. Pape, it would not be quite so discomfiting were it not for the fact that courts have also engrafted onto § 1983 assorted made-up defenses that cannot possibly be squared with the statutory text.¹⁴ [fn. 14: The most glaring made-up defense is the ‘clearly established law’ test, which collides head-on with § 1983’s broad and unqualified textual command. Even those who argue for some version of qualified immunity nevertheless disavow the clearly-established-law requirement. . . . Other recent scholarship casts doubt on qualified immunity’s entire historical underpinning. Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Cal. L. Rev. 201 (2023) (noting that § 1983’s originally passed language contained a ‘notwithstanding clause,’ now missing for unknown reasons, that explicitly negated all state-law defenses, making clear that § 1983 claims are viable notwithstanding ‘any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary’). Not all scholars are convinced, however, including a prominent academic critic of qualified immunity who suggests that the repeal of the ‘notwithstanding clause’ was a codifier’s error that Congress nevertheless ‘passed into law’ as part of the Revised Statutes of 1874. See William Baude, Codifiers’ Errors and 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Volokh Conspiracy (June 6, 2023), <https://reason.com/volokh/2023/06/12/codifiers-errors-and-42-u-s-c-1983/> (“This is a case where Congress itself passed a law that probably made a mistake, making substantive changes to the text when the revision was not supposed to.”). . . . But no matter where one falls on the scholarly debate surrounding the ‘notwithstanding clause,’ there really is no debate on the fundamental point that the ‘clearly established law’ test is untethered from § 1983’s text and history and nigh impossible to defend.] If nothing else, today’s decision underscores a striking statutory double standard: Judges read out text that is plainly there, and read in text that is plainly not—both for the benefit of rights-violating officials. Whatever the operative language of § 1983 says, or does not say, current judge-invented immunity doctrine seems hardwired—relentlessly so—to resolve these questions in one direction and one direction only. Counter-textual immunity is a one-way ratchet, and regrettably, today’s decision inflicts yet another wrong turn. I respectfully dissent.” [footnotes, other than fn. 14, omitted]]

Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 979-81 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willett, J., concurring), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 193 (2023) (“Today’s decision upholding qualified immunity is compelled by our controlling precedent. I write separately only to highlight newly published scholarship that paints the qualified-immunity doctrine as flawed—foundationally—from its inception. . . For more than half a century, the Supreme Court has claimed that (1) certain common-law immunities existed when § 1983 was enacted in 1871, . . . and (2) ‘no evidence’ suggests that Congress meant to abrogate these immunities rather than incorporate them. . . But what if there were such evidence? Indeed, what if the Reconstruction Congress had explicitly stated—right there in the original statutory text—that it was nullifying all common-law defenses against § 1983 actions? That is, what if Congress’s literal language unequivocally negated the original interpretive premise for qualified immunity? Professor Alexander Reinert argues precisely this in his new article, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation—that courts have been construing the wrong version of § 1983 for virtually its entire legal life. Wait, what? As passed by the Reconstruction Congress, Section 1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 (now colloquially known as § 1983) read this way:

[A]ny person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States, shall, any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary notwithstanding, be liable to the party injured in any action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.... .

The italicized language—the ‘Notwithstanding Clause,’ as Professor Reinert calls it—explicitly displaces common-law defenses. . . The language that Congress passed makes clear that § 1983 claims are viable notwithstanding ‘any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to contrary.’ The language is unsubtle and categorical, seemingly erasing any need for unwritten, gap-filling implications, importations, or incorporations. Rights-violating state actors are liable—period—notwithstanding any state law to the contrary. Then things went off the rails, quickly and stealthily. For reasons lost to history, the critical ‘Notwithstanding Clause’ was inexplicably omitted from the first compilation of federal law in 1874. . . The Reviser of Federal Statutes made an unauthorized alteration to Congress’s language. And that error was compounded when the various revised statutes were later published in the first United States Code in 1926. The Reviser’s error, whether one of omission or commission, has never been corrected. Today, 152 years after Congress enlisted the federal courts to secure Americans’ constitutional rights, if one were to Google ‘42 U.S.C. § 1983,’ the altered version that pops up says nothing about common-law defenses. According to Professor Reinert, that fateful, unexplained omission means that courts and scholars have never ‘grappled’ with the Notwithstanding Clause’s significance. . . All to say, the Supreme Court’s original justification for qualified immunity—that Congress wouldn’t have abrogated common-law immunities absent explicit language—is faulty because the 1871 Civil Rights Act expressly included such language. Those sixteen lost words, by presumably encompassing state common-law principles, undermine the doctrine’s long-professed foundation and underscore that what the 1871 Congress meant for state actors who violate Americans’ federal rights is not immunity, but liability—indeed, liability notwithstanding any state law to the contrary. . . These are game-changing arguments, particularly in this text-centric judicial era when jurists profess unswerving fidelity to the words Congress chose. Professor Reinert’s scholarship supercharges the critique that modern immunity jurisprudence is not just atextual but countertextual. That is, the doctrine does not merely complement the text—it brazenly contradicts it. In arguing that qualified immunity is flawed from the ground up, Professor Reinert poses a provocative question: ‘If a legislature enacts a statute, but no one bothers to read it, does it still have interpretive force?’. . . It seems a tall order to square the modern qualified-immunity regime with Congress’s originally enacted language. But however seismic the implications of this lost-text research, “[a]s middle-management circuit judges,” we cannot overrule the Supreme Court.’. . Only that Court can definitively grapple with § 1983’s enacted text and decide whether it means what it says—and what, if anything, that means for § 1983 immunity jurisprudence.”)

See also Hankins v. Wheeler, 109 F.4th 839, 845 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Hankins argues that qualified immunity should be unavailable as a defense to a Section 1983 action or, at a minimum, should not bar full discovery. He points to the recent revelation that Section 1983 as originally enacted contained a ‘Notwithstanding Clause’ that appears to abrogate common-law immunities. See Alexander Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Calif. L. Rev. 201, 207–08 (2023). As Judge Willett has explained, ‘[t]he Reviser of Federal Statutes made an unauthorized alteration to [that] language,’ which ‘was compounded when the various revised statutes were later published in the first United States Code’ and ‘has never been corrected.’ Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 980 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willett, J., concurring). Whatever its merit, the argument is foreclosed because ‘[o]nly th[e] [Supreme] Court can definitively grapple with § 1983’s enacted text and decide whether it means what it says—and what, if anything, that means for § 1983 immunity jurisprudence,’. . . and the Court has not done so.”)

Wearry v. Foster, 33 F.4th 260, 278-81 (5th Cir. 2022) (Ho., J., dubitante), reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, 52 F.4th 258 (2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 2459 (2023) (“Worthy civil rights claims are often never brought to trial. That’s because an unholy trinity of legal doctrines—qualified immunity, absolute prosecutorial immunity, and Monell v. Department of Social Services of City of New York, 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978)—frequently conspires to turn winnable claims into losing ones. This case illustrates that conspiracy in action. Under the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity, Wearry cannot bring suit against the prosecutor or the police officer who wrongly put him on death row. And that is so even if we assume (as we must at this stage) that the prosecutor and police officer engaged in a malicious campaign to coerce false testimony against him. Nor could Wearry sue the municipality that employed the prosecutor and police officer, because neither of them was operating pursuant to an official municipal policy or custom. . . The good news for anyone outraged by this state of affairs is that the American people have a remedy. Congress decides what our laws shall be. Courts merely interpret and apply those laws. So if a court applies a rule of law that seems wrong and unjust, the people can demand that the legislative branch fix it. In sum, Congress can abolish qualified immunity, absolute prosecutorial immunity, and Monell. And it can do so anytime it wants to. The bad news is that, although Congress can fix what ails us in cases like this, it shouldn't have to. Because Congress never enacted the immunities that would presume to stop us from deciding Wearry's claims. As the Constitutional Accountability Center observes in its amicus brief, courts should construe provisions 'in accordance with ... text and history.' So if we are going to recognize any immunities—notwithstanding the complete absence of any statutory text to support such immunities—at the very most we should recognize only those immunities that are 'so well established in the common law ... that the members of the 42nd Congress must have been aware of them and could not have meant to abrogate them by implication.' . . . In short, this is a problem of the courts' own making. Take the doctrine of qualified immunity. It requires civil rights plaintiffs to prove not only a violation of their constitutional rights, but a 'clearly established' one. But the 'clearly established' requirement lacks any basis in either the text or original understanding of § 1983. . . . The same can be said for absolute prosecutorial immunity. In 1871, when Congress enacted § 1983 into law, criminal cases were prosecuted by private parties, not public prosecutors. . . . So we must determine what immunities a modern public prosecutor might have enjoyed, had they existed back in 1871. There appear to be only two immunities at common law relevant to modern prosecutors: quasi-judicial immunity and defamation immunity. . . . And neither of those immunities was anywhere near as robust as absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . . Quasi-judicial immunity protected the 'quasi-judicial' acts of 'government servants'—'official acts involving policy discretion but not ... adjudication.' . . . So there's a good argument for extending quasi-judicial immunity to modern prosecutors today. . . . But at common law, quasi-judicial immunity could be defeated by a showing of malice. . . . And that is exactly what Wearry has alleged here—a malicious effort to falsify witness testimony against him in a capital murder trial. . . . Nor does defamation immunity save the prosecutor here. Defamation immunity insulates all statements made during court proceedings. But it applies only to defamation claims. . . . It does not shield prosecutors against malicious prosecution claims. . . . So the upshot is this: Under an originalist view of § 1983, we should presumably allow Wearry's claim to proceed to the merits. But the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity kills Wearry's suit. And if prosecutorial immunity didn't do the job, then qualified immunity presumably would. (And Wearry didn't even bother to sue the municipality, because Monell would have snuffed that claim out in an instant.) That's wrong. Wearry's complaint plainly alleges a bad faith, malicious violation of his constitutional rights. That should be enough under the text and original understanding of § 1983 to proceed to the merits—even assuming that courts should apply at least those immunities that existed in the common law at the time of enactment. . . . The majority says it is 'strange' to apply prosecutorial immunity here. . . . I agree. As explained, I'm skeptical about the doctrine of absolute prosecutorial immunity as an original matter. But a faithful reading of precedent requires us to grant it here, no matter how troubling I might personally find it. As a panel, we're duty-bound to follow precedent. And that means we're duty-bound to follow precedent, full stop—not just when it leads to results we like. . . . Our precedents apply absolute prosecutorial immunity in cases just like this. The panel majority has nevertheless decided to allow this suit to proceed to the merits. As an originalist, I may cheer this result. . . . But I doubt that our prosecutorial immunity precedent permits it.”)

Mayfield v. Currie, 976 F.3d 482, 488-93 (5th Cir. 2020) (Willett, J., concurring) (“Stating the correct outcome is easy in this case; untangling a knotty constitutional inquiry to arrive at that outcome, less so. Today’s bottom-line disposition is certainly correct: Reversing the denial of Officer Currie’s Malley-based motion to dismiss, and remanding the Franks issue. I write separately only to point out that the Mayfields have not shown any constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. . . . The court begins (and ends) its immunity analysis on ‘clearly established law’ grounds, declining to address—let alone determine—whether Officer Currie violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place. True, the Supreme Court has blessed our ‘sound discretion’ to pivot solely on prong two of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . And ‘clearly established law’ is often outcome-determinative. But just because we can jump straight to prong two without undertaking the nettlesome task of determining if anyone’s rights were violated doesn’t mean we should. Leapfrogging the constitutional merits does make for easier sledding. . . . But such skipping, jurists and scholars lament, leads to ‘ “constitutional stagnation”—fewer courts establishing law at all, much less clearly doing so.’ . . . The modern immunity regime, as with many judge-invented doctrines, could use greater precision. And one way to advance constitutional clarity is to give courts and public officials more matter-of-fact guidance as to what the law prescribes and proscribes. Yes, scrutinizing the alleged constitutional offense requires more work. More time. More resources. Overworked federal courts already resemble Lucy and Ethel in the chocolate factory. . . . But since we require plaintiffs to prove a violation of clearly established law, it seems only fair that we do our part in establishing what that law is. How can a plaintiff produce precedent if fewer courts are producing precedent? How can a plaintiff show a violation if fewer courts are showing what constitutes a violation? The result: Section 1983 meets Catch-22.... Important constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because no one’s answered them before. Courts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there’s no equivalent case on the books. No precedent = no clearly established law = no liability. An Escherian Stairwell. Heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses. . . . Ordinary citizens are told that ignorance of the law is no excuse. The judge-created rules of qualified immunity are, well, different. Accordingly, judges should, whenever possible, shrink the universe of uncertainty and ‘clearly establish’ which alleged misdeeds violate the law, and which do not, thus narrowing the presumed knowledge gap between those who enforce our laws and those who live under them. . . . Officer Currie is shielded from civil liability ‘insofar as [her] conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Specifically, the Mayfields must show: ‘(1) that [Officer Currie] violated a statutory or constitutional right, and (2) that the right was “clearly established” at the time of the challenged conduct.’ . . . As explained below, the Mayfields fall doubly short: There is no Fourth Amendment violation at all, clearly established or otherwise. . . . In sum, the record evidence establishes that the municipal court judge was presented with an arrest-warrant affidavit containing facts that were corroborated and supplemented by other arrest and search-warrant affidavits, which, considered together, establish probable cause and justify the warrant for Mr. Mayfield’s arrest. . . . Because the warrant was supported by probable cause, the Mayfields have not shown a constitutional violation. . . . Turning to the second issue—‘clearly established law’—the court rightly concludes that the Mayfields fail to establish that the alleged Fourth Amendment violation was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the challenged conduct. . . To be clearly established, a right must be sufficiently clear ‘that every “reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right.”’. . An officer is not eligible for qualified immunity under Malley when there is an ‘obvious failure of accurately presented evidence to support the probable cause required for the issuance of a warrant.’ . . . We have held the standard in Malley is not satisfied when an officer proffers a facially invalid warrant affidavit—one devoid of any facts—one that ‘states nothing more than the charged offense, accompanied by a conclusory statement’ that the individual committed the offense. . . . And, while we have held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity under Malley when the warrant was based solely on a skimpy affidavit, the burden is on the Mayfields to cite a case holding that the Fourth Amendment required the affidavit to establish probable cause on its own, without consideration of other supporting documents. . . They have not done so. . . The Supreme Court has explicitly recognized our discretion to address the qualified-immunity prongs in whatever order we choose. In my judgment, the development of the law is best served by undertaking, wherever possible, the threshold constitutional analysis. Respectfully, courts should attempt to provide greater judicial guidance at the outset, explaining whether a right was in fact violated, not merely whether a rights violation was clearly established. In any event, because the Mayfields have failed to show a constitutional violation, let alone a clearly established one, Officer Currie cannot be liable under Malley. And the court is right to remand the Franks issue so that the district court can tackle it in the first instance.”) Horvath v. City of Leander, Texas, 946 F.3d 787, 795, 800-03 (5th Cir. 2020) (Ho, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (“I would welcome a principled re-evaluation of our precedents under both prongs. . . The second prong has been widely criticized, and for good reason: Neither the text nor the original understanding of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 supports the ‘clearly established’ requirement. . . In addition, courts too often misuse the first prong, finding constitutional violations where none exist as an original matter. . . In sum, we grant immunity when we should deny—and we deny immunity when we should grant. But be that as it may, I am duty bound to faithfully apply established qualified immunity precedents, just as I am duty bound to faithfully follow Smith. I concur in the judgment in part and dissent in part. . . .The ‘clearly established’ requirement is controversial because it lacks any basis in the text or original understanding of § 1983. Nothing in the text of § 1983—either as originally enacted in 1871 or as it is codified today—supports the imposition of a ‘clearly established’ requirement. . . By contrast, Congress has expressly adopted a ‘clearly established’ requirement in other contexts. For example, in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Congress imposed special burdens on habeas petitioners who seek relief from convictions. AEDPA requires habeas petitioners not only to establish a violation of law, but to identify ‘clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.’ . . The qualified immunity doctrine imposes a similar ‘clearly established’ standard in § 1983 cases—but without any corresponding textual basis. That is troubling because, in other contexts, the Supreme Court has declined to read language into a statute if Congress explicitly included the same language in other statutes. . . Nor is there any other basis for imputing such a requirement to Congress, such as from the common law of 1871 or even from the early practice of § 1983 litigation. . . In sum, there is no textualist or originalist basis to support a ‘clearly established’ requirement in § 1983 cases. . . One of the primary justifications for the ‘clearly established’ requirement is that the fear of litigation not only deters bad conduct, but chills good conduct as well. That is a valid but, I believe, ultimately misplaced concern. For if courts simply applied the first prong of the doctrine in a manner more consistent with the text and original understanding of the Constitution, we might find that the second prong is unnecessary to prevent chilling, as well as unwarranted by the text. Law enforcement officials and other public officials who engage in misconduct should be held accountable. . . Public officials who violate the law without consequence ‘only further fuel public cynicism and distrust of our institutions of government.’ . . But there is also concern that the fear of litigation chills public officials from lawfully carrying out their duties. . . . Much of the chilling problem, however, stems from misuse of the first prong of the doctrine. Simply put, courts find constitutional violations where they do not exist. For example, the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit reasonable efforts to protect law-abiding citizens from violent criminals—it forbids only ‘unreasonable searches and seizures.’ . . As those words were understood at the time of the Founding, the Fourth Amendment allows police officers to take the steps necessary to apprehend and prevent felons from harming innocent citizens. . . So if chilling police conduct is the concern, there is no need for an atextual ‘clearly established’ requirement. The Constitution should be enough—if we get the substantive Fourth Amendment analysis right. Our court’s recent debates about qualified immunity illustrate this point. In Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464 (5th Cir. 2019), no member of our court claimed that the officers violated ‘clearly established’ law. We all agreed that the officers involved in the death of a suspected active shooter were entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong. . . What divided us was the first prong—whether the plaintiff established a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Four members of our court dissented from the denial of rehearing en banc, writing that, ‘[i]f we want to stop mass shootings, we should stop punishing police officers who put their lives on the line to prevent them’—echoing the same chilling concerns previously expressed by the Supreme Court. Winzer v. Kaufman County, 940 F.3d 900, 901 (5th Cir. 2019) (Ho, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc). But we did so under the first prong, not the second. . . So too in Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc). There we again divided over whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment—the first prong of the qualified immunity doctrine—in taking steps to prevent a distraught and armed teenager from shooting up a nearby school. . . Once again, so long as the substantive analysis under the first prong is right, there is no need for the second prong. . . . Smith does not foreclose Horvath’s Free Exercise claim against the city. But qualified immunity requires us to affirm the judgment as to the fire chief. I would vacate the judgment as to the Free Exercise claim against the city and remand to allow Horvath to proceed on that claim. I dissent in part for that reason. In all other respects, I concur in the judgment.”)

Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 474-81 (5th Cir. 2019) (on rehearing) (Willett, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (“The majority opinion correctly diagnoses Dr. Zadeh’s injury but refuses to prescribe a remedy: His rights were violated, but since the law wasn’t clearly established, Dr. Zadeh loses. I originally agreed with this violation-without-vindication result. . . But deeper study has convinced me that the officials' constitutional misstep violated clearly established law, not a previously unknown right. And it has reaffirmed my broader conviction that the judge-made immunity regime ought not be immune from thoughtful reappraisal. . . . Here, Texas officials gave Dr. Zadeh no time to question the subpoena's reasonableness. That's a violation. Plain and simple. . . . But there are exceptions to most every rule. Under the Supreme Court's 1981 decision in Burger, officials don't have to give people time to comply if:

- the business is part of a closely regulated industry;
- there's a substantial government interest;
- warrantless searches are necessary; and
- there's a 'constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.' . . .

This search whiffs two requirements. So I agree with the majority opinion: The Burger exception doesn't apply. Medical practices—including pain-management clinics—aren't 'closely regulated' industries. . . . In sum, the law strongly protects privacy in medicine. Pain management is a medical field. So pain-management clinics aren't closely regulated. Unfortunately, the majority opinion assumes without deciding that pain-management clinics are closely regulated. In doing so, the majority blurs constitutional contours. . . . Our legal system serves the public best when it provides clear rules, consistently applied—bright lines and sharp corners. We owe clarity to the courts below us, the litigants before us, and the cases beyond us. Thankfully, our court has at least established that medicine generally isn't closely regulated. . . . Setting aside the 'closely regulated' issue, the Burger exception still doesn't apply. The laws here aren't a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant. In Burger, the Court explained that a statute has to notify the public that the government can search on-demand. And it must limit officer discretion. These statutes neither notify nor limit. Here, the statutes don't notify business owners of on-demand searches. These statutes allow 'a reasonable time' to produce records. And they define 'reasonable time' as 'fourteen calendar days'; less only if there's an emergency or a risk 'that the records may be lost, damaged, or destroyed.' That's not notice of routine, on-the-spot searches. Lastly, the statutes don't limit officer discretion. The only limits: who can subpoena things (the Board); who the Board can subpoena (licensees); and what the Board can demand (medical records). But that's it. Otherwise, there's total discretion. Thus, the Burger exception doesn't apply. And so all that's left to decide is if the violation was clearly established. . . . The Supreme Court in See, Lone Steer, and Patel made clear the need for precompliance review of administrative subpoenas. That's controlling law. Summing up: The Board violated Dr. Zadeh's Fourth Amendment rights. No exception applies. And the law was clearly established. The state officials are thus not immune. On this basis alone, Dr. Zadeh deserves his day in court. . . . The majority concedes that the statutes here don't limit the discretion of the inspecting officers as Burger requires. The court also acknowledges that statutes must provide notice. Yet the court holds that these requirements weren't—themselves—clearly established. I understand the impulse. After all, qualified immunity is supposed to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law'—that's what the Supreme Court remarked in Wesby. So if reasonably competent officers wouldn't necessarily know that they're violating the law, they shouldn't be liable. For example, the majority says that since we haven't yet enforced the limited-discretion requirement, reasonable officials could've thought that the subpoena satisfied Burger. Thus, they wouldn't necessarily realize they're breaking the law. But that hyperspecific take snubs the Supreme Court's time-worn test: Was there a clearly established violation? Yes, it's a violation to conduct a warrantless search without precompliance review. Sometimes there's an exception to this test. But not here. No exception applies. And it's only when an exception applies that the general rule doesn't. . . Yet even if we should ask whether the Burger exception was clearly established, Dr. Zadeh still ought to win. Controlling law dictates that there must be statutory notice. . . . Everyone agrees his Fourth Amendment rights were violated. But owing to a legal deus ex machina—the 'clearly established' prong of qualified-immunity analysis—the violation eludes vindication. At first I agreed with the panel majority that the government violated the law but not clearly established law. I was wrong. Beyond this case, though, I must restate my broader unease with the real-world functioning of modern immunity practice. To some observers, qualified immunity smacks of unqualified impunity, letting public officials duck consequences for bad behavior—no matter how palpably unreasonable—as long as they were the first to behave badly. Merely proving a constitutional deprivation doesn't cut it; plaintiffs must cite functionally identical precedent that places the legal question 'beyond debate' to 'every' reasonable officer. Put differently, it's immaterial that someone acts unconstitutionally if no prior case held such misconduct unlawful. This current 'yes harm, no foul' imbalance leaves victims violated but not vindicated. Wrongs are not righted, and wrongdoers are not reproached. Today the majority opinion says Dr. Zadeh loses because his rights weren't clearly established. But courts of appeals are divided—intractably—over precisely what degree of factual similarity must exist. How indistinguishable must existing precedent be? On the one hand, the Supreme Court reassures plaintiffs that its caselaw 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.' On the other hand, the Court admonishes that 'clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.' How to square these abstract instructions? Take Dr. Zadeh. Effectively, he loses since no previous panel has ever held this exact sort of search unconstitutional. In day-to-day practice, the 'clearly established' standard is neither clear nor established among our Nation's lower courts. Two other factors perpetuate perplexity over 'clearly established law.' First, many courts grant immunity without first determining whether the challenged behavior violates the Constitution. They avoid scrutinizing the alleged offense by skipping to the simpler second prong: no factually analogous precedent. Forgoing a knotty constitutional inquiry makes for easier sledding, no doubt. But the inexorable result is 'constitutional stagnation'—fewer courts establishing law at all, much less clearly doing so. Section 1983 meets Catch-22. Plaintiffs must produce precedent even as fewer courts are producing precedent. Important constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because no one's answered them before. Courts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there's no equivalent case on the books. No precedent = no clearly established law = no liability. An Escherian Stairwell. Heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses. Second, constitutional litigation increasingly involves cutting-edge technologies. If courts leapfrog the underlying constitutional merits in cases raising novel issues like digital privacy, then constitutional clarity—matter-of-fact guidance about what the Constitution requires—remains exasperatingly elusive. Result: gauzy constitutional guardrails as technological innovation outpaces legal adaptation. Qualified immunity aims to balance competing policy goals: 'the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably.’ And I concede that the doctrine enjoys special favor at the Supreme Court, which seems untroubled by any one-sidedness. The Court recently declined to take up a closely watched case challenging the warrantless strip search of a four-year-old preschooler. A strange-bedfellows alliance of leading scholars and advocacy groups of every ideological stripe—perhaps the most diverse amici ever assembled—had joined forces to urge the Court to fundamentally reshape immunity doctrine. Even in this hyperpartisan age, there is a growing, cross-ideological chorus of jurists and scholars urging recalibration of contemporary immunity jurisprudence. Indeed, it’s curious how this entrenched, judge-created doctrine excuses constitutional violations by limiting the statute Congress passed to redress constitutional violations. Count me with Chief Justice Marshall: ‘The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.’ Doctrinal reform is arduous, often-Sisyphean work. Finding faults is easy; finding solutions, less so. But even if qualified immunity continues its forward march and avoids sweeping reconsideration, it certainly merits a refined procedural approach that more smartly—and fairly—serves its intended objectives.”)

Green v. Thomas, 734 F.Supp.3d 532, 539-40, 543-45, 547-69 (S.D. Miss. 2024), affirmed in part and reversed in part by Green v. Thomas, 129 F.4th 877 (5th Cir. 2025) (“For nearly two years, the State of Mississippi falsely accused Desmond Green of capital murder. A detective used a lying, drug-impaired jailhouse informant to lock Green up. The detective also steered the informant to select Green’s face from a photo lineup. It was a horrifying wrong. Compounding Green’s suffering was another horror. The jail he was held in was full of violence, rodents, and moldy food. . . The informant eventually recanted. The State then dropped the charges. But the ordeal cost Green almost two years of his life. Green filed this lawsuit to seek justice for those two wrongs—his prosecution and conditions of confinement. He has sued the detective who locked him up, her employer (the City of Jackson, Mississippi), and the operator of the Hinds County Detention Center (Hinds County, Mississippi). Green is now on the precipice of being wronged a third time. Not by a rogue officer or jailer, but by the law itself. Because the detective says the legal doctrine of qualified immunity requires the Court to dismiss Green’s claims against her. Qualified immunity was invented by the Supreme Court in 1967. In plain English, it means persons wronged by government agents cannot sue those agents unless the Supreme Court previously found substantially the same acts to be unconstitutional. . . A cynic might say that with qualified immunity, government agents are at liberty to violate your constitutional rights as long as they do so in a novel way. . . Most plaintiffs in this situation argue that the officer that wronged them isn’t entitled to qualified immunity. Green does that. Unlike others, though, he has taken the next step and argued that qualified immunity is itself unlawful. He joins lawyers, professors, judges, and even Supreme Court Justices who have called for the doctrine’s re-evaluation, if not its abolition. The Court agrees with these calls for change. Congress’s intent to protect citizens from government abuse cannot be overridden by judges who think they know better. As a doctrine that defies this basic principle, qualified immunity is an unconstitutional error. It is past time for the judiciary to correct this mistake. The Court presents Green’s allegations, the governing legal standards, and the substantive case law below. It concludes that the detective is not entitled to qualified immunity. Her actions violated clearly-established law. Even if this were not the case, the detective’s quest would fail. For qualified immunity has no basis in law. It is an extra-constitutional affront to other cherished values of our democracy. The detective’s motion to dismiss is therefore denied. . . . Because the law is codified at 42 U.S.C. § 1983—and because lawyers usually shy away from saying Ku Klux Klan—this law is often referred to as ‘Section 1983.’ This Court will refer to the law by its formal name as a reminder of why the Reconstruction Congress saw the need to enact it. . . . The Ku Klux Klan Act created ‘a species of tort liability that on its face admits of no immunities.’. . . That all changed in Pierson v. Ray, a case arising out of Jim Crow Mississippi. [court discusses Pierson] It is difficult to see qualified immunity’s creation as anything other than a backlash to the Civil Rights Movement. Yet even as America has incorporated the lessons of that Movement into its dominant narrative—that of American progress—the law has retained this vestige. Since the 1960s, in fact, the Supreme Court has continued to shape, enforce, and expand qualified immunity, making it almost impossible to overcome. . . . Qualified immunity has obvious economic consequences. It discourages victims of misconduct from bringing lawsuits, and those who do file suit sometimes recover nothing because of it. Qualified immunity accomplishes this by preventing victims of government misconduct from using the discovery tools available to other litigants. See Carswell v. Camp, 54 F.4th 307, 312-13 (5th Cir. 2022). Another obvious consequence of qualified immunity, though, is a perpetuation of racial inequality. Research indicates that Black Americans are pulled over more often, searched more often, arrested more often, imprisoned more often, wrongfully convicted more often, and killed by law enforcement more often than other Americans. Qualified immunity then bars many of these individuals from securing justice, ‘shut[ting] the courthouse doors on a large portion of those black and brown citizens who plausibly allege that police officers targeted, surveilled, or stopped them because of their race.’. . . If the Fifth Circuit disagrees and grants qualified immunity on any of these claims, Green advances an alternative argument for moving forward against Detective Thomas. He contends that ‘the qualified immunity doctrine is unsound law’ and a ‘misreading of the Civil Rights Act of 1871.’. . . This Court has written on this topic previously. See Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F. Supp. 3d 386 (S.D. Miss. 2020). So it should come as little surprise that the Court finds these arguments compelling. Justices, judges, advocates, and scholars have long found fault with qualified immunity. Several of the more compelling critiques are summarized below. . . . Qualified immunity. . . does not appear in the text of the Ku Klux Klan Act. It is not found in any Constitutional provision or other statute. Nor does it ‘help give ... life and substance’ to the ‘specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights.’. . . The defense has the opposite effect. It nullifies the guarantees of the Bill of Rights. The doctrine’s components are similarly untethered to any authority. Justice Thomas has observed several times that the clearly established test ‘cannot be located in § 1983’s text.’. . . An officer’s right to immediately appeal the denial of qualified immunity was invented in 1985. [citing Mitchell v. Forsyth] And the requirement that ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate’? The Supreme Court came up with that in 2011. [citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd] Not long ago, a plaintiff could satisfy the clearly established requirement by pointing to ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’

[citing Wilson v. Layne] Al-Kidd changed that too. It required plaintiffs to identify a ‘robust’ consensus of cases clearly establishing the law. . . Today, it is not clear that a robust consensus is enough. The Supreme Court has suggested that only its precedent can establish the law. [citing District of Columbia v. Wesby.] . . . Green points to new research suggesting that when Congress enacted the Ku Klux Klan Act, it ‘adopted explicit text that displaced common law defenses,’ making clear ‘that such a claim would be viable notwithstanding “any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary.”’ [citing Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Calif. L. Rev. 201, 207 (2023)] . . . Federal judges have taken note. In Rogers v. Jarrett, Judge Willett described this line of attack as a ‘game-changing argument[] ... in this text-centric judicial era when jurists profess unswerving fidelity to the words Congress chose. . . If Professor Reinert is correct, he added, it would ‘supercharge[] the critique that modern immunity jurisprudence is not just atextual but countertextual. That is, the doctrine does not merely complement the text—it brazenly contradicts it.’ . . No decisive judgment has been returned on this line of inquiry. Hopefully the academic community will continue to investigate. As we wait, it remains true that qualified immunity is the law of the land and commands respect under stare decisis. If the Supreme Court follows its most recent jurisprudence on that subject, though, qualified immunity might be with us for but a short time. The next section explains why. . . In 2022, the Supreme Court upended 50 years of precedent and eliminated the Constitutional right to a pre-viability abortion. Dobbs, 597 U.S. at 215, 142 S.Ct. 2228. Its reasoning in that case supports upending existing law here. [court discusses] Professor Schwartz’s research indicates that ‘qualified immunity is not achieving its policy objectives’ and ‘may, in fact, increase the costs and delays associated with constitutional litigation.’ Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails, 127 Yale L.J. 2, 11 (2017). One of her more galling findings reveals that officers are trained on ‘broad principles’—not the specific ‘factual scenarios’ that appellate judges then insist were necessary predicates to liability. Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity’s Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 610 (2021). . . And the notion that a government employee will change their behavior out of fear of personal liability is not borne out by the evidence. Police officers are not held financially responsible for the vast majority of settlements and judgments against them. Joanna C. Schwartz, The Case Against Qualified Immunity, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1797, 1806 (2018). At the end of the day, the Court’s policy-based defense of qualified immunity is simply a choice to privilege government officials over all others. The justifications are less than persuasive. . . Time and time again, the Justices reverse lower courts for ‘fail[ing] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [the defendant] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ . . The result is a world where courts let prison officials get away with putting someone in a feces-covered cell for six days, rather than hold them accountable for violating the general principle: don’t make people sleep in other people’s feces. Consistency suggests that one of these two systems must change. If we value liberty as much as we say we do, perhaps the criminal law should refuse to convict someone unless the unlawfulness of their ‘particularized’ conduct had already been held to be ‘beyond debate’ at the time they acted. . . Or, if it is qualified immunity to yield, we should define Constitutional rights at a higher level of generality, recognizing that we will never be able ‘to outline each of the many possible ways that a person might be said to’ violate the Constitution. . . But the two systems cannot coexist with any honesty.

It cannot be true that in America, it is easier to take away one's liberty than hold the government accountable for violating the very Constitution guaranteeing that liberty. . . . This Judge has no say in the adjustment or abolition of qualified immunity. But having devoted several pages to critiquing the doctrine, I do feel some responsibility to spell out the principles I believe should guide any changes. 'We the People' elect the President—through the electoral college—every four years. We the People elect our Senators every six years and our Representatives every two years. And, although We the People don't vote on federal judges, we nevertheless exercise vast power in the judicial branch every day, through jury service. Jurors are judges of the facts. They decide what happened, who's responsible, and whether there will be consequences. They decide who to believe a little bit and who not to believe at all. They weigh evidence by the preponderance standard, the clear and convincing standard, and the beyond a reasonable doubt standard. Juries decide damages awards in civil cases from car wrecks to discrimination claims to billion-dollar intellectual property disputes. They decide guilt and innocence in criminal cases. Sometimes they even 'express the conscience of the community on the ultimate question of life or death.' . . . To say that the judiciary is 'undemocratic,' then, is not the full story. . . . Judicial supremacy has too-often deprived the People of their proper role in deciding constitutional torts brought under the Ku Klux Klan Act. The doctrine of qualified immunity, as currently constructed, mistakenly lets judges quibble endlessly over whether a constitutional violation was 'clearly established,' 'beyond debate,' or 'obvious.' . . . All of this frustrates resolution by the People. The doctrine also errs in giving defendants unusual rights to take immediate appeals. These appeals not only deprive victims of their right to pursue evidence in the government's possession, but they allow more judges to perpetuate the tedious legal debate. It should not have taken more than seven years for Mr. Taylor—the Texas man housed in excrement—to secure judicial permission to take discovery from prison officials. But it did. This area of law reflects a deep distrust of ordinary people. . . . This Court has seated juries for quite a few years now. They pay close attention to the facts. Wanting to follow the law, they ask questions about the substantive legal instructions they receive. Their deliberations take time, which can be agonizing, but we wait because it is the fairest way to settle our disputes. And regardless of whether a judge agrees with the verdict, in our democracy it is the jury's decision to make. In the same way we trust the collective judgment of voters in elections, we must trust the judgment of jurors in deciding cases. Law enforcement cases are no different. I have seated juries that have found for and against law enforcement officers. The jurors know the difference between those acting properly and those violating others' rights. Their work confirms that when it comes to fact-finding, 'anything a judge can do a jury can do better.' . . . In Ku Klux Klan Act cases, as elsewhere, all we need to do is tell jurors the truth. We should tell jurors that law enforcement officers must sometimes 'make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.' . . . We all know that. We should also tell jurors that officials who engage in a pattern of misconduct or act in a 'calculated fashion' despite 'months to consult legal counsel' are entitled to less deference. Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Tex., 94 F.4th 374, 408 (5th Cir. 2024) (Willett, J., dissenting). It's just common sense. We should instruct jurors that federal law gives people the right to be free 'from unconstitutional action under color of state law, whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial.' . . . At the same time, we should instruct them that unnecessary suits against public officers run the risk of diverting ‘energy from pressing public issues’ and deterring ‘able citizens from acceptance of public office.’. These principles are in tension. It is true. The Constitution is full of those tensions. Its authors in one breath declared all men to be created equal, and in the other calculated a slave to be worth three-fifths of a white person. Contradiction is in America’s DNA. The judiciary should permit the People to resolve those tensions and contradictions case by case, as the evidence dictates. Only with that democratic participation will we ‘reinforce[] a fundamental belief ... that we are all created equal and assure[] citizens that in our society even the powerful and wealthy are subject to the scrutiny of average citizens.’. . . Desmond Green has suffered two injustices. The judiciary should not impose a third. If qualified immunity would do that, closing the courthouse doors to his claims, then the doctrine should come to its overdue end. The motion to dismiss is denied.” [footnotes omitted])

Perron v. Travis, No. 20-00221-BAJ-EWD, 2023 WL 6368131, at ___ n.7 (M.D. La. Sept. 28, 2023) (“The qualified immunity defense remains ‘the law of the land.’ Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F. Supp. 3d 386, 409 (S.D. Miss. 2020) (Reeves, J.) (reviewing the history and expansion of the qualified immunity doctrine, and calling for its elimination). But for how long? Scholars and at least one jurist of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit have recently called for its ouster because the doctrine is founded on a legal fiction derived from a reconstruction-era scrivener’s error that removed a determinative 16-word clause from the published version of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. See Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 CAL. L. REV. 201 (2023). Restored to its proper place, this clause ‘unequivocally negate[s] the original interpretive premise for qualified immunity.’ See Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 979 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willett, J., concurring). It is not this Court’s role to cast aside qualified immunity here, particularly absent any argument from the parties. Indeed, only the Supreme Court can definitively ‘overrule’ the defense. Id. at 981. For now, the undersigned commends Professor Reinert’s scholarship, and joins Judge Willett’s call for the Supreme Court to ‘definitively grapple with § 1983’s enacted text and decide whether it means what it says—and what, if anything, that means for § 1983 immunity jurisprudence.’ Id.”)

Thomas v. Johnson, No. CV H-23-662, 2023 WL 5254689, at *6–7 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 15, 2023) (“Thomas attacks the doctrine of qualified immunity, arguing that recent scholarship forecloses its continued application. The court must reject this invitation to ignore established circuit and Supreme Court precedent. Until recently, scholarly discussions and criticisms of the modern doctrine focused on its lack of textual foundation and scope compared to its common law antecedents. See generally, e.g., Scott A. Keller, Qualified and Absolute Immunity at Common Law, 73 STAN. L. REV. 1337 (2021); Aaron L. Nielson & Christopher J. Walker, A Qualified Defense of Qualified Immunity, 93 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 1853 (2018); William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 CALIF. L. REV. 45 (2018). Many—from a variety of perspectives—have also attacked the doctrine on the ground that it appears to sanction state officials’ abuses of power. See generally, e.g., Lisa Needham, Disgusting Grants of Qualified Immunity: Not Just for Cops Anymore!, BALLS & STRIKES (July 14, 2022), <https://ballsandstrikes.org/legal-culture/qualified-immunity-teachers-not-just-for-cops/> (last visited July 31, 2023); Jay Schweikert, Qualified Immunity: A Legal, Practical, and Moral Failure, CATO INST. (Sept. 14, 2020), <https://www.cato.org/policy-analysis/qualified-immunity-legal-practical-moral-failure>; Brief of Alliance Defending Freedom & American Civil Liberties Union et al. as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioner, Allah v. Milling, 139 S. Ct. 49 (2018) (Mem.) (No. 17-8654). Justices and judges—including in this circuit—have found the doctrine troubling. See, e.g., Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1162 (2018) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (criticizing “a one-sided approach to qualified immunity [that] transforms the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers”); Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1872 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“In an appropriate case, we should reconsider our qualified immunity jurisprudence.”); Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 480–81 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willet, J., concurring in part) (“Indeed, it’s curious how this entrenched, judge-created doctrine excuses constitutional violations by limiting the statute Congress passed to redress constitutional violations.”). Thomas’s brief in opposition points to another, more recent, attack on the qualified immunity doctrine: the discovery that the original text of what became § 1983, passed as part of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, contained a clause stating that officials may be held liable for civil rights violations “any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary notwithstanding.” (Docket Entry No. 16 at 20 (quoting Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, ch. 22, § 1, 17 Stat. 13 (1871))); see also Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 CALIF. L. REV. 201 (2023). Thomas argues that the notwithstanding clause should be interpreted in accordance with the original statute’s original public meaning, which should have resulted, with respect to § 1983 claims, in the abrogation of the common law immunities that form the basis of contemporary qualified immunity jurisprudence. . . But this court is bound by both circuit and Supreme Court precedent; ‘however seismic the implications of this lost-text research ... [the court] cannot overrule the Supreme Court.’ Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 981 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willet, J., concurring) (summarizing the historical argument in Professor Reinert’s article, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation). ‘Only that Court can definitively grapple with § 1983’s enacted text and decide whether it means what it says—and what, if anything, that means for § 1983 immunity jurisprudence.’ . . This court is bound by current law and must wait for the justices to turn from their occasional criticisms of the allegedly atextual and ahistorical doctrine to its abrogation or modification to entertain Thomas’s argument. Precedent requires the court to determine whether the clearly established law placed the officers on notice that their actions violated Thomas’s constitutional rights. The court believes that the many decisions from the Fifth Circuit, cited above, offered ample notice to the officers that it is unconstitutional to use physical force sufficient to severely injure a suspect when that suspect is compliant or has been at most passively resisting. The circuit has also been clear that the exact means of inflicting the force need not be identical for officers to be on notice that their actions violate clearly established law. Bruss and Schultz had sufficient notice that instructing a police dog to attack a person suspected of making excessive noise, lying on the ground, with his hands extended before him and without visible access to any weapon, violated that person’s constitutional rights.”)

Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F.Supp.3d 386, 391-424 (S.D. Miss. 2020) (“The Constitution says everyone is entitled to equal protection of the law—even at the hands of law enforcement. Over the decades, however, judges have invented a legal doctrine to protect law enforcement officers from having to face any consequences for wrongdoing. The doctrine is called ‘qualified immunity.’ In real life it operates like absolute immunity. . . . Tragically, thousands have died at the hands of law enforcement over the years, and the death toll continues to rise. Countless more have suffered from other forms of abuse and misconduct by police. Qualified immunity has served as a shield for these officers, protecting them from accountability. This Court is required to apply the law as stated by the Supreme Court. Under that law, the officer who transformed a short traffic stop into an almost two-hour, life-altering ordeal is entitled to qualified immunity. The officer’s motion seeking as much is therefore granted. But let us not be fooled by legal jargon. Immunity is not exoneration. And the harm in this case to one man sheds light on the harm done to the nation by this manufactured doctrine. As the Fourth Circuit concluded, ‘This has to stop.’ . . . Just as the 19th century Supreme Court neutered the Reconstruction-era civil rights laws, the 20th century Court limited the scope and effectiveness of Section 1983 after Monroe v. Pape. The doctrine of qualified immunity is perhaps the most important limitation. . . . A review of our qualified immunity precedent makes clear that the Court has dispensed with any pretense of balancing competing values. Our courts have shielded a police officer who shot a child while the officer was attempting to shoot the family dog; prison guards who forced a prisoner to sleep in cells ‘covered in feces’ for days; police officers who stole over $225,000 worth of property; a deputy who body-slammed a woman after she simply ‘ignored [the deputy’s] command and walked away’; an officer who seriously burned a woman after detonating a ‘flashbang’ device in the bedroom where she was sleeping; an officer who deployed a dog against a suspect who ‘claim[ed] that he surrendered by raising his hands in the air’; and an officer who shot an unarmed woman eight times after she threw a knife and glass at a police dog that was attacking her brother. If Section 1983 was created to make the courts “‘guardians of the people’s federal rights,’” what kind of guardians have the courts become? One only has to look at the evolution of the doctrine to answer that question. Once, qualified immunity protected officers who acted in good faith. The doctrine now protects all officers, no matter how egregious their conduct, if the law they broke was not ‘clearly established.’ This ‘clearly established’ requirement is not in the Constitution or a federal statute. The Supreme Court came up with it in 1982. In 1986, the Court then ‘evolved’ the qualified immunity defense to spread its blessings ‘to all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ It further ratcheted up the standard in 2011, when it added the words ‘beyond debate.’ In other words, ‘for the law to be clearly established, it must have been “beyond debate” that [the officer] broke the law.’ An officer cannot be held liable unless every reasonable officer would understand that what he is doing violates the law. It does not matter, as the Fifth Circuit has explained, ‘that we are morally outraged, or the fact that our collective conscience is shocked by the alleged conduct . . . [because it] does not mean necessarily that the officials should have realized that [the conduct] violated a constitutional right.’ Even evidence that the officer acted in bad faith is now considered irrelevant. The Supreme Court has also given qualified immunity sweeping procedural advantages. ‘Because the defense of qualified immunity is, in part, a question of law, it naturally creates a “super-summary judgment” right on behalf of government officials.

Even when an official is not entitled to summary judgment on the merits – because the plaintiff has stated a proper claim and genuine issues of fact exist – summary judgment can still be granted when the law is not reasonably clear.’ And there is more. The Supreme Court says defendants should be dismissed at the ‘earliest possible stage’ in the proceedings to not be burdened with the matter. The earliest possible stage may include a stage in the case before any discovery has been taken and necessarily before a plaintiff has obtained all the relevant facts and all (or any) documents. If a court denies a defendant’s motion seeking dismissal or summary judgment based on qualified immunity, that decision is also immediately appealable. Those appeals can lead all the way to the United States Supreme Court even before any trial judge or jury hears the merits of the case. Qualified immunity’s premier advantage thus lies in the fact that it affords government officials review by (at least) four federal judges before trial. Each step the Court has taken toward absolute immunity heralded a retreat from its earlier pronouncements. Although the Court held in 2002 that qualified immunity could be denied ‘in novel factual circumstances,’ the Court’s track record in the intervening two decades renders naïve any judges who believe that pronouncement. Federal judges now spend an inordinate amount of time trying to discern whether the law was clearly established ‘beyond debate’ at the time an officer broke it. But it is a fool’s errand to ask people who love to debate whether something is debatable. . . . To be clear, it is unnecessary to ascribe malice to the appellate judges deciding these terrible cases. No one wants to be reversed by the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court’s summary reversals of qualified immunity cases are ever-more biting. If you’ve been a Circuit Judge since 1979—sitting on the bench longer than any current Justice—you might expect a more forgiving reversal. Other appellate judges see these decisions, read the tea leaves, and realize it is safer to find debatable whether it was a clearly established Constitutional violation to force a prisoner to eat, sleep, and live in prison cells swarming in feces for six days. It is also unnecessary to blame the doctrine of qualified immunity on ideology. ‘Although the Court is not always unanimous on these issues, it is fair to say that qualified immunity has been as much a liberal as a conservative project on the Supreme Court.’ Judges disagree in these cases no matter which President appointed them. Qualified immunity is one area proving the truth of Chief Justice Roberts’ statement, ‘We do not have Obama judges or Trump judges, Bush judges or Clinton judges.’ There are numerous critiques of qualified immunity by lawyers, judges, and academics. Yet qualified immunity is the law of the land and the undersigned is bound to follow its terms absent a change in practice by the Supreme Court. . . . [T]he Court finds a genuine factual dispute about whether Jamison voluntarily consented to the search. A reader would be forgiven for pausing here and wondering whether we forgot to mention something. When in this analysis will the Court look at the elephant in the room—how race may have played a role in whether Officer McClendon’s actions were coercive? Jamison was a Black man driving through Mississippi, a state known for the violent deaths of Black people and others who fought for their freedom. Pelahatchie is an hour south of Philadelphia, a town made infamous after a different kind of traffic stop resulted in the brutal lynching of James Chaney, Michael Schwerner, and Andrew Goodman. Pelahatchie is also less than 30 minutes east of Jackson, where on June 26, 2011, a handful of young white men and women engaged in some old-fashioned Redemption and murdered James Craig Anderson, a 47-year old Black, gay man. Pelahatchie is also in Rankin County, the same county the young people called home. Only a few miles separate the two communities. For Black people, this isn't mere history. It's the present. . . . Jamison's traffic stop cannot be separated from this context. Black people in this country are acutely aware of the danger traffic stops pose to Black lives. Police encounters happen regardless of station in life or standing in the community; to Black doctors, judges, and legislators alike. United States Senator Tim Scott was pulled over seven times in one year—and has even been stopped while a member of what many refer to as 'the world's greatest deliberative body.' The 'vast majority' of the stops were the result of 'nothing more than driving a new car in the wrong neighborhood or some other reason just as trivial.' The situation is not getting better. The number of people killed by police each year has stayed relatively constant, and Black people remain at disproportionate risk of dying in an encounter with police. It was all the way back in 1968 when Nina Simone famously said that freedom meant 'no fear! I mean really, no fear!' Yet decades later, Black male teens still report a 'fear of police and a serious concern for their personal safety and mortality in the presence of police officers.' In an America where Black people 'are considered dangerous even when they are in their living rooms eating ice cream, asleep in their beds, playing in the park, standing in the pulpit of their church, birdwatching, exercising in public, or walking home from a trip to the store to purchase a bag of Skittles,' who can say that Jamison felt free that night on the side of Interstate 20? Who can say that he felt free to say no to an armed Officer McClendon? It was in this context that Officer McClendon repeatedly lied to Jamison. It was in this moment that Officer McClendon intruded into Jamison's car. It was upon this history that Jamison said he was tired. These circumstances point to Jamison's consent being involuntary, a situation where he felt he had 'no alternative to compliance' and merely mouthed 'pro forma words of consent.' Accordingly, Officer McClendon's search of Jamison's vehicle violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Jamison, the question in this case is whether it was clearly established that an officer who has made five sequential requests for consent to search a car, lied, promised leniency, and placed his arm inside of a person's car during a traffic stop while awaiting background check results has violated the Fourth Amendment. It is not. Jamison identifies a Tenth Circuit case finding that an officer unlawfully prolonged a detention 'after verifying the temporary tag was valid and properly displayed.' That court wrote that '[e]very temporary tag is more difficult to read in the dark when a car is traveling 70 mph on the interstate. But that does not make every vehicle displaying such a tag fair game for an extended Fourth Amendment seizure.' Aside from the fact that a Tenth Circuit case is not 'controlling authority' nor representative of 'a robust consensus of persuasive authority,' the case is unavailing here since Officer McClendon was awaiting NCIC results when he began to question Jamison. As discussed above, questioning while awaiting results from an NCIC check is 'not inappropriate.' Officer McClendon's initial questioning was not in and of itself a Fourth Amendment violation. As to Officer McClendon's 'particular conduct' of intruding into Jamison's vehicle, making promises of leniency, and repeatedly questioning him, Jamison primarily argues that 'a genuine issue of material fact exists regarding the voluntariness of Mr. Jamison's alleged consent to allow the Defendant McLendon to search his car.' He contends that a grant of 'qualified immunity [is] inappropriate based on those factual conflicts.' To prevail with this argument, Jamison must show that the factual dispute is such that the Court cannot 'sett[e] on a coherent view of what happened in the first place.' Further, '[Jamison's] version of the violations [should] implicate clearly established law.’ That is not the case here. While Jamison and Officer McClendon’s recounting of the facts differs, the Court is able to settle on a coherent view of what occurred based on Jamison’s version of the facts. Considering the evidence in a light ‘most favorable’ to Jamison,’ Jamison has failed to show that Officer McClendon acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. An officer’s ‘acts are held to be objectively reasonable unless all reasonable officials in the defendant’s circumstances would have then known that the defendant’s conduct violated the United States Constitution or the federal statute as alleged by the plaintiff.’ While Jamison contends that Officer McClendon’s intrusion was coercive, Jamison fails to support the claim with relevant precedent. He cites to this Court’s opinion in United States v. Alvarado, which found it unreasonable to detain a person on the side of the highway for an hour ‘for reasons not tied to reasonable suspicion that he had committed a crime or was engaged in the commission of a crime.’ However, this Court’s opinions cannot serve as ‘clearly established’ precedent. Moreover, the facts of that case are distinguishable since the defendant in Alvarado was unlawfully held after background checks came back clear. The cases the Court cited above regarding physical intrusions – United States v. Pierre and New York v. Class – are also insufficient. While it has been clearly established since at least 1986 that an officer may be held liable for an unreasonable ‘intrusion into the interior of [a] car,’ this is merely a ‘general statement[] of the law.’ ‘[C]learly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.’ . . . Given the lack of precedent that places the Constitutional question ‘beyond debate,’ Jamison’s claim cannot proceed. Officer McClendon is entitled to qualified immunity as to Jamison’s prolonged detention and unlawful search claims. . . . Our nation has always struggled to realize the Founders’ vision of ‘a more perfect Union.’ From the beginning, ‘the Blessings of Liberty’ were not equally bestowed upon all Americans. Yet, as people marching in the streets remind us today, some have always stood up to face our nation’s failings and remind us that ‘we cannot be patient.’ Through their efforts we become ever more perfect. The U.S. Congress of the Reconstruction era stood up to the white supremacists of its time when it passed Section 1983. The late Congressman John Lewis stared down the racists of his era when he marched over the Edmund Pettus Bridge. The Supreme Court has answered the call of history as well, most famously when it issued its unanimous decision in Brown v. Board of Education and resigned the ‘separate but equal’ doctrine to the dustbin of history. The question of today is whether the Supreme Court will rise to the occasion and do the same with qualified immunity. . . . That the Justices haven’t acted so far is perhaps understandable. Not only would they likely prefer that Congress fixes the problem, they also value stare decisis, the legal principle that means ‘fidelity to precedent.’ Stare decisis, however, ‘isn’t supposed to be the art of methodically ignoring what everyone knows to be true.’ From TikTok to the chambers of the Supreme Court, there is increasing consensus that qualified immunity poses a major problem to our system of justice. Justice Kennedy ‘complained’ as early as 1992 that in qualified immunity cases, ‘we have diverged to a substantial degree from the historical standards.’ Justice Scalia admitted that the Court hasn’t even ‘purported to be faithful to the common-law immunities that existed when § 1983 was enacted.’ Justice Thomas wrote there is ‘no basis’ for the ‘clearly established law’ analysis and has expressed his ‘growing concern with our qualified immunity jurisprudence.’ Justice Sotomayor has noted that her colleagues were making the ‘clearly established’ analysis ever more ‘onerous.’ In her view, the Court’s doctrine ‘tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished.’ It remains to be seen how the newer additions to the Court will vote. . . . We read § 1983 against a background of robust immunity instead of the background of a robust Seventh Amendment. . . . [E]very hour we spend in a § 1983 case asking if the law was ‘clearly established’ or ‘beyond debate’ is one where we lose sight of why Congress enacted this law those many years ago: to hold state actors accountable for violating federally protected rights. . . . Instead of slamming shut the courthouse doors, our courts should use their power to ensure Section 1983 serves all of its citizens as the Reconstruction Congress intended. Those who violate the constitutional rights of our citizens must be held accountable. When that day comes we will be one step closer to that more perfect Union. . . . I do not envy the task before the Supreme Court. Overturning qualified immunity will undoubtedly impact our society. Yet, the status quo is extraordinary and unsustainable. Just as the Supreme Court swept away the mistaken doctrine of ‘separate but equal,’ so too should it eliminate the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . Let us waste no time in righting this wrong.”) [footnotes omitted]

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 677-84 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) (Donald, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“While I agree that the district court should be reversed on the state law claims and that Officer Rhodes violated Luke Stewart’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures, I would also find that the constitutional right was clearly established and that, therefore, Rhodes is not entitled to qualified immunity. The majority evaluates the clearly-established prong too narrowly and provides immunity to an officer who created a dangerous situation and then used that situation to justify the fatal shooting of a man who did not present an immediate danger of serious physical injury to the officer. In fact, it is debatable whether Stewart presented any danger to the officer or the public, or if he even knew that Rhodes was a law enforcement officer, since neither Rhodes nor Catalani announced themselves as police officers. . . . Despite § 1983’s categorical decree that all persons under color of state law who cause the deprivation of a constitutional right ‘shall’ be subject to liability, the Supreme Court overlaid qualified immunity onto the statute’s directive in an effort to balance its underlying policies. . . . More specifically, the doctrine—as we know it today—was deemed necessary to protect public officials from unforeseeable developments in the law. . . . Today, the seemingly endless struggle with applying the doctrine is in defining the extent of a clearly established right. . . . Judge Willett from the Fifth Circuit recently highlighted some of the issues with the clearly-established standard in his dissent in Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., dissenting). Noting the courts’ division over what level of ‘factual similarity must exist,’ he wrote that ‘the “clearly established” standard is neither clear nor established among our Nation’s lower courts.’ Id. He also emphasized that deciding immunity issues based on a too-narrow construction of clearly established law prevents the vindication of constitutional rights[.] . . . Of course, the problems do not end there, as courts have increasingly begun to skip the constitutional question and simply ask whether the right was clearly established. . . . Here, the majority answered the constitutional question first but construes

the clearly-established prong too narrowly. The sole purpose of the clearly-established prong, as created and announced by the Supreme Court, is to protect officials from unforeseeable or unknowable developments in the law. . . It is not a blank check to engage in specific acts that have not previously been considered by a court of controlling authority. . . Nor is it ‘a license to lawless conduct.’ . . When defining clearly established rights, we must have in the forefront of our mind this question: would a reasonable officer have known that his actions were unconstitutional? The majority notes that Rhodes had no duty to retreat. However, Rhodes likewise had a duty to only use such force as was necessary under the totality of the circumstances. The fact that Rhodes shot Stewart five times at near point-blank range defies reasonableness. This is the type of wantonness that does not require a case on point to put an officer on notice that his conduct is unreasonable. As Judge Gorsuch opined, ‘some things are so obviously unlawful that they don’t require detailed explanations’ or happen so rarely that there will be no case on point. Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082 (10th Cir. 2015). Had Rhodes been standing outside of the car when he used lethal force, this would be a very simple case—he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . However, in this Circuit, the Court has not encountered the exact situation that occurred in this case—the officer being inside of the car at the time of the shooting. That lack of precisely-analogous controlling law can oftentimes sound the death knell to a § 1983 claim. . . Here, the majority sounds the death knell for Stewart’s § 1983 claims and finds that the right was not clearly established, but I disagree. In addition to this being a situation where precisely-analogous law should not be required, both in-circuit cases and out-of-circuit cases show that Rhodes violated Stewart’s clearly-established right to be free from excessive force when he shot Stewart five times and killed him, even though he posed no imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . The law is clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the suspect is presenting an imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . Although Rhodes asserts that he felt that he was in danger while the car was moving, and that he feared that he may be in danger if the car were to begin moving again, the fact remains that the car was not moving at the time Rhodes chose to shoot Stewart. This lack of imminent threat of serious physical injury renders lethal force objectively unreasonable in this circumstance (despite Rhodes’ individualized concern to the contrary). . . . Although this case presents unique factual circumstances within this Circuit, there are at least four factually similar cases from other jurisdictions. [discussing cases] While it is arguable that these four cases establish the ‘robust consensus’ that would put a reasonable officer on notice of Stewart’s specific rights, . . . what is more persuasive is that these four cases illuminate the application of the specific—and clearly established—right that an individual has to be free from lethal force when fleeing arrest in a car that is not presenting an imminent threat of serious physical harm to anybody. . . Moreover, these four cases applied that specific right when the suspect’s car was actually moving, whereas in our case Stewart’s car was stopped when he was killed. That distinction makes it even more apparent that a reasonable officer would have known that lethal force was inappropriate in this case. As such, I would find that Stewart’s rights were clearly established at the time that Rhodes shot and killed him. . . . I find myself writing separately about the dangers of unchecked police powers with unsettling and increasing frequency. Six years ago, I dissented from a decision affirming summary judgment for several officers who killed Leroy Hughes, an African American man suffering from mental illness, by shocking him with tasers twelve times in five minutes. See Sheffey v. City of Covington, 564 F. App'x 783, 796-97 (6th Cir. 2014) (Donald, J., dissenting). The first eight shocks occurred in a single minute. . . The total delivery exceeded 14,000 volts. . . In that dissent, I recalled the names of Amadou Diallo, Sean Bell, Oscar Grant, Jonathan Ferrell, and others. . . And I exhorted this Court and its readers not to 'ignore the seeds of systemic inequalities sown in our Nation's history and lain bare by diligent review.' . . We have new names today: George Floyd, Elijah McClain, Rayshard Brooks, and too many others. The world knows why they died. The same seeds whose bitter fruit killed Leroy Hughes killed them too. And on March 13, 2017, in Euclid, Ohio, they killed Luke Stewart. That the seeds of these senseless killings are systemic should not absolve the shooters. Our system of justice bestows upon police great powers and a sacred trust. We rightly protect police from penalties that otherwise would follow from poor conduct when officers act with reason. But when officers fail to act with reason, when they are motivated by impulses that spring from dark corners of the psyche or simply fail implicitly to acknowledge the humanity of the people before them, they violate our sacred trust. And then the same system that empowers and protects police must, if it is to function properly, if it is to be worthy of recognition as a system of justice, strip those powers and protections away. Luke Stewart should be alive today. He was unarmed, unsuspected of committing a serious felony, and behind the wheel of a stationary vehicle when Rhodes opened fire into his torso, chest, neck, and wrist. Qualified immunity should not shield Rhodes from the consequences of that unreasonable decision. I dissent.”)

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Baldwin v. City of Estherville, 915 N.W.2d 259, 281-99 (Iowa 2018) (Appel, J., joined by Hecht, J., dissenting) (“The federal doctrine of statutory qualified immunity progressively dilutes legal norms, embraces numerous false assumptions, fails to recognize the important role of juries in restraining government, and is inconsistent with important tenants of Iowa law. We should not voluntarily drape our constitutional law with the heavy chains of indefensible doctrine. We should aim to eliminate fictions in our law and be honest and forthright on the important question of what happens when officers of the law commit constitutional wrongs that inflict serious reputational, emotional, and financial harms on our citizens. . . . We should tread very carefully before we limit the scope of remedies for unconstitutional conduct because we are, in effect, cutting down the scope of the substantive rights involved. Make no mistake, this case is not about the tail on the dog. It is about the dog. The notion that judges may create a ‘gap’ between constitutional rights and the remedies afforded is untenable. The consequence of such a gap is to effectively reduce the constitutional protections afforded to the public. To the extent they are not enforced, the nice words in the constitution do not mean what they seem to mean. . . . In short, when citizens suffer potentially grievous harms from unconstitutional conduct in violation of article I, section 1 or article I, section 8, we should require the officials who engaged in the unconstitutional conduct to bear the burden of the loss. We should not allow the officials who engage in unconstitutional conduct to respond to the prayer of the harmed citizen with, ‘Aw, tough luck. Tut tut. Bye bye.’ . . . The common law provenance of broad-brushed statutory qualified immunity asserted by the United States Supreme Court in its statutory qualified immunity cases is based on an incorrect view of common law history. . . . [T]he Supreme Court has, in its constitutional immunity cases, confused the role of good faith as an element of a specific offense with the different and much broader notion of good-faith immunity. For instance, in Pierson, the Supreme Court cited the elements of the tort of false arrest at common law. . . . But the fact that bad faith and flagrancy are elements of certain common law torts is not a basis for a broadly framed, across-the-board constitutional immunity doctrine. . . . And in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, the Court jettisoned subjective bad faith for objective bad faith, a clear departure from any approach to the common law immunities. . . . This innovation had no basis at all in common law. Even among members of the Supreme Court, the fiction that broad statutory qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is supported by the common law is unraveling. At least three Justices have recognized that the statutory qualified immunities caselaw, in fact, departs from common law precedents. For example, in Wyatt v. Cole, Justice Kennedy noted that the Court had ‘diverged to a substantial degree from the historical standards’ of the common law and observed that statutory immunity was not supposed to be based upon ‘freewheeling policy choice[s].’ . . . In a dissenting opinion in Crawford-El v. Britton, Justice Scalia noted that ‘our treatment of qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 has not purported to be faithful to the common-law immunities that existed when § 1983 was enacted.’ . . . Most recently, in Ziglar v. Abbasi, Justice Thomas observed that ‘we have diverged from the historical inquiry mandated by the statute.’ . . . The sandy foundation of federal statutory qualified immunity is not withstanding the test of time but rather is being washed away. . . . Robust qualified immunity for individuals committing constitutional wrongs is completely inconsistent with the wording, the legislative history, and the challenging historical purpose of the statute. . . . If it is true that police conduct will be chilled by tort rules, then the granting of immunity will lead police to engage in more unconstitutional activities because they do not have to worry about potential liabilities. We must consider both halves of the deterrence walnut. Indeed, at common law, an official’s exposure to ‘being mulcted in damages was precisely the deterrent for errors of judgment.’ . . . More recently, the NAACP Legal Defense Fund has explicitly called for a reexamination of the legal standards governing qualified immunity in light of police violence involving African-Americans. . . . According to the NAACP view, more deterrence is needed. . . . Judge Jon Newman agrees, calling upon Congress to abolish the defense of qualified immunity in order to better control police misconduct. Jon O. Newman, Here’s a Better Way to Punish the Police: Sue Them for Money, Wash. Post (June 23, 2016), http://wapo.st/28R2Np4?tid=ss_mail&utm_term=.16d65eac7e49y [<https://perma.cc/2CSG-2ERG>]. The libertarian Cato Institute has joined the fray, noting ‘the deleterious effect [that qualified immunity] has on the ability of citizens to vindicate their constitutional rights, and the subsequent erosion of accountability among public officials that the doctrine encourages.’ Brief of the Cato Institute as Amicus Curiae Supporting Plaintiffs-Appellees and Affirmance at 1, Williams v. Cline, — F.3d. — (7th Cir. 2018) (No. 17–2603), <https://object.cato.org/sites/cato.org/files/pubs/pdf/williams-v-cline-cato-amicus-brief-motion.pdf> [<https://perma.cc/R6UU-E7AB>]; see also Devon W. Carbado, Blue-on-Black Violence: A Provisional Model of Some of the Causes, 104 Geo. L.J. 1479, 1519–24 (2016) (examining problems presented by qualified immunity and indemnification). . . . The handwringing of the United States Supreme Court in its qualified immunity cases shows a dissatisfaction with the common law and with the failure of the legislative branch to enact policy preferences that the majority of the Court seems to prefer. Qualified immunity is thus simply judicial legislation—it reflects dissatisfaction with the failure of the legislative process to relieve individual officers of liability through indemnification and the achievement of the desired policy result through judicially legislating a policy of qualified immunity. . . . The federal approach to statutory qualified immunity embraces a dynamic that has progressively chewed and choked potential remedies for constitutional violations. The federal approach requires a plaintiff to overcome qualified immunity by demonstrating that the officials involved engaged in violations of ‘clearly established rights.’ . . . A key question, of course, is at what level of generality is this test imposed? The federal caselaw suggests that the level of generality has become increasingly specific—namely, that unless there is an authoritative, reported case that is nearly factually identical to the case in question, the constitutional right is not clearly established. . . . Further, in determining whether there has been a violation of constitutional rights, the federal courts jettisoned any subjective test in favor of a ‘reasonableness’ test in determining whether the actions of the officers qualify for immunity. . . . The objective reasonableness test is, of course, so amorphous that some liability might have emerged for officials, so the federal caselaw has now tightened the screw another turn by replacing or supplementing the objectively reasonable standard with the new formulation of ‘entirely unreasonable.’ . . . And, there is more. By now allowing, if not encouraging, courts not to reach the question of whether a constitutional violation actually occurred, but only whether the right involved was ‘clearly established,’ the constitutional immunity doctrine has prevented the development of substantive constitutional law by reducing the number of cases that address claims on the constitutional merits. . . . The federal constitutional immunity doctrine thus serves to limit the development of constitutional law by eliminating consideration of constitutional uncertainties in filed cases. . . . Further, the presence of difficult-to-meet constitutional immunity standards has dramatic impact in law offices where lawyers and putative clients weight the practicalities of bringing constitutionally based legal actions in the face of strong immunity headwinds. See Alexander A. Reinert, Does Qualified Immunity Matter?, 8 U. St. Thomas L.J. 477, 494–95 (2011) (noting “qualified immunity plays a large role in case selection” and “limit[s] the extent to which civil rights litigation tests the boundaries of the law”). The creation of artificial immunities for constitutional violations is bad news for the development of state constitutional law. . . . The mere lifting of federal statutory qualified immunity doctrine and supplanting it into analysis of constitutional claims under the Iowa Constitution is a nonstarter. The question is whether we should independently develop a judge-made doctrine of qualified immunity to relieve public officials from liability for damages arising from their unlawful conduct as a supplement to the constitutional text contained in article I of the Iowa Constitution. I conclude that we should not manufacture a qualified immunity doctrine for constitutional wrongs of public officials. Our state constitutional tradition places strong emphasis on the Bill of Rights. . . . There can simply be no doubt that limiting the remedies available for violations of constitutional provisions limits the substantive protections of those constitutional provisions for all practical purposes. Justice Harlan was spot-on when he observed that the relationship between substance and remedy is one-on-one. . . . In any event, the basic premise that qualified immunity is needed to prevent overdeterrence of official conduct has little support. A recent study by Professor Joanna Schwartz confirms what one might suspect, namely, that at least with respect to police officers, local governments almost always indemnify for settlements and judgments arising out of misconduct lawsuits. See Joanna C. Schwartz, Police Indemnification, 89 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 885, 912 (2014). . . . The fact that officers are almost always indemnified undercuts one of the primary arguments in favor of the immunity doctrine—that without it, officers will be deterred from engaging in appropriate activities for fear of the financial consequences of a wrong decision.”)

Iowa, 971 F.3d 816, 820 (8th Cir. 2020) (“At the motion to dismiss stage, both parties briefed the new ‘all due care’ qualified immunity standard as applied to the hunters’ unreasonable search claim under Article I, § 8 of the Iowa Constitution. The officers again raised qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, although neither party referenced the new standard, instead applying federal standards. The district court, noting the error, applied the correct legal standard to the Iowa constitutional claim. The hunters do not challenge that Baldwin is the applicable Iowa standard, or that the district court correctly applied the new standard to the facts of this case. They also do not argue they were not given an adequate opportunity to brief the issue. . . . The district court did not err in considering summary judgment for the unreasonable search claims under the Iowa Constitution.”)

NINTH CIRCUIT

Hardy v. Kish, No. 1:23-CV-00306-BLW, 2025 WL 253342, at *8 n.1 (D. Idaho Jan. 21, 2025) (“Ms. Hardy argues that qualified immunity is contrary to the text of the Constitution. As this Court recently recognized, ‘[t]he history of qualified immunity is fraught; the scholarship cited is rigorous; and the district court opinion is moving and thoughtful. However, none of it is authoritative precedent for this Court. Binding law from the Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit has unambiguously recognized qualified immunity. That is the law the Court is required to rely upon.’ Schuchardt v. Sousa, --- F. Supp. 3d ---, 2024 WL 4418061, at *9 (D. Idaho Oct. 4, 2024). (“In legal circles and beyond, one of the most debated civil rights litigation issues of our time is the appropriate scope and application of the qualified immunity doctrine, particularly in cases of deaths resulting from police shootings. . . . Many legal scholars and others have called for the doctrine to be revisited and eliminated, significantly restricted, or at the very least altered. . . . For years, justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the lower federal courts, have been critical of the application and expansion of the doctrine. . . . While there is so much more that could, and perhaps should, be said about the current state of this judicially created doctrine, the undersigned will stop here for today. In short, this judge joins with those who have endorsed a complete re-examination of the doctrine which, as it is currently applied, mandates illogical, unjust, and puzzling results in many cases.”)

REV. 45 (2018); Cato Institute, Qualified Immunity: The Supreme Court’s Unlawful Assault on Civil Rights and Police Accountability (March 1, 2018 policy forum). For years, justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the lower federal courts, have been critical of the application and expansion of the doctrine. See, e.g., Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1162 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (“The majority today...tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished. Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.”); Ziglar v. Abbasi, ___ U.S. ___, ___, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1872 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“In an appropriate case, we should reconsider our qualified immunity jurisprudence.”); Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 647 (1987) (Stevens, J., dissenting) (“The Court stunningly restricts the constitutional accountability of the police by creating a false dichotomy between police entitlement to summary judgment on immunity grounds and damages liability for every police misstep, by responding to this dichotomy with an uncritical application of the precedents of qualified immunity that we have developed for a quite different group of high public office holders, and by displaying remarkably little fidelity to the countervailing principles of individual liberty and privacy that infuse the Fourth Amendment.”); Zadeh v. Robinson, ___ F.3d ___, 2019 WL 2752310, at *16 (5th Cir. July 2, 2019) (Willett, J., concurring) (“Qualified immunity aims to balance competing policy goals. And I concede it enjoys special favor at the Supreme Court, which seems untroubled by any one-sidedness. Even so, I add my voice to a growing, cross-ideological chorus of jurists and scholars urging recalibration of contemporary immunity jurisprudence and its ‘real world implementation.’”); Manzanares v. Roosevelt Cty. Adult Detention Ctr., 331 F. Supp. 3d 1260, 1293–94 n.10 (D.N.M. 2018) (critiquing the Supreme Court’s application of qualified immunity in many respects, among them the application of the clearly established law requirement, noting: “Factually identical or highly similar factual cases are not, however, the way the real world works. Cases differ. Many cases have so many facts that are unlikely to ever occur again in a significantly similar way”). While there is so much more that could, and perhaps should, be said about the current state of this judicially created doctrine, the undersigned will stop here for today. In short, this judge joins with those who have endorsed a complete re-examination of the doctrine which, as it is currently applied, mandates illogical, unjust, and puzzling results in many cases. However, the Supreme Court’s decision in Kisela is, of course, binding on this court. The circumstances presented there, where the Supreme Court held the officer was entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment, posed a significantly lesser degree of danger to a third party than those presented in this case. Accordingly, application of the holding in Kisela to the undisputed evidence in this case dictates the result reached herein.”), aff’d, 978 F.3d 1088 (9th Cir. 2020).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Estate of Taylor v. Salt Lake City, 16 F.4th 744, 785-87 (10th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 83 (2022) (Lucero, J., dissenting) (“Today, this court at once invades the province of the jury to resolve disputes of material fact and disregards decades of Supreme Court precedent when it bends over backward to draw all possible inferences in favor of Officer Cruz. Although the majority’s misapplication of the law is egregious on its own, we must not for one second lose sight of the behavior that the court rubber-stamps today. Officer Cruz is absolved of his constitutional obligation to reasonably investigate a plainly unreliable 911 complaint, the details of which he ignored. Three young Hispanic men were stopped without reasonable suspicion of any crime. Officers pursued an unarmed and non-threatening Dillon Taylor with guns drawn, ignoring his right to walk away from an unconstitutional stop. Adam and Jerrail were chastised for raising their hands too quickly, but Dillon was shot and killed for complying too slowly. As a result, yet another innocent young American is dead at the hands of police. That his family is left without so much as a trial to assess the reasonableness of these actions is a travesty of justice that I cannot abide. The resolution of this case by a panel of judges rather than a citizen jury is emblematic of profound structural issues with the judicially created doctrine of qualified immunity. Empirical evidence demonstrates that the doctrine as currently implemented fails to serve even its purported goal of protecting law-abiding government officials from the time and expense of frivolous litigation. See Joanna C. Schwartz, How Qualified Immunity Fails, 127 Yale L.J. 2, 71 (2018). . . Rather, it functions to discourage the filing of meritorious civil rights claims and incents frivolous actions not subject to qualified immunity. . . At the same time, police kill nearly 1,100 Americans each year, a figure more than thirty times greater than other wealthy countries. . . Against this illogical backdrop, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that qualified immunity as currently constituted is broken. As Dillon’s case so tragically illustrates, the doctrine precludes remedies for unconstitutional police actions while serving no discernible societal benefit. Of course, Dillon’s family is not alone in bearing the costs of this confounding reality. . . So long as qualified immunity fails to serve any evident purpose, I am left to conclude that the reasonableness of governmental use of force is best assessed by juries comprised of citizens subjected to the police actions we are asked to judge. Particularly in cases like Dillon’s, replete with disputed facts, it is clear that judicial adjudication of police use of force has failed to strike the appropriate balance between public safety and individual rights required by the Constitution. Dillon had a phone, a Snickers bar, and a nickel in his pocket—not a gun. Officer Cruz had no basis to believe otherwise. After paying careful attention to the facts and circumstances of this case, I cannot conclude that Officer Cruz’s actions were objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when eight-and-a-half minutes after hearing the 911 dispatch, and 22 seconds after pulling up in his cruiser, he shot and killed Dillon Taylor for no crime at all. As Jerrail Taylor asks, as should we all: ‘what the [expletive] did I just do, ... that I can’t walk in America and buy a goddamn drink and a beer, like what am I doing wrong?’”)

Cox v. Wilson, 971 F.3d 1159, 1161-65 (10th Cir. 2020) (Lucero, J., joined by Phillips, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“Because the panel decision in this case exponentially expands in this circuit the judicially created doctrine of qualified immunity into an all-purpose, no-default, use-at-any-time defense against asserted police misconduct, and because it clearly demonstrates so much of what is wrong with qualified immunity, I requested that my colleagues review the panel decision en banc. From the denial of that request, I respectfully dissent. . . . Instead of expressly ruling on the merits of the issues raised and granting the parties the due process to which they are entitled, the panel chose to openly entangle the previously denied and dismissed doctrine of qualified immunity into its analysis. It denied the parties a ruling on the merits of their appeal and instead concluded that because police misconduct in a prior case was arguably more egregious than the misconduct at issue in this case—but was nevertheless shielded by qualified immunity—the deputy sheriff in this case is similarly protected by qualified immunity. Specifically, the panel reasons that because the conduct in the prior case was apparently ‘improp[er]’ to ‘most laypersons’ but not in violation of clearly established law, it follows that the officer’s conduct in this case is also not a violation of clearly established law. . . .As has been noted, the text of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ‘makes no mention of defenses or immunities.’ Baxter v. Bracey, — U.S. —, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1862, — L.Ed.2d — (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari) (quotation and alteration omitted). Qualified immunity is entirely a court-created doctrine. As concerns police officer misconduct, it stems from the Court’s 1967 decision, Pierson v. Ray, 386 U.S. 547, 556-57, 87 S.Ct. 1213, 18 L.Ed.2d 288 (1967). Following its creation, which intended to prevent frivolous and harassing litigation, . . . the doctrine has mutated in seemingly unending fashion. The case before us is Exhibit A of that continuing transformation. Much of the problem with the expansion of the doctrine is exacerbated because the Court has failed to give direction on (1) the scope of appellate court power to raise qualified immunity as a basis for disposition of a case when qualified immunity was denied by or not raised before the district court, and (2) the required nexus of particular facts necessary to satisfy the clearly-established element of qualified immunity analysis. In concluding that Wilson was entitled to qualified immunity, the panel relies solely on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether the constitutional right violated ‘was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s unlawful conduct.’ . . . But it ignores that the district court denied qualified immunity to Wilson under this prong because the relevant ‘factual context [wa]s highly disputed.’ . . . And worse, rather than compare the specific facts of the present case with those of prior cases, the panel satisfies itself with comparing the relative perceived egregiousness of police conduct in factually dissimilar cases. Specifically, the panel relies only on the facts of Pauly, a case that did not involve a car chase, vehicular pursuit, or any facts remotely similar to the facts of the instant case. . . . At a time when ‘courts of appeals are divided—intractably—over precisely what degree of factual similarity must exist’ for a constitutional violation to be clearly established, Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), the panel opinion effectively signals to lower courts that they may circumvent issues of factual fit by relying on idiosyncratic assessments of the relative impropriety of officer misconduct. Shifting the focus from ‘particularized’ facts to nebulous notions of comparative impropriety places this case squarely into the conflict among our sibling circuits in applying the clearly-established prong. . . . And it calls for just ‘the sort of “freewheeling policy choice[s]”’ the Court has ‘disclaimed the power to make.’. . . Further, the panel’s most unusual resurrection of the qualified immunity issue to correct a squarely presented trial error similarly invites lower courts to make ‘freewheeling policy choice[s]’ inappropriate under § 1983. . . . Though the federal courts of appeals disagree as to whether courts are empowered to raise sua sponte the affirmative defense of qualified immunity on behalf of the government, . . . none have suggested appellate power extends to reversing the trial court’s denial of qualified immunity when such reversal has not been appealed—until now. Thus, by resurrecting an issue raised, resolved, and not appealed, the panel takes yet another step down the road of mutating the doctrine into an ‘absolute shield’ against consequences for the violation of constitutional rights. . . . As noted, this case is Exhibit A of that metastasis. For these reasons, the panel’s decision is neither ‘right [n]or just under the law.’. . . The modern qualified immunity doctrine already sends the ‘alarming signal to law enforcement officers ... that they can shoot first and think later.’. . . Our panel opinion adds another signal: egregious police misconduct will go unpunished if the court can locate prior, arguably more improper conduct that escaped liability. In other words, the Tenth Circuit now holds that a reasonable officer would not ‘understand that what he is doing violates [a constitutional] right,’. . . if ‘worse’ conduct has previously been shielded by qualified immunity. This terrible precedent, thus created, is two-fold. One: it allows panels to use qualified immunity, at any stage of litigation, to uphold an otherwise erroneous decision of the district court—notwithstanding a substantial dispute regarding the evidence; notwithstanding the denial of a previous motion not appealed in a timely manner; and notwithstanding the district court denied qualified immunity time and again. Two: it shields police misconduct from liability so long as any other government officer at some point committed—in the panel’s mind—more improper conduct and was not held liable. Together, these two pronouncements create a carte blanche which can be scripted and negotiated to counter the public interest and foster the violation of constitutional rights by those charged with protecting them. Regrettably, this case is one of many illustrating that the profound issues with qualified immunity are recurring and worsening. ‘Given the importance’ of these issues, we can no longer delay confronting them. Baxter, 140 S. Ct. at 1865 (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari). Particularly in light of recent—though not novel—unrest, at least one of our sibling circuits has recognized that the relentless transformation of qualified immunity into an absolute shield must stop. See Est. of Jones by Jones v. City of Martinsburg, 961 F.3d 661, 673 (4th Cir. 2020), as amended (June 10, 2020). But as it stands in the Tenth Circuit, the panel opinion allows courts to finesse ambiguities to avoid confronting the hard issues presented. And that’s a denial of due process any way you look at it. By continuing to await addressing deep and troubling qualified immunity issues brought to our attention time and again, we are complicit in this denial.”)

White v. City of Topeka, 489 F.Supp.3d 1209, 1212-14 (D. Kan. 2020) (“In recent years, many judicial officers have criticized qualified immunity. For example, Justice Thomas repeatedly has expressed his ‘strong doubts about [the Supreme Court’s] § 1983 qualified immunity doctrine.’ [citing Baxter v. Bracey, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1865 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) and Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1870, 1872 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment)] Recently, several federal district court judges have levied strong criticism of the qualified immunity doctrine because of the way it immunizes police officers for their actions. [citing Jamison v. McClendon, 476 F. Supp. 3d 386 (S.D. Miss. 2020) and other cases] This dialogue, however, can’t displace the court’s current job in this case. The court ‘is required to apply the law’ governing qualified immunity ‘as stated by the Supreme Court.’ . . . So, within these strictures imposed by the qualified immunity doctrine, the court must determine whether the two officers violated Mr. White’s clearly established constitutional right against use of excessive force. This summary judgment order reaches two primary conclusions. First, based on the summary judgment facts, the court holds that a reasonable jury could conclude that the totality of the circumstances do not support probable cause to believe Mr. White committed severe crimes or that he posed a threat of serious physical harm to the officers or others. And so, under these facts, a genuine issue exists whether the officers’ use of force was unjustified. . . Second, and again applying the summary judgment facts, the court nonetheless holds that qualified immunity applies. It reaches this conclusion because plaintiffs have failed to identify a ‘clearly established right’ that the officers violated. In other words, plaintiffs have identified no clearly established Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case that prohibited use of deadly force against an individual who was carrying a firearm in his pocket, had ignored officers’ commands to lie down and stop, had resisted officers’ attempts to secure his firearm, and then fled from officers with the gun still in his possession. Likewise, the court’s independent research has located no such case. This second conclusion requires the court to grant summary judgment on plaintiffs’ claim against the two officers.”)

Green v. Padilla, No. CIV 19-0751 JB\JFR, 2020 WL 5350175, at *20 n.6 (D.N.M. Sept. 4, 2020) (Browning, J.) (“It seems ironic that the federal courts would restrict a congressionally mandated remedy for constitutional violations -- presumably the rights of innocent people -- and discourage case law development on the civil side -- and restrict case law development to motions to suppress, which reward only the guilty and is a judicially created, rather than legislatively created, remedy. Commentators have noted that, ‘[o]ver the past three decades, the Supreme Court has drastically limited the availability of remedies for constitutional violations in’ exclusionary rule litigation in a criminal case, habeas corpus challenges, and civil litigation under § 1983. . . . Some commentators have also encouraged the courts to drop the suppression remedy and the legislature to provide more -- not less -- civil remedies for constitutional violations. . . . In Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586 (2006), the Supreme Court noted that civil remedies were a viable alternative to a motion to suppress when it held that the exclusionary rule was inapplicable to cases in which police officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they fail to knock and announce their presence before entering. . . . Rather than being a poor or discouraged means of developing constitutional law, § 1983 seems the better and preferable alternative to a motion to suppress. It is interesting that the current Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit appear more willing to suppress evidence and let criminal defendants go free, than have police pay damages for violations of innocent citizens' civil rights. It is odd that the Supreme Court has not adopted a clearly established prong for suppression claims; it seems strange to punish society for police violating unclear law in criminal cases but protect municipalities from damages in § 1983 cases.”)

Stevenson on behalf of Howard v. City of Albuquerque, No. CIV 17-855 JB\LF, 2020 WL 873937, at *26 n.46 (D.N.M. Feb. 21, 2020) (Browning, J.) (“The Supreme Court signals to the lower courts that a factually identical or a highly similar factual case is required for the law to be clearly established, and the Tenth Circuit is now sending those signals to the district courts. . . Factually identical or highly similar factual cases are not, however, the way the real world works. Cases differ. Many cases have so many facts that are unlikely to ever occur again in a significantly similar way. . . The Supreme Court’s view of the clearly established prong assumes that officers are routinely reading Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit opinions in their spare time, carefully comparing the facts in these qualified immunity cases with the circumstances they confront in their day-to-day police work. It is hard enough for the federal judiciary to embark on such an exercise, let alone likely that police officers are endeavoring to parse opinions. It is far more likely that, in their training and continuing education, police officers are taught general principles, and, in the intense atmosphere of an arrest, police officers rely on these general principles, rather than engaging in a detailed comparison of their situation with a previous Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit case. It strains credulity to believe that a reasonable officer, as he is approaching a suspect to arrest, is thinking to himself: ‘Are the facts here anything like the facts in York v. City of Las Cruces?’ Thus, when the Supreme Court grounds its clearly-established jurisprudence in the language of what a reasonable officer or a ‘reasonable official’ would know, Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. at 1153, yet still requires a highly factually analogous case, it has either lost sight of reasonable officer’s experience or it is using that language to mask an intent to create ‘an absolute shield for law enforcement officers,’ Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. at 1162 (Sotomayor, J. dissenting). The Court concludes that the Supreme Court is doing the latter, crafting its recent qualified immunity jurisprudence to effectively eliminate § 1983 claims against state actors in their individual capacities by requiring an indistinguishable case and by encouraging courts to go straight to the clearly established prong. . . The Court disagrees with the Supreme Court’s approach. The most conservative, principled decision is to minimize the expansion of the judicially created clearly established prong, so that it does not eclipse the congressionally enacted § 1983 remedy. As the Cato Institute noted in a recent amicus brief, ‘qualified immunity has increasingly diverged from the statutory and historical framework on which it is supposed to be based.’. . See generally William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45 (2018)(arguing that the Supreme Court’s justifications for qualified immunity are incorrect). Further, as the Honorable Clarence Thomas, Associate Justice for the Supreme Court, has argued, because the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity analysis ‘is no longer grounded in the common-law backdrop against which Congress enacted [§ 1983], we are no longer engaged in “interpret[ing] the intent of Congress in enacting” the Act.’. . The judiciary should be true to § 1983 as Congress wrote it. Moreover, there should be a remedy when there is a constitutional violation, and jury trials are the most democratic expression of what police action is reasonable and what action is excessive. If the citizens of New Mexico decide that state actors used excessive force or were deliberately indifferent, the verdict should stand, not be set aside because the parties could not find an indistinguishable Tenth Circuit or Supreme Court decision. Finally, to always decide the clearly established prong first and then to always say that the law is not clearly established could be stunting the development of constitutional law. See Aaron L. Nielson & Christopher J. Walker, The New Qualified Immunity, 89 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 6 (2015). And while the Tenth Circuit -- with the exception of now-Justice Gorsuch, see Shannon M. Grammel, Justice Gorsuch on Qualified Immunity, 69 Stan. L. Rev. Online 163 (2017) -- seems to agree with the Court, see, e.g., Casey v. City of Federal Heights, 509 F.3d at 1286, the per curiam reversals appear to have the Tenth Circuit stepping lightly around qualified immunity's clearly established prong, see Aldaba II, 844 F.3d at 874; Malone v. Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs for Cty. of Dona Ana, 707 F. App'x at 555-56; Brown v. City of Colorado Springs, 709 F. App'x 906, 915-16 (10th Cir. 2017), and willing to reverse district court decisions.") Ganley v. Jojola, 402 F.Supp.3d 1021, 1095 n.38 (D.N.M. 2019) (Browning, J.) ("The Court further notes that the Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence 'effectively eliminate[s] § 1983 claims by requiring an indistinguishable case and by encouraging courts to go straight to the clearly established prong. . . Such de facto rigidity has led Professor Karen Blum of Suffolk University Law School to conclude that the Supreme Court's approach to qualified immunity has

(1) stifled the development of constitutional standards while creating a confusing and divisive debate about what constitutes 'clearly established' law; (2) imposed substantial burdens and costs on the litigation of civil rights claims by encouraging multiple and often frivolous or meritless interlocutory appeals; and (3) resulted in judges displacing jurors as fact finders. Karen M. Blum, Qualified Immunity: Time to Change the Message, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1887, 1891 (2018)(citing Nelson v. City of Albuquerque, 283 F. Supp. 3d at 1107 n.44). Professor Blum is not alone. The Honorable Robert W. Pratt, senior United States District Judge for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, sitting by designation, has likewise noted that 'because every individual case will present at least nominal factual distinctions[,] ... [i]f precisely identical facts were required, qualified immunity would in fact be absolute immunity for government officials.' . . Moreover, the Honorable Jack B. Weinstein, senior United States District Judge for the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, has also criticized the doctrine on the same grounds, and, in Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975 (E.D.N.Y. June 11, 2018), Judge Weinstein devotes significant discussion to highlighting concerns he and others have regarding the Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence. . . Although the Court agrees that such criticism is warranted, and would, if the Court were writing on a clean slate, minimize the expansion of the judicially created clearly established prong so that it does not eclipse the congressionally enacted § 1983 remedy, as a district court, the Court is bound to apply faithfully and honestly controlling Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent, and it will do so here.”)

Manzanares v. Roosevelt County Adult Det. Ctr., 331 F.Supp.3d 1260, 1294 n.10 (D.N.M. 2018) (Browning, J.) (“If a district court in New Mexico is trying -- as it does diligently and faithfully -- to receive and read the unwritten signs of its superior courts, it would appear that the Supreme Court has signaled through its per curiam qualified immunity reversals that a nigh identical case must exist for the law to be clearly established. As former Tenth Circuit judge, and now Stanford law school professor, Michael McConnell, has noted, much of what lower courts do is read the implicit, unwritten signs that the superior courts send them through their opinions. . . Although still stating that there might be an obvious case under Graham that would make the law clearly established without a Supreme Court or Circuit Court case on point, . . . the Supreme Court has sent unwritten signals to the lower courts that a factually identical or a highly similar factual case is required for the law to be clearly established, and the Tenth Circuit is now sending those unwritten signals to the district courts[.] . . . common law of 1871 did not include any across-the-board defense for all public officials.’ Cato Brief at 2. ‘With limited exceptions, the baseline assumption at the founding and throughout the nineteenth century was that public officials were strictly liable for unconstitutional misconduct. Judges and scholars alike have thus increasingly arrived at the conclusion that the contemporary doctrine of qualified immunity is unmoored from any lawful justification.’ Cato Brief at 2. See generally William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. Bergdorf*, 889 F.3d 1136, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018)(Baldock, J.)(holding that a child caseworker was not entitled to qualified immunity, because a caseworker would know that ‘child abuse and neglect allegations might give rise to constitutional liability under the special relationship exception’); McCoy v. Meyers, 887 F.3d 1034, 1052-53 (10th Cir. 2018)(Matheson, J.)(concluding that there was clearly established law even though the three decisions invoked to satisfy that prong were not ‘factually identical to this case,’ because those cases ‘nevertheless made it clear that the use of force on effectively subdued individuals violates the Fourth Amendment’). But see Lakey for the Estate of Lakey v. City of Wilson, No. CIV-20-152-RAW, 2024 WL 2221675, at *3 (E.D. Okla. May 16, 2024) (“We will start by addressing Plaintiff’s novel argument that Qualified Immunity should be overturned. . . . This Court must reject Plaintiff’s argument as it bound by stare decisis to follow decades of Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit case law which acknowledge the validity of applying qualified immunity when relevant to § 1983 claims. Plaintiff argues that qualified immunity should be overturned because the doctrine contradicts the ‘Notwithstanding Clause’ of § 1983 of the Civil Rights Act. . . This language, Plaintiff argues, prevents courts from applying state common law defenses, such as qualified immunity to § 1983 cases. . . The original text of Section 1 of Congress’s 1871 Civil Rights act, in pertinent part states as follows:

That any person who, under color of any law, statue, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage of any state, shall subject or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights ... shall, any such law, statue ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the state to the contrary notwithstanding, be liable to the party injured.

. . . Plaintiff argues that the underlined language which was subsequently omitted from the U.S.C. would bar the application of qualified immunity, a state common law doctrine, to § 1983 cases. Both the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals have repeatedly upheld the application of qualified immunity to § 1983 cases. . . . The Plaintiff does not provide a single example of binding or persuasive case law where a federal court applies the rule of law for which it argues. As such, this Court is bound by both Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent recognizing that qualified immunity may apply to § 1983 cases. There is simply no precedent for interpreting the ‘Notwithstanding Clause’ to mean that the doctrine of qualified immunity does not apply in the context of § 1983 of the Civil Rights Act. Thus, this Court rejects Plaintiffs’ argument that qualified immunity should be overturned.”)

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Stalley v. Cumbie, 124 F.4th 1273, 1322 n.7 (11th Cir. 2024) (Jordan, J., dissenting) (“Like others, I have said elsewhere that the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence is mistaken and should be corrected. See Sosa v. Martin Cnty., 57 F.4th 1297, 1303 (11th Cir. 2023) (en banc) (Jordan, J., concurring). And recent historical scholarship also suggests that, when the statute that became § 1983 was enacted, Congress included the phrase ‘any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage of the state to the contrary notwithstanding.’ This phrase was incorrectly omitted by the first Reviser of Federal Statutes when the first edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States was published in 1874. See Alexander A. Reinhert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Cal. L. Rev. 201, 235–38 (2023). As some judges have explained, this revelation has significant consequences for today’s qualified immunity doctrine. See, e.g., Price v. Montgomery Cnty., Ky., 72 F.4th 711, 727 n.1 (6th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 144 S. Ct. 2499, — L.Ed.2d — (2024) (Nalbandian, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 979–81 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willet, J., concurring). If today’s decision is a harbinger of where qualified immunity has put us, the correction of the doctrine can’t come fast enough.”)

Gilmore v. Georgia Department of Corrections, 111 F.4th 1118, 1138-41 (11th Cir. 2024) (Newsom, J., concurring), reh’g en banc granted, 119 F.4th 839 (11th Cir. 2024) (“Many have complained that modern qualified-immunity jurisprudence is fundamentally broken for one reason or another. Some say, for instance, that it's textually and historically unjustifiable, at least in its current form. See, e.g., William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45 (2018). Others contend that it bears no connection to the realities of modern policing. See, e.g., Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity's Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605 (2021). I'll leave those major-league debates for another day. For now, I'd simply like to highlight a couple of minor-league oddities generated by existing qualified-immunity doctrine. . . The first results from the fact that the Supreme Court has bounced around about the order in which reviewing courts should decide qualified-immunity's merits and 'clearly established' prongs. Initially, of course, in Saucier v. Katz, the Supreme Court held that a reviewing court should always resolve the merits of a plaintiff's constitutional claim first, before determining whether the law underlying that claim was sufficiently clearly established to defeat qualified immunity. . . Less than a decade later, though, in Pearson v. Callahan, the Court reversed itself and held that the Saucier sequence should no longer be regarded as mandatory' and that reviewing courts may consider the merits and clearly-established issues in whatever order they wish. . . Both options entail perversities of a sort. On the one hand, if courts routinely bypass the merits in favor of resolving the qualified-immunity issue on the clearly-established prong, they forgo valuable opportunities to establish law for future cases. . . On the other hand, if a court concludes that a defendant's conduct violated the Constitution, but then goes on to hold that the law wasn't clearly established at the time he acted and that he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, its merits holding is effectively dictum. . . Today's decision takes the latter path, tackling the merits before proceeding to the clearly-established inquiry. And given the circumstances, I think that's the right call: The Fourth Amendment questions that this case presents are important both to prison officials and to would-be prison visitors, and they are likely to recur; accordingly, it makes sense to go ahead and decide them. Even so, I must admit that it feels strange—even a little jarring—to resolve weighty constitutional questions of first impression in what all must agree is (or in ordinary circumstances would be) dictum. . . [I]n answering the Fourth Amendment question on the merits, we've done exactly what the Supreme Court has authorized us to do. It's just weird that the qualified-immunity two-step permits—and in some way even encourages—courts to do the very thing that we would otherwise condemn. . . . The second oddity relates to the question whether a reviewing court can consider non-binding authority in determining whether the law at issue was 'clearly established' for qualified-immunity purposes. Today's majority opinion correctly recognizes that existing Eleventh Circuit precedent prevents us from looking beyond this Court's jurisdictional boundaries in search of clearly established law. . . In her separate concurring opinion, Judge Rosenbaum makes the case that our rule contravenes the Supreme Court's own precedent, which, she says, has long recognized that not only 'controlling authority' but also 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' can clearly establish the law. . . I share Judge Rosenbaum's concern that we may well be out of step with the Supreme Court's view about the role of non-binding authority in the qualified-immunity calculus. But I'll confess that I'm not at all sure how a 'robust consensus' rule would (or should) operate in the real world. For better or worse, modern qualified-immunity doctrine bottoms on notions of 'fair notice' to government officials. . . Accordingly, in determining whether a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' can clearly establish the law for qualified-immunity purposes, we should presumably ask whether that sort (and exactly what sort) of consensus gives officials the requisite notice. . . . And at the risk of getting all meta, the answer to that question, in turn, may well turn on one's views on the nature of law itself—evocative, in a way, of the well-worn debates surrounding Swift and Erie. Here's what I mean: Is 'the law'—of the sort that either is or isn't clearly established—necessarily the product of some sovereign lawgiver? Or can it exist of its own force, without the need for a formal, authoritative, binding decree? If it's the former, then there's presumably no basis for looking beyond our jurisdictional boundaries in assessing whether 'the law' was clearly established. On that view, government officials working within the confines of the Eleventh Circuit are entitled to limit their search for and knowledge of 'the law' to this court's binding decisions—other courts' decisions may be interesting, they may be informative, but they can't clearly establish 'the law.' But if it's the latter—if 'the law' can exist independently of a binding decree—then the rule that only in-circuit decisions can clearly establish that law for qualified-immunity purposes makes a lot less sense. Inasmuch as real-world 'fair notice' is qualified-immunity's lodestar, I think I lean toward the latter view. Especially in a case like this, in which (1) our own analogous-but-not-binding decisions involving arrestees, students, and border entrants have required that strip searches be supported by reasonable suspicion, . . . and (2) all nine of our sister circuits that have considered the issue have held that the Fourth Amendment requires reasonable suspicion for strip searches of prison visitors, . . . it seems eminently reasonable to conclude that 'the law' gave the prison officials at Smith State Prison 'fair notice' that their suspicionless strip search of Clarissa Gilmore was unconstitutional. . . . To be candid, though, that's little more than my own 'sense'—a vibe. If we changed any (or several) of the inputs, I might well have a different sense. What if, for instance, this Court hadn't required reasonable suspicion in the arrestee, student, and border-entrant contexts, and we were thus left with only the nine-circuit consensus regarding strip searches of prison visitors? Would I have the same sense about the fairness of imputing notice to the Smith officials? Probably, but I can't be sure. What if the other circuits weren't unanimous—say, that seven had required reasonable suspicion but two hadn't? Six and three? Or what if our sister circuits were unanimous, but only four had decided the issue, rather than nine? Who knows. You can probably see where this is going: It all feels, well, kind of made up. And as I've said before, 'if there is any fixed star in my own constitutional constellation, it's that unelected, unaccountable federal judges shouldn't make stuff up.' Club Madonna Inc. v. City of Miami Beach, 42 F.4th 1231, 1261 (11th Cir. 2022) (Newsom, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citation omitted). * * * I realize, of course, that I'm just identifying problems, not offering solutions—which, I know, can be annoying. By and large, though, we 'inferior court[]' judges. . . . have to play the hand the Supreme Court deals us. It may be that the problems I've highlighted—minor-league as they are—indicate that the time is coming (has come?) for that Court to consider a major-league reassessment of its qualified-immunity jurisprudence.”)

Sosa v. Martin County, Florida, 57 F.4th 1297, 1303-04 (11th Cir. 2023) (en banc), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 88 (2023) (Jordan, J., joined by Wilson and Jill Pryor, JJ., concurring in the judgment) (“For the reasons set out by Judge Rosenbaum in Part II.A of her dissent, I do not think that Baker v. McCollan . . . forecloses a substantive due process claim for ‘overdetention’ based on misidentification. In my opinion, we correctly recognized such a claim in Cannon v. Macon Cty. . . . and Ortega v. Christian[.] . . . And so have a number of our sister circuits. . . . As we explained in Reeves v. City of Jackson, . . . the Supreme Court in Baker said that detention ‘pursuant to a valid warrant but in the face of repeated protests of innocence will after the lapse of a certain amount of time deprive the accused of “liberty ... without due process of law.”’. . . I nevertheless concur in the judgment affirming dismissal of Mr. Sosa’s ‘overdetention’ claim. The Supreme Court’s recent qualified immunity decisions require that the facts of prior cases be very, very close to the ones at hand to give officers reasonable notice of what is prohibited. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7–9 (2021); City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11–12 (2021). Although the inquiry does not—at least not yet—demand ‘a case directly on point,’ it requires that ‘existing precedent ... place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . If the only relevant case here was Cannon, then maybe a reasonable police officer would know that Mr. Sosa’s continued detention was unlawful. But reading Cannon in conjunction with Baker, as we must, makes the issue less clear. Mr. Sosa was detained for three days, the same time period at issue in Baker, while Cannon involved a detention of seven days. Those two cases, taken together, would not have provided reasonable officers adequate notice that they were violating Mr. Sosa’s substantive due process rights by not releasing him—at least not ‘beyond debate’ as the Supreme Court’s decisions require. . . . In other words, under the legal fiction created by qualified immunity, a reasonable police officer who read these cases would not know for certain that detaining Mr. Sosa for three days was unlawful. . . . My concurrence is a reluctant one because the Supreme Court’s governing (and judicially-created) qualified immunity jurisprudence is far removed from the principles existing in the early 1870s, when Congress enacted what is now 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . If federal statutes are supposed to be interpreted according to ordinary public meaning and understanding at the time of enactment, . . . and if § 1983 preserved common-law immunities existing at the time of its enactment, . . . the qualified immunity doctrine we have today is regrettable. Hopefully one day soon the Supreme Court will see fit to correct it.”)

Johnson v. Ortiz, No. 20-13547, 2022 WL 1311540, at *3 (11th Cir. May 2, 2022) (not reported) (Jordan, J., concurring) (“I join the court’s opinion and add the following about Mr. Johnson’s Fourth Amendment claim. Like Justice Thomas, I believe the Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence is not faithful to the text of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and rests on shaky historical and doctrinal grounds. See, e.g., Hoggard v. Rhodes, 141 S. Ct. 2421, 2421–22 (2021) (Thomas, J., respecting the denial of certiorari); Baxter v. Bracey, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1862–64 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari); Schantz v. DeLoach, No. 20-10503, 2021 WL 4977514, at *12 (11th Cir. Oct. 26, 2021) (Jordan, J., concurring). But given the Court’s recent qualified immunity decisions, see, e.g., City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11–12 (2021), I agree that Officer Ortiz is entitled to qualified immunity even under Mr. Johnson’s version of the facts (which included Mr. Johnson over the bleeding victim with his hands on her neck and chest).”)

in Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822662 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021), and City of Tahlequa v. Bond, 595 U.S. ___, 2021 WL 4822664 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021), I reluctantly concur in the judgment. I say reluctantly because the Supreme Court’s governing (and judicially-created) qualified immunity jurisprudence is far removed from the principles existing in the early 1870s, when Congress enacted 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . For a Court that consistently tells us that federal statutes are interpreted according to ordinary public meaning and understanding at the time of enactment . . . and that § 1983 preserved common-law immunities existing at the time of its enactment, . . . that is a regrettable state of affairs. Viewing the evidence in light most favorable to Mr. Schantz, Sheriff DeLoach used deadly force against him twice. Sheriff DeLoach first fired his shotgun at Mr. Schantz when he had stopped his motorcycle. When that first blast missed and Mr. Schantz understandably tried to drive away, Sheriff DeLoach fired at him again. This time the shot hit home, with the buckshot striking Mr. Schantz in the face and neck. The notion that Sheriff DeLoach can escape liability for using deadly force under these circumstances—against an unarmed joyrider who was at rest on his motorcycle—stands § 1983 on its head, and will lessen incentives for police departments to craft better policies for the use of deadly force. ‘Regardless of the formal relationship between the constitutional and state law standards and the administrative standard, it is clear that the administrative standard remains heavily informed by both.’ Seth W. Stoughton, Jeffrey J. Noble, & Geoffrey P. Alpert, Evaluating Police Uses of Force 104 (2020). See also Franklin E. Zimring, When Police Kill 219 (2017) (“[T]he main arena for the radical changes necessary to save many hundreds of civilian lives in the United States each year is the local police department, not the federal courts or Congress, not state government, not local mayors or city councils, not even the hearts and minds of the police officers on the streets. All of these people and institutions can help by influencing local police to create less destructive rules of engagement.”).

III. HEIGHTENED PLEADING REQUIREMENT

A. The Leatherman Decision

Although the majority in Siegert disposed of the case on grounds that the plaintiff stated no claim for relief, four Justices who did confront the question, approved of the “heightened pleading standard” where the state of mind of the defendant is an essential component of the underlying constitutional claim, but rejected the District of Columbia Circuit’s “direct evidence” requirement, instead requiring nonconclusory allegations of subjective motivation supported by either direct or circumstantial evidence. If this threshold is satisfied, then limited discovery may be allowed.

Plaintiffs attempting to impose Monell liability upon a governmental unit had been required, in some circuits, to plead with particularity the existence of an official policy or custom which could be causally linked to the claimed underlying violation. See, e.g., Strauss v. City of Chicago, 760 F.2d 765 (7th Cir. 1985).

In Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 113 S. Ct. 1160 (1993), the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the “heightened pleading standard” in cases alleging municipal liability. The Fifth Circuit had upheld the dismissal of a complaint against a governmental entity for failure to plead with the requisite specificity. “While plaintiffs’ complaint sets forth the facts concerning the police misconduct in great detail, it fails to state any facts with respect to the adequacy (or inadequacy) of the police training.” 954 F.2d 1054, 1058 (5th Cir. 1992).

While leaving open the question of “whether our qualified immunity jurisprudence would require a heightened pleading in cases involving individual government officials,” the Supreme Court refused to equate a municipality’s freedom from respondeat superior liability with immunity from suit. 113 S. Ct. at 1162.

Finding it “impossible to square the ‘heightened pleading requirement’ . . . with the liberal system of ‘notice pleading’ set up by the Federal Rules[.]” the Court suggested that Federal Rules 8 and 9(b) would have to be rewritten to incorporate such a “heightened pleading standard.” The Court concluded that “[i]n the absence of such an amendment, federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later.” Id. at 1163.

B. Crawford-El v. Britton

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 118 S. Ct. 1584 (1998), the Court addressed the “broad question [of] whether the courts of appeals may craft special procedural rules” for cases in which a plaintiff’s substantive constitutional claim requires proof of improper motive and “the more specific question [of] whether, at least in cases brought by prisoners, the plaintiff must adduce clear and convincing evidence of improper motive in order to defeat a motion for summary judgment.” Id. at 1587. In striking down the D.C. Circuit’s “clear and convincing” burden of proof requirement in such cases, a five-member majority of the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Stevens, clarified that the Court’s holding in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982), that “bare allegations of malice” cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense, “did not implicate the elements of the plaintiff’s initial burden of proving a constitutional violation.” 118 S. Ct. at 1592. The Court noted that “although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff’s affirmative case. Our holding in Harlow, which related only to the scope of an affirmative defense, provides no support for making any change in the nature of the plaintiff’s burden of proving a constitutional violation.” Id. The Court explained that the subjective component of the qualified immunity defense that was jettisoned in Harlow “permitted an open-ended inquiry into subjective motivation [with the] primary focus . . . on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff.” Id. at 1594. Such an open-ended inquiry precluded summary judgment in many cases where officials had not violated clearly established constitutional rights. “When intent is an element of a constitutional violation, however, the primary focus is not on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff; rather, it is more specific, such as an intent to disadvantage all members of a class that includes the plaintiff . . . or to deter public comment on a specific issue of public importance.” Id.

Sensitive to the concerns about subjecting public officials to discovery and trial in cases involving insubstantial claims, the Court noted that existing substantive law “already prevents this more narrow element of unconstitutional motive from automatically carrying a plaintiff to trial[,]” and “various procedural mechanisms already enable trial judges to weed out baseless claims that feature a subjective element” Id.

First, under the substantive law on which plaintiff relies, there may be some doubt as to the whether the defendant’s conduct was unlawful. The Court gave as an example the question of whether the plaintiff’s speech was on a matter of public concern. Second, where plaintiff must establish both motive and causation, a defendant may still prevail at summary judgment by, for example, showing that defendant would have made the same decision in the absence of the protected conduct. Id.

The Court noted two procedural devices available to trial judges that could be used prior to any discovery. First, the district court may order a reply under Fed. R. Civ. P. 7(a), or grant a defendant’s motion for a more definite statement under Rule 12(e). As the Court noted, this option of ordering the plaintiff to come forward with “specific, nonconclusory factual allegations” of improper motive exists whether or not the defendant raises the qualified immunity defense. 118 S. Ct. at 1596-97. Second, where the defendant does raise qualified immunity, the district court should resolve the threshold question before discovery.

To do so, the court must determine whether, assuming the truth of the plaintiff’s allegations, the official’s conduct violated clearly established law. [footnote omitted] Because the former option of demanding more specific allegations of intent places no burden on the defendant-official, the district judge may choose that alternative before resolving the immunity question, which sometimes requires complicated analysis of legal issues. If the plaintiff’s action survives these initial hurdles and is otherwise viable, the plaintiff ordinarily will be entitled to some discovery. Rule 26 vests the trial judge with broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.

Id. at 1597.

The majority opinion concluded that “[n]either the text of § 1983 or any other federal statute, nor the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provides any support for imposing the clear and convincing burden of proof on plaintiffs either at the summary judgment stage or in the trial itself.” Id. at 1595. Instead of the categorical rule established by the Court of Appeals, the Court endorsed broad discretion on the part of trial judges in the management of the factfinding process. Id. at 1598.

Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented, and formulated the following test for motive-based constitutional claims:

[W]hen a plaintiff alleges that an official's action was taken with an unconstitutional or otherwise unlawful motive, the defendant will be entitled to immunity and immediate dismissal of the suit if he can offer a lawful reason for his action and the plaintiff cannot establish, through objective evidence, that the offered reason is actually a pretext.

Id. at 1600 (Rehnquist, C.J., joined by O'Connor, J., dissenting).

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented and proposed the adoption of a test that would impose "a more severe restriction upon 'intent-based' constitutional torts." Id. at 1604. (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting). Under Justice Scalia's proposed test, [O]nce the trial court finds that the asserted grounds for the official action were objectively valid (e.g., the person fired for alleged incompetence was indeed incompetent), it would not admit any proof that something other than those reasonable grounds was the genuine motive (e.g., the incompetent person fired was a Republican).

C. Swierkiewicz v. Sorema / Hill v. McDonough

Swierkiewicz v. Sorema, 122 S. Ct. 992, 998 (2002) ("Rule 8(a)'s simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions. Rule 9(b), for example, provides for greater particularity in all averments of fraud or mistake. [footnote omitted] This Court, however, has declined to extend such exceptions to other contexts. . . . Just as Rule 9(b) makes no mention of municipal liability under Rev. Stat. '1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1994 ed., Supp. V), neither does it refer to employment discrimination. Thus, complaints in these cases, as in most others, must satisfy only the simple requirements of Rule 8(a).").

See also Hill v. McDonough, 126 S. Ct. 2096, 2103 (2006) ("Specific pleading requirements are mandated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and not, as a general rule, through case-by-case determinations of the federal courts.").

D. Jones v. Bock

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 918, 919, 921, 926 (2007) ("There is no question that exhaustion is mandatory under the PLRA and that unexhausted claims cannot be brought in court. . . . What is less clear is whether it falls to the prisoner to plead and demonstrate exhaustion in the complaint, or to the defendant to raise lack of exhaustion as an affirmative defense. The minority rule, adopted by the Sixth Circuit, places the burden of pleading exhaustion in a case covered by the PLRA on the prisoner; most courts view failure to exhaust as an affirmative defense. . . We think petitioners, and the majority of courts to consider the question, have the better of the argument. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) requires simply a ‘short and plain statement of the claim’ in a complaint, while Rule 8(c) identifies a nonexhaustive list of affirmative defenses that must be pleaded in response. The PLRA itself is not a source of a prisoner’s claim; claims covered by the PLRA are typically brought under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, which does not require exhaustion at all, see Patsy v. Board of Regents of Fla., 457 U. S. 496, 516 (1982). Petitioners assert that courts typically regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense in other contexts. . . and respondents do not seriously dispute the general proposition. . . The PLRA dealt extensively with the subject of exhaustion, see 42 U. S. C. ‘1997e(a), (c)(2), but is silent on the issue whether exhaustion must be pleaded by the plaintiff or is an affirmative defense. This is strong evidence that the usual practice should be followed, and the usual practice under the Federal Rules is to regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense. In a series of recent cases, we have explained that courts should generally not depart from the usual practice under the Federal Rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns. [citing Leatherman, Swierkiewicz and Hill] . . . We think that the PLRA’s screening requirement does not—explicitly or implicitly—justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself . . . We conclude that failure to exhaust is an affirmative defense under the PLRA, and that inmates are not required to specially plead or demonstrate exhaustion in their complaints. We understand the reasons behind the decisions of some lower courts to impose a pleading requirement on plaintiffs in this context, but that effort cannot fairly be viewed as an interpretation of the PLRA. ‘Whatever temptations the statesmanship of policy-making might wisely suggest,’ the judge’s job is to construe the statute—not to make it better.”. . . We are not insensitive to the challenges faced by the lower federal courts in managing their dockets and attempting to separate, when it comes to prisoner suits, not so much wheat from chaff as needles from haystacks. We once again reiterate, however—as we did unanimously in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill—that adopting different and more onerous pleading rules to deal with particular categories of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts.”)

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 922, 923 (2007) (“The PLRA requires exhaustion of ‘such administrative remedies as are available,’ 42 U. S. C. ‘1997e(a), but nothing in the statute imposes a ‘name all defendants’ requirement along the lines of the Sixth Circuit’s judicially created rule. . . . Compliance with prison grievance procedures, therefore, is all that is required by the PLRA to ‘properly exhaust.’ The level of detail necessary in a grievance to comply with the grievance procedures will vary from system to system and claim to claim, but it is the prison’s requirements, and not the PLRA, that define the boundaries of proper exhaustion. As the MDOC’s procedures make no mention of naming particular officials, the Sixth Circuit’s rule imposing such a prerequisite to proper exhaustion is unwarranted.”)

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 924 (2007) (“As a general matter, if a complaint contains both good and bad claims, the court proceeds with the good and leaves the bad. ‘[O]nly the bad claims are dismissed; the complaint as a whole is not. If Congress meant to depart from this norm, we would expect some indication of that, and we find none.’”)

See also Albino v. Baca, 747 F.3d 1162, 1166 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (“First, although it may be more a matter of a change of nomenclature than of practical operation, we overrule Wyatt v. Terhune, 315 F.3d 1108, 1119 (9th Cir.2003), in which we held that a failure to exhaust under § 1997e(a) should be raised by a defendant as an ‘unenumerated Rule 12(b) motion.’ We conclude that a failure to exhaust is more appropriately handled under the framework of the existing rules than under an ‘unenumerated’ (that is, non-existent) rule. Failure to exhaust under the PLRA is ‘an affirmative defense the defendant must plead and prove.’ Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 204, 216 (2007). In the rare event that a failure to exhaust is clear on the face of the complaint, a defendant may move for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). Otherwise, defendants must produce evidence proving failure to exhaust in order to carry their burden. If undisputed evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the prisoner shows a failure to exhaust, a defendant is entitled to summary judgment under Rule 56. If material facts are disputed, summary judgment should be denied, and the district judge rather than a jury should determine the facts. Second, we hold that Albino has satisfied the exhaustion requirement of § 1997e(a). Defendants have failed to prove that administrative remedies were available at the jail where Albino was confined. Because no administrative remedies were available, he is excused from any obligation to exhaust under § 1997e(a). We therefore direct the district court to grant summary judgment to Albino on the issue of exhaustion.”)

E. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1968, 1969, 1974 (2007) (“Justice Black’s opinion for the Court in Conley v. Gibson spoke not only of the need for fair notice of the grounds for entitlement to relief but of ‘the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.’ . . . This ‘no set of facts’ language can be read in isolation as saying that any statement revealing the theory of the claim will suffice unless its factual impossibility may be shown from the face of the pleadings; and the Court of Appeals appears to have read Conley in some such way when formulating its understanding of the proper pleading standard On such a focused and literal reading of Conley’s ‘no set of facts,’ a wholly conclusory statement of claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleadings left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some ‘set of [undisclosed] facts’ to support recovery. So here, the Court of Appeals specifically found the prospect of unearthing direct evidence of conspiracy sufficient to preclude dismissal, even though the complaint does not set forth a single fact in a context that suggests an agreement. . . . [A] good many judges and commentators have balked at taking the literal terms of the Conley passage as a pleading standard. [citing cases and commentators] We could go on, but there is no need to pile up further citations to show that Conley's 'no set of facts' language has been questioned, criticized, and explained away long enough. . . . [A]fter puzzling the profession for 50 years, this famous observation has earned its retirement. The phrase is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint. . . . Conley, then, described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint's survival. . . . [W]e do not require heightened fact pleading of specifics, but only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Because the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed.").

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1978, 1988, 1989 (2007) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., except as to Part IV, dissenting) ("If Conley's 'no set of facts' language is to be interred, let it not be without a eulogy. . . . Petitioners have not requested that the Conley formulation be retired, nor have any of the six amici who filed briefs in support of petitioners. I would not rewrite the Nation's civil procedure textbooks and call into doubt the pleading rules of most of its States without far more informed deliberation as to the costs of doing so. Congress has established a process—a rulemaking process—for revisions of that order. . . . Whether the Court's actions will benefit only defendants in antitrust treble-damages cases, or whether its test for the sufficiency of a complaint will inure to the benefit of all civil defendants, is a question that the future will answer. But that the Court has announced a significant new rule that does not even purport to respond to any congressional command is glaringly obvious.")

F. Erickson v. Pardus

Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) ("It was error for the Court of Appeals to conclude that the allegations in question, concerning harm caused petitioner by the termination of his medication, were too conclusory to establish for pleading purposes that petitioner had suffered 'a cognizable independent harm' as a result of his removal from the hepatitis C treatment program. . . . The complaint stated that Dr. Bloor's decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was 'endangering [his] life.' . . . It alleged this medication was withheld 'shortly after' petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was 'still in need of treatment for this disease,' and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment. . . . This alone was enough to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2). Petitioner, in addition, bolstered his claim by making more specific allegations in documents attached to the complaint and in later filings. The Court of Appeals' departure from the liberal pleading standards set forth by Rule 8(a)(2) is even more pronounced in this particular case because petitioner has been proceeding, from the litigation's outset, without counsel.")

G. Ashcroft v. Iqbal

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1942, 1943, 1949-54 (2009) (“This case . . . turns on a narrower question: Did respondent, as the plaintiff in the District Court, plead factual matter that, if taken as true, states a claim that petitioners deprived him of his clearly established constitutional rights. We hold respondent’s pleadings are insufficient. . . . Two working principles underlie our decision in Twombly. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. . . . Rule 8 marks a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, but it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. . . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . . But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged-but it has not ‘show[n]’-that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ . . . In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . . We begin our analysis by identifying the allegations in the complaint that are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Respondent pleads that petitioners ‘knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [him]’ to harsh conditions of confinement ‘as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.’ . . . The complaint alleges that Ashcroft was the ‘principal architect’ of this invidious policy. . . . and that Mueller was ‘instrumental’ in adopting and executing it. . . . These bare assertions, much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a ‘formulaic recitation of the elements’ of a constitutional discrimination claim. . . . namely, that petitioners adopted a policy ‘ “because of,” not merely “in spite of,” its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.’ . . . As such, the allegations are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. . . . It is important to recall that respondent’s complaint challenges neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention in the MDC. Respondent’s constitutional claims against petitioners rest solely on their ostensible “policy of holding post-September-11th detainees” in the ADMAX SHU once they were categorized as “of high interest.” . . . To prevail on that theory, the complaint must contain facts plausibly showing that petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post-September-11 detainees as ‘of high interest’ because of their race, religion, or national origin. This the complaint fails to do. Though respondent alleges that various other defendants, who are not before us, may have labeled him a person of ‘of high interest’ for impermissible reasons, his only factual allegation against petitioners accuses them of adopting a policy approving ‘restrictive conditions of confinement’ for post-September-11 detainees until they were ‘ “cleared” by the FBI.’ . . . Accepting the truth of that allegation, the complaint does not show, or even intimate, that petitioners purposefully housed detainees in the ADMAX SHU due to their race, religion, or national origin. All it plausibly suggests is that the Nation's top law enforcement officers, in the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity. Respondent does not argue, nor can he, that such a motive would violate petitioners' constitutional obligations. He would need to allege more by way of factual content to 'nudge[e]' his claim of purposeful discrimination 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.' . . . [R]espondent's complaint does not contain any factual allegation sufficient to plausibly suggest petitioners' discriminatory state of mind. His pleadings thus do not meet the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. It is important to note, however, that we express no opinion concerning the sufficiency of respondent's complaint against the defendants who are not before us. Respondent's account of his prison ordeal alleges serious official misconduct that we need not address here. Our decision is limited to the determination that respondent's complaint does not entitle him to relief from petitioners. . . . Our decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for 'all civil actions'. . . and it applies to antitrust and discrimination suits alike. . . . Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise. . . . It is true that Rule 9(b) requires particularity when pleading 'fraud or mistake,' while allowing '[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind [to] be alleged generally.' But 'generally' is a relative term. In the context of Rule 9, it is to be compared to the particularity requirement applicable to fraud or mistake. Rule 9 merely excuses a party from pleading discriminatory intent under an elevated pleading standard. It does not give him license to evade the less rigid-though still operative-strictures of Rule 8. . . . And Rule 8 does not empower respondent to plead the bare elements of his cause of action, affix the label 'general allegation,' and expect his complaint to survive a motion to dismiss.") Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1959-61 (2009) (Souter, J., joined by Stevens, J., Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., dissenting) ("The complaint . . . alleges, at a bare minimum, that Ashcroft and Mueller knew of and condoned the discriminatory policy their subordinates carried out. Actually, the complaint goes further in alleging that Ashcroft and Muller affirmatively acted to create the discriminatory detention policy. If these factual allegations are true, Ashcroft and Mueller were, at the very least, aware of the discriminatory policy being implemented and deliberately indifferent to it. Ashcroft and Mueller argue that these allegations fail to satisfy the 'plausibility standard' of Twombly. They contend that Iqbal's claims are implausible because such high-ranking officials 'tend not to be personally involved in the specific actions of lower-level officers down the bureaucratic chain of command.' . . . But this response bespeaks a fundamental misunderstanding of the enquiry that Twombly demands. Twombly does not require a court at the motion-to-dismiss stage to consider whether the factual allegations are probably true. We made it clear, on the contrary, that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be. . . . The sole exception to this rule lies with allegations that are sufficiently fantastic to defy reality as we know it: claims about little green men, or the plaintiff's recent trip to Pluto, or experiences in time travel. That is not what we have here. . . . Iqbal's claim is not that Ashcroft and Mueller 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject' him to a discriminatory practice that is left undefined; his allegation is that ‘they knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject’ him to a particular, discrete, discriminatory policy detailed in the complaint. Iqbal does not say merely that Ashcroft was the architect of some amorphous discrimination, or that Mueller was instrumental in an ill-defined constitutional violation; he alleges that they helped to create the discriminatory policy he has described. Taking the complaint as a whole, it gives Ashcroft and Mueller ‘ “fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.” ’”)

U.S. Supreme Court

Johnson v. City of Shelby, Miss., 135 S. Ct. 346, 346-47(2014) (per curiam) (“We summarily reverse. Federal pleading rules call for ‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,’ Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2); they do not countenance dismissal of a complaint for imperfect statement of the legal theory supporting the claim asserted. . . . In particular, no heightened pleading rule requires plaintiffs seeking damages for violations of constitutional rights to invoke § 1983 expressly in order to state a claim. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 164, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993) (a federal court may not apply a standard ‘more stringent than the usual pleading requirements of Rule 8(a)’ in ‘civil rights cases alleging municipal liability’); Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N. A., 534 U.S. 506, 512, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (imposing a ‘heightened pleading standard in employment discrimination cases conflicts with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2)’). The Fifth Circuit defended its requirement that complaints expressly invoke § 1983 as ‘not a mere pleading formality.’ . . . The requirement serves a notice function, the Fifth Circuit said, because ‘[c]ertain consequences flow from claims under § 1983, such as the unavailability of respondeat superior liability, which bears on the qualified immunity analysis.’ . . . This statement displays some confusion in the Fifth Circuit’s perception of petitioners’ suit. No ‘qualified immunity analysis’ is implicated here, as petitioners asserted a constitutional claim against the city only, not against any municipal officer. . . . Our decisions in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), are not in point, for they concern the factual allegations a complaint must contain to survive a motion to dismiss. A plaintiff, they instruct, must plead facts sufficient to show that her claim has substantive plausibility. Petitioners’ complaint was not deficient in that regard. Petitioners stated simply, concisely, and directly events that, they alleged, entitled them to damages from the city. Having informed the city of the factual basis for their complaint, they were required to do no more to stave off threshold dismissal for want of an adequate statement of their claim. . . . For clarification and to ward off further insistence on a punctiliously stated ‘theory of the pleadings,’ petitioners, on remand, should be accorded an opportunity to add to their complaint a citation to § 1983. . . . For the reasons stated, the petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

D.C. CIRCUIT

Tooley v. Napolitano 586 F.3d 1006, 1009 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (“We recognize that in a nation of 300 million people, with millions of government employees, some are bound at any given moment to be acting unwisely, foolishly, counterproductively, mistakenly, maliciously, viciously, even inanely. But the particular combination of sloth, fanaticism, inanity and technical genius alleged here seems to us to move these allegations into the realm of claims ‘flimsier than Adoubtful or questionable’—... Aessentially fictitious,” . . . not realistically distinguishable from allegations of ‘little green men’ of the sort that Justice Souter recognized in Iqbal as properly dismissed on the pleadings.”).

Owens v. Republic of Sudan, 531 F.3d 884, 894, 895 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (“Sudan tries to limit the principle expressed in Swierkiewicz to merits pleadings . That argument is inconsistent with Rule 8, which, as just noted, expressly applies its ‘a short and plain statement’ requirement to jurisdictional pleadings . . . Indeed, we have held the standard for assessing the sufficiency of jurisdictional pleadings under the FSIA ‘is similar to that of Rule 12(b)(6).’ . . Thus no heightened pleading requirement applies here. . . We only require that the complaint contain ‘enough factual matter (taken as true)’ to suggest that Sudan’s material support of al Qaeda was a cause of the embassy bombings. See Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1965 (2007). In other words, we require ‘enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence’ of this causal link.”).

Aktieselskabet AF 21.November 2001 v. Fame Jeans Inc., 525 F.3d 8, 15-17 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (“[T]he district court interpreted Twombly as establishing a new threshold for complaints: enough facts to ‘clarify the grounds’ on which each claim rests and ‘nudge[] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.’ . . Many courts have disagreed about the import of Twombly. [collecting cases in footnote] We conclude that Twombly leaves the long-standing fundamentals of notice pleading intact. . . Rule 8 requires, not a specific quantity of facts, but simply ‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ . . Over the years, courts have tended to drift away from this standard by imposing various requirements of particularity. . . The Supreme Court has continually pruned back such requirements, with the admonition that we are not to impose heightened pleading requirements. . . After decades of such consistency, we will not lightly assume the Supreme Court intended to tighten pleading standards. Indeed, the Court has indicated quite clearly that it meant no such thing. Twombly itself reiterated that a complaint ‘does not need detailed factual allegations.’ . . In sum, Twombly was concerned with the plausibility of an inference of conspiracy, not with the plausibility of a claim. A court deciding a motion to dismiss must not make any judgment about the probability of the plaintiff’s success, for a complaint ‘may proceed even if it appears that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.’””).

Ghawanmeh v. Islamic Saudi Academy, No. 09-631 (JMF), 2009 WL 4456328, at *9, *10 (D.D.C. Nov. 27, 2009) (“In order to state a claim under Title VII, a plaintiff must aver that ‘(1) she is a member of a protected class; (2) she suffered an adverse employment action; and (3) the unfavorable action gives rise to an inference of discrimination.’ . . . In her complaint, plaintiff claims that the ISA discriminated against her in violation of Title VII on the basis of her gender (female) and her national origin (Jordanian). . . . She argues that she was unfairly denied leave and ultimately dismissed because there was a ‘systemic prejudicial and biased culture favoring males and Saudi Arabian nationals at Defendant ISA, which policies, either express or implied, are known or constructively known to Defendant KSA and nonetheless allowed to persist.’ . . . She also makes the following allegations: Due to Defendant’s workplace culture of preferential treatment, other employees were granted unpaid leaves of absence for vacations and other reasons, before and during this period. . . . Other similarly situated teachers who also happen to be Saudi Arabian nationals were not so dismissed, and were not otherwise unfairly treated. . . . Defendant ISA allows and perhaps encourages a culture of Saudi ethnocentrism at the school, with knowledge (actual or constructive) of Defendants KSA, evinced by the disparate way non-Saudi teachers, especially women, are treated. . . . Had Plaintiff been male and/or a Saudi Arabian national, she would not have been fired. . . . The problem is that plaintiff does not identify the other similarly situated teachers. The question, therefore, is whether her failure to do so merits dismissal. After Twombly but before Iqbal, the court of appeals for this circuit confronted the argument that Twombly required a plaintiff to specify those facts which entitled him to relief. See Aktieselskabet AF 21 v. Fame Jeans, Inc., 525 F.3d 8 (D.C. Cir.2008). The court rejected the proposition that a complaint needed detailed factual allegations to survive and rejected the argument that Twombly should be read to abrogate the requirement of Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that the complaint need only contain a ‘short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ . . . It pointed to a decision by the Supreme Court issued after Twombly, that indicated that ‘specific facts were not necessary’ if the complaint gave fair notice of the claim. Id. (quoting Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007)) (per curiam). Judged by that standard and construed liberally in plaintiff’s favor, the allegations give notice to defendant that plaintiff is asserting that she was treated differently from Saudis and men who applied for the leave she was refused, and who were not fired as a result of seeking that leave, as she was. Thus, even though she does not name the persons who are similarly situated to herself, but who were treated differently, plaintiff’s complaint survives defendant’s motion to dismiss.”).

FIRST CIRCUIT

Medina-Velazquez v. Hernandez-Gregorat, 767 F.3d 103, 111-12 (1st Cir. 2014) (“Under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, ‘[p]ublic officials may be held liable ... for a constitutional violation only if a plaintiff can establish that his or her constitutional injury resulted from the direct acts or omissions of the official, or from indirect conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization.’ . . . We recognize that ‘precise knowledge of the chain of events leading to the constitutional violation may often be unavailable to a plaintiff’ when a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is filed; therefore, ‘we take to heart the Supreme Court’s call to “draw on our ‘judicial experience and common sense’ as we make a contextual judgment about the sufficiency of the pleadings.”’ . . . On its own, the complaint does not specifically connect the appellees to the adverse employment actions. Each appellant, however, does claim that he ‘placed in writing his concern’ regarding the negative employment actions but that the ‘communication went unanswered.’ The district court properly requested these letters, which were incorporated by reference into the complaint, and supplemented the allegations with the identity of the recipient defendants. We have recognized that a letter may be used as evidence at trial to show for purposes of § 1983 liability that the named recipient personally knew of the writer’s employment situation. . . . Whether the addressee actually received the letter is ‘a factual question appropriate for jury determination.’ . . . Hence, in resolving a motion to dismiss, where the burden is merely demonstrating the plausibility of a claim and all reasonable inferences are drawn in the plaintiff’s favor, we can infer that the recipients of the letters were aware of their contents.”)

Garcia-Catalan v. U.S., 734 F.3d 100, 104, 105 (1st Cir. 2013) (“[T]he appellant's complaint is plainly modeled on Form 11 of the Appendix to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . The complaint disclosed the date, time, and place of the alleged tort, and it delineated both the nature of the dangerous condition at the commissary and the resulting injuries to the appellant. At least two courts of appeals have concluded that the standard announced in Twombly and Iqbal does not undermine the viability of the federal forms as long as there are sufficient facts alleged in the complaint to make the claim plausible. See K-Tech Telecomm., Inc. v. Time Warner Cable, Inc., 714 F.3d 1277, 1283–84 (Fed.Cir.2013); Hamilton v. Palm, 621 F.3d 816, 818 (8th Cir.2010). We share this view. It pays due homage to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 84, which declares that ‘[t]he forms in the Appendix suffice.’ Fed.R.Civ.P. 84. Honoring Rule 84 is, in turn, consistent with the Supreme Court's instruction that the Civil Rules may not be amended by ‘judicial interpretation.’ . . . For another thing, ‘some latitude may be appropriate’ in applying the plausibility standard in certain types of cases. . . . Generally speaking, these are cases in which a material part of the information needed is likely to be within the defendant's control. . . . This is such a case: it cannot reasonably be expected that the appellant, without the benefit of discovery, would have any information about either how long the liquid was on the floor or whether any employees of the commissary were aware of the spill. . . . We add, moreover, that the plausibility inquiry properly takes into account whether discovery can reasonably be expected to fill any holes in the pleader's case. . . . Given what the appellant has set forth in her complaint, it is reasonable to expect that ‘modest discovery may provide the missing link’ that will allow the appellant to go to trial on her claim. . . . We need go no further. . . . For the reasons elucidated above, we hold that the appellant's complaint contains sufficient factual content to support a plausible claim for negligence against the United States. Consequently, we reverse the judgment of the district court and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Atieh v. Riordan, 727 F.3d 73, 76 (1st Cir. 2013) (“The plausibility standard is a screening mechanism designed to weed out cases that do not warrant either discovery or trial. . . To this end, the plausibility standard asks whether the complaint ‘contain[s] sufficient factual matter ... to “state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.”’ . . APA review, however, involves neither discovery nor trial. Thus, APA review presents no need for screening. It follows that the plausibility standard has no place in APA review. This makes perfect sense. The focal point of APA review is the existing administrative record. . . Allowing the allegations of a complaint to become the focal point of judicial review introduces an unnecessary and inevitably unproductive step into the process. The relevant inquiry is—and must remain—not whether the facts set forth in a complaint state a plausible claim but, rather, whether the administrative record sufficiently supports the agency’s decision. . . This paradigm dictates the outcome of the instant appeal. We hold that the plausibility standard does not apply to a complaint for judicial review of final agency action and that the district court therefore erred in invoking it.”)

Evergreen Partnering Group, Inc. v. Pactiv Corp., No. 12–1730, 2013 WL 3063902 (1st Cir. June 19, 2013) (“In assessing these allegations, the district court improperly applied a heightened pleading standard in reviewing Evergreen’s complaint, and it improperly occupied a factfinder role when it both chose among plausible alternative theories interpreting defendants’ conduct and adopted as true allegations made by defendants in weighing the plausibility of theories put forward by the parties. The court went beyond Twombly’s pleading requirements when it found Evergreen’s complaint deficient as compared to those in other cases that pled ‘highly specific details as to how the alleged conspirators communicated with each other, the individuals who were involved, when the communications took place, the substance of their contents, and the dramatic switch in business practices that followed.’ Evergreen, 865 F.Supp.2d at 142. As discussed earlier, Twombly does not require such heightened pleadings for § 1 claims.”)

Gianfrancesco v. Town of Wrentham, 712 F.3d 634, 639, 640 (1st Cir. 2013) (“Gianfrancesco’s due process claim is of the substantive sort, and alleges executive (rather than legislative) misconduct. . . Thus, he must plausibly allege that the actions taken against him were so egregious as to shock the conscience and that they deprived him of a protected interest in life, liberty, or property. . . He has not done so. Construed in Gianfrancesco’s favor, the amended complaint describes a pattern of selective and excessive enforcement of municipal regulations. But it is remarkably vague. The complaint says that Tom’s Tavern was subject to ‘inapplicable’ septic and sprinkler system requirements, but it does not say how or when it was subjected to these requirements, or by whom; it also does not say what makes the requirements excessive. None of these missing facts should be beyond Gianfrancesco’s reach. . . In any event, even if Gianfrancesco has established that Tom’s Tavern was subjected to unlawful regulation, he has not plausibly alleged that this overreaching was ‘a brutal and inhumane abuse of official power,’ or ‘truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable.’ . . The complaint is devoid of allegations actually describing the defendants’ conduct, and accusatory adverbs like ‘wrongfully,’ ‘deliberately,’ and ‘selectively’ cannot carry a factually inadequate complaint across the pleading threshold. . . . Gianfrancesco’s equal protection claim is similarly deficient. Under the class-of-one rubric, an equal protection plaintiff may press a claim ‘that [he] has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment,’ even where he does ‘not [show] membership in a class or group. . . But, as we recently explained, a class-of-one plaintiff bears the burden of showing that his comparators are similarly situated in all respects relevant to the challenged government action. . . Gianfrancesco says that he has carried this burden by identifying one similarly situated business (the Anvil Pub), but we do not agree. The complaint makes no effort to establish how or why the Anvil Pub is similarly situated to Tom’s Tavern in any relevant way, and does not mention any other putative comparator. It simply says that the regulatory and enforcement measures taken against Tom’s Tavern were not also taken against ‘similarly situated establishments.’ These are ‘assertions nominally cast in factual terms but so general and conclusory as to amount merely to an assertion that unspecified facts exist to conform to the legal blueprint.’. . And there is no suggestion that Gianfrancesco lacks the information needed to identify similarly situated businesses. . . In light of these shortcomings, Gianfrancesco has not pled a plausible class-of-one claim.”)

Rodriguez-Reyes v. Molina-Rodriguez, 711 F.3d 49, 51-57 (1st Cir. 2013) (“The court below ruled, among other things, that the complaint failed to state a claim for relief because it did not assert facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case of political discrimination. The prima facie case is an evidentiary model, not a pleading standard. For this reason, the interaction between the prima facie case and the plausibility standard crafted by the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), has created some confusion. We now resolve that confusion and hold that the prima facie case is not the appropriate benchmark for determining whether a complaint has crossed the plausibility threshold. Accordingly, that aspect of the district court’s decision must be annulled and the case remanded for further proceedings. . . . [A]n inquiry into plausibility necessitates a two-step pavane. . . First, the court must sift through the averments in the complaint, separating conclusory legal allegations (which may be disregarded) from allegations of fact (which must be credited). . . Second, the court must consider whether the winnowed residue of factual allegations gives rise to a plausible claim to relief. . . In this case, the district court tested the complaint in a crucible hotter than the plausibility standard demands. It repeatedly faulted the complaint for failing to ‘establish a prima facie case of political discrimination.’. . The plaintiffs argue that this laser-like focus on a prima facie case is misplaced at the pleading stage; that requirement, they say, should be reserved for summary judgment and trial. We agree. In Swierkiewicz v. Sorema, 534 U.S. 506 (2002), the Supreme Court negated any need to plead a prima facie case in the discrimination context and emphasized that the prima facie model is an evidentiary, not a pleading, standard. . . . We recognize that these cases were decided before the Supreme Court effected a sea change in the law of federal pleading in Iqbal and Twombly. This gives rise to two questions. First, does the hegemony of the Swierkiewicz/Leatherman/Educadores line of cases continue in a post-Iqbal/Twombly world? Second, what is the role, if any, of the prima facie case in determining plausibility at the pleading stage? We answer the first question in the affirmative: the Swierkiewicz holding remains good law. . . It is not necessary to plead facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case at the pleading stage. . . Iqbal does not mention, but is wholly consistent with, Swierkiewicz; there, the Court stressed that, notwithstanding the neoteric plausibility standard, no ‘detailed factual allegations’ are required in a complaint. . . The prima facie standard is an evidentiary standard, not a pleading standard, and there is no need to set forth a detailed evidentiary proffer in a complaint. In answering the first question, we do not write on a pristine page. Several other courts of appeals have considered the question and concluded, as we do, that the Swierkiewicz Court’s treatment of the prima facie case in the pleading context remains the beacon by which we must steer. See, e.g., Keys v. Humana, Inc., 684 F.3d 605, 609–10 (6th Cir.2012); Khalik v. United Air Lines, 671 F.3d 1188, 1191–92 (10th Cir.2012); Coleman v. Md. Ct. of App., 626 F.3d 187, 190 (4th Cir.2010); Arista Records LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120–21 (2d Cir.2010); al- Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 974 (9th Cir.2009), rev’d on other grounds, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011). This brings us to the second question. With respect to this question, we do not mean to imply that the elements of the prima facie case are irrelevant to a plausibility determination in a discrimination suit. They are not. Those elements are part of the background against which a plausibility determination should be made. . . .In a nutshell, the elements of a prima facie case may be used as a prism to shed light upon the plausibility of the claim. Although a plaintiff must plead enough facts to make entitlement to relief plausible in light of the evidentiary standard that will pertain at trial—in a discrimination case, the prima facie standard—she need not plead facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case. . . .With this architecture in place, we first examine the district court’s conclusion that the complaint failed adequately to establish that Molina (the de facto head of the agency) was aware of the plaintiffs’ affiliations with opposing political parties. . . To be sure, the complaint contains only a conclusory statement of Molina’s knowledge. For pleading purposes, however, knowledge may be inferable from other allegations in the complaint. . . So it is here. . . . We think that the district court subjected the complaint to an overly stringent pleading standard. An assertion that a defendant was affirmatively seeking information about employees’ political affiliations is more than a bare legal conclusion. The plaintiffs’ ‘witch-hunt’ and ‘talk[ing] about politics’ averments, though general, are factual assertions that must, at the pleading stage, be given credence. . . .The relevant question for a district court in assessing plausibility is not whether the complaint makes any particular factual allegations but, rather, whether ‘the complaint warrant[s] dismissal because it failed in toto to render plaintiffs’ entitlement to relief plausible.’ . . There need not be a one-to-one relationship between any single allegation and a necessary element of the cause of action. What counts is the ‘cumulative effect of the [complaint’s] factual allegations.’ . . Here, the factual allegations, taken in their entirety, plausibly support a finding that Molina had acquired knowledge of the plaintiffs’ political affiliations. The district court also held that the plaintiffs had failed plausibly to allege Ríos’s antagonistic political affiliation. . . . [T]o survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, it is not necessary for a plaintiff in a political discrimination case to bring forth evidence that the defendant is a card-carrying member of the opposition party. On this issue, the plaintiffs’ factual allegations are adequate for pleading purposes. . . . The last pillar on which the district court’s order rests involves what it concluded was the absence of any plausible allegation that political affiliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the adverse employment actions. . . Once again, it is important to bear in mind that the plaintiffs, for pleading purposes, need not establish this element; the facts contained in the complaint need only show that the claim of causation is plausible. . . . The complaint here contains allegations that all of the plaintiffs were affiliated with political parties that opposed the NPP; that none of them ever received a negative evaluation for her work at the AIJ; that each was replaced by an NPP adherent; and that the critical decisions were made by newly appointed officials loyal to the NPP and in a politically charged atmosphere. The record contains no nondiscriminatory explanation for the adverse employment actions. . . . When all is said and done, we think that the array of circumstances described in the complaint suffices to support an inference of political animus.”) Grajales v. Puerto Rico Ports Authority, 682 F.3d 40, 45-47, 49, 50 (1st Cir. 2012) (“Under ordinary circumstances, a court may measure the plausibility of a complaint by means of a motion for judgment on the pleadings. . . . We have not, however, spoken to the question of whether it is appropriate to apply the plausibility standard after substantial pretrial discovery has taken place. An obvious anomaly arises in such a situation because a court attempting to determine whether a complaint should be dismissed for implausibility must decide, on the basis of the complaint alone, if the complaint lacks enough factual content to allow a ‘reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . . This is, by its nature, a threshold inquiry, and logic strongly suggests that it occur prior to discovery. Ignoring the entire panoply of facts developed during discovery makes little sense. An artificial evaluation of this sort seems especially awkward because one of the main goals of the plausibility standard is the avoidance of unnecessary discovery. . . . Applying the plausibility standard to a complaint after discovery is nearly complete would defeat this core purpose. . . . Thus, while district courts enjoy broad discretion in managing their dockets, we think that, once the parties have invested substantial resources in discovery, a district court should hesitate to entertain a Rule 12(c) motion that asserts a complaint’s failure to satisfy the plausibility requirement. Here, however, we need not decide the difficult question of whether the district court’s decision to entertain the defendants’ Rule 12(c) motion after nine months of pretrial discovery was an abuse of discretion. As we explain below, this case can readily be resolved on the merits of the plausibility claim. We turn, therefore, to the plaintiff’s substantive contention. . . . As a general matter, liability for public officials under section 1983 arises only if ‘a plaintiff can establish that his or her constitutional injury resulted from the direct acts or omissions of the official, or from indirect conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization.’ . . . Moreover, supervisory liability under section 1983 cannot arise solely on the basis of respondeat superior. . . . Such liability requires that the supervisor’s conduct (whether action or inaction) constitutes ‘supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence[,] or gross negligence of the supervisor amounting to deliberate indifference.’ . . . Finally, the case law requires a separate assessment of the potential liability of each of the defendants. . . . Viewing the pleaded facts in the light most hospitable to the plaintiff, the following picture emerges. In 2008, the plaintiff—who had an exemplary record of service within the PRPA—moved from a trust (policymaking) to a career (non-policymaking) position. Shortly after the change in administration wrought by the 2008 election, the plaintiff began experiencing significant harassment at the hands of persons loyal to an opposing political party (which controlled the new administration). This course of harassment consisted in large part of actions for which there was no legitimate explanation. The harassment culminated in unjustified disciplinary threats, disparate treatment, the loss of the plaintiff’s right to carry a sidearm, his involuntary transfer to a remote work station, the elongation of his workday, and a denial of remuneration for the extra time and travel involved. The scenario here is not unfamiliar. Similar claims of political discrimination in the public workplace following a change in administration appear to be increasingly common in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. . . In this instance, the close temporal proximity between the regime change and the onset of pervasive cross-party harassment, coupled with the absence of any legitimate reason for much of the offending conduct, permits a plausible inference at the pleading stage that political animus was a motivating factor behind the harassment. . . We hold, therefore, that the factual allegations in the second amended complaint, taken as true and considered as a whole, state a plausible section 1983 claim for political discrimination. We caution, however, that a favorable plausibility determination does not necessarily herald a likelihood of success at subsequent stages of the litigation. Factual allegations must be proven, evidence to the contrary must be factored into the mix, and the merits remain entirely open.”) Pruell v. Caritas Christi, 678 F.3d 10, 12-15 (1st Cir. 2012) (“The need for pleading specificity in federal complaints has been somewhat unsettled since the Supreme Court’s decisions in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007) and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have long provided for ‘notice pleading,’ requiring a ‘short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,’ Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2), but the Supreme Court also made clear in Twombly that Rule 8(a)(2) still requires a ‘showing,’ rather than a blanket assertion, of entitlement to relief. Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only ‘fair notice’ of the nature of the claim, but also ‘grounds’ on which the claim rests. . .Indeed, well before Twombly and Iqbal, specificity requirements had been stiffened in many circuit courts, see Twombly, 550 U.S. at 562 (collecting cases), redressing what had been a much earlier swing of the pendulum to the other end of its arc, e.g., Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957); other pressures for tightening up have come from growing dockets, the enormous cost of modern discovery, and the benefits to court and parties of sorting out hopeless claims early on. But, as in any transition, there remain issues of fair warning and elucidation. To allege an employment relationship, plaintiffs in this case state: ‘At all relevant times, Ashleigh Pruell and Amy Gordon (‘Plaintiffs’) were employees under the FLSA, employed by defendants within this district and reside within this District’ and to allege underpayment of overtime, the complaint as amended says: ‘Throughout their employment with defendants, Plaintiffs regularly worked hours over 40 in a week and were not compensated for such time, including the applicable premium pay.’. . The key statement—‘regularly worked hours over 40 in a week and were not compensated for such time’—is one of those borderline phrases. . . . Standing alone, the quoted language is little more than a paraphrase of the statute. . . . Nevertheless, we think the motion to amend should be allowed. The precedents on pleading specificity are in a period of transition, and precise rules will always be elusive because of the great range and variations in causes of action, fact-patterns and attendant circumstances (e.g., warnings, good faith of counsel). . . While specifics as to the named plaintiffs here are lacking, some of the information needed may be in the control of defendants. Plaintiffs certainly know what sort of work they performed and presumably know how much they were paid as wages; but precisely how their pay was computed and based upon what specific number of hours for particular time periods may depend on records they do not have. Complaints cannot be based on generalities, but some latitude has to be allowed where a claim looks plausible based on what is known. . . . Under all of these circumstances we think another amendment should be permitted, and it would be helpful on remand for the district judge to indicate to plaintiffs what deficiencies remain and what the court expects to be supplied in a final amended complaint. The judgment is affirmed so far as it finds the complaint inadequate to state an FLSA claim, but the dismissal with prejudice is vacated, and the case remanded to give the plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a sufficient complaint.”)

Schatz v. Republican State Leadership Committee, 669 F.3d 50, 56-58 (1st Cir. 2012) (“Like the district judge, we skip over whether Schatz’s complaint plausibly alleges defamation and focus on whether it plausibly alleges actual malice—given that this is the simplest way to pinpoint Schatz’s problem. Not so fast, Schatz says, suggesting that courts cannot take that tack. Unfortunately for Schatz, he cites no case for the point, and we are aware of none, so we need say no more about that. See Rodríguez v. Municipality of San Juan, 659 F.3d 168, 175–76 (1st Cir.2011). But before we tangle with the actual-malice issue, we need to clear away some underbrush. . . .His complaint used actual-malice buzzwords, contending that the RSLC had ‘knowledge’ that its statements were ‘false’ or had ‘serious doubts’ about their truth and a ‘reckless disregard’ for whether they were false. But these are merely legal conclusions, which must be backed by well-pled facts. See, e.g., Ocasio–Hernández, 640 F.3d at 12. As for facts, the complaint alleged that the RSLC had basically branded him a criminal, falsely charging him with working with his co-selectmen to ‘wrong [ly]’ divert $10,000 in ‘taxpayer’ funds to a ‘political organization’ and then voting to kill a $10,000 fireworks celebration. The reality, at least according to his complaint, is that town residents had voted in January 2008 to contribute to the Coalition and that he had voted in March 2009 to fund the fireworks display. From these allegations Schatz further insists that the RSLC had portrayed him in a sinister light by connecting the two funding decisions (the one had nothing to do with the other) and by referring to the Coalition as a ‘political organization’ rather than by its name (leaving the impression that maybe his ‘political organization’ had gotten the 10 grand). Given what the newspapers had reported, which, according to the complaint, were the RSLC’s sole sources of information, the RSLC knew the offending statements were false or made them recklessly without any regard for the truth—or so Schatz argues. He also points out that his complaint alleged that the RSLC did not launch ‘any additional investigation’ to determine whether what it said was true. And, reaching the ultimate crescendo, he contends that the complaint’s allegations plausibly show that the RSLC acted with actual malice. We think just the opposite. After comparing what the RSLC proclaimed with what the newspapers disclosed (as everyone agrees we should), we conclude that none of Schatz’s points, individually or collectively, can save the day for him. . . . The bottom line, then, is that he has not ‘nudged’ his actual-malice claim ‘across the line from conceivable to plausible,’ so the judge rightly dismissed the complaint. . . . As a last-ditch effort to save his case, Schatz suggests that if we do not reverse the judge we will be setting pleading standards higher than what Twombly and Iqbal require. Not so. Sure, malice is not a matter that requires particularity in pleading—like other states of mind, it ‘may be alleged generally.’ See Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b). But, to make out a plausible malice claim, a plaintiff must still lay out enough facts from which malice might reasonably be inferred—even in a world with Twombly and Iqbal. . Having followed Twombly and Iqbal to a T, we easily reject Schatz’s last line of attack.”)

Feliciano-Hernandez v. Pereira-Castillo, 663 F.3d 527, 533-36 (1st Cir. 2011) (“Feliciano-Hernández’s complaint fails under Iqbal to plead adequately that the individual defendants violated his constitutional rights and so fails the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As such, he necessarily fails the second prong as well: an objectively reasonable public official situated as defendants would not be on notice of violations of any constitutional rights. The named defendants are very high-level officials, each of whom, as Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had vast responsibilities. . . . The complaint sets forth a series of conclusions. It alleges that ‘[i]n keeping the plaintiff confined beyond the term of his sentence, each defendant acted with deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard of the plaintiff’s Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law’ and that ‘[e]ach defendant [] unjustifiabl[y] deprived plaintiff of liberty in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law.’. The complaint states as to each of the former-Secretary defendants that he or she ‘is being sued on the basis of his [or her] deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard’ of the plaintiff’s rights. It alleges among other conclusions that the defendants ‘failed in their duty to assure adequate monitoring, disciplining, evaluating, training and supervising any and all personnel under their charge, to assure that all inmates were properly classified and released upon completion of their sentence.’ It relatedly alleges that ‘[h]ad the defendants complied with their supervisory duties, they would have identified those employees that did not properly register the plaintiff’s classification and inaccurately categorized the crimes for which he had been sentenced.’ None of these conclusory allegations suffice to establish a claim. These are exactly the sort of ‘unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation[s]’ that both we and the Supreme Court have found insufficient. . . . There are a number of other specific deficiencies in the complaint. We start (and end) with the failure to plead that any of the named defendants, each a former Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had any individual notice that plaintiff’s incarceration beyond 1993 was a violation of his constitutional rights, much less that there was an affirmative link to them or that they were deliberately indifferent to those notices of alleged violations of his rights. Actual or constructive knowledge of a rights violation is a prerequisite for stating any claim. . . . Even beyond failing to show notice to the individual defendants, the complaint fails on other grounds. Feliciano-Hernández ‘would still have to go further, for “not every official who is aware of a problem exhibits deliberate indifference by failing to resolve it.”’. . . The complaint contains no factual allegations to support even a minimal showing of deliberate indifference.”)

Air Sunshine, Inc. v. Carl, 663 F.3d 27, 35 (1st Cir. 2011) (“The bald allegation that Carl refused to accept the inspection Air Sunshine had conducted, pending revision of certain manuals, which Air Sunshine had been waiting for Carl to approve, also does not state a procedural due process claim. The complaint does not state when the private inspection took place, when the results were submitted to Carl, when Carl refused to accept the inspection, why his refusal was improper, and provides no other information that would provide necessary context for a claim of constitutional violation. These and the other ‘naked assertion[s]’ of procedural due process violations are ‘devoid of “further factual enhancement” and do not survive the motion to dismiss. . . Carl’s actions were also entirely consistent with lawful conduct, which is another reason the complaint fails to meet the Iqbal standard.”)

Soto-Torres v. Fraticelli, 654 F.3d 153, 157 n.2 (1st Cir. 2011) (“The complaint’s allegations that Soto-Torres was ‘illegally and unreasonabl[y] detained’ and that ‘excessive force’ was used in pushing him to the floor are legal conclusions that are not to be credited.”)

Ocasio-Hernandez v. Fortuno-Burset, 640 F.3d 1, 13-17, 19 (1st Cir. 2011) (“At issue. . . is the correctness of the district court’s conclusion that the plaintiffs’ complaint fails to show that the defendants had knowledge of the plaintiffs’ political affiliation and that the plaintiffs’ political affiliation motivated the defendants’ participation in the plaintiffs’ terminations. . . . The district court erred by not affording the plaintiffs’ allegations the presumption of truth to which they were entitled. First, as we explained above, the Supreme Court’s concerns about conclusory allegations expressed in Twombly and Iqbal focused on allegations of ultimate legal conclusions and on unadorned recitations of a cause-of-action’s elements couched as factual assertions. Allegations of discrete factual events such as the defendants questioning the plaintiffs and replacing the plaintiffs with new employees are not ‘conclusory’ in the relevant sense. Second, factual allegations in a complaint do not need to contain the level of specificity sought by the district court. . . . Additionally, the district court erred when it failed to evaluate the cumulative effect of the factual allegations. The question confronting a court on a motion to dismiss is whether all the facts alleged, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, render the plaintiff’s entitlement to relief plausible. . . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has suggested that allegations that would individually lack the heft to make a claim plausible may suffice to state a claim in the context of the complaint’s other factual allegations. . . . We also reject the district court’s ‘lead to the conclusion’ formulation to the extent it implies a stronger logical connection than that demanded by plausibility. As we have said previously, ‘[a] plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss.’ Sepúlveda-Villarini, 628 F.3d at 30. Taking all well-pleaded factual allegations as true, the plaintiffs in this case have pleaded adequate factual material to support a reasonable inference that the four defendants had knowledge of their political beliefs. . . . Because precise knowledge of the chain of events leading to the constitutional violation may often be unavailable to a plaintiff at this early stage of the litigation, we take to heart the Supreme Court’s call to ‘draw on our “judicial experience and common sense” as we make a contextual judgment about the sufficiency of the pleadings.’. . . As we have often emphasized, one rarely finds ‘smoking gun’ evidence in a political discrimination case. . . . Circumstantial evidence must, at times, suffice. Moreover, the requirement of plausibility on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) ‘simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the illegal [conduct].’. . . The allegations above plausibly show that each defendant possessed knowledge of and shared some responsibility for the termination of employees at La Fortaleza. . . . Turning to the question of discriminatory motive, we must again conclude that the district court erred. The allegations of the plaintiffs’ complaint support the reasonable inference that the defendants’ decision to terminate the plaintiffs’ employment was substantially motivated by political affiliation. . . . The cumulative weight of the plaintiffs’ factual allegations easily nudges their claim of political discrimination ‘across the line from conceivable to plausible’ as to each defendant. . . . Read as a whole, the plaintiffs’ complaint unquestionably describes a plausible discriminatory sequence that is all too familiar in this circuit. . . . Under the Federal Rules, no more is required to ‘unlock the doors of discovery’ for these plaintiffs.”)

Rios-Colon v. Toledo-Davila, 641 F.3d 1, 2, 5 (1st Cir. 2011) (“Plaintiff Víctor Hugo Ríos-Colón (‘Ríos’) appeals from the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, dismissing his suit alleging racial discrimination in the course of his employment in the Puerto Rico Police Department for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6). The complaint alleged that he is black and that his supervisor in the Police Department used racial slurs against him and transferred him to a less desirable position. For the reasons explained below, we conclude that the complaint plausibly alleged claims of racial discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e-2000e-17, and of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, made actionable by 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . The complaint alleges that Ríos was transferred from a position with the Drug Prevention Division to a less desirable position with the Bureau of Illegal Arms. The position to which he was transferred allegedly offered materially less attractive working conditions and fewer opportunities to earn overtime pay. The complaint furthermore plausibly alleges that the disadvantageous transfer was based on racial discrimination. It alleges that Cordero, the supervisor who caused Ríos to be transferred and who recommended a less qualified white candidate in preference to Ríos when a position in the Drug Prevention Division later became available, had used abusive and derogatory slurs expressing explicit anti-black racial bias. These allegations were sufficient to plead a cognizable claim under the Equal Protection Clause, as they convey a plausible inference that Cordero discriminated against Ríos in official acts, depriving him of significant advantages because of his race.”)

Peñalbert-Rosa v. Fortuno-Burset, 631 F.3d 592, 595-97 (1st Cir. 2011) (“Iqbal could be viewed as emergent law, see, e.g., 129 S.Ct. at 1961 (Souter, J., dissenting), but we ourselves had earlier said a complaint that rests on ‘bald assertions’ and ‘unsupportable conclusions’ may be subject to dismissal, Aulson v. Blanchard, 83 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir.1996); and our decisions since Iqbal have several times found unadorned factual assertions to be inadequate. . . . Without trying to lay down a mechanical rule, it is enough to say that sometimes a threadbare factual allegation bears insignia of its speculative character and, absent greater concreteness, invites an early challenge—which can be countered by a plaintiff’s supplying of the missing detail. Here, Peñalbert’s complaint does allege that personnel decisions in the executive mansion are within the authority of the governor, but nothing beyond speculation supports the further assertion that the governor or his chief of staff participated in the decision to dismiss Peñalbert. Someone denominated the ‘administrator’ of the governor’s mansion might more plausibly be involved, but nothing in the complaint indicates the administrator’s actual duties or that the administrator ordinarily passes on the selection or discharge of a receptionist. A defendant could be liable, even without knowing of Peñalbert or her position, if (for example) on some generic basis that defendant authorized the impermissible firing of PDP supporters because of their party membership or beliefs. . . But, again, mere possibility is not enough to state a claim and again no facts are stated in the complaint to show that in this instance any of the three gave such an order or that it is even plausible that they did. If Peñalbert had any basis beyond speculation for charging any one of the named defendants with knowing participation in the wrong, it seems almost certain that this would have been mentioned—if not in the complaint at least in the opposition to the motion to dismiss. Specific information, even if not in the form of admissible evidence, would likely be enough at this stage; pure speculation is not. This may seem hard on a plaintiff who merely suspects wrongdoing, but even discovery requires a minimum showing and ‘fishing expeditions’ are not permitted. . . However, Peñalbert’s position is in one respect different: the complaint adequately alleges—based on the non-conclusory facts already listed—that someone fired Peñalbert based on party membership. Of course, the factual allegations might be later undermined or countered by affirmative defenses . . . but at this stage the complaint adequately asserts a federal wrong by someone. So while the present complaint does not justify suit against the defendants actually named, an avenue for discovery may be open. A plaintiff who is unaware of the identity of the person who wronged her can sometimes proceed against a ‘John Doe’ defendant as a placeholder. . . We have previously condoned the device, at least when discovery is likely to reveal the identity of the correct defendant and good faith investigative efforts to do so have already failed. . . Whether Peñalbert could make such a showing is not clear from the face of her complaint, and she has not sought this ‘John Doe’ alternative. Rarely do we rescue a civil claim—even to the very limited extent now contemplated—on grounds not urged either on the district court or on us. But Twombly and Iqbal are relatively recent; developing a workable distinction between ‘fact’ and ‘speculation’ is still a work in progress; and while upholding the dismissal of the complaint against the named defendants, we think that the interests of justice warrant a remand to give Peñalbert a reasonable opportunity to move to amend the complaint to seek relief against a ‘John Doe’ defendant.”) Sepulveda-Villarini v. Department of Educ. of Puerto Rico, 628 F.3d 25, 29, 30 (1st Cir. 2010) (“We think that the district court demanded more than plausibility. Each set of pleadings includes two significant sets of allegations. First, for a period of four or five school years the school administration provided the reduced class size in response to the respective plaintiff’s request, supported by some sort of medical certification attesting to its legitimacy. In each complaint, those years of requested accommodation are put forward as establishing, in effect, a base-line of adequacy under the statute in response to an implicit acknowledgment that a statutory disability required the provisions that were made. Second, each set of pleadings describes changed facts beginning in the 2007-08 year, in which instructions from the defendant Secretary resulted in raising the class size to 30 (with a young team teacher to share the load with Sepúlveda). Each complaint alleges that the plaintiff’s emotional and physical health subsequently deteriorated to the point of requiring treatment, and each concludes that assigning 30 pupils was less than reasonable accommodation under the statute. . . . We . . . see the trial judge’s call for allegations explaining ‘how’ class size was significant and the change in size was actionable as a call for pleading the details of medical evidence in order to bolster the likelihood that a causal connection will prove out as fact. It may even be read as an expression of skepticism that medical evidence would support the causal claim that increased class size damaged health. But Twombly cautioned against thinking of plausibility as a standard of likely success on the merits; the standard is plausibility assuming the pleaded facts to be true and read in a plaintiff's favor. . . . A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss, and the fair inferences from the facts pleaded in these cases point to the essential difference between each of them and the circumstances in Twombly, for example, in which the same actionable conduct alleged on the defendant's part had been held in some prior cases to be lawful behavior. . . . We therefore vacate the portion of the order in each case that found the complaint inadequate to state a Title I violation, and inadequate to state a Rehabilitation Act claim for the same reason.")

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 273-75 & n.7(1st Cir. 2009) ("[A]nalyzing the pleadings under Iqbal, we hold that the allegations of the complaint do not allege a sufficient connection between the Mayor and the alleged conscience-shocking behavior—the killing of the seized pets—to state the elements of a substantive due process violation. . . . The purported liability of the Mayor for damages for substantive due process violations does not involve a policy of the Municipality for which he is responsible, nor does it rest on his personal conduct. Instead, the allegations against the Mayor are that he promulgated a pet policy for the public housing complexes and was present at and participated in one of the raids. This level of involvement is insufficient to support a finding of liability. . . . Plaintiffs complaint identifies no policy which authorized the killing of the pets, much less one which the Mayor authorized. Second, the complaint does not allege that the Mayor was personally involved in any conscience-shocking conduct during the raids. . . . A government official who himself inflicts truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable harm on a person or his property may be liable; but there is no claim in this complaint the Mayor himself inflicted such harm. . . . The allegations against the Mayor thus do not establish that his involvement was sufficiently direct to hold him liable for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights. Nor do the allegations make out a viable case for supervisory liability, such that the Mayor could, on these pleadings, be held responsible for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights committed by subordinate municipal employees or workers from ACS. . . . Some recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability. . . . We need not resolve this issue, however, because we find that the plaintiffs have not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under our previous formulation of the standards for supervisory liability. . . . Here, the Mayor's promulgation of a pet policy that was silent as to the manner in which the pets were to be collected and disposed of, coupled with his mere presence at one of the raids, is insufficient to create the affirmative link necessary for a finding of supervisory liability, even under a theory of deliberate indifference. The Mayor is entitled to qualified immunity on the pleadings on the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims.")

Thomas v. Rhode Island, 542 F.3d 944, 949 (1st Cir. 2008) ("[E]ven if the probable cause theory of the appellants were properly before us, we would reject it. The vague references in the complaint to acts of the defendants that 'are illegal' and 'without lawful authority' were insufficient to apprise defendants that the appellants were asserting a more particular claim that there was a lack of probable cause for the arrests. As we have stated, ‘[n]otice pleading rules do not relieve a plaintiff of responsibility for identifying the nature of her claim.’ . . . Our precedent is clear that courts ‘must always exhibit awareness of the defendant’s inalienable right to know in advance the nature of the cause of action being asserted against him,’ because such notice is ‘[a] fundamental purpose of pleadings under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.’ . . . Here, the generality of the complaint’s language did not afford defendants such notice with respect to the probable cause claim.”).

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *7, *8 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) [O’Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin’s R & R) (“[T]he fact that Keenan is alleged by Solomon to have engaged in unconstitutional misconduct, and then to have engaged in further misconduct in an immunized capacity (i.e., his grand jury testimony) does not serve to immunize him retroactively with respect to the earlier acts. . . . It is also potentially evidence with respect to the allegation plausibly made in the Amended Complaint that Keenan colluded with Dookhan and the ADA, intending to frame Solomon, which would also state a claim for violation of his due process rights. Even where Brady is not implicated, state actors nevertheless violate an accused’s due process rights when they engage in a ‘deliberate deception.’ . . . As in Limone, Solomon’s allegations here are broader than a Brady claim. . . . Solomon alleges not that Keenan merely disposed of the tested substance, but then was otherwise an unwitting collateral victim of Dookhan’s misconduct. Rather, he plausibly alleges that Keenan, along with Dookhan, knowingly sought Solomon’s wrongful conviction by: failing to provide the field test materials; attempting to intimidate Solomon’s counsel; seeking an indictment of Solomon on the felony charge; and offering false (albeit immunized) testimony and evidence to the grand jury.”)

Brace v. Massachusetts, 673 F.Supp.2d 36, 42, 43 (D. Mass. 2009) (“[T]he heightened ‘plausibility’ pleading standard first articulated in Twombly and then re-stated in Iqbal might not be as universal as Plaintiff’s counsel seemed to contend at oral argument. Regardless of the actual reach of Twombly and Iqbal, and even assuming, arguendo, that the heightened pleading standard applies, Plaintiff in this case has pled sufficient facts to survive Defendant Frey’s motion to dismiss. As to the first element needed to establish a violation of Ms. Brace’s rights under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, there is little question that Plaintiff’s complaint establishes that Ms. Brace’s condition while she was in custody constituted a serious medical need. Similarly, Plaintiff’s complaint contains enough factual detail to plausibly support a claim that Defendant Frey might have exhibited deliberate indifference to this serious medical need. The complaint alleges that Defendant Frey observed Ms. Brace while she was in obvious medical distress, which would establish that she was subjectively aware of the substantial risk of serious harm. The complaint also avers that Defendant Frey did take the minimal step of making a phone call to the medical unit about Ms. Brace’s condition, which is enough to establish that she in fact did actually draw the inference that a risk of harm existed. Given Plaintiff’s factual allegations about Defendant Frey’s role in the events of August 20, 2005, it is plausible that Plaintiff could establish that Defendant Frey’s failure to take any further action could constitute deliberate indifference. The complaint here does not begin and end with a conclusory recitation of the legal elements that must be proved. Rather, Plaintiff has cited to enough specific alleged acts or omissions by Defendant Frey that might support a claim under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, especially given the limited access to information that Plaintiff has had prior to taking discovery in this case.”).

Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 177-79 & n.2 (D. Mass. 2009) (“Plausibility, as the Supreme Court’s recent elaboration in Ashcroft v. Iqbal makes clear, is a highly contextual enterprise—dependent on the particular claims asserted, their elements, and the overall factual picture alleged in the complaint. . . .Allegations become ‘conclusory’ where they recite only the elements of the claim and, at the same time, the court’s commonsense credits a far more likely inference from the available facts. . . .This analysis depends on the full factual picture, the particular cause of action, and the available alternative explanations. Yet in keeping with Rule 8(a), a complaint should only be dismissed at the pleading stage where the allegations are so broad, and the alternative explanations so overwhelming, that the claims no longer appear plausible. . . .Together, [the] factual allegations [of the complaint] raise the plausible inference that, given their supervisory duties and security responsibilities, the Defendants failed to adequately train, supervise, or investigate Ballista’s year-long sexual encounters with Chao. They encompass also a failure to adopt policies and procedures within the DOC that would have prevented the sexual abuse alleged in the complaint. . . . Given the public attention devoted to sexual abuse in prisons writ large, and the repetitive, long-lasting abuse alleged in this case, it is a fair inference from the pleadings that prison officials—including Commissioner Dennehey—were deliberately indifferent to the risks and reality of this abuse. . . . Notably, the state of mind required to make out a supervisory claim under the Eighth Amendment—i.e., deliberate indifference—requires less than the discriminatory purpose or intent that Iqbal was required to allege in his suit against Ashcroft and Mueller. . . Together with the other contextual factors discussed above, what qualifies as a fair or credible inference from the facts alleged in the pleadings must be calibrated accordingly.. . . While the Defendants’ personal involvement will be further tested at the summary judgment stage, Chao’s claims have met the crucial threshold of plausibility and survive the Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss.”)

Farrah v. Gondella, No. 07-12075-RGS, 2008 WL 2788090, at *3, *4 (D. Mass. July 16, 2008) (not reported) (“In Blodgett’s view, the supervisory claim is pled so broadly that it would allow civil rights plaintiffs to sweep any superior officer into the ambit of liability simply by using catch-phrases like “knew or should have known” and “failed to act.” Blodgett contends that plaintiff is attempting to bootstrap allegations regarding Blanchard’s past conduct into the claim of supervisory liability without pleading any link between the alleged conduct and Blodgett personally. According to Blodgett, Twombly requires more. Blodgett may in this regard place too much weight on Twombly, but there is another consideration. Rule 8 requires a civil rights plaintiff (as it does plaintiffs generally) to set forth factual allegations with respect to each material element necessary to warrant relief, including ‘who did what to whom, when, where, and why.’ Educadores Puertorriqueños en Acción v. Hernández, 367 F.3d 61, 68 (1st Cir.2004) (affirming the application of Rule 8 to civil rights actions, but rejecting a ‘heightened pleading standard’). . . . Plaintiff’s supervisory claim against Blodgett, as currently pled, skirts perilously close to an unadorned theory of vicarious liability, a tort concept that has no application in a section 1983 context. . . . While a civil rights plaintiff need not plead encyclopedic facts in order to adequately state a supervisory liability claim, the facts pled should be sufficient to cross the rim of the speculative into the realm of the plausible. This is particularly true where the supervisor against whom the claim is brought is an elected official whose duties run well beyond oversight of one of many components of a government office owing manifold duties to the general public. Perhaps the court is mistaken in permitting plaintiff a second chance as against Blodgett, but at this stage of the proceedings, the rules are appropriately plaintiff-friendly, and Blodgett has not (as yet) raised a claim of qualified immunity. The court will permit plaintiff to conduct discovery from Blodgett limited solely (and strictly) to the issues of: (1) his authority to discipline members of the Drug Task Force for alleged misconduct; and (2) his knowledge of any propensity by Blanchard (or others) to use excessive force.”).

Brown v. Sweeney, 526 F.Supp.2d 126, 129, 130 (D.Mass. 2007) (“The United States Supreme Court is the flagship of a vast fleet of courts. Where, as here, it makes a course correction after sailing on a particular tack for a long period of time, it has the right to expect that each of the subordinate units will keep station on the flag, make the identical course correction, and sail on the new course in perfect alignment. At least that is the theory. Here, of course, the metaphor breaks down. Decisions of the Supreme Court do not come with precise orders, such as ‘alter course three degrees to starboard.’ Rather they carefully decide the specific controversy before the Court and explain the grounds of such decision. Given our strong stare decisis tradition, however, every such decision implicitly carries a signal much like Nelson’s famous ‘England expects ...’ flag hoist at Trafalgar, i.e. ‘that every man shall do his duty’ and so we all shall ... at least insofar as we can make out the signal. There is some merit to an argument limiting the reach of Bell Atlantic to its antitrust subject matter. Professor Erwin Chemerinsky suggested such a limitation in addressing the District of Massachusetts Judicial Conference in June 2007. The Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic noted the imperative of dismissing antitrust claims before embarking your expensive discovery. . . . Such an argument is supported by the more recent Supreme Court decision in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). The Supreme Court, in Erickson, addressed a claim for a section 1983 violation and stated that ‘[s]pecific facts are not necessary.’ . . . To make matters more confusing, the authority cited for the proposition is Bell Atlantic, with an internal quotation citing Conley. . . . Bell Atlantic, when read together with Erickson, and in light of the cases that have addressed this issue, appears neither to be confined to antitrust cases nor to impose a significantly heightened pleading standard. . . . The use of the Bell Atlantic language and standard in Erickson implies that recognizing a heightened (or different) pleading standard only for antitrust cases and therefore distinguishing Bell Atlantic on its antitrust subject matter ought fail. . . . Still, Erickson is instructive in analyzing a motion to dismiss after Bell Atlantic. In Erickson, the Supreme Court held that a section 1983 claim alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment was properly pled where ‘[t]he complaint stated that [the doctor’s] decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was Aendangering [his] life”’ and that ‘this medication was withheld Ashortly after” petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was Astill in need of treatment for this disease,” and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment.’. . These generalized factual allegations were deemed sufficient and demonstrate that a liberal pleading standard as to the ‘grounds’ of a claim remains. . . The decision in Bell Atlantic, therefore, is properly read as undermining only those claims that rest exclusively on conclusory or merely speculative assertions.”).

SECOND CIRCUIT

Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51, 68 (2d Cir. 2015) (“[W]e find erroneous each of the three apparently independent grounds given by the district court for dismissing Willey’s claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement. The first two aim to set a minimum duration and minimum severity of an exposure for it to reach the level of a constitutional violation. We agree that there are many exposures of inmates to unsanitary conditions that do not amount to a constitutional violation, but we reject the district court’s conclusion that there is any bright-line durational requirement for a viable unsanitary-conditions claim. Nor is there some minimal level of grotesquerie required, which goes unmet by an inmate’s accumulating human waste that fills a toilet but does not ‘overflow[] into his cell.’. . Instead, our decisions and those of other circuits evaluate the product of these two components—whether exposure to human waste is cruel and unusual depends on both the duration and the severity of the exposure. . . . The severity of an exposure may be less quantifiable than its duration, but its qualitative offense to a prisoner’s dignity should be given due consideration. Here, the district court’s analysis did not appear to consider the effect that the cell shields would have in exponentially amplifying the grotesquerie of the odor of the accumulating waste. Another relevant consideration increases the severity of Willey’s second alleged exposure, which the district court did not discuss. Over those fourteen days in a filthy cell, Willey alleges that he was kept naked and without access to clothing. We do not mean to set out any precise formula—we do not say, for example, that this 14-day exposure without clothing was more or less grave than the later 28-day exposure with clothing—but any analysis must consider both the duration and the severity of an inmate’s experience of being exposed to unsanitary conditions. Finally, the district court’s imposition of a third requirement—that an inmate ‘claim[] that he suffered sickness or other ill effects’ to establish a violation, J.A. 676—fares no better. Although the seriousness of the harms suffered is relevant to calculating damages and may shed light on the severity of an exposure, serious injury is unequivocally not a necessary element of an Eighth Amendment claim. . . Even if such harm were required, Willey plainly alleged that his mental-health problems and attempted suicide followed the campaign of retaliation of which the unsanitary conditions of his confinement were a prominent part. For these reasons, independent of the reaching of grounds not raised by the movants without notice and an opportunity to respond, we vacate the dismissal of Willey’s claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement.”)

Crawford v. Cuomo, 796 F.3d 252, 254 (2d Cir. 2015) (“We write today to clarify the rule set forth in Boddie: A corrections officer’s intentional contact with an inmate’s genitalia or other intimate area, which serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or to humiliate the inmate, violates the Eighth Amendment. Moreover, we recognize that sexual abuse of prisoners, once passively accepted by society, deeply offends today's standards of decency. The proper application of the rule in Boddie must reflect these standards. By alleging that Officer Prindle fondled their genitals for personal gratification and without penological justification, Crawford and Corley stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Dolan v. Connolly, 794 F.3d 290, 292, 295 (2d Cir. 2015) (“We hold that action as a member of an ILC, i.e. the filing or voicing of grievances on behalf of a prison population, qualifies as constitutionally protected conduct under the First and Fourteenth Amendments and that retaliation for such conduct is therefore actionable under Section 1983. . . . While we harbor some skepticism as to whether the complaint, as it stands, adequately pleads a factual basis from which to infer a causal connection between Dolan’s protected conduct and the adverse actions allegedly taken by (at least) some defendants, reading the pro se complaint and opposition papers liberally, we cannot conclude that amendment would be futile.”)

Drimal v. Tai, 786 F.3d 219, 223-24 (2d Cir. 2015) (“The district court’s rulings on the pleadings and on qualified immunity suffer from two deficiencies. First, the district court erred in finding Drimal’s complaint sufficient to plead a violation of Title III because Drimal simply asserted in a conclusory fashion that intercepting marital telephone calls violated Title III without any reference to the duty to minimize. Second, in evaluating defendants’ claims of qualified immunity, the district court ruled on all the defendants as a single group instead of evaluating Drimal’s claims against each defendant individually. Accordingly, we vacate the district court’s denial of the motion to dismiss and direct the dismissal of the complaint with leave to replead under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a)(2) because it appears that amending the complaint would not be futile. . . . In assessing the complaint, the district court read the minimization requirement into the plaintiff’s allegations that defendants ‘unlawfully’ listened to her calls and required no greater specificity as to the facts alleged. However, a simple allegation that defendants behaved ‘unlawfully,’ unsupported by any factual detail, is precisely the type of legal conclusion that a court is not bound to accept as true on a motion to dismiss, and the district court erred in doing so here.”)

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64 (2d Cir. 2014) (“‘Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief ... requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense’ Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679. We would love to live in a world where it is implausible for a doctor to disregard her oath and refuse to treat a patient she believed had attacked a female officer—just as we would love to live in a world where it is implausible for an employer to be so irrational as to refuse to hire a qualified applicant because of the applicant’s skin color. Unfortunately, we do not. . . Taking the allegations in Nielsen’s complaint and his opposition brief as true, Nielsen can plausibly allege that Dr. Rabin acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . If Nielsen’s complaint were amended to include the allegations in his opposition to the motion to dismiss, the complaint would sufficiently set forth the mental state element of his deliberate indifference claim. Thus, amendment would not be futile. We therefore REVERSE the decision to deny leave to amend and REMAND to the District Court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64-67 (2d Cir. 2014) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent. It is common ground that Nielsen’s initial complaint was properly dismissed. It alleged that he received minimal medical treatment for serious injuries after police officers informed his treating physicians that Nielsen had attacked two of the officers. . . The majority and I agree that these allegations, even if proven, cannot sustain a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim for deliberate indifference. . . The holding of the majority is that an amended complaint would survive if augmented by two incremental allegations made in Nielsen’s opposition to the motion to dismiss: that the officers accompanying Nielsen told Dr. Rabin that (1) one of the officers Nielsen attacked was a woman, and (2) Nielsen ‘should be ignored and left alone.’ I am of the view that these two allegations do not render plausible the claim that Dr. Rabin withheld medical services from a patient with serious visible injuries. . . It is implausible that a doctor would neglect a patient at the request of a malicious policeman. In any event, the claim is defeated by a review of the medical file (attached as an exhibit to the declaration of counsel in support of Dr. Rabin’s motion to dismiss). It reflects that Nielsen did not report symptoms indicative of serious injury, that Nielsen was examined by multiple medical professionals, that some treatment was administered, that what was done reflected a medical consensus, and that Nielsen was told to return for follow-up attention. The claim thus becomes that two doctors violated their oaths and that a nurse falsely reported that Nielsen was in a low level of pain at the time of discharge, all at the behest of police officers who told the doctors that their patient should be neglected. This claim, which is absurd, is easily classed as implausible. . . . The majority opinion reflects two fallacies that are indulged with some frequency in our opinions. First, there is insufficient appreciation that this section 1983 action is a personal claim against the individual assets of Dr. Rabin, and that the defense costs of such a claim alone can wipe out a college fund or equity on a home. . . The plausibility test in cases such as this is a safeguard against a financial injustice that can often outweigh the harm claimed by a plaintiff. True, some or many defendants are indemnified by employers or insurers (though insurance may not cover intentional acts); but such an arrangement would be dehors the record, and may not be considered by us in deciding whether a claim survives through the expense of discovery and extended motion practice. See Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 162 n. 6 (2d Cir.2013). Second, the majority’s ruling on plausibility unintentionally implies a certain disrespect for the ethics of doctors and nurses. The majority deems it plausible that each of these medical professionals (and all of them together) would allow a patient’s suffering to go unabated at the say-so of policemen expressing hostility to a person in custody. We would never deem such dereliction plausible if alleged against a lawyer.”)

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119, 126, 128, 130 (2d Cir. 2013) (“Walker plausibly alleged that his conditions of confinement at FCI Ray Brook deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life’s necessities and subjected him to unreasonable health and safety risks. He alleged that for approximately twenty-eight months, he was confined in a cell with five other men, with inadequate space and ventilation, stifling heat in the summer and freezing cold in the winter, unsanitary conditions, including urine and feces splattered on the floor, insufficient cleaning supplies, a mattress too narrow for him to lie on flat, and noisy, crowded conditions that made sleep difficult and placed him at constant risk of violence and serious harm from cellmates. Based on these allegations, we conclude that Walker has plausibly alleged cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . .In dismissing Walker’s complaint, the district court improperly ‘assay[ed] the weight of the evidence,’ . . . and failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Walker’s favor. For example, the district court found that Walker’s failure to indicate ‘the exact extent or duration of [his] exposure to unsanitary conditions’ was fatal to his Eighth Amendment claim. Similarly, the court held that Walker’s allegations of inadequate ventilation were insufficient because he did not provide any details about the temperatures in his cell. Such detailed allegations, however, are not required for a pro se complaint to survive a motion to dismiss. Moreover, Walker alleged that he was placed in the six-man cell on November 18, 2008 and was still there when he filed his complaint on March 16, 2011. He also alleged that it was so hot during the summer that he had difficulty breathing, and it was so cold during the winter that ice formed inside the cell windows. Drawing all reasonable inferences in Walker’s favor, these allegations plausibly alleged that the conditions persisted for twenty-eight months and that the temperatures were extreme enough to state an Eighth Amendment claim. . . .In so holding, we reaffirm that each prisoner complaint alleging a constitutional violation must be carefully analyzed in light of the particular facts contained therein. Here, the specific facts in Walker’s complaint plausibly alleged a violation of the Eighth Amendment. But each complaint is different, and courts have the power and duty to dismiss complaints that contain only conclusory, frivolous, or implausible allegations.”)

Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55, 59, 60 (2d Cir. 2010) (“District courts in our Circuit differ as to the impact of this pleading standard on a ‘class of one’ equal protection claim. . . .This uncertainty is attributable to the tension between [i] this Court’s decision in DeMuria v. Hawkes, 328 F.3d 704, 707 (2d Cir.2003), which held under a now-obsolete pleading standard that a ‘class of one’ claim is adequately pled (‘albeit barely’ so) even without specification of others similarly situated, and [ii] the Supreme Court’s recent clarifications, which require that a complaint allege facts sufficient to establish ‘a plausible claim for relief[.]’ . . . We hold that the pleading standard set out in Iqbal supersedes the ‘general allegation’ deemed sufficient in DeMuria, 328 F.3d at 707. Under Iqbal, factual allegations must be sufficient to support necessary legal conclusions. . . . The Rustons’ complaint fails to allege facts that ‘plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.’ As to the Town defendants, the Rustons’ argument appears to be that the Town refused to consider their application while considering applications submitted by those similarly situated. However, the Rustons do not allege specific examples of the Town’s proceedings, let alone applications that were made by persons similarly situated. The equal protection claim as to the Town defendants therefore fails for lack of factual allegations to support the legal conclusion. As to the Village, the Rustons argue that other, similarly situated properties were allowed to connect to the Village’s sewer system. The Rustons do identify several properties that allegedly were allowed to connect to the Village’s sewer system, all of them individual homes or businesses that (like the Rustons’ land) were outside the Village but within the Town. We credit, as we must, the factual allegations that these other properties received sewer access while the Rustons’ property did not. Nevertheless the complaint fails to state a claim that would support relief. . . . None of these properties is similar to the Rustons’ proposed 14-home development, let alone so similar that no rational person could see them as different. . . .As the Rustons fail to allege that properties sufficiently similar to theirs were treated more favorably by either the Village or the Town, they have failed to state a ‘class of one’ equal protection claim.”)

Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120, 121 (2d Cir. 2010) (“The Twombly plausibility standard, which applies to all civil actions, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1953, does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged ‘upon information and belief’ where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant, see, e.g., Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 215 (2d Cir.2008), or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 Concluding that the complaint before it failed to state a plausible claim, the Twombly Court stated that ‘[i]n reaching this conclusion, we do not apply any “heightened” pleading standard,’ id. at 569 n. 14 (emphasis added). Rather, it emphasized that its holding was consistent with its ruling in Swierkiewicz that ‘a heightened pleading requirement,’ requiring the pleading of ‘“specific facts” beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief,’ was ‘impermissibl[e],’ Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. . . . Nor did Iqbal heighten the pleading requirements. Rather, it reiterated much of the discussion in Twombly and rejected as insufficient a pleading that the Iqbal Court regarded as entirely conclusory. Accordingly, although Twombly and Iqbal require ‘A factual amplification [where] needed to render a claim plausible,’” . . . we reject Doe 3’s contention that Twombly and Iqbal require the pleading of specific evidence or extra facts beyond what is needed to make the claim plausible.”)

Shomo v. State of New York, 374 F. App’x 180, ____ (2d Cir. 2010) (not published) (“Appellant, pro se, appeals from the order of the United States District Court for the Western District of New York (Arcara, C.J.), sua sponte dismissing Appellant’s 42 U.S.C. § 1983 complaint with leave to amend, pursuant to Rules 8 and 10 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e). . . . We conclude that, under either an abuse of discretion or de novo standard, the district court erred in dismissing Appellant’s complaint, even with leave to amend, because many of Appellant’s claims, if true, would be actionable under the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq. (“ADA”), and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794. While the district court afforded Appellant the opportunity to amend his complaint, Appellant’s complaint was not so deficient as to require its dismissal at such an early stage of litigation. The jurisprudence involving Rule 8, traced from our decision in Salahuddin through the Supreme Court’s recent Iqbal decision, is difficult to apply to the dismissal of a complaint containing too much detail, especially where the complaint is filed by a pro se litigant. . . . Notably, even after Twombly, where a litigant is proceeding pro se, courts remain ‘obligated’ to construe pro se complaints liberally. . . . Notwithstanding the length and detail of Appellant’s complaint, his claims enunciate recognizable unconstitutional behavior. The day-to-day events described by Appellant concern the activities of his daily living: his need to be fed, bathed, and aided with toileting. While citing to numerous federal statutes (a practice not uncommon for pro se litigants), Appellant's claims centered around his disability and the alleged deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. He then amplified these claims, as required under Twombly and Iqbal, by making specific references to events that he claimed were evidence of such deliberate indifference. Insofar as he cited multiple civil rights statutes, '[t]he failure in a complaint to state a statute, or to cite the correct one, in no way affects the merits of a claim. Factual allegations alone are what matters.' Albert v. Carovano, 851 F.2d 561, 571 n. 3 (2d Cir.1988). In fact, while not a model of clarity, Appellant's complaint is neither 'unintelligible' nor 'a labrynthian prolixity of unrelated and vituperative charges that defied comprehension.'").

Turkmen v. Ashcroft, 589 F.3d 542, 546, 547 (2d Cir. 2009) ("We could undertake to decide whether the challenged claims satisfy the pleading standard of Twombly and Iqbal; however, in the circumstances of this case—where plaintiffs have already announced their intent to file a Fourth Amended Complaint to preserve for the putative class the claims asserted only by the settling plaintiffs—we think it better to vacate that portion of the district court's order denying dismissal of the conditions of confinement claims on the ground that an outdated pleading standard was applied, and to remand the case for further proceedings consistent with the standard articulated in Twombly and Iqbal. It may be that the district court will grant plaintiffs leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint to satisfy the heightened pleading standard. . . . If the district court denies leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint, it should evaluate the sufficiency of the Third Amended Complaint in light of the settlement and the heightened pleading standard. The district court can then address whether, under Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Amended Complaint fails to state a claim, or inadequately alleges the personal involvement of the moving defendants, or entitles the moving defendants to qualified immunity with respect to the conditions of confinement claims. At this stage of proceedings, we do no more than vacate the order denying the motions to dismiss with respect to the conditions of confinement claims, and remand to the district court for further proceedings.").

Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 213-16 (2d Cir. 2008) ("We agree with the Iqbal panel's conclusion that Twombly focused on the plausibility of the complainant's claim for relief, although Iqbal does not offer much guidance to plaintiffs regarding when factual 'amplification [is] needed to render [a] claim plausible.' . . . We need not locate the outer bounds of Twombly's new standard for assessing pleadings under Rule 8(a) here, because no amplification was necessary in this case. After Twombly, the Supreme Court issued another decision addressing the sufficiency of a pleading under Rule 8(a), but this time specifically for a complaint filed pro se. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). The Court reversed the Tenth Circuit's dismissal of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim, holding that the court of appeals had 'depart[ed] from the liberal pleading standards' of Rule 8(a). . . . The Court reiterated that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary,' and that the complainant 'need only Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'" . . . But Erickson also emphasized that the court of appeals' departure from Rule 8(a)'s liberal pleading standard was particularly unwarranted because the complainant was pro se . . . Twombly and Erickson explicitly disavow that Rule 8(a) requires any plaintiff—let alone a pro se plaintiff—to plead 'specific facts.' . . . Moreover, as Boykin correctly observes, the names and records, if any, of persons who were not members of the protected classes and were more favorably treated in the loan application process is information particularly within KeyBank's knowledge and control. Pleading on the basis of information and belief is generally appropriate under such circumstances. . . . Boykin is correct that she did not need to allege discriminatory animus for her disparate treatment claim to be sufficiently pleaded. There is no heightened pleading requirement for civil rights complaints alleging racial animus . . . and this Court has found such claims sufficiently pleaded when the complaint stated simply that plaintiffs 'are African-Americans, describe[d] defendants' actions in detail, and allege[d] that defendants selected [plaintiffs] for maltreatment Asolely because of their color.'". . . We have upheld the vitality of this principle since Twombly. . . Here, it is sufficient that Boykin's complaint states that she 'is an African American female,' describes KeyBank's actions with respect to her loan application and alleges that she 'was treated differently from similarly situated loan applicants ... because of her race, sex, and the location of the property in a predominantly African-American neighborhood.' In sum, Boykin's allegations, taken as true, indicate the possibility of discrimination and thus present a plausible claim of disparate treatment. The complaint gives KeyBank notice of Boykin's claim and the grounds upon which it rests that is sufficient to satisfy Rule 8(a). We emphasize that we are expressing no opinion regarding the merits of Boykin's claim. And that is precisely the point: even after Twombly, dismissal of a pro se claim as insufficiently pleaded is appropriate only in the most unsustainable of cases. The merits of a claim like Boykin's, which on its face presents a plausible allegation of disparate treatment, should be tested on summary judgment.").

In re Elevator Antitrust Litigation, 502 F.3d 47, 50 (2d Cir. 2007) ("A narrow view of Twombly would have limited its holding to the antitrust context, or perhaps only to Section 1 claims; but we have concluded that Twombly affects pleading standards somewhat more broadly. [citing Iqbal]").

Brown v. City of N.Y., No. 13-CV-06912, 2017 WL 1390678, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2017) ("Brown contends that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple gave gang members special privileges and responsibilities at GMDC. But Brown has not pled any specific facts that, if accepted as true, would establish that these defendants created this policy or allowed it to continue under their watch. For example, Brown does not allege that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple instructed specific correction officers to behave this way, nor does Brown claim that Laboriel, O'Connell, Beltz, and Skepple learned of and ignored specific instances of correction officers condoning attacks by the Bloods. The complaint's conclusory statements that these defendants' created an unconstitutional policy are thus insufficient to demonstrate their personal involvement in this case. . . . Brown's allegations about the false reports, though, are sufficient to establish the personal involvement of Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple. Brown contends that Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz and Captain Skepple authored false reports, and that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O’Connell, and Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz ‘signed off’ on false reports prepared by others. . . Defendants cite the Second Circuit’s decision in Williams v. Smith, 781 F.2d 319, 324 (2d Cir. 1986) for the proposition that ‘the creation of an inaccurate report alone’ does not constitute a constitutional violation. . . Here, however, Brown alleges not only that the incident reports were inaccurate, but also that the Individual Defendants who authored and reviewed them did so to retaliate against him for his complaint about CO James. Although ‘a prison inmate has no general constitutional right to be free from being falsely accused in a misbehavior report,’ the creation of a false report can infringe on an inmate’s constitutional rights when it is used to retaliate against him for exercising a constitutional right. . . Since the complaint here plausibly suggests that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O’Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple had a retaliatory motive, the court cannot dismiss Brown’s § 1983 claims against them for lack of personal involvement.”)

Doe v. New York, No. 10 CV 1792(RJD)(VVP), 2012 WL 4503409, *10-*12 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2012) (“[I]f defendants admittedly promulgated written policies which limited or denied altogether Hepatitis treatment for symptomatic inmates who specifically requested treatment—or, as in several cases, whose treating physicians did so—it is certainly plausible that defendants had an unwritten policy to withhold diagnoses and treatment from asymptomatic inmates who did not request testing or treatment. Additionally, courts in this Circuit have repeatedly declined to dismiss allegations concerning similar instances of failing to inform inmates of their Hepatitis diagnosis over long periods of time, including pursuant to policies nearly identical to those alleged by plaintiffs in this case. . . The Court accordingly rejects defendants’ plausibility challenge. . . Thus although plaintiffs’ claims against Governor Pataki in his individual capacity may proceed based on his alleged role in creating the Hepatitis policy, plaintiffs’ claims brought pursuant to Section 1983 against all individually named DOCS officials are dismissed for failure to adequately allege personal involvement under Section 1983. The fatal flaws identified by the Court may be readily remedied, at least as to some of the individual DOCS defendants. Accordingly, plaintiffs may amend their complaint with respect to these defendants within thirty days of the date of this Order.”)

Bradley v. Rell, No. 1:07-CV-0148 (GTS/RFT), 2010 WL 1257868, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2010) (“As have other Circuits, the Second Circuit has recognized that the clarified plausibility standard that was articulated by the Supreme Court in Twombly governs all claims, including claims brought by pro se litigants (although the plausibility of those claims is to be assessed generously, in light of the special solicitude normally afforded pro se litigants). . . It should be emphasized that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8’s plausibility standard, explained in Twombly, was in no way retracted or diminished by the Supreme Court’s decision (two weeks later) in Erickson v. Pardus, in which (when reviewing a pro se pleading) the Court stated, “Specific facts are not necessary” to successfully state a claim under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . . That statement was merely an abbreviation of the often-repeated point of law—first offered in Conley and repeated in Twombly—that a pleading need not ‘set out in detail the facts upon which [the claim is based]’ in order to successfully state a claim. . . That statement did not mean that all pleadings may achieve the requirement of ‘fair notice’ without ever alleging any facts whatsoever. Clearly, there must still be enough fact set out (however set out, whether in detail or in a generalized fashion) to raise a right to relief above the speculative level to a plausible level.”).

Valenti v. Massapequa Union Free School Dist., No. 09-CV-977 (JFB)(MLO), 2010 WL 475203, at *4 n.5 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 5, 2010) (“The recent Supreme Court decisions in Iqbal and Twombly do not obviate this standard. Indeed, the Court in Twombly explicitly reaffirmed Swierkiewicz. 550 U.S. at 570 (citing Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 508); see also Boykin v. Key Corp., 521 F.3d 202, 213 (2d Cir.2008) (noting that the Twombly Court “affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz”); Gilman v. Inner City Broadcasting Corp., No. 08 Civ. 8909(LAP), 2009 WL 3003244, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 2009) (“ Iqbal was not meant to displace Swierkiewicz’s teachings about pleading standards for employment discrimination claims because in Twombly, which heavily informed Iqbal, the Supreme Court explicitly affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz. ”).”).

Kregler v. City of New York, No. 08 Civ. 6893(VM), 2009 WL 2524628, at 7-9, *12 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 17, 2009) (“Fundamentally, the ‘plausibility’ standard that the Supreme Court articulated in Twombly and Iqbal reflect [sic] one judicial means to part the wheat from the chaff in assessing the sufficiency of pleadings. Yet, as the case at hand illustrates and the law reports amply record, the problem persists, a sign of an intrinsic tension built into the federal rules. Whether in their factual allegations as originally crafted, or upon being granted leave to replead deficient claims, seasoned plaintiffs’ counsel know to charge the pleadings with enough adjectives that reverberate of extreme malice, improper motives, and bad faith to raise factual issues sufficient to survive a dispositive motion, thus securing a hold on the defendant strong enough for the duration, however long and costly the ultimate resolution of the claim be. In practical terms, the philosophy of pleading that these rules embody, a one-rule-fits-all principle, defines the scope of the problem engendered by its unintended outcomes. . . . In consequence, the Court’s Rule 12(i) hearing represented an effort to employ an infrequently used procedure to bring about speedier and better-informed resolution of a motion to dismiss involving serious accusations of violations of constitutional rights leveled against high-ranking government officials. This endeavor accords with guidance by the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit instructing district courts to exercise their broad discretion to guard public officials from being ‘subjected to unnecessary and burdensome discovery or trial proceedings.’. . . As scheduled, the hearing was limited to two threshold issues raised in Defendants’ objections to the pleadings in the Amended Complaint: the absence of sufficient allegations of personal involvement by various individual defendants in making the decision to reject Kregler’s application, and lack of a causal connection between Kregler’s endorsement of Morgenthau and the rejection of his application for appointment as a City Marshal. These questions constitute fundamental aspects of a sufficient claim of First Amendment retaliation, and are thus decisive in any review of whether the pleadings, as amplified by the pertinent record of the preliminary hearing, satisfy the Twombly/Iqbal plausibility standard. To summarize its purpose and scope, Rule 12(i) authorizes the Court to conduct a preliminary hearing to consider and decide before trial a motion raising any defense listed in Rule 12(b)(1)- (7). See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(i). As appropriate, the Court may use that procedure to determine jurisdictional as well as other threshold issues. . . . Here, on repleading to address deficiencies in the original complaint, Kregler described the threshold issues either in conclusory terms or with generalized allegations which still require substantial inferential leaps to make his claims plausible, rather than with well-pleaded facts that, accepted as true, plausibly suggest Defendants' retaliatory misconduct as the likely explanation for their rejection of Kregler's application. The Rule 12(i) hearing, even limiting the Court's consideration solely to Kregler's testimony on direct and cross-examination, confirms the Court's finding in this regard. . . . In terms of time, it took approximately five months from the Court's preliminary decision to order the Rule 12(i) hearing to the disposition of the case by the instant ruling. Thus, the Court was able to resolve this matter in a far shorter time than would have been required if it had denied Defendants' original motion to dismiss by reason of the closeness of the call at the initial review and thereby permitting the litigation to proceed into lengthier discovery and probably more time-consuming summary judgment motions—a process which, given the type of case involved, in this District would ordinarily consume as much as two years of litigation to conclude with the Court's determination.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Garrett v. Wexford Health, No. 17-3480, 2019 WL 4265187, at *16-19 (3d Cir. Sept. 10, 2019) (“In assessing whether a pleading satisfies Rule 8, there is no bright-line rule to be applied. ‘Inevitably, the sufficiency of a complaint must be determined on a case-by-case basis.’ . . . The circumstances surrounding the particular pleading, including the nature of the action, the sort of relief being sought, the availability of information, and other practical considerations must guide the inquiry into whether the litigant’s statement of his claim qualifies as ‘short and plain.’ . . . We first consider Rule 8’s ‘short’ statement requirement. Certainly, there can be no single ‘proper length’ for stating a particular claim. The level of factual detail will vary with the complexity of the claim asserted. . . . But a district court acts within its discretion when it dismisses an excessively prolix and overlong complaint, particularly where a plaintiff declines an express invitation to better tailor her pleading. . . . Paying heed to the foregoing principles, the Seventh Circuit has held that a district court abuses its discretion when a pro se complaint is dismissed ‘merely because it contains repetitious and irrelevant matter,’ so long as that ‘disposable husk [surrounds] ... a core of proper pleading.’ . . . Similarly, the Second Circuit has held that dismissal of pro se complaints ‘is usually reserved for those cases in which the complaint is so confused, ambiguous, vague, or otherwise unintelligible that its true substance, if any, is well disguised.’ . . . It is apparent that the District Court abused its discretion in ordering dismissal here. The claims in Garrett’s pro se FAC are sufficiently ‘short’ and ‘plain,’ and the FAC adequately puts a number of the defendants on notice of Garrett’s claims and makes a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (when taken as true) to plausibly suggest that Garrett can satisfy the elements of his § 1983 claims. . . . In conclusion, there are claims in Garrett’s pro se FAC against the Corrections Defendants that satisfy the ‘short and plain statement’ requirement. . . . While the complaint is far from perfect, we cannot agree with the Magistrate Judge’s assessment, adopted by the District Court, that ‘Plaintiff’s factual and legal allegations are, to a substantial extent, incomprehensible’ and that the FAC contains ‘virtually no detail as to who did what and when.’. We are always mindful that the abuse of discretion standard of review is highly deferential. And we are not unsympathetic to the difficulties and frustrations the Magistrate Judge experienced in managing a case that involved various iterations of a complaint. Yet we simply cannot conclude that the District Court’s sweeping dismissal of all the claims in the FAC was a proper exercise of discretion. We will therefore vacate and remand the matter for further proceedings.”)

Hildebrand v. Allegheny County, No. 13–1321, 2014 WL 2898527, *11 (3d Cir. June 26, 2014) (“The District Court erred by applying Iqbal and Twombly to Hildebrand’s pleading of the conditions precedent to filing suit under the ADEA. Iqbal and Twombly interpreted Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), which governs the standard for pleading a claim for relief. The pleading of conditions precedent is governed by Rule 9(c), not Rule 8(a). Neither Iqbal nor Twombly purport to alter Rule 9. We see no indication that those cases sought to override the plain language of Rule 9(c), and we therefore conclude that the pleading of conditions precedent falls outside the strictures of Iqbal and Twombly.”)

Lawal v. McDonald, 546 F. App’x 107, 113, 114 (3d Cir. 2014) (“As the District Court observed, the repeated and collective use of the word ‘Defendants’ ‘fail[ed] to name which specific Defendant engaged in the specific conduct alleged.’. . . As a result, the Amended Complaint is ambiguous about each Defendant’s role in the operation and whether he committed the act himself or supervised other agents in doing so. In using the collective ‘Defendants,’ Plaintiffs alleged that each of the Defendants: (a) directed the PPA to send the letters to Plaintiffs advising them that they were entitled to a refund, to be picked up at the PPA facility; (b) attacked each driver, throwing him against a wall and handcuffing him; (c) was told by Plaintiffs that Plaintiffs were citizens; (d) interrogated each Plaintiff for more than one hour; (e) acknowledged to each Plaintiff that he ‘had been mistakenly detained,’ but (f) told them they were not permitted to leave; (g) held the Plaintiffs for several additional hours; and (h) prohibited them from speaking or standing. There is a serious question as to whether it is plausible that each of the three defendants committed all of the acts ascribed to them, particularly given the number of other individuals brought to the facility during the operation and the affidavits submitted with Defendants’ motion to dismiss. . . In light of these ambiguities, the Amended Complaint may fail to meet Iqbal’s directive that ‘a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official’s own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.’. Moreover, given the very narrow potential claim upon which relief may be granted, it is difficult for Defendants to determine which of them are alleged to have held or directed others to hold Plaintiffs after their U.S. citizenship was verified and they were no longer suspected of violating the immigration laws. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to proceed on a theory of supervisory liability, the pleading likely requires further factual assertions linking the direction or act of an individual defendant to the alleged unconstitutional conduct. . . Thus, to resolve the ambiguity regarding the precise actions each individual Defendant allegedly took, we will provide Plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a pleading that provides the factual enhancements that specify the acts each individual Defendant . . . allegedly took, explains whether each Defendant personally engaged in the acts or if the actions were taken at the specific Defendant’s direction, and includes facts concerning the reasonableness of Plaintiffs' detention. Of course, such a pleading must comply with Fed.R.Civ.P. 11. If Plaintiffs choose to file a Second Amended Complaint, the District Court will be free to entertain another motion to dismiss before permitting any discovery and determine whether Plaintiffs have alleged facts that demonstrate a specific Defendant plausibly engaged in an unreasonable seizure after they verified Plaintiffs' citizenship status, and, even if sufficiently alleged, whether the specific Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

James v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 700 F.3d 675, 680-682 (3d Cir. 2012) ("Mrs. James's assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law' to comply with Officer Marshall's request does not alter our conclusion. . . . By crediting these allegations, the District Court assumed that Mrs. James was 'compelled' to accompany her daughter to the hospital. This was error because whether she was in fact 'compelled' to do so is a legal conclusion. At the motion to dismiss stage, we accept as true all factual assertions, but we disregard threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, legal conclusions, and conclusory statements. . . . Although Mrs. James asks us to accept as fact her assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law,' in reality it is a legal conclusion artfully pleaded as a factual assertion, which is not entitled to a presumption of truth. . . . As far as relevant factual averments go, the Complaint pleads only that the officers 'insisted' that one parent accompany Nicole. As we have explained, insistence alone is insufficient to constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The only fact that might point toward a seizure is Officer Marshall's threat that Mr. and Mrs. James would be charged with assisted manslaughter if they prevented Nicole from going to the hospital and she actually committed suicide. But that threat was not made in connection with Mrs. James's decision to accompany Nicole to the hospital; rather, it was made in the context of the parents agreeing to send Nicole to the hospital in the first place, which does not implicate a restriction on Mrs. James's freedom of movement. . . . For the reasons stated, we hold that Mrs. James was not seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Having found no constitutional violation, we hold that Officer Marshall is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bistran v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352, 368-71 (3d Cir. 2012) ("After stripping away conclusory allegations not entitled to the presumption of truth, we conclude that Bistran states a plausible failure-to-protect claim against the ten Prison Management Defendants, Lts. Rodgers and Robinson, and Sr. Officer Bowns based on Bistran's placement in the recreation yard with Northington and his gang. First, Bistran alleges that putting him in a locked recreation area with Northington et al. posed a substantial risk of serious harm because (a) Northington and others knew of Bistran's cooperation with prison officials plus (b) Northington had a violent criminal past and had previously threatened to attack Bistran in the recreation yard because of that cooperation. Second, Bistran alleges that officials were deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk posed because they made no attempt to prevent his placement in the yard with Northington despite the fact that he (Bistran) repeatedly advised the officials responsible for the photocopying operation of the threats Northington and others made. Third, Bistran pleads causation: Northington and two other inmates violently attacked him on June 30, 2006 in the recreation yard because he cooperated with prison officials, not for some other reason. We consider the supporting factual allegations in further detail. . . .

[T]he alleged number of tortfeasors in this case does not undermine the plausibility of the underlying torts. In Young v. Quinlan, we allowed an inmate’s failure-to-protect claim to proceed past summary judgment when, among other things, he claimed to have ‘told [ten named prison officials] several times that he was concerned for his safety and needed to be placed in protective custody,’ and each of these ten officials had failed to respond reasonably to stop the assaults by other inmates. . . Here too the fact that Bistran claims to have specifically warned eight officials of the risks he faced does not transform his allegations into impermissible ‘group pleading.’ . . In sum, Bistran has stated a plausible claim that thirteen officials violated their constitutional duty to protect him from inmate violence by being deliberately indifferent to the risk posed by his placement in the recreation yard with Northington and others who knew of his prior complicity with prison authorities. If this claim fails to survive a motion to dismiss, little does.”)

Green v. New Jersey, No. 12–1517, 2012 WL 3641995, *1, *2 (3d Cir. Aug. 27, 2012) (not published) (“We agree with the District Court that, as drafted, the complaint fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted. To avoid dismissal, a complaint’s ‘[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.’ . . The complaint ‘must not be “so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by [Fed.R.Civ.P. 8]”’. . . Green’s complaint fails to satisfy these standards. . . Nevertheless, prior to dismissing a pro se complaint under § 1915(e), a District Court must give the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his pleading to cure the defect unless such an amendment would be inequitable or futile. . . The District Court neither informed Green that he could amend his complaint, nor did it determine that any amendment would be inequitable or futile. On the current record, we cannot exclude the possibility that Green, who is litigating his case pro se, might plead additional facts in an amended complaint that will state a claim for relief. Thus, while we express no view as to whether Green will ultimately plead any meritorious claims, we conclude that the District Court erred in dismissing the complaint without providing Green leave to amend. Accordingly, we will summarily vacate the District Court’s order dismissing the case with prejudice and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Burtch v. Milberg Factors, Inc., No. 10-2818, 2011 WL 5027511, at *5 (3d Cir. Oct. 24, 2011)(“To determine the sufficiency of a complaint under Twombly and Iqbal, we must take the following three steps: First, the court must ‘tak[e] note of the elements a plaintiff must plead to state a claim.’ Second, the court should identify allegations that, ‘because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.’ Finally, ‘where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.’”)

Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 72, 74-77 (3d Cir. 2011) (“[W]e assume for purposes of this appeal that a federal supervisory official may be liable in certain circumstances even though he or she did not directly participate in the underlying unconstitutional conduct. The District Court specifically concluded that a Fourth Amendment claim does not require a showing of a discriminatory purpose and that Plaintiffs could therefore proceed under a ‘knowledge and acquiescence’ theory. Plaintiffs acknowledge that the ‘terminology’ used to describe ‘supervisory liability’ is ‘often mixed.’ . . . They contend that a supervisor may be held liable in certain circumstances for a failure to train, supervise, and discipline subordinates. . . . We accordingly stated in a § 1983 action that ‘[p]ersonal involvement can be shown through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.’ Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). . . . We further indicated that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 if he or she implements a policy or practice that creates an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation on the part of the subordinate and the supervisor’s failure to change the policy or employ corrective practices is a cause of this unconstitutional conduct. . . . Having addressed the legal elements that a plaintiff must plead to state a legally cognizable claim, we turn to the remaining steps identified by Iqbal: (1) identifying those allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to any assumption of truth; and (2) then determining whether the well-pleaded factual allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . . We acknowledge that Plaintiffs filed an extensive and carefully drafted pleading, which certainly contained a number of troubling allegations especially with respect to alleged unconstitutional behavior on the part of lower-ranking ICE agents. Plaintiffs are also correct that, even after Iqbal, we must continue to accept all factual allegations as true, construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and then determine whether a reasonable inference may be drawn that the defendant is liable for the alleged misconduct. . . . [W]e ultimately conclude that, like Iqbal, Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible Bivens claim against the four Appellants. Initially, certain allegations in the Second Amended Complaint were conclusory in nature and merely provided, at best, a ‘framework’ for the otherwise appropriate factual allegations. . . . For instance, the broad allegations regarding the existence of a ‘culture of lawlessness’ are accorded little if any weight in our analysis. . . . We further note that the relevant counts in the pleading contained boilerplate allegations mimicking the purported legal standards for liability, which we do not assume to be true. We also must reject certain broad characterizations made by the District Court, which were not supported by either the actual factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint or reasonable inferences from such allegations. Most significantly, the District Court went too far by stating that Myers and Torres ‘worked on these issues everyday.’ . . . Turning to the non-conclusory factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint, we begin with the critical issue of notice. Plaintiffs did reference an impressive amount of documentation that allegedly provided notice to Appellants of their subordinates’ unconstitutional conduct. However, these alleged sources of notice were fatally flawed in one way or another. Broadly speaking, we must point out the typical ‘notice’ case seems to involve a prior incident or incidents of misconduct by a specific employee or group of employees, specific notice of such misconduct to their superiors, and then continued instances of misconduct by the same employee or employees. The typical case accordingly does not involve a ‘knowledge and acquiescence’ claim premised, for instance, on reports of subordinate misconduct in one state followed by misconduct by totally different subordinates in a completely different state. . . . Second, we observe that allegations specifically directed against Appellants themselves (unlike the allegations directed at the agents who actually carried out the raids) described conduct consistent with otherwise lawful behavior. . . . In other words, a federal official specifically charged with enforcing federal immigration law appears to be acting lawfully when he or she increases arrest goals, praises a particular enforcement operation as a success, or characterizes a home entry and search as an attempt to locate someone (i.e., a fugitive alien). In fact, the qualified immunity doctrine exists to encourage vigorous and unflinching enforcement of the law. . . . We also agree with Appellants' assertion that Plaintiffs themselves did not really identify in their pleading what exactly Appellants should have done differently, whether with respect to specific training programs or other matters, that would have prevented the unconstitutional conduct. . . . We also cannot overlook the fact that Appellants themselves occupied relatively high-ranking positions in the federal hierarchy. . . . [T]he context here involved, at the very least, two very high-ranking federal officials based in Washington D.C. who were charged with supervising the enforcement of federal immigration law throughout the country (as well as two other officials responsible for supervising such enforcement throughout an entire state). . . . [W]e wish to emphasize that our ruling here does not leave Plaintiffs without any legal remedy for the alleged violation of the United States Constitution. Chavez, Galindo, and W.C. are still free to pursue their official capacity claims for injunctive relief against any further intimidation or unlawful entry into their home. Also, we do not address Plaintiffs' individual capacity claims for damages against the lower-ranking ICE agents named in the Second Amended Complaint.”)

Santiago v. Warminster Tp., 629 F.3d 121, 128-34 & n.8, n.10 (3d Cir. 2010) (“While we conclude that the Third Amended Complaint can be read as alleging liability based on the Supervising Officers’ own acts, we will nevertheless affirm the District Court’s ruling because those allegations fail to meet the pleading requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal. . . . [A]ny claim that supervisors directed others to violate constitutional rights necessarily includes as an element an actual violation at the hands of subordinates. In addition, a plaintiff must allege a causal connection between the supervisor’s direction and that violation, or, in other words, proximate causation. . . . Therefore, to state her claim against Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly, Santiago needs to have pled facts plausibly demonstrating that they directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they ‘knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights.’. . . As to her claim against Lt. Springfield, Santiago must allege facts making it plausible that ‘he had knowledge of [Alpha Team’s use of excessive force during the raid]’ and ‘acquiesced in [Alpha Team’s] violations.’. . . Numerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after Iqbal. . . . Because we hold that Santiago’s pleadings fail even under our existing supervisory liability test, we need not decide whether Iqbal requires us to narrow the scope of that test. . . . Santiago alleges that the plan developed and authorized by Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly ‘specifically sought to have all occupants exit the Plaintiff’s home, one at a time, with hands raised under threat of fire, patted down for weapons, and then handcuffed until the home had been cleared and searched.’ Because this is nothing more than a recitation of what Santiago says the Alpha Team members did to her, it amounts to a conclusory assertion that what happened at the scene was ordered by the supervisors. While the allegations regarding Alpha Team’s conduct are factual and more than merely the recitation of the elements of a cause of action, the allegation of supervisory liability is, in essence, that ‘Murphy and Donnelly told Alpha team to do what they did' and is thus a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a [supervisory liability] claim,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct.. at 1951 (internal quotation marks omitted)—namely that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed others in the violation of Santiago's rights. Saying that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought' to have happen what allegedly happened does not alter the fundamentally conclusory character of the allegation. . . Our conclusion in this regard is dictated by the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. . . . In short, Santiago's allegations are 'naked assertion[s]' that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in the allegedly excessive manner that they did and that Lt. Springfield acquiesced in Alpha Team's acts. As mere restatements of the elements of her supervisory liability claims, they are not entitled to the assumption of truth. However, it is crucial to recognize that our determination that these particular allegations do not deserve an assumption of truth does not end the analysis. It may still be that Santiago's supervisory liability claims are plausible in light of the non-conclusory factual allegations in the complaint. We therefore turn to those allegations to determine whether the claims are plausible. . . . In summary, the allegations against Alpha Team are that the officers ordered everyone to exit the house one at a time; that Santiago exited first under threat of fire; that Santiago was patted down in a demeaning fashion, found to be unarmed, and subsequently handcuffed; that the remaining occupants of the home then exited, some of whom were handcuffed while others were not; that Santiago's daughter was coerced into consenting to a search of the home; and that Santiago was left restrained for thirty minutes while her home was searched, during which time she had a heart attack. The question then becomes whether those allegations make it plausible that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights,' . . . or that Lt. Springfield 'had knowledge [that Alpha Team was using excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.' . . . [T]here is no basis in the complaint to conclude that excessive force was used on anyone except Santiago. Even if someone else had been subjected to excessive force, it is clear that the occupants were not being treated uniformly. Thus, Santiago's allegations undercut the notion of a plan for all occupants to be threatened with fire and handcuffed. While it is possible that there was such a plan, and that Alpha Team simply chose not to follow it, 'possibility' is no longer the touchstone for pleading sufficiency after Twombly and Iqbal. Plausibility is what matters. Allegations that are 'merely consistent with a defendant's liability' or show the 'mere possibility of misconduct' are not enough. . . Here, given the disparate treatment of the occupants of the home, one plausible explanation is that the officers simply used their own discretion in determining how to treat each occupant. In contrast with that 'obvious alternative explanation' for the allegedly excessive use of force, the inference that the force was planned is not plausible. Where, as here, an operation results in the use of allegedly excessive force against only one of several people, that use of force does not, by itself, give rise to a plausible claim for supervisory liability against those who planned the operation. To hold otherwise would allow a plaintiff to pursue a supervisory liability claim anytime a planned operation resulted in excessive force, merely by describing the force used and appending the phrase 'and the Chief told them to do it.' Iqbal requires more. . . . We next ask whether the allegation that Lt. Springfield was placed in charge of the operation, coupled with what happened during the operation, makes it plausible that Lt. Springfield knew of and acquiesced in the use of excessive force against Santiago. Again, we conclude that it does not. The complaint implies but does not allege that Lt. Springfield was present during the operation. Assuming he was present, however, the complaint still does not aver that he knew of the allegedly excessive force, nor does it give rise to the reasonable inference that he was aware of the level of force used against one individual. . . . In sum, while Santiago’s complaint contains sufficient allegations to show that the Supervising Officers planned and supervised the operation and that, during the operation, Alpha Team used arguably excessive force, her allegations do nothing more than assert the element of liability that the Supervising Officers specifically called for or acquiesced in that use of force. . . . The Third Amended Complaint was filed after the close of discovery. Consequently, there is no reason to believe that Santiago’s conclusory allegations were simply the result of the relevant evidence being in the hands of the defendants. Under Iqbal, however, the result would be the same even had no discovery been completed. We recognize that plaintiffs may face challenges in drafting claims despite an information asymmetry between plaintiffs and defendants. Given that reality, reasonable minds may take issue with Iqbal and urge a different balance between ensuring, on the one hand, access to the courts so that victims are able to obtain recompense and, on the other, ensuring that municipalities and police officers are not unnecessarily subjected to the burdens of litigation. . . . The Supreme Court has struck the balance, however, and we abide by it.”)

West Penn Allegheny Health System, Inc. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 98 (3d Cir. 2010) (“The District Court opined that judges presiding over antitrust and other complex cases must act as ‘gatekeepers,’ and must subject pleadings in such cases to heightened scrutiny. The District Court’s gloss on Rule 8, however, is squarely at odds with Supreme Court precedent. Although Twombly acknowledged that discovery in antitrust cases ‘can be expensive,’ . . . it expressly rejected the notion that a ‘“heightened” pleading standard’ applies in antitrust cases. . . and Iqbal made clear that Rule 8’s pleading standard applies with the same level of rigor in ‘“all civil actions[.]”’ . . . It is, of course, true that judging the sufficiency of a pleading is a context-dependent exercise. . . . Some claims require more factual explication than others to state a plausible claim for relief. . . . For example, it generally takes fewer factual allegations to state a claim for simple battery than to state a claim for antitrust conspiracy. . . . But, contrary to the able District Court’s suggestion, this does not mean that Twombly’s plausibility standard functions more like a probability requirement in complex cases. We conclude that it is inappropriate to apply Twombly’s plausibility standard with extra bite in antitrust and other complex cases.”)

In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litigation, 618 F.3d 300, 319 n.17 (3d Cir. 2010) (“Although Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203 (3d Cir.2009), stated that Twombly and Iqbal had ‘repudiated’ the Supreme Court’s earlier decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002), see Fowler, 578 F.3d at 211, we are not so sure. Clearly, Twombly and Iqbal inform our understanding of Swierkiewicz, but the Supreme Court cited Swierkiewicz approvingly in Twombly, see 550 U.S. at 555-56, 127 S.Ct. 1955, and expressly denied the plaintiffs’ charge that Swierkiewicz ‘runs counter’ to Twombly’s plausibility standard, id. at 569-70, 127 S.Ct. 1955. As the Second Circuit has observed, Twombly ‘emphasized that its holding was consistent with [the Court’s] ruling in Swierkiewicz that “a heightened pleading requirement,” requiring the pleading of “specific facts beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief,” was “impermissibl[e].” Arista Records, 604 F.3d at 120 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (alterations in Arista Records)). In any event, Fowler’s reference to Swierkiewicz appears to be dicta, as Fowler found the complaint before it to be adequate. 578 F.3d at 212; see also id. at 211 (“The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here.”)).

Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203, 209, 210 (3d Cir. 2009) (“Standards of pleading have been in the forefront of jurisprudence in recent years. Beginning with the Supreme Court’s opinion in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), continuing with our opinion in Phillips, supra., and culminating recently with the Supreme Court’s decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1955, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), pleading standards have seemingly shifted from simple notice pleading to a more heightened form of pleading, requiring a plaintiff to plead more than the possibility of relief to survive a motion to dismiss. . . . The Supreme Court’s opinion in Iqbal extends the reach of Twombly, instructing that all civil complaints must contain ‘more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.’ . . . Therefore, after Iqbal, when presented with a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, district courts should conduct a two-part analysis. First, the factual and legal elements of a claim should be separated. The District Court must accept all of the complaint’s well-pleaded facts as true, but may disregard any legal conclusions. . . . Second, a District Court must then determine whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a ‘plausible claim for relief.’ . . . Inasmuch as this is an employment discrimination case, we asked the parties to comment on the continued viability of the Supreme Court’s decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002). In Swierkiewicz, the Supreme Court held that a complaint alleging unlawful employment discrimination did not have to satisfy a heightened pleading requirement. The complaint in that case was said to be sufficient because it ‘detailed the events leading to [the plaintiff’s] termination, provided relevant dates, and included the ages and nationalities of at least some of the relevant persons involved with his termination.’ . . . The Supreme Court in Swierkiewicz expressly adhered to Conley’s then-prevailing ‘no set of facts’ standard and held that the complaint did not have to satisfy a heightened standard of pleading. . . . Swierkiewicz and Iqbal both dealt with the question of what sort of factual allegations of discrimination suffice for a civil lawsuit to survive a motion to dismiss, but Swierkiewicz is based, in part, on Conley, which the Supreme Court cited for the proposition that Rule 8 ‘relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.’ . . . We have to conclude, therefore, that because Conley has been specifically repudiated by both Twombly and Iqbal, so too has Swierkiewicz, at least insofar as it concerns pleading requirements and relies on Conley. . . . The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here. We had already extended our holding in Phillips, to the employment discrimination context. In Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School, Inc., 522 F.3d 315 (3d Cir.2008), a terminated charter-school teacher brought an action claiming that she was fired for retaliation and her religious beliefs. The teacher pleaded that she was fired because of her ‘AChristian religious beliefs,’ her refusal to engage in the Alibations ceremony,” and her Acomplaints related to the ceremony.”. . . We held that the ‘plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.”).

Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School Inc., 522 F.3d 315, 322 (3rd Cir. 2008) (“Today, we extend our holding in Phillips to the employment discrimination context. The plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.”).

Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 230-34 (3rd Cir. 2008) (“What makes Twombly’s impact on the Rule 12(b)(6) standard initially so confusing is that it introduces a new ‘plausibility’ paradigm for evaluating the sufficiency of complaints. At the same time, however, the Supreme Court never said that it intended a drastic change in the law, and indeed strove to convey the opposite impression; even in rejecting Conley’s ‘no set of facts’ language, the Court does not appear to have believed that it was really changing the Rule 8 or Rule 12(b)(6) framework. . . . In determining how Twombly has changed this standard, we start with what Twombly expressly leaves intact. The Supreme Court reaffirmed that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 ‘ Requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,’ in order to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests,” and that this standard does not require ‘detailed factual allegations.’ . . . [T]he Twombly decision focuses our attention on the ‘context’ of the required short, plain statement. Context matters in notice pleading. Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case—some complaints will require at least some factual allegations to make out a ‘showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.’ Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964. Indeed, taking Twombly and the Court’s contemporaneous opinion in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007), together, we understand the Court to instruct that a situation may arise where, at some point, the factual detail in a complaint is so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by Rule 8. . . . The second important concept we take from the Twombly opinion is the rejection of Conley’s ‘no set of facts’ language. In rejecting the Conley language, the Supreme Court was careful to base its analysis in pre-existing principles. . . .The Court emphasized throughout its opinion that it was neither demanding a heightened pleading of specifics nor imposing a probability requirement. . . . Indeed, the Court cited Twombly just days later as authority for traditional Rule 8 and 12(b)(6) principles. See Erickson, 127 S.Ct. at 2200. Thus, under our reading, the notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a)(2) remains intact, and courts may generally state and apply the Rule 12(b)(6) standard, attentive to context and an showing that ‘the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.’ Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964. . . . The more difficult question raised by Twombly is whether the Supreme Court imposed a new ‘plausibility’ requirement at the pleading stage that materially alters the notice pleading regime. . . . The answer to this question is difficult to divine. Numerous references to ‘plausibility’ in Twombly seem to counsel reliance on the concept as a standard for notice pleading. . . . Yet, the Twombly decision repeatedly indicated that the Court was not adopting or applying a ‘heightened pleading standard.’ . . . The issues raised by Twombly are not easily resolved, and likely will be a source of controversy for years to come. Therefore, we decline at this point to read Twombly so narrowly as to limit its holding on plausibility to the antitrust context. Reading Twombly to impose a ‘plausibility’ requirement outside the § 1 context, however, leaves us with the question of what it might mean. ‘Plausibility’ is related to the requirement of a Rule 8 ‘showing.’ In its general discussion, the Supreme Court explained that the concept of a ‘showing’ requires only notice of a claim and its grounds, and distinguished such a showing from ‘a pleader’s Abare averment that he wants relief and is entitled to it.’” Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1965 n. 3. . . . The Supreme Court’s Twombly formulation of the pleading standard can be summed up thus: ‘stating . . . a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest’ the required element. Id. This ‘does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage,’ but instead ‘simply calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of’ the necessary element. . . . That is to say, there must be some showing sufficient to justify moving the case beyond the pleadings to the next stage of litigation. The complaint at issue in this case clearly satisfies this pleading standard, making a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest the required elements of Phillips’ claims.”).

Mitchell v. Township of Willingboro Municipality Government, 913 F.Supp.2d 62, 67, 68, 72 (D.N.J. 2012) (“The Third Circuit has cautioned against dismissing a case based on qualified immunity on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion because ‘it is generally unwise to venture into a qualified immunity analysis at the pleading stage as it is necessary to develop the factual record in the vast majority of cases.’ Newland v. Reehorst, 328 F. App’x 788, 791 n. 3 (3d Cir.2009). While the issue of whether a right is clearly established and whether a reasonable officer could have believed his actions were lawful are questions of law for the court to decide, the Court does not consider facts outside the pleadings in assessing these issues. The Third Circuit has clearly held that ‘qualified immunity will be upheld on a 12(b)(6) motion only when the immunity is established on the face of the complaint.’ Thomas v. Independence Township, 463 F.3d 285, 291 (3d Cir.2006). In this case, the court confirms its previous holding that the Plaintiff has sufficiently pled a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights by Defendant Perez. . . . Plaintiff’s complaint alleges that Officer Perez received a 9–1–1 dispatch call to pull over a blue Honda Accord with no license plates that had been speeding down a nearby road. Plaintiff alleges his car was a green Honda Accord with a Pennsylvania license plate and that he was not committing any traffic violations at the time he was pulled over by Officer Perez. Plaintiff further argues his Honda Accord had a rear Pennsylvania license plate and that Pennsylvania does not require a license plate on the front of the car. Plaintiff maintains Defendant Perez used the 9–1–1 dispatch call as a pretext to make the stop and Plaintiff avers the only reason he was pulled over was because he is an African American male. This sufficiently alleges a deprivation of a constitutional right and plausibly states a claim under the Fourth Amendment. With regard to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it is well established that an officer must have an articulable and reasonable suspicion that the driver has committed a motor vehicle offense in order to conduct an investigatory stop. . . . Defendant Perez does not argue that Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment rights in this case were not clearly established. Consequently, the Plaintiff’s complaint satisfies the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, the court concludes it is inappropriate to dismiss this case on qualified immunity grounds at the pleading stage. Here, the immunity is not established on the face of the complaint. The Plaintiff adequately alleges a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights and these rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Therefore, since the law was clear at the time of the incident that reasonable suspicion was required to conduct an investigatory stop, Defendant Perez can be granted qualified immunity only if his conduct in stopping Plaintiff's car was a violation a reasonable officer could have committed. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff as the non-moving party, the court concludes a reasonable officer would not have conducted an investigatory stop of the Plaintiff in this situation and a jury could conclude reasonable suspicion did not exist.”)

Zenquis v. City of Philadelphia, 861 F.Supp.2d 522, 529 (E.D. Pa. 2012) (“To support the inference of an agreement among the officer defendants and the private individuals who assaulted him, Zenquis relies principally on the allegation that the private individuals ‘had spoken to at least one or more of the individual [police] defendants, and were told ... that they should detain [Zenquis] and that they would be permitted to use force against [Zenquis].’. . This is consistent with and buttressed by the allegations, earlier in the amended complaint, that at least some of the officer defendants were canvassing the Kensington neighborhood for several hours prior to the assault, advising private citizens (including both the perpetrators of the alleged assault and others) to use force to detain Zenquis. . . Finally, the amended complaint alleges that ‘civilians who spoke with the individual defendants ... received the clear message from the officers that they would be free to assault the plaintiff with impunity.’. . Taken together, these allegations are adequate to state a claim for conspiracy. According to the complaint, the private individuals who assaulted Zenquis were urged by the police to do so, were told they could use force to do so, and understood this to mean that they could assault Zenquis “with impunity.” That is a sufficient basis, at the pleading stage, to ground an inference that there was an agreement between at least some of the officer defendants and the private actors to violate Zenquis’s Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure. In context, it is not implausible that the police would commit themselves to such an agreement during the frenetic search for a suspect wanted for a sensational crime; the plausibility of the conspiracy allegation is further bolstered by the allegation that the police licensed similar behavior in capturing the actual rapist the following day. At the very least, Zenquis has put the defendants on notice of the nature of the conspiracy claim with sufficiently detailed factual allegations to justify discovery.”)

Morris v. Philadelphia Housing Authority, No. 10-5431, 2011 WL 1661506, at 3-5 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 28, 2011) (“District Court Judges have experienced difficulty in interpreting the Supreme Court’s intent in Twombly and Iqbal. Particularly in the civil rights context, in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, the Supreme Court specifically held that notice pleading under Rule 8 was proper. . . The difficulty in following Leatherman is that its holding appears to be significantly undermined by Iqbal, yet Leatherman is not cited in either the majority or dissenting opinions of Iqbal. Further, before Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Circuit expressly held that the complaint in a civil rights case is subject to the liberal notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a). . . The Third Circuit has not yet issued a precedential opinion squaring its holding in Evancho with those of Twombly and Iqbal. but it did discuss the implications of Twombly in Phillips, a § 1983 case. . . The undersigned, formerly a member of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, knows that many practitioners and judges share in the confusion resulting from Iqbal's seemingly strong requirement of factual pleadings in the absence of any specific overruling of prior cases allowing traditional notice pleading. The Court concludes that notice pleading is still the rule, because Rule 8 is still in effect, but that the concept of notice pleading has changed and must be accompanied by either factual or legal assertions satisfying the elements of the claims made. . . In other words, 'notice pleading' now requires 'notice' of at least those facts necessary to raise an inference that Plaintiff has a claim. . . The plausibility standard calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the necessary elements of the claims. . . Plaintiff's Complaint in its current form does not raise this reasonable expectation.”)

RHJ Medical Center, Inc. v. City of DuBois, 754 F.Supp.2d 723, 731 -733 (W.D. Pa. 2010) (“While the Third Circuit has not definitively resolved this issue, a number of district courts within the Third Circuit, . . . as well as other Courts of Appeals . . . have applied the Iqbal standard to motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). This Court is inclined to agree, though this decision will have several consequences that may not have been discussed elsewhere. For decades, granting a motion for judgment on the pleadings was only appropriate where the movant ‘clearly establishes that no material issue of fact remains to be resolved and that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.’. . . Generally, federal courts were reluctant to grant a Rule 12(c) Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings, because it provides for summary disposition of a party’s claim on the merits before discovery. . . These prior standards mirrored the previous notice pleading standard articulated in Conley . . . but Iqbal changed the game. . . Iqbal effected not only motions to dismiss, but has also impacted motions for judgments on the pleading, and imported the higher burden of ‘plausibility.’ Applying the Iqbal standard will likely make it tougher for complaints to survive motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). Yet, to do otherwise would frustrate Iqbal. In many cases, motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) and 12(b)(6) are complimentary and largely interchangeable—the key difference being that the right to file motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) is waived if an answer is filed. A plaintiff should not be able to benefit from a weaker standard and higher probability of success under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) than he would under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(6). The burden of proof on the Plaintiff should increase at each stage of litigation. . . Iqbal has also impacted the manner in which courts must assess subject matter jurisdiction, even when considering a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Historically, when considering whether to dismiss a case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), the Court generally ‘must accept the allegations in the complaint as true and determine whether they are sufficient to invoke its jurisdiction.’. . . Now, the Plaintiff ‘has the burden of establishing that subject matter jurisdiction exists within the parameters of the “plausibility” standard established by Twombly and Iqbal when confronted with Defendant’s 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss.”).

Major Tours, Inc. v. Colorel, 720 F.Supp.2d 587, 605, 606 (D.N.J. 2010) (“The Complaint contains abundant allegations of racially-motivated discrimination, which are summarized at the beginning at the first paragraph: ‘Because of Plaintiffs’ race, Defendants and their associates have targeted their buses for improper, illegal, and unreasonably burdensome stops, inspections, and seizures.’ (Compl.¶ 1) Plaintiffs allege, among other things, that Defendants and their agents gathered near certain casinos known to have primarily African American clientele in order to stop buses in a racially discriminatory manner (Id. ¶ 26); that Defendants exercised their discretion with racially discriminatory intentions, targeting Plaintiffs’ buses for towing because of Plaintiffs’ race (Id. ¶ 30); and that Defendants often require Plaintiffs—on account of their race—to have their buses towed away (Id. ¶ 34). Each of these is a specific allegation of a discriminatory act taken for racially discriminatory reasons, and supported by further allegations of white owned buses being subjected to differential treatment. Defendants maintain that these statements are too conclusory, but they are not. . . . Unlike the defendants in Iqbal, Defendants in this case have offered no nondiscriminatory reason for any of the racially discriminatory behavior specifically alleged in the Complaint, nor is there any obvious nondiscriminatory explanation for the disparate treatment alleged by Plaintiffs. There is no obvious and lawful purpose that explains, for example, why inspectors would target casinos frequented by African Americans for bus safety inspections, or why they would permit white operated buses to repair violations on-site while requiring Plaintiffs to be towed. Rule 8 does not require plaintiffs who are pleading a pattern of racially discriminatory conduct to include all of the evidence that suggests that the conduct was a result of racially discriminatory intentions rather than the byproduct of some legitimate purpose. . . . Instead, they must simply allege enough facts to nudge the claim into the realm of the plausible. Therefore, the factual allegations in the current complaint regarding racially discriminatory purpose are sufficiently concrete with respect to the investigator defendants.”)

Southersby Development Corp. v. Borough of Jefferson Hills, No. 09-208, 2010 WL 1576465, at *4 (W.D. Pa. Apr. 20, 2010) (“The Defendants initially challenged the sufficiency of the substantive due process claim made in Southersby’s original Complaint. Before those first Motions to Dismiss could be considered, Southersby filed the Amended Complaint (Doc. 21), adding four paragraphs clearly intended to rectify any deficiencies in pleading the ‘shocks the conscience’ requirement: 22. Defendants’ unequal and unlawful actions ... were motivated by bias against the plaintiff as a non-resident developer and intended to financially injure plaintiff in retaliation for exercising its constitutionally-protected right to contest Jefferson Hill’s [sic] attempts to charge and collect certain legal escrow fees and storm and sanitary sewer tap fees relative to the development of Patriot Pointe. 23. Upon information and belief, McVicker and other agents of Jefferson Hills have personal or business relationships with land developers or individuals who reside in the Borough and who stand to gain a profit or benefit from the failure of the Patriot Pointe development or from the plaintiff [halting] further land development. 24. The defendants engaged in corruption and self-dealing such that their unlawful actions ... were motivated by an intent to harm the plaintiff and interfere with the development of Patriot for the purpose of benefitting, financially or otherwise, the defendants or resident land developers or individuals associated with the defendants, by deterring the plaintiff from seeking to develop other land within the Borough and causing the failure or foreclosure of Patriot Pointe. 38. Defendants' arbitrary and irrational actions ... involve corruption, self-dealing, gross abuse of official power, and interference with constitutionally protected activities of the plaintiff, and are so egregious that it shocks the conscience. The Defendants contend that these modifications, even considered against the background of the remaining allegations, constitute unsubstantiated conclusions that do not meet the Twombly/Iqbal/Fowler plausibility standard. Thus, they say, Southersby has failed to allege conduct sufficiently egregious to shock the conscience, and its substantive due process claim fails. The Court agrees. Surviving a motion to dismiss requires more than raising a possibility of unlawful action. 'Where a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.' . . . Though Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 'makes a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, ... it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.' . . . Measured against this standard, Southersby's allegations fall short. It is as though Southersby had stated that it is a cold day in Pittsburgh, without providing a basis for its conclusion. How do we know it is cold? Are passersby wearing heavy coats and turning up their collars? Is there snow in the air or frost on the windows? Similarly, here, Southersby states, without supporting facts, that the Defendants engaged in 'corruption' and 'self dealing,' two of the factors identified in Eichenlaub that may amount to 'conscience shocking' behavior. The allegations in the Amended Complaint raise, at most, the possibility of corruption and self dealing. The same is true with respect to facts regarding the Defendants' interference with other of Southersby's constitutional rights. . . . As a result, it is impossible for the Court to find plausible the assertion of conscience shocking behavior. . . . Here, just as in Eichenlaub, the facts alleged support a claim based on improper motive, but are insufficient to state a substantive due process claim.'").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Riddick v. Barber, 109 F.4th 639, 646-47 (4th Cir. 2024) ("In granting the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court recognized Youngberg as the governing precedent and correctly described its professional judgment rule. . . . Where the district court went wrong, in our view, was in holding that Riddick could not state a claim under Youngberg unless he first identified, at the pleading stage, the 'accepted professional standard' from which his conditions substantially departed. . . . We agree with Riddick, joined by the United States as amicus curiae on appeal, that a plaintiff need not articulate a professional standard of care at this early stage of litigation. Instead, a plaintiff may survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss by pleading facts regarding his treatment from which it may be reasonably inferred that such treatment fell substantially outside the professional standard of care and the bounds of professional judgment. By dismissing Riddick's complaint for failing to 'identify the accepted professional standard' for restraints and seclusion in the civil-commitment context, . . . the district court imposed a requirement supported by neither ordinary pleading standards nor Youngberg itself. A motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) tests only the sufficiency of a complaint; it does not 'resolve contests surrounding the facts, the merits of a claim, or the applicability of defenses.' . . . At this preliminary stage, Riddick need only plead ‘enough facts to state a claim [to] relief that is plausible on its face.’. . . And that standard is met if a complaint ‘pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’. . . The district court misapplied this plausibility standard by failing to recognize that even if a complaint does not set forth the particulars of the relevant standard of care, allegations regarding a plaintiff’s own treatment may still give rise to a reasonable inference that no professional judgment was exercised. . . . In their brief, the defendants suggested that they now agree on this point, and at oral argument they confirmed their position that a Youngberg plaintiff need not plead the content of a specific professional standard to survive a motion to dismiss. So instead of asking us to adopt the district court’s rationale, the defendants ask us to affirm on a different ground, arguing that Riddick’s complaint does not set out facts from which a Youngberg violation could be inferred. We disagree. Reading Riddick’s pro se complaint generously and applying our ‘judicial experience and common sense,’. . . we may reasonably infer that there was a substantial departure from professional judgment in connection with Riddick’s conditions of confinement.”)

Clatterbuck v. City of Charlottesville, 708 F.3d 549, 560 (4th Cir. 2013) (“It is not implausible that the City singled out requests for immediate donations in an attempt to target the particular nuisance of beggars’ speech but allow other types of solicitation to continue. We find Appellants’ allegation a reasonable one, and must accept it as true at this stage. . . . Thus, we find that Appellants have nudged their claim that the City enacted a content-based regulation, which is not the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest, across the line from conceivable to plausible.”)

De’lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520, 524-26 (4th Cir. 2013) (“De’lonta contends she has stated a valid constitutional claim because the Appellees’ ‘denial of consideration for sex reassignment surgery, when viewed against the backdrop of her medical history and circumstances, constitutes a deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment.’. . . Appellees counter that De’lonta’s complaint fails to satisfy Twombly’s plausibility requirement. While conceding that De’lonta’s need for protection from self-mutilation is a serious medical need, Appellees assert that because De’lonta has never been prescribed sex reassignment surgery, she cannot allege that sex reassignment surgery is a serious medical need for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Applying this two-prong Eighth Amendment standard, we first resolve that De’lonta has alleged an objectively serious medical need for protection against continued self-mutilation. . . . Next, we conclude that De’lonta’s complaint sufficiently alleges Appellees’ deliberate indifference to her serious medical need, and consequently, that the district court’s dismissal was in error. . . . De’lonta alleges that, despite her repeated complaints to Appellees alerting them to the persistence of her symptoms and the inefficacy of her existing treatment, she has never been evaluated concerning her suitability for surgery. Instead, despite their knowledge that De’lonta’s therapy sessions with Psychologist Lang actually provoked her ‘overwhelming’ urges to self-castrate, VDOC’s medical staff’s only response to De’lonta’s requests for surgery was a ‘request that you continue to work with Ms. Lang in individual therapy at this time.’ These factual allegations, taken as true, state a plausible claim that Appellees ‘actually kn[e]w of and disregard[ed]’ De’lonta’s serious medical need in contravention of the Eighth Amendment. . . .We wish to be clear about our holding. We hold only that De’lonta’s Eighth Amendment claim is sufficiently plausible to survive screening pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915A. We do not decide today the merits of De’lonta’s claim. Nor, for that matter, do we mean to suggest what remedy De’lonta would be entitled to should she prevail. In our view, the answers to those questions have no bearing on whether De’lonta has stated a claim that Appellees have been deliberately indifferent to her serious medical need by refusing to evaluate her for surgery, consistent with the Standards of Care.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 385, 386 (4th Cir. 2013) (“The district court opined that Mr. Tobey’s complaint ‘is devoid of any facts suggesting that [Appellants]—neither of whom are law enforcement officers with the power of arrest—made any such assertion or otherwise indicated to the RIC police that Plaintiff should be arrested.’ . . . The district court further noted that ‘Plaintiff’s counsel conceded that the Complaint “doesn’t say directly that [Plaintiff’s arrest] was at the instruction of the TSA.”’ . . . Fortunately for Mr. Tobey, he was not required to state these precise magical words in order to plausibly plead that Appellants caused his arrest. The Supreme Court reiterated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly that a ‘formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.’ . . . Allegations have facial plausibility ‘when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . . As the Supreme Court explained, Section 1983 (and by association Bivens) anticipates that a government official will be ‘responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.’ . . . It is an undoubtedly natural consequence of reporting a person to the police that the person will be arrested; especially in the scenario we have here, where TSA and RIC police act in close concert. So long as Mr. Tobey’s complaint rendered it plausible that Appellants helped effectuate his arrest, the district court should have factored the arrest into its decision as to whether Mr. Tobey alleged plausible Bivens claims against Appellants. When looking at Mr. Tobey’s complaint and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, it is logical to assume that Appellants had a hand in his arrest. Mr. Tobey announced to Appellants his desire to peacefully protest TSA screening measures, and at that point, Appellants ‘radioed for assistance.’ Immediately thereafter, RIC police ‘seized and handcuffed’ Mr. Tobey from behind without further inquiry. It is reasonable to infer that whatever Appellants told RIC police caused Mr. Tobey’s arrest. This inference is bolstered by the fact that Appellants silently stood by and watched RIC police arrest Mr. Tobey. The fact that Appellants do not have the power of arrest does not hurt Mr. Tobey, but helps him, as one can infer that Appellants radioed RIC police to arrest Mr. Tobey as they could not do it themselves. It may bear out after further discovery that Appellants radioed for assistance for innocuous reasons. It may also bear out that Appellants indicated to RIC police that they should arrest Mr. Tobey. Mr. Tobey’s complaint raises a plausible inference that Appellants caused his arrest, and thus it was improper for the district court to find otherwise at the 12(b)(6) phase of litigation. The district court should have considered the entire course of events up to arrest when deciding whether to dismiss Mr. Tobey’s Bivens actions against Appellants.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 402, 403 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) (“Tobey’s suit fails for another, independent reason, and in rejecting this reason, the majority manages to flout a second body of Supreme Court precedent. In a recent line of decisions, the Court has held that a plaintiff must allege enough factual content in his complaint to render his legal claim for relief ‘plausible on its face’ in order to survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). . . Tobey’s complaint falls well short of this requirement, for it conclusorily asserts that defendants engaged in viewpoint discrimination without pleading so much as a single factual allegation that supports this conclusion. In short, by announcing a near-categorical rule that every complaint survives a motion to dismiss, the majority proceeds as if Twombly and Iqbal were purely advisory. The rules of pleading assume particular importance in the context of a damages action against a public official, especially one alleging that the official acted with an impermissible motive. The doctrine of qualified immunity and the rules of pleading are therefore mutually reinforcing: the former ensures that officials cannot be subjected to damages suits for making close judgment calls where the governing law was unclear, while the latter ensure that this defense cannot be defeated by a bare allegation of impermissible motive. . . . In light of these principles, it becomes clear that Tobey’s complaint fails to allege a ‘plausible’ claim of viewpoint discrimination against defendants. . . . Tobey’s allegation of viewpoint discrimination is barely distinguishable from the allegation of religious and racial discrimination that the Supreme Court rejected as conclusory in Iqbal. . . . Stripped of the conclusory allegation of viewpoint discrimination, Tobey’s First Amendment claim ‘stops well short of the line between possible and plausible.’”)

Brown v. North Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 612 F.3d 720, 722-24 (4th Cir. 2010) (“Brown’s complaint alleges the following facts. On May 9, 2008, an ACI staff member instructed him to enter the ‘Housing Block’ to retrieve a number of cleaning supplies. The staff member gave the instruction despite having knowledge that another inmate in the Housing Block harbored a grudge against Brown. While gathering the cleaning supplies, Brown was assaulted and brutally beaten by that inmate. As a result of that assault, a steel plate was inserted into Brown’s jaw and he received ‘ongoing’ medical care for ‘permanent’ injuries. Brown’s complaint further alleges that Officer Simms was in ‘the Block’ when the assault occurred, that Officer Teague observed the assault, and that the ‘staff officers in question were [n]egligent and placed [Brown] in a dangerous and vulnerable position.’ In an administrative grievance form attached to his complaint, Brown specified that Officer Winkler was the staff member who was aware of the other inmate’s grudge against Brown but nonetheless sent him to pick up cleaning supplies. The administrative grievance form also alleges that Officer Teague admitted to Brown that he witnessed the assault but chose not to intervene. . . . The state contends that no reasonable person could infer from the complaint that Officer Simms knew of the assault in time to intervene, yet deliberately and indifferently failed to do so. We disagree with that reading of the record. Brown’s complaint alleges that Officer Simms was in ‘the Block’ when the assault occurred. A reasonable person could infer from that statement that Officer Simms was aware of the attack, and that his failure to intervene represented deliberate indifference to a serious risk of harm. Similarly, Brown’s complaint states that ‘staff members’ were aware of the other inmate’s grudge, that the staff members knew there were prior problems between that inmate and Brown, and that they placed Brown ‘in a [d]angerous and vulnerable position.’ Because there were only three ACI correction officers designated in the complaint, it is reasonable to assume that Brown was naming Officer Simms when he described the staff members who were deliberately indifferent to the serious harm posed by his fellow inmate. Accordingly, the district court should not have dismissed Brown’s claim against Officer Simms.”)

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192 n.1 (4th Cir. 2009) (“The standard that the plaintiffs quoted from Swierkiewicz . . . was explicitly overruled in Twombly.”)

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192-94 (4th Cir. 2009) (“[T]he ‘notice pleading’ characterization may itself be too simplistic, failing to recognize the many other provisions imposing requirements that permit courts to evaluate a complaint for sufficiency early in the process. Rule 8 itself requires a showing of entitlement to relief. Rule 9 requires that allegations of fraud, mistake, time, place, and special damages be specific. Rule 11 requires that the pleading be signed and provides that the signature ‘certifies’ (1) that the claims in the complaint are not asserted for collateral purposes; (2) that the claims asserted are ‘warranted’; and (3) that the factual contentions ‘have evidentiary support.’ And Rule 12(b)(6) authorizes a court to dismiss any complaint that does not state a claim ‘upon which relief can be granted.’ The aggregation of these specific requirements reveals the countervailing policy that plaintiffs may proceed into the litigation process only when their complaints are justified by both law and fact. In recent years, with the recognized problems created by ‘strike suits,’ . . . and the high costs of frivolous litigation, the Supreme Court has brought to the forefront the Federal Rules’ requirements that permit courts to evaluate complaints early in the process. [discussing Twombly and Iqbal] With these principles in hand, we now turn to the complaint in this case to determine whether, on its face, it states a plausible claim for relief. . . . Count I of the complaint, where the plaintiffs most fully articulate a claim, alleges that members of the Baltimore City Police Department, under the direction of Mayor O’Malley and City Solicitor Tyler, ‘broke into and entered’ the Police Commissioner’s offices, seized personal property, and ‘detained, held in custody and seized’ the Police Commissioner and his deputies while ordering them to ‘surrender their weapons, badges, identification cards’ and similar property—all without the benefit of criminal charges or a warrant. The complaint concludes that this conduct violated the plaintiffs’ Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. Considered in their context, these allegations describe the conduct of Mayor O’Malley taken in furtherance of his decision to terminate the plaintiffs’ employment, directing members of the Baltimore City Police Department to seize police department property and escort the plaintiffs from the police building. . . . Taking the facts in the complaint as true, we agree with the district court that Count I nonetheless fails to set forth a plausible claim for relief. While the Commissioner and his deputies conclusorily alleged that the searches and seizures violated their constitutional rights because no charges had been filed against them, nor had any warrant issued, their complaint did not allege that the defendants were engaged in a law-enforcement effort. Indeed, the facts show to the contrary, that the defendants’ actions against the plaintiffs were employment actions based on the Mayor’s perceived right to fire the Police Commissioner without cause, as stated in the Memorandum of Understanding between Commissioner Clark and Baltimore City.).

McLean v. U.S., 566 F.3d 391, 399, 400 (4th Cir. 2009) (“Although the Supreme Court has subsequently made clear that the factual allegations in a complaint must make entitlement to relief plausible and not merely possible, see Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 554-63 (2007), ‘[w]hat Rule 12(b)(6) does not countenance are dismissals based on a judge’s disbelief of a complaint’s factual allegations,’ Neitzke, 490 U.S. at 327; see also Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. ‘District court judges looking to dismiss claims on such grounds must look elsewhere for legal support.’ Neitzke, 490 U.S. at 327. ‘[A] well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of the facts alleged is improbable and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.’ Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. . . Neitzke makes clear that a dismissal for frivolousness is of a qualitatively different character than a dismissal for failure to state a claim. As a result, our holding today should not be read to indicate that a dismissal for frivolousness that is rendered without prejudice should avoid a strike designation.”).

Ray v. Amelia County Sheriff’s Office, 302 F. App’x 209, 2008 WL 5155257, at *1 (4th Cir. Dec. 9, 2008) (“The district court erred in dismissing Ray’s ADEA claim based upon its finding that her own complaint produced a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the defendants’ termination of her employment that rebutted her prima facie case, while failing to demonstrate that the reasons stated in her own complaint were a pretext for discrimination. Ray was not required to plead specific facts establishing a prima facie case of discrimination in her complaint, let alone to plead facts showing that the non-discriminatory reason for termination suggested by her own complaint was pretextual. Ray was required only to state her claim so as to give the defendants fair notice of its nature and the grounds upon which it rests, with enough factual allegations to state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Ray alleges in her complaint that she is a member of a protected class (she is forty-five years old), she suffered an adverse employment action (her employment was terminated), and she was replaced by a substantially younger employee who is less qualified for the position than Ray. Ray states several possible reasons for the termination of her employment that are related to her age: Sheriff Jimmy E. Weaver’s desire to have younger-looking employees at the front of the Amelia County Sheriff’s Office; Weaver’s desire to hire a replacement who was less familiar with official policies and procedures; and a problem with Ray’s desire to utilize her accrued annual leave benefits. Taken together, these allegations provide the defendants with fair notice of the nature of her claim and the grounds upon which it rests, and state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Although Ray’s complaint indicates that there were other ostensible reasons why her employment was terminated, the inclusion of those stated reasons in her complaint does not establish at the pleadings stage that she is not entitled to relief on her stated discrimination claim.”).

In re Mills, 287 F. App’x 273, 2008 WL 2937850, at *6 (4th Cir. July 29, 2008) (“Mills’ argument on appeal is simply that the allegations in the complaint, even if taken as true, are too vague and conclusory to demonstrate the violation of constitutional rights. . . We disagree. A complaint need only give ‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . . There is no heightened pleading standard for qualified-immunity cases.”).

Giarratano v. Johnson, 521 F.2d 298, 304, 305 (4th Cir. 2008) (“Giarratano’s complaint alleges that ‘[t]he exclusion of inmates from the protections of the Freedom of Information Act is not rationally related to any legitimate government interest.’ This conclusory assertion is insufficient to overcome the presumption of rationality that applies to the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . Thus, the district court’s dismissal of the facial challenge was appropriate. The conclusion that dismissal is appropriate comports with Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), which requires pleading ‘enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.’. . In Twombly, the Supreme Court, noting that ‘a plaintiff’s obligation to provide the ‘Aground’ of his entitlement to relief’ requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do,’ id. at 1964-65, upheld the dismissal of a complaint where the plaintiffs did not ‘nudge [] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.’. . Here, Giarratano’s conclusory allegation about the lack of a rational relationship between VFOIA’s prisoner exclusion and any legitimate state interest is insufficient . . . to plausibly state a claim for relief in light of the strong presumption in favor of the legislation’s rationality and the readily apparent justification for the legislation. . . . In holding that Giarratano could not meet his burden, the district court cited a variety of rational reasons for the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . . Giarratano, on the other hand, failed to allege any set of facts that would indicate the classification at issue violated any fundamental rights, was irrational, or otherwise failed to serve a legitimate state interest. Simply put, Giarratano has alleged no facts to support a claim much less a ‘plausible’ claim.”).

Mitchell v. Lewis, C/A No. 0:11–2860–CMC–PJG, 2012 WL 137471, at *5 n.4 (D.S.C. Jan. 4, 2012) (“The Supreme Court in Iqbal, and the Fourth Circuit in Trulock, addressed pleading standards in the procedural context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. However, this court finds that those standards also apply in the court’s initial screening of a complaint pursuant to §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A, since Iqbal discusses the general pleading standards of Rule 8, which apply in all civil actions. . . Moreover, §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A(b) permit sua sponte dismissal of a complaint that fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, which is essentially the same standard found in Rule 12(b)(6).”)

Williams v. Family Service of Roanoke Valley, No. 7:09cv00227, 2009 WL 3806333, at *5, *6 (W.D. Va. Nov. 13, 2009) (“Ms. Williams believes that her supervisors intended for her reassignment to be permanent and an effort to force her to retire, and she believes that they were motivated to discriminate against her on account of her age and race. Her personal beliefs and speculation, however, are no substitute for proof. At the pleading stage, it is necessary to state a plausible claim for relief that raises the right to recover beyond the speculative level. Stripped of its speculation and personal belief, Ms. Williams’ complaint shows only this: she was performing satisfactorily, her supervisors asked her to work temporarily as a receptionist with no loss of pay or benefits because of a legitimate need, a younger white female was to cover for her temporarily, and another employee that was approximately Williams’ age voluntarily resigned. These facts fall far short of raising a plausible claim for relief that discriminatory animus motivated an adverse employment action. In short, nothing Ms. Williams has said in her pleadings, or in open court in support of her pleadings, and ultimately her claim, raises her right to relief above the speculative level. In reaching this conclusion, the court notes that it does not view this as a technical pleading failure that disadvantages a pro se plaintiff. To the contrary, the Court has assumed the veracity of her relevant factual allegations, including her amplification of them in open court, and concluded that they do not ‘plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.’ Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950.”)

Arnold v. Williams, 979 F.3d 262, 267-69 (5th Cir. 2020) (“This immunity-from-suit interest does not require that the plaintiff’s original complaint exceed the short-and-plain-statement standard of Rule 8. . . Rather, ‘a plaintiff seeking to overcome qualified immunity must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.’ . . That is, a plaintiff must plead qualified-immunity facts with the minimal specificity that would satisfy Twombly and Iqbal. Furthermore, if the defendant first raises qualified immunity, the district court, ‘ “may [then] in its discretion, insist that a plaintiff file a reply tailored to [the defendant’s] answer [or motion to dismiss] pleading the defense of qualified immunity.”’ . . In this case, Arnold broadly addressed qualified immunity in his original complaint by alleging that Deputy Williams “knowingly violated” “clearly established law.” Williams explicitly raised qualified immunity in his memorandum in support of his motion to dismiss, but the district court did not require Arnold to file a Schulte reply tailored to the defense of qualified immunity. In his memorandum in opposition to the motion to dismiss, Arnold addressed qualified immunity, albeit in a merely conclusory fashion: ‘The Court should find that qualified immunity does not apply to this case.’ In dismissing Arnold’s unreasonable-search and unreasonable-seizure claims, the district court did not determine if Williams is entitled to qualified immunity on those claims. Rather, it granted 12(b)(6) dismissal because it concluded that Arnold did not plausibly allege a search or seizure. . . . At the 12(b)(6) stage of litigation, it is inappropriate for a district court to weigh the strength of the allegations. . . Instead, the district court must simply decide if the complaint plausibly alleges a claim for relief. . . By stating a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 and stating facts that make plausible an unreasonable search, Arnold meets the minimal pleading standard necessary to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on that claim, at least as to the two § 1983 elements set forth in Gomez. He has not done so for his unreasonable-seizure claim. Ordinarily, after determining that a plaintiff had plausibly alleged constitutional violations, we would turn to the qualified-immunity analysis. . . Here, however, ‘the district court found the complaint deficient on its face and never reached’ qualified immunity. . . ‘Because as a general rule, we do not consider an issue not passed upon below, we remand for the district court to decide in the first instance whether [qualified immunity] defeats’ Arnold’s unreasonable-search claim. . . We therefore reverse the dismissal of the unreasonable-search claim and remand for the district court to consider qualified immunity before proceeding to the merits of the case.”)

Shaw v. Villanueva, 918 F.3d 414, 418-19 (5th Cir. 2019) (“Shaw’s unadorned allegations are similarly conclusory. He has pleaded no specific facts showing that Villanueva and Ebrom misdirected Sotelo into issuing the arrest warrant. And so he has not established the exception to the independent-intermediary doctrine. In other words, his allegations are all broth and no beans. Finally, Shaw contends that Deputy Phillips doctored the complaint affidavit because it contained two unfavorable details absent from Mutz’s statement. But that’s irrelevant here. The Supreme Court held in Iqbal that ‘vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits.’ . . . And thus in deciding qualified immunity for Villanueva and Ebrom, we do not concern ourselves with Phillips. . . . Besides, Shaw has not appealed Phillips’ qualified immunity. In sum, the independent-intermediary doctrine applies, meaning Villanueva and Ebrom are entitled to qualified immunity from Shaw’s false-arrest claim. . . . Post-Iqbal, formulaic recitations or bare-bones allegations will not survive a motion to dismiss. Given the thinness of Shaw’s allegations, Villanueva and Ebrom are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 839 n.11 (5th Cir. 2017) (“Many difficulties of determining the adequacy of pleadings could be avoided by the district court’s ordering a plaintiff to ‘file a reply tailored to an answer pleading the defense of qualified immunity.’ Schulte v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433–34 (5th Cir. 1995). See also Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 590 (5th Cir. 2016) (noting that when a defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense, the court must first “apply[] [the] general pleading standard to the complaint” and “may [then], in its discretion, insist that a plaintiff file a reply”). The district court may require particularized pleading of facts responsive to the defendant’s plea of immunity. Officer Turner filed a Motion to Dismiss and, in the Alternative, for a Rule 7(a) Reply to Immunity Defense. The district court granted the motion to dismiss without ordering a Rule 7 reply.”)

Doe v. United States, 831 F.3d 309, 321 (5th Cir. 2016) (“In this appeal, we set aside the objective ‘clearly established law’ requirement, which is traditionally confined to the qualified immunity context. The analytical task before us today is to determine whether the complaint contains sufficient factual information showing that the same ICE officials under scrutiny in Robertson acted with deliberate indifference in relation to the transport policy violations and detainees’ safety. . . . We are mindful of our prior conclusion that the plaintiffs sufficiently pled that these officials ‘had actual knowledge’ of transport policy violations and of the transport policy’s ‘assault-preventing objective.’ . . . Thus, the specific question is whether that information alone renders the officials’ alleged culpability greater than ‘gross negligence,’ or whether more is required to make a plausible assertion that the officials knew of a ‘substantial risk of serious harm’ and consciously disregarded it. . . . A complaint must include ‘facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face’ to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. . . . We agree with the Government that some of our other conclusions in Robertson are relevant to that determination. For example, we discussed that the plaintiffs’ complaint did not include ‘any concrete facts betray[ing] a heightened risk of sexual assault during ... transports’ Robertson, 751 F.3d at 391. The plaintiffs do not allege that ICE officials knew of prior incidents of sexual assaults connected with detainee transports, of detainee ‘fears’ of sexual assault during transport, or of Dunn’s crimes ‘(in time to prevent them).’ . . . There also is no claim that ICE officials knew ‘of Dunn’s dangerous proclivities.’ . . . The detention center’s history of sexual assault, moreover, consists primarily of the 2007 incident between a detainee and guard which was unrelated to detainee transport. . . . The guard’s employment was terminated. . . . In short, the plaintiffs failed to plead that ICE officials were aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that known violations of the transport policy created a ‘substantial risk’ that detainees would be sexually assaulted. . . . Our ruling should not be interpreted as setting a standard that requires ‘a completed attack or confirmed potential victims or aggressors’ to make a successful deliberate indifference claim. . . . Still, mere knowledge of another party’s contractual violation is not enough to allege culpability beyond gross negligence in this case. . . . We have held that ‘observ[ing] questionable behavior’ and an awareness of lack of ‘compliance’ with the terms of a settlement agreement were not enough to show deliberate indifference. . . . The plaintiffs have not plausibly asserted that ICE officials acted with deliberate indifference. We affirm the district court’s dismissal of the plaintiffs’ FTCA claims against the United States.”)

Williams-Boldware v. Denton County, Tex., 741 F.3d 635, 643, 644 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Williams–Boldware did not plead this cause of action with the requisite specificity to defeat a motion to dismiss based upon qualified immunity. ‘One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time consuming, and intrusive.’ . . . Before allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find ‘that the plaintiff’s pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome’ a qualified immunity defense. . . . Here, Williams–Boldware’s failure to promote claim did not plead facts that would overcome a qualified immunity defense because her allegations are conclusory statements based almost wholly upon speculation. . . . Williams–Boldware speculates that Susan declined to recommend or approve her for more challenging assignments, but provides no facts to support her allegation. She also speculates that Cary Piel and Ryan Calvert were involved in selecting misdemeanor prosecutors for coveted assignments, but provides no factual support for that allegation. Most notably, Williams–Boldware failed to even allege that she applied for a promotion and was rejected. Under certain circumstances, a failure to promote claim is viable even when the employee never applied for a position. . . . However, the employee must demonstrate that applying ‘would have been a futile gesture.’ . . . Williams–Boldware made no such showing. Because Williams–Boldware failed to plead facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss on her failure to promote claim, the district court did not err by denying discovery and dismissing the suit against the Individual Defendants.”)

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 408, 409 (5th Cir. 2013) (“The district court erred in sua sponte dismissing at the initial screening stage Rogers’s claim that Jose Garcia acted with deliberate indifference to his safety. Rogers alleged in his complaint that he was not provided with a seatbelt and that he could not protect himself when the prison van stopped abruptly because he was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs. He alleged that Jose Garcia knew that other prisoners had been injured when the prison van in which they were riding stopped abruptly. Notwithstanding that knowledge, Garcia drove the van recklessly and Rogers sustained serious injuries when Garcia had to brake suddenly to avoid hitting another vehicle. . . .Rogers alleged that he sustained a serious injury because Jose Garcia operated the prison van recklessly, knowing that there was a substantial risk that Rogers would be injured if the van stopped abruptly because Rogers was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs and was not provided with a seatbelt. Rogers's allegation that Jose Garcia told another officer that other inmates similarly had been injured the prior week and during other incidents, which 'happen [] all the time,' states more than mere negligence. Garcia's alleged statement, if true, is sufficient to demonstrate that he knew of the risk to Rogers. . . .Rogers has a nonfrivolous argument that Jose Garcia violated his Eighth Amendment right to freedom from cruel and unusual punishment by acting with deliberate indifference to his safety. . . .Thus, the district court abused its discretion in sua sponte dismissing this claim against Jose Garcia at the initial screening stage and before the filing of any responsive pleadings, and we remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 411, 412 (5th Cir. 2013) (Edith H. Jones, J., dissenting) ("With due respect to my colleagues, I dissent from the holding that Rogers' conclusory statements about reckless driving by Officer Jose Garcia suffice to plead an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference. My concerns may be easily listed. First, there is no constitutional requirement that inmates be buckled with seatbelts during transportation. Nearly all courts have rejected such claims, because the use of seatbelts on shackled prisoners presents inevitable, non-trivial security concerns for other passengers and the guards. . . .Second, this prisoner's allegations of 'reckless driving' are factually insufficient to meet the demanding constitutional standard and pleading requirements. To establish deliberate indifference, the prisoner must show that the prison official knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . .The prisoner must show both that the official was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed and that the official actually drew the inference. . . .The prisoner's pleadings, moreover, must allege 'sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face.' . . .Rogers' allegations of Garcia's excessive speed, reckless driving, and darting in and out of traffic are conclusory, because he was seated in the back of a prison van, where his view of surrounding traffic had to be obstructed: the majority explain that he was seated perpendicular to oncoming traffic. Unlike the prisoner in the Brown case, relied on by the majority, he neither requested a seatbelt nor urged Jose Garcia to drive slower or more carefully. That Garcia 'recklessly' caused the collision is even more doubtful, as Rogers states in his appellate brief that 'Garcia was forced to slam on the transport van's brakes to avoid rear-ending a vehicle stopped in the freeway early morning traffic.' Taking this statement as an addendum to Rogers's pleadings, two implications are possible. Either Garcia, even though negligent in his driving, responded to an unusual, unanticipated situation, negating the inference that he knew a serious risk of substantial harm to Rogers existed; or Rogers's allegations lack sufficient factual detail from which an inference of recklessness can fairly be drawn. Similarly lacking are factual allegations that Garcia was actually aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to Rogers in these circumstances. The only alleged corroboration to Rogers' conclusion is Garcia's statement that prisoners have been injured during transportation in other instances. This statement, however, says nothing about whether Garcia was the driver on those occasions, nothing about whether actual reckless driving occurred, nothing about the type or extent of injuries sustained, nothing about driving conditions, and nothing about the use of seatbelts. Thus, I disagree that Garcia's statement can be taken to indicate the heightened state of culpability inherent in a constitutional violation. . . . Lack of seatbelts alone, as the majority concede, does not pose 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Further, because all driving in the congested and unpredictable traffic of the Houston metropolitan area poses some risk, the line between negligence and unconstitutional deliberate indifference must be securely drawn so that the Constitution does not simply become a 'font of tort law.' . . . The only way to preserve this distinction is to insist on careful factual allegations. Third, the majority's reliance on Brown is misplaced for two reasons. First, allegations of reckless driving were supported in that case by facts. The facts were that the convoy drove at speeds up to 75 miles per hour; the guards had refused multiple requests for seatbelts as the prisoners were being loaded into the vans; the guards 'taunted' the inmates about safety concerns; the vans followed each other too closely; the vans were passing other cars when road signs 'suggested otherwise.' . . . No such facts are pled by Rogers. . . . The majority's decision to allow this complainant to proceed is unfortunate, but Rogers must prove far more to overcome Garcia's likely defense of qualified immunity and actually sustain his assertions of a constitutional violation.")

Wilson v. Birnberg, 667 F.3d 591, 599, 600 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Wilson alleged that Birnberg intentionally deprived him of ballot access by, as the complaint states, 'rejecting Wilson's application out of retaliation for Wilson's exercise of free speech.' Specifically, Wilson claimed that during a prior election he had distributed flyers critical of the successful Democratic mayoral candidate, Annise Parker. This is 'factual content' supporting Birnberg's liability 'for the misconduct alleged.' . . . The election for which Wilson was denied a place on the ballot was a primary to select the Democratic Party's nominee for Harris County Commissioner's Court, Precinct No. 4. Birnberg chairs the Harris County Democratic Party and the county seat is Houston. There were no other Democratic candidates. Wilson filed his application for candidacy in the last hour of the last possible day, which meant that had his filing been accepted, he would have become the Democratic Party nominee by default. The facts pled are that a political-party chairman denied an application on an improper basis in order to prevent a critic of the mayor from receiving her party's nomination. 'The plausibility standard [for a complaint] is not akin to a "probability requirement"....' . . . Rule 12(b)(6) does not permit us to affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim unless we determine 'it is beyond doubt' that Wilson 'cannot prove a plausible set of facts' to support his allegations.")

Rhodes v. Prince, 360 F. App'x 555, 559, 560 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Our inquiry 'is an objective one, asking whether a reasonable person in the position of [Rhodes] would believe he was the subject of a criminal or an administrative investigation by the department.' . . . The question is fact-intensive. . . . Rhodes points us to the events of December 9, 2003 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation. We must first, however, identify the allegations in his complaint that are entitled to a presumption of truth. . . . Rhodes alleges that Defendant Roach 'intentionally and falsely arrested' him, 'when he knew such conduct was a violation of [his] Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful search and seizures,’ and that Defendant Roach did so with the support of the other Defendants. Because an ‘arrest’ is a legal conclusion under the Fourth Amendment and a necessary element of a false arrest claim, . . . Rhodes’s allegation of ‘arrest’ is ‘nothing more than a formulaic recitation of the elements’ of a constitutional . . . claim . . . and [is] not entitled to be assumed true.’ Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). Rhodes describes Defendant Roach’s questioning as an ‘interrogation.’ ‘Interrogation’ is a word with mixed connotations in the law, typically used to describe the questioning of a person while in custody. . . . Rhodes’s use of ‘interrogation’ to describe the questioning by Defendant Roach does not necessarily equate to an arrest because, absent facts indicative of a Fourth Amendment seizure, Rhodes’s description amounts to little more than a matter of word choice, without additional legal weight. Cf. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951. Some of the alleged facts in Rhodes’s Rule 7(a) reply are, however, entitled to a presumption of truth. Rhodes alleges that on December 4, 2003, Defendants Krohn, Carroll, and Roach notified him that he was a suspect in the burglary, and that he asserted his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. Defendant Roach advised Rhodes that he would head a criminal investigation into the matter. The Department then informed Rhodes that he was subject to an internal affairs investigation, placed him on administrative leave and conducted an interview on the matter. Rhodes further alleges that he was fingerprinted and palm printed ‘without consent’ before Defendant Roach questioned him. Rhodes alleges that the questioning lasted approximately two hours. Although it is not clear from the Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes’s counsel appears to have been present during the questioning. Viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that he has not sufficiently pled that he was ‘seized’ under the Fourth Amendment. The district court required Rhodes to come forward with sufficient factual allegations in his Rule 7(a) reply to overcome the Defendants’ claim to qualified immunity. . . . Rhodes thus had the burden to demonstrate that an objective person would not have felt free to leave the exchange with Defendant Roach. . . . Rhodes has not carried his burden. Significantly, Rhodes never alleged that he appeared at the Eastside Police Station involuntarily or felt that he was being detained. Rhodes also does not allege any show of force by the police. The taking of fingerprints and palm prints traditionally accompany an arrest, but standing alone, they do not suffice to establish an arrest. Rhodes was aware of both the criminal and administrative investigations and, in his Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes had the burden to distinguish between his compliance with workplace obligations and a show of police force sufficient to demonstrate a Fourth Amendment arrest. . . . Rhodes failed to do so. Even viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the encounter. Thus, Rhodes has not sufficiently alleged that he was ‘seized’ under the Fourth Amendment.”).

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *2 & n.2, *4 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) (unpublished) (“Caraway, Congemi, Cunningham, and Deroche have asserted a qualified immunity defense. In reviewing those claims, we are guided both by the ordinary pleading standard and by a heightened one. . . . We emphasize that this heightened pleading standard applies only to claims against public officials in their individual capacities. The Supreme Court’s decision in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics and Intelligence Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), made clear that a heightened pleading standard was inapplicable to suits against municipalities.

Further, the heightened standard is inapplicable to claims against public officials in their official capacity, for we have ‘explained that official-capacity lawsuits are typically an alternative means of pleading an action against the governmental entity involved....’ Baker v. Putnal, 75 F.3d 190, 195 (5th Cir.1996). . . . Schultea explained that, once a defendant asserts the defense of qualified immunity, a district court may order the plaintiff to submit a reply after evaluating the complaint under the ordinary pleading standard. . . We held that more than mere conclusions must be alleged, stating specifically that ‘a plaintiff cannot be allowed to rest on general characterizations, but must speak to the factual particulars of the alleged actions, at least when those facts are known to the plaintiff and are not peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants.’ . . ‘Heightened pleading requires allegations of fact focusing specifically on the conduct of the individual who caused the plaintiff’s injury.’ . . In Schultea, we adopted the rationale that, ‘in some cases, such as in search cases, probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. And if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.’ . . Here, the Defendants ask us to accept that Deroche entered the property for the sole purpose of determining if relief items were present. At the time, Deroche alleged he entered because of the alarm. Floyd asserts that Deroche knew that Floyd was not misappropriating relief items; instead, the entry into the property was all about embarrassing Floyd because of his past run-ins with then-Chief of Police Congemi. This is the type of conflict that warrants discovery. The district court should not have dismissed the claim.”).

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *6 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) (“Floyd does not complain that Caraway himself filed the alleged unlawful affidavit in support of the warrants. Instead, he claims that Caraway, in his capacity as chief investigator, directed and approved the applications filed by Cunningham. This is an alleged Fourth Amendment violation under Franks, as we stated in addressing the claim against Cunningham. ‘Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official’s own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.’ Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Liability under Section 1983 for a supervisor may exist based either on personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation or ‘a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor’s wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.’ Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 304 (5th Cir.1987). We must determine whether Floyd alleged the ‘factual particulars’ necessary to state a valid Fourth Amendment claim against Caraway. . . The relevant allegation is that Caraway ‘participated in, approved and directed’ the filing of false and misleading affidavits. In analyzing the issue, we turn to the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Iqbal. . . . Certainly our precedents have acknowledged that some limited discovery may at times be needed before a ruling on immunity is proper. As an example, we referred to ‘search cases, [because] probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants.’ . . In such a case, ‘if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.’ . . The importance of discovery in such a situation is not to allow the plaintiff to discover if his or her pure speculations were true, for pure speculation is not a basis on which pleadings may be filed. Rule 11 requires that any factual statements be supported by evidence known to the pleader, or, when specifically so identified, ‘will likely have evidentiary support’ after discovery. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3) (emphasis added). There has to be more underlying a complaint than a hope that events happened in a certain way. Instead, in the ‘short and plain’ claim against a public official, ‘a plaintiff must at least chart a factual path to the defeat of the defendant’s immunity, free of conclusion.’ Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1430. Once that path has been charted with something more than conclusory statements, limited discovery might be allowed to fill in the remaining detail necessary to comply with Schultea. . . Under these standards, Floyd’s allegations against Caraway amount to nothing more than speculation. The conclusory assertion that Caraway ‘participated in, approved and directed’ the filing of false and misleading affidavits is consistent with finding a constitutional violation, but it needed further factual amplification. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Floyd might not know everything about what occurred, but the bare allegation does not make it plausible that he knows anything. Unlike his allegations against Cunningham, this bare assertion does not provide any detail about what Caraway, as chief of investigations, did to seek to control Cunningham’s filing of an affidavit. Put differently, the conclusion presents nothing more than hope and a prayer for relief. An example of a situation that falls squarely within the kind of case justifying limited discovery is discussed in a recently released but non- precedential opinion by a panel of this court. Morgan v. Hubert, No. 08- 30388, 2009 WL 1884605 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009). In Morgan, a plaintiff who was in protective custody before Hurricane Katrina was transferred to a general prison population following the storm. . . After being beaten and stabbed, the plaintiff filed a Section 1983 suit against the prison warden. . . The complaint presented sufficient detail to demonstrate a highly plausible allegation of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The events cited were so clear, the practical effects of such conduct so obvious, that the defendants’ responsibility under Section 1983 for the plaintiff’s harm simply needed the detail that limited discovery would either provide or deny. . . Unlike in Morgan, Floyd has shown nothing in his complaint to indicate a basic plausibility to the allegation. His Section 1983 claim premised on a Fourth Amendment violation therefore fails.”).

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App’x 466, No. 08-30388, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) (“In his amended complaint and reply, Morgan alleges the following facts regarding Hubert’s personal actions: (1) that Hubert created policies that placed Morgan in substantial risk of harm; (2) that he failed adequately to house, feed, and provide medical care for inmates evacuated from OPP, and particularly failed to provide protection to inmates in protective custody and to provide medical care to those assaulted; (3) that Hubert knew or should have known that transfers from OPP would include prisoners in protective custody; (4) that Hubert knew or should have known of the need to segregate these prisoners; (5) that Hubert failed to follow the policies he had in place for the segregation and protection of prisoners, and that he failed to ensure that his staff followed the policies; (6) in the alternative that Hubert failed to enact any policies and was thus deliberately indifferent to Morgan’s rights; and (7) that Hubert had a personal duty to create and implement these policies or to oversee those who created and implemented the policies. The difficulty with these allegations is that they fail to state specifically such important facts as when Hubert knew of the transfers and what his policies were regarding them, including the handling of prisoners in protective custody. See Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1434 (requiring the plaintiff to support a claim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant's conduct at the time of the alleged acts" (emphasis added)). The time line from Hubert's planning for the hurricane to Morgan's arrival at EHCC is crucial to the deliberate indifference analysis, directly bearing on Hubert's knowledge of the events. The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan's, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts 'peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,' id. at 1432, and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . . Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court's ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity: 'The district court may ... limit any necessary discovery to the defense of qualified immunity.' 47 F.3d at 1434. Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert's possession, we do not consider the parties' remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete. Additional facts establishing the time line are particularly important when evaluating the second prong of the qualified immunity test-the reasonableness of Hubert's actions in light of the clearly established constitutional right. While the fact of Hurricane Katrina is unquestionably relevant to this inquiry, so too are the facts noting when Hubert learned of impending transfers and what steps he took to prepare for them. Several days of notice versus hours or even minutes of notice greatly changes the reasonableness calculus. Under such circumstances, remand for limited discovery is appropriate."). [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.)] Mohamed for A.M. v. Irving Indep. Sch. Dist., 252 F.Supp.3d 602, ____ (N.D. Tex. 2017), aff'd, ____ F. App'x ____ (5th Cir. 2019) ("The threshold question that the court must decide is whether, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Principal Cummings violated A.M.'s constitutional right to equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. If the allegations fail to state a claim for an underlying constitutional violation, Principal Cummings is entitled to qualified immunity without the necessity that the court reach the other aspects of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . Viewing all well-pleaded allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiff, the court determines that the Complaint fails to plead facts from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings's complained-of conduct was motivated by unlawful racial or religious animus. To the extent the Complaint alleges that Principal Cummings intentionally discriminated against A.M. based on his race or religion, the allegations are wholly conclusory and fail to 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level...[even] on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).' . . The Complaint contains no factual allegation that supports a showing that Principal Cummings removed A.M. from the classroom, ordered him to write a statement, or decided to temporarily suspend him from McArthur, based on his religion or race. Plaintiff's reliance on nothing more than conclusory, speculative, and sweeping allegations of constitutional violations and intent is insufficient to overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense. . . .Further, the Complaint fails to state an equal protection violation against Principal Cummings because it does not allege that he treated A.M. differently than other similarly situated students, and that the unequal treatment was based on religion or race. . . .Finally, allegations that the IISD has a pattern of disciplining African-American students more harshly than other students, that the IISD generally had an anti-Muslim bias, that Principal Cummings was aware of TEA reports reflecting such disparity, or that other school officials displayed racial animus, are insufficient as a matter of law to impute liability to Principal Cummings. To overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff must, at a minimum, allege facts from which the court may infer that Principal Cummings was himself personally motivated by discriminatory animus. . . . Even assuming that Plaintiff had met the threshold requirement of alleging an underlying constitutional violation, the court concludes that Principal Cummings is, nevertheless, entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiff has failed to allege facts from which the court can conclude that Principal Cummings acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. Principals are responsible for the safety of students and others on campus and, as part of that responsibility, often have to make decisions quickly and with little information. The court acknowledges that A.M. repeatedly stated that the device in question was an alarm clock and not a bomb; however, in light of well-documented incidents in this country of students bringing weapons and other prohibited devices to school, one in Principal Cummings's position cannot rely on or accept such assertions without at least conducting some level of investigation or sufficient inquiry to ensure that the device does not pose a risk to the safety of students and others on campus. . . .A principal's fate is not so hapless that, on the one hand, by not taking action he is faced with the gruesome prospect of death or serious injury of persons had the device actually been a bomb and exploded; and, on the other hand, he is faced with a federal lawsuit for denial of a student's constitutional rights because the device turned out not to be a bomb. Woe unto the principal who fails to act on a potential threat that later becomes a reality! To hold Principal Cummings, or any other administrator, to this standard places him between the dreaded Scylla and Charybdis. . . .As earlier stated, qualified immunity is designed to protect from civil liability 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' . . .Principal Cummings's alleged conduct falls into neither category. The court simply cannot go so far as to say, based on the allegations presented, that Principal Cummings was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law' or A.M.'s constitutional rights. Moreover, the Complaint contains no allegations from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings would have acted differently if the student bringing the device to school and showing it to others in violation of a teacher's orders had been non-African American or non-Islamic. For these reasons, the allegations in the Complaint regarding Principal Cummings are inadequate to overcome his defense of qualified immunity. Accordingly, the court will grant Principal Cummings's Motion to Dismiss based on qualified immunity.")

Huff v. Refugio County Sheriff's Dept., No. 6:13–CV–00032, 2013 WL 5574901, *2, *3 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 9, 2013) (“Defendants take the principle requiring a plaintiff to identify individual conduct attributable to each public official too far. That rule typically results in dismissals when individual policymakers are named as defendants without any allegation about their specific role in formulating the challenged policy. . . . Here we are not dealing with allegations against policymakers, but allegations that two individuals had direct involvement in applying excessive force. The allegation is that both were present in the cell when the force was applied. This is more than sufficient at the pleading stage, even under the heightened standard applied to public officials sued in their individual capacity. . . . Discovery can flesh out the remaining detail of which officer slammed Huff to the floor and which officer brought his arm behind his back.”)

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Small v. Brock, 963 F.3d 539, 541–43 (6th Cir. 2020) (“We thus hold that a prisoner states an Eighth Amendment claim by alleging that, without provocation, a prison official threatened the prisoner’s life on multiple occasions and took concrete steps, such as aggressively brandishing a deadly weapon, to make those threats credible. . . . Of course, our holding does not mean that Small’s right was clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. But we need not resolve the issue of qualified immunity in this appeal. Although the dissent points to several out-of-circuit cases holding that a court may sua sponte dismiss a prisoner or indigent plaintiff’s claim at any time if it believes that the claim is barred by qualified immunity, such a rule has yet to be adopted in this circuit. . . . In any event, we think that the approach taken by the Ninth Circuit strikes the right balance between screening for meritless claims and fidelity to the rules of pleading. . . . Under that approach, a court ‘may [sua sponte] dismiss a [prisoner’s] claim on qualified immunity grounds ... , but only if it is clear from the complaint that the plaintiff can present no evidence that could overcome a defense of qualified immunity.’. . . That is so because ‘[p]ro se complaints frequently lack sufficient information for a judge to make a qualified immunity determination without the benefit of a responsive pleading or discovery.’. . . Such is the case here: Small has a non-frivolous argument that his asserted right was clearly established based on our sister circuits’ longstanding recognition of that right. . . . It is thus for the district court to determine in the first instance whether Brock is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Small v. Brock, 963 F.3d 539, 544 (6th Cir. June 26, 2020) (Thapar, J., dissenting) (“The allegations in this case are troubling. But the Constitution is not a one-size-fits-all remedy for every injury. And in fact, the Constitution and federal law often limit our authority to address certain injuries. . . . [T]here’s little doubt that the alleged constitutional violation here wasn’t clearly established and thus that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. The majority opinion acknowledges as much but still remands the case to the district court. And for what purpose? Just so that the defendant can file a motion to dismiss, which the district court will (almost certainly) grant and our court will (almost certainly) affirm. . . . [T]he majority notes that Small has a ‘non-frivolous argument’ that the alleged violation in this case was clearly established based on out-of-circuit precedent. But the PLRA doesn’t just bar ‘frivolous’ claims; it bars all claims that ‘fail[] to state a claim upon which relief may be granted’ or ‘seek[] monetary relief from a defendant who is immune from such relief.’”)

Johnson v. Moseley, 790 F.3d 649, 654-57 (6th Cir. 2015) (“There can be no doubt that the Sixth Circuit recognizes a ‘constitutionally cognizable claim of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . ‘Yet, that is not enough.’ . . . To avoid the qualified immunity defense, plaintiff was required to plead facts making out a violation of a constitutional right clearly established in a ‘particularized sense.’ That is, the right said to have been violated must be defined ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . Although neither plaintiff nor the district court has defined the right to freedom from malicious prosecution in such a particularized sense, both have relied on our analysis in Sykes v. Anderson. Indeed, Sykes is instructive. In Sykes, we recognized that a showing of ‘malice’ is not necessarily essential to a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . . But we also observed that the requisite participation in the decision to prosecute after probable cause has ceased to exist must amount to ‘aiding’ the decision in more than a passive or neutral way. . . . And there must be some element of blameworthiness or culpability in the participation—albeit less than ‘malice.’ That is, truthful participation in the prosecution decision is not actionable. . . . The requisite blameworthiness was made out in Sykes by evidence that both defendant officers testified for the prosecution and each made false statements, made flagrant misrepresentations, or failed to disclose key items of evidence. . . . We further clarified the point in Robertson, 753 F.3d at 617, holding that even false testimony is not actionable as malicious prosecution unless deliberate-i.e., given with knowledge of, or reckless disregard for, its falsity. . . . Even more recently, the rule was succinctly stated in Newman v. Township of Hamburg, 773 F.3d 769 (6th Cir.2014). A police officer violates a suspect’s clearly established right to freedom from malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment ‘only when his deliberate or reckless falsehoods result in arrest and prosecution without probable cause.’ . . . Again, we see that a defendant’s participation must be marked by some kind of blameworthiness, something beyond mere negligence or innocent mistake, to satisfy the elements of a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [A]lthough the district court noted that plaintiff’s allegations lacked details, it accepted them as sufficient to meet the notice pleading requirements of Rule 8(a) and warrant further discovery proceedings. Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a). Despite the insufficiency of plaintiff’s allegations, the court withheld dismissal based on the possibility that discovery might disclose specific facts substantiating the claim. This ignores the fact that plaintiff, having sued defendant officers for violation of his civil rights, to overcome their assertion of qualified immunity, was obliged to allege facts describing how each defendant’s conduct violated a federally protected right under clearly established law. . . . Because, as explained above, plaintiff’s complaint does not set forth facts meeting this requirement, the claim is subject to dismissal. To be clear, we are not enforcing a ‘heightened pleading requirement’ that would run afoul of Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998); see Goad v. Mitchell, 297 F.3d 497, 501–04 (6th Cir.2002). Rather, consistent with Crawford–El’s admonition that ‘firm application of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is fully warranted’ where qualified immunity is asserted, we enforce the non-controversial requirement that plaintiff ‘put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations’ establishing a cognizable injury in order to withstand a prediscovery motion to dismiss. . . The district court’s ruling that plaintiff is entitled to discovery notwithstanding his conclusory allegations flies in the face of qualified immunity’s purpose of resolving insubstantial claims as early as possible so as to avoid unnecessarily subjecting government officials to the disruptive burdens of litigation. . . The court’s ruling, allowing plaintiff to conduct discovery that may uncover substantiating facts, also undercuts counsel’s Rule 11 obligation to conduct a reasonable investigation and uncover evidentiary support for fact allegations before filing the complaint. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3). Had counsel undertaken such an investigation and uncovered facts facially substantiating the malicious prosecution claims—facts inadvertently omitted from the original complaint—counsel would naturally have moved the district court for leave to amend the complaint so as to augment the allegations. That counsel made no such motion is telling. And no less telling is it that plaintiff’s appellate briefing is also devoid even of argument attempting to put flesh on his ‘bare bones’ allegations. He maintains simply that his allegations, conclusory though they be, are sufficient. We are not persuaded.”)

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App’x 348, 354 (6th Cir. 2014) (“Given the number and variety of ways the Shivelys allege they contacted school officials, the Shivelys notification of police, medical care professionals, and the guidance counselor, and the Superintendent’s knowledge of the ongoing harassment, the complaint plausibly alleges that Brown, Miller, and Wells, as the Principals and Assistant Principal of schools attended by T.S., knew about the ongoing student-on-student bullying and, given their positions of authority, were involved in making decisions regarding how it would be addressed. This conclusion is also supported by the procedural posture of this case, where litigation has continued during the pendency of this appeal and Brown, Miller, and Wells are proper Defendants before this court on the Shivelys’ state-law claims. We conclude that the district court did not err in finding that the Shivelys’ complaint meets the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 683–84.”)

LaFountain v. Harry, 716 F.3d 944, 951(6th Cir. 2013) (“Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a), ‘[a] party may amend its pleading once as a matter of course within 21 days after serving it’ and, ‘[i]n all other cases, ... [t]he court should freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires.’ In McGore, however, we held that, when the Prison Litigation Reform Act requires dismissal of a prisoner’s claim, a district court cannot grant leave to amend. . . .Every other circuit to have reached the issue disagrees.[collecting cases] Meanwhile, in Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 127 S.Ct. 910, 166 L.Ed.2d 798 (2007), the Supreme Court held that ‘the PLRA’s screening requirement does not—explicitly or implicitly—justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself.’. . The Court reasoned that, ‘when Congress meant to depart from the usual procedural requirements, it did so expressly.’. . Jones controls here. The PLRA’s screening requirements—28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) & 1915(e)(2)(B); 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c)(1)—say nothing about whether a district court can allow a prisoner to amend his complaint. Thus, McGore is flatly inconsistent with Jones. We therefore overrule McGore; and we hold, like every other circuit to have reached the issue, that under Rule 15(a) a district court can allow a plaintiff to amend his complaint even when the complaint is subject to dismissal under the PLRA.”)

Marcilis v. Township of Redford, 693 F.3d 589, 596, 597 (6th Cir. 2012) (“Though we have not yet addressed this issue in a published opinion, we have found, in an unpublished opinion, that a complaint failed where a plaintiff ‘did not allege that particular defendants performed the acts that resulted in a deprivation of [plaintiff’s] constitutional rights. This is a requirement in Bivens actions such as this one.’ . . . The complaint mentions Doyle and Livingston only in paragraph six, for the purposes of identifying them as employees of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Otherwise, the complaint makes only categorical references to ‘Defendants.’ We conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing the claims against Doyle and Livingston for failing to ‘allege, with particularity, facts that demonstrate what each defendant did to violate the asserted constitutional right.”)

Davis v. Prison Health Services, 679 F.3d 433, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2012) (“[E]ven if Davis had failed to include allegations about similarly-situated prisoners, his complaint still should not have been dismissed at the pleadings stage. [citing Swierkiewicz] Davis’s complaint. . . contains allegations that, if accepted as true, would constitute direct evidence that his removal from the public-works program was improperly motivated by anti-gay animus. By dismissing his claim because he had purportedly failed to identify any similarly situated prisoners, the district court mistakenly required Davis ‘to plead more facts than he may ultimately need to prove to succeed on the merits if direct evidence of discrimination is discovered.’ . . . In sum, Davis has alleged sufficient facts that, accepted as true, state a plausible claim for relief. Accordingly, Davis ‘deserves a shot at additional factual development, which is what discovery is designed to give him.’ Fabian v. Fulmer Helmets, Inc., 628 F.3d 278, 281 (6th Cir.2010). Dismissal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2), 1915A and 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c) for failure to state a claim was improper.”)

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Napolitano, 648 F.3d 365, 378, 379 (6th Cir. 2011) (“Plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against Defendants, in either their official or individual capacities, under the First Amendment. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the constitutionality of the alleged RWE Policy, Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege the existence of such a policy. And to the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the alleged retaliation by Defendants on account of Plaintiffs’ protected activities, Plaintiffs’ allegations are likewise deficient. Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege that any actions by Defendants injured Plaintiffs in a way that would deter a person of ordinary firmness from further participation in constitutionally protected activity. Nor have Plaintiffs plausibly alleged that any adverse action by Defendants was motivated at least in part by Plaintiffs’ constitutionally protected activity.”)

New Albany Tractor, Inc. v. Louisville Tractor, Inc., 650 F.3d 1046, 1050, 1051, 1053 (6th Cir. 2011) (“This new ‘plausibility’ pleading standard causes a considerable problem for plaintiff here because defendants Scag and Louisville Tractor are apparently the only entities with the information about the price at which Scag sells its equipment to Louisville Tractor. This pricing information is necessary in order for New Albany to allege that it pays a discriminatory price for the same Scag equipment, as required by the language of the Act. This type of exclusive distribution structure makes it particularly difficult to determine whether discriminatory pricing exists. Before Twombly and Iqbal, courts would probably have allowed this case to proceed so that plaintiff could conduct discovery in order to gather the pricing information that is solely retained within the accounting system of Scag and Louisville Tractor. It may be that only Scag and Louisville Tractor have knowledge of whether Scag exercises control over the terms and conditions of Louisville Tractor's sales to retailers, including the retail operations of Louisville Tractor. The plaintiff apparently can no longer obtain the factual detail necessary because the language of Iqbal specifically directs that no discovery may be conducted in cases such as this, even when the information needed to establish a claim of discriminatory pricing is solely within the purview of the defendant or a third party, as it is here. . . .By foreclosing discovery to obtain pricing information, the combined effect of Twombly and Iqbal require plaintiff to have greater knowledge now of factual details in order to draft a 'plausible complaint.' . . Without discovery, pricing information or any fact that would support an allegation of illegal economic collusion becomes far harder to obtain. Under the new Twombly standard set forth by the Supreme Court in an antitrust case, even though a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, its '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.' . . In this case that means, as the district court held, that plaintiff must allege specific facts of price discrimination even if those facts are only within the head or hands of the defendants. The plaintiff may not use the discovery process to obtain these facts after filing suit. The language of Iqbal, 'not entitled to discovery,' is binding on the lower federal courts. . . . Without discovery, the plaintiff may have no way to find out the facts in the hands of competitors, but Iqbal specifically orders courts, as quoted above, to refuse to order further discovery. If the plaintiff should be able to find out the facts it needs to state a claim, it will have to file another complaint. For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court.")

Frank v. Dana Corp., 646 F.3d 954, 961 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In the past, we have conducted our scienter analysis in section 10(b) cases by sorting through each allegation individually before concluding with a collective approach. . . However, we decline to follow that approach in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, __ U.S. __, 131 S.Ct. 1309, __ L.Ed.2d __ (2011). There, the Court provided for us a post-Tellabs example of how to consider scienter pleadings 'holistically' in section 10(b) cases. . . Writing for the Court, Justice Sotomayor expertly addressed the allegations collectively, did so quickly, and, importantly, did not parse out the allegations for individual analysis. . . This is the only appropriate approach following Tellabs's mandate to review scienter pleadings based on the collective view of the facts, not the facts individually. . . Our former method of reviewing each allegation individually before reviewing them holistically risks losing the forest for the trees. Furthermore, after Tellabs, conducting an individual review of myriad allegations is an unnecessary inefficiency. Consequently, we will address the Plaintiffs' claims holistically.")

Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Township of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 683, 684 (6th Cir. 2011) (“Although plaintiffs’ amended complaint contains 250 paragraphs and occupies 54 pages, it contains precious little factual support for the theory that the state defendants’ more favorable treatment of Minard demonstrates they were victims of unlawful discrimination. Although plaintiffs conclusorily allege that Minard is similarly situated, exhibits attached to their complaint substantiate undisputed and facially legitimate reasons for the state defendants’ complained-of actions in regulating plaintiffs’ compost operation at 32 Mile Road—reasons that appear to be unique to that property. Although plaintiffs make various allegations that the state defendants, acting in concert with Richmond Township and its residents, have been unfairly demanding in their enforcement of agricultural and environmental standards, no inference of unlawful discrimination can legitimately arise where the only asserted comparable, Minard, is shown by plaintiffs’ own pleadings to be dissimilarly situated in several relevant respects. In short, plaintiffs’ allegations that Minard is similarly situated and that his more favorable treatment by defendants evidences unlawful discrimination are exposed as little more than ‘legal conclusions couched as factual allegations’ and need not be accepted as true under Rule 12(b)(6) scrutiny. . . . Plaintiffs’ factual allegations fail to ‘raise the right to relief above the speculative level.’ . . . They fail to warrant a ‘reasonable inference that [defendants are] liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . . When the allegations are viewed in light of the exhibits attached to the complaint, they fall far short of making out a ‘plausible claim of entitlement to relief’ under either equal protection theory. . . . As such, plaintiffs’ ‘insubstantial’ equal protection claim was ripe for dismissal under the doctrine of qualified immunity at the earliest possible stage in the litigation. . . . The district court’s contrary ruling is based in part on a failure to apply the Supreme Court’s teaching in Twombly and Iqbal. The district court expressly recognized the applicability of Twombly, recognized that legal conclusions need not be accepted as true, and recognized that the complaint must set forth ‘some factual basis’ for the claims asserted. Yet, the court accepted plaintiffs’ alleged legal conclusions that Minard was similarly situated and that they were treated differently because of gender-based discrimination without requiring supporting factual allegations. . . . Nothing but legal conclusions suggests that the state defendants acted with unlawful discriminatory animus. . . . Based on the foregoing analysis, we conclude the district court erred by denying the state defendants’ motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. The factual allegations in the complaint, viewed in conjunction with the exhibits attached to the complaint, are insufficient to make out a valid equal protection claim under the ‘plausibility standard’ prescribed by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal.”)

Hill v. Lappin, 630 F.3d 468 (6th Cir. 2010) (holding that the Twombly/Iqbal plausibility standard applies to dismissals of prisoner cases for failure to state claim under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) and 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii).)

Nali v. Ekman, 355 F. App’x 909, 2009 WL 4641737, at *3 (6th Cir. Dec. 9, 2009) (“In order to plead a cognizable § 1985 claim, Nali must allege specific facts that, taken together, plausibly suggest that (1) two or more individuals ‘conspire[d] ... for the purpose of depriving [him] of the equal protection of the laws,’ (2) they acted to further that conspiracy and (3) he was injured as a result. . . . As the magistrate and district court recognized, Nali failed to plead sufficient facts to state a cognizable Equal Protection Clause claim. In connection with this requirement, he alleged that '[d]efendants' motives were racially based [and] supported by animosity towards plaintiff.' But, as the Supreme Court recently held, a complaint that includes conclusory allegations of discriminatory intent without additional supporting details does not sufficiently show that the pleader is entitled to relief. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1950-51 (2009). Nali's claim can survive only if he pleaded facts supporting that conclusion. He has not done so. The fact that 'defendants are caucasian' and that Nali 'is non-caucasian' does not by itself show that defendants were motivated to discriminate against him on the basis of his race or ethnicity. Although Nali adds that 'no one else was ticketed' for similar conduct (being in the chow hall at the wrong time), that fact does not show discrimination unless accompanied by some evidence that the people not disciplined were similarly situated and of a different race, see Coker v. Summit County Sheriff's Dept., 90 F. App'x 782, 790 (6th Cir.2003) (unpublished disposition)—facts he does not allege in his complaint. The district court properly dismissed this claim.”).

In re Travel Agent Com'n Antitrust Litigation, 583 F.3d 896, 912-15 (6th Cir. 2009)(Merritt, J., dissenting) (“The Supreme Court majority has made clear that it is not making a major change in the law of pleading with Twombly and its progeny. . . . As with any other new, general legal standard, the nature and meaning of the newly modified standard can be understood and followed only by analyzing how the standard is applied in actual cases like this case. Here my colleagues have seriously misapplied the new standard by requiring not simple ‘plausibility,’ but by requiring the plaintiff to present at the pleading stage a strong probability of winning the case and excluding any possibility that the defendants acted independently and not in unison. My colleagues are requiring the plaintiff to offer detailed facts that if true would create a clear and convincing case of antitrust liability at trial without allowing the plaintiff the normal right to conduct discovery and have the jury draw reasonable inferences of liability from strong direct and circumstantial evidence. . . . The antitrust cases decided in both courts of appeals and district courts since Twombly and Iqbal are few, and most of the cases decided by district courts have yet to reach the courts of appeals. . . . The uniformity needed for the rule of law and equal justice to prevail is lacking. This irregularity may be attributed to the desire of some courts, like my colleagues here, to use the pleading rules to keep the market unregulated, while others refuse to use the pleading rules as a cover for knocking out antitrust claims. . . . There are many, including my colleagues, whose preference for an unregulated laissez faire market place is so strong that they would eliminate market regulation through private antitrust enforcement. Using the new Twombly pleading rule, it is possible to do away with price fixing cases based on reasonable inferences from strong circumstantial evidence.”).

Hensley Mfg. v. ProPride, Inc., 579 F.3d 603, 609 n.4 (6th Cir. 2009) (“The Supreme Court has recently clarified that its decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for *A*ll civil actions,”” despite the fact that Twombly itself arose in the context of an antitrust suit. . . . The Court’s decision in Iqbal made clear that the Twombly standard is not limited to ‘sprawling, costly, and hugely time-consuming’ litigation, Twombly, 550 U.S. at 560 n. 6, dispelling such speculation by courts both within and outside this circuit.”).

Gunasekera v. Irwin, 551 F.3d 461, 466 (6th Cir. 2009) (“Courts in and out of the Sixth Circuit have identified uncertainty regarding the scope of Twombly and have indicated that its holding is likely limited to expensive, complicated litigation like that considered in Twombly.”)

Total Benefits Planning Agency, Inc. v. Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 552 F.3d 430, 434 n.2 (6th Cir. 2008) (“This Court has cited the heightened pleading of Twombly in a wide variety of cases, not simply limiting its applicability to antitrust actions. See, e.g., Tucker v. Middleburg-Legacy Place, 539 F.3d 545 (6th Cir.2008) (Family & Medical Leave Act); *Bassett v. National Business Development Services, Inc. v. American Credit Educ. and Consulting, Inc., 299 F. App’x 509, 2008 WL 4772074, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 31, 2008) (“Plaintiff asked this court to determine whether Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007), rather than Bell Atlantic, should be used to determine the specificity with which a complaint must be filed. Plaintiff specifically asserted that Erickson, which was issued by the Supreme Court after Bell Atlantic, set forth a more liberal standard. The district court correctly applied Bell Atlantic, as the facts of the instant case are more akin to those at issue in Bell Atlantic. Erickson concerned a pro se litigant, ‘and “a pro se complaint, however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers.”’ . . . Bell Atlantic, however, concerned an anti-trust matter, where the case emphasized the heightened possibility for abuse among lawsuits of this specie. . . . Copyright infringement, like anti-trust actions, lends itself readily to abusive litigation, since the high cost of trying such a case can force a defendant who might otherwise be successful in trial to settle in order to avoid the time and expenditure of a resource intensive case. Therefore, greater particularity in pleading , through showing ‘plausible grounds,’ is required.”).

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 558 (6th Cir. 2008) (“Hall and Schrader separately argue that Back has failed to establish a prima facie case of political-affiliation dismissal. Were this appeal before us in the context of the denial of a summary judgment motion, we might entertain their argument. But it is not. Because we are at the pleading stage of this case, and because there is no ‘heightened pleading requirement ... for civil rights plaintiffs in cases in which the defendant raises the affirmative defense of qualified immunity,’ . . . Back was not required to plead her prima facie case But for now, at the pleading stage, it suffices that Back alleged that she ‘was terminated by defendants Hall and Schrader by reason of her political affiliation as a Democrat.’”).

Lambert v. Hartman, 517 F.3d 433, at 439, 440, 442, 445, 446 (6th Cir. 2008) (“Although the factual allegations in a complaint need not be detailed, they ‘must do more than create speculation or suspicion of a legally cognizable cause of action; they must show entitlement to relief.’ League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 527 (6th Cir.2007) (emphasis in original) (citing Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1964-65 (2007)). . . . [T]his court has recognized an informational-privacy interest of constitutional dimension in only two instances: (1) where the release of personal information could lead to bodily harm (Kallstrom), and (2) where the information released was of a sexual, personal, and humiliating nature (Bloch). . . . Lambert’s first argument is a request for us to adopt a new approach to assessing informational privacy claims—one that does not require the court to first determine whether the privacy interest implicates a fundamental right. The reasonable-expectation-of-privacy standard that Lambert proposes is in many ways similar to the more fluid approach that other circuits have adopted for assessing claims of informational privacy. . . . Employing this standard, Lambert argues that she has a reasonable expectation of privacy in her Social Security number, and that the district court therefore erred in failing to balance that interest against the Defendants’ interest in publishing unredacted public records on the internet. Lambert is of course correct in pointing out that both Congress and the courts have recognized the privacy interest in one’s Social Security number. . . . The Sixth Circuit, however, has developed and applied a different approach to assessing informational privacy claims. As discussed above, that approach requires that the asserted privacy interest implicate a fundamental right. . . . We are bound by those decisions unless this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court holds otherwise, and Lambert’s argument must fail for that reason. . . . Lambert has undoubtedly shown that, as a policy matter, the Clerk’s decision to provide unfettered internet access to people’s Social Security numbers was unwise. This much is evidenced by the fact that the Defendants have subsequently removed the citations in question from the website and changed the local rules to better protect sensitive personal information. But to constitutionalize a harm of the type Lambert has suffered would be to open a Pandora’s box of claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, a step that we are unwilling to take. . . . Indeed, absent a showing of an infringement of a right that is ‘fundamental or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,’ this court’s precedents bar an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 from proceeding any further.”).

Midwest Media Property, L.L.C. v. Symmes Tp., Ohio, 503 F.3d 456, *472 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2007) (“Admittedly, the notice pleading requirement was amended slightly by the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Bell Atlantic Co. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), which held that ‘a plaintiff’s obligation to provide the ‘Agrounds’ of his Aentitlement to relief’ requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....’ . . . Twombly does not apply here, however, because Plaintiff has coupled its allegations with facts which suggest that Defendant has deprived it of its alleged right to post signs. . . . Twombly involved a claim under ‘ 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendants engaged in a ‘contract, combination ... or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce.’ . . . Rather than alleging that such collusion existed, however, the Twombly plaintiff merely alleged that the defendants were operating their businesses in a manner which is consistent with collusion, and then invited the courts to conclude that a conspiracy must follow from this circumstantial evidence. . . . The Supreme Court held that, under ‘ 1 of the Sherman Act, a ‘bare assertion of conspiracy’ is not sufficient to state a claim. . . . Instead, the Twombly plaintiff was also required to plead facts which ‘raise[] a suggestion’ of actual collusion. . . . In other words, Twombly was a case where the plaintiff invoked a statute banning collusion, but failed to actually state any facts suggesting collusion. This stands in stark contrast to the instant case. Here, Plaintiff alleges a violation of the First Amendment’s Free Speech Clause, and supports its allegation with specific examples of instances where the challenged regulations denied it the ability to speak freely. Plaintiff expressly states that it has been unable to post signs ‘[a]s a result of the Township’s enforcement of its Sign Regulations.’ . . . It cites nine specific examples where it was denied its alleged rights as a direct result of the Township’s denial of Plaintiff’s applications to post signs.”).

Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 548 (6th Cir. 2007) (“The Supreme Court has recently clarified the law with respect to what a plaintiff must plead in order to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). The Court stated that ‘a plaintiff’s obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.’ . . . Additionally, the Court emphasized that even though a complaint need not contain ‘detailed’ factual allegations, its ‘[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.’ . . . In so holding, the Court disavowed the oft-quoted Rule 12(b)(6) standard of Conley v. Gibson, . . . characterizing that rule as one ‘best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard.’”).

Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 555 (6th Cir. 2007) (Moore, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority cites Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), but if there was any doubt whether Twombly altered the pleading requirements, the Supreme Court put that doubt to rest in Erickson v. Pardus, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007). . . .”).

Weisbarth v. Geauga Park Dist., 499 F.3d 538, 542 (6th Cir. 2007) (“Iqbal thus held that Twombly’s plausibility standard did not significantly alter notice pleading or impose heightened pleading requirements for all federal claims. Instead, Iqbal interpreted Twombly to require more concrete allegations only in those instances in which the complaint, on its face, does not otherwise set forth a plausible claim for relief. . . . see also Collins v. Marva Collins Preparatory Sch., No.

1:05cv614, 2007 WL 1989828, at *3 n.1 (S.D.Ohio July 9, 2007) (noting that eight federal district courts in the Sixth Circuit have thus far applied Twombly in the manner described in Iqbal, while only one has restricted Twombly to the antitrust-conspiracy context). Ultimately, as explained below, our disposition of Weisbarth's claim does not depend upon the nuances of Twombly's effect on the dismissal standard. We therefore need not resolve the scope of that decision here.”).

Lindsay v. Yates, 498 F.3d 434, 440 n.6 (6th Cir. 2007) (“Swierkiewicz was discussed extensively by the dissent in the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). Twombly addressed requirements for pleading an antitrust claim under ‘1 of the Sherman Act. The dissent argued that the Twombly majority had devised a ‘new pleading rule’ that called into question the continued vitality of Swierkiewicz. 127 S.Ct. at 1974 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Because the Supreme Court majority distinguished Swierkiewicz and nowhere expressed an intent to overturn it, we have no basis for concluding that Swierkiewicz is no longer good law. Moreover, although this case does not present the question of if, or exactly how, Twombly has changed the pleading requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), we note that in Erickson v. Pardus, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), decided after Twombly, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that Rule 8(a) ‘requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’”).

Gudenas v. Cervenik, No. 1:09CV21692010, 2010 WL 987699, at *3 n.2 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 22, 2010) (“Presumably, certain of the Forms provided in accordance with Civil Rule 84 will be eliminated or modified. See, e.g., Fed.R.Civ.P. 84, Appendix, Form 11 (“On date, at place, the defendant negligently drove a motor vehicle against the plaintiff”) and Form 15 (“On date, at place, the defendant converted to the defendant’s own use property owned by the plaintiff”). Although these Forms ‘illustrate the simplicity and brevity,’ Fed.R.Civ.P. 84, that the Rules formerly contemplated, the allegations as set forth in Forms 11 and 15 would surely fail as ‘legal conclusions [of negligence and conversion] couched as factual allegation [s],’ under Twombly and Iqbal.”).

Spencer v. Oldham, No. 12–2519–JDT–tmp, 2013 WL 3816620, *4, *5 (W.D. Tenn. July 22, 2013) (“The Sixth Circuit recently held that a district court may allow a prisoner to amend his complaint to avoid a sua sponte dismissal under the PLRA. [LaFountain v. Harry] . . . Leave to amend is not required where a deficiency cannot be cured. . . The deficiencies in Plaintiff’s complaint cannot be cured by amendment because the claims asserted are entirely lacking in merit.”)

Bell v. City of Cleveland, 548 F.Supp.2d 444, 448-50 (N.D. Ohio 2008) (“In an excessive force action, involving the question of qualified immunity, the officer’s intent or motive is not determinative. . . Rather, the issue regarding Officer Delvecchio will be the objective legal reasonableness of his action in view of the circumstances he confronted, assessed in light of clearly established legal rules. . . Thus, Crawford-El and Goad are inapposite, and do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case. . . Delvecchio’s motion seeks to move the complaint beyond the ‘short and plain statement’ requirements of Civil Rule 8(a). . . He requests that the court order a reply which sets forth ‘specific facts (not conclusory allegations) that demonstrate a genuine issue of fact regarding Officer Delvecchio’s right to qualified immunity at this time.’ . . Essentially, Delvecchio seeks to impose a summary judgment standard under Rule 56 onto the initial pleadings of this case. Moreover, Delvecchio implies that the complaint is insufficient in that it does not reflect the version of facts as set forth in his answer. . . The court reads the complaint as alleging specific facts, not merely conclusory allegations. . . While those alleged facts are (not surprisingly) contested at this early stage of the litigation, it is not accurate to say that the complaint contains merely ‘conclusory allegations.’ . . [T]he allegations of the complaint in this case are specific in setting forth a factual scenario (albeit contested) of the shooting. . . The Supreme Court has consistently rejected heightened pleading standards not required by the Federal Rules themselves. Last year, the Court rejected the Sixth Circuit’s requirement that prisoners plead and demonstrate exhaustion in complaints under the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . . Although the court must look to the complaint when evaluating an assertion of qualified immunity in an excessive force action, ‘there is no heightened pleading requirement for such claims.’ . . . In summary, Crawford-El and Goad do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case.”).

Rice v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., 2007 WL 4126525, at *4 (E.D.Mich. Nov. 19, 2007)(“The Sixth Circuit has not expressly ruled on the scope of Twombly, but several cases have mentioned it. On August 15, 2007, the Sixth Circuit noted that in Erickson v. Pardus, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), decided after Twombly, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that Rule 8(a) ‘requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ Lindsay v. Yates. . . . Lindsay, however, did not require that the court decide the question of if or how Twombly changed the pleading requirements of Fed. R. Civ. Pro. 8(a). On August 24, 2007, the Sixth Circuit noted the uncertainty of Twombly’ s effect. Weisbarth v. Geauga Park District, 499 F.3d 538, 2007 WL 2403659 at *3 (6th Cir. August 24, 2007). On August 28, 2007, the Sixth Circuit applied, without comment, the standard from Twombly. League of United American Citizens v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 2007 WL 2416474 at *2 (6th Cir. August 28, 2007). On September 25, 2007, the Sixth Circuit applied Twombly, which it found ‘requires that the factual allegations of a complaint Abe enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.’” Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 2007 WL 2768285 at *3, (6th Cir. September 25, 2007) while the dissent argued that Twombly did not alter the federal pleading requirements.”).

Carrasquillo v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:10-CV-219, 2010 WL 3893616, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 27, 2010) (“Although the plaintiff’s complaint sets forth sparse factual allegations, the Iqbal standard does not require more to survive a motion to dismiss. The facts Carrasquillo alleges sufficiently support his wrongful arrest and imprisonment claims at this stage of litigation. Carrasquillo correctly points out that much of the information demanded by the defendants’ motion rests in their own hands. Without further discovery, this Court will not require the plaintiff to allege with detail the methodology the defendants used to conduct their investigation, the manner by which that investigation unfolded, or the precise role each defendant played in the investigation and arrest. Similarly, this Court will not require detailed factual allegations regarding the existence and validity of an arrest warrant still undisclosed to the plaintiff. Though Rule 8 ‘does not unlock the doors of discovery’, neither does it require plaintiffs to allege facts that only discovery could reveal. In addition, if this Court accepts Carrasquillo’s allegations as true, which it must in evaluating a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, it is plausible that the plaintiff has suffered false arrest and imprisonment. The plaintiff states that he was arrested, briefly jailed, and released without charge. All parties identify the plaintiff’s 17-year-old son as the correct target of the arrest. According to the plaintiff, he was 44 years old at the time of his arrest. The plaintiff also says that he repeatedly asserted his innocence during the arrest. . . and that he repeatedly identified himself. . . . Taken as true, these facts could plausibly suggest either that probable cause did not support the arrest, or that the defendants incorrectly executed a warrant against someone they could not reasonably mistake for 17-year-old Nelson Carrasquillo, Jr.”).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Felton v. City of Chicago, 827 F.3d 632, 635–37 (7th Cir. 2016) (“Felton’s allegations—that when he fled officers along an expressway, they chased him, rammed his car, and used stun guns on him—were not frivolous. . . If the judge dismissed the suit as factually frivolous, he abused his discretion. A claim is legally frivolous if it is ‘based on an indisputably meritless legal theory.’ . . Felton’s theory is familiar: he says officers used excessive force in arresting him, which violates the Fourth Amendment (applicable to the states through the Fourteenth). As an initial matter, Felton’s suit would lack ‘even an arguable basis in law’ if his injuries were self-inflicted and the officers caused him no harm. That may be what the district judge concluded after reading the newspapers. But when screening for frivolousness, ‘the complaint is the entire record of the case.’ . . The ‘frivolousness determination, frequently made sua sponte before the defendant has even been asked to file an answer, cannot serve as a factfinding process for the resolution of disputed facts.’ . . Felton says the judge relied on the newspapers to dismiss his suit. And though the City did not file a brief, it sent a letter to the court, agreeing with Felton that the district court dismissed the suit ‘based on the court’s independent research into newspaper accounts of the underlying incident.’ If the judge did so, that is unjustifiable, no matter how deferential our review. In our analysis, we credit Felton’s allegation that the officers caused his injuries. Felton argues that the legal viability of his suit depends on facts that could not have been determined at the screening stage. For example, he asks ‘whether the police were justified in chasing [him] in the first place.’ But that’s irrelevant because ‘pre-seizure conduct is not subject to Fourth Amendment scrutiny.’ Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332–33 (7th Cir. 1992); see also California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626–27 (1991). . . Felton also questions whether the officers had ‘some other purpose,’ aside from stopping his flight. But the Fourth Amendment analysis is objective, so the officers’ intentions do not matter. . . Objectively, at least one part of Felton’s complaint was legally viable: his allegation that he was shot by multiple stun guns. Nothing in the complaint says that this happened during the car chase. A reasonable inference is that it happened afterward. And nothing in the complaint says whether Felton was subdued, passively resisting, or actively resisting at the time. Discovery may reveal that he was actively resisting, but at the screening stage the judge was required to draw the reasonable inference that Felton was subdued or only passively resisting. In that case, shooting him with stun guns could violate clearly established law. . . . Dismissing these allegations as frivolous was an abuse of discretion. As to the legal effect of Felton's allegations that officers rammed his car, the parties were correct to focus on the objective dangerousness of the car chase. Officers are allowed to end a highly dangerous car chase by ramming the fleeing car. . . . But, as Felton stresses, the complaint does not say that the chase was dangerous. Felton's chase might have been like O.J. Simpson's: low-speed, on a deserted expressway, with officers following at a safe distance. If Felton posed no danger but officers rammed his car, a Fourth Amendment claim would not be frivolous. . . . It might be fair to say that a car chase along an expressway is usually dangerous, so the inference that the chase was O.J.-like is not reasonable. And if the chase in this case was not dangerous, Felton should have said that in his complaint. But even if that was the case, when a plaintiff—especially a pro se plaintiff—fails to state a claim in his first complaint, he should ordinarily be given a chance to amend. . . . And because Felton's stun gun allegations stated a claim, the case must be returned to the district court. Because Felton did not name the specific officers involved in his arrest, he must amend his complaint, so he will have the opportunity to add detail to his car chase allegations. On remand, the parties should know that in Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court refused to accept the non-movant's version of the facts at summary judgment because that version was clearly contradicted by a video of the chase. . . . If video exists that clearly contradicts Felton's story, an early and cost-efficient motion for summary judgment might be appropriate. Of course, as the Scott dissent noted, . . . video may not tell the whole story and reasonable people can sometimes draw different conclusions from the same video. If the defendants move for summary judgment, the parties should know that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) allows non-movants to argue that further discovery is necessary to resolve the motion.”)

Herron v. Meyer, 820 F.3d 860, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2016) (“If Meyer set out to punish Herron for his grievances, then a price has been attached to speech. The district court thought otherwise in part because Herron had not attached his grievances to the complaint, but that was not necessary; a complaint narrates a claim and need not supply the proof. That comes later. . . . And if, as we doubt, an amendment to the complaint was required, the district court should have allowed it rather than dismissing the claim. . . . Whether a penalty has been attached to protected speech is potentially more difficult. Many decisions assume that essentially everything a prisoner says in the grievance system—if not everything a prisoner says to a guard—is protected by the First Amendment. See, e.g., DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 618 (7th Cir.2000); Pearson v. Welborn, 471 F.3d 732, 741 (7th Cir.2006). These decisions do not discuss a parallel line of cases about grievances that public workers make about the conditions of their employment. That line of cases attempts to distinguish statements on topics of public importance (protected) from personal gripes (unprotected) and statements that disrupt the workplace (also unprotected). . . . The decisions in the prison-grievance line do not explain why the First Amendment offers greater protection to prisoners than to public employees. We do not get into that here, because the subject has not been addressed in the briefs. It is enough to flag the subject as worth attention, either in some future litigation or in this case if, contrary to our expectations, the First Amendment theory turns out to matter. The judgment of the district court is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Childress v. Walker, 787 F.3d 433, 440-41 (7th Cir. 2015) (“[A]llegations that a prison administrator knew that the conditions of a prisoner’s mandatory release included a ban on computer-related material, but nevertheless instituted, condoned, or willfully turned a blind eye to a practice that placed computer-related material among prisoners’ possessions, state a claim for relief under the Eighth Amendment. These are the precise allegations that Mr. Childress sets forth in his complaint. He alleges that there is a regular practice of placing computer disks with inmates’ property. . . . Moreover, he alleges that prison administrators knew of this practice and knew that this practice put at least some recently released prisoners in jeopardy of losing their freedom, but nevertheless did not alter, change, or otherwise intervene to prevent the harm. Specifically, on his return to BMRCC in November 2010, Assistant Warden Bates admitted to Mr. Childress that two other inmates had been re-incarcerated on the basis of ‘the same policies, practice, and procedures regarding floppy disk[s] associated with institutional programs being placed in the outgoing property of inmates by IDOC Employees.’ . . . To survive dismissal, a plaintiff’s complaint ‘need only “give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.”’. . . Here, Mr. Childress alerts Assistant Warden Bates to his claim and to the basis of that claim: Assistant Warden Bates, as ‘Assistant Warden of Programs,’ . . . was familiar with the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program; he knew that the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program, or of similar programs, were causing recently released inmates to lose their freedom, but did nothing to prevent this harm; indeed he ‘continued to adhere to[] and follow these same policies, practices, and procedures all to the detriment and deprivation of the plaintiff[’]s Constitutional Rights.’. . . These allegations satisfy the notice pleading requirement of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2).”)

Adams v. City of Indianapolis, 742 F.3d 720, 733 (7th Cir. 2014) (“For all its heft, the amended complaint alludes to disparate impact in wholly conclusory terms. In several places the complaint uses the words ‘disproportionate’ and ‘impermissible impact’ and other synonyms, but those are bare legal conclusions, not facts. We reiterate that ‘[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of the cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice’ to state a plausible claim for relief. . . . Moreover, ‘[t]his is a complex discrimination claim, and we have observed that under Iqbal and Twombly, “[t]he required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim.”’. . . In a complex disparate-impact case like this one, we would expect to see some factual content in the complaint tending to show that the City’s testing process, or some particular part of it, caused a relevant and statistically significant disparity between black and white applicants for promotion. The amended complaint contains no factual allegations of this sort. We are told that the promotion-testing process during this period had several component parts, but the plaintiffs do not identify which part they are attacking. Perhaps they could try to demonstrate that the different elements of the testing process are not capable of separation for analysis, see 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–2(k)(1)(B)(i); this flaw alone might not be fatal. The far more serious problem is the complete lack of factual content directed at disparate-impact liability. There are no allegations about the number of applicants and the racial makeup of the applicant pool as compared to the candidates promoted or as compared to the police or fire department as a whole. There are no allegations about the racial makeup of the relevant workforce in the Indianapolis metropolitan area or the supervisory ranks in the police and fire departments. There are no factual allegations tending to show a causal link between the challenged testing protocols and a statistically significant racial imbalance in the ranks of sergeant, lieutenant, or captain in the police department or battalion chief, lieutenant, or captain in the fire department. Disparate-impact plaintiffs are permitted to rely on a variety of statistical methods and comparisons to support their claims. At the pleading stage, some basic allegations of this sort will suffice. But the amended complaint contains no allegations of the kind, nor any other factual material to move the disparate-impact claims over the plausibility threshold. Accordingly, these claims were properly dismissed on the pleadings.”)

Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 625, 651, 652 (7th Cir. 2013) (“Twombly and Iqbal direct us to consider whether the plaintiff’s claims are plausible. However, it is important to keep in mind that even after Twombly and Iqbal, pro se complaints like Turley’s are to be construed liberally. See, e.g., Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93–94 (2007) (per curiam); Munson v. Gaetz, 673 F.3d 630, 632–33 (7th Cir.2012). Here, Turley survives dismissal because his claims are plausible and his complaint sets out more than conclusory statements. . . Turley argues that frequent lockdowns for substantial periods of time have deprived him of exercise and caused him various health issues. The State’s response is that Turley has failed to allege a constitutionally sufficient injury, especially since no individual lockdown exceeded 90 days, and the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to Turley’s or the other inmates’ situation. The district court dismissed this claim because it thought that Turley had not listed specific periods of confinement, but this conclusion is incorrect. The State relies heavily on Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 886 (7th Cir.2001), for the notion that there exists an ironclad rule that a denial of yard privileges shorter than 90 consecutive days cannot be the basis for an Eighth Amendment claim. However, the State has misconstrued this rule. In Pearson, we stated that we thought ‘it a reasonable rule that a denial of yard privileges for no more than 90 days at a stretch is not cruel and unusual punishment.’. . . However, we were careful to explain that the ‘norm of proportionality’ would guide the acceptable duration of lockdown. Even a lockdown not exceeding 90 days could violate that norm if it were ‘impos [ed] ... for some utterly trivial infraction of the prison’s disciplinary rules.’”)

Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1021-25 & n.5, 1027, 1028 (7th Cir. 2013) (“IFP plaintiffs have the same right as other plaintiffs to amend a timely filed complaint at least once as a matter of course pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) and to make further amendments with leave of court. The only difference regarding IFP and fee-paying plaintiffs arises in section 1915(e), which directs courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP and provides that ‘the court shall dismiss the case at any time’ if, among other things, the action is frivolous or malicious or ‘fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted....’ 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2). If a district court’s sua sponte dismissal in such cases were without leave to amend, we would face serious questions about fair access to the courts. Without at least an opportunity to amend or to respond to an order to show cause, an IFP applicant's case could be tossed out of court without giving the applicant any timely notice or opportunity to be heard to clarify, contest, or simply request leave to amend. . . . District courts must allow IFP plaintiffs leave to amend at least once in all circumstances in which such leave would be granted to fee-paying plaintiffs under Rule 15(a). . . . We therefore join the majority of other circuits in interpreting section 1915(e) not only to permit granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend complaints dismissed for failure to state a claim but also to require granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend their complaints at least once when Rule 15(a) would allow amendment in the case of fee-paying litigants. . . . We have previously recognized an additional interpretive question regarding section 1915's use of the word 'case,' leaving as an open question whether or not section '1915(e)(2)'s requirement that "the case" be dismissed necessitates the dismissal of the entire action or merely the complaint....' Furnace v. Bd. of Trustees of Southern Illinois Univ., 218 F.3d 666, 669 (7th Cir.2000). Today we also resolve that issue: Section 1915 requires the district court to dismiss only the complaint, not the entire action, and the court should grant leave to amend in all cases in which a fee-paying plaintiff would enjoy leave to amend under Rule 15(a). . . . On the merits, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Luevano's original complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. . . . The original complaint stated claims for relief. As a preliminary matter, the pleading standards for pro se plaintiffs are considerably relaxed, Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam), even in the wake of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . . Neither Iqbal nor Twombly overruled Swierkiewicz, and it is our duty to apply the Supreme Court's precedents unless and until the Supreme Court itself overrules them.")

Engel v. Buchan, 710 F.3d 698, 699, 708-10 (7th Cir. 2013) ("A Bivens cause of action is available for violations of Brady. Although the Supreme Court has cautioned against extending Bivens to new contexts, this case meets the Court's requirements for doing so and is materially indistinguishable from Bivens itself. And Engel's complaint contains enough factual specificity to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. Because the Brady obligation was well established at the time of the events at issue here (Buchan does not argue otherwise), qualified immunity does not apply. . . . [S]haky or no, Bivens remains the law, and we are not free to ignore it. As recently as last year, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the standards for resolving new Bivens questions. Minneeci, 132 S.Ct. at 621. Applying those standards here, we conclude, consistent with our decision in Manning I, that a Bivens cause of action is available for a Brady violation committed by a federal law-enforcement agent in connection with a state criminal prosecution. . . . Buchan also argues that even if Engel has a cause of action under Bivens, qualified immunity applies because the complaint does not contain sufficiently specific factual allegations to plausibly state a claim for violation of Engel's due-process rights. . . . It is beyond dispute that the Brady right was well established at the time of the events set forth in Engel's complaint. . . . Buchan does not argue otherwise. Instead, he maintains that Engel's complaint lacks sufficient factual content to state a claim for a Brady violation under the pleading standard announced in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . . Buchan argues that Engel makes only conclusory allegations with respect to his central claim of wrongdoing—as, for example, when he alleges that ‘[a]ll of the evidence introduced against Plaintiff at his trial was the product of intentional misconduct by the Defendants, who fabricated evidence, manipulated witnesses, and withheld exculpatory evidence.’ Were this the entirety of the factual allegations in the complaint, Buchan might have a point. . . . But Iqbal makes clear that ‘legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint’ so long as they are ‘supported by factual allegations,’ . . . and that is the case here. Read as a whole, Engel’s complaint easily contains enough specific factual allegations to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. [court reviews factual allegations] These allegations, read in context with the rest of the complaint, surpass the plausibility threshold of Twombly and Iqbal.”)

Richards v. Mitcheff, 696 F.3d 635, 638 (7th Cir. 2012) (“This suit. . . could not properly be dismissed under either Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c). The claim is sound in theory (see Farmer and Gamble); the complaint’s allegations make an eighth-amendment recovery plausible. Indiana allows tolling because of physical incapacity—and, far from pleading that he was capable of suing throughout the two years after his first surgery, Richards pleaded incapacity, again plausibly. The district judge had this to say: ‘Richards’ explanations for the delay are unpersuasive.’ That’s it. No other analysis. The court did not identify a legal obstacle to the suit; the judge just deemed the allegations ‘unpersuasive.’ But a judge cannot reject a complaint’s plausible allegations by calling them ‘unpersuasive.’ Only a trier of fact can do that, after a trial. For their part, defendants seem to be unaware that state law supplies the principles of tolling in litigation under § 1983; neither of the two briefs filed by appellees mentions Indiana’s tolling rules. We appreciate the judicial desire to resolve cases as swiftly as possible. Litigation is costly for both sides, and a doomed suit should be brought to a conclusion before costs are needlessly run up. Twombly designed its plausibility requirement as a partial antidote to the high costs of discovery and trial. But neither Twombly nor Iqbal has changed the rule that judges must not make findings of fact at the pleading stage (or for that matter the summary-judgment stage). A complaint that invokes a recognized legal theory (as this one does) and contains plausible allegations on the material issues (as this one does) cannot be dismissed under Rule 12. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Judges should respect the norm that complaints need not anticipate or meet potential affirmative defenses. If the facts are uncontested (or the defendants accept plaintiffs’ allegations for the sake of argument), it may be possible to decide under Rule 12(c); if the parties do not agree, but one side cannot substantiate its position with admissible evidence, the court may grant summary judgment under Rule 56. But this case has not reached the stage where Richards’s allegations of physical incapacity are put to the test. Once Richards has had an opportunity to produce evidence material to the tolling question, its sufficiency under Indiana law can be tested by a motion for summary judgment. Before proceeding further, however, the district court should consider carefully whether to assist Richards in finding a lawyer who can muster the facts and, if necessary, secure medical experts.”)

Norfleet v. Walker, 684 F.3d 688, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) (“There are unanswered questions about the statutory claim, and if the plaintiff were represented we might deem the complaint insufficient under the enhanced pleading standard imposed by Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 680–81 (2009). But as a pro se (as well as a prisoner and thus severely limited in his ability to conduct the kind of

Geinosky v. City of Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 745 n.1, 748 n.3 (7th Cir. 2012) (“The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). A motion under Rule 12(b)(6) can be based only on the complaint itself, documents attached to the complaint, documents that are critical to the complaint and referred to in it, and information that is subject to proper judicial notice. . . . A plaintiff, however, has much more flexibility in opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion and in appealing a dismissal. A party appealing a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal may elaborate on his factual allegations so long as the new elaborations are consistent with the pleadings. . . In the district court, too, a party opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion may submit materials outside the pleadings to illustrate the facts the party expects to be able to prove. . . . In the turmoil concerning civil pleading standards stirred up by Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . and Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly . . . a plaintiff who is opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c) motion and who can provide such illustration may find it prudent to do so. (It may also be prudent to explain to the district court that the materials are being submitted for illustrative purposes and should not be used to convert the motion into a Rule 56 motion for summary judgment.) Even in a case where a plaintiff would need to identify a similarly situated person to prove his case, like the McDonald case cited by the district court on this point, we see no basis for requiring the plaintiff to identify the person in the complaint. McDonald was decided on summary judgment, not on the pleadings. . . Rule 8(a)(2) requires only ‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ Even the more demanding pleading requirements under Iqbal and Twombly do not require a plaintiff to identify specific comparators in a complaint.”)

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 616-19 (7th Cir. 2011) (“Though the district court’s analysis was faulty, the equal-protection claim against the City was properly dismissed. To state a Monell claim against the City for violation of Mersaides’s right to equal protection, McCauley was required to ‘plead[] factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference’ that the City maintained a policy, custom, or practice of intentional discrimination against a class of persons to which Mersaides belonged. . . He did not meet this burden. . . . We have interpreted Twombly and Iqbal to require the plaintiff to ‘provid[e] some specific facts’ to support the legal claims asserted in the complaint. . . The degree of specificity required is not easily quantified, but ‘the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together.’ . . The required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim. . . . This case is more like Brooks than Swanson. Many of the alleged ‘facts’ are actually legal conclusions or elements of the cause of action, which may be disregarded on a motion to dismiss. . . For example, McCauley alleges that the City ‘has an unwritten custom, practice and policy to afford lesser protection or none at all to victims of domestic violence’ and that ‘[t]here is no rational basis’ for this purported policy. Similarly, McCauley alleged the following: [The City], through its agents, employees and/or servants, acting under color of law, at the level of official policy, practice, and custom, with deliberate, callous, and conscious indifference to McCauley’s constitutional rights, authorized, tolerated, and institutionalized the practices and ratified the illegal conduct herein detailed, and at all times material to this Complaint, [the City] had interrelated de facto policies, practices, and customs.

These are the legal elements of the various claims McCauley has asserted; they are not factual allegations and as such contribute nothing to the plausibility analysis under Twombly/Iqbal. Once the legal conclusions are disregarded, just one paragraph of factual allegations remains:

Defendant violated McCauley's constitutional rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 by:

- a. failing to provide adequate security and promptly arrest Martinez;
- b. failing to promulgate any policy to ensure the prompt arrest of individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
- c. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to timely arrest violators of protective orders;
- d. maintaining a custom and practice of failing to adequately train officers concerning the necessity of promptly arresting individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
- e. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to have safeguards in place to ensure that violators of protective orders were timely arrested;
- f. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether someone who is arrested for domestic violence is on parole;
- g. failing to have a custom, practice and policy to communicate with state officials and law enforcement officials regarding domestic violence arrests;
- h. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect in order to communicate with parole agents on domestic violence arrests;
- i. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether an arrestee of a domestic violence offense is on parole prior to issuing an order of protection; and
- j. maintaining a custom, practice and policy of ignoring the seriousness of domestic violence arrests.

McCauley maintains that these allegations are sufficient to state a Monell equal-protection claim against the City. We disagree. In order to state a facially plausible equal-protection claim under Monell, the factual allegations in McCauley's complaint must allow us to draw the reasonable inference that the City established a policy or practice of intentionally discriminating against female victims of domestic violence in the provision of police protection. That is, McCauley needed to allege enough 'by way of factual content to "nudge[e]" his claim of purposeful discrimination "across the line from conceivable to plausible."' Because the Equal Protection Clause is 'concerned ... with equal treatment rather than with establishing entitlements to some minimum of government services, [it] does not entitle a person to adequate, or indeed to any, police protection.' . . . 'On the other hand, selective withdrawal of police protection, as when the Southern states during the Reconstruction era refused to give police protection to their black citizens, is the prototypical denial of equal protection.' . . . The allegations in the paragraph quoted above do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained a policy or practice of selective withdrawal of police protection. To the contrary, the complaint alleges that the City failed to have particularized practices in place for the special protection of domestic-violence victims. In essence, the complaint alleges that the City failed to promulgate specific policies for this particular class of crime victims, not that the City denied this class of victims equal protection. At most, the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly suggest the uneven allocation of limited police-protection services; they do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained an intentional policy or practice of omitting police protection from female domestic-violence victims as a class. Just as in Brooks, McCauley's factual allegations are entirely consistent with lawful conduct—here a lawful allocation of limited police resources. . . And the complexity of McCauley's equal-protection claim distinguishes this case from Swanson.”)

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 620, 622-25, 627-29 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) (“I agree with my colleagues that plaintiff has failed to state a claim against defendant Walker. I respectfully dissent from the rejection of plaintiff’s equal protection claim against the City of Chicago. I am skeptical about plaintiff’s ability to prove the claim, but his complaint should be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, even under the new and subjective pleading standards announced in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). I explain first my skepticism, then some of the problems raised by Iqbal, and finally why the complaint should survive the motion to dismiss. Mr. McCauley’s suit seeks to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment’s equal protection requirements on the decisions of a major city police force about how to allocate its resources. Plaintiff’s only viable equal protection theory is that the Chicago police department made a deliberate decision to minimize the police protection available to victims of domestic violence, and that the police did so because of an intentional animus against women, who make up the vast majority of adult victims of domestic violence. . . . As a subordinate federal court, it is our responsibility to do our best to apply the law as stated in Iqbal. My colleagues do so here, and the Iqbal standard is clearly decisive for the panel majority. The problem here is that it also our responsibility to do our best to apply other Supreme Court decisions involving pleading standards, including Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993); Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007); and Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), as well as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as adopted by the Court and approved by Congress, and the form pleadings that are part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and that were also approved by the Court and Congress. Iqbal is in serious tension with these other decisions, rules, and forms, and the Court’s opinion fails to grapple with or resolve that tension. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that these decisions, rules, and forms simply conflict with Iqbal. As a result of this unresolved tension, since Iqbal was decided, the lower federal court decisions seeking to apply the new ‘plausibility’ standard are wildly inconsistent with each other, and with the conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court. . . . First, Iqbal’s reasoning and holding conflict with Rule 9(b), which requires that a party alleging fraud or mistake ‘state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake.’ As for other states of mind, however, the rule provides: ‘Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person’s mind may be alleged generally.’ . . . Second, Iqbal conflicts with other recent Supreme Court decisions. Iqbal did not overrule or question a number of the Court’s prior cases on notice pleading. . . . Third, Iqbal conflicts with the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 84 provides that the forms in the appendix ‘suffice under these rules and illustrate the simplicity and brevity that these rules contemplate.’ Iqbal did not purport to overrule or amend Rule 84 or the forms, but it is difficult to reconcile the new ‘plausibility’ standard with those forms. Many of the approved forms require virtually no explanation of the underlying facts as long as the defendant is informed of the event or transaction that gave rise to the claim, according to the broad notice purpose of the rules. . . . Unless one can plausibly explain away the tension between Iqbal and Rule 9(b) and the Rule 84-endorsed form complaints, then Iqbal conflicts with the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071 et seq., and the prescribed process for amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . Fourth, Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy is highly subjective, and returns courts to the long disapproved methods of analysis under the regime of code pleading. . . . Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy makes the difference indeterminate. Application of the dichotomy is leading to judge-specific and case-specific differences in outcome that confuse everyone involved. . . . Fifth, Iqbal's reliance on 'judicial experience and common sense' invites the highly subjective and inconsistent results that have been observed. The Iqbal concept of plausibility is 'context-specific.' . . . As a practical matter, the concept invites district judges to exercise their individual views of the likely merits of the case at the outset, when the only information available is the complaint. Worse still, an uncritical reading of the Court's 'obvious alternative explanation' reasoning seems to invite judges to weigh competing explanations for alleged conduct and dismiss cases merely because they believe one explanation over another. . . . In application, this standard bears a striking resemblance to the most stringent pleading requirement in American civil law, for pleading scienter in securities fraud claims, pursuant to the specific direction of Congress in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2) (requiring plaintiff to 'state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind'); accord, Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues and Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 323-24 (2007) (explaining that a 'strong inference' must be 'cogent and compelling, thus strong in light of other explanations' for the defendant's actions). Congress has not imposed such a demanding standard for pleading in any other context—including civil rights and employment discrimination cases, which often turn on whether a defendant's explanation for a decision is legitimate or merely a pretext covering for unlawful bias. Rule 9(b) and the Supreme Court decisions in Swierkiewicz and Leatherman permit plaintiffs to plead intent generally, meaning without the sort of specifics required under the PSLRA. But if the Iqbal pleading standard is applied in the district court, plaintiffs who already face the uphill battle of proving secret intent must now contend with the possibility of pre-discovery dismissal whenever the alleged pretext asserted by defendants in their motion to dismiss sounds plausible to the common sense of the particular judge. The potential harm of Iqbal in this context is that outcomes will vary based on how different judges view the plausibility of, for example, a police policymaker harboring and acting on improper motives toward women who complain of domestic violence. . . . In the face of all these problems, what are the lower federal courts to do? The first thing we can do is recognize the uncertainty that litigants, their lawyers, and district courts now face. As a result of that uncertainty, the courts of appeals should insist that in all but the most unusual situations, a party whose pleading is dismissed based on the Iqbal plausibility standard should be entitled to an opportunity to amend the pleading after the court has made its decision. . . . We should exercise caution to avoid punishing parties for imperfect predictions as to how the subjective and inconsistent Iqbal standard might be applied in their case. . . . But where that approach is not enough to resolve the case, I believe we must take care not to expand Iqbal too aggressively beyond its highly unusual context—allegations aimed at the nation's highest-ranking law enforcement officials based on their response to unprecedented terrorist attacks on the United States homeland—to cut off potentially viable claims. Iqbal exemplifies the old adage about hard cases. The failure of the Supreme Court to address all of the law that would conflict with broad application of the case should weigh heavily against that broad application, at least until the Supreme Court provides clearer guidance about how to reconcile Iqbal with its prior cases, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and their accompanying forms. Reading the present complaint as a whole, plaintiff McCauley has alleged the particulars of a plausible Monell claim. As the majority points out, McCauley has alleged the elements of such a claim using the relevant legal language. While some of these statements are conclusory in nature, they serve to notify defendants and the court of the type of claim being brought. There can be no doubt that the complaint provides sufficient notice of the circumstances that gave rise to the claims. McCauley made factual allegations that Chicago police failed to arrest Martinez despite knowledge of his harassment and violations, ¶ 25, and that this failure resulted from a custom of untimeliness and indifference with regard to the seriousness of domestic violence, ¶ 125(c) and (j). McCauley alleges 'deliberate indifference' generally, see ¶ 126, but elsewhere describes numerous specific failures to act that are factually consistent with such an intent. See, e.g., ¶ 51. It is difficult to imagine what more McCauley might allege on the crucial question of intent without reciting a list of specific states of mind that Chicago police policy-makers might have. We did not require such a recital in Swanson and we should not do so here. By extending Iqbal to dismiss plaintiff McCauley's equal protection Monell claim against the City of Chicago, the majority runs afoul of Leatherman, Rule 9(b), and the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Perhaps the Supreme Court majority intended Iqbal to work such a revolution in federal civil practice, but if so, the Court failed to grapple with the conflicts and did not express any direct rejection of these other governing sources of law. Under these circumstances, therefore, I would reverse the dismissal of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago and give him an opportunity to pursue discovery. Even if I agreed that the current version of the complaint failed to state a claim, I would remand with instructions to give plaintiff an opportunity to file an amended complaint to try to comply with the new and uncertain standards of Iqbal.”)

In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litigation, 630 F.3d 622, 625-27, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) (“The interlocutory appeal that we are asked to authorize in this case does not seek to overturn any findings of fact. The defendants are arguing rather that even if all the factual allegations of the complaint are true, the complaint is insufficiently plausible to satisfy Twombly. They are asking us to apply a legal standard—the pleading standard set forth in Twombly —to a set of factual allegations taken as true for purposes of the appeal. . . . [W]hen the question presented by an appeal is whether Twombly requires dismissal of a complaint, the concerns underlying that decision argue for empowering the district court and the court of appeals to authorize an interlocutory appeal. Twombly, even more clearly than its successor, Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), is designed to spare defendants the expense of responding to bulky, burdensome discovery unless the complaint provides enough information to enable an inference that the suit has sufficient merit to warrant putting the defendant to the burden of responding to at least a limited discovery demand.

When a district court by misapplying the Twombly standard allows a complex case of extremely dubious merit to proceed, it bids fair to immerse the parties in the discovery swamp—‘that Serbonian bog ... where armies whole have sunk’ (Paradise Lost ix 592-94)—and by doing so create irrevocable as well as unjustifiable harm to the defendant that only an immediate appeal can avert. Such appeals should not be routine, and won’t be, because as we said both district court and court of appeals must agree to allow an appeal under section 1292(b); but they should not be precluded altogether by a narrow interpretation of ‘question of law.’ . . . [I]n this case there is no question of hunting through a record or immersing ourselves in a complicated contract, and moreover we do have a question of the meaning of a common law doctrine—namely the federal common law doctrine of pleading in complex cases, announced in Twombly. Decisions holding that the application of a legal standard is a controlling question of law within the meaning of section 1292(b) are numerous. . . . Not that routine applications of well-settled legal standards to facts alleged in a complaint are appropriate for interlocutory appeal. But Twombly is a recent decision, and its scope unsettled (especially in light of its successor, Iqbal—from which the author of the majority opinion in Twombly dissented; and two of the Justices who participated in those cases have since retired). This court has only twice discussed the application of Twombly to antitrust violations, and in both cases only in passing. . . . Pleading standards in federal litigation are in ferment after Twombly and Iqbal, and therefore an appeal seeking a clarifying decision that might head off protracted litigation is within the scope of section 1292(b). . . . The previous cases do not address the relation of Twombly to the standards for interlocutory appeals under that section, and that is a further novelty that justifies the conclusion that the appeal presents a genuine question of law. So we grant the application for interlocutory appeal, and, since the merits of the appeal have been fully briefed in the parties’ submissions and would not, we think, be illuminated by oral argument, we proceed to the merits. . . . [W]e agree with the district judge that the complaint alleges a conspiracy with sufficient plausibility to satisfy the pleading standard of Twombly. . . . The Court said in Iqbal that the ‘plausibility standard is not akin to a “probability requirement,” but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.’ . . . This is a little unclear because plausibility, probability, and possibility overlap. Probability runs the gamut from a zero likelihood to a certainty. What is impossible has a zero likelihood of occurring and what is plausible has a moderately high likelihood of occurring. The fact that the allegations undergirding a claim could be true is no longer enough to save a complaint from being dismissed; the complaint must establish a nonnegligible probability that the claim is valid; but the probability need not be as great as such terms as ‘preponderance of the evidence’ connote. The plaintiffs have conducted no discovery. Discovery may reveal the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability. All that we conclude at this early stage in the litigation is that the district judge was right to rule that the second amended complaint provides a sufficiently plausible case of price fixing to warrant allowing the plaintiffs to proceed to discovery.”)

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832 (7th Cir. 2011) (“So suppose some of the plaintiff’s factual allegations are unrealistic or nonsensical and others not, some contradict others, and some are ‘speculative’ in the sense of implausible and ungrounded. The district court has to consider all these features of a complaint en route to deciding whether it has enough substance to warrant putting the defendant to the expense of discovery. . . or, in a case such as this (like Iqbal itself), burdening a defense of immunity. . . We are left in darkness as to whether the plaintiff is actually alleging that Atkins was denied food or water for four days, or for a lesser, but still constitutionally significant, length of time. The plaintiff's lawyer has had four bites at the apple. Enough is enough. . . All this is apart from the futility of the suit. Atkins is the only witness for the plaintiff, and Atkins is dead. His widow would be happy to testify to what he told her had happened to him, but her testimony would be inadmissible hearsay. There is no other evidence to support the charge of unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and no suggestion that any defendants, or other members of the prison staff, are prepared to support the plaintiff's version of the facts—or, should we say, any one of the plaintiff's versions. The district court was correct to dismiss the suit.”)

Bausch v. Stryker Corp., 630 F.3d 546, 558, 561 (7th Cir. 2010) (“There are no special pleading requirements for product liability claims in general, or for Class III medical device claims in particular. The federal standard of notice pleading applies, so long as the plaintiff alleges facts sufficient to meet the new ‘plausibility’ standard applied in Iqbal and Twombly. . . In applying that standard to claims for defective manufacture of a medical device in violation of federal law, moreover, district courts must keep in mind that much of the product-specific information about manufacturing needed to investigate such a claim fully is kept confidential by federal law. Formal discovery is necessary before a plaintiff can fairly be expected to provide a detailed statement of the specific bases for her claim. Accordingly, the district court erred in this case by dismissing plaintiff’s original complaint and by denying her leave to amend her complaint. . . . As Judge Melloy noted in Medtronic Leads: ‘If plaintiffs must allege that the defendant violated a particular FDA-approved specification before discovery, then it is difficult to appreciate how any plaintiff will ever be able to defeat a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.’ [In re Medtronic, Inc., Sprint Fidelis Leads Products Liability Litigation, 623 F.3d 1200, 1212 (8th Cir.2010) (Melloy, J., dissenting)] We think Judge Melloy said it well in suggesting that, in analyzing the sufficiency of pleadings , ‘a plaintiff’s pleading burden should be commensurate with the amount of information available to them.’ Id. Here, Bausch pled sufficiently given the amount of information to which she had access.”) Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 403-05 (7th Cir. 2010) (“The question with which courts are still struggling is how much higher the Supreme Court meant to set the bar, when it decided not only Twombly, but also Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). This is not an easy question to answer, as the thoughtful dissent from this opinion demonstrates. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has adopted a ‘plausibility’ standard, but on the other hand, it has insisted that it is not requiring fact pleading, nor is it adopting a single pleading standard to replace Rule 8, Rule 9, and specialized regimes like the one in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (“PSLRA”), 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2). . . . As we understand it, the Court is saying . . . that the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together. In other words, the court will ask itself could these things have happened, not did they happen. For cases governed only by Rule 8, it is not necessary to stack up inferences side by side and allow the case to go forward only if the plaintiff's inferences seem more compelling than the opposing inferences. . . . The Supreme Court's explicit decision to reaffirm the validity of Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), which was cited with approval in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, indicates that in many straightforward cases, it will not be any more difficult today for a plaintiff to meet that burden than it was before the Court's recent decisions. A plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else. That is an entirely plausible scenario, whether or not it describes what 'really' went on in this plaintiff's case. A more complex case involving financial derivatives, or tax fraud that the parties tried hard to conceal, or antitrust violations, will require more detail, both to give the opposing party notice of what the case is all about and to show how, in the plaintiff's mind at least, the dots should be connected. . . . Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home-equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.")

Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 407-12 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion except with respect to reversing the dismissal of the plaintiff's claim of housing discrimination. I have difficulty squaring that reversal with Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), unless Iqbal is limited to cases in which there is a defense of official immunity—especially if as in that case it is asserted by very high-ranking officials (the Attorney General of the United States and the Director of the FBI)—because the defense is compromised if the defendants have to respond to discovery demands in a case unlikely to have merit. . . . The majority opinion does not suggest that the Supreme Court would limit Iqbal to immunity cases. . . . There is language in my colleagues' opinion to suggest that discrimination cases are outside the scope of Iqbal, itself a discrimination case. The opinion says that 'a plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else.' Though this is not a promotion case, the opinion goes on to say that 'Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.' . . . Suppose this were a promotion case, and several people were vying for a promotion, all were qualified, several were men and one was a woman, and one of the men received the promotion. No complexity; yet the district court would "draw on its judicial experience and common sense," Ashcroft v. Iqbal, supra, 129 S.Ct. at 1950, to conclude that discrimination would not be a plausible explanation of the hiring decision, without additional allegations. This case is even stronger for dismissal because it lacks the competitive situation—man and woman, or white and black, vying for the same job and the man, or the white, getting it. . . . There is no allegation that the plaintiff in this case was competing with a white person for a loan. It was the low appraisal of her home that killed her chances for the $50,000 loan that she was seeking. . . . The Supreme Court would consider error the plausible inference in this case, rather than discrimination. . . . The majority opinion relies heavily on Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002) [but] Swierkiewicz is distinguishable. . . . Title VII cases are not exempted by Swierkiewicz from the doctrine of the Iqbal case. Iqbal establishes a general requirement of ‘plausibility’ applicable to all civil cases in federal courts. . . . But when a bank turns down a loan applicant because the appraisal of the security for the loan indicates that the loan would not be adequately secured, the alternative hypothesis of racial discrimination does not have substantial merit; it is implausible. Behind both Twombly and Iqbal lurks a concern with asymmetric discovery burdens and the potential for extortionate litigation In most suits against corporations or other institutions, and in both Twombly and Iqbal—but also in the present case—the plaintiff wants or needs more discovery of the defendant than the defendant wants or needs of the plaintiff, because the plaintiff has to search the defendant’s records (and, through depositions, the minds of the defendant’s employees) to obtain evidence of wrongdoing. With the electronic archives of large corporations or other large organizations holding millions of emails and other electronic communications, the cost of discovery to a defendant has become in many cases astronomical. And the cost is not only monetary; it can include, as well, the disruption of the defendant’s operations. If no similar costs are borne by the plaintiff in complying with the defendant’s discovery demands, the costs to the defendant may induce it to agree early in the litigation to a settlement favorable to the plaintiff. It is true, as critics of Twombly and Iqbal point out, that district courts have authority to limit discovery. . . . But especially in busy districts, which is where complex litigation is concentrated, the judges tend to delegate that authority to magistrate judges. And because the magistrate judge to whom a case is delegated for discovery only is not responsible for the trial or the decision and can have only an imperfect sense of how widely the district judge would want the factual inquiry in the case to roam to enable him to decide it, the magistrate judge is likely to err on the permissive side. “One common form of unnecessary discovery (and therefore a ready source of threatened discovery) is delving into ten issues when one will be dispositive. A magistrate lacks the authority to carve off the nine unnecessary issues; for all the magistrate knows, the judge may want evidence on any one of them. So the magistrate stands back and lets the parties have at it. . . . This structural flaw helps to explain and justify the Supreme Court’s new approach. It requires the plaintiff to conduct a more extensive precomplaint investigation than used to be required and so creates greater symmetry between the plaintiff’s and the defendant’s litigation costs, and by doing so reduces the scope for extortionate discovery. . . . The plaintiff has an implausible case of discrimination, but she will now be permitted to serve discovery demands that will compel elaborate document review by Citibank and require its executives to sit for many hours of depositions. . . . The threat of such an imposition will induce Citibank to consider settlement even if the suit has no merit at all. That is the pattern that the Supreme Court’s recent decisions are aimed at disrupting. We should affirm the dismissal of the suit in its entirety.”) Santiago v. Walls, 599 F.3d 749, 758, 759 (7th Cir. 2010) (“Mr. Santiago alleged that he submitted a grievance to Warden Walls’s office, asking that the inmate with whom he was being housed be placed on his enemy list and that he be given a cell change. The grievance claimed that the prison officials were following a practice of placing him in cells with inmates with whom there was bound to be a confrontation. He further alleged that the Warden ‘knew or should have known’ that Castro was dangerous. We think that this allegation is sufficient, at the pleading stage, to state a claim that Warden Walls actually knew or consciously turned a blind eye toward an obvious risk. Mr. Santiago cannot know for certain what Warden Walls knew without discovery. Consequently, the district court should not have dismissed this count of the complaint. The dissent suggests two infirmities with Mr. Santiago’s pro se complaint. First, it would require a much greater level of specificity in both the complaint and in the appended grievance form. With respect to the grievance, neither this court nor any other American court has imposed the requirements of fact or code pleading on such a document. The purpose of a grievance is, quite simply, to advise prison management of a situation that could harm the good order and discipline of the institution so that remedial steps can be taken by the officer who is responsible for such remedies. Here, the warden was informed that personnel under his command were undermining the good order and discipline of the institution by placing Mr. Santiago in situations where violence was inevitable. Although the dissent apparently takes the contrary view, we believe that any warden worth his or her salt would consider such an allegation sufficient to commence an aggressive investigation. Most wardens would not fail to meet their responsibilities simply because the complaining prisoner, while alleging retaliation, failed to name names. The maintaining of prison discipline does not depend on prisoners naming names. To the extent that the dissent is asserting that the complaint itself lacked sufficient specificity, it is asking for a return to the days before the Supreme Court eliminated that impermissible gloss on the Federal Rules in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993). It is clear that this complaint conforms to the standards set out by the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007) and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009).”).

Cooney v. Rossiter, 583 F.3d 967, 971 (7th Cir. 2009) (“The Court’s specific concern in Bell Atlantic was with the burden of discovery imposed on a defendant by implausible allegations perhaps intended merely to extort a settlement that would spare the defendant that burden. In Iqbal it was with the inroads into the defense of official immunity—which is meant to protect the officer from the burden of trial and not merely from damages liability—that allowing implausible allegations to defeat a motion to dismiss would make. Smith v. Duffey, 576 F.3d 336, 339-40 (7th Cir.2009). Thus, as the Court said in Iqbal, ‘determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will ... be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.’ 129 S.Ct. at 1950 . . . In other words, the height of the pleading requirement is relative to circumstances. We have noted the circumstances (complexity and immunity) that raised the bar in the two Supreme Court cases. This case is not a complex litigation, and the two remaining defendants do not claim any immunity. But it may be paranoid pro se litigation, arising out of a bitter custody fight and alleging, as it does, a vast, encompassing conspiracy; and before defendants in such a case become entangled in discovery proceedings, the plaintiff must meet a high standard of plausibility.”).

Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir. 2009) (“Any doubt that Twombly had repudiated the general notice-pleading regime of Rule 8 was put to rest two weeks later, when the Court issued Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93 (2007). . . . This court took Twombly and Erickson together to mean that ‘at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.’. . . This continues to be the case after Iqbal. That case clarified that Twombly’s plausibility requirement applies across the board, not just to antitrust cases. In addition, Iqbal gave further guidance to lower courts in evaluating complaints. . . . We understand the Court in Iqbal to be admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone could do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more. These are the plaintiffs who have not provided the ‘showing’ required by Rule 8. So, what do we take away from Twombly, Erickson, and Iqbal? First, a plaintiff must provide notice to defendants of her claims. Second, courts must accept a plaintiff’s factual allegations as true, but some factual allegations will be so sketchy or implausible that they fail to provide sufficient notice to defendants of the plaintiff’s claim. Third, in considering the plaintiff’s factual allegations, courts should not accept as adequate abstract recitations of the elements of a cause of action or conclusory legal statements.”).

Burks v. Raemisch, 555 F.3d 592, 593 (7th Cir. 2009) (“Plaintiffs need not lard their complaints with facts; the federal system uses notice pleading rather than fact pleading. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Knowledge and intent, in particular, need not be covered in detail; Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b) provides that ‘[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person’s mind may be alleged generally.’ It is enough to lay out a plausible grievance. A prisoner’s statement that he repeatedly alerted medical personnel to a serious medical condition, that they did nothing in response, and that permanent injury ensued, is enough to state a claim on which relief may be granted—if it names the persons responsible for the problem. Doing nothing could be simple negligence, but it does not stretch the imagination to see that it might also amount to deliberate indifference.”).

Tamayo v. Blagojevich, 526 F.3d 1074, 1082, 1083, 1085, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2008) (“Since Bell Atlantic, we cautiously have attempted neither to over-read nor to under-read its holding. We have stated that the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic ‘retooled federal pleading standards,’ and retired ‘the oft-quoted Conley formulation.’. . . We also have cautioned, however, that Bell Atlantic ‘must not be overread.’. . . Although the opinion contains some language that could be read to suggest otherwise, the Court in Bell Atlantic made clear that it did not, in fact, supplant the basic notice-pleading standard. . . . The task of applying Bell Atlantic to the different types of cases that come before us continues. In each context, we must determine what allegations are necessary to show that recovery is ‘plausible.’. . . For complaints involving complex litigation—for example, antitrust or RICO claims—a fuller set of factual allegations may be necessary to show that relief is plausible. . . . The Court in Bell Atlantic wished to avoid the ‘in terrorem’ effect of allowing a plaintiff with a ‘largely groundless claim’ to force defendants into either costly discovery or an increased settlement value. . . . [W]e conclude that Ms. Tamayo’s complaint included enough facts in support of a claim of sex discrimination under Title VII and the Equal Pay Act to survive dismissal at this stage of the proceedings. . . . Similarly, we conclude that Ms. Tamayo’s complaint alleged enough facts to state a claim for retaliation. . . . The pleading standard is no different simply because qualified immunity may be raised as an affirmative defense. . . . In any event, the right to be free from sex discrimination is clearly established. Taking all facts pleaded in Ms. Tamayo’s complaint as true, the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right; therefore, a grant of qualified immunity is inappropriate at this point in the proceedings.”).

Limestone Development Corp. v. Village of Lemont, Ill., 520 F.3d 797, 803, 804 (7th Cir. 2008) (“Under Bell Atlantic, the complaint in a potentially complex litigation, or one that by reason of the potential cost of a judgment to the defendant creates the ‘in terrorem’ effect against which Blue Chip warned, must have some degree of plausibility to survive dismissal. It is true that the narrowest holding in Bell Atlantic is merely that an antitrust complaint charging an agreement between firms not to compete must contain ‘enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.... An allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice.’. The Court was concerned lest a defendant be forced to conduct expensive pretrial discovery in order to demonstrate the groundlessness of the plaintiff’s claim. . . . But the concern is as applicable to a RICO case, which resembles an antitrust case in point of complexity and the availability of punitive damages and of attorneys’ fees to the successful plaintiff. RICO cases, like antitrust cases, are ‘big’ cases and the defendant should not be put to the expense of big-case discovery on the basis of a threadbare claim. Bell Atlantic must not be overread. The Court denied ‘requir[ing] heightened fact pleading of specifics,’ 127 S.Ct. at 1974; ‘a complaint ... does not need detailed factual allegations.’ . . . Within weeks after deciding Bell Atlantic, the Court reversed a Tenth Circuit decision for requiring fact pleading . Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, had complained that he had Hepatitis C, that he was on a one-year treatment program for it, that shortly after the program began the prison officials withheld treatment, and that his life was in danger as a result. That was the context in which the Court said that ‘specific facts’ need not be pleaded. . . . A complaint must always, however, allege ‘enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face,’ . . . and how many facts are enough will depend on the type of case. In a complex antitrust or RICO case a fuller set of factual allegations than found in the sample complaints in the civil rules’ Appendix of Forms may be necessary to show that the plaintiff’s claim is not ‘largely groundless.’ Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 231-32 (3d Cir.2008). If discovery is likely to be more than usually costly, the complaint must include as much factual detail and argument as may be required to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim.”) Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir. 2007) (“In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, . . . the Supreme Court wrote that ‘[w]hile a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, ... a plaintiff’s obligation to provide the ‘*A*grounds’ of his ‘*A*entitle[ment] to relief’ requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....’ . . .

Two weeks later the Court clarified that Twombly did not signal a switch to fact-pleading in the federal courts. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). To the contrary, Erickson reaffirmed that under Rule 8 “[s]pecific facts are not necessary; the statement need only give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.” . . . Taking Erickson and Twombly together, we understand the Court to be saying only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.”).

Cosby v. Rodriguez, 711 F.Supp.3d 983, ____ (N.D. Ill. 2024) (“[T]hough it is obvious that not every kick or baton strike came from Officer Rodriguez, it would be ‘unfair and illogical’ to require Mr. Cosby, who alleges he was being beaten, to somehow keep track of who shoved him to the ground, who held him down, and who beat him in the head with a baton. . . This is especially true in the context of a chaotic protest, where it would undoubtedly be difficult to keep track of what was going on and when; indeed, Mr. Cosby alleges elsewhere in his complaint that officers generally removed or lacked identifying badges or nametags and, in some cases, did not use their body cameras. . . A pleading standard that ‘require[d] a plaintiff, without the benefit of discovery, to connect every single alleged instance of misconduct in the complaint to every single specific officer would effectively allow police officers to violate constitutional rights with abandon as long as they ensured they could not be individually identified’ . . Rule 8 does not require that result. Indeed, ‘where a plaintiff has been injured “as the consequence of the actions of an unknown member of a collective body, identification of the responsible party may be impossible without pretrial discovery,” “and ... courts should not dismiss such claims”’. . . Here, the alleged unconstitutional acts—the types of force used when arresting Mr. Cosby—are straightforward, and the complaint provides enough notice to Officer Rodriguez to withstand scrutiny under Rule 8. To survive summary judgment, Mr. Cosby will have to tie Officer Rodriguez specifically to each allegedly unconstitutional act. As the parties have not yet engaged in discovery that might enable Plaintiff to meet this burden, the court declines Rodriguez’s request to dismiss Counts I, II, III, VIII, and XI.”)

Padron v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., No. 10 C 6656, 2011 WL 1760229, at *4 (N.D. Ill. May 9, 2011) (“Notwithstanding the facial inadequacy of Counts I through III, Plaintiffs argue that those counts should not be dismissed because of ‘informational asymmetry’ favoring Defendant. Plaintiffs claim that Defendant possesses the facts that Plaintiffs need to plead their case and that Plaintiffs are powerless to obtain information without access to the discovery process. Plaintiffs contend that as pro se complainants who do not speak English and who are unfamiliar with the legal process, they have little choice but to rely on the EEOC’s investigation and findings, much of which is redacted. According to Plaintiffs, if Defendant’s motion to dismiss is granted, ‘informational asymmetry’ unfairly would protect the Defendant from liability. Plaintiffs also rely on In re Text Messaging to support their informational asymmetry argument. There, the court recognized that discovery could reveal ‘the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability.’ In re Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 629 (emphasis added). However, the court made that statement after determining that the plaintiffs already had alleged sufficient circumstantial evidence to infer plausibly that the defendants engaged in price fixing. . . The court found that circumstantial evidence was sufficient at the pleading stage and noted that direct evidence could emerge during discovery. . . As discussed above, Plaintiffs have not already alleged circumstantial evidence that plausibly gives rise to an inference of discriminatory practices by Defendant. Therefore, In re Text Messaging is distinguished and does not support Plaintiffs' argument that discovery should be permitted. I also note that Plaintiffs have not established the existence or extent of any purported 'informational asymmetry.' Plaintiffs worked for Defendant for between five and six years. They had opportunity to observe Defendant's practices and discuss with other co-workers the terms and conditions of their employment. Presumably, such experiences prompted Plaintiffs to file EEOC charges in the first place. Yet, Plaintiffs allege few facts based on their tenure working for Defendant. Moreover, Plaintiffs could have performed an investigation to obtain additional information about Defendant's practices. Although Defendant may have exclusive access to certain types of evidence, Plaintiffs had their own ways of collecting information that could make their claims plausible. Yet, such facts are not pleaded in their complaint. Defendant argues that Plaintiffs' complaint is precisely what Twombly sought to guard against: conclusory allegations made in the hope of obtaining discovery that potentially could support Plaintiffs' claim. Defendant is correct that preventing meritless lawsuits and needless, costly discovery was an important concern in Twombly. . . The Court stated that 'it is no answer to say that a claim just shy of a plausible entitlement to relief can, if groundless, be weeded out early in the discovery process.' . . If courts granted discovery in those circumstances, risk-averse defendants would settle even weak claims before subsequent proceedings could dispose of them. . . Twombly discourages correcting perceived informational asymmetry through discovery, which is the approach advocated by Plaintiffs. Accordingly, Counts I through III are dismissed.")

Santana v. Cook County Bd. of Review, No. 09 C 5027, 2011 WL 1549240, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 25, 2011) ("Before Iqbal our own Court of Appeals, in Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT & T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir.2007) described Twombly and Erickson as establishing 'only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.' And more recently Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir.2009) has confirmed that the Airborne Beepers reading of pleading law post-Twombly and post-Erickson remains accurate after Iqbal. Brooks, id. describes Iqbal as 'admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone can do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more.' Familiar Rule 12(b)(6) principles—still operative under the new pleading regime—require this Court to accept as true all of Santana's well-pleaded factual allegations, with all reasonable inferences drawn in his favor (Christensen v. County of Boone, 483 F.3d 454, 457 (7th Cir.2007)(per curiam)). . . . With no plausible claim having been alleged by Santana after his fifth effort to do so, the figurative severance of the 4AC and cauterization of the fatal wound, both accomplished by this opinion, have to preclude any hydra-like effort by his counsel to grow still another head through a fifth amended complaint. Enough is enough.

Defendants are entitled to a judgment as a matter of law on all of Santana's claims. Their Rule 12(b)(6) motion is granted, and this action is dismissed with prejudice.")

Kitchen v. Burge, 781 F.Supp.2d 721, 728, 734, 735, 738 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("Byrne is not alleged to have directly participated in Kitchen's torture. Rather, the complaint simply alleges that Byrne was Burge's 'right hand man,' and that, like Burge, Byrne 'engaged in a pattern and practice of torture and brutality himself, and also supervised, encouraged, sanctioned, condoned and ratified brutality and torture by other detectives, including the Police Officer Defendants named herein.' . . . These generic and conclusory allegations are not sufficient to assert a claim against Byrne. Accordingly, I grant the officer defendants' motion to dismiss Byrne from the complaint. . . . Given the nature of the information that the municipal defendants are alleged to have suppressed, the possibility of establishing a causal link with Kitchen's incarceration is at least minimally plausible. For example, Martin is alleged to have hindered OPS investigations into Burge's and others' use of torture at Area 2 and 3 Headquarters; and when findings of torture were made, Shines attempted to 'secret' or suppress them. Although none of the suppressed information had specifically to do with Kitchen's case, it is not unreasonable to infer that awareness of other instances of torture could have drawn attention to the problem more generally, causing Kitchen's case to come to light sooner. In Daley's case, however, judicial experience and common sense do not permit such a reasonable inference based on Daley's decision to promote Dignan, for example, or to provide Burge's legal defense. For these reasons, Daley's motion to dismiss Count I is granted. . . . The Seventh Circuit has made clear that conspiracy claims under § 1983 are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Srivastava v. Cottey, 83 Fed. App'x 807, 810 (7th Cir.2003). Rather, a complaint need only provide 'notice of time, scope, and parties involved.' Id. Kitchen's complaint easily satisfies this requirement. Defendants argue that Kitchen's § 1985 and § 1986 conspiracy claims fail because there must be an underlying predicate violation of constitutional rights. As already explained, Counts I and IV are sufficient to state a claim. Defendants also argue that plaintiff has failed to allege an 'underlying equal protection claim or any specific facts tying Defendant Officers to any racially motivated intent to deprive Plaintiff of his equal protection rights.' The complaint alleges that the conspiracy was formed 'with the knowledge and purpose of depriving Plaintiff, who is African-American, and numerous other African American torture victims of the equal protection of the laws and/or of equal privilege and immunities under the law, and with racial animus toward the Plaintiff and the other victims of this racially motivated conspiracy.' . . . Accordingly, I deny the defendants' motions to dismiss Count V.")

Wiek v. Keane, No. 09 CV 920, 2010 WL 1976870, at *3 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2010) ("Wiek's amended complaint sets forth the following well-pleaded facts: (i) that the officers entered his home without a warrant, (ii) conducted a search and (iii) placed him under arrest. Nevertheless, the Defendants contend that because Wiek did not allege that the officers entered his home without probable cause, exigent circumstances, or his consent, he failed to state a claim under § 1983. The Court is persuaded that Wiek's amended complaint rises above speculation and states more than naked assertions or conclusions of law. Unlike in his original complaint, Wiek now alleges that the officers entered his home without a warrant and conducted a search. . . . He further alleges that the officers then placed him under arrest and transported him to the police station. . . The core of the Fourth Amendment is the fundamental concept that any governmental invasion into one's home or expectation of privacy must be strictly circumscribed. . . As a result, warrantless searches of one's home are presumptively unconstitutional, absent consent or exigent circumstances. . . Wiek does not bear the burden of showing a lack of probable cause or exigent circumstances. . . In addition, the circumstances of this case justify a relatively low pleading standard. This case is not as factually complex as Twombly or Iqbal. As a result, the pleading standard is not as high as what the courts used in those cases. . . Additionally, in a case such as this, Wiek may not be aware of any viable reasons that the officers had for their conduct. As such, Wiek may not be able to assert any more facts. Consequently, despite the fact that Wiek has set forth notably sparse allegations even in his amended complaint, the Court denies the Defendants' motion to dismiss Wiek's § 1983 claim against the officers.”)

McDaniel v. Elgin, No. 209-CV-119, 2010 WL 339082, at *4 (N.D. Ind. Jan. 22, 2010) (“Here, Plaintiff has made specific factual allegations that he was subjected to repeated, consistent sexual harassment, including unwelcome touching of his person, by his supervisor, Harvey, and that this has created a ‘hostile work environment.’ McDaniel alleges that after refusing Harvey’s advances, his work was ‘scrutinized down to the letter,’ he was threatened with ‘work-ups’, that he was looked over for raises and promotions, and that his employment was terminated. These factual allegations stand in contrast to the ‘[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action’ that amount to ‘legal conclusions’ that concerned the Supreme Court in Iqbal. Rather than merely making bare-boned assertions that he was ‘harassed’ or suffered an ‘adverse employment action,’ McDaniel has provided specific factual detail that would support a plausible inference of unlawful discrimination. He noted that he was inappropriately touched and that he suffered adverse treatment as a result of his gender. This is all that is required by McDaniel at this early stage of the litigation. Similarly, McDaniel has provide sufficient factual material to support a plausible inference that he was improperly subjected to unlawful retaliation in response to his filing a complaint with the Indiana Human Rights Commission and giving his deposition in another matter where Elgin is the defendant. Again, these are specific, factual allegations, not mere legal conclusions. McDaniel has alleged that he was fired in retaliation for these activities and that is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Rule 8 pleading standard as described in Iqbal. This is not to say that McDaniel’s allegations are to be believed or that there is sufficient evidence to successfully resist a motion for summary judgment. Rather, McDaniel has pleaded sufficient specific factual matter that satisfies the relatively low hurdle required by the Rule 8 liberal pleading standard and therefore dismissal of Plaintiff’s claims is not warranted.”).

Kyle v. Holina, 09-cv-90-slc, 2009 WL 1867671, at *1 (W.D. Wis. June 29, 2009) (“I agree with defendants that my conclusion must be revisited in light of Iqbal, which extended the pleading standard enunciated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), to encompass discrimination claims and implicitly overturned decades of circuit precedent in which the court of appeals had allowed discrimination claims to be pleaded in a conclusory fashion. . . . Under the Supreme Court’s new standard, an allegation of discrimination needs to be more specific.”)

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Faulk v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 30 F.4th 739, 746-48 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Faulk argues the district court properly denied Wood’s motion to dismiss, permitting Faulk to pursue discovery and Wood to renew his arguments at the summary judgment stage. There are two serious flaws in this analysis. First, it is contrary to controlling Supreme Court precedent. In Twombly, a complex antitrust conspiracy case, the Court squarely rejected this contention, adopting a more rigorous plausibility pleading standard[.] . . . In Iqbal, the Court was emphatic in applying this rule in § 1983 qualified immunity cases[.] . . . [A]pplying this principle is particularly appropriate in this case. At the district court’s direction, Faulk was permitted to engage in extensive discovery to replace John Doe Defendants with named defendants who participated in the alleged First and Fourth Amendment violations. As a result, Faulk added new defendants identified as members of the ‘arrest team’ and specific allegations of the roles played by many of the initial defendants. But as to Wood, all Faulk could factually allege in 332 paragraphs was that he was working on September 17 and took custody of Faulk’s bicycle. Requiring Wood to devote time to multi-party discovery in which Faulk fishes for something more to tie him to the ‘kettle plan’ is precisely what Iqbal precludes. After substantial discovery and access to evidentiary proceedings in Ahmad, Faulk’s lengthy FAC lacks a factual basis to infer that Officer Wood was personally involved in the constitutional violations alleged in Counts I and II. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of Officer Wood’s motion to dismiss these claims. . . . [T]he FAC does not contain specific and plausible allegations linking Wood to the overt acts that Count V alleges defendants committed against Faulk -- unlawful kettling and unlawful seizure, arrest without probable cause, use of excessive force, and detention for thirteen hours. What Count V adds are allegations that Wood ‘agreed to participate’ in violations of his civil rights and ‘shared the conspiratorial objectives’ to punish Faulk and other victims of the illegal kettling plan ‘because Defendants believed the group to be protesting police brutality.’ We conclude these allegations do not state a plausible claim of civil conspiracy against Officer Wood. ‘Without some further factual enhancement [a naked assertion of conspiracy] stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of “entitlement to relief.”’ . . . Nor does the FAC ‘contain any factual allegation sufficient to plausibly suggest [Wood’s] discriminatory state of mind.’ . . . Without factual enhancement, these naked allegations are ‘merely legal conclusions.’ . . . A conspiracy claim ‘requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.’ . . . Wood is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

Whitney v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 887 F.3d 857, 860 (8th Cir. 2018) (“The district court correctly concluded that the complaint fails to allege facts establishing the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference claim. The incorporated medical examiner’s report mentions that an unnamed medical practitioner at the Justice Center knew that Whitney was having suicidal thoughts, but nowhere does the complaint allege that this information was relayed to Sharp. The complaint contains a legal conclusion that Sharp was deliberately indifferent but fails to make any allegation about Sharp’s knowledge. This conclusory statement does not save the complaint absent any allegation of knowledge.”)

Hager v. Arkansas Dept. of Health, 735 F.3d 1009, 1015 (8th Cir. 2013) (“Hager relies primarily on Swierkiewicz. However, her complaint has far fewer factual allegations than the complaint there. In Swierkiewicz, the complaint for age and nationality discrimination alleged: the plaintiff was demoted and replaced by a younger employee of the employer's nationality; the replacement was inexperienced; in promoting the younger, inexperienced employee, the employer wanted to ‘energize’ the department; the employer excluded and isolated plaintiff from business decisions and meetings; plaintiff sent a memo outlining his grievances and tried to meet with the employer to discuss his discontent; and plaintiff was fired. . .Hager makes only two conclusory allegations of gender discrimination: (1) she ‘is a victim of gender discrimination;’ and (2) she ‘was discharged under circumstances summarily [sic] situated nondisabled males ... were not.’ She does not allege any gender-related comments or conduct before her termination. . . She also does not allege facts showing that similarly situated employees were treated differently. . .In sum, Hager does not state a § 1983 claim for gender discrimination. Hager's allegation that she is the victim of gender discrimination fails to give Dr. Zohoori fair notice of the claim and the grounds upon which it rests. . . Hager's conclusory assertion that she was discharged under circumstances similarly situated men were not imports legal language couched as a factual allegation and fails to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. . . The district court erred in denying Dr. Zohoori's motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim.”)

Hamilton v. Palm, 621 F.3d 816, 817, 818 (8th Cir. 2010) (“The only element of this claim here at issue is whether Hamilton’s complaint sufficiently alleged that the Palms were his employers. Thus, we must consider how the general principles of Twombly and Iqbal apply to the pleading of a recurring common law issue—whether a party was an employee or an independent contractor at the time in question. We conclude that, to answer this question, we need look no further than Rule 84 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides, ‘The forms in the Appendix [to the Rules] suffice under these rules....’ The rules referred to obviously include Rule 8(a)(2). The Appendix includes Forms 11-13, which set forth prototypes of various negligence complaints. Form 13, entitled ‘Complaint for Negligence Under the Federal Employers’ Liability Act,’ includes the following allegation: ‘4. During this work, the defendant, as the employer, negligently put the plaintiff to work....’ (Emphasis added.) The district court considered Form 13 irrelevant because it applies to F.E.L.A. claims by railroad workers. But that overlooks Form 13’s broader significance. As incorporated by Rule 84, Form 13 makes clear that an allegation in any negligence claim that the defendant acted as plaintiff’s ‘employer’ satisfies Rule 8(a)(2)’s notice pleading requirement for this element. Here, consistent with Form 13, Hamilton alleged that he was ‘employed’ by the Palms. Rule 84 and Form 13 may only be amended ‘by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation.’ Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 515, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (quotation omitted), distinguished in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 569-70. Therefore, the district court erred in concluding that Hamilton’s allegation of employee status, however facially conclusory it might appear to be in the abstract, failed to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2).”)

Gregory v. Dillard's, Inc., 565 F.3d 464, 473 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Even before the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), we held that a civil rights complaint ‘must contain facts which state a claim as a matter of law and must not be conclusory.’. Twombly confirmed this approach by overruling Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957), and establishing a plausibility standard for motions to dismiss. . . After Twombly, we have said that a plaintiff ‘must assert facts that affirmatively and plausibly suggest that the pleader has the right he claims . . . , rather than facts that are merely consistent with such a right.’ Stalley v. Catholic Health Initiative, 509 F.3d 517, 521 (8th Cir.2007); see Wilkerson v. New Media Tech. Charter Sch., 522 F.3d 315, 321-22 (3d Cir.2008). While a plaintiff need not set forth ‘detailed factual allegations,’ Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964, or ‘specific facts’ that describe the evidence to be presented, Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) (per curiam), the complaint must include sufficient factual allegations to provide the grounds on which the claim rests. . . A district court, therefore, is not required ‘to divine the litigant’s intent and create claims that are not clearly raised,’ Bediako, 354 F.3d at 840, and it need not ‘conjure up unpled allegations’ to save a complaint. Rios v. City of Del Rio, 444 F.3d 417, 421 (5th Cir.2006) (internal quotation omitted).”).

Brown v. City of Ferguson, Mo., No. 4:15CV00831 ERW, 2015 WL 4393960, at *3 (E.D. Mo. July 16, 2015) (“Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss regarding Plaintiffs’ Equal Protection claims will be denied. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects against discrimination on the basis of race. . . Plaintiffs’ must include allegations of intentional discrimination showing discriminatory racial purpose to establish a violation. . . ‘When the claim is selective enforcement of traffic laws or a racially-motivated arrest, the plaintiff must normally prove that similarly situated individuals were not stopped or arrested in order to show the requisite discriminatory effect and purpose.’. . Plaintiffs included numerous allegations supporting their claims Defendant City violated the Equal Protection Clause. Although Plaintiffs did not use the exact phrase ‘similarly situated individuals,’ they did include several allegations stating African-Americans were treated differently than others. . . Additionally, Plaintiffs specifically alleged Defendant City’s actions were driven by intentional discrimination. . . Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled a violation of the Equal Protection Clause; Defendants’ Motion to Dismiss on this point will be denied. . . . In their complaint, Plaintiffs have included allegations Defendant Wilson deprived them of their right to a familial relationship with their son. . . Plaintiffs also alleged Defendant Wilson’s conduct shocked the conscience of the community, and Defendant Wilson acted with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of Plaintiffs and their son. . . Although the Court may later determine Plaintiffs’ claimed liberty interest is neither an interest deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition nor clearly established, and thus find qualified immunity to apply,⁴ Plaintiffs have included sufficient allegations to satisfy the pleading standard in FRCP 8(a)(2).”).

Zumwalt v. City of Wentzville, No. 4:10CV561RWS, 2010 WL 2710496, at *8, *9 (E.D. Mo. July 7, 2010) (“Defendants have apparently confused the plausibility standard of Twombly and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009) with the fact pleading standard used in the Missouri state courts. . . . Neither Twombly nor Iqbal changed the Rule 8 pleading notice pleading requirement to fact pleading. Specific facts are not necessary; the plaintiff must only allege facts sufficient to give fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. . . In this case, Zumwalt alleges he was elected to the Local 1032 bargaining unit team. On July 6, 2009, as a Local 1032 representative, Zumwalt met in the union’s initial bargaining session with the City and its agents, servants and employees. On August 3, 2009, the bargaining team again met with the City. Zumwalt alleges that on August 6, 2009, he was notified in writing that an off-duty Foristell police officer had filed a complaint against him regarding an incident that occurred on August 1, 2009. Zumwalt also alleges that city personnel actively procured the filing of a formal complaint against him. He believes their decision to do so was based on his status as a “vocal advocate” for collective bargaining rights and his position as a member of Local 1032’s bargaining team. Based on the timing of the complaint against Zumwalt in relation to his collective bargaining negotiation activities, I find it is plausible that the reason the city employees actively procured or solicited the off-duty officer to file a complaint against Zumwalt was his participation in the collective bargaining negotiations.”)

Disability Rights Montana, Inc. v. Batista, 930 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir. 2019) (“This case is controlled by the Supreme Court’s decisions in Brown v. Plata and in Farmer v. Brennan. Under Brown v. Plata, an Eighth Amendment claim is made out if prisoners with serious mental illnesses face a substantial risk of serious harm, and this is met with deliberate indifference to their condition. This makes good sense because once persons are incarcerated, they can no longer see to their own medical needs. In these circumstances, the state, which incarcerated them and limited their ability to seek care for themselves, stands in a unique relation that requires it to provide necessary medical care and protect against serious medical risks. Under Farmer, a prisoner meets the first prong of the test for cruel and unusual punishment if he or she can show that prison policies or practices pose a ‘substantial risk of serious harm.’ The second prong is met upon showing of deliberate indifference, which, as Farmer makes clear, is shown adequately when a prison official is aware of the facts from which an inference could be drawn about the outstanding risk, and the facts permit us to infer that the prison official in fact drew that inference, but then consciously avoided taking appropriate action. Here, the facts alleged are adequate to support the claim that has been asserted under these principles. Iqbal and Twombly require only that a plausible claim be alleged, not that it can be proven with certainty. Enough facts are plausibly alleged in the complaint so that this matter should not have been dismissed without further process. We reverse the district court’s judgment and remand to a different district court judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep’t, 885 F.3d 639, 642 (9th Cir. 2018) (“We disagree with the district court that the allegation that the officers ‘beat the crap out of’ Byrd was ‘too vague and conclusory’ to support a legally cognizable claim. Byrd’s use of a colloquial, shorthand phrase makes plain that Byrd is alleging that the officers’ use of force was unreasonably excessive; this conclusion is reinforced by his allegations about the resulting injuries.”)

Rosati v. Igbinoso, 791 F.3d 1037, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2015) (“Rosati’s complaint plausibly alleges that she has severe gender dysphoria, citing repeated episodes of attempted self-castration despite continued hormone treatment. . . Rosati also alleges that the medically accepted treatment for her dysphoria is SRS, supporting that allegation with copious citations to the World Professional Association for Transgender Health (“WPATH”) Standards of Care. . . Rosati plausibly alleges that prison officials were aware of her medical history and need for treatment, but denied the surgery because of a blanket policy against SRS. Indeed, the state acknowledged at oral argument that no California prisoner has ever received SRS. . . . Even absent such a blanket policy, Rosati plausibly alleges her symptoms (including repeated efforts at self-castration) are so severe that prison officials recklessly disregarded an excessive risk to her health by denying SRS solely on the recommendation of a physician’s assistant with no experience in transgender medicine. . . . Although Rosati lacks a medical opinion recommending SRS, she plausibly alleges that this is because the state has failed to provide her access to a physician competent to evaluate her. . . . We express no opinion on whether SRS is medically necessary for Rosati or whether prison officials have other legitimate reasons for denying her that treatment. But, like other courts that have considered similar actions, we hold that the allegations in Rosati’s complaint are sufficient to state a claim.”)

Knapp v. Hogan, 738 F.3d 1106, 1110, 1111 (9th Cir. 2013) (“We hold that dismissals following the repeated violation of Rule 8(a)’s ‘short and plain statement’ requirement, following leave to amend, are dismissals for failure to state a claim under § 1915(g). While past cases have found that this type of strike is accrued by a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, they do not hold that this is the only possible way. . . . We find the reasoning of the Seventh Circuit to be persuasive: after an incomprehensible complaint is dismissed under Rule 8 and the plaintiff is given, but fails, to take advantage of the leave to amend, ‘the judge [is] left with [] a complaint that, being irremediably unintelligible, [gives] rise to an inference that the plaintiff could not state a claim.’ See Paul v. Marberry, F.3d 702, 705 (7th Cir. 2011). When a litigant knowingly and repeatedly refuses to conform his pleadings to the requirements of the Federal Rules, it is reasonable to conclude that the litigant simply cannot state a claim. Such a narrow expansion of the definition of ‘failure to state a claim’ beyond Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals is fully in harmony with the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . . Complaints that are filed in repeated and knowing violation of Federal Rule 8’s pleading requirements are a great drain on the court system, and the reviewing court cannot be expected to ‘fish a gold coin from a bucket of mud.’. Knapp accrued two strikes for the Ninth Circuit dismissals, and three additional strikes for the district court dismissals. He has more than met the requirement for a revocation of in forma pauperis status under the Prison Litigation Reform Act.”)

Panagacos v. Towery, Nos. 11–35527, 11–35538, 2012 WL 6573787, *1, *2 (9th Cir. Dec. 17, 2012) (not reported) (“The TAC alleges that Towery infiltrated plaintiffs’ peaceful anti-war protest group in order to spy on and disrupt plaintiffs’ activities. The TAC alleges, for example, that Towery identified plaintiffs to others in order to facilitate their arrest without probable cause. Rudd allegedly directed Towery’s efforts and compiled Towery’s intelligence in reports that he disseminated to other government actors. Both men allegedly coordinated with law-enforcement agencies to plan and implement strategies designed to silence the protestors. The district court correctly determined that these allegations are plausibly supported by sufficient factual detail and must be presumed true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. The TAC gives examples of specific times and places that Towery spied on plaintiffs’ meetings. It alleges that defendants met with specifically identified law-enforcement officers and agencies, and identifies specific time frames when these meetings occurred. These factual allegations are sufficient to ‘give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively.’ Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1216 (9th Cir.2011). As the district court noted, Towery and Rudd’s direct involvement in information gathering and reporting distinguishes this case from Iqbal, where conclusory allegations about the high-level government defendants’ involvement were ‘not entitled to be assumed true.’ . . . Plaintiffs have pled a plausible violation of their clearly established First Amendment rights. Plaintiffs have alleged that defendants ‘deterred or chilled the plaintiff’s political speech’ and that such deterrence motivated defendants’ conduct. . . . As a result of defendants’ information sharing and coordination with local law enforcement, plaintiffs were allegedly arrested without probable cause. These arrests allegedly disrupted plaintiffs’ peaceful protests and deterred their political speech. The TAC’s allegations also support a plausible inference that defendants were motivated by an impermissible intent to disrupt plaintiffs’ speech activities. Given plaintiffs’ strong anti-war message and defendants’ alleged illegal actions in purposefully facilitating a campaign of false arrests, it is plausible that Towery and Rudd were motivated by a desire to silence the protestors and not just by a desire to protect military shipments. . . . Finally, it is clearly established that intentionally enabling arrests without probable cause in order to suppress speech violates the First Amendment. . . . Plaintiffs have also pled plausible violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. It is clearly established that facilitating arrests without probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Beck, 527 F.3d at 863–64. The district court also correctly determined that the TAC’s allegations that Towery coordinated with local police to covertly break into a private listserve plausibly describe an unconstitutional search.”)

Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 924 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (“Given the detail in the complaint and the seriousness of the allegations, we are reluctant to dismiss the false arrest claim against Arpaio on the basis of the pleadings. Iqbal demands more of plaintiffs than bare notice pleading. . . . , but it does not require us to flyspeck complaints looking for any gap in the facts. Lacey has spun a long and sometimes repetitive narration of Arpaio’s determination to silence the New Times by any means necessary. It is a short step to infer that Arpaio was well aware of the flaws in Wilenchik’s prosecution, but welcomed the excuse to have Lacey and Larkin arrested immediately, even if he lacked probable cause. We think this is all Iqbal requires at this stage.”)

Wilhelm v. Rotman, 680 F.3d 1113, 1121, 1122 (9th Cir. 2012) (“Plaintiff filed his complaint pro se. ‘We construe pro se complaints liberally and may only dismiss a pro se complaint for failure to state a claim if it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.’ Silva v. Di Vittorio, 658 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir.2011) (internal quotation marks omitted). Iqbal did not alter the rule that, ‘where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, [courts should] construe the pleadings liberally and ... afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.’ Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks omitted).”)

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1003-05 (9th Cir. 2012) (“[T]he State defendants argue that plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against them for supervisory liability. We recently reaffirmed that a plaintiff may state a claim under § 1983 against a supervisor for deliberate indifference. Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011). . . . After thoroughly examining the plaintiffs’ complaint, we agree that there are few specific allegations against the State defendants. Most of the allegations in the complaint simply reference ‘Defendants,’ without specifying whether the conduct at issue was committed by the named State officials, County officials, or the ‘John Doe’ supervisors or caseworkers. . . .The allegations that do expressly reference the State defendants are too general to state a claim for supervisory liability. In Starr v. Baca, the plaintiff alleged that Sheriff Baca himself had been given clear notice by the Department of Justice of the specific unconstitutional conditions in the jails; that the Sheriff received numerous reports documenting inmate violence caused by the unconstitutional conduct of his deputies; and that the Sheriff ultimately acquiesced in these constitutional violations. . . . In contrast, the allegations here claim that the agencies directed by Willden and Comeaux have oversight responsibility for Clark County’s foster care system and are required to ensure that Clark County is complying with state and federal law. The complaint also alleges that all of the defendants had knowledge of independent reports documenting the systemic failures of foster care in Nevada. But it does not allege that Willden or Comeaux had any personal knowledge of the specific constitutional violations that led to Plaintiffs’ injuries, or that they had any direct responsibility to train or supervise the caseworkers employed by Clark County. The allegations that come closest to pleading personal involvement by Willden and Comeaux concern the failure to provide medical records to the children and their foster parents in order to facilitate their medical care. . . .When read together, these allegations suggest that there may be a causal connection between the State defendants’ failure to share these medical records and the injuries suffered by plaintiffs such as Henry, who received a dangerous combination of prescription drugs because his medical records were not given to his treatment providers. But even if the complaint in its current form fails to state a claim against the State officials for substantive due process violations, the district court abused its discretion by failing to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend their complaint. . . . Here, Plaintiffs offered to amend their complaint if necessary in their response to the motion to dismiss, but the district court did not grant leave to amend and did not provide any reasons for its decision. As we have already concluded, the complaint adequately pleads violations of Plaintiffs’ clearly established substantive due process rights, and it plausibly suggests an entitlement to relief from at least some of the defendants. Where the complaint falls short in some places is tying its factual allegations to particular defendants. But this type of deficiency can likely be cured by amending the complaint, and there is certainly no evidence to suggest that allowing amendment would be futile. Therefore, on remand, Plaintiffs should be given an opportunity to amend their substantive due process claims. We note that in any future proceedings in the district court, each defendant's liability must be analyzed individually using the proper standard, whether that individual is a line-level caseworker, a supervisory official, or a municipality.”)

Cafasso, U.S. ex rel. v. General Dynamics C4 Systems, Nos. 09-16181, 09-16607, 09-177102011 WL 1053366, at *4 & n.6 (9th Cir. Mar. 24, 2011) (“Until now, we have not had occasion explicitly to confirm that Iqbal’s plausibility requirement applies to claims subject to Rule 9(b). We have, however, said that ‘complaints alleging fraud must comply with both [Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] 8(a) and 9(b).’ . . . Because Rule 8(a) requires the pleading of a plausible claim, Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949- 50, we hold that claims of fraud or mistake—including FCA claims—must, in addition to pleading with particularity, also plead plausible allegations. . . . Iqbal and its ‘plausibility’ standard have been the subject of serious and thoughtful criticism. . . . Also, at least one state court has disagreed with the wisdom of Iqbal and declined to adopt its plausibility standard for state court pleadings. McCurry v. Chevy Chase Bank, FSB, 233 P.3d 861, 863-64 (Wash. 2010). Nonetheless, pleading requirements for the federal courts have departed from the traditional Rule 8 standard under Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47-48 (1957); under Iqbal, the pleading standard has changed and plausibility is required.”)

Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 939-42 (9th Cir. 2012) (on remand from the Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Ashcroft v. Iqbal) (“As discussed in more detail below, after reviewing the Supreme Court’s decision in Iqbal, the parties’ supplemental briefs, and our court’s recent decision in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), we now hold that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs’ claims for money damages. The conclusory allegations in Plaintiffs’ Second Amended Complaint are insufficient to establish Defendants’ individual liability for money damages. Our holding, however, is limited. Qualified immunity is only an immunity from a suit for money damages, and does not provide immunity from a suit seeking declaratory or injunctive relief. . . . Accordingly, on remand, the Plaintiffs may proceed with their claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. . . . As discussed in greater detail below, in the case before us, the factual allegations in Plaintiffs’ complaint resemble the ‘bald’ and ‘conclusory’ allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr. . . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs pleaded insufficient facts to establish ‘plausible’ claims against the Defendants in their individual capacities and the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Plaintiffs’ complaint proceeds under two theories of liability against the Defendants in their individual capacities. Plaintiffs allege that the Defendants are: (a) liable for their own conduct because they created policies and procedures that violated the Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights; and, (b) liable because they were deliberately indifferent to their subordinates’ constitutional violations. . . . Plaintiffs’ allegations fail to state claims against Defendants in their individual capacities under either theory of liability. Plaintiffs’ complaint is based on conclusory allegations and generalities, without any allegation of the specific wrong-doing by each Defendant. For example, Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim alleges that Defendants' 'policies, practices and customs subject [Plaintiffs] to unreasonable searches; searches as a form of punishment; degrading public strip searches; improper seizures of personal belongings; and the use of unreasonable force and physical restraints.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches. Plaintiffs' remaining claims suffer from the same infirmities. Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claim alleges that 'Defendants have personal knowledge of retaliation against [the Plaintiffs] for participation in lawsuits, but Defendants' policies, practices and customs permit and encourage retaliation.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy or custom, nor are there specific allegations regarding each Defendant's purported knowledge of the retaliation. The remainder of Plaintiffs' claims are likewise devoid of specifics. The absence of specifics is significant because, to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1448. Even under a 'deliberate indifference' theory of individual liability, the Plaintiffs must still allege sufficient facts to plausibly establish the defendant's 'knowledge of' and 'acquiescence in' the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates. Starr, 652 F.3d at 1206–07. In short, Plaintiffs' 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations are insufficient to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1215-17 (9th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("The juxtaposition of Swierkiewicz and Erickson, on the one hand, and Dura, Twombly, and Iqbal, on the other, is perplexing. Even though the Court stated in all five cases that it was applying Rule 8(a), it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, in fact, the Court applied a higher pleading standard in Dura, Twombly and Iqbal. The Court in Dura and Twombly appeared concerned that in some complex commercial cases the usual lenient pleading standard under Rule 8(a) gave too much settlement leverage to plaintiffs. That is, if a non-specific complaint was enough to survive a motion to dismiss, plaintiffs would be able to extract undeservedly high settlements from deep-pocket companies. In Iqbal, by contrast, the Court was concerned that the usual lenient standard under Rule 8(a) would provide too little protection for high-level executive branch officials who allegedly engaged in misconduct in the aftermath of September 11, 2001. To the extent that we perceive a difference in the application of Rule 8(a) in the two groups of cases, it is difficult to know in cases that come before us whether we should apply the more lenient or the more demanding standard. But whatever the difference between these cases, we can at least state the following two principles common to all of them. First, allegations in a complaint or counterclaim must be sufficiently detailed to give fair notice to the opposing party of the nature of the claim so that the party may effectively defend against it. Second, the allegations must be sufficiently plausible that it is not unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery. . . . Viewed in the light of all of the Supreme Court's recent cases, we hold that the allegations of Starr's complaint satisfy the standard of Rule 8(a). We do not so hold merely because Starr's complaint, like the complaint in Erickson, alleges deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Rather, we so hold because his complaint complies with the two principles just stated. First, Starr's complaint specifically alleges numerous incidents in which inmates in Los Angeles County jails have been killed or injured because of the culpable actions of the subordinates of Sheriff Baca. The complaint specifically alleges that Sheriff Baca was given notice of all of these incidents. It specifically alleges, in addition, that Sheriff Baca was given notice, in several reports, of systematic problems in the county jails under his supervision that have resulted in these deaths and injuries. Finally, it alleges that Sheriff Baca did not take action to protect inmates under his care despite the dangers, created by the actions of his subordinates, of which he had been made aware. These allegations are neither 'bald' nor 'conclusory.' . . . Rather, they are sufficiently detailed to give notice to Sheriff Baca of the nature of Starr's claim against him and to give him a fair opportunity to defend against it. . . . Second, the factual allegations in Starr's complaint plausibly suggest that Sheriff Baca acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, and was thereby deliberately indifferent to the danger posed to Starr. There is no 'obvious alternative explanation,' within the meaning of Iqbal, for why Sheriff Baca took no action to stop his subordinates' repeated violations of prisoners' constitutional rights despite being repeatedly confronted with those violations, such that the alternative explanation requires us to conclude that Starr's explanation 'is not a plausible conclusion.' . . . If there are two alternative explanations, one advanced by defendant and the other advanced by plaintiff, both of which are plausible, plaintiff's complaint survives a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Plaintiff's complaint may be dismissed only when defendant's plausible alternative explanation is so convincing that plaintiff's explanation is implausible. The standard at this stage of the litigation is not that plaintiff's explanation must be true or even probable. The factual allegations of the complaint need only 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.' . . . As the Court wrote in Twombly, Rule 8(a) 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' to support the allegations. . . . Starr's complaint satisfies that standard. . . . We hold that the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal did not alter the substantive requirements for supervisory liability claims in an unconstitutional conditions of confinement case under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments where deliberate indifference is alleged. We further hold that Starr has sufficiently alleged under Rule 8(a) a supervisory liability claim of deliberate indifference against Sheriff Baca. We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of Starr's claim against Sheriff Baca and remand for further proceedings.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1218, 1219, 1221 (9th Cir. 2011) (Trott, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("Alleging that the Sheriff 'could' have known, 'should' have known, and 'should' have become aware is tantamount to admitting that Starr had no facts to support his allegations. The test that governs this case consists of two words, not one. Indifference is not enough. For indifference to be actionable, it must be deliberate. Starr's conclusory allegations amount to no more than formulaic flak fired into the sky in an attempt to bring down the squadron leader. When we cease to look at the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department (LASD) as an abstraction and look at the reality, we see good reasons for requiring facts before permitting lawsuits against the Sheriff himself: the agency is gigantic. The LASD is the largest Sheriff's Department in the world. It covers 3,171 square miles, 2,557,754 residents, and by contract 42 of the 88 incorporated cities in Los Angeles County. The Department employs 8,400 law enforcement officers and 7,600 civilians and is responsible for 48 courthouses and 23 substations. The Men's Central Jail alone houses a revolving population of 5,000 inmates. In addition, the Department operates the Twin Towers Correctional Facility, the Mira Loma Detention Facility, the Pitchess Detention Center, and the North County Correctional Center. Persons charged with or convicted of crimes are in over one hundred different locations. The layers of administration and management between what happens in a jail are many and they are complex. To infer that specific incidents which occur in a jail are necessarily known by the Sheriff is to engage in fallacious logic. This complexity does not absolve the Department of responsibility for respecting the constitutional rights and general well-being of its charges, but it does show how inappropriate it is to sue the Sheriff individually unless in terms of causation the Sheriff can be personally tied to the actionable behavior at issue. Just being a disappointing or even an insufficiently engaged public servant is not enough. Those issues are for the ballot box and the County Board of Supervisors, not the courts. . . . The days of pleading conclusions without factual support accompanied by the wishful hope of finding something juicy during discovery are over. Wisely, we have moved up judgment day to the complaint stage rather than bog down the courts and parties with pre-summary judgment combat. This conclusion, of course, does not leave Starr without redress. He may sue the Sheriff in his official capacity, which is the same as suing the County of Los Angeles and the Sheriff's Department, and he may pursue his lawsuit on the ground of official policy or longstanding custom and practice—but he may not sue the Sheriff individually just because he is the Sheriff.”)

Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2010) (“Because Hebbe is an inmate who proceeded pro se, his complaint ‘must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers,’ as the Supreme Court has reaffirmed since Twombly. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam). Iqbal incorporated the Twombly pleading standard and Twombly did not alter courts’ treatment of pro se filings; accordingly, we continue to construe pro se filings liberally when evaluating them under Iqbal. . . . We therefore join the five other circuits that have determined that pro se complaints should continue to be liberally construed after Iqbal. See McGowan v. Hulick, 612 F.3d 636, 640-42 (7th Cir.2010); Bustos v. Martini Club Inc., 599 F.3d 458, 461-62 (5th Cir.2010); Casanova v. Ulibarri, 595 F.3d 1120, 1124 n. 2, 1125 (10th Cir.2010); Capogrosso v. Sup.Ct. of N.J., 588 F.3d 180, 184 & n. 1 (3d Cir.2009); Harris v. Mills, 572 F.3d 66, 71-72 (2d Cir.2009) (noting that even following Twombly and Iqbal, ‘we remain obligated to construe a pro se complaint liberally’). . . . While the standard is higher, our ‘obligation’ remains, ‘where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, to construe the pleadings liberally and to afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.’ Bretz v. Kelman, 773 F.2d 1026, 1027 n. 1 (9th Cir.1985) (en banc).”).

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 969 (9th Cir. 2010) (“Krainski failed to allege in her complaint or at oral argument any facts suggesting that any of the officers had a reason to suspect the falsity of the statements made by the victim and two other university employees; instead, she merely alleged in a conclusory fashion that the officers ‘knew, or should have known, that the allegations ... were false’ and that they failed to conduct an adequate investigation. The record does not contain any information that would create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers had facts sufficiently detailed to cause a reasonable person to believe a crime had been committed and that Krainski was the perpetrator. We conclude that qualified immunity applies, as ‘a reasonable police officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful’ when arresting a suspect following a report from two university employees and a student alleging an attack. We thus affirm the district court’s dismissal of Krainski’s Amendment Fourth cause of action against the UNLV Employees based on the defendants’ entitlement to qualified immunity.”).

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2010) (B. Fletcher, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The district court erred by dismissing Krainski’s Fourth Amendment claim and abused its discretion by dismissing the complaint without leave to amend. I therefore respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority’s opinion that affirms the district court’s decision in those respects. If the UNLV police officers who arrested Krainski knew or should have known that the allegations against her were false, the police officers would have violated the Fourth Amendment’s clearly established prohibitions. . . The majority, however, deems Krainski’s Fourth Amendment claim too conclusory to survive. Krainski’s complaint is more than ‘legal conclusions’ or a ‘recital[] of the elements of a cause of action,’ Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 1950 (2009), because she alleges more than simply that UNLV police lacked probable cause to arrest her. She alleges in some detail the factual circumstances under which the arrest took place. . . She also alleges facts that explain why the police lacked probable cause— namely, that the police ‘knew, or should have known, that the allegations [against her] were false.’ That allegation is enough to satisfy Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) and to survive a motion under Rule 12(b)(6). The Supreme Court has expressly approved as adequate an analogous complaint alleging negligence. Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 513 n. 4 (2002) (quoting Fed.R.Civ.P. app. Form 9 (2000)). . . . Krainski has adequately stated a claim for a violation of the Fourth Amendment.”).

Alvarez v. Hill, 518 F.3d 1152, 1159 (9th Cir. 2008) (“Appellees’ rigid insistence that RLUIPA claims must be specifically pled in the plaintiff’s complaint is without support in our precedent and frankly puzzling in view of the lenience traditionally afforded pro se pleadings and of RLUIPA’s manifest purpose of protecting ‘institutionalized persons who are unable freely to attend to their religious needs.’ . . The ‘simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions’ provided for by rule or by statute. . . Accordingly, we hold that RLUIPA claims need satisfy only the ordinary requirements of notice pleading , and that a complaint’s failure to cite RLUIPA does not preclude the plaintiff from subsequently asserting a claim based on that statute. Under this pleading standard, it is sufficient that the complaint, alone or supplemented by any subsequent filings before summary judgment, provide the defendant fair notice that the plaintiff is claiming relief under RLUIPA as well as the First Amendment.”).

Walker v. Wechsler, No. 116CV01417JLTPC, 2016 WL 5930420, at *2 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 12, 2016) (“While ‘plaintiffs [now] face a higher burden of pleadings facts ...,’ . . . the pleadings of pro se inmates and detainees are still construed liberally and are afforded the benefit of any doubt. Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir. 2010). . . . If he chooses to file a first amended complaint, Plaintiff should endeavor to make it as concise as possible. He should merely state which of his constitutional rights he feels were violated by each named defendant and its factual basis. Plaintiff need not and should not cite legal authority for his claims in a first amended complaint. His factual allegations are accepted as true and need not be bolstered by legal authority at the pleading stage. If Plaintiff files a first amended complaint, his factual allegations will be screened under the legal standards and authorities stated in this order.”)

Sablan v. A.B. Won Pat Intern. Airport Authority, Guam, Civil No. 10-00013, 2010 WL 5148202, at *4 (D. Guam Dec. 9, 2010) (“Now, when evaluating employment discrimination complaints in the context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, district courts in the Ninth Circuit are proceeding on the premise that although it may not be necessary that the complaint have facts constituting all the elements of a prima facie in order to survive the motion to dismiss, those elements are nonetheless relevant to the court’s analysis of the sufficiency of the complaint. [collecting cases] Common to all these cases is the recognition that although the elements of a prima facie employment discrimination case constitute ‘an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement’ (Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 514), Twombly and Iqbal have indisputably pushed pleading standards a bit back in the direction of fact pleading. Courts therefore must look at a complaint in light of the relevant ‘evidentiary standard,’ in order to decide whether it ‘contain[s] sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to “state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.”’. . . The idea, then, is not that Swierkiewicz has been overruled, but rather that, after Twombly and Iqbal, an employment discrimination plaintiff must get closer to alleging a prima facie case than was necessary a few years ago.”)

Microsoft Corp. v. Phoenix Solutions, Inc., 741 F.Supp.2d 1156, 1159 (C.D. Cal. 2010) (“This Court agrees with the Federal Circuit and those district courts that have held that a party alleging direct infringement need only comply with Form 18. A patentee ‘need only plead facts sufficient to place the alleged infringer on notice as to what he must defend.’. . . This Court additionally reasons that minimal pleading of direct infringement is sufficient because this Court requires the prompt filing of infringement contentions, which put the party accused of infringement on detailed notice of the basis for the allegations against it. Correspondingly, the Court finds that a declaratory judgment claim of no direct infringement need only plead facts to put the patentee on notice and need not be subject to the heightened pleading standards of Twombly and Iqbal. . . . All other claims, counterclaims and affirmative defenses in a patent case are subject to the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal, except for inequitable conduct.”)

Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09-CV-1015 AWI DLB, 2010 WL 2867287, at *4, *5 (E.D. Cal. July 21, 2010) (“If Lucas intends to allege a manufacturing defect, he must identify/explain how the taser weapon either deviated from Taser Int.'s intended result/design or how the taser weapon deviated from other seemingly identical taser models. . . A bare allegation that the taser weapon had 'a manufacturing defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949-50. If Lucas intends to allege a design defect claim, he should identify which design defect theory he wishes to utilize. Under the consumer expectations test, Lucas 'should describe how the [taser weapon] failed to meet the minimum safety expectations of an ordinary consumer' of taser weapons... Under the risk-benefits test, Lucas should allege that the risks of the design outweigh the benefits, and then 'explain how the particular design of the [taser weapon] caused [Lucas] harm.'. Again, a bare allegation that the taser weapon suffered from a 'design defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion...Dismissal of tenth cause of action is appropriate because the complaint contains no factual allegations that identify what aspect of the subject taser's design and manufacture made it defective. Since it is not clear that amendment would be futile, the Court will dismiss the SAC with leave to amend.")

Ernst v. Cate, No. 1:08-cv-01940-OWW-GSA, 2009 WL 3818227, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2009) ("Plaintiff's second cause of action is the only claim in which plaintiff contends that the defendants, including Cate, acted intentionally. First, plaintiff alleges, 'The defendants decided to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' (doc. 16, & 33). Later, plaintiff claims, 'Defendants discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons' (doc. 16, & 36). Because plaintiff provides no factual support for these legal conclusions, he fails to satisfy the pleading standards set forth in Iqbal and Twombly. Although a court evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is instructed to assume the truth of all factual allegations of the plaintiff and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, it need not accept as true unreasonable inferences or conclusory allegations masquerading as facts. . . . That the CDCR Secretary and Assistant Director acted in concert with two corrections officers 'to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' strains credulity. Similarly, the underlying facts offer nothing to suggest that Cate 'discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons.'").

Doe ex rel. Gonzales v. Butte Valley Unified School Dist., No. CIV. 09-245 WBS CMK, 2009 WL 2424608, at *8, *9 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 6, 2009) ("Although Iqbal's majority opinion itself did not intimate any seachange, jurists and legal commentators have observed that the decision marks a striking retreat from the highly permissive pleading standards often thought to distinguish the federal system from " 'the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era,' 129 S.Ct. at 1949. . . Prior to Iqbal, many courts—including this court and, apparently, the Supreme Court itself—read Rule 8 to express a 'willingness to allow [] lawsuits based on conclusory allegations ... to go forward,'". . . . Indeed, for over half a century, district courts had been instructed that the 'short plain statement' required by Rule 8 'must simply give the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.”. . . Now, however, even the official Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Forms, which were touted as ‘sufficient under the rules and ... intended to indicate the simplicity and brevity of the statement which the rules contemplate,’ Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 84, have been cast into doubt by Iqbal. . . Accordingly, although the court will grant in part defendants’ motion to dismiss, the court will also permit plaintiff leave to amend. Plaintiff, however, is admonished to thoroughly and carefully set forth his allegations in any subsequent amended complaint, as both judicial resources and fairness to defendants preclude unlimited opportunities to amend the pleadings.”).

Ibrahim v. Department of Homeland Sec., No. C 06-00545 WHA, 2009 WL 2246194, at *10 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2009) (“Ibrahim has not pleaded that defendants took action because of and not merely in spite of her being Muslim and a Malaysian citizen. That plaintiff was Muslim and detained is not enough to draw an inference of discrimination under the Iqbal standard. No additional facts, such as derogatory statements, are alleged. Accordingly, as pled, the discrimination claims against San Francisco officers or Bondanella are insufficient. A good argument can be made that the Iqbal standard is too demanding. Victims of discrimination and profiling will often not have specific facts to plead without the benefit of discovery. District judges, however, must follow the law as laid down by the Supreme Court. Yet, the harshness is mitigated here. Counsel for the San Francisco defendants and Bondanella admit that plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment claim can go forward. This means that discovery will go forward. During discovery, Ibrahim can inquire into facts that bear on the incident, including why her name was on the list. If enough facts emerge, then she can move to amend and to reassert her discrimination claims at that time.”).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1144-45, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018) (“In its order denying the caseworkers’ motion to dismiss, the district court opined that the caseworkers, rather than making any individualized arguments, ‘collectively’ asserted the defense of qualified immunity. . . The caseworkers, according to the court, argued only that the complaint’s factual allegations were not ‘conscience shocking.’. . Therefore, instead of asking whether the complaint stated a claim under the special relationship exception as to each caseworker, the district court only asked whether the complaint alleged ‘any possible claims’ that shocked the conscience. . . The district court’s approach constituted error because it shifted the burden to the caseworkers to establish their entitlement to qualified immunity. Perhaps the advocacy of the caseworkers’ trial counsel in the district court was less than stellar. But where multiple state actors raise a qualified immunity defense in a motion to dismiss, ‘good as to one, good as to all’ is never the proper approach to adjudicating the sufficiency of the complaint. . . Before a court may undertake the proper analysis, the complaint must ‘isolate the allegedly unconstitutional acts of each defendant’; otherwise the complaint does not ‘provide adequate notice as to the nature of the claims against each’ and fails for this reason. . . Here, the caseworkers’ assertion of qualified immunity in their motion, an assertion they made multiple times therein, gave rise to a presumption that they were immune from suit. . . This presumption operated such that when the caseworkers raised the defense of qualified immunity, the burden shifted to Plaintiffs to demonstrate the complaints' factual allegations established their right to recover against each caseworker. . . If Plaintiffs then failed to establish either prong of the qualified immunity analysis as to any caseworker, that caseworker was entitled to prevail on his or her defense. . . In sum, the burden was on Plaintiffs to overcome the presumption of immunity that arose as to each individual caseworker once the caseworkers raised the qualified immunity defense. Pahls tells us exactly this. There we explained that to state a viable § 1983 claim and overcome a qualified immunity defense, plaintiffs 'must establish that each defendant ... [violated] plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights.... Plaintiffs must do more than show ... that "defendants," as a collective and undifferentiated whole, were responsible for those violations.' . . What this means for our purposes is that every named Plaintiff had the burden of adequately pleading every element of his or her claim under the special relationship exception—including the existence of a special relationship between himself or herself and the State—against one or more named caseworkers. Whether a plaintiff has adequately pled a special relationship with the State should be the first inquiry in cases like this. 'The existence of the special relationship is the pivotal issue.' . . In its absence, an ODHS caseworker cannot be held liable under the special relationship exception to a Plaintiff suffering injuries at the hands of Jerry and Deidre Matthews—no matter how shocking the complaint's factual allegations. . . .Discovery may proceed on Plaintiff M.S.'s claim against Defendant Bergdorf because in 2005 the law was well established such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the governing law would have understood Bergdorf's failure to protect M.S. in light of child abuse and neglect allegations might give rise to constitutional liability under the special relationship exception. . . Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Bergdorf's defense of qualified immunity as to M.S.'s particular claim against her. To the extent the complaint otherwise purports to state any cause of action under the special relationship exception, however, the district court, for the reasons stated, erred in denying the caseworkers qualified immunity.") Ghailani v. Sessions, 859 F.3d 1295, 1304-06 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The district court dismissed Mr. Ghailani's religious freedom claim with prejudice on the basis that he failed to meet the requirements of Gee in his complaint, i.e., that he did not include facts showing the regulations restricting his ability to pray Jumu'ah were not related to a legitimate penological interest. We agree with this analysis as applied to Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim. However, Mr. Ghailani also pled that the restriction on his ability to pray was a violation of RFRA. The district court erred in applying the same pleading requirement to the RFRA claim as it did to the constitutional religious freedom claim. . . . Because the Turner standard does not apply to a RFRA claim, a prisoner-plaintiff clearly need not plead facts showing 'that the actions of which he complains were not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests,' as Gee required for First Amendment claims. Accordingly, while the district court properly dismissed Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim alleging that the prison violated his free exercise rights by not allowing him to pray Jumu'ah, it erred in dismissing his RFRA claim. Moreover, just as Mr. Ghailani did not need to plead facts showing the government lacked a legitimate penological interest, he also did not need to plead facts showing that the restrictions were not in ‘furtherance of a compelling governmental interest’ and were not ‘the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest.’ 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-1(b)(1)-(2). Subsection (b) of RFRA is an ‘affirmative defense,’ and ‘the burden is placed squarely on the Government by RFRA.’”)

Vega v. Davis, 572 F. App’x 611, 618-19 (10th Cir. 2014) (“In his response brief, the plaintiff essentially argues that the warden could be liable for any suicide by a mentally ill person in the Control Unit because of his knowledge that there were mentally ill people in the Control Unit that were not receiving mental health services. However, the complaint’s only non-conclusory fact supporting the inference that Davis knew about the lack of treatment in the Control Unit was his single visit there. Although it is certainly possible that on his tour he witnessed enough in the Control Unit to make it obvious that there was a systematic denial of mental health care, we conclude from our ‘judicial experience and common sense’ that a single visit does not ‘plausibly suggest’ that Davis knew enough to be deliberately indifferent to Control Unit inmates. . . . Certainly, there is much in this complaint that, if true, is deeply concerning. However, we are counseled by Iqbal to remember that ‘each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.’. . . The fact that allegations in this complaint, if true, expose significant shortcomings in the treatment of mentally-ill prisoners at ADX cannot negate that requirement.”)

Kansas Penn Gaming, LLC v. Collins, 656 F.3d 1210, 1219, 1220 (10th Cir. 2011) (“[I]n the wake of Twombly and Iqbal, and consistent with our cases establishing a more refined analytical framework for class-of-one claims, we must apply the plausibility standard with care. As at least one circuit has found, in light of Iqbal, a generalized pleading in the mold of Olech is no longer sufficient to state a class-of-one claim. Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55 (2d Cir.2010), cert. denied, 131 S.Ct. 824 (2010). In that case, for example, the Second Circuit upheld the dismissal of plaintiffs’ claim against the defendant town, for failure to set out specific examples of similarly situated individuals and differing treatment. . . . We likewise dismissed a class-of-one claim on similar grounds in an unpublished but representative opinion. See Glover v. Mabrey, 384 F. App’x 763, 778 (10th Cir.2010) (“[Plaintiff] has failed to allege, as it must, the identity or characteristics of other, similarly situated contractors and how those similarly situated contractors were treated differently.”). . . . With these principles in mind, and consistent with our holdings in Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1247, 1253 and Smith, 561 F.3d at 1098, plaintiffs must offer enough specific factual allegations to ‘nudge[] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.’. . . . As we discussed above, after Twombly and Iqbal, it is insufficient to simply allege that other, unidentified properties have ‘comparable’ or ‘similar’ conditions—the claim must be supported by specific facts plausibly suggesting the conditions on the properties and the properties themselves are similar in all material respects. These cursory allegations are inadequate to support any class-of-one claim. But they are particularly problematic here, where the complaint addresses the inherently subjective and individualized enforcement of health and safety regulations. Unlike Olech, this is not a case where the regulatory decision is a simple, one-dimensional inquiry, resolved with a tape measure. Rather, Kansas Penn challenges an act of regulatory enforcement that implicates a ‘multiplicity of relevant (nondiscriminatory) variables,’ ‘from the relative culpability of the defendants to the optimal deployment of prosecutorial resources,’ making it ‘correspondingly more difficult to bring an equal protection claim.’ . . . Because Kansas Penn has failed to allege facts suggesting that other property owners were similarly situated in all material respects, the district court did not err in dismissing the complaint.”)

Gee v. Pacheco, 627 F.3d 1178, 1185, 1186 (10th Cir. 2010) (“Although the plausibility standard has been criticized by some as placing an improper burden on plaintiffs, denying them proper access to the courts, that criticism ordinarily would not apply to the restrictions on prisoner complaints described above. One of the chief concerns of critics is that plaintiffs will need discovery before they can satisfy plausibility requirements when there is asymmetry of information, with the defendants having all the evidence. But prisoners claiming constitutional violations by officers within the prison will rarely suffer from information asymmetry. Not only do prisoners ordinarily know what has happened to them; but they will have learned how the institution has defended the challenged conduct when they pursue the administrative claims that they must bring as a prerequisite to filing suit. . . . Of course, if the complaint alleges that the prisoner received no explanation in the grievance process (or was coerced into not pursuing a grievance), the claim that an officer’s conduct lacked justification may become plausible. To be sure, a pro se prisoner may fail to plead his allegations with the skill necessary to state a plausible claim even when the facts would support one. But ordinarily the dismissal of a pro se claim under Rule 12(b)(6) should be without prejudice, . . . and a careful judge will explain the pleading’s deficiencies so that a prisoner with a meritorious claim can then submit an adequate complaint[.]”)

Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995, 1002 (10th Cir. 2010) (amended complaint “plausibly asserted the requisite casual connection between [prosecutor’s] conduct and the search and seizure that occurred at [plaintiff’s] home.”)

Smith v. U.S., 561 F.3d 1090, 1104, 1105 (10th Cir. 2009) (“To state an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim, Smith had to allege that each defendant official. . . acted with deliberate indifference—that he or she both knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . . As the litigation progresses, it is possible the government will produce evidence showing that some or all of the individual defendants did not know that the 1994 Ramsey-Schilling survey disclosed the presence of asbestos in the closet, or more generally, that an individual defendant did not know of the presence of asbestos in the closet, based on simple lack of knowledge or intervening circumstances. However, these are matters to be determined at a later point in this case. Smith has satisfied the standard enunciated in Robbins—the defendants are on fair notice of who is alleged to have done what to whom, Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1249—as to all defendants named in their individual capacities other than Alberto Gonzales and H. Lappin (the director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons).”).

Choate v. Lemmings, Nos. 07-7099, 07-7100, 08-7010, 2008 WL 4291199, at *5 (10th Cir. Sept. 22, 2008) (not reported) (“The Supreme Court made clear in Gomez that there is no basis for imposing on a § 1983 plaintiff the obligation to anticipate and plead around the qualified immunity defense. . . More recently, in the wake of Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), this court specifically rejected a heightened pleading standard for civil rights plaintiffs facing the immunity defense. See Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 916-917 (10th Cir.2001). A § 1983 complaint needs but two allegations to state a cause of action: (1) that the plaintiff was deprived of a federal right; and (2) that the person who deprived him acted under color of state law. . . Moreover, these allegations need not be pled with specificity. All that is required are ‘sufficient facts, that when taken as true, provide plausible grounds that discovery will reveal evidence to support plaintiff’s allegations.’”).

Briggs v. Johnson, No. 07-6037, 2008 WL 1815721, at *4-*6(10th Cir. Apr. 23, 2008) (not published) (“Construing his complaint in the light most favorable to him, Briggs has alleged that Defendants, Jean Bonner, and Carla Lynch, acting in concert, instructed at least one person to cease reporting ongoing abuse perpetrated against Kelsey. Clearly, this conduct was directed specifically at Kelsey, not the public at large. Further, it is evident from a reading of the entire complaint that Kelsey’s guardian, her paternal grandmother, was involved in reporting that Kelsey was being abused during her unsupervised visits with Smith. As we recognized in Currier, the act of instructing individuals to cease reporting abuse has the effect of impeding access to protective services or other sources of assistance otherwise promptly available to the victim at the time of the abuse. . . Thus, if true, Defendants’ actions imposed an immediate threat of harm to Kelsey which was limited in range and duration. Accordingly, we conclude Briggs has sufficiently alleged that Defendants created or increased Kelsey’s vulnerability to abuse by their alleged act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse. . . . Briggs’s complaint differs from the complaint we concluded was insufficient in a recent case also involving allegations of substantive due process violations by state employees. See Robbins, 2008 WL 747132, at *5-*8. In contrast to the complaint in Robbins, Briggs’s allegation that Defendants discouraged the reporting of additional incidents of abuse is specific enough to give Defendants fair notice of the grounds on which he claims entitlement to relief. Based on this allegation, the district court had no difficulty applying Currier to determine that the constitutional right asserted was clearly established. . . . We affirm the denial of Defendants’ motion to dismiss to the extent they assert an entitlement to qualified immunity on Briggs’s danger creation claim predicated on their act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse.”)

VanZandt v. Oklahoma Dept. of Human Services, 276 F. App’x 843, 2008 WL 1945344, at *3 (10th Cir. May 5, 2008) (“This Court, in Robbins, stated that plausibility serves two purposes: (1) to weed out claims that, absent additional pleadings, do not have a reasonable prospect of success, and (2) to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. . . A court, therefore, must review a complaint with these purposes in mind. Not surprisingly, the Twombly Court is critical of complaints that do not mention specific times, places or people involved. . . This Court also acknowledged that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice is dependant on the context of the case involved. . . Although we apply the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally, complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. . . The Twombly standard has greater ‘bite’ in these contexts, ‘reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity at the earliest stage of a litigation.’ . . Therefore, in § 1983 cases, a plaintiff must ‘make clear exactly who is alleged to have done what to whom, to provide each individual with fair notice as to the basis of the claims against him or her....’ . . Of course, neither Twombly nor Robbins requires, and we do not demand, the sort of specificity required in claims subject to Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b). . . . To carry their burden, plaintiffs under the Twombly standard must do more than generally use the collective term ‘defendants.’ . . This Court, in Robbins, placed great importance on the need for a plaintiff to differentiate between the actions of each individual defendant and the actions of the group as a whole. . . This is because the purposes of plausibility, notice and gatekeeping, are best served by requiring plaintiffs to directly link an actual individual with the alleged improper conduct.”).

Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1247-50 (10th Cir. 2008) (“We are not the first to acknowledge that the new formulation is less than pellucid. See Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 157 (2d Cir.2007) (referring to the ‘conflicting signals’ in the Twombly opinion); Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 2008 WL 305025, at *3 (3d Cir. Feb. 5, 2008) (calling the opinion ‘confusing’). As best we understand it, however, the opinion seeks to find a middle ground between ‘heightened fact pleading,’ which is expressly rejected . . . and allowing complaints that are no more than ‘labels and conclusions’ or ‘a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action,’ which the Court stated ‘will not do.’ . . The most difficult question in interpreting Twombly is what the Court means by ‘plausibility.’ The Court states that the complaint must contain ‘enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.’ . . But it reiterates the bedrock principle that a judge ruling on a motion to dismiss must accept all allegations as true and may not dismiss on the ground that it appears unlikely the allegations can be proven. . . . Thus, ‘plausible’ cannot mean ‘likely to be true.’ Rather, ‘plausibility’ in this context must refer to the scope of the allegations in a complaint: if they are so general that they encompass a wide swath of conduct, much of it innocent, then the plaintiffs ‘have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.’ . . The allegations must be enough that, if assumed to be true, the plaintiff plausibly (not just speculatively) has a claim for relief. . . This requirement of plausibility serves not only to weed out claims that do not (in the absence of additional allegations) have a reasonable prospect of success, but also to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. ‘Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only ‘fair notice’ of the nature of the claim, but also ‘grounds’ on which the claim rests.’ . . . The Twombly Court was particularly critical of complaints that ‘mentioned no specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies.’ . . . The Third Circuit has noted, and we agree, that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice, and therefore the need to include sufficient factual allegations, depends on context: ‘Context matters in notice pleading. Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case....’ [citing Phillips] The context of this case is a claim of qualified immunity by state officials or employees who were sued for damages in their personal capacity for injuries to a child inflicted by a third party. . . .To ‘nudge their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible,’ Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1974, in this context, plaintiffs must allege facts sufficient to show (assuming they are true) that the defendants plausibly violated their constitutional rights, and that those rights were clearly established at the time. . . . Although we apply ‘the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally,’ . . . complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. The Twombly standard may have greater bite in such contexts, appropriately reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity ‘at the earliest possible stage of a litigation.’ . . . Given the complaint’s use of either the collective term ‘Defendants’ or a list of the defendants named individually but with no distinction as to what acts are attributable to whom, it is impossible for any of these individuals to ascertain what particular unconstitutional acts they are alleged to have committed. . . . In addition to the failure of Count I to satisfy the standard of fair notice required by Rule 8, the plaintiffs do not allege facts sufficient to render their [state-created-danger and equal protection] claim[s] plausible.”)

Dorf v. City of Evansville, No. 11–CV–351–S, 2012 WL 1440343, at *4, *5 & n.2 (D. Wyo. Apr. 22, 2012) (“In noting that Plaintiff’s allegations are made ‘upon information and belief,’ the Court does not suggest that such allegations made are improper under Iqbal and Twombly. As the Sixth Circuit recently observed, the plausibility standard of Iqbal and Twombly:

does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged upon information and belief where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible.

Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). Here, however, even though Plaintiffs’ allegations are made ‘upon information and belief,’ there is simply no ‘factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . Nor is the nature of Officer Pena’s alleged prior misconduct a matter that is ‘peculiarly within the possession and control’ of defendants.”)

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

McCullough v. Finley, 907 F.3d 1324, 1333-35 (11th Cir. 2018) (“The jailers allege that the mayor and chiefs, government officials ‘at the highest level,’ . . . created and implemented an unlawful scheme and intentionally subjected them to that scheme, but Iqbal illustrates why the jailers are ‘armed with nothing more than conclusions[.]’ .Substitute the mayor for the attorney general and the chiefs for the FBI director in Iqbal, and the comparison is uncanny. Like the complaint in Iqbal, which labeled the attorney general as the ‘principal architect’ and the FBI director as the ‘instrument[]’ behind an unlawful detention policy, the jailers’ complaint alleges that the mayor ‘adopted’ and the chiefs ‘administered’ an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue. The complaint in Iqbal alleged that the attorney general and the FBI director ‘knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [Iqbal] to harsh conditions of confinement as a matter of policy.’. . Similarly, the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs ‘adopted, ratified[,] and administered policies, practices[,] or customs’ that were ‘part of a scheme designed to increase municipal budgets ... through imprisonment for nonpayment [of fines] ... and the use of coerced jail labor.’ And the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs acted ‘intentionally and unlawfully,’ as well as ‘recklessly, wantonly, willfully, maliciously, or in bad faith.’ We must discard the conclusory allegations that the mayor and chiefs created and implemented a scheme. As the Supreme Court has explained, allegations that government officials were the ‘principal architect’ and instrument[]’ behind an unlawful policy, without supporting allegations, are conclusory. The allegations that the mayor ‘adopted’ and the chiefs ‘administered’ an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue, without more, are ‘not entitled to be assumed true.’. . And the allegations that the mayor and chiefs intended to subject jailees to the scheme are conclusory. The district court ruled that the jailees’ allegations are ‘very much tied to bad faith,’ but it ignored that these allegations merely recite the legal elements that the jailees must establish to overcome state-agent immunity. . . The jailees cannot overcome the mayor’s and chiefs’ immunity with conclusory allegations that ‘carry no weight.’. The absence of allegations about any individual acts of the mayor or chiefs reinforces the conclusory nature of the jailees’ complaint. The jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs are ‘individually liable for their acts or omissions,’ but the complaint fails to ‘provid[e] the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion.’. . The complaint alleges the mayor’s and chiefs’ names and titles, but nothing about ‘the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the [scheme], their personal interactions or familiarity with [jailees], their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about’ the scheme that they allegedly operated. . . We cannot even infer from the complaint when either chief was in office. Nor can we infer that the mayor or chiefs were ever present in a municipal courtroom when jailees were sentenced or in a municipal jail when jailees were forced to work. After we discard conclusory allegations, the second step in our evaluation of a complaint is to assume that any remaining factual allegations are true and determine whether those allegations state a plausible claim. . . To state a plausible claim, factual allegations must ‘allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’. . That is, a complaint must contain factual allegations that are ‘enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.’. . Factual allegations, although consistent with a plaintiff’s theory, may fail to state a plausible claim ‘given more likely explanations.’. . The jailees argue that their complaint contains ‘great factual detail,’ but we disagree. After discarding their conclusory allegations, we struggle to find factual allegations left in the complaint, and the few factual allegations that remain do not state a plausible claim. The jailees allege that the City of Montgomery collected more fines and court costs than the City of Huntsville, which has a similar population, but even if true, the difference in municipal revenues does not ‘nudge[] [the jailees]’ claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.’. . Perhaps there is more crime in Montgomery. This lone factual allegation does not support a plausible inference of a scheme by the mayor and chiefs, ‘given more likely explanations’ for the difference in municipal revenues. . . The alleged difference in revenues fails to raise the jailees’ ‘right to relief above the speculative level.’. The jailees’ complaint contains factual allegations about misconduct in the municipal court, but as we explained, that misconduct concerns judicial acts. And any connection between the judicial acts and the mayor and chiefs is ‘too chimerical to be maintained.’ . . The jailers do not allege that the mayor or chiefs presided over any proceedings in which they could have informed a defendant of his rights, appointed counsel, or considered alternative sentences. And certainly, the mayor and chiefs did not sentence jailers to sit-out their fines. No factual allegations in the complaint plausibly connect the mayor or chiefs to these judicial acts, and without any ‘factual enhancement,’ the complaint ‘stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility.’”)

Carollo v. Boria, 833 F.3d 1322, 1330, 1332 (11th Cir. 2016) (“It is not appropriate at the motion to dismiss stage for us to interpret the Municipal Charter’s ambiguous job description for the City Manager. . . Discovery will illuminate exactly which laws Carollo had the responsibility to enforce or administer and, in fact, enforced or administered in the ordinary course of his job responsibilities. Nonetheless, with respect to the only question before us under Rules 8(a) and 12(b)(6) — whether, taking the factual allegations in the complaint as true, the complaint states a claim — we find it plausible under Iqbal and Twombly that Carollo spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job duties as City Manager when he made statements to law enforcement and other agencies about how Boria and Ruiz violated Florida’s campaign finance laws. . . Carollo’s status as a supervising public official does not alter our conclusion that he has plausibly alleged that he spoke as a citizen about violations of Florida’s campaign finance laws. . . . Under these circumstances, we believe that justice requires giving Carollo an opportunity to file an amended complaint that resurrects those portions of his complaint that we dismiss by pleading facts that support the claim — if true — that he spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job responsibilities. The district court should then proceed directly to discovery, which will reveal, among other things, what precisely were Carollo’s ordinary job responsibilities. Indeed, each of the relevant cases from the Supreme Court and this Circuit to undertake Garcetti’s ‘practical inquiry’ concerning whether a plaintiff spoke pursuant to ordinary job responsibilities or as a citizen did so at the summary judgment stage or later in the life of the case.”)

Hoeftling v. City of Miami, 811 F.3d 1271, 1276 (11th Cir. 2016) (“We expressly held in Randall, and reaffirm today, that ‘whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly–Iqbal plausibility standard [which] applies to all civil actions....’ . . . Accordingly, the district court should not have placed a ‘heightened pleading’ burden on Mr. Hoeftling for his § 1983 claims.”)

Weiland v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff’s Office, 792 F.3d 1313, 1321-28 (11th Cir. 2015) (“T.D.S. was this Court’s first shot in what was to become a thirty-year salvo of criticism aimed at shotgun pleadings, and there is no ceasefire in sight. . . Some of our shooting, which has mostly been done with nonlethal dicta, has at times been nearly as lacking in precision as the target itself. At times we have used the term ‘shotgun pleading’ to mean little more than ‘poorly drafted complaint.’ . . In the hope that we could impose some clarity on what we have said and done about unclear complaints, we have examined more than sixty published decisions issued since the T.D.S. decision in 1985. One thing we looked for is how many types of shotgun pleadings have been used, wittingly or unwittingly, by attorneys and litigants. [court discusses four categories of shotgun pleadings] [W]e conclude that the district court abused its discretion when it dismissed Weiland's count one and count three claims against Fleming and Johnson on the ground that those counts did not comply with Rules 8(a)(2) and 10(b). In concluding that the court should not have dismissed those two counts, we are not retreating from this circuit's criticism of shotgun pleadings, but instead are deciding that, whatever their faults, these two counts are informative enough to permit a court to readily determine if they state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The district court implicitly recognized as much when it observed in the orders dismissing counts one and three that they actually do state claims upon which relief can be granted. Whether those observations are correct is a question to which we now turn. . . . Deputies Johnson and Fleming did not argue in their motion to dismiss Weiland's third amended complaint, or in their brief to this Court, that they are entitled to qualified immunity. We limit our analysis to whether the allegations in Weiland's complaint are sufficient to state a claim upon which relief can be granted without regard to the qualified immunity defense. . . . Construing the allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as we are required to do, count one alleges that Deputy Johnson shot Weiland without warning when he was not posing a threat to the deputies or anyone else; that while he was on the ground bleeding from the gunshot wound and not offering any resistance or threat, Deputy Fleming tasered Weiland; and that while he was on the ground seriously injured by both the shooting and the taser and not offering any resistance or threat, both deputies beat him without cause. Count one states an excessive force claim upon which relief can be granted against both deputies. . . . Weiland claims that he was detained improperly and prosecuted for charges based on evidence fabricated by the deputies and lies contained in their police reports. . . . Because count three specifies a causal connection between the alleged cover up and the specific deprivation of Weiland's constitutional rights, it sufficiently alleges 'an underlying actual denial of his constitutional rights,' which is required to state a claim for conspiracy under § 1983. . . . For these reasons, we will reverse the part of the district court's judgment dismissing count three as to Deputy Johnson and Deputy Fleming.") Franklin v. Curry, 738 F.3d 1246, 1251, 1252 (11th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) [Note Judge Ripple from 7th Cir. sitting by designation] ("Franklin's repeated allegations the Supervisory Defendants were deliberately indifferent or their actions constituted or resulted in deliberate indifference carry no weight. Similarly, by alleging Appellants 'knew or should have known' of a risk, Franklin has merely recited an element of a claim without providing the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion. The district court found these allegations sufficient. Had the district court followed the Supreme Court's 'twopronged approach' of first separating out the complaint's conclusory legal allegations and then determining whether the remaining well-pleaded factual allegations, accepted as true, 'plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief,' the insufficiency of Franklin's allegations would have been obvious. . . . Stripping away Franklin's conclusory allegations leaves only a handful of properly pleaded facts—specifically, (1) that Gay verbally harassed Franklin and told her 'there is nothing you can do,' (2) that Gay sexually assaulted Franklin, (3) that Gay had previously sexually assaulted another female detainee, and (4) that Gay had previously had sexual relations with a third female detainee. Given only these facts, Franklin's complaint is insufficient to state a plausible claim that each of the Supervisory Defendants should have known of a substantial risk that Gay would sexually assault Franklin, much less that each defendant was subjectively aware of the risk and knowingly disregarded it. Franklin states that Sheriff Curry ‘failed to promulgate, to adopt, to implement or to enforce policies, rules, or regulations to safeguard female inmates,’ but she does not describe any of the policies that were in place, the sort of policies that should have been in place, or how those policies could have prevented Gay’s harassment. Similarly, Franklin alleges the names and titles of the other Supervisory Defendants. . . but alleges nothing about the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the jail, their personal interactions or familiarity with Gay, their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about but were deliberately indifferent to Gay’s conduct and the risk he posed. . . From Franklin’s allegations, a finder of fact could not even conclude that all of the Defendants were ever in the jail, much less that each of their individual actions constituted deliberate indifference to the risk Gay would abuse Franklin. Subjecting Appellants to the full ‘panoply of expensive and time-consuming pretrial discovery devices,’ . . . and forcing them to defend this action based on Franklin’s inadequate allegations not only runs counter to the general rules of pleading, it also undermines qualified immunity’s fundamental purpose of protecting ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law’ from the costs of suit.”)

AFL-CIO v. City of Miami, 637 F.3d 1178, 1186 (11th Cir. 2011) (“The plaintiffs have made conclusory statements that they were deprived of property without due process, but this is not even a ‘formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.’ . . Nothing in the complaint—directly, inferentially, or otherwise—says how Florida’s procedures for recovering wrongfully taken property violated due process, or that the plaintiffs even attempted to use those procedures. Nor do the plaintiffs allege that the defendants’ pre-deprivation procedures, if they were even required, were somehow inadequate. Given the absence of any information in the complaint about a material element of their claim, the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.”)

Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 708 n.2, 709 (11th Cir. 2010) (“We now say explicitly what Keating implied: whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly-Iqbal plausibility standard. . . . Thus, like complaints in all other cases, complaints in § 1983 cases must now “‘contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory.’” . . . While Swann, GJR, and Danley reaffirm application of a heightened pleading standard for § 1983 cases involving defendants able to assert qualified immunity, we agree with Randall that those cases were effectively overturned by the Iqbal court. Pleadings for § 1983 cases involving defendants who are able to assert qualified immunity as a defense shall now be held to comply with the standards described in Iqbal.”)

Harrison v. Benchmark Electronics Huntsville, Inc., 593 F.3d 1206, 1214, 1215 (11th Cir. 2010) (“The district court concluded that Harrison failed to plead his medical inquiry claim in his complaint, a determination Harrison contests on appeal. We only require that a plaintiff provide

‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that [he] is entitled to relief.’ Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). ‘The point is to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.’”. . . Harrison satisfied our liberal pleading standard. His complaint alleged that BEHI questioned him about his seizures following a pre-employment drug test, and he claimed damages for these allegedly prohibited medical inquiries. Thus, BEHI had fair notice that Harrison sought relief under ‘ 12112(d)(2), and his allegations, which specifically referred to pre-employment medical inquiries, were more than speculative. . . To the extent that the district court concluded otherwise, it erred.”)

Harper v. Lawrence County, Ala., 592 F.3d 1227, 1234, 1235 (11th Cir. 2010) (“Here, there are two main ways Plaintiff alleges Defendants knew of Harper’s serious medical needs. First, Plaintiff claims that they ‘had full knowledge that Harper was an alcoholic who would experience delirium tremens (DT’s) due to alcohol withdrawal if left untreated,’ because he had been arrested before and placed in the Lawrence County Jail on various alcohol-related charges. Compl. at 8. She also alleges that during the course of one or more of his prior arrests Harper ‘informed the defendants that he had a history of seizures due to alcohol withdrawal.’ Id. at 9. However, these allegations do not meet the Rule 8 standard, much less the heightened pleading standard. Plaintiff did not offer any facts to suggest why these Defendants in particular (a sheriff, two jail administrators, and two jailers) would know of Harper’s specific medical history, nor did she offer any specific facts regarding Harper’s past arrests. Moreover, even if those Defendants did know of Harper’s history of alcoholism and/or past alcohol-related arrests, they would still have needed to know that Harper was in serious need of medical attention during the time period in question, April 24, 2007 to April 28, 2007. In our view, Plaintiff does not ‘raise [her] right to relief above the speculative level’ in this instance. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Second, Plaintiff claims Defendants were aware of Harper’s condition because of his symptoms and behavior at the jail. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that several days after his initial incarceration Harper was hallucinating, slurring his words, physically weak, and incoherent. According to the Complaint, Reed and/or Robinson told both Taylor and Fike that Harper was displaying erratic and strange behavior. Compl. at 7-8. The Complaint also alleges that other inmates informed Reed and Robinson that Harper was acting strangely, losing his balance, and had urinated on himself. Id. at 9. Based on these allegations we hold that Plaintiff adequately alleged Reed and Robinson had ‘actual knowledge’ of the risk of serious harm to Harper if left untreated. However, the Complaint does not allege how the other three Defendants, Sheriff Gene Mitchell and administrators Kenneth Mitchell and Brown, could possibly have had such actual knowledge. Thus, the court should have dismissed the ‘personal participation’ claims as to those three Defendants based on qualified immunity, and we reverse the district court’s order in that respect.”).

Amnesty Intern., USA v. Battle, 559 F.3d 1170, 1179, 1180 (11th Cir. 2009) (“Since Leatherman, this court has determined that heightened pleading still applies where the defendants are individuals for whom qualified immunity may be available. . . .Here, the district court conflated the issues of satisfying the heightened pleading with the need to overcome qualified immunity. To satisfy even the heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims, Amnesty need plead only ‘some factual detail' from which the court may determine whether Defendants' alleged actions violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . The heightened pleading standard does not require a complaint to cite cases demonstrating that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he complaint makes clear Amnesty's allegation that its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated because it was unable to have a successful protest rally and unable to pass out Amnesty literature as a result of Defendants' creation of a police cordon. These facts provide sufficient detail for Defendants to understand what alleged rights were violated (the right to hold a peaceful protest with an audience and the right to pass out leaflets) and which of their actions allegedly violated those rights (Defendants' actions ordering their subordinates to create a police cordon which interfered with the rally and the distribution of leaflets). These facts also provide enough information for the court to determine whether those facts indeed set out a violation of rights and whether those rights were clearly established when these incidents occurred.”).

A.P. ex rel. Bazerman v. Feaver, 293 F. App'x 635, 2008 WL 3870697, at *10 (11th Cir. Aug. 21, 2008) (“While Rule 8 allows a plaintiff a great deal of latitude in the manner in which a complaint presents a claim, . . .this court has implemented more stringent pleading requirements in § 1983 actions in which qualified immunity is likely to be raised as a defense. . . . This heightened specificity is necessary so that the court has sufficient factual allegations to allow it to assess whether a defendant's actions violated a clearly established right. . . If it is impossible to make this determination from the face of the plaintiff's complaint, the purpose of the qualified immunity defense— shielding government officials from the demands of defending oneself from damages suits—may well be frustrated.”).

Davis v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. Consol., 516 F.3d 955, 974 n.43 (11th Cir. 2008) (“We understand Twombly as a further articulation of the standard by which to evaluate the sufficiency of all claims brought pursuant to Rule 8(a). In that case, the Court retired the oft-cited standard that ‘a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond a doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief,’ Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S.Ct. 99, 102, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957), saying it ‘is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint.’ Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1969. The main Rule 8(a) standard now seems to be whether the ‘allegations plausibly suggest[] ([and are] not merely consistent with)’ a violation of the law.”).

Weissman v. National Ass'n of Securities Dealers, Inc., 500 F.3d 1293, 1309 n.6 (11th Cir. 2007) (Tjoflat, J., dissenting) (“Although I believe Weissman's complaint is due to be dismissed on absolute immunity grounds under even the basic Rule 8 pleading standard, I would suggest that our explicit heightened pleading requirement for some § 1983 suits might properly be applied in the SRO [Self Regulating Organization] immunity context, as well. A few words about heightened pleading may be helpful here. The panel in Swann read the Supreme Court's decision in Leatherman as having abrogated two of our earlier decisions suggesting a broad application of the heightened pleading requirement in § 1983 cases. . . In describing the effect of Leatherman on our circuit’s precedent, Swann purported to limit the application of heightened pleading to only those cases in which qualified immunity is a potential defense. . . To be sure, Leatherman abrogated our heightened pleading precedent to the extent that our cases applied the more stringent standard to claims against municipalities. I do not believe, however, that Leatherman precludes the application of a heightened pleading requirement in absolute immunity cases.”).

Ratliff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, Florida, No. 22-CV-61029-RAR, 2023 WL 3750581, at *6 (S.D. Fla. June 1, 2023) (“Ramos argues he is entitled to qualified immunity because it is not clearly established ‘that following a directive to utilize less-than-lethal force during a protest where rioters w[ere] “throwing bottles, rocks, and other non-deadly objects”’ violates a plaintiff’s First Amendment rights ‘in . . . bright line terms.’. . MacDoughall, Dietrich, Cristafaro, Figueras, and Greenlaw similarly argue it is not clearly established ‘that issuing a directive to utilize less-than-lethal force during a protest where rioters w[ere] “throwing bottles, rocks, and other non-deadly objects”’ violates the First Amendment ‘in...bright line terms.’. . The Court rejects these arguments, because directing ‘subordinate officers to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd at a large public demonstration violates a demonstrator’s First Amendment rights because of the ‘broader, clearly established principle, that peaceful demonstrators have a First Amendment right to engage in expressive activities.’. . Because Ratliff alleges she was retaliated against while peacefully demonstrating, the Court finds Keating controlling at this stage. The only difference as to Ramos is that Keating addressed the issue of giving a directive rather than ‘following a directive.’. . But even assuming Ramos was following a directive to disperse a peaceful crowd, he had sufficient reason to ‘question the validity of’ that order given Keating’s holding. . . And Keating is even more controlling as to MacDoughall, Dietrich, Cristafaro, Figueras, and Greenlaw’s claim of qualified immunity, because it directly rebuts their assertion that it is not clearly established that ordering subordinates to disperse a peaceful demonstration and then failing to stop the unlawful retaliatory conduct violates the demonstrators’ First Amendment rights.”)

Washington v. Albright, 814 F.Supp.2d 1317, 123, 1324 (M.D. Ala. 2011) (After setting out history of “heightened pleading standard” in Eleventh Circuit, court goes on : “Further muddying the waters, is the fact that decisions since Randall have not uniformly rejected heightened pleading in § 1983 cases. A number of courts within the Eleventh Circuit have relied upon Randall and held that there is no longer any heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims against individuals entitled to qualified immunity. [collecting cases] However, at least one panel decision from the Eleventh Circuit decided after Randall makes no mention of it and employs the heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Heflin v. Miami-Dade County, 393 F. App’x 658, 659-60 (11th Cir.2010). This Court is persuaded that the appropriate course is to follow the holding of Randall and reject heightened pleading. The Court notes that this may not be a case in which the applicable standard makes a difference. For the reasons set forth below, the Court finds that Washington’s pleading fails to satisfy the pleading standards announced in Iqbal, Twombly, and their progeny. Logically, if the pleading is insufficient to me[e]t that lesser standard, it would also be insufficient under the heightened pleading standard which this Court declines to apply in this case.”)

Pressley v. Madison, No. 2:08-CV-0157-RWS, 2009 WL 3878260, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 17, 2009) (“Plaintiff sues Joel Robinson, a former Barrow County Sheriff, and three officials of the Barrow County Jail (the Jail)—Captain Mike Katsegianes, Sergeant M. Walker, and Officer Connor. (“m.Compl. & 3.) Plaintiff presents the following allegations. On January 2, 2007, she was transferred from state prison to the Jail, where Officer Connor removed her hijab in the presence of several men, in violation of Plaintiff’s Muslim religious beliefs and practices. Officer Connor then told Plaintiff that ‘she is not allowed to cover her hair in the jail, even for prayer.’ Plaintiff claims that without her hijab she cannot ‘practice Islam through 5 daily obligatory prayers, for which her hair must be covered.’ When Plaintiff grieved this alleged violation, Captain Katsegianes informed her that she did ‘not have the right to wear anything that is or could be a safety or security issue.’ Plaintiff’s hijab was not returned to her until she was transferred back to state prison on January 4, 2007. (Id. & IV.) Plaintiff alleges that the four named Defendants violated her rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutional Persons Act (RLUIPA), the First Amendment’s Free Exercise Clause, and the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause. (Id.) Plaintiff seeks an injunction to prohibit Barrow County Jail from depriving Muslim women of their hijabs and also seeks several million dollars in damages. (Id. & V.) Court finds that Plaintiff has alleged a viable cause of action under § 1983 based on the deprivation of her hijab at the Barrow County Jail. That claim is ALLOWED TO PROCEED as in any other civil action. However, because Plaintiff has not set forth any action taken by Joel Robinson in violation of her legal rights, Mr. Robinson is DISMISSED from this action.”).

Frye v. Escambia County Bd. of Educ., No. 08-0340-WS-N, 2009 WL 3336917, at *1 (S.D. Ala. Oct. 13, 2009) (“The plaintiff does not directly address this standard but instead insists the complaint satisfies Rule 8 as construed by the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). . . The heightened pleading requirement, however, does not spring from Rule 8 but from the needs of individual governmental defendants for sufficient information to allow them to effectively assert qualified immunity (which is immunity from suit, not merely from judgment) at the outset of litigation. . . Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly questioned the imposition of pleading requirements in excess of those inherent in Rule 8, . . . the Eleventh Circuit continues to enforce its heightened pleading requirement. . . The plaintiff’s invocation of Rule 8 is thus unresponsive to the defendants’ challenge.”).

Rhodes v. MacDonald, No. 4:09-CV-106 (CDL), 2009 WL 2997605, at *4 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 16, 2009) (“For a complaint to be facially plausible, the Court must be able ‘to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged’ based upon a review of the factual content pled by the Plaintiff. . . The factual allegations must be sufficient ‘to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.’ Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007). Plaintiff’s complaint is not plausible on its face. To the extent that it alleges any ‘facts,’ the Complaint does not connect those facts to any actual violation of Plaintiff’s individual constitutional rights. Unlike in Alice in Wonderland, simply saying something is so does not make it so. The weakness of Plaintiff's claim certainly weighs heavily against judicial review of the deployment order, and in fact, would authorize dismissal of Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim.”).

Glenn v. Brumby, No. 1:08-CV-2360-RWS, 2009 WL 1849951, at *3 n. 2 (N.D. Ga. June 25, 2009) (“The Court notes that Defendants contend a higher pleading standard applies to § 1983 cases like the one before the Court, but Plaintiff is correct that the Eleventh Circuit has rejected such a pleading requirement and has clarified that to the extent that such a requirement still exists, it applies only in cases where qualified immunity is an available defense.”)

Burge v. Ferguson, No. 8:07-cv-2217-T-23MSS, 2008 WL 5246306, at *3 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 16, 2008) (“Although controversial, the heightened pleading requirement permits a potentially immune defendant to frame a fact-specific qualified immunity defense at an early stage and enables the court to conduct the fact-specific inquiry contemplated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Absent a heightened pleading requirement, a meaningful Saucier inquiry is often impossible. Accordingly, some courts rejecting a heightened pleading requirement as inconsistent with Rule 8(a)’s notice pleading standard have adopted a rule that effectively reproduces the requirement. See, e.g., Thomas v. Independence Twp., 463 F.3d 285, 300-302 (3d Cir.2006); cf. Schulte v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir.1995).”)

Accordingly, some courts rejecting a heightened pleading requirement as inconsistent with Rule 8(a)’s notice pleading standard have adopted a rule that effectively reproduces the requirement. See, e.g., Thomas v. Independence Twp., 463 F.3d 285, 300-302 (3d Cir.2006); cf. Schulte v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir.1995).”).

Brown v. Pastrana, No. 08-20631-CIV., 2008 WL 4097615, at *5 n.2 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 4, 2008) (“The Jones v. Bock, Twombly and Erickson Courts have once again reiterated, as the Supreme Court unanimously held in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill, that adopting a different and more onerous pleading standard in particular types of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts. . . . Some district courts in the Eleventh Circuit continue to apply a ‘heightened pleading’ standard, justifying its use on the flawed premise that the Supreme Court specifically ruled that district courts may not impose a heightened pleading requirement for claims pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against municipal entities but declined to reach the issue of whether a similar holding was warranted in such cases against individual government entities. . . The ‘flaw’ in this logic is the fact that the Supreme Court has not indicated that qualified immunity might warrant an exception to the general approach, the explicit disclaimer of a heightened pleading standard in Twombly, and Erickson’s reversal of the Tenth Circuit’s use of a heightened pleading standard in case against individual state actors who might be entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Fleming v. Barber, No. 3:07cv279/MCR/MD, 2008 WL 2790194, at *3 (N.D. Fla. July 17, 2008) (“The Supreme Court has stated that a heightened pleading standard—which requires the facts of a claim to be alleged with some specificity—contravenes the notice pleading requirements set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. . . . Nonetheless, with respect to claims brought pursuant to § 1983, this circuit has recognized that a heightened pleading requirement in fact is applicable. . . . In particular, this circuit has consistently held that the decision in Leatherman does not apply to defendants who may be entitled to qualified immunity In such cases, ‘more than mere conclusory notice pleading is required.... [A] complaint will be dismissed as insufficient where the allegations it contains are vague and conclusory.’”)

Walling v. City of Largo 2008 WL 2782687, at *4 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2008) (“Plaintiff alleges that Bell Atlantic raises a clear question of the Eleventh Circuit’s position with regard to heightened pleading standards and that this question has not been addressed by the Eleventh Circuit subsequent to the Bell Atlantic ruling. . . . Plaintiff relies primarily on Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) as support for his argument that he has plead sufficient facts to state a claim. . . . This Court finds that it is not clear that the Eleventh Circuit has upheld a heightened pleading requirement for Section 1983 claims. Thus, this Court finds a heightened pleading standard an improper lense through which to analyze the First Amended Complaint.”)

Bouyer v. Rounsoville, No. 1:08-CV-0856-RWS, 2008 WL 2787484, at *4 (N.D. Ga. July 15, 2008) (“Plaintiff’s conclusory allegations regarding the City’s policy fail to satisfy the pleading requirements under Twombly. Reyes v. City of Miami Beach, No. 07-22680-CIV, 2008 W.L. 686958, at *14 (S .D. Fla. March 13, 2008).”)

Hawkins v. Eslinger, No. 6:07-cv-1261-Orl-19GJK, 2008 WL 2074409, at *1 n.4 (M.D. Fla. May 15, 2008) (“Plaintiff relies heavily on two cases from the Second Circuit which have rejected the position that ‘class of one’ claims are subject to a heightened pleading requirement. . . . Although the Eleventh Circuit has not explicitly adopted a heightened pleading requirement, it does require a plaintiff to include ‘key factual details’ in alleging the existence of a similarly-situated person. . . . To the extent the Second Circuit has determined otherwise, the Court must disregard its reasoning in favor of binding case law from the Eleventh Circuit.”).

I. Note: Motion to Dismiss v. Summary Judgment Standard

SUPREME COURT

Sause v. Bauer, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 2563 (2018) (per curiam) (“As the case comes before us, it is unclear whether the police officers were in petitioner’s apartment at the time in question based on her consent, whether they had some other ground consistent with the Fourth Amendment for entering and remaining there, or whether their entry or continued presence was unlawful. Petitioner's complaint contains no express allegations on these matters. Nor does her complaint state what, if anything, the officers wanted her to do at the time when she was allegedly told to stop praying. Without knowing the answers to these questions, it is impossible to analyze petitioner's free exercise claim. In considering the defendants' motion to dismiss, the District Court was required to interpret the pro se complaint liberally, and when the complaint is read that way, it may be understood to state Fourth Amendment claims that could not properly be dismissed for failure to state a claim. We appreciate that petitioner elected on appeal to raise only a First Amendment argument and not to pursue an independent Fourth Amendment claim, but under the circumstances, the First Amendment claim demanded consideration of the ground on which the officers were present in the apartment and the nature of any legitimate law enforcement interests that might have justified an order to stop praying at the specific time in question. Without considering these matters, neither the free exercise issue nor the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity can be resolved. Thus, petitioner's choice to abandon her Fourth Amendment claim on appeal did not obviate the need to address these matters.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 876 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("[A]lthough the inspectors conceded in the appeal from their motion to dismiss that Moore's claim stated a violation of clearly established law, they are free to assert qualified immunity now: the 'legally relevant factors bearing upon the [qualified immunity] question will be different on summary judgment than on an earlier motion to dismiss,' because the court now conducts the immunity inquiry based on 'the evidence before it,' rather than the pleadings."), rev'd on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 1695 (2006).

FIRST CIRCUIT

Eves v. LePage, 927 F.3d 575, 582-83 & n.5 (1st Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court has long established that, when sued in their official capacities, government officials are immune from damages claims unless '(1) they violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was "clearly established at the time."'. . . A decision of qualified immunity on a motion to dismiss is appropriate here. . . . We reject Eves's contention that qualified immunity should be decided at a later stage of litigation, not on a motion to dismiss. That would turn well-settled precedent on its head. The Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage [of the] litigation.' . . The Court has affirmed the dismissal of multiple First Amendment claims on the basis of qualified immunity. . . We have as well.")

Velez-Rivera v. Agosto-Alicea, 437 F.3d 145, 151 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiffs allege that the district court applied the heightened pleading standard in two separate instances. First, when it granted summary judgment for Agosto because Pena had failed to allege any material fact showing ‘deliberate indifference,’ an element of ‘supervisory liability.’ . . . Second, when the district court found that Agosto was protected under the doctrine of qualified immunity because his actions with regard to Velez were ‘objectively reasonable.’ We see no evidence that the heightened pleading standard was applied. Under the overruled standard, the district court would have required heightened specificity at the pleading stage, which did not occur in this case. By contrast, the district court correctly applied the appropriate standard of review to defendants’ summary judgment motion when it found no genuine issue as to any material fact. The court’s analysis of supervisory liability and qualified immunity relied upon the appropriate standards because, although specificity is not required at the pleading stage, it is required at the summary judgment stage. Swierkiewicz specifically distinguished the two doctrines, explaining that ‘[t]his simplified notice pleading standard relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.’ . . . In other words, notice pleading is sufficient for a claim to survive a motion to dismiss, but plaintiffs bear a heavier burden at the summary judgment stage.”).

Jenkins v. City of Taunton, No. CV 15-10003-MBB, 2018 WL 326462, at *5 (D. Mass. Jan. 8, 2018) (“[A]lthough mindful that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as monetary damages, the denial of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage does not foreclose the responding officers from raising the defense in a post-trial motion based on the facts in evidence at trial. . . . Thus, the responding officers retain the ability to move for judgment as a matter of law before the case is submitted to the jury and after a verdict based on qualified immunity in order to avoid any monetary damages. . . . “[O]nce trial has been had, the availability of official immunity” is ascertained based on “the trial record, not the pleadings nor the summary judgment record.””)

Tanvir v. Tanzin (Tanvir IV), 120 F.4th 1049, 1060 n.6 (2d Cir. 2024) (“The Appellants seek to defer a decision on qualified immunity until a later stage in the litigation. They argue that, when the district court granted defendants qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage, it improperly construed the Appellants’ complaint against them and did not hold defendants to an appropriately high burden. But the Supreme Court has ‘stressed the importance of resolving [qualified] immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . Thus, although we have cautioned that defendants are often unsuccessful in asserting qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage, . . . we have also explained that, “[l]ike other affirmative defenses, official immunity may be resolved’ at that stage ‘when the facts establishing it are apparent on the face of the complaint[.]’ . . . As explained below, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the face of the complaint, so the district court did not err in deciding qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage.”)

Matzell v. Annucci, 64 F.4th 425, 434 (2d Cir. 2023) (“Although qualified immunity defenses are often decided on motions for summary judgment, in appropriate circumstances a district court may address qualified immunity at the pleadings stage.” . . . We have recognized, however, that a qualified immunity defense ‘faces a formidable hurdle’ at the motion to dismiss stage ‘and is usually not successful.’ . . . Where a defendant presents a qualified immunity defense on a motion to dismiss or, as here, for judgment on the pleadings, ‘the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support his claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense.’”)

Sabir v. Williams, 52 F.4th 51, 63-64 (2d Cir. 2022) (amending and superseding opinion at 37 F.4th 810 (2d Cir. 2022)) (“The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly ... stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . ‘But there is an obvious, if rarely expressed, corollary to that principle: The immunity question cannot be resolved before the earliest possible stage, i.e., prior to ascertainment of the truth of the plausible factual allegations on which a finding of qualified immunity is premised.’ . . . The wardens chose to press their qualified immunity defense at the pleadings stage, and they therefore must face the ‘more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route.’ McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 436 (2d Cir. 2004). Specifically, ‘the facts supporting the defense [must] appear on the face of the complaint,’ . . . or in its attachments and documents incorporated by reference. . . . On a motion to dismiss, the plaintiffs are ‘entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support [their] claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense.’ . . . For this reason, we have explained that ‘advancing qualified immunity as grounds for a motion to dismiss is almost always a procedural mismatch.’ [citing Chamberlain] Although it is possible for a qualified immunity defense to succeed on a motion to dismiss, . . . such a defense ‘faces a formidable hurdle ... and is usually not successful[.]’ . . . A reasonable officer should have known, based on clearly established law, that denying a Muslim inmate the ability to engage in group prayer without any justification or compelling interest, as alleged in the SAC, violates RFRA.”)

Chamberlain for the Estate of Chamberlain v. City of White Plains, 960 F.3d 100, 107-14 (2d Cir. 2020) (“Based on the facts alleged and otherwise before the district court, viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, we conclude that a reasonable, experienced officer would not have determined there was probable cause to believe that Chamberlain needed urgent medical attention. The officers outside of his apartment knew that the Life Alert system had been activated accidentally. . . . The Life Aid operator informed the police dispatcher that Chamberlain was not in need of medical assistance. And Chamberlain himself firmly and repeatedly informed the officers that he had not called for help and was not in need of assistance of any kind, let alone urgent medical aid. . . . These facts as alleged in the complaint and related documents, and viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, give rise to the plausible inference that the officers knew that Chamberlain was not in need of urgent medical assistance but chose to enter his home anyway. . . . Again emphasizing that our decision is based only on the facts as we must view them at this stage of the proceedings, we conclude that a reasonable, experienced officer would not be justified in believing that entry into the apartment was necessary. We therefore vacate that portion of the judgment of the district court dismissing the unlawful entry claim. . . . To be sure, qualified immunity should be resolved ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . But there is an obvious, if rarely expressed, corollary to that principle: The immunity question cannot be resolved before the ‘earliest possible stage,’ . . . i.e., prior to ascertainment of the truth of the plausible factual allegations on which a finding of qualified immunity is premised. And since qualified immunity is an affirmative defense that is typically asserted in an answer, . . . as a general rule, ‘the defense of qualified immunity cannot support the grant of a [Rule] 12(b)(6) motion[.]’. . . Thus, a qualified immunity defense presented on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion ‘faces a formidable hurdle . . . and is usually not successful.’ . . . Otherwise, plaintiffs alleging a violation of their constitutional rights would face a heightened pleading standard under which they must plead not only facts sufficient to make out their claim but also additional facts to defeat an assertion of qualified immunity. . . . Put another way, advancing qualified immunity as grounds for a motion to dismiss is almost always a procedural mismatch. . . . The defendants do not clear this high bar. The law was clearly established at the time of entry that a warrantless entry into a private dwelling, absent exigent circumstances, is unlawful. . . . It was further established that a warrantless entry in response to a medical concern is unlawful absent probable cause to believe that a person inside is in immediate danger. . . . The officers were responding to a 911 call at a location that was the source of prior EDP calls. They could hear Chamberlain yelling things that indicated that he was in psychological distress, but they had no information suggesting he was in physical danger. As pleaded, the Life Aid operator informed the dispatcher that Chamberlain’s medical alert had been triggered accidentally. Chamberlain repeatedly told the officers that he did not call the police. Both Chamberlain and the Life Alert operator told the officers that Chamberlain was not in need of medical assistance. Further, despite now asserting that Chamberlain needed urgent medical aid, the officers ultimately opened the apartment door bearing no medical equipment but instead with a Taser and guns drawn. It was also clearly established at the moment of entry that an uncorroborated 911 call—like the initial, later withdrawn, call to police by Life Aid—reporting that a mentally ill person was in distress is insufficient support for probable cause to believe there is a medical exigency. . . . Here, not only was the emergency call from Chamberlain’s apartment uncorroborated by Chamberlain or anyone else with firsthand knowledge of his condition, . . . it was later expressly retracted by the Life Aid operator who initiated the call to police. Viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, therefore, the facts as alleged are sufficient to overcome the defendants’ assertion of a qualified immunity defense, at least until further facts are submitted on a motion for summary judgment or at trial. Police perform dangerous and challenging work for the public benefit, often under perilous circumstances. Qualified immunity reflects the recognition that, in order to ensure public safety, police officers require sufficient protection to enable them to perform their duties without fear of unwarranted private litigation. . . . [I]t may well be that the defendant police officers in this case are ultimately entitled to immunity, indeed, at the ‘earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . But today is not that day. . . . Here, Appellant has plausibly alleged that the officers’ warrantless entry into Chamberlain’s home was not justified by exigent circumstances and was, therefore, a violation of his clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. Since the officers’ qualified immunity defense is not clearly established by allegations in the Amended Complaint as augmented by the relevant recordings, . . . the district court erred in applying it in the context of the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. We therefore vacate the judgment of the district court with respect to the qualified immunity defense asserted by defendants Carelli, Hart, Demchuk, Fottrell, and Martin related to the unlawful entry claims. . . .

Our review of Appellant’s excessive force claim against Officer Martin is limited to whether the district court correctly concluded on a motion to dismiss, and reaffirmed on a motion for summary judgment, that Officer Martin, the defendant who deployed beanbag shots against Chamberlain, was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to his use of non-lethal force. . . . That said, because we have vacated the district court’s grant of defendants’ motion to dismiss the claim for unlawful warrantless entry, we also vacate the court’s determination that Officer Martin was entitled to qualified immunity for his use of the beanbag shotgun. It is not clear to us whether, and if so, to what extent, the district court’s determination that Appellant failed to plead a cause of action for unlawful entry—a decision we now reverse—affected the court’s analysis of the legitimacy of the police actions as they entered the apartment. . . . We therefore remand the excessive force claim against Officer Martin so the district court may determine in the first instance at the appropriate stage of the proceedings whether Officer Martin is entitled to qualified immunity for his use of the beanbag shotgun in light of the totality of circumstances, including the officers’ warrantless entry and the justifications therefor, which must be further developed. The officers’ unlawful entry into Chamberlain’s apartment, if borne out by proven facts, may affect the balancing of factors bearing on whether the officers’ use of force was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.”)

Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 93-97 (2d Cir. 2015) (“Plaintiffs were part of a large group that had gathered on a vehicular ramp approaching the Bridge and on the street behind it, locations generally reserved for vehicular traffic, making it impossible for vehicles to proceed. They do not challenge the conclusion that it would be reasonable for a police officer to infer that plaintiffs either intended to block traffic on the Bridge as part of their protest, or at a minimum were aware of a ‘substantial and unjustifiable risk’ that they were doing so. . . . Rather, they contend that reasonable officers in defendants’ position would also have been aware, or should have been aware, that plaintiffs had a reasonable belief that they had been authorized to cross the Bridge on the vehicular roadway, based on the fact that police officers who had been blocking their progress subsequently retreated and ‘led the march across the bridge,’ which they construed as ‘an actual and apparent grant of permission to follow.’. . . We are not concerned with whether plaintiffs’ asserted belief that the officers’ behavior had given them implied permission to violate traffic laws otherwise banning pedestrians from the roadway would constitute a defense to the charge of disorderly conduct; that issue would be presented to a court adjudicating the criminal charges against plaintiffs. Instead, we are faced with the quite separate question of whether any such defense was so clearly established as a matter of law, and whether the facts establishing that defense were so clearly apparent to the officers on the scene as a matter of fact, that any reasonable officer would have appreciated that there was no legal basis for arresting plaintiffs. . . . We cannot answer that question in the affirmative. . . . It cannot be said that the officers here disregarded known facts clearly establishing a defense. In the confused and boisterous situation confronting the officers, the police were aware that the demonstrators were blocking the roadway in violation of § 240.20(5). They were also certainly aware that no official had expressly authorized the protesters to cross the Bridge via the roadway. To the contrary, the officers would have known that a police official had attempted to advise the protestors through a bullhorn that they were required to disperse. While reasonable officers might perhaps have recognized that much or most of the crowd would be unable to hear the warning due to the noise created by the chanting protesters, it was also apparent that the front rank of demonstrators who presumably were able to hear exhibited no signs of dispersing. The Complaint and videotapes are devoid of any evidence that any police officer made any gesture or spoke any word that unambiguously authorized the protesters to continue to block traffic, and indeed the Complaint does not allege that any of the plaintiffs observed any such gesture. . . . Most importantly, no plaintiff alleges in the Complaint that he or she heard any statement from any police officer authorizing the protestors to cross the Bridge via the vehicular roadway, or observed any unambiguous indication from any police officer inviting the protesters to cross the Bridge in that manner. Nor is any such statement or gesture recorded in the videotapes submitted by the parties and incorporated into the Complaint by reference. Indeed, most of the plaintiffs allege that they did not see anything the police officers did, and simply ‘followed the march’ as it proceeded across the Bridge. . . . Plaintiffs nevertheless insist that, by ceasing to block the demonstrators’ advance and instead turning and walking toward the Brooklyn side of the Bridge, the officers implicitly gave them permission to proceed. That action, however, is inherently ambiguous. It is certainly true that, by removing themselves from the demonstrators’ path, police ‘allowed’ the protesters to advance, in the sense that they stopped physically blocking them. But such an action does not convey, implicitly or explicitly, an invitation to ‘go ahead.’ The failure of a thin line of police officers to physically impede a large group that—based on the actions of those immediately on the front line—would reasonably be understood to be intent on advancing across the Bridge even absent permission does not suggest that those officers understood that the conduct they had ceased physically blocking was lawful, or had been affirmatively authorized by the police. . . . Even conceding that a majority of police officers would not reasonably have understood the retreat as inviting the demonstrators to enter the roadway, plaintiffs suggest that we cannot dismiss the Complaint so long as any officer who participated in the arrests may reasonably have anticipated some protestors to reasonably interpret it as such. The essential flaw in plaintiffs’ logic, and in that of the prior panel opinion, is the extent to which it requires police officers to engage in an essentially speculative inquiry into the potential state of mind of (at least some of) the demonstrators. Neither the law of probable cause nor the law of qualified immunity requires such speculation. Whether or not a suspect ultimately turns out to have a defense, or even whether a reasonable officer might have some idea that such a defense could exist, is not the question. . . . An officer still has probable cause to arrest, and certainly is entitled to qualified immunity, so long as any such defense rests on facts that are so unclear, or a legal theory that is not so clearly established, that it cannot be said that any reasonable officer would understand that an arrest under the circumstances would be unlawful. . . . On the face of the Complaint, the officers were confronted with ambiguities of fact and law. As a matter of fact, the most that is plausibly alleged by the Complaint and the supporting materials is that the police, having already permitted some minor traffic violations along the marchers’ route, and after first attempting to block the protesters from obstructing the vehicular roadway, retreated before the demonstrators in a way that some of the demonstrators may have interpreted as affirmatively permitting their advance. Whether or not such an interpretation was reasonable on their part, it cannot be said that the police’s behavior was anything more than—at best for plaintiffs—ambiguous, or that a reasonable officer would necessarily have understood that the demonstrators would reasonably interpret the retreat as permission to use the roadway. As a matter of law, Cox establishes that, under some circumstances, demonstrators or others who have been advised by the police that their behavior is lawful may not be punished for that behavior. The extent of that principle is less than clear, and we need not decide here how far it might extend. It is enough to say that no clearly established law would make it ‘clear to a reasonable officer,’ . . . that it would be unlawful to arrest individuals who were in prima facie violation of a straightforward statutory prohibition because those individuals may have believed, based on inferences drawn from ambiguous behavior by the police, that they were authorized to violate the statute. . . . Finally, plaintiffs argue that the Complaint may not be dismissed on the pleadings on qualified immunity grounds. It is certainly true that motions to dismiss a plaintiff’s complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis of an affirmative defense will generally face a difficult road. . . . But that does not mean that qualified immunity can never be established at the pleading stage. To the contrary, every case must be assessed on the specific facts alleged in the complaint. The Supreme Court has made clear that qualified immunity can be established by the facts alleged in a complaint, see Wood v. Moss, — U.S. —, 134 S.Ct. 2056 (2014), and indeed, because qualified immunity protects officials not merely from liability but from litigation, that the issue should be resolved when possible on a motion to dismiss, ‘before the commencement of discovery,’ . . . to avoid subjecting public officials to time consuming and expensive discovery procedures. In this case, the facts alleged in the Complaint, and those depicted in the videos, do not bear out plaintiffs’ legal conclusion that the officers’ actions constituted ‘an actual and apparent grant of permission’ to the demonstrators to utilize the roadway. . . . Still less do those facts plausibly describe a situation in which reasonable officers would have clearly understood that their actions were interpreted by the demonstrators as a grant of permission, such that arresting the demonstrators would violate clearly established law. Accordingly, dismissal of the Complaint is required.”)

Velez v. Levy, 401 F.3d 75, 101 (2d Cir. 2005) (“We emphasize that this qualified immunity determination is made in view of the procedural posture of this case. Though Levy is not, as a matter of law, entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings, a factual basis for qualified immunity may arise as the proceedings develop. It may be, after discovery, that Velez cannot adduce the facts necessary to show that Levy based his actions ‘on irrational and non legitimate considerations and pressures and having no rational [connection] to a legitimate state purpose,’ as she alleges in her complaint. But the plaintiff’s assertions that they were so based are not merely conclusory, as can be seen from the Board of Education’s findings, attached to the complaint, which state that the Chancellor’s decision was ‘arbitrary and capricious’ and ‘irrational,’ given that the investigation was ‘grossly flawed’ and ‘could not rationally be relied upon.’ At this stage of the case, we therefore cannot say that, as to the procedural due process claim, qualified immunity based on the Chancellor’s good faith is appropriate.”).

McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 436 (2d Cir. 2004) (“[W]e see no reason why even a traditional qualified immunity defense may not be asserted on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion as long as the defense is based on facts appearing on the face of the complaint. . . . Of course, a defendant presenting an immunity defense on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion instead of a motion for summary judgment must accept the more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route. Not only must the facts supporting the defense appear on the face of the complaint, . . . but, as with all Rule 12(b)(6) motions, the motion may be granted only where ‘it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle him to relief.’ . . . Thus, the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support his claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense. On the other hand, with a motion for summary judgment adequately supported by affidavits, the party opposing the motion cannot rely on allegations in the complaint, but must counter the movant’s affidavits with specific facts showing the existence of genuine issues warranting a trial. . . . A party endeavoring to defeat a lawsuit by a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim faces a ‘higher burden’ than a party proceeding on a motion for summary judgment.”).

McGrady v. Montgomery County, Maryland, No. 20-CV-107-LJV, 2024 WL 1657341, at *2–3 (W.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2024) (“This Court previously concluded that the individual-capacity claims against the state defendants appeared to be barred by qualified immunity because ‘the proceedings against McGrady appear to have been initiated under a facially valid warrant.’ . . . More specifically, the Court noted that ‘an officer who executes an arrest warrant issued in error is immune from suit unless the officer was involved in obtaining the warrant by fraud or the warrant was invalid on its face.’ . . . The Court determined that the state defendants seem to be entitled to qualified immunity because McGrady ‘only state[d] in conclusory fashion that the “defendants knew or should have known” that the warrant [for his arrest] was invalid’ and did not ‘allege[] any facts suggesting that [the state defendants were] involved in obtaining the warrant by fraud or that the warrant was invalid on its face.’ . . . McGrady’s second amended complaint does not cure that deficiency. Again, McGrady alleges in conclusory fashion that ‘the [January 7, 1998] warrant...was fra[u]dulently issued without probable cause’ and that the state defendants ‘were aware of the fraud.’ . . . But he does not provide any facts to support that assertion. . . . The Court recognizes that it is rarely appropriate to grant a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity and that summary judgment is usually the vehicle for such a ruling. . . . Here, however, despite having been given the opportunity to plead a claim that survives qualified immunity, McGrady still ‘has not alleged any reason for the [state defendants] to have doubted the legitimacy of the 1998 [w]arrant.’ . . . For that reason, and based on the facts pleaded in his second and third amended complaints, McGrady’s federal and state law claims against the state defendants are barred by qualified immunity and are therefore dismissed. . . . McGrady argues that he should be allowed ‘to file another amended complaint.’ . . . But McGrady already has amended his complaint twice—once with the benefit of this Court’s analysis—and he provides no reason to think that if given one more chance he will be able to plead additional facts that would cure the deficiencies in his claims. Leave to amend therefore is denied as futile. . . . The Court sympathizes with McGrady, who says that he was arrested and detained based on a warrant that was ‘not valid’ because it was issued in connection with a matter that ‘had been resolved long before’ his arrest. . . . But he has sued one set of defendants over whom this Court cannot exercise jurisdiction, and the other defendants are immune from suit. What is more, he provides no facts suggesting that his arrest and detention were the result of anything other than a mistake. Therefore, and for the reasons stated above and in this Court's previous order, . . . the defendants' motions to dismiss . . . are GRANTED, and McGrady's second amended complaint. . . is dismissed.")

Butler v. Hesch, No. 1:16-CV-1540, 2018 WL 922187, at *18 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 15, 2018) ("On a motion to dismiss, however, a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause 'faces a formidable hurdle ...' and is usually not successful.' Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191-92 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir. 2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, Defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that their actions were objectively reasonable and not patently incompetent. At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case.")

Marlin v. City of New York, No. 15 CI V. 2235 (CM), 2016 WL 4939371, at *1, *6, *16-17 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2016) ("Because Defendants have also brought a motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground of qualified immunity, the Plaintiff has been deposed, in order to fully flesh out his story. To the extent that the deposition testimony elicited Plaintiff's version of the events pleaded in the FAC, it is deemed true for purposes of this pre-answer motion for summary judgment. Stephenson v. John Doe 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 2003); see Individual Practices and Procedures for Judge McMahon, Rule IV.E.3. It seems that a number of questions were put at the deposition seeking to undermine the truth of what Plaintiff asserted. That is all very well and good, but as will be discussed below, it is irrelevant to a qualified immunity motion made at this early stage of proceedings. At this pre-answer stage, a court considering a motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity properly takes the plaintiff's story as true and asks whether a reasonable police officer standing in the shoes of each of the defendants could have thought that his actions, as described by the plaintiff, were constitutionally compliant. This is not the time for asserting that Plaintiff's story is not true, or that things did not happen as Plaintiff described them, or for establishing that the police officers did nothing wrong (which the City has a lamentable habit of confusing with qualified immunity). . . . In deciding the issue of qualified immunity, 'the defendants' version of the facts is absolutely irrelevant.' . . . Accordingly, this Court does not take testimony from defendants or otherwise consider their version of events. . . Pursuant to this Court's Individual Rules, when any defendant raises a qualified immunity defense, I insist that the plaintiff amplify the 'short, plain statement' in the complaint with testimony that fully fleshes out his story. For purposes of this aspect of the motion (which is really a motion for summary judgment), the Court relies on evidence in the FAC as amplified by Plaintiff's deposition testimony. Time and time again, this Court finds that municipal defendants conflate qualified immunity with arguments relating to the merits of a claim. In many cases, defendants file a notice of motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and proceed to make arguments for dismissal of Plaintiff's claims that have nothing to do with qualified immunity. For instance, defendants may argue that the plaintiff fails to plead facts sufficient to make out a constitutional violation, or that things did not happen in quite the way the Plaintiff says they did. The instant motion raising the qualified immunity defense is no exception. Thus, the Court finds it necessary to remind Defendants that an official is often entitled to dismissal or summary judgment ‘not because of qualified immunity, but because he did nothing wrong.’ . . . And indeed, as we shall see, only one of plaintiff’s many claims is dismissible on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . In the excessive force context, the analysis required to determine whether an officer deserves qualified immunity converges with the analysis used to determine whether force was excessive under the Fourth Amendment: both inquiries hinge on a determination of objective reasonableness. . . . Both analyses require asking: ‘Whether in the particular circumstances faced by the officer, a reasonable officer would believe that the force was lawful.’ . . . In cases involving the ‘sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,’ it may be appropriate to afford the defendants an ‘extra layer of protection.’ . . . This is not one of those ‘hazy’ cases. No reasonable officer could possibly believe that he needed to use so much force to subdue a non-resisting arrestee as to dislocate and fracture his elbow, causing long-lasting damage. Taking Plaintiff’s account of events as true, Defendants’ pre-answer motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity is denied.”)

Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 375 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (“On a motion to dismiss. . . a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause ‘ “faces a formidable hurdle . . .” and is usually not successful.’ Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191–92 (2d Cir.2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir.2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, the defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that ‘the officers were objectively reasonable and patently not incompetent.’ . . . At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case. Because the complaint plausibly alleges that there was no probable cause to arrest Higginbotham for a violation of any of the four statutes suggested by the defendants, and because the defendants are not at this stage entitled to qualified immunity, Higginbotham has adequately stated a section 1983 false arrest claim.”)

But see Higginbotham v. Sylvester, No. 14-CV-8549 (PKC), 2016 WL 6496253, at *3–5 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2016) (“All fact discovery has been completed and the determination of whether probable cause existed is ripe for determination. . . . The summary judgment record includes the size of Higginbotham and his camera, the dimensions of the phone booth, and a visual depiction of the crowd surrounding the phone booth. The Court concludes that probable cause existed to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law §§ 120.20. . . . The undisputed facts surrounding Higginbotham’s ascent of the phone booth demonstrate that a person of reasonable caution would infer that Higginbotham acted recklessly in creating a substantial risk of serious physical injury to another person. It can reasonably be inferred that Higginbotham was aware of the risk of climbing atop the phone booth based on the fact that he was only able to do so by first climbing on top of police barricades. . . . Higginbotham was also aware of the large crowd that was tightly packed around the phone booth in question when he climbed to the top of it. . . Indeed, the video recording and pictures of Higginbotham atop the phone booth show that protestors and other camerapersons stood directly below Higginbotham while he filmed from above. . . Nevertheless, Higginbotham climbed more than seven feet above the tightly-packed crowd and filmed the protest, all while balancing a 30-pound camera on his shoulder. . . And because Higginbotham had climbed atop of the phone booth once before, he knew that the roof was not flat, but curved. . . Based on Higginbotham's position above the crowd atop a phone booth with a curved roof, probable cause existed for a reasonable person to believe that Higginbotham consciously disregarded the risk of losing his balance and falling or dropping his camera from more than seven feet in the air. . . . Because the Court concludes that there was probable cause for Higginbotham's arrest, 'a fortiori, [defendants] would be entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.' . . However, even if probable cause was lacking, defendants would nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity. Officers are entitled to qualified immunity for false arrest claims if they can establish that they had "arguable probable cause" to arrest the plaintiff.' . . Here, the evidence is sufficient to support a finding of arguable probable cause to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law § 120.20. That is to say, it was objectively reasonable for the arresting officers to believe that probable cause existed, or at the very least, for officers of reasonable competence to disagree on whether probable cause existed.")

Bonilla v. City of York, No. 1:14-CV-2238, 2015 WL 1525483, at *7 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 2, 2015) ("The present case is one of the 'vast majority of cases' in which a determination of qualified immunity is inappropriate at the pleading stage. When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the complaint alleges a plausible violation of Bonilla's Fourth Amendment rights through the use of excessive force. As this court has previously stated, 'the protections of the Fourth Amendment are sufficiently clear that [the officers] should have known that shooting [the decedent] to death violated those protections.' Williams, 30 F.Supp.3d at 314. The question therefore becomes, once again, whether the officer responsible for firing the fatal shot was objectively reasonable in doing so. Because there are unresolved issues of historical fact material to the reasonableness of Officer Roosen's and Officer Jordan's actions, including if and when they knew Bonilla was unarmed or had surrendered, it is premature at the motion to dismiss stage for the court to determine that either Officer Roosen or Officer Jordan is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.)

Doriety for Estate of Crenshaw v. Sletten, 109 F.4th 670, 679-81 (4th Cir. 2024) ("We have not previously addressed in a published decision whether and in what manner a trial court may consider a video recording at the motion to dismiss stage. But we have explained that when a district court considers a video recording of a police encounter at the summary judgment stage, a court must credit the plaintiff's version of the facts to the extent they are not 'blatantly contradicted’ by the recording. . . .In agreement with our sister circuits, we now conclude that the same standard applies to a trial court’s consideration of a video recording at the motion to dismiss stage. . . . Accordingly, we hold that a district court can consider a video submitted at the motion to dismiss stage when (1) the video is ‘integral’ to the complaint and its authenticity is not challenged, but (2) only to the extent that the video ‘clearly depicts a set of facts contrary to those alleged in the complaint,’ or ‘blatantly contradicts’ the plaintiff’s allegations, rendering the plaintiff’s allegations implausible. . . . [W]e conclude that the video ‘falls far below [the] high bar’ of blatantly contradicting the plaintiff’s allegations. . . . It is difficult to discern many critical details from the video. . . . We hold that at the motion to dismiss stage the plaintiff’s allegations are sufficient to allege a plausible claim of excessive force. Because the video recording did not blatantly contradict the plaintiff’s allegations regarding the location of the officer and the trajectory of the moving car at the time each shot was fired, the district court erred in construing the facts in a manner inconsistent with the plaintiff’s allegations. Based on the plaintiff’s allegations, a reasonable officer in Officer Sletten’s position would not think that the stolen car, which was moving away from the officer, posed a significant and immediate threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer that would justify his conduct of firing one shot through the car’s windshield and additional shots through the car’s passenger window. . . . In reaching these conclusions in this case, we recognize that law enforcement officers regularly are placed in threatening situations and are not as a matter of course required to ‘ponder the[] many conflicting factors’ or ‘risk[] losing their last chance to defend themselves’ by ‘paus[ing] for even for an instant.’ . . . Nonetheless, courts must be mindful not to short-circuit at the motion to dismiss stage a plaintiff’s plausible claim of excessive force based on a video that does not blatantly contradict those allegations.”)

Riddick v. Barber, 109 F.4th 639, 650 n.5 (4th Cir. 2024) (“The defendants also briefly argue that we may affirm the dismissal of Riddick’s complaint on a ground the district court expressly declined to address: that they are entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity defenses are ‘usually not successful’ at this early stage in the proceedings, where plaintiffs must present only ‘a claim that is plausible on its face.’ . . . This case does not appear to be an exception; whether the defendants violated clearly established law will turn at least in part on whether, as plausibly alleged, the defendants substantially departed from accepted professional judgment in restraining and secluding Riddick.”)

Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926, 930-31 (4th Cir. 2022) (“Even if they committed the violations, Defendants posit, case law that existed in 2012, when their latest solitary-confinement program went into effect, simply did not put them on notice that either the conditions themselves or the procedures used to decide who belongs in them violated the Constitution. The problem for Defendants, however, is that they invoke qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss, before any of the evidence is in. And on the facts Plaintiffs have pleaded, Defendants cannot succeed: On the Eighth Amendment charge, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged—even by Defendants’ own measure—that Defendants knew the harms long-term solitary confinement causes and disregarded them. But qualified immunity does not protect knowing violations of the law. . . . As to the Fourteenth, Plaintiffs suggest Defendants violated even the most foundational due process guarantees: notice and an opportunity to respond. Defendants cannot meaningfully argue they did not know due process requires at least that much. . . Defendants' contentions boil down to disagreements over the facts: what they knew and when, and what procedures they offered in practice. But at this stage, we take Plaintiffs' allegations as true and affirm the district court's denial of the motion to dismiss.")

Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 317-18 (4th Cir. 2019) ("It cannot be put more plainly: we previously considered whether Robinson's allegations stated a claim against Lioi because we were considering only the district court's decision to deny a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Now, we are reviewing whether Robinson's evidence supports a claim against Lioi and Russell because we are considering the district court's decision to grant a motion for summary judgment under Rule 56(a). . . . Unlike the first time this case came before us, we are no longer obliged to accept Robinson's allegations as true. While Robinson is still entitled to have the record viewed in the light most favorable to her, we can no longer simply accept her characterizations of what occurred. Now that the parties have completed discovery, we have a 'fully-developed record' to apply 'to those allegations upon a motion for summary judgment,' . . . and Robinson must present more than a 'scintilla' of evidence to support her allegations[.] . . There is also nothing remarkable in concluding that some plaintiffs whose claims survive a motion to dismiss are unable to meet their burden to survive summary judgment. . . .Discovery produced substantially different facts than Robinson alleged in her Complaint which requires us to alter our understanding of the factual underpinnings of Robinson's claim for purposes of summary judgment. Based on this divergence, the law-of-the-case doctrine does not constrain our review of how the governing legal principles apply to Robinson's claim. At bottom, the evidence that Robinson marshaled during discovery demonstrates that Russell and Lioi's conduct cannot support a state-created danger substantive due process claim and that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Cloaninger ex rel. Estate of Cloaninger v. McDevitt, 555 F.3d 324, 331 (4th Cir. 2009) ("The procedural framework for evaluating a claim of qualified immunity is therefore clear: when the defendant in a § 1983 action raises a qualified immunity defense, the court ordinarily assesses whether the plaintiff's complaint states sufficient factual allegations that, if true, show a violation of clearly established constitutional rights. To do so, the plaintiff's complaint must allege conduct a reasonable officer would know to be unlawful. However, when there has been discovery and the defendants challenge through a motion for summary judgment the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to support the allegations of his complaint, including his description of their conduct, an evaluation of the complaint's sufficiency is unnecessary and may unduly prolong the defendants' entanglement in litigation if the court can determine that the plaintiff's evidence does not support his allegations. In that circumstance, the familiar standard for summary judgment under Rule 56 applies.").

Doe v. Montgomery County Board of Education, No. CV 21-0356 PJM, 2021 WL 6072813, at *16 (D. Md. Dec. 23, 2021) ("While this is yet another close call, the Court concludes that neither Defendant Crouse nor Defendant Sullivan is entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. The determination of whether it was objectively reasonable to conclude that as school officials, knowing what they knew, and failing to do what they were specifically supposed to do, they were not required to provide protection against sexual assault by one or more students against the students on school property requires a closer examination of the knowledge Defendants Crouse and Sullivan actually possessed in 2017 and 2018. . . The question of whether Defendants Crouse and Sullivan are entitled to qualified immunity, therefore, is not ripe for decision at this stage of the proceedings. The Court believes it would more properly be addressed on summary judgment.”)

Quigley v. City of Huntington, W. Virginia, No. 3:17-CV-01906, 2017 WL 4998647, at *6 (S.D.W. Va. Nov. 2, 2017) (“The United States Supreme Court has made clear that a ruling on qualified immunity should be made early in the proceedings. . . Qualified immunity acts ‘as an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.’ . . Therefore, the entitlement to the immunity is ‘effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.’ . But where qualified immunity is presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, ‘the defense faces a formidable hurdle and is usually not successful.’ . Only if the plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim on its face, may a Court dismiss a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . But the Court will not dismiss a complaint where the plaintiff supplies sufficient detail regarding the claim to demonstrate a ‘more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits.’ . Applying that standard to this case, it must be apparent on the face of the complaint that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. But, from the facts alleged, Plaintiff could plausibly demonstrate the officer violated a clearly established right, and thus is not entitled to the protective cloaking of qualified immunity, at this stage. This does not mean, however, that Plaintiff’s objection is correct. Plaintiff’s contention that qualified immunity should be denied as a matter of law fails to persuade this Court. Consistent with the applicable standard for a motion to dismiss, this Court has assumed the factual allegations in Plaintiff’s complaint are true. To rule, as Plaintiff wants, that, based upon that assumption of truth, the officer is stripped of his qualified immunity protection would be a fool’s errand. That simply would not comport with the sound reasoning and judgment that is required of this Court.”).

Bakutis v. Dean, 129 F.4th 299, 307 (5th Cir. 2025) (“Here, Jefferson was watching her nephew and heard someone outside of her home in the middle of the night. She, unsurprisingly, walked to the window to see who was there. Nothing suggests that Jefferson knew the police were at her home. Jefferson was not fleeing from the police. There is no allegation that she was violent or aggressive. And Dean does not assert that he believed Jefferson posed an immediate and significant threat to him or others. He does not allege that he saw her holding a weapon. . . Under these circumstances, it is clearly established that Dean was required to announce himself as an officer and issue a warning, prior to employing deadly force. . . Based on the current record, every reasonable officer would have known that it is objectively unreasonable to shoot someone under these circumstances. At the 12(b)(6) stage we Affirm the district court’s denial of Dean’s motion to dismiss because of qualified immunity. This does not foreclose Dean from re-asserting qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage or even at trial, if facts reveal that deadly force might have been objectively reasonable and a warning could not be given. . . There are a number of key facts unknown at this stage, including whether Jefferson was holding a weapon. A defendant's request for qualified immunity should be granted at the earliest possible stage of litigation, but only if he is entitled to it. . . Dean may ultimately be entitled to prevail against the plaintiff regarding the objective reasonableness of his conduct, but not on the record we have upon this 12(b)(6) motion.”)

Guerra v. Castillo, No. 22-40196, 2023 WL 5764278, at *7 (5th Cir. Sept. 7, 2023) (“In sum, because Reyna ‘generated’ the basic facts in the probable cause affidavits, such that the district court was correct to deny his Rule 12 motion based on potential Franks liability, . . . it follows a fortiori that Castillo ‘generated’ the basic facts in the probable cause affidavits and the district court erred by granting his Rule 12 motion. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court’s dismissal of Guerra’s false arrest claim against Castillo and REMAND for further proceedings. . . Fifth Circuit case law between 2003 (Castellano) and 2021 (Anokwuru) explicitly denied the possibility of a constitutional malicious prosecution claim. When evaluating whether Castillo violated clearly established law for purposes of our qualified immunity analysis, we consider whether the law was clearly established ‘at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct.’ . . We AFFIRM the district court’s Rule 12 dismissal of Guerra’s malicious prosecution claim against Castillo because this court’s caselaw explicitly disclaimed the existence of a constitutional claim for malicious prosecution at the time of Castillo’s alleged conduct in 2018 and 2019 and Guerra has identified no Supreme Court case law from the same period acknowledging such a claim. . . Guerra plausibly alleges that his refusal to direct his subordinate to drop the DWI charges, despite Castillo’s urging, was a but-for cause and substantial motivation for Castillo’s retaliatory acts. But Guerra has failed to put forward any law that suggests Guerra’s refusal to do as his direct superior asked, in the context of his employment as a patrol sergeant, constitutes First Amendment protected speech, let alone that it is First Amendment protected speech under clearly established law. . . Given that this is a qualified immunity context, ‘[i]t is the plaintiff’s burden to demonstrate that qualified immunity is inappropriate,’ even at the motion to dismiss stage. . . We conclude that Guerra has failed to overcome Castillo’s qualified immunity because he has put forward no authority relevant to the question whether his refusal was protected speech. . . We AFFIRM the district court’s dismissal of Guerra’s First Amendment claim against Castillo.”)

Herrera v. Acevedo, No. 21-20520, 2022 WL 17547449, at *3 (5th Cir. Dec. 9, 2022) (not reported) (“Here, the district court stated at the motion hearing that it could not yet dismiss Herrera’s First and Fourth Amendment claims against the defendants because of the existence of ‘clearly established law on preventing arrest without probable cause and arrest for the purpose of chilling protected speech.’ We agree. . . Here, according to Herrera’s amended complaint, he ‘had not obstructed any roadway, yet he was arrested for violating Texas’s roadway obstruction statute while attempting to participate in a constitutionally protected peaceful protest. It is unclear from this record if HPD officers had probable cause to arrest Herrera during the protest. In turn, it is unclear if there was a violation of Herrera's First and Fourth Amendment rights when he was arrested. As the district court observed, '[t]here's no way to make a determination ... right now whether [Herrera] was or was not violating Texas Penal Code.' If the facts in Herrera's complaint are taken to be true, however, he has at minimum pled enough 'to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face' and thus survives the motion-to-dismiss stage. . . Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in denying the defendants' motion to dismiss on grounds of qualified immunity.")

Ristow v. Hansen, No. 17-50121, 2018 WL 671150, ____ n.12 (5th Cir. Feb. 1, 2018) (not reported) ("Ristow insists that the officers should not be allowed to raise a qualified immunity defense in their motion to dismiss, but instead must wait to raise that defense until they file their answer. We have previously urged that '[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved "at the earliest possible stage in litigation."' . . According to this principle, the district court was correct in addressing the officers' claims to qualified immunity at this stage in the litigation. See, e.g., Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 683 (5th Cir. 2017) (addressing qualified immunity defense raised in a motion to dismiss).")

Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 369 F.3d 504, 506, 507 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has recognized that the second step of the Harlow test is different at the summary judgment stage than it is when the defendant asserts qualified immunity after the initial pleadings. [citing Behrens] 'At the earlier stage, it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized....' . . . On summary judgment, 'the plaintiff can no longer rest on the pleadings' and the court must look 'to the evidence before it (in the light most favorable to the plaintiff) in conducting the Harlow inquiry.' . . . Consequently, the court must highlight evidence that, if interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, identifies conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . By outlining this factual scenario the court does not make a determination that the alleged conduct occurred. Rather, it concludes that there is evidence in the record that, when interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, establishes conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . Ordinarily the district court in denying the summary judgment motion will outline 'the factual scenario it believes emerges from viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable' to the plaintiff. . . It will also highlight the evidence in the record supporting its conclusions, and it will determine whether the defendant's conduct, as outlined in the factual scenario, was 'objectively reasonable' in light of the relevant clearly established law. . . In cases where the district court failed to outline the relevant factual scenario and the evidence in the record establishing the relevant conduct, the Supreme Court has authorized 'the court of appeals [to] undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.' . . We, however, have determined that there is another option in these situations. In certain cases, rather than combing through the record ourselves and concluding what factual scenario the district court likely assumed in applying the Harlow test, we will remand to the district court so that it can outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision. . . Although we are not required to make such a remand, in some cases it may provide a 'more efficient alternative.' . . In this case, the district court did not outline the factual scenario it assumed in construing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to the Officers. In fact, it appears that it rested its ruling solely on the allegations made by the Officers in their Third Amended Complaint. This would be improper in light of the Supreme Court's instructions in Behrens. Considering it is not clear that the district court assumed a factual scenario supported by summary judgment evidence in applying the Harlow test, and if it did, what that factual scenario is, the more 'efficient alternative' in this case is to remand to the district court for it to outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision."), on remand to Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 2004 WL 2402439 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 10, 2004), vacated and remanded, 388 F.3d 464 (5th Cir. 2004).

Alfred v. Collins, No. Civ.A. H-03-2904, 2006 WL 492355, at *9 n.6 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 28, 2006) ("There is an implicit divergence of authority in this Circuit about the procedure for assessing the first prong of a qualified immunity defense in response to a summary judgment motion. Many appellate panels state that the issue is whether the plaintiff has 'alleged' facts establishing a constitutional violation, thus suggesting that the district court should not consider uncontroverted evidence presented by a defendant in the summary judgment motion. The Linbrugger case is the only case the Court can locate in which the issue is addressed. It is possible that the terminology focusing on what the plaintiff 'alleges' stems from the early practice that qualified immunity would be addressed on motions to dismiss. 'Qualified immunity is "an entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation."' . . Courts are to make the qualified immunity analysis 'early in the proceedings so that the costs and expenses of trial are avoided where the defense is dispositive.' . . Nevertheless, as a practical matter, defendants often, in an effort to develop the facts in the hopes of obtaining favorable rulings on the second qualified immunity prong, willingly engage in discovery and then seek qualified immunity rulings through summary judgment motions.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Cooperrider v. Woods, 127 F.4th 1019, 1036 (6th Cir. 2025) ("We have repeatedly cautioned . . . that 'it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.' . . Although the Supreme Court has directed that qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point in the proceedings,' . . . 'that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12[.]' . . This is because, '[a]bsent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is 'obvious' or 'squarely governed' by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not' for purposes of determining whether a right is clearly established.'" . . Thus, 'even though we retain jurisdiction over this type of appeal, this Court generally denies qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage in order for the case to proceed to discovery, so long as the plaintiff states a plausible claim for relief.'")

Cooperrider v. Woods, 127 F.4th 1019, 1036, 1040 (6th Cir. 2025) (“All parties agree that Cooperrider engaged in protected speech when he wrote critically of the Governor and his administration’s response to the COVID-19 pandemic. The question before us, then, is whether Cooperrider adequately pleaded an adverse action taken by the Defendants—i.e., the initiation and continuation of enforcement proceedings against Brewed and the permanent revocation of Brewed’s alcohol license—and that the action was causally connected to Cooperrider’s protected speech. The district court determined that the complaint failed plausibly to allege a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . We disagree. . . . Having concluded that the complaint successfully states a First Amendment retaliation claim, we next address whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . In the context of a motion to dismiss, ‘[t]he test is whether, reading the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it is plausible that an official’s acts violated the plaintiff’s clearly established constitutional right.’ . . ‘The law is well settled in this Circuit that retaliation under color of law for the exercise of First Amendment rights is unconstitutional.’ . . And we have ‘clearly stated that private citizens have a First Amendment right to criticize public officials and to be free from retaliation for doing so.’ . . We therefore conclude that the complaint plausibly alleges that Beshear, Perry, and Duke violated Cooperrider’s clearly established right to criticize the state government without retaliation. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Beshear, Perry, and Duke as to Cooperrider’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Cooperrider v. Woods, 127 F.4th 1019, 1052-53 (6th Cir. 2025) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I agree with the majority that the defendants do not enjoy qualified immunity. But I disagree with the idea that timing has anything to do with the decision. While the majority correctly holds that the district court erred in finding that the defendants deserved qualified immunity, it’s important to remember that courts have the power to evaluate qualified immunity claims at the motion to dismiss stage. In recent years, the timing of qualified immunity determinations has generated considerable confusion. On the one hand, judges have explained that an officer’s ‘entitle[ment] to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point.’ . . And we’ve said the motion to dismiss stage is just such a moment. . . On the other hand, other judges have reasoned that the appropriate point is ‘usually summary judgment and not dismissal.’ . . The majority falls into this latter camp, asserting that it’s inappropriate to make such a determination at the motion to dismiss stage. But that’s incorrect. How so? Qualified immunity isn’t a factual question. Instead, at the motion to dismiss stage, a court should accept the facts in the plaintiff’s complaint as true and consider whether the defendant violated clearly established constitutional rights. . . That’s a classic legal issue, which is why courts can review it on an interlocutory appeal. . . Thus, the mere fact that a pleading sits at the motion to dismiss stage doesn’t mean this court can’t resolve a qualified immunity defense. It can—and often should.”)

Blackwell v. Nocerini, 123 F.4th 479, 490-92 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Even if the complaint alleged the absence of probable cause, the City Officials respond that it did not plausibly plead that they pursued the stalking charge in retaliation for Blackwell’s political speech. To the contrary, the Supreme Court adopted the lack-of-probable-cause requirement for retaliatory-prosecution claims because of this requirement's 'powerful evidentiary significance' in establishing retaliatory animus (and the causal connection between the speech and the prosecution). . . . So a complaint that pleads the lack of probable cause goes a long way toward pleading causation. Further, Nocerini allegedly alerted Strong about Blackwell soon after Blackwell criticized her at the meeting in January 2019. When combined with the lack of probable cause, this short 'time gap' suffices to allege causation at this early stage. . . . What is the appropriate level of generality in Blackwell's case? We see room for debate on this question. On the one hand, recall that his retaliatory-prosecution claim requires him to prove the absence of probable cause. . . . Because probable cause turns on the totality of the circumstances, officers often will struggle over how this 'general standard' applies to specific facts. . . . When considering search-or-seizure claims under the Fourth Amendment, then, a plaintiff who seeks to show the violation of a clearly established right must usually identify cases that found a lack of probable cause in similar circumstances. . . . Plaintiffs can avoid this requirement to identify similar caselaw only in 'the rare "obvious case"' in which any reasonable officer would have recognized the absence of probable cause. . . . Now that the Court has incorporated a probable-cause element into this First Amendment context, one might argue that retaliatory-prosecution plaintiffs must likewise identify factually similar probable-cause caselaw. And Blackwell's briefing did not even attempt to do so. On the other hand, retaliatory-prosecution claims under the First Amendment differ from Fourth Amendment claims in a material way. The Fourth Amendment generally adopts an objective test that renders an officer's motives for an action irrelevant. . . . A First Amendment retaliatory-prosecution claim, by contrast, requires plaintiffs to prove more than the absence of probable cause. This claim also requires a defendant to have harbored a 'retaliatory motive' for a prosecution. . . . That officers must have acted with 'subjective animus' in the First Amendment context reduces the concern that they will not know that their conduct violates the law. . . . So perhaps plaintiffs should have to prove only that the officers harbored this retaliatory intent and that they acted without probable cause (without the need to identify similar probable-cause cases). . . . After all, wouldn't any officer 'immediately' recognize the 'unlawfulness' of pursuing a prosecution for the purpose of punishing speech protected by the First Amendment? . . . The Supreme Court has recognized the illegality of this conduct since Hartman in 2006. . . . In the end, though, we need not resolve this debate at this stage given that we must accept the complaint's allegations. If those allegations are true, the City Officials could not seek qualified immunity even under the more defendant-friendly test. It would have been 'obvious' to any reasonable officer that the three incidents that allegedly led the City Officials to pursue charges against Blackwell did not establish probable cause that he had engaged in stalking. . . . So Blackwell did not need to identify analogous probable-cause caselaw to get past the pleading stage. And we can save for another day whether he must do so at the summary-judgment stage.") Diei v. Boyd, 116 F.4th 637, 648, 650-51 (6th Cir. 2024) ("[D]efendants argue that, even if the complaint fairly alleges unconstitutional conduct on their part, they are entitled to qualified immunity because Diei's rights were not "'clearly established"' at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . . On this front, it bears noting the present procedural posture—a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. That fact can be decisive. For '[a]lthough an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment,’ given the record development that typically occurs during discovery. . . Either way, clearly established law ‘should not be defined at a high level of generality.’ . . An ‘existing precedent’ must place the contours of the right ‘beyond debate.’ . . Here, the right at issue is Diei’s ability to post online, under a pseudonym, about topics unrelated to her studies in a way that did not materially interfere with the pedagogical interests of the College. Against that backdrop, we ask whether a reasonable public official would have understood that Diei’s speech was protected. . . Diei points to three cases to demonstrate that her rights were clearly established. . . . Based on Diei’s complaint, the College’s treatment of her speech clearly transgressed the school’s authority. Diei alleges that her speech did not concern her courses, classmates, or school, nor did it have any disruptive effect on school activities. Further, Diei alleges that she never received the professionalism policies that gave rise to her punishment. In Diei’s case, then, the professionalism policies served no pedagogical purpose. Ward clearly established that Diei’s speech, as alleged, was beyond the purview of her educators’ control. At this stage, we need not decide whether the policies actually tracked the norms of the profession or were too vague to provide Diei with sufficient notice of prohibited conduct. As for Papish and Reno, defendants argue that the rights described in those cases are defined at a high level of generality. Standing alone, this may well be true. But Papish held that universities cannot punish a student solely based on the content of her speech. . . And by establishing that the First Amendment does not differentiate between online and offline speech, Reno extended Papish’s protections to online student speech. . . In conjunction with Ward, these cases put it ‘beyond debate’ that the speech, as alleged, was protected. . . . That we sit at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage bears repeating. Oftentimes, we need a fuller factual picture to define the contours of the right at issue to determine if it was clearly established, . . . especially so in the First Amendment context[.] . . At this point, we accept Diei’s well-pleaded allegations as true. Those allegations disclaim receipt or knowledge of the professionalism policy under which Diei was purportedly disciplined. So we cannot, at this stage, credit the College’s claimed pedagogical purposes when it is plausibly alleged they were unknown to Diei. As the record develops, it may reveal that Diei’s speech was not clearly protected. . . For example, her speech may have disrupted the College in ways not apparent from the complaint. Such evidence would affect the qualified immunity analysis. Today, we merely hold that Diei’s speech, as alleged, was clearly protected by the First Amendment. At this preliminary stage, then, defendants do not deserve dismissal based on qualified immunity.”) Saalim v. Walmart, Inc., 97 F.4th 995, 1002 n.4 (6th Cir. 2024) (“The dissent suggests that we should consider the video because it has been admitted into the record and because the dissent believes that it is ‘dispositive’ of the issues in the case. . . To be sure, the video will likely be important evidence in either a later summary judgment motion or in a trial. However, as we have consistently noted, the fact that there is video evidence of an encounter does not permit us to overlook the Rule 12(c) standard of review in the name of ‘efficien[cy].’ . . Instead, our precedent dictates that we may only consider the video when reviewing a Rule 12 motion to the extent that the video ‘blatantly contradict[s]’ the allegations in the complaint. . . The dissent identifies no blatant contradictions between the video depiction of the events and the allegations in the

Saalim v. Walmart, Inc., 97 F.4th 995, 1017-19 (6th Cir. 2024) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“[I]n this case, the parties, the district court, and this panel have readily available for review an undisputed and indisputable video recording of exactly what happened. The raw video from Deputy Bretzloff’s body cam, which captured the entire encounter, is admissible—and admitted—record evidence. In fact, Saalim’s complaint expressly relies on that video, citing to it extensively. Thus, the district court (and now this panel) was left simply to decide whether ‘the events recorded on the tape justified the officers’ conduct.’ . . . After watching the video, I am confident that an officer in that same circumstance could reasonably have determined that Saalim was actively resisting and not merely unable to comply. Moreover, no reasonable juror could characterize Saalim’s behavior here as ‘compliance.’ Therefore, considering the reasonableness of Officer Bretzloff’s actions under the totality of the circumstances leads me to conclude that he is entitled to qualified immunity in this case. Now the video. . . . There is no dispute that this video is admissible—in fact, already admitted—evidence that is relevant and reliable. It is not merely relevant, however; it is dispositive. At trial, the finder of fact (judge or jury) will simply watch the video and determine whether Deputy Bretzloff’s actions were within the wide bounds of reasonableness under the circumstances. . . . Saalim’s description of the events (from his complaint, deposition, or trial testimony) will be as irrelevant as the district court’s description of those events in the underlying opinion and the panel majority’s description herein. More to the point, because the dispositive video is in the record, the court’s standard is the same regardless of the motion, be it a motion to dismiss, judgment on the pleadings, summary judgment, or directed verdict. In ruling on any such motion, the court must determine whether any reasonable juror could look at that evidence (i.e., that video) and find the officer’s actions impermissibly unreasonable. Therefore, to apply this test properly and efficiently, we (like the district court) must ‘view[] the facts in the light depicted by the videotape,’ as the Court told us in Scott[.] . . . Because I believe the district court appropriately considered the video evidence before it and correctly granted Deputy Bretzloff qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent.”)

Brown v. Giles, 95 F.4th 436, 441 (6th Cir. 2024) (“The dissent points out that the lack of sound from an audio recording may not be ‘reliabl[e].’ . . . But we don’t just rely on the lack of sound. The presence of the taser sound when Officer Giles initially tases Brown, contrasted with the conspicuous silence mere seconds later, belies his claims. And Brown never even tries to explain why the taser would fire silently a few seconds after firing audibly. Qualified immunity gives police officers immunity from suit ‘at the earliest possible stage.’ . . . Officer Giles appropriately raised qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. Thus, he is entitled to qualified immunity now.”)

Brown v. Giles, 95 F.4th 436, 444-45 (6th Cir. 2024) (White, J., dissenting) (“The lead opinion also concludes that Giles’s second alleged use of the taser—after Brown hit the pavement and was incapacitated—never happened because the bodycam video ‘blatantly contradict[s]’ Brown’s allegations that it occurred[.] . . I disagree. This negative deduction hinges on the absence of a sound and cites a single unpublished district-court decision for the proposition that a taser necessarily makes a sound whenever used. . . . Here, the first tasing occurred in probe mode (two probes shot as a projectile), while the second tasing is alleged to have occurred in drive-stun mode (direct contact between the taser and Brown’s body). More fundamentally, however, ‘[t]he lack of sound on an audio recording cannot be reliably used to discount’ testimony at the summary judgment stage, . . . let alone allegations in a complaint. ‘Many factors could affect what sounds are recorded, including the volume of the sound, the nature of the activity at issue, the location of the microphone, whether the microphone was on or off, and whether the microphone was covered.’ . . Thus, it is inappropriate to assume the absence of a second tasing from the absence of a sound despite ‘[t]he presence of the taser sound’ during the first tasing[.] . . Again, the two alleged tasings occurred in different modes, and the ‘[m]any factors’ affecting ‘what sounds are recorded’ could apply at some but not other points of an audio recording[.] . . In short, it cannot be said based on the video that it is blatant—‘completely obvious,’ . . . that Giles did not use his taser a second time. Further factual development should be permitted on Brown’s claim based on this allegation, too.”)

Sterling Hotels, LLC v. McKay, 71 F.4th 463, 466-67 (6th Cir. 2023) (“Sterling overstates our circuit’s ‘general preference’ for deciding qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage, rather than on the pleadings. . . True, the ‘precise factual basis for the plaintiff’s claim or claims may be hard to identify’ before discovery. . . At the pleadings stage, however, the court takes the complaint’s factual allegations as true and decides whether—based on those facts—the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . If so, the case is over; if not, the denial of immunity is provisional, since the court may revisit the issue on summary judgment—where the court will take as true only the facts as to which the plaintiff has created a ‘genuine issue.’ . . In sum, a district court must adjudicate a motion to dismiss on grounds of qualified immunity.”)

MacIntosh v. Clous, 69 F.4th 309, 315 (6th Cir., 2023) (“Although the plaintiff ultimately bears the burden of showing that a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity, that burden is not high at the 12(b)(6) stage: Reading the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, it need only be ‘plausible’ that an official’s acts violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . And although qualified immunity is available at the motion to dismiss stage, ‘it is generally inappropriate . . . to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.’ . . As we have often explained, ‘an officer’s “entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest point,”’ but ‘that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.’ . . This is for good reason—development of the factual record is ‘frequently necessary to decide whether the official’s actions violated clearly established law.’”)

Myers v. City of Centerville, Ohio, 41 F.4th 746, 756-59 (6th Cir. 2022) (“[I]n punting a decision on qualified immunity, the district court effectively denied it—as it unlocked discovery without answering the ‘threshold immunity question.’ . . We therefore have jurisdiction to review that order. Myers says that’s wrong, but for a different reason. Citing Johnson v. Jones, . . . he argues

we lack jurisdiction because the district court, in his view, found ‘that the factual record [wa]s insufficient for a determination at this stage of the proceedings.’ True, Johnson held that a denial of a summary-judgment motion raising qualified immunity is not immediately appealable if it ‘determines only a question of “evidence sufficiency,” i.e., which facts a party may, or may not, be able to prove at trial.’ . . . But Johnson does not logically extend to the pleadings stage, a stage at which the court must assume all well-pleaded facts as true. . . . Because all facts are assumed as true, it follows that ‘there cannot be any disputed questions of fact’ when deciding a motion for judgment on the pleadings. . . . Johnson’s bar is thus not triggered, . . . and that’s so despite the district court’s expressed reasons for denying the motion—because ‘our review solely involves applying principles of law to a given and assumed set of facts[.]’ Our authority to review the defendants’ qualified-immunity defense is therefore clear. And that review extends to the merits-based, legal question of whether Myers engaged in constitutionally protected speech (the only element the defendants challenge now) and thereby plausibly alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Though we cannot know for sure, it’s a fair guess that the district court relied on Wesley’s assertion (adopted by Buddenberg) ‘that “it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.”’ . . . The court erred by doing so. We held, long before Buddenberg and Wesley, that district courts have ‘a duty to address’ qualified immunity when it is ‘properly raised prior to discovery.’ . . . After all, qualified immunity shields government defendants not merely from liability, but also from litigation and discovery, because ‘[i]nquiries of this kind can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.’ . . . Buddenberg and Wesley could not have disturbed that long-settled precept, . . . so they could not (and do not) give license to deny qualified immunity, without a reasoned opinion, whenever the defense is raised in a Rule 12 motion. However, as we recently explained in Crawford, Wesley does have a point: analyzing the second prong of qualified immunity—whether the alleged constitutional violation is clearly established—‘is sometimes difficult’ on the pleadings, since that ‘inquiry may turn on case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery.’ . . . Still, that ‘is only a “general preference,” not an absolute one.’ . . . In some cases, the clearly established prong may be determined on the pleadings. Indeed, Buddenberg itself determined, on appeal from the denial of a motion to dismiss raising qualified immunity, that the plaintiff’s ‘right to report public corruption, unethical conduct, and sex-based discrimination within her workplace was clearly established.’ . . . More importantly, Crawford made crystal clear that that general preference does not at all cover qualified immunity’s first prong—whether the complaint plausibly alleged a constitutional violation. . . . Put differently, if the complaint fails to allege facts plausibly showing the violation of a constitutional right (regardless of whether that right was clearly established), granting qualified immunity is appropriate on the pleadings. . . . The assertion of qualified immunity, by itself, does not change that. So, in this case, as in every other case in which a defendant timely raises qualified immunity, the district court was required to determine whether Myers plausibly alleged a constitutional violation and, if so, whether that right was clearly established. . . . But we need not vacate the district court’s order and remand because, based on our de novo review of the pleadings, we answer both of those questions in the affirmative.”)

Bell v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 37 F.4th 362, 363-64 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Before we get to the facts, we must address a threshold legal question. For an appeal from a motion to dismiss, we ordinarily stay within the four corners of the complaint to determine whether the plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief. . . . So can we consider the police officers’ dash-cam video footage here? Yes. In qualified-immunity cases, we’ve previously considered videos at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . . . And for good reason. Qualified immunity isn’t just a defense to liability—it’s immunity from the costs and burdens of suit in the first place. . . . If officers are entitled to qualified immunity and don’t receive it at the earliest possible stage, then they lose its protections for as long as they continue to litigate. . . . So when uncontroverted video evidence easily resolves a case, we honor qualified immunity’s principles by considering the videos. Plus, the videos here are already in the record. Indeed, the plaintiff’s complaint implicitly relies on the videos by recounting facts that could only be known to him by watching the videos. Thus, it makes little sense to waste time and effort by ignoring the videos’ contents. . . . That said, our use of the videos is limited at this stage. If there is a factual dispute between the parties, we can only rely on the videos over the complaint to the degree the videos are clear and ‘blatantly contradict[]’ or ‘utterly discredit[]’ the plaintiff’s version of events. . . . Otherwise, we must accept the plaintiff’s version as true. . . . This all makes sense—if the indisputable video evidence contradicts Bell’s pleadings, his allegations are implausible.”)

Kenjoh Outdoor, LLC v. Marchbanks, 23 F.4th 686, 695 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Kenjoh argues that it is generally inappropriate to grant qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. Kenjoh is correct that some of our caselaw has suggested a presumption against granting qualified immunity on a motion to dismiss. But we recently clarified the scope of this ‘presumption’ in Crawford. . . . As we said, any presumption only has bite when the ‘clearly established’ inquiry turns on ‘case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery.’ . . . But if the complaint is ‘distinguishable from our past cases on its face,’ it will not survive a motion to dismiss. . . . Kenjoh’s complaint need not proceed to discovery. After all, it is easily distinguishable from our past caselaw. That is because it asks us to apply the prior restraint doctrine to commercial speech, which we haven’t done. All in all, we will do here what the Supreme Court did in al-Kidd. We will ‘affirm[] the application of qualified immunity’ because it is ‘apparent from the complaint that the law was not clearly established because “not a single judicial opinion” ha[s] held the official’s action unconstitutional.”’)

Crawford v. Tilley, 15 F.4th 752, 763-66 (6th Cir. 2021) (“Admittedly, we sometimes state that ‘it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.’ . . . And the district court here cited this proposition four times. But that general statement is at best imprecise. To be fair, most statements of this proposition are careful to explain that its application rests on qualified immunity’s clearly established prong. . . . And that’s correct but the specificity of our opinions varies. So we clarify below. It is true that courts, including ours, have suggested a basic incongruity between pleading requirements under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8, which require only that a plaintiff state a claim, and affirmative defenses, like qualified immunity. . . . The idea is that a plaintiff is generally not required to negate

an affirmative defense in a complaint. . . But as we have noted, the validity of such defenses may be apparent from the face of the complaint, rendering a motion to dismiss appropriate. . . This is, after all, how we normally adjudicate other affirmative defenses on motions to dismiss. . . The larger point though is that this possible incongruity does not justify a special rule or presumption against granting motions to dismiss that applies specifically for qualified immunity. . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has consistently stated that one of the goals of qualified immunity is not only to help defendants avoid unnecessary trials but also to allow defendants to avoid pre-trial discovery where the lawsuit is ‘insubstantial.’. . And for avoiding pretrial discovery, ‘a motion to dismiss is conclusive as to this right.’. . Moreover, in Harlow, the Court reformulated the qualified immunity test by eliminating the subjective-good-faith requirement precisely because that requirement was permitting some qualified immunity cases to advance further than they should. . . Finally, if there is a procedural incongruity here, the Supreme Court has not recognized it. Or, at least, the Court has not hesitated to affirm the dismissal of a lawsuit on qualified immunity grounds without mentioning any presumption against doing so. . . Now, what about applying the two-part inquiry itself: does either prong support a general preference to not grant motions to dismiss on qualified immunity? Here, it seems apparent, and consistent with our cases, that no such preference applies to the violation-of-a-constitutional-right prong. After all, asking whether there was a violation of a constitutional right resembles the Rule 12(b)(6) question—has the plaintiff pleaded facts that state a claim for relief in the complaint? More importantly, in Iqbal itself, which, along with Twombly, . . . are the leading cases on Rule 12(b)(6), the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of the plaintiff’s complaint on qualified immunity because it failed to establish a plausible claim. . . And, as noted above, nowhere did the Supreme Court suggest that it was inappropriate to dismiss a complaint on qualified immunity or that there should be a presumption against it. If there were a presumption or preference against dismissing the case, we would expect the Court to at least acknowledge it. Common sense also proves the point. Imagine a conditions-of-confinement case identical to the one we face here. But—unlike Erwin—imagine that the hypothetical state defendant moved to dismiss under 12(b)(6) without raising qualified immunity. We would apply Iqbal to that motion. So it would be nonsensical, and even ironic, to enforce a presumption against dismissing the same complaint simply because the defendant has raised qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. In other words, § 1983 complaints are subject to the same federal rules as any other complaint. ‘No heightened pleading requirement applies to our review of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity.’. . This reluctance to dismiss cases on qualified immunity might have more vitality in the clearly established context, which Iqbal did not cover. But even there, the inquiry is nuanced. Dismissing for qualified immunity on this ground is sometimes difficult because the clearly established inquiry may turn on case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery. . . This is a natural development because the application of qualified immunity today can turn on minute factual distinctions. . . At the same time, we are cognizant of the Supreme Court’s admonition that we not let a plaintiff allege rights at such a high level of abstraction that his claim always survives. . . . So a complaint distinguishable from our past cases on its face will not often survive a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. This is especially true where granting relief to the plaintiff can only be done by recognizing a novel constitutional right. . . . Dawn’s complaint, all told, must clear three hurdles. First, she must allege that someone Erwin oversees violated Marc's constitutional rights. Second, she must allege 'active unconstitutional behavior' by Erwin. And third, she must allege that the 'active unconstitutional behavior' was both a cause in fact and a proximate cause of the violation of Marc's rights. Dawn has not carried this burden here. Her amended complaint fails both to allege any 'active unconstitutional behavior' by Erwin and to explain how this behavior proximately caused Marc's injuries. Thus, Erwin is entitled to qualified immunity on the constitutional violation prong.")

Koch v. Ohio, No. 20-3334, 2021 WL 2221644, at *5 (6th Cir. June 2, 2021) (not reported) ("Koch is correct that the fact-intensive nature of a qualified immunity defense often makes 12(b)(6) dismissal on qualified immunity grounds inappropriate, Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 433 (6th Cir. 2015), but we have upheld such dismissals when the 'complaint establishes the defense.' Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 762 (6th Cir. 2020). This is such a case. Even if Koch's allegations are true and we assume they state a retaliation claim, Koch cites no case that would have put Meyer on notice that failing to open an inspector general investigation into Koch's complaints would violate the Constitution, and we are aware of no such case.")

Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 660-61, 663, 665 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[W]hen 'no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded' that the challenged action was constitutional, the Supreme Court has held that there does not need to be a case directly on point. [citing Taylor v. Riojas] . . . Although a defendant's 'entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.' . . . 'The reasoning for our general preference is straightforward: "Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is 'obvious' or 'squarely governed' by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not" for purposes of determining whether a right is clearly established.' . . . Therefore, 'it is generally inappropriate for a ... court to grant a [12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings] on the basis of qualified immunity.' . . . This Court's usual practice of waiting until summary judgment to resolve qualified immunity issues has particular import in this case for another reason. In addition to shielding government officials from liability for civil damages, qualified immunity is also 'a limited "entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation."' . . . The desire to shield government officials from 'broad discovery,' . . . is the basis for such a defendant's entitlement to have qualified immunity 'resolved at the earliest possible point[.]'. . . But this 'concern [is] irrelevant here.' . . . Because Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claims against the Corrections Defendants rely on the same factual predicate as the excessive force claims, denying qualified immunity at this stage will not impose any additional discovery burdens. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's decision to allow Plaintiff's excessive force claims against the Corrections Defendants to proceed to discovery. . . . [T]he Executive Defendants argue that, assuming the sufficiency of Plaintiff's allegations, they did not violate any clearly established law. However, 'ample case law teaches that deliberate indifference toward a detainee's suicidal tendencies is a violation of Constitutional rights.' . . . 'At the time of this incident, ... [Johnson] had a clearly established right not to be deprived of food.’ . . He also had a clearly established right to not be housed in an overcrowded facility. . . Whether this, or other, precedent clearly established a right that was violated by the Executive Defendants requires factual development regarding the exact circumstances faced by the Executive Defendants, what actions they took, what they knew when taking the alleged unconstitutional actions, and with what intent they acted. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s decision to deny judgment on the pleadings on Plaintiff’s deliberate indifference claims against the Executive Defendants.”)

Hart v. Hillsdale County, Michigan, 973 F.3d 627, 642 (6th Cir. 2020) (“If the officers had reason to question the database’s reliability or if a reasonably well-trained officer would have caught its error immediately, then it was clearly established that the officers could not rely exclusively on that database to establish probable cause. To the extent the officers argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they were ‘simply following orders,’ we rejected that argument in Bunkley v. City of Detroit, 902 F.3d 552, 562 (6th Cir. 2018). There, as here, the officers who claimed to be following orders made mistakes of their own. . . The City and County Defendants here similarly failed to perform any investigation or ask any questions that could have confirmed whether Hart was required to register even though, drawing all inferences in Hart’s favor, Defendants were statutorily mandated to ask those questions, were on notice of the risk of error, and were aware of the materially different requirements for homeless offenders. . . The Supreme Court has instructed that, in performing Fourth Amendment qualified immunity analysis, we must confine ourselves to ‘the situation [the officer] confronted,’ carefully considering the ‘particular factual context[]’ at issue. . . That is hard to accomplish at the motion to dismiss stage. ‘Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is “obvious” or “squarely governed” by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not.’ . . On the false arrest claims, Hart has plausibly alleged a violation of his clearly established constitutional rights. Remand for factual development is necessary.”)

Hart v. Hillsdale County, Michigan, 973 F.3d 627, 646-47, 652-53 (6th Cir. 2020) (Readler, J., dissenting) (“According to the complaint, the Michigan State Police, in conjunction with a retained private data firm, made a grave mistake. Michigan law put the State Police singularly in charge of the State’s Sex Offender Registration database, with inferior law enforcement officials to rely upon the information stored therein. . . Unfortunately, the State Police failed to update their database to account for a change in Michigan law that removed Anthony Hart’s registration requirements. As a result of that oversight, Hart was erroneously listed in the database as being subject to reporting requirements, erroneously instructed by the State Police to register with local officials, and thus erroneously detained by local officers in Hillsdale for failing to honor his registration commitments. . . Similarly fooled by the State Police’s error were the prosecutor, the state court, and even Hart’s attorney. Regrettably, Hart served 19 months in prison before the error was spotted by prison officials. The gravity of this error is clear. But so too should be the conclusion that the local Hillsdale officers (perhaps unlike the State Police) are entitled to qualified immunity. Our cases absolve officers of liability where they rely upon information transmitted from other officers

(in this case, superior officers). And the majority opinion does not cite any clearly established law holding, ‘beyond debate,’ that the local officers should have second guessed their superiors in the State Police at the time of Hart’s arrests. . . . One might fairly expect a live dispute over whether the State Police violated any constitutional right owed to Hart. After all, its error, in conjunction with that of its private vendor, allegedly caused Hart to continue to register with local officials, registrations he admits he failed to honor. . . . The legal question posed here—whether officers act recklessly by failing independently to verify information in an authoritative police database—may also be resolved on the pleadings. Accepting as true Hart’s factual allegations, the local officers acted reasonably in relying on the state database, and the lack of clearly established law to the contrary supports granting qualified immunity on Hart’s claims. . . . At worst, the officers here were negligent in not independently investigating Hart’s legal status. But the majority opinion identifies no state or federal rule that required them to do so. . . . Nor, at all events, did the officers violate any purportedly clearly established constitutional right. Hart must fairly allege a constitutional right defined by then-existing precedent that is ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply,’ . . . thus putting the question ‘beyond debate.’ . . . The majority opinion’s first salvo is to say this case is not suitable for resolution at the motion to dismiss stage. To be sure, at this stage we must assume Hart’s allegations as true. But even then, Hart is not absolved of his duty to plead facts that, when assumed as true, would be sufficient to state a claim for which relief may be granted. True, Wesby was decided past the Rule 12(b) stage (and in the officers’ favor, it should be noted, on the issue of qualified immunity). . . . But that does not mean cases can never be resolved then, especially one (like Hart’s) that turns on a straight-forward legal question. Perhaps, as the majority opinion next contends, ‘there does not have to be a case directly on point’ to overcome qualified immunity. If so, Hart typically must still identify a ‘body of relevant case law’ squarely aligned with his Fourth Amendment-inspired legal theory. . . . The majority opinion says that body of law is exemplified by Bunkley v. City of Detroit, 902 F.3d 552 (6th Cir. 2018). But Bunkley turned on instances of repeated, intentional misconduct, something the majority opinion acknowledges Hart has not sufficiently alleged.”)

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 610 (6th Cir. 2020) (“‘[A]n officer cannot rely on a judicial determination of probable cause if that officer knowingly makes false statements and omissions to the judge such that but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.’ . . . That is precisely the situation that Plaintiffs allege here. And yet, in his motion to dismiss, Sanchez simply asserted that he relied on the warrant in good faith and did not make any materially false statements or omissions. But that argument has nothing to do with the sufficiency of Plaintiffs’ complaint or adequacy of their allegations regarding Sanchez’s bad faith. Instead, to the extent that Sanchez seeks to argue that Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate a genuine factual dispute on this issue, he can make that argument in a motion for summary judgment once discovery has occurred. . . . In short, Sanchez’s motion to dismiss did not challenge the sufficiency of Plaintiffs’ allegations, and if construed as a motion for summary judgment, it was premature. Sanchez is not entitled to qualified immunity at this time.”)

Marvaso v. Sanchez, 971 F.3d 599, 611-14 (6th Cir. 2020) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) (“Even taking Plaintiffs’ factual allegations as true, Sanchez, Adams, and Reddy, Jr. are entitled to qualified immunity. Plaintiffs also fail to adequately plead their § 1983 conspiracy claim. Thus, I dissent. . . . Even after removing the assertions Plaintiffs claim Sanchez falsified, and adding the facts he allegedly omitted, the affidavit still supports a finding of probable cause. . . . [B]ecause there was probable cause for the search warrant even without Sanchez’s alleged falsities and omissions, it cannot be said that ‘but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.’ . . . There is thus no constitutional violation. And with no constitutional violation, Sanchez is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The majority says this presents fact-intensive questions and requires factual development beyond what’s in the complaint, and that we should thus wait until summary judgment to decide these claims. . . . But this isn’t a factual question. We accept the facts in Plaintiffs’ complaint as true and look only to whether those facts amounted to a clearly established constitutional violation when they occurred. . . . And that’s a question of law, which is why we can review it on an interlocutory appeal. . . . No discovery or further factual development can cure Plaintiffs’ failure to plead ‘the violation of a right so clearly established that a reasonable official would necessarily have recognized’ it. . . . So Adams and Reddy, Jr. are entitled to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage of this case.”)

In re Flint Water Cases, 960 F.3d 303, 321-25, 330, 332 (6th Cir. 2020) (“This case is a consolidated class action in the In re Flint Water Cases litigation. . . . The only claim before us on appeal is Plaintiffs-Appellants’ 42 U.S.C. § 1983 substantive due process claim for deprivation of bodily integrity. The Putative Class includes Flint residents and businesses, but only Flint residents are parties to this appeal. The Defendants include City and State officials, the City of Flint, and private engineering firms, but only the government defendants are parties to this appeal. . . . Under the collateral order doctrine, we have jurisdiction over the City and State officials’ interlocutory appeals of the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to the extent they raise legal questions. . . . The collateral order doctrine also provides us with jurisdiction over the City of Flint’s and Governor Whitmer’s interlocutory appeals from the district court’s denial of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. . . . Some (but not all) Defendants-Appellants were parties to the Guertin appeal and were denied qualified immunity in that case. . . . The Defendant-Appellant City and State officials argue that qualified immunity shields them from suit. We review de novo a district court’s decision to deny qualified immunity. . . . In Guertin, we held that City and State officials’ role in creating, sustaining, and covering up the Flint Water Crisis violated Flint residents’ right to bodily integrity, Guertin, . . . and that this right was clearly established at the time[.]. . . . Critically, this case comes to us at the motion to dismiss stage. The allegations in the Complaint must be taken as true. . . . Some judges of this court have even noted that, because the facts at this stage are yet undeveloped, ‘it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. Although an officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.’ . . . With these principles in mind, Plaintiffs-Appellees have plausibly alleged that Defendants-Appellants violated their right to bodily integrity. . . . All of the Defendant-Appellant City Officials argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they acted based on professional opinions from MDEQ officials and private engineering firms. . . . At this stage, we must credit Plaintiffs’ allegation that the Defendant-Appellant City Officials had independent knowledge that the Flint River water was causing a public health crisis—regardless of what the MDEQ or the engineering firms reported. . . . The Defendant-Appellant State Officials sued in their individual capacities are Governor Snyder and Treasurer Dillon. We have not had the opportunity previously to address their conduct. We hold that Plaintiffs-Appellees plausibly allege a constitutional violation as to Snyder, but we refrain from deciding this question for Dillon until the district court has an opportunity to reconsider in light of Brown v. Snyder (In re Flint Water Cases), No. 18-cv-10726, 2020 WL 1503256, at *9 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 27, 2020). . . . Snyder’s alleged role in creating, failing to mitigate, and covering up the crisis plausibly demonstrates deliberate indifference.”)

Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 761-62 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) (“Like in our sister circuits, here it is ‘generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.’ . . . But this is only a ‘general preference,’ not an absolute one. . . . Defendants may raise the qualified immunity defense in response to a 12(b)(6) motion because it is ‘an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.’ . . . That is why some claims must ‘be resolved prior to discovery.’ . . . Thus, despite the general preference to save qualified immunity for summary judgment, sometimes it’s best resolved in a motion to dismiss. This happens when the complaint establishes the defense. . . . So we ask whether the complaint plausibly alleges ‘that an official’s acts violated the plaintiff’s clearly established constitutional right.’ . . . If, taking all the facts as true and reading all inferences in the plaintiff’s favor, the plaintiff has not plausibly showed a violation of his clearly established rights, then the officer-defendant is entitled to immunity from suit.”)

Cahoo v. SAS Analytics Inc., 912 F.3d 887, 907 (6th Cir. 2019) (“The Court appreciates that an ‘officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point....’ . . . But this Court has repeatedly stated that the earliest possible point for evaluating a qualified immunity defense ‘is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.’ . . . If Plaintiffs hope to survive a motion for summary judgment, they will need to provide evidence to support their allegations, particularly in regards to the actions taken by each Individual Agency Defendant. But at this early stage, the Court finds that Plaintiffs’ well-pleaded facts sufficiently allege that each Individual Agency Defendant violated Plaintiffs’ clearly-established due process rights by implementing, overseeing, and continuing to enforce a government program that substantially interfered with Plaintiffs’ property interests, despite knowing that the program rendered an exceptionally high percentage of invalid fraud determinations. For these reasons, the Court finds that qualified immunity does not shield the Individual Agency Defendants at this stage of the litigation with respect to Plaintiffs’ due process claim.”)

Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App’x 385, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (“[T]he Officers—not Osberry—filed the motion for judgment on the pleadings. We review de novo a judgment on the pleadings, using the same standard as a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). . . This means that ‘all well-pleaded material allegations of the pleadings of the opposing party must be taken as true.’ . . Here, Osberry is the party opposing the motion—so we construe the complaint in the light most favorable to Osberry, accept her allegations as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in her favor. . . In contrast, we do not accept the Officers’ allegations as true. But at oral argument, the Officers asked us to accept some allegations in the answer as true because Osberry’s complaint fails to contradict all the Officers’ counter-allegations. For example, Osberry’s complaint is silent on whether there was an ‘active crime scene’—which the Officers first raised in their answer. The Officers’ argument lacks any merit. Under Rule 7(A), a ‘plaintiff is not required to reply to affirmative defenses or new matter appearing in the answer.’ . . And under Rule 8(b)(6), where new allegations are in a pleading to which no responsive pleading is required, the court must consider the new allegations as denied. . . In other words, because Osberry did not have to respond to the Officers’ answer, we must assume that Osberry denies any new allegations in the answer. And when considering the Officers’ motion, we rely on the general Rule 12 standard. . . Here, our review of the video tracks the district court’s finding that the video does not ‘so blatantly and conclusively contradict’ the allegations in the complaint that ‘no reasonable jury could find in [Osberry’s] favor.’ . . For example, the video does not conclusively show that Osberry resisted arrest, hit the Officers, or that she—and not the Officers—provoked the brief scuffle. Likewise, the video does not necessarily show an ‘active crime scene’ or ‘a barricaded subject.’ There are no police vehicles, no caution tape, and no blockades or barriers visible in the video that would suggest that Osberry was in an active crime scene. Indeed, the presence of other individuals and vehicles, including several people riding bicycles nearby, would suggest the opposite. And while the presence of many police officers may suggest an ongoing investigation, as could Officer Frysinger instructing Osberry that ‘you need to leave this is a crime scene,’ these facts alone do not ‘utterly discredit’ Osberry’s version of the arrest. In sum, at this stage, we can rely on the well-pleaded allegations in the complaint and leave further evaluation of the video to either the district court at summary judgment or the jury at trial. This is consistent with our previous warnings ‘that it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.’ . . Instead, we clarified that ‘[a]lthough an officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.’ . . This is especially true where, as is the case here, ‘the fact-intensive nature of the applicable tests make it “difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery.”’”) Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App’x 385, ___ n.2 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Our ability to consider video evidence at the pleading stage apparently finds its roots in Rule 10(c), which instructs that ‘[a] copy of a written instrument that is an exhibit to a pleading is a part of the pleading for all purposes.’ Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(c) (emphasis added). See also Weiner v. Klais & Co., 108 F.3d 86, 89 (6th Cir. 1997) (explaining that Rule 10(c) allows a court to consider ‘certain pertinent documents’ as part of the pleadings); Brownmark Films, LLC v. Comedy Partners, 682 F.3d 687, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) (explaining that it would make ‘eminently good sense’ to extend the Rule 10(c) incorporation-by-reference doctrine to videos). This case, however, does not require us to determine the appropriateness (or limits) of reviewing videos under Rule 10 and Rule 12. See, e.g., Aimee Brown, Comment, Pleading in Technicolor: When Can Litigants Incorporate Audiovisual Works Into Their Complaints?, 80 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1269, 1278–1306 (2013).”)

Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 428 (6th Cir. 2015) (Wesley II) (“Before proceeding to the merits of the motion to dismiss, we note a critical threshold error in the district court’s opinion. Instead of the ‘plausibility’ standard our precedent clearly requires, the district court improperly held Wesley to a novel and significantly higher standard. The district court determined—indeed, emphasized—that Wesley was required to make ‘a substantial showing that the defendant stated a deliberate falsehood or showed reckless disregard for the truth’ in order to survive Rule 12 dismissal. . . Such a ‘substantial’ pleading burden at the Rule 12 stage is plainly inappropriate in light of Iqbal and Twombly—cases that the district court cited but failed to apply—as well as this circuit’s settled precedent. The district court’s error apparently stems from its reliance on Vakilian v. Shaw, 335 F.3d 509, 517 (6th Cir.2003), a case that does speak of the ‘substantial showing’ plaintiffs must make when faced with dismissal. Vakilian, however, is a summary judgment case, as is every other case cited by the district court in support of its ‘substantial showing’ standard. . . Other than the district court’s own decision, no published opinion within the Sixth Circuit has ever imported Vakilian’s ‘substantial showing’ language into the Rule 12 context. At oral argument before this court, Rigney conceded that Vakilian’s ‘substantial showing’ standard was inappropriate at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage. We agree. Moreover, review of the pleadings and applicable case law leaves us convinced that Wesley has satisfied his initial pleading burden.”)

Walker v. Louisville/Jefferson County Metro Government, No. 3:21-CV-161-DJH-LLK, 2022 WL 301687, at *12-14 (W.D. Ky. Feb. 1, 2022) (“Walker claims that Hankison, Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell violated the knock-and-announce requirement by failing to announce before entering Taylor’s apartment, although he concedes that the officers knocked. . . Mattingly and Cosgrove argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they announced and had a valid no-knock warrant, which permitted their entry without knocking and announcing. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell contend that they ‘were not present at the scene when the events took place.’ . . Walker has plausibly alleged that the officers failed to announce when executing the warrant. . . Despite Taylor asking the individuals knocking to identify themselves, the officers failed to respond or otherwise announce their presence. . . Walker has also plausibly alleged that the officers listed in his complaint, including Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell, were part of the entry team executing the warrant . . . and members of an entry team can be liable for a failure to knock and announce. . . Whether the officers acted reasonably under the totality of the circumstances in anticipating exigent circumstances is a question of fact. . . Neither ‘the presence of drugs alone’ nor the mere possibility of evidence destruction vitiates the knock-and-announce requirement. Moreover, the issuance of a no-knock warrant does not end the reasonableness inquiry. . . As set forth in Walker’s complaint, the officers did not anticipate exigent circumstances when they executed the warrant because they planned to knock and announce, believing that Taylor, who had no criminal history, would be home alone and that her residence was ‘a soft target.’ . . Because Walker plausibly alleges that there were no exigent circumstances justifying the officers' failure to announce, the defendants' motions to dismiss must be denied as to Count II. . . Walker claims that the officers, who were in plain clothes, failed to announce when they entered Taylor's apartment and thus created a dangerous situation that led to his single shot at the officers. . . Walker further alleges that Mattingly and Cosgrove returned fire at Taylor and Walker, despite Cosgrove's inability to clearly see them. . . Walker distinguishes the officers' failure to announce upon entry from their failure to announce when they knocked. . . The Sixth Circuit has stated that 'where "the events preceding the shooting occurred in close temporal proximity to the shooting, those events have been considered in analyzing whether excessive force was used."'. . Mattingly and Cosgrove, citing Chappell v. City of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 914 (6th Cir. 2009), argue that their decisions upon entry are 'irrelevant' to the excessive-force analysis, making their return of fire reasonable and entitling them to qualified immunity. . . Yet their reliance on Chappell is misplaced. . . In Chappell, the court did not consider the officers' unlawful entry because the entry did not happen simultaneously with or mere moments before the shooting, as it did here. . . Rather, the excessive-force claim stemmed from the officers' entry into an upstairs bedroom after their entry into the residence from the downstairs front door. . . And notably, Chappell involved a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. . . The Court acknowledges that '[a] different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.' Cty. of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1544 (2017). But Walker alleges a failure-to-knock-and-announce claim separate from the excessive-force claim, which stems from the officers' failure to announce upon entry. . . Here, the officers' failure to announce upon entry occurred either simultaneously with or mere seconds before the shooting. . . Under the facts alleged, whether Mattingly and Cosgrove acted reasonably and thus are entitled to qualified immunity cannot be resolved at the motion-to-dismiss stage. . . In reaching this conclusion, the Court heeds the Sixth Circuit's admonition against ' "resolv[ing] a Rule 12(b)(6) motion on qualified immunity grounds" because development of the factual record is frequently necessary to decide whether the official's actions violated clearly established law.' . . 'Although an officer's "entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.' . . Notably, Mattingly and Cosgrove have cited no Sixth Circuit case where the court granted a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on an excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity when the defendants were accused of discharging a firearm at the plaintiff. . . . Here, additional factual development is necessary to determine whether Mattingly and Cosgrove are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Walker asserts that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell should be held liable for failing to identify themselves upon entry and for failing to intervene when Mattingly, Hankison, and Cosgrove shot at him. . . Walker does not claim that Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell discharged their firearms. . . Therefore, Walker's excessive-force claim against these defendants depends on their failure to intervene when other officers shot at him. . . Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell argue that they 'did not discharge[] their weapons' and thus cannot be found liable for the other officers' alleged use of excessive force. . . These defendants, however, fail to address their alleged failure to intervene. . . And contrary to their assertion, they can be held liable for other officers' use of excessive force if they '(1) "observed or had reason to know that excessive force would be or was being used, and (2) ... had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring.”. . . Taking all facts in the complaint as true, as the Court is required to do at this stage, the Court finds that Walker has plausibly alleged that Jaynes, Mattingly, Goodlett, and Nobles obtained a warrant to search Taylor’s apartment that was invalid. Huckelberry, Phan, and Burbrink, however, are entitled to qualified immunity for the constitutionally defective warrant. Walker has also plausibly alleged that Mattingly, Cosgrove, Hoover, James, Nobles, Campbell, and Hankison . . . failed to announce before entering Taylor’s apartment and that Mattingly and Cosgrove used unreasonable and excessive force against him. Because Hoover, James, Nobles, and Campbell do not address Walker’s allegation that they failed to intervene when the other officers allegedly used excessive force, this claim against them also survives.”)

Hoskins v. Knox County, Kentucky, No. CV 17-84-DLB-HAI, 2018 WL 1352163, at *19–20 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 15, 2018) (“[T]he Supreme Court has repeatedly ‘stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’. . . The Sixth Circuit, however, has clarified that only truly ‘insubstantial claims against government officials should be resolved ... prior to broad discovery,’ Johnson, 790 F.3d at 653, and has cautioned that ‘it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.’ Wesley, 779 F.3d at 433. Thus, ‘[a]lthough an officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.’. . . With respect to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis, the KSP Defendants have not argued that the constitutional rights allegedly violated were not clearly established at the time of the Defendant Officers’ actions. Nor could they. At the time of Plaintiffs’ arrest and pretrial detention, they had a clearly established right to be free from malicious prosecution and fabricated evidence under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Therefore, despite the lack of any developed argument, the Court assumes that the Defendants’ qualified-immunity argument rests on the first prong—whether the facts alleged make out a constitutional violation. As this Court has explained in detail above, the Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated plausible claims for malicious prosecution, fabrication of evidence, supervisor liability, failure to intervene, and conspiracy under § 1983. Accordingly, the KSP Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Beathard v. Lyons, 129 F.4th 1027, 1032-36 (7th Cir. 2025) (“[A]n order postponing a decision on qualified immunity ordinarily is not appealable. . . . Unless the district court delays so long in ruling that the delay becomes a de facto denial, a decision not to rule on a motion [to dismiss on grounds of qualified immunity] is just that: inaction. This follows from the general rule the Supreme Court has acknowledged forbidding interlocutory appeals in situations where ‘unresolved issues of fact’ remain or the district court has not even ‘tentatively decided anything about the merits of the claim.’. . . To be sure, the district court in this case did say at the conclusion of its order that the defendants’ motion to dismiss was ‘denied.’. . . But the court’s language in the preceding sentence makes clear that the court did not think it advisable to address qualified immunity with only the allegations of Beathard’s complaint to inform its assessment. By way of explanation, the court cited Doe v. Purdue Univ., 928 F.3d 652, 665 (7th Cir. 2019), and Jacobs v. City of Chicago, 215 F.3d 758, 765 n.3 (7th Cir. 2000), for the common-sense point that qualified immunity is fact-driven, and yet as a matter of federal pleading rules the plaintiff is not required to set out in his complaint all of the facts that might bear on qualified immunity. The court’s reference here to ‘a more fully developed record’ in its concluding sentence thus leaves no doubt that it did not believe this was a case in which the defense could be evaluated based on the face of the complaint, but rather that further development was necessary before it could properly assess qualified immunity. . . . Nowhere in its order did the court otherwise suggest that Beathard had either pleaded enough to overcome qualified immunity or had instead pleaded himself out of court by making allegations that left no doubt that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. In short, the court’s order ‘d[id] not settle or even tentatively decide anything’ about the merits of the defendants’ qualified-immunity arguments. . . . It reserved those arguments for a later date. . . . We take the defendants’ point that qualified immunity is meant to spare a defendant the burden of litigation, not merely an adverse monetary judgment at the conclusion of a suit. . . . To that end, an invocation of qualified immunity should be resolved as soon as the record allows an assessment of the defense. . . . But at what stage of the case it is realistically possible to evaluate qualified immunity depends on the nature of the claim and circumstances of the individual case. In some cases, the fact-intensive nature of the claim means that resolution of a qualified immunity defense must await factual development. . . . The district court reasonably understood this to be such a case. This is not to say that deferring the question of qualified immunity leaves the defendants with no protection from the burdens of litigation. The district court has broad discretion to manage discovery (including the imposition of appropriate limits) and to prioritize development of the record as to the issues relevant to the defense of qualified immunity. . . . The district court and the parties may also prioritize a motion for summary judgment focused on qualified immunity without prejudice to a later round of summary judgment focused on other issues. . . . Because the district court postponed a decision on the defendant’s invocation of qualified immunity rather than denying their motion to dismiss on that basis, we lack jurisdiction over this appeal.”)

Sabo v. Erickson, 128 F.4th 836, 842-43 (7th Cir. 2025) (en banc) (“Simply put, a plaintiff can plead himself out of court on qualified immunity grounds. . . . Examining whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity upon a motion to dismiss also comports with the Supreme Court’s directive to resolve immunity questions ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation,’ . . . because qualified immunity protects government officials from both litigation and liability[.] . . . So, dismissal of a plaintiff’s complaint on qualified immunity grounds is appropriate if, taking the facts alleged in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . In such circumstances, the plaintiff may state a claim, but it is not one ‘upon which relief can be granted.’”)

Sabo v. Erickson, 128 F.4th 836, 852-53, 856-57 (7th Cir. 2025) (en banc) (Jackson-Akiwumi, J., joined by Maldonado, J., dissenting) (“The majority would effectively require litigants—at the pleadings stage, no less—to establish not just that they seek to enforce a clearly established right but that the right has an almost perfect analog in existing case law. Here, that means that even though John Sabo was unlawfully held in custody and even incarcerated as a result, he cannot ask a factfinder to hold the responsible officials accountable. I cannot agree with such a narrow gateway for § 1983 litigants (or, conversely, such a wide window for defendants to avoid the specter of liability), so I dissent. In Part I, I counter the majority's view of what plaintiffs must do to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, and I emphasize the low bar for plaintiffs to state a claim for relief. In Part II, I explain why the differences between this case and our existing precedents are slight ones that do not warrant granting Wisconsin state officials Sheri Hicks and Debra Haley qualified immunity at this juncture. . . . Today the majority concludes that Sabo, as plaintiff, needs to cite clearly established law 'with much more specificity' than usual to show that qualified immunity does not apply. . . . Precedent does not support this conclusion. The majority relies on Mullenix v. Luna, in which the Supreme Court observed that Fourth Amendment cases are so particularly fact-dependent that specificity is 'especially important.' . . . The Mullenix Court did not, as the majority suggests, impose a heightened standard for plaintiffs to overcome qualified immunity, let alone in an Eighth Amendment case. In support of this heightened standard, the majority also cites Ziglar v. Abbasi—again outside the Eighth Amendment context—in which the Supreme Court imported from Mullenix a need for factual specificity 'with respect to abstract rights' when defining clearly established law. . . . Sabo's asserted right is far from abstract. The right not to be held in state custody for an unlawfully long period as the result of deliberate indifference is specific and well-defined, as I explain below. . . . Additionally, the majority acknowledges, . . . but fails to apply, the principle that the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity does not increase Sabo's pleading standard. Sabo must provide only a 'short and plain statement' of a plausible claim. . . . He need not anticipate nor overcome affirmative defenses like qualified immunity in his complaint. . . . Under these well-known pleading standards, Sabo adequately stated a claim. Taking his factual allegations as true, he was kept on probation for an unlawful period, and he was even incarcerated because he violated probation conditions that should have ended months earlier. Hicks and Haley were responsible for checking and revising sentences that did not comply with the law—state law, to be sure, but I will address that red herring separately. When they reviewed the sentence here, they were incorrect about what the law permitted for convictions like Sabo's. No one—Sabo included—considers this kind of mistake to violate the federal Constitution. But when Hicks and Haley learned that the law did not permit a category of sentences that they had approved in the exercise of their official duties, they were then certain that they had failed to correct at least some overly long terms of probation. In other words, Sabo has pleaded, they had actual notice of this fact. Hicks and Haley also had the ability, at a minimum, to notify someone of their error, and potentially could have personally discovered the names of probationers with unlawful sentences. (To assume their inability to do so is to draw inferences in the defendants' favor rather than Sabo's.) What they did instead was nothing at all: They consciously disregarded a known risk that one or more persons who had served out a full sentence remained in the custody of the state with liberty significantly curtailed. These allegations state a claim that the defendants violated Sabo's rights under the Eighth Amendment (a finding the majority opinion avoids but casts serious doubt on). And these allegations describe a violation of a clearly established right. Sabo's account of the facts warrants at least discovery to uncover the context for Hicks and Haley's failure to act. . . . What are the consequences of the analytical framework the majority has adopted? Using such slight distinctions between Sabo's allegations and the prior cases to deny that the constitutional right in this case is clearly established prevents plaintiffs from enforcing their rights in all but the most oft-repeated scenarios. Yet the Supreme Court has consistently reminded us that it 'is not necessary, of course, that the very action in question has previously been held unlawful' and that 'an officer might lose qualified immunity even if there is no reported case directly on point.' . . . Viewing the slight distinctions between Sabo's allegations and the prior cases as dispositive differences does nothing to ensure that defendants are on notice of their constitutional obligations. See Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity's Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 610 (2021) (showing that officers are not trained to make decisions based on granular factual scenarios, but on broad principles). Further, the early stage of the proceedings in this case makes the majority's narrow definition of 'clearly established' even more burdensome. To avoid dismissal, need a plaintiff map his factual assertions wholesale onto those described in prior judicial decisions? We seem close to imposing such a requirement. (The majority insists that this case does not closely depend on factual determinations, making it proper to address qualified immunity at the pleadings stage, but this is belied by its reliance on factual distinctions to show that this case is purportedly unlike any other.) There are sound reasons, which I need not repeat here, why courts ought not to decide most affirmative defenses, and especially qualified immunity, on the pleadings. . . . Although untimeliness, for example, can be evident from the face of a pleading, qualified immunity, with its fact-specific nature, is different. The Supreme Court's instruction to decide immunity 'at the earliest possible stage in the litigation,' . . . cannot mean we should reject a plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint, much less raise the pleading standard to do so. Separate from the question of whether the right we have all been discussing is 'clearly established,' there is obviously the question of whether the right exists at all. That matter ought to be settled. We have frequently decided that a defendant's actual notice of a group of prisoners at risk of a constitutional violation creates an obligation to do something to prevent it, if in the position to do so. . . . Here too, Hicks and Haley had notice that a group of people in state custody were at risk of a constitutional violation and, though Hicks and Haley were able to take action to abate the risk, they did not. It is not clear why the standard widely used in other prison contexts would not also apply here. . . . Correctional officials in records departments, like their counterparts within prisons, are accountable when they turn a blind eye to constitutional violations that they are informed of and have the power to correct. In deciding that Hicks and Haley are entitled to qualified immunity before any facts are developed, the majority simultaneously (1) requires Sabo to assert a right with too much granularity and (2) prevents him from acquiring enough facts to satisfy the majority's narrower formulation of the right. (For all we know, Hicks and Haley had a spreadsheet with the names of all affected probationers; only discovery would reveal this.) The majority's moves restrain the practical availability of a remedy under § 1983 by expanding the textually untethered defense of qualified immunity. . . . This, in turn, dilutes the statute's ability to 'interpose the federal courts between the States and the people, as guardians of the people's federal rights.' . . . I would vacate the district court's dismissal of Sabo's deliberate indifference claim against Hicks and Haley. I respectfully dissent.")

Schimandle v. DeKalb County Sheriff's Office, 114 F.4th 648, 660 (7th Cir. 2024) (“‘Rarely do we see qualified immunity awarded at the pleading stage.’ . . . That is because whether qualified immunity applies ‘most often depend on facts a plaintiff is not required to plead at the outset of litigation to avoid dismissal.’ . . . But here, the district court appropriately analyzed videos of the incident, witness testimony, and reports incorporated in Schimandle’s pleadings. That substantial evidence allowed the district court—and us now—to consider and recognize qualified immunity at this stage.”)

Roldan v. Stroud, 52 F.4th 335, 339-40 (7th Cir. 2022) (“Our cases make clear that the motion-to-dismiss stage is rarely ‘the most suitable procedural setting to determine whether an official is qualifiedly immune.’ . . . The reason is simple: at the outset of litigation, we often cannot tell from a complaint whether qualified immunity applies. . . . To survive a motion to dismiss, plaintiffs need only include ‘a short and plain statement’ of a claim that is plausible on its face and entitles them to relief. . . . Put another way, plaintiffs do not have to recite every detail related to their allegations. They just have to include enough facts to present ‘a story that holds together.’ . . . Qualified immunity, by contrast, is a defense that ‘often depend[s] on the particular facts of a given case.’ . . . When a defendant invokes qualified immunity, we do not raise the pleading standard and require plaintiffs to ‘anticipate and overcome’ that defense. . . . The facts essential to this defense typically emerge during discovery, and so we most commonly see qualified immunity invoked in a motion for summary judgment. The case before us illustrates the difficulty of trying to see the details relevant to qualified immunity through the lens of a motion to dismiss. Taking Roldan’s allegations as true and drawing reasonable inferences in his favor, we (like the district court) have little difficulty concluding that the state suppressed a material agreement that might have undermined the victim’s credibility. . . . But remember who Roldan sued—the police officers. Those officers ordinarily have a duty to disclose the agreement only to the prosecutors. . . . This matters because Roldan alleged that the officers and the prosecution acted ‘in concert’ with each other to suppress the agreement and that the prosecution ‘knew or should have known’ that the agreement was Giglio material. To our eye, both statements appear to suggest that the prosecution knew about the police’s promise to certify the victim’s U-visa application as long as she testified against Roldan. But those allegations are also amenable to a different interpretation. Perhaps Roldan mentioned the prosecution simply because of the route disclosure more commonly would have taken: police would have informed the prosecution, who, in turn, would have then disclosed the agreement to Roldan. . . . At the dismissal stage, however, we cannot draw an inference against Roldan or somehow hold him to a pleading standard beyond Rule 8 just because the defendants invoked qualified immunity as a defense. . . . Discovery is needed to shed light on who knew about the alleged U-visa agreement with the victim. If discovery reveals that the prosecution knew of the arrangement, then none of the police officer defendants could be liable under § 1983 unless the police and the prosecution conspired to fabricate evidence. . . . The disclosure obligation would have instead rested with the prosecutor, who has already been dismissed from this case on grounds of absolute immunity. We leave it to the discretion of the district court how to structure the discovery. . . . Early summary judgment proceedings might preserve the resources of both the court and the parties, and nothing would prevent further summary judgment proceedings on other issues later in the case if that proves necessary. For these reasons, we AFFIRM the district court’s denial of the defendants’ Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity and REMAND for further proceedings.”) Hanson v. LeVan, 967 F.3d 584, 591-92, 597-98 (7th Cir. 2020) (“The district court’s remark—that whether LeVan will be entitled to qualified immunity on a further-developed record ‘cannot be resolved on the pleadings’—merely acknowledges the different standards that apply to a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss and a Rule 56(a) motion for summary judgment. As we’ve already mentioned, before discovery begins, a defendant asserting qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal if the allegations in the complaint fail to state a claim of a clearly established right having been violated. . . After discovery, however, the defendant asserting qualified immunity is entitled to summary judgment if the evidence fails to demonstrate a genuine factual issue about the characteristics of the employee’s position or whether the defendant committed the alleged acts. . . In this way, while qualified immunity may not entitle a defendant to dismissal on the pleadings, qualified immunity may entitle the defendant to summary judgment later on. And because each determination is conclusive as to the defendant’s right to avoid the burdens of pretrial discovery and trial, a denial of qualified immunity can be a ‘final decision’ at both stages of the litigation. . . . LeVan’s disagreement with the assumed context here illustrates the mismatch between the 12(b)(6) plausibility standard and the often fact-intensive nature of qualified-immunity inquiries. . . But that incongruity does not justify heightening the pleading standard, which imposes on the plaintiffs no obligation to initially ‘anticipate and overcome a defense of qualified immunity’ in their complaint. . . The plausibility standard, which leads us to take as given the plaintiffs’ allegations about the nature of their positions, is why ‘a complaint is generally not dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds.’ . . And it is why the plaintiffs’ First Amendment claims should not be dismissed on qualified-immunity grounds here. . . .LeVan is correct that political-patronage dismissals overall comprise a ‘somewhat murky area of the law,’ . . and that the clearly established’ inquiry ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . But LeVan did not face ‘an undeveloped state of the law’ regarding political-patronage dismissals. . . Nor did he align his conduct with court holdings that the Milton Township Deputy Assessor position falls within the Elrod-Branti exception. . . No case ‘directly on point’ was required for the relevant right to have been clearly established. . . The context LeVan faced was whether to fire, on political-patronage grounds, low-level employees (as opposed to cabinet-level advisors) who performed clerical and professional work involving no political discretion. And when LeVan dismissed the plaintiffs, the law was clear that a position lacking the features of a policymaking role—such as significant political discretion or cabinet-level advisory functions—falls under the Elrod-Branti rule, not the exception. . . We thus think it ‘sufficiently clear’ that—taking as given the plaintiffs’ well-pleaded allegations that the positions occupied a low rung of the bureaucratic ladder and lacked policymaking authority—every reasonable official would have understood that firing the plaintiffs because of their political affiliation violates their First Amendment rights. . . To be clear, LeVan may be entitled to qualified immunity on a motion for summary judgment, at which time the plaintiffs' well-pleaded allegations are not taken as true. But that is a matter different from the one before us now.")

Denwiddie v. Mueller, 775 F. App'x 817, ____ (7th Cir. 2019) ("The district court erred in determining that no clearly established law was violated because Denwiddie 'had not carried her burden to rebut' the officers' qualified immunity defense. There is no duty to plead around a qualified immunity defense. . . And '[b]ecause a qualified immunity defense so closely depends on the facts of the case, a complaint is generally not dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds.' . . When qualified immunity is raised in a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for "objective legal reasonableness."'. . We take care to follow the Supreme Court's admonition not to define the constitutional rights in question at too high a level of generality. . . The rights must be described with adequate specificity, but there need not be a case directly on point so long as existing precedent is sufficiently analogous as to place the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. . . It was clearly established in October 2014 that the search and seizure that Denwiddie described in her complaint and elaborated on in her response to the motion to dismiss were unlawful. Ignoring key facts when obtaining a search warrant, executing an overly broad warrant, destroying the homeowner's property, and permanently seizing private, legal property, are objectively unreasonable. . . It is possible that none of these things happened, but that is a question of proof, which comes later.")

Reed v. Palmer, 906 F.3d 540, 549-551, 553-54 (7th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he district court acted prematurely in deciding Palmer's entitlement to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. The court found that, during the time period alleged in the complaints, no law clearly established 'what the [C]onstitution requires of a government official in [Palmer's] position under similar circumstances.' Palmer's position is determined with reference to the well-pleaded factual allegations in plaintiffs' complaints, which are taken as true and considered in the light most favorable to plaintiffs on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . According to the complaints, Palmer contracted with the state of Wisconsin to place juveniles, including plaintiffs, in the Copper Lake facility. The complaints further allege that both plaintiffs were in Palmer's custody pursuant to state court orders. Moreover, Palmer monitored and received reports concerning Reed's and Ray-Cluney's conditions of confinement at Copper Lake. Based on these reports, plaintiffs allege Palmer 'knew or should have known of the systemic and excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake,' and '[d]espite such knowledge, Palmer failed to remove the Iowa girls placed at Copper Lake and acted with deliberate indifference in doing so.' These allegations are sufficient to withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that their constitutional rights were violated through excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake. Supreme Court precedent is not clear about whether state juvenile detention facility conditions should be judged under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . In a case over forty years ago, we applied the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment standard to evaluate the use of corporal punishment and tranquilizing drugs at a juvenile correctional institution. . . . Meanwhile, other circuits have applied the Fourteenth Amendment's 'more protective' Due Process Clause in evaluating juvenile detention center conditions. . . . At the time plaintiffs were allegedly in Palmer's custody, isolation of pre-trial juvenile detainees not 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective,' Bell, 441 U.S. at 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861, could rise to the level of a constitutional violation. Here, plaintiffs' complaints plausibly allege that they were kept in isolation at Copper Lake for excessive amounts of time. Caselaw clearly establishes that such conduct could violate the Fourteenth and/or the Eighth Amendment. On the present record, however, it is impossible to determine whether such a constitutional violation occurred in plaintiffs' cases. We know the respective complaints allege plaintiffs spent an inordinate amount of time at Copper Lake in isolation. However, we do not know the reasons behind their seclusion. We therefore cannot evaluate, under the Fourteenth Amendment, whether Palmer—or the other defendants—acted reasonably pursuant to a 'legitimate governmental objective or instead unlawfully 'punished' plaintiffs. . . Nor can we determine, under the Eighth Amendment, whether Palmer had a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind.' . . . Such a result does not condemn the district court to unnecessary litigation or impede Palmer's potential right to be free from suit. The district court has a variety of means ... to move the case incrementally forward in order to address the qualified immunity issue at the earliest possible stage.' . . For instance, '[t]he Rule 12(e) motion for a more definite statement is perhaps the best procedural tool available to the defendant to obtain the factual basis underlying a plaintiff's claim for relief.' . . Alternatively, if additional evidence is needed to develop the factual record, the district court may 'limit the timing, sequence, frequency, and extent of that discovery under Rule 26.'")

[While the following case involved a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii), the reasoning would clearly apply to dismissal of a prisoner's complaint where dismissal is based on the grounds that the plaintiff "seeks monetary relief against a defendant who is immune from such relief." 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii).]

Coleman v. Labor & Indus. Review Comm'n of Wisconsin, 860 F.3d 461, 465-66, 470-71, 474-75 (7th Cir. 2017) ("[M]ay an Article I judge dismiss an action for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, if that dismissal is part of the initial screening that occurs in IFP cases and thus takes place before the defendants are served? Although the statute does not say this in so many words, we have understood section 1915(e) to 'direct [] courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP.' Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1022 (7th Cir. 2013). It instructs 'the court' to 'dismiss the case at any time' if, among other things, the action 'fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted.' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii). The magistrate judge in our case followed that command and entered a final judgment for the as-yet-unserved defendant. We must decide whether this was permissible. . . . [A]lthough the consent requirement is carved in stone, the identity of 'the parties' whose permission section 636(c)(1) demands is less clear. Is it all of the parties? Some of the parties? Only any party who must be before the court for purposes of the ruling in question? The circuits have come to different conclusions about this question, and unfortunately, so have we. The Fifth Circuit, in Neals v. Norwood, 59 F.3d 530, 532 (5th Cir. 1995), and our opinion in Hains v. Washington, 131 F.3d 1248, 1249 & n.2 (7th Cir. 1997) (per curiam), take the position that an unserved defendant is not one of the ‘parties’ for purposes of section 636(c)(1), and thus the defendant’s consent is not required in order to permit a magistrate judge to issue a dispositive order when screening a complaint for IFP purposes. On the other side, the Eighth Circuit, in Henry v. Tri-Services, Inc., 33 F.3d 931, 933 (8th Cir. 1994), and our court in Geaney v. Carlson, 776 F.2d 140, 142 (7th Cir. 1985), hold that the magistrate cannot finally dispose of the case, on screening or otherwise, without the defendant’s consent. No matter what the rules concerning consent are, there is a substantial role for the magistrate judge to play in the screening process. Under the rule of Neals and Hains, the magistrate judge enters a final judgment on the case, while under the approach of Henry and Geaney, he evaluates the complaint, takes any nondispositive actions that are appropriate (e.g., further investigation of indigence), and recommends an action for the district court. . . If the action recommended is dismissal, the district court can enter that final judgment (after considering any properly filed objections) without bothering the defendants. Under either view, to the extent that section 1915(e)(2) involves nondispositive issues, such as the truthfulness of the allegation of poverty, nothing in the Magistrate Judges’ Act prevents the magistrate judge from resolving the issue. That is because a conclusion that the plaintiff is not indigent does not foreclose further legal proceedings—it just means that the plaintiff must pony up the required filing fee. . . . The conclusion we draw is that a dismissal under section 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) for failure to state a claim is covered by the language in the Magistrate Judges Act that prevents the district court from designating a magistrate judge to ‘hear and determine’ a motion ‘to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.’ 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A). That rule is not absolute, however. It yields when, as section 636(c)(1) puts it, the magistrate judge is acting with ‘the consent of the parties.’ Packed into that short phrase are two questions: what does it take to signify consent, and which parties (one, some, or all) have to consent? Typically, both parties file written consents to the magistrate judge’s jurisdiction and the case proceeds without a hitch. And as Judge Posner’s dissent emphasizes, consent need not be explicit. No dispute there: consent may be implicit, as the Supreme Court recognized in Roell v. Withrow, 538 U.S. 580, 586–91, 123 S.Ct. 1696, 155 L.Ed.2d 775 (2003). But even implicit consent requires some action from the party whose consent must be found. . . . With the idea of presumed consent out of the way, the question remains whether the statute permits the consent of only one party. We think not. To begin with, that is not what the statute says; it speaks instead of the consent of the ‘parties,’ plural. The Commission sees no problem in the use of the plural: at the time of screening, it notes, only one party has come before the court. It should be enough, the Commission says, to obtain only the consent of the party that is actually present. This would require us to treat the unserved defendant as a nonparty to the case for this purpose. Such a step would ignore the general use of the term ‘parties’ throughout the rules of civil procedure. At the time of filing any civil complaint, only one party is ever before the court. . . . The fact that it is the plaintiff who commences the suit does not mean that the other parties named in the complaint do not count as ‘parties’ prior to service of process. And our case differs in one critical respect from the hypotheticals that concern Judge Easterbrook. . . All of his examples involve a case that has at least one plaintiff and at least one defendant. And in all of his examples, at least one plaintiff and one defendant have consented to the authority of the magistrate judge. That is the crucial element missing here: in our case, only one side of the ‘v’ has consented to the magistrate judge, and under the statute, that is not enough. . . .This court, unfortunately, has not been consistent in its approach to the issue we have been discussing. . . . We see no principled way of reconciling Geaney and Hains, even though Hains dealt with the prisoner-specific section 1915A, whereas Coleman’s case was dismissed under section 1915(e). The relevant language and structure of these two statutes are identical. . . . In the end, Hains stands alone in this circuit. Our consistent emphasis on the importance of consent strongly supports Geaney’s analysis. . . . We conclude that Geaney, Brook, and Stevo are more consistent with the language of the statute and better respect the constitutional line between Article III judges and other adjudicators. We thus overrule Hains. Because this resolves an internal circuit conflict and overrules one case, we have circulated this opinion to all judges in regular active service. See Cir. R. 40(e). A majority of the judges did not wish to hear this case en banc. Judge Easterbrook, joined by Judge Sykes, voted in favor of an en banc hearing. Judge Posner dissents on the merits. As we stressed earlier, this does not mean that the work of the magistrate judge in this type of case is wasted. The role of the magistrate judges in conducting screening of prisoner and in forma pauperis actions is of great assistance to the district court. But unless all parties to the action have consented to the magistrate judge’s authority to resolve the case finally, the role of the magistrate judge must parallel that of the bankruptcy judges after Stern. Rather than entering final judgments, they must ‘issue proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to be reviewed de novo by the district court.’ . . . We realize that this adds one extra step, but it is not a particularly burdensome one, and it does not mean that parties in the Commission’s position must be served before the case can be resolved. It just means that the district judge must enter any post-screening orders that dispose of the entire case. Fears that the district court judges will drown beneath a deluge of IFP applications are overblown. The Stern dissent expressed similar fears, but this has not come to pass. . . . The magistrate judges’ screening is among those ‘additional duties as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.’”)

Huber v. Beth, No. 21-C-0969, 2023 WL 1437715, at *10–11 (E.D. Wis. Feb. 1, 2023) (“Issues of qualified immunity are ordinarily resolved at summary judgment, not on a motion to dismiss. . . . The Seventh Circuit has made clear that ‘the motion-to-dismiss stage is rarely “the most suitable procedural setting to determine whether an official is qualifiedly immune.”’ . . . That is so because it is often impossible to tell from a complaint whether qualified immunity applies. . . . A plaintiff is not required to anticipate and overcome the defense of qualified immunity by pleading facts that go beyond the short-and-plain statement required by federal notice-pleading standards. . . . Thus, when a defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense via a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, he or she faces ‘a more challenging standard of review than would apply on summary judgment.’ . . . In the present case, the right at issue is the due-process right to be protected from state-created dangers. The Seventh Circuit has held that this right is clearly established. [citing Paine] This claim falls squarely within the scope of clearly established law as stated in Paine, which was not called into question by Weiland. . . . The individual defendants also contend that events in Kenosha on the night in question were chaotic, and that officers were faced with difficult decisions about how to best control and maneuver the protestors. They contend that plaintiff cannot point to a case that clearly establishes how they were supposed to respond to the specific circumstances they faced. However, this argument is not appropriate at the pleading stage, when the facts about the specific circumstances that the officers faced are not yet established. . . Moreover, the facts alleged in the complaint create at least a plausible inference that the defendants would have known that their conduct violated the Due Process Clause. The complaint alleges that the individual defendants knowingly funneled protestors into a confined area with hostile armed individuals that had threatened to harm protestors. . . Thus, as alleged in the complaint, the defendants needlessly and knowingly endangered protestors. Cases such as Paine put the individual defendants on notice that their alleged actions were unconstitutional. . . For the above reasons alone, defendants are not entitled to a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds. However, the complaint also alleges that defendants intentionally sent the protestors into the path of the armed individuals to ‘deal with’ (i.e., use force against) them, because they were hostile to the protestors’ social-justice message and racial makeup. . . Because I must accept these allegations as true, I must assume when assessing qualified immunity that the defendants intended to cause unnecessary harm to protestors. It is, of course, clearly established that officers cannot intentionally harm members of the public for no reason (or for malicious reasons). . . Therefore, plaintiff’s allegations that the individual defendants intended to harm protestors—which I discuss in more detail below—provide an additional reason for denying qualified immunity at this stage of the case.”)

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Carter v. Ludwick, No. 21-3510, 2022 WL 16707933 (8th Cir. Nov. 4, 2022) (not reported) (“The district court--without mentioning qualified immunity--denied the motions to dismiss, and defendants filed these interlocutory appeals, arguing that the district court erred in failing to issue a reviewable ruling on qualified immunity. This circuit has repeatedly stressed the importance of resolving qualified immunity issues at the earliest possible stage in the litigation. . . Because the district court did not address qualified immunity in its denial of the motions to dismiss, we remand these cases with instructions for the district court to rule on defendants’ claims to qualified immunity. . . While we do not take a position on whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, we stress that any ruling on qualified immunity should provide a meaningful basis for appellate review.”)

Thunderhawk v. Morton County, No. 20-3052, 2022 WL 2441323, at *1–2 (8th Cir. July 5, 2022) (not reported) (“In its 101-page opinion and order, the district court devoted less than 3 pages to the qualified immunity analysis. As to the first prong, the district court determined that ‘the Plaintiffs have alleged facts showing violations of their constitutional right to speech,’ and, as to the second prong, the district court stated that ‘whether the law was clearly established so that a reasonable official would know he or she was violating the constitutional rights of another ... appears to be the biggest contention between the parties.’ . . Instead of deciding the clearly established prong, however, the district court stated that this case is an example of why ‘qualified immunity is often best decided on a motion for summary judgment when the details of the alleged deprivations are more fully developed.’ . . As the United States Supreme Court has noted, ‘when qualified immunity is asserted at the pleading stage, the precise factual basis for the plaintiff's claim or claims may be hard to identify' and 'the answer [to] whether there was a violation may depend on a kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed. . . 'While a district court may address the prongs in any order, it "may not deny qualified immunity without answering both questions in the plaintiff's favor."'. . The district court's failure to answer the clearly established inquiry was thus erroneous. Defendants urge us to conduct the clearly established inquiry in the first instance as it involves a purely legal question. We decline to do so without the benefit of the district court's analysis. . . We therefore remand to the district court with instructions to conduct the requisite clearly established analysis.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Jensen v. Brown, No. 23-2545, 2025 WL 748139, at *4, *11-13 (9th Cir. Mar. 10, 2025) (“[I]n this instance, the merits of the First Amendment claim need to be decided for purposes of the official capacity prospective relief sought. . . And as we ultimately conclude that the Administrators did violate clearly established law, . . .we must address the merits of the constitutional issue for that reason as well. So we assess first whether Jensen has pleaded a First Amendment violation. . . . [W]e conclude that Jensen has pleaded a constitutional violation. . . We now turn to ‘whether the right at issue was “clearly established” at the time of defendant’s alleged misconduct.’. . .Here, by the time of the alleged retaliation, Pickering had established that ‘the preferable manner of operating the school system ... clearly concerns an issue of general public interest.’. . More recently, Demers held that speech opining on ‘the nature of what [is] taught at [a] school’ addresses a matter of public concern, putting a reasonable official on notice that Jensen’s speech regarding TMCC’s math curriculum met this criterion. . . In addition, it was clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation that speech need not be aired to the general public to involve a matter of public concern. . . Further, Demers pronounced that if a public employee’s speech is ‘related to scholarship or teaching,’ it does not fall outside the ambit of the First Amendment simply because it is made pursuant to the employee’s official duties. . . As Demers illustrated, speech about a department’s curriculum, like that at issue here, falls squarely within the scholarship or teaching exception. . . And it was clearly established that retaliatory actions like those taken by the Administrators constitute adverse employment actions. . . So at the time of the Math Summit incident, it was clearly established that a professor has a right to speak about a school’s curriculum without being reprimanded, given negative performance reviews, and put through an investigation and termination hearing. We note, as the district court concluded otherwise, that Demers’ substantive holdings as to the reach of the Pickering doctrine are now clearly established law. Demers ultimately held that qualified immunity applied in that case, but that was because ‘[u]ntil the decision in [Demers], our circuit ha[d] not addressed the application of Garcetti to teaching and academic writing.’. . Once Demers clarified that Garcetti does not apply to speech related to scholarship or teaching, the doctrinal ambiguity was eliminated and does not bar Jensen’s claim. . . . Ordinarily, the next Pickering step is evaluating whether it was clearly established that TMCC’s interest in maintaining an orderly workplace did not outweigh Jensen’s right to speak. . . But ‘[d]etermining claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage raises special problems for legal decision making[.]’. . One such problem arises when the boundaries of the right at issue are delineated by a balancing test in which the defendant bears the burden of substantiating its interest, as is the case here. Determining whether it was clearly established that the Pickering balancing would tilt in Jensen's favor turns on the strength of the state's interests, which, as discussed above, must appear from the complaint itself, if at all. . . . There is not yet any 'evidence in the record that [Jensen's] conduct interfered with the performance of the governmental function,' and 'we are unable to determine without an evidentiary record whether any act [the state] committed in defense of [its interests] constituted a violation of clearly established rights, or even in general terms, where the Pickering balancing tips.' . . . Because 'it is not possible to determine at this stage as a matter of law that [Jensen] has not alleged a violation of clearly established law,' the Administrators are not entitled to qualified immunity at the pleading stage. . . . In reaching the opposite outcome, the district court concluded that Jensen had not shown that his right was clearly established. The complaint described his anti-retaliation right too generally, the district court said, and contained 'only three citations—Demers, 746 F.3d 402, the First Amendment, and 42 U.S.C. § 1983,' which 'do not clearly establish the specific right at issue in this particular case.' We cannot agree with this truncated analysis. '[A]ppellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.' Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 512, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994). 'A court engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should therefore use its "full knowledge of its own and other relevant precedents"' . . . As described above, our review of the full range of relevant precedents indicates that the Administrators are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage.")

Sabra v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 44 F.4th 867, 892-93 (9th Cir. 2022) ("It is true that resolving claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage can sometimes present 'special problems for legal decision making,' . . . particularly when we are 'aided only by the skeletal ... factual picture sketched out in the complaint[.]' . . . Thus, it is understandable that district courts sometimes delay a decision on qualified immunity until the parties have had the opportunity to develop a more comprehensive factual record. . . . In this case, though, there are two unique features that obviate the concern over resolving qualified immunity claims prior to discovery. First, Plaintiffs attached substantial documentary evidence to their Complaint, including the allegedly offending slides; the assigned reading excerpt from Future Jihad; screenshots of the full end-of-module quiz; the World Politics course syllabus; screenshots of Sabra's correspondence with Damask following his completion of the quiz; and screenshots of the College's statement posted to Instagram. We therefore have access to the allegedly offending course material that forms the sum and substance of Plaintiffs' claims, as well as other materials that serve to contextualize Plaintiffs' factual allegations. These are precisely the materials that ordinarily would have been produced in discovery. Second, Damask's World Politics course was a self-guided course administered entirely online. The PowerPoint slides, assigned readings, and end-of-module quizzes made up the entirety of the course. There were no lectures, discussion groups, or other pedagogical components beyond the materials described in the Complaint. In other words, we have before us the universe of evidence we might wish to consider in resolving Damask's claim of qualified immunity. Discovery would not serve to sharpen our understanding of the factual picture in this case. Even if discovery somehow were to produce additional relevant evidence, it is difficult to conceive of evidence that would alter the result in this case. As discussed, we have found no cases that would have put Damask on notice that his conduct might be unconstitutional under the circumstances here. No matter what we might learn in discovery, then, Damask would still be shielded by qualified immunity. . . . Postponing our qualified immunity decision until the summary judgment stage would only consume additional time, expense, and judicial resources, without any realistic possibility that the outcome would change.”)

Sabra v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 44 F.4th 867, 897 (9th Cir. 2022) (Bress, J., dissenting) (“The majority bestows qualified immunity on Professor Damask based on a minimal record that raises more questions than it answers, even though we have repeatedly held that granting qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage and without discovery is disfavored.”)

B.Q. through Rodriguez-Q., No. 19-56348, 2020 WL 6112498 (9th Cir. Oct. 16, 2020) (not reported) (“Because qualified immunity is ‘an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability,’ . . . the Supreme Court has directed courts to resolve such questions ‘at the earliest stage of litigation possible[.]’ Defendants can raise qualified immunity immediately, and district courts may grant a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds if the record supports such a ruling. . . Here, by addressing qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage, the district court appropriately resolved the question at the earliest stage of the litigation possible. Appellant cites no precedent supporting his argument that district courts are not allowed to do so.”)

Hernandez v. City of San Jose, 897 F.3d 1125, 1137-38 (9th Cir. 2018) (“ ‘Whatever the merits of the decision[s] in [Wood and Kennedy], the differences [in the facts of those] case[s] and [this] case . . . leap from the page.’ [citing Kisela] Without more, Wood and Kennedy did not place these Officers on notice that their actions were unlawful ‘in light of the specific context of [this] case.’. But the Attendees have also cited Johnson, a case that clearly establishes the state-created danger doctrine applies to the crowd-control context. . . .Based on the allegations in the FAC, which we take as true at this stage of the proceedings, we also find that this is ‘one of those rare cases’ in which the constitutional violation ‘is so “obvious” that we must conclude . . . qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.’. . Here, the Attendees allege the Officers shepherded them into a violent crowd of protesters and actively prevented them from reaching safety. The Officers continued to implement this plan even while witnessing the violence firsthand, and even though they knew the mob had attacked Trump supporters at the Convention Center earlier that evening, and that similar, violent encounters had occurred in other cities. Viewed in the light most favorable to the Attendees, these allegations establish ‘with obvious clarity’ that the Officers increased the danger to the Attendees and acted with deliberate indifference to that danger, pursuant to the state-created danger doctrine. . . We therefore hold ‘that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us “to draw the reasonable inference that the [Officers are] liable for the misconduct alleged,”’. . and that the district court properly denied the Officers qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. This, of course, ‘does not mean that th[e] case must go to trial,’ . . . or that the Officers are now precluded from ever asserting a claim for qualified immunity in this litigation. As we have noted time and again, ‘[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, [the Officers] will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.’”) Keates v. Koile, 883 F.3d 1228, 1234-35, 1237-38, 1240 (9th Cir. 2018) (“This appeal raises an additional wrinkle because the district court granted the motion to dismiss largely on the ground that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. Determining claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage raises special problems for legal decision making. . . . On the one hand, we may not dismiss a complaint making ‘a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.’ . . . But on the other hand, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity so long as ‘their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . The Supreme Court has emphasized that this is a low bar, explaining that ‘[q]ualified immunity gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.’ . . . Balancing these competing rules, when a district court dismisses a complaint for failure to state a claim based on a qualified immunity defense, we consider whether the complaint alleges sufficient facts, taken as true, to support the claim that the officials’ conduct violated clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable officer would be aware ‘in light of the specific context of the case.’ . . . If the operative complaint ‘contains even one allegation of a harmful act that would constitute a violation of a clearly established constitutional right,’ then plaintiffs are ‘entitled to go forward’ with their claims. . . . But our decision at the motion-to-dismiss stage sheds little light on whether the government actors might ultimately be entitled to qualified immunity ‘were the case permitted to proceed, at least to the summary judgment stage’ and the court is presented with facts providing context for the challenged actions. . . . Because the operative complaint here was dismissed on qualified immunity grounds, we must determine whether Keates and A.K.’s complaint pleads a plausible claim that withstands a qualified immunity defense. . . . In sum, our case law clearly establishes that the rights of parents and children to familial association under the Fourteenth, First, and Fourth Amendments are violated if a state official removes children from their parents without their consent, and without a court order, unless information at the time of the seizure, after reasonable investigation, establishes reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger of serious bodily injury, and the scope, degree, and duration of the intrusion are reasonably necessary to avert the specific injury at issue. . . . [B]ased solely on the facts alleged in the complaint construed in favor of Keates and A.K., a reasonable official in Koile’s position would know the available information did not establish reasonable cause to believe that A.K. was in imminent danger of attempting to commit suicide, or that it was necessary to separate her from her mother, transfer her to ABHS, and continue to detain her after medical professionals at ABHS concluded she was a low suicide risk. Therefore, we conclude that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us ‘to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.’ . . . The district court therefore erred in dismissing the familial association claim against Koile and Pender on the basis of qualified immunity. However, ‘[o]ur denial of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings does not mean that this case must go to trial.’ . . . As we have previously noted, ‘[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.’”)

Butler v. San Diego District Attorney’s Office, 370 F.3d 956, 958, 964 (9th Cir. 2004) (“We hold that the district court applied an incorrect evidentiary standard in denying summary judgment. It incorrectly understood the law to require it to assume that factual allegations in a plaintiff’s § 1983 complaint are true when a defendant moves for summary judgment based on official immunity. Based on that understanding of the law, the district court did not rule on the admissibility of evidence proffered by plaintiffs at summary judgment, but rather simply assumed that the factual allegations in the complaint were true without regard to whether they had evidentiary support. The district court was misled by a brief (and incorrect) statement by this court in Fletcher v. Kalina, 93 F.3d 653, 654 (9th Cir.1996), and a repetition of that statement by the Supreme Court on review of our decision in Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 122 (1997). We hold that these brief statements were inadvertent and erroneous statements of the law. A correct statement of the law is that when a defendant makes a properly supported motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, the plaintiff has an obligation to produce evidence of his or her own. In such a case, the district court is not required (or even allowed) simply to assume the truth of challenged factual allegations in the complaint. In other words, a motion for summary judgment based on official immunity is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, just like all motions for summary judgment in civil suits in federal district court. . . . Thus, in the usual case where a defendant asserts an official immunity defense, the district court first decides whether the facts alleged in the complaint, assumed to be true, yield the conclusion that the defendant is entitled to immunity. This is the analysis under Rule 12(b)(6) on a motion to dismiss. If, taking the facts as stated in the complaint, the defendant is entitled to immunity, no discovery should be permitted and the case should be dismissed. . . . If a plaintiff passes this initial hurdle, he or she is entitled to enough discovery to permit the court to rule on a defendant’s subsequent summary judgment motion brought under Rule 56. . . . The Supreme Court has clearly, and repeatedly, admonished that official immunity is immunity from suit rather than merely immunity from liability. . . . It would therefore be extremely odd if, in ruling on a defendant’s motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, a district court were required to assume that the allegations in plaintiff’s complaint are true. If that were the law, the defendant would effectively be deprived of the protection afforded by a motion for summary judgment, and would be given only the protection afforded by a motion to dismiss. That is, the defendant would always be obliged to go to trial if the plaintiff’s allegations (as distinct from the plaintiff’s evidence) would overcome a claim of official immunity. If this were the law, a defendant moving for summary judgment based on official immunity would have to go to trial more, rather than less, often than a defendant moving for summary judgment on some other basis. Given that the very purpose of official immunity is to provide immunity from trial, this cannot be the law. . . . Because the district court misunderstood the evidentiary standard in ruling on defendants’ motions for summary judgment based on official immunity, we vacate the district court’s ruling and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We recognize that the district court’s misunderstanding of the evidentiary standard may have led it to be more restrictive in the discovery it allowed to plaintiff than it would have been if it had properly understood the standard, and that the court may have led plaintiffs to seek to discover and introduce less evidence than they otherwise would have done. We leave it to the district court on remand to allow additional discovery, if appropriate, based on the evidentiary standard plaintiff must meet in responding to a properly supported motion for summary judgment.”).

Thompson v. Lampert, No. CV-02-135-HU, 2004 WL 1673102, at *15 n.3 (D. Ore. July 27, 2004) (“While the qualified immunity cases indicate that the first inquiry as to whether a constitutional right has been violated is based on a review of the facts alleged taken in the light most favorable to plaintiff, this does not mean that the court’s analysis of a qualified immunity defense in the context of a summary judgment motion is limited to the allegations in the complaint or those put forth only by the plaintiff. . . Rather, the inquiry is whether upon review of the evidence in the record, there is a disputed issue of fact. If so, Saucier requires that the court conduct the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis assuming the truth of the facts as alleged by the plaintiff and in a light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . If, however, the record reveals only undisputed facts and those facts do not support a constitutional violation, the inquiry ends.”).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Sanchez v. Guzman, 105 F.4th 1285, 1289-1300 (10th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, No. 24-463 (U.S. Jan.13, 2025) (“[U]nder the unique circumstances of this case, we are unable to make that qualified-immunity determination because Plaintiffs have failed to identify the record evidence that supports the version of the facts that they have pleaded and argued in their briefing. In other words, Plaintiffs have failed to supply the factual foundation for our qualified-immunity legal analysis. As a necessary consequence, Plaintiffs have effectively waived our review of their challenge to the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Defendants. More specifically, this is so because Plaintiffs’ failure to define the operative factual universe—with citations to supportive record evidence—prevents us from assessing whether Plaintiffs have carried their two-part qualified-immunity burden. In particular, absent Plaintiffs identifying for us a record-based factual universe reflecting their version of events, we cannot opine on whether the district court committed reversible error in concluding that Plaintiffs did not satisfy the clearly established law prong of the qualified-immunity test. The assessment of whether a plaintiff has satisfied that prong—as well as the first prong of the qualified-immunity test (constitutional violation vel non)—turns on the nature of the record-based factual universe that a plaintiff has defined. But here Plaintiffs have failed to define such a universe. Therefore, they have effectively waived our review of their qualified-immunity challenge. Accordingly, exercising jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, we are constrained on this basis to uphold the district court’s judgment. . . . Plaintiffs have failed to define in any meaningful manner a factual universe grounded in record evidence that could form the foundation for our inquiry into existing clearly established law. In other words, Plaintiffs have failed to present their record-based version of the events that bear on Defendants’ use of force for our use in evaluating the merits of their legal challenge. Indeed, Plaintiffs did not even include a “Statement of Facts” section in their Opening Brief. Accordingly, we conclude that Plaintiffs have effectively waived our review of their appellate challenge to the district court’s clearly established law ruling. And for that reason, we reject Plaintiffs’ appellate challenge and uphold the district court’s judgment. As our discussion of the governing law supra should have made patent, the clearly established law inquiry is fact-intensive because it ordinarily focuses on determining whether there is caselaw with materially similar facts to the facts of the case before the court. . . . And, in the summary-judgment context, the plaintiff is obliged to define the factual universe by reference to record evidence. That is, the plaintiff has the burden of supporting her version of events, as reflected in the plaintiff’s complaint and arguments, with record evidence. . . . Absent this record-based picture of the case facts, there is no foundation for the court to conduct a clearly established law inquiry—that is, there are no facts grounded in the evidence against which the court can compare the facts of the caselaw that comprises clearly established law. Stated otherwise, the plaintiff is obliged to offer a record-supported version of the facts that would reveal the unlawfulness of the defendants’ conduct—when those facts are viewed through the prism of clearly established law. Here, Plaintiffs have completely failed to fulfill this obligation. . . . Rather than relying on the district court’s general statements regarding the areas of fact that it was willing to assume in Plaintiffs’ favor, Plaintiffs were obliged to define here a record-based factual universe—viewing the facts in the light most favorable to them—which we could use in resolving the legal, clearly established law issue. But Plaintiffs failed to do so. And, second, Plaintiffs’ roundabout, indirect reliance on the district court’s order resolving the motions to dismiss does not advance the ball for them one iota. In their briefing here, Plaintiffs quote from a portion of the district court’s summary judgment order, where the court was reciting the procedural history of this case and specifically acknowledging—through citations and parentheticals containing quoted language—its rulings in resolving the motions to dismiss. . . . However, Plaintiffs’ reliance on this portion of the record where the district court was accepting as true certain facts for purposes of resolving Defendants’ motions to dismiss is unavailing. It does not help Plaintiffs to carry their burden of proof of defining a universe of record-based facts to support our clearly established law analysis. It is axiomatic that, in resolving motions to dismiss, courts accept the well-pleaded factual averments of the plaintiff’s complaint as true and construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . However, this pleading-based approach is inapposite in the summary-judgment context. In that context, as here, the plaintiff cannot rest on her well-pleaded factual averments; rather, the plaintiff must point to record evidence supportive of the plaintiff’s position; this means that, though ordinarily the court accepts plaintiff’s version of the facts as the starting point for the legal analysis, that version will be cognizable only if it is supported by record evidence. . . . As applied here, the upshot is this. The district court properly accepted the well-pleaded factual averments of Plaintiffs’ complaint in resolving the motions to dismiss. And those averments did favor Plaintiffs’ argument that the Defendants used excessive force—in that, among other things, they depict Defendants as shooting at Plaintiffs’ vehicle, even though Plaintiffs supposedly posed no threat to Defendants and were not resisting. Yet Plaintiffs’ citation to the portion of the record involving the district court’s resolution of the motions to dismiss does not help them carry their summary-judgment burden. Plaintiffs are no longer free to rely on the district court’s acceptance of their complaint averments. Rather, Plaintiffs are obliged to demonstrate that their version of the facts is supported by evidence in the record. Stated otherwise, they are required to ground their version of the facts in such evidence. Perhaps that record evidence would support Plaintiffs' argument that the Defendants used excessive force, as Plaintiffs' complaint averments did. Perhaps not. But either way, Plaintiffs are obliged here to rest their version of the facts—upon which they seek to defeat Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity—on record evidence, not pleading averments. Only such a record-based version of the facts could form the foundation for our clearly established law analysis in the summary-judgment context. Plaintiffs, however, have failed to provide us with such a version of the facts; they cannot do so by relying on the well-pleaded factual averments of the complaint that the district court accepted as true at the motion-to-dismiss stage of the proceedings. The inquiry into the existence of clearly established law is not undertaken in a factual vacuum; rather, it turns on the closeness of the fit of the facts contained in the controlling caselaw to a universe of record-based facts in the case at bar. Because Plaintiffs have failed to define for us on summary judgment a universe of record-based facts, we have no factual foundation upon which to determine whether Defendants violated Plaintiffs' clearly established legal rights. Stated otherwise, by failing to define for us the operative universe of record-supported facts, Plaintiffs have prevented us from determining what law was clearly established. And because Plaintiffs bear the burden of showing that applicable clearly established law defeats Defendants' qualified-immunity defense, this definitional failure as to the operative factual universe sounds the death knell for their appellate challenge. In short, we have no basis to disturb the district court's determination—on clearly established law grounds—that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Thompson v. Ragland, 23 F.4th 1252, 1256 (10th Cir. 2022) (“The procedural posture of the qualified-immunity inquiry may be critical. Because they turn on a fact-bound inquiry, ‘qualified immunity defenses are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage’ rather than on a motion to dismiss. . . . On a motion to dismiss, ‘it is the defendant’s conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for [constitutionality].”)

Myers v. Brewer, 773 F. App’x 1032, ____ (10th Cir. 2019) (“‘Asserting a qualified immunity defense via a Rule 12(b)(6) motion . . . subjects the defendant to a more challenging standard of review than would apply on summary judgment.’ . . . ‘At the motion to dismiss stage, it is the defendant’s conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for objective legal reasonableness.’ . . . We evaluate ‘(1) whether the facts that a plaintiff has alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right, and (2) whether the right at issue was clearly established.’”)

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Miller v. Palm Beach County Sheriff’s Office, 129 F.4th 1329, 1333-34 (11th Cir. 2025) (“We have repeatedly held that a district court errs when it reserves ruling on an official’s entitlement to qualified immunity. In Collins v. School Board of Dade County, for example, we held that a failure to rule on qualified immunity raised in a motion for summary judgment effectively denied the defendants the right not to stand trial. . . In Howe v. City of Enterprise, we likewise held that the district court erred when it reserved its ruling on the officers’ entitlement to qualified immunity upon a motion to dismiss. . . And, in Chesser v. Sparks, we emphasized that an entitlement to qualified immunity ‘raised ... on a motion to dismiss ... will be granted if the complaint fails to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right.’. . . A district court must adjudicate a defense of qualified immunity at whatever stage it is raised. The district court erred when it refused to resolve this threshold legal issue. As an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is not, as the district court stated, ‘more appropriately resolved at the summary judgment sta[g]e or later in the proceedings.’ To the contrary, our precedents mandate its resolution ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’. . . Even if the paperless order entered here could be construed as concluding that Miller’s complaint alleged a constitutional violation, the district court failed to provide ‘sufficient explanation[]’ to allow us to ‘engage in meaningful appellate review.’. . . It failed to conduct the required claim-by-claim and defendant-by-defendant analysis, address whether the deputies acted within their discretionary authority, or decide whether any alleged violation was clearly established. And it erred by reserving its ruling until summary judgment.”)

Swinford v. Santos, 121 F.4th 179, 193-94 (11th Cir. 2024) (Calvert, District Judge, concurring) (“During the pendency of this appeal, other panels of this Court decided Baker v. City of Madison, Alabama, 67 F.4th 1268, 1277 (11th Cir. 2023), which held that the incorporation-by-reference doctrine applies to police body camera footage, and Johnson v. City of Atlanta, 107 F.4th 1292, 1300 (11th Cir. 2024), which held that the incorporation-by-reference doctrine does not require the complaint to refer to the document at issue or to attach it. Under the prior panel precedent rule, this panel is bound by these rulings, and accordingly I join the majority opinion in full. . . As a district judge who regularly handles motions to dismiss raising qualified immunity, I write separately to point out some practical issues with applying the incorporation by reference doctrine to body camera footage within the motion to dismiss framework, and offer some guidance on resolving them. When reviewing a motion to dismiss, we are instructed to ‘accept[] the facts alleged in the complaint as true and draw[] all reasonable inferences therefrom in the plaintiff’s favor.’. . . In the case of incorporation by reference involving a document, this is straightforward. The parties can dispute what a given clause was intended to mean, but there is generally no dispute as to what the document says. In the paradigmatic example of a contract, the district court determines whether the well-pleaded allegations of the complaint constitute a breach of the incorporated contract. But when a video is incorporated by reference, Baker instructs that ‘we accept the video’s depiction instead of the complaint’s account ... and view the facts in the light depicted by the video.’. . . Unlike a document, a video can depict numerous subjects moving independently at varying distances and speaking over each other at varying degrees of audibility. When there are multiple videos providing different viewpoints of the same event, the task is even more complicated. At the motion to dismiss stage, the district court usually has only a complaint, the videos, and the parties’ briefs, the latter of which by design are structured around competing narratives and theories of the case and thus do not neatly map to each other. Compare this with the more orderly summary judgment framework where the parties would have been required to organize their arguments as to the contents of the videos into discrete factual assertions, permitting the district court to engage in the more familiar process of disregarding portions of the record not cited and focusing on whether the record actually supports a given factual assertion. . . Turning to this case, unmoored from the framework of the summary judgment process, the district court below was essentially forced to transcribe the footage and cite directly to portions of the video in formulating its opinion. To do so required some degree of editorial judgment with no opportunity for the parties to weigh in on what made the ‘final cut.’ While motions to dismiss governed by Baker and Johnson do not require conversion to summary judgment, my read of those cases is that they do not foreclose conversion as an exercise of discretion. Exercising this discretion will often lead to a more orderly presentation of the merits and facilitate appellate review. Any concerns about subjecting a defendant to discovery prior to a ruling on the motion can be avoided by sharply narrowing the scope of discovery to those issues necessary for resolution of the converted motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b) and (c).”)

Meshal v. Commissioner, Georgia Department of Public Safety, 117 F.4th 1273, 1288-89 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2024) (“Here, based on the facts as alleged in the complaint, a reasonable police officer could not have believed that Meshal’s long-ago arrest for driving with a suspended license, his delivery trip to Miami, and his mere presence on the No Fly List were sufficient to detain him for more than an hour and a half. This is especially true given the alleged numerous, explicit warnings in the same NCIC notice that flagged Meshal’s no-fly status. As the district court aptly put it, ‘[t]he Complaint plausibly allege[d] that the officers merely equated Meshal’s presence on the list to ambiguous criminal activity, which they believed they were at liberty to investigate without regard for Meshal’s constitutionally protected rights.’. . That belief was not only wrong—it was unreasonable. Moreover, binding precedent featuring materially similar facts clearly established that the officers violated Meshal’s Fourth Amendment rights by extending the stop, without reasonable suspicion of other criminal activity, beyond the time it took for them to conduct tasks incident to the stop. . . Because the existence of the affirmative defense of qualified immunity does not ‘clearly appear[] on the face of the complaint,’ the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for extending the duration of Meshal’s traffic stop, at least at this stage of the proceedings.⁶ [fn.6: We note that although Meshal’s complaint adequately alleged a violation of clearly established law, development of the factual record through discovery may bring to light new information that could affect the qualified immunity analysis. And the officers are free to reassert qualified immunity on a motion for summary judgment and at trial, if there is one[.]] . . . Besides his seizure claim, Meshal also brought a claim for the unlawful search of his truck, based on his allegation that Frink, at the apparent invitation of Janufka, ‘opened the passenger side door of the semi-truck and physically lifted his dog into the cabin of the vehicle’ before ‘enter[ing] the truck himself’ for ‘approximately a minute and a half.’ . . Based on the allegations in the complaint, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity from this claim. Generally, the Fourth Amendment requires officers to obtain a warrant supported by probable cause before searching a person’s property. . . Under the automobile exception to the Fourth Amendment, however, ‘officers may search an automobile without having obtained a warrant so long as they have probable cause to do so.’. . Probable cause to search a vehicle exists where an officer could conclude that ‘there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in the vehicle.’. . We have already explained that, under Meshal’s version of events, the officers lacked arguable reasonable suspicion of a crime sufficient to detain Meshal longer than it would have taken to check his license and registration and write his traffic ticket. That necessarily means that they lacked arguable probable cause to search Meshal’s truck for contraband or evidence of a crime. . . Further, it was clearly established at the relevant time that arguable probable cause was required. . . Without arguable probable cause, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for searching Meshal’s truck.”)

IV. STATE OF MIND AND QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

D.C. CIRCUIT

Daugherty v. Sheer, 891 F.3d 386, 390-92 (D.C. Cir. 2018) (“Regardless of whether a court expressly has declared certain conduct unlawful, a government official is not entitled to qualified immunity where ‘every “reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates th[e] right.”’. . Accordingly, ‘we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view—if there is one.’. . The proponent of a purported right has the ‘burden to show that the particular right in question ... was clearly established’ for qualified-immunity purposes. . . In their claim now on appeal, Daugherty and LabMD assert that Sheer and Yodaiken violated their rights by prosecuting an enforcement action in retaliation for Daugherty’s speech, despite the undisputed data-security breach underlying the FTC’s investigation and regardless of ultimate control over the decision to bring a complaint residing with the FTC board. Because no such right was clearly established, Sheer and Yodaiken are immune from this suit. . . Our task, then, is to determine whether there is a clearly established right to be free from an enforcement action where retaliatory motive was allegedly present, but was not plausibly alleged to be the but-for cause of the enforcement. . . . Supreme Court precedent shows that there is no such clearly established right. If anything, the leading cases cut the other way: they show that retaliatory motive does not automatically imbue the conduct in question with an unconstitutional air, where the official’s actions have a legitimate basis. . . . Because the FTC enforcement action against LabMD had an alternative cause—the undisputed data-security breach by which the 1718 File was publicly available from a LabMD computer—the alleged actions by Sheer and Yodaiken did not violate Daugherty’s or LabMD’s clearly established rights, even assuming retaliatory motive. Sheer and Yodaiken accordingly are entitled to qualified immunity, and the District Court’s decision concluding otherwise is REVERSED.”)

Richardson v. D.C., 322 F. Supp. 3d 175, 184-86 (D.D.C. 2018) (“It may seem odd to speak of qualified immunity in the context of the Eighth Amendment. After all, to hold an officer liable for deliberate indifference, a court must find that the officer disregarded a risk of harm that he subjectively knew about. Moreover, it was clearly established in Farmer v. Brennan that disregarding a risk of inmate-on-inmate sexual assault amounts to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. So if the record were to support a jury finding that Warden Smith disregarded the risk that an inmate like Richardson might be assaulted if placed in a cell with a heterosexual male, wouldn't the record necessarily also support a finding that Smith violated clearly established law? Not necessarily. Farmer put correctional officers on notice that they cannot house together a transgender female inmate who they know faces a particularly high risk of assault with a male inmate. . . But the case leaves open what exactly a higher-level supervisor or policymaker must do when dealing not with particularized evidence of risk, but rather with the ever-present, generalized risk of sexual assault that transgender inmates face at the hands of their cellmates. In other words, Farmer does not hold that transgender female inmates, notwithstanding their own housing preferences, may never be celled with male inmates. In fact, Farmer says nothing whatsoever about general procedures for housing transgender inmates. And, equally importantly, Farmer laid down a principle that officers who reasonably respond to known risks cannot be held liable for deliberate indifference, . . . which leaves open the possibility that an official's unreasonable response was not clearly unreasonable under existing law. The Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Taylor v. Barkes . . . helps explain why Farmer's holding—clear as it may be with respect to certain conduct—does not automatically vitiate Smith's immunity here. In Barkes, the widow of a former inmate who committed suicide in prison had sued the commissioner of the state department of corrections and the prison's warden. . . She claimed that the officials had displayed deliberate indifference toward his risk of suicide 'by failing to supervise and monitor the private contractor that provided the medical treatment—including the intake screening—at the [prison]'. . The court of appeals had found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on her Eighth Amendment claim because, at the time of the inmate's death, there were cases on the books putting officers on notice that they could not behave with reckless indifference to a particular inmate's known 'vulnerability to suicide.' . The Supreme Court disagreed. In its view, those prior decisions did not clearly establish the unlawfulness of the officials' purported conduct—failing to implement adequate screening procedures—because the cases 'did not say ... that detention facilities must implement procedures to identify such vulnerable inmates, let alone specify what procedures would suffice.' . By the same token, Farmer does not dictate the outcome here. The clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to sexual assault does not mean that it is clearly established what procedures a supervisor must put in place to prevent assault. And the Court finds that, as a matter of undisputed fact, Warden Smith's actions did not violate clearly established Eighth Amendment law. It is undisputed that Smith played a limited role in the chain of events that led to Richardson's purported assault. He testified that he did not participate in creating or implementing the two policies that Richardson takes issue with—the one that allowed transgender inmates to be housed in the general male prison population, . . . or the one that presumptively double-celled inmates, including transgender inmates, absent a specific finding that they belonged in protective custody[.] Richardson identifies no evidence undermining that testimony, and indeed she concedes that the policies were instituted not by Smith, but by the Department's Director. . . . Nor is there any evidence suggesting that Smith selected Glover as Richardson's cellmate or was aware of Richardson's concerns about Glover, which she claims to have expressed to several prison guards after being moved into his cell. Rather, the record, read in the light most favorable to Richardson, supports the following narrative with respect to Warden Smith's state of mind: Smith knew that, pursuant to Department of Corrections policy, an inmate could circumvent the Transgender Housing Committee's hearing process by signing a form agreeing to be housed according to her birth sex. . . Smith could override any initial determination related to housing—including the inmate’s election of birth-sex housing—by making a recommendation to the Director in writing. . . Smith also knew that any transgender female inmate who was housed in the general male population would presumptively be double-celled based on a suicide-prevention policy instituted by the Director. . . Smith could register disagreement with that policy but could not unilaterally change it. . . A jury could also infer that Smith knew generally that transgender female inmates—particularly those exhibiting traditionally feminine characteristics—faced a higher risk of sexual assault when celled with male inmates. There is no evidence, however, that Smith had any information indicating that Richardson faced a particularly high risk of abuse. Nor is there evidence that Smith knew that Glover, beyond his substantial criminal history, posed an especially high threat of sexual assault. Obviously, Richardson need not point to a case finding liability under that exact set of facts in order to overcome qualified immunity. . . But she still must persuade the Court that, in 2014, Smith was on clear notice that the foregoing conduct and associated state of mind amounted to a constitutional violation. She cites no authority, nor is the Court is aware of any, that provided such notice. The right to be free from deliberate indifference to the risk of assault does not necessarily imply that Smith needed to categorically prevent transgender female inmates from being celled with male inmates who exhibited no particularized red flags when it came to sexual violence. And an officer in Smith’s position could reasonably—not necessarily correctly, but reasonably—believe that the D.C. jail’s system for housing transgender inmates properly balanced inmate safety against avoiding mandatory isolation of transgender inmates, especially because it is undisputed that the double-celling policy was enacted to mitigate the risk of suicide. Smith is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Richardson’s Eighth Amendment claim against him in his individual capacity.”)

FIRST CIRCUIT

Jordan v. Town of Waldo, 943 F.3d 532, 547-49 (1st Cir. 2019) (“Having concluded that a jury could find that Officer Hesseltine and Chief Labombarde violated Jordan’s constitutional rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure and false arrest, we turn to these two defendants’ contention that we should affirm on the alternative grounds that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We have already concluded that the officers violated a federal constitutional right, so the sole question is whether the unlawfulness of their conduct was ‘clearly established at the time.’ . . . As the defendants correctly conceded at oral argument, the law clearly prohibited officers from ‘us[ing] deliberately falsified allegations to demonstrate probable cause.’ . . . Despite this concession, the defendants’ brief could be read to argue that -- even assuming Hesseltine and Labombarde deliberately included falsehoods in the warrant affidavit -- they are entitled to qualified immunity unless Jordan can show that any reasonable officer would have understood that, absent the falsehoods, probable cause would not have existed. We must disagree. . . . The aim of the doctrine of qualified immunity ‘is to avoid the chilling effect of second-guessing where the officers, acting in the heat of events, made a defensible (albeit imperfect) judgment.’ . . . There is no good reason to provide such protection to an officer who deliberately paints a misleading picture of the facts in order to procure a warrant. Whether or not it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the false picture was necessary to establish probable cause, it certainly would be clear to any law enforcement officer that trying to mislead the judicial officer in seeking a warrant is highly improper. . . . [O]n this record we consider the cumulative impact of what jurors might find to be a deliberate attempt to convey a knowingly false picture by combining a falsehood and two omissions in an effort to secure a warrant. So we are confident that the requirements for establishing a constitutional violation in this case provide sufficient protection for the officers so as to render any further qualified immunity analysis unnecessary. We therefore decline to affirm the judgment on qualified immunity grounds.”)

Martinez-Velez v. Rey-Hernandez, 506 F.3d 32, 46 (1st Cir. 2007) (“[I]n political discrimination cases—where wrongful motive is an element of the claim—the case law has regularly rejected this objective-reasonableness argument.”)

Rosario-Urdaz v. Velazco, 433 F.3d 174, 178 & n.2, 179 (1st Cir. 2006) (“Traditionally—search and seizure is the best example—the Supreme Court has said that private motive is irrelevant if the defendant had objective probable cause or, for qualified immunity purposes, a reasonable officer might have so believed, even if wrongly. . . . By contrast, in cases involving first amendment rights, some of our decisions have left open the possibility that an objectively reasonable action could still be denied qualified immunity if improperly motivated. [citing Mihos and Tang] These cases note, without resolving, the tension between specific-intent constitutional violations and the requirement that qualified immunity be decided on a purely objective basis. . . . In all events, even if the existence of a political motivation underlying an objectively reasonable employment decision were enough to preclude qualified immunity, Rosario-Urdaz must make a threshold showing that she was adversely affected by these personnel decisions. . . . The personnel decisions of which Rosario-Urdaz complains do not rise to this level.”).

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 102 , 103 (1st Cir. 2005) (“[T]he problem in this case is not one of a single actor with multiple motives, but of sequential actors having different motives—the first actor’s motive being unlawful and the second actor’s motive at least permissible. In such a case, the first actor may be (and here was) a but-for cause of the firing. The question is whether the intervening step—a final decision maker acting on a permissible ground—should as a matter of policy (not lack of causation) insulate the wrongdoer from liability. We have found only a few circuits that have addressed this sequence-of-actors issue in the present context, and they are nominally in conflict. [citing cases] The interplay between qualified immunity and First Amendment violations is a difficult subject, partly because the former normally employs an objective standard and the latter—in contrast to the ordinary Fourth Amendment claim— turns heavily upon motive. This does not mean that qualified immunity can never succeed in a First Amendment case, see Dirrane v. Brookline Police Dept., 315 F.3d 65, 69-71 (1st Cir.2002), but only that the opportunities may be narrowed. On appeal, appellants’ brief describes qualified immunity doctrine in general terms but makes no effort to apply it to the facts of this case. An argument not seriously developed in the opening brief is forfeit,. . .and that rule certainly applies in this case. Given that the jury almost surely found that appellants' purpose was improper retaliation, it is not clear how a qualified immunity defense could easily have prevailed.")

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 105-08 (1st Cir. 2005) (Carter, J., dissenting) ("[T]he conduct and motivation of Ms. Morales and Mr. Alvarez cannot be, as a matter of law, any part of a legally sufficient causative factor in Secretary Fuentes' employment action. Even though the evidence might be construed to establish that their termination recommendations were potentially driven by some unconstitutional motivation, they cannot be liable under section 1983 without some evidence of causation between that motivation and the decision by Secretary Fuentes to discharge the Plaintiff. . . . Without at least being able to impute appellants' unlawful motives to Secretary Fuentes, those wrongful motives cannot be found to be a motivating factor in the adverse employment action. . . . As a matter of law, there simply cannot be any causal link here between any supposed improper motives of the minions and the discharge implemented by Secretary Fuentes' solitary decision to discharge plaintiff for a proper, stated reason. . . . Webber v. International Paper Co., 417 F.3d 229 (1st Cir.2005). . . is a clear application of the Mt. Healthy rule requiring the presence of causal linkage between the conduct of those who are found to harbor discriminatory motivation and the making of the actual, challenged employment decision. It is, I suggest, not proper for this panel to depart from this holding. In this Circuit, each panel of the Court is bound by prior panel decisions directly on point. . . The seminal holding of Webber, for present purposes, is that where the evidence fails to show that the final decision-maker is influenced adversely by the motivation of lower level actors, the type and level of causation required by Mt. Healthy is absent and must be recognized. A).

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 103-07(1st Cir. 2004) ("Given the importance of Swift's motivation for firing Mihos for his vote, we must pause to address Swift's argument in her brief that 'the state of mind of the public official is not relevant to the question of qualified immunity,' citing to Harlow v. Fitzgerald. . . . This argument, along with citations to Harlow, is often made in First Amendment retaliation cases when defendants raise the qualified immunity defense. We are mindful that the Supreme Court in Harlow changed qualified immunity doctrine to emphasize the objective, not subjective, nature of that inquiry. However, Harlow does not stand for the proposition that inquiries into defendants' subjective motivation is inappropriate in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis in assessing whether an intent-based constitutional violation has been alleged. . . . Harlow, then, did not affect the first step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether plaintiff's allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation. Certain constitutional violations, including First Amendment retaliation claims, include defendant's motivations as a foundational element of the tort: Mihos's First Amendment retaliation claim 'has no meaning absent the allegation of impermissible motivation.' . . . While the Supreme Court has removed from the qualified immunity analysis inquiries into whether a defendant knew that he was violating plaintiff's constitutional rights or acted maliciously to that end, this jurisprudence has not suggested that the 'objectification' of the qualified immunity inquiry somehow removes the intent element in the 'subset of constitutional torts [in which] motivation or intent is an element of the cause of action .' . . . In Crawford-El v. Britton. . . the Supreme Court confirmed that although Harlow eliminated inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, it did not eliminate inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis when plaintiff alleges an intent-based constitutional tort. . . . With its careful attention to the ways in which trial courts can control the examination of an official's state of mind pre-trial, the Supreme Court acknowledged in Crawford-El that the adoption of an objective standard for qualified immunity in Harlow did not foreclose all state of mind inquiries during the pre-trial consideration of qualified immunity when state of mind is an element of the constitutional tort. Swift misreads Harlow in asserting that its reformulation of the qualified immunity defense makes her motivation in firing Mihos irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, if the qualified immunity defense proffered in her motion to dismiss does not identify proper grounds apart from motive for dismissing the case, and if the thrust of her motion to dismiss is simply to deny that she acted with the constitutionally proscribed motive, she is unlikely to succeed." [footnotes omitted]).

Orekoya v. Mooney, 330 F.3d 1, 11(1st Cir. 2003) ("Orekoya next erroneously argues that Judge Young could not have granted qualified immunity because 'national origin discrimination precludes the availability of qualified immunity as a defense,' citing to DiMarco-Zappa v. Cabanillas, 238 F.3d 25, 31, 37 (1st Cir.2001). The assertion is flatly wrong. DiMarco applied the usual rules of qualified immunity and concluded, on the facts there, that immunity was not available. There is no per se rule that national origin discrimination is exempt from qualified immunity analysis.").

Tower v. Leslie-Brown, 326 F.3d 290, 296 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Certainly, the unlawfulness of entering a person's home to effectuate a warrantless arrest in the absence of exigent circumstances was clearly established at the time of Tower's arrest in January 2001. . . . But the qualified immunity inquiry demands that we ask a second, more specific question: would a reasonable officer have known that it was unlawful to enter the home under the specific circumstances faced? . . . Maine law largely answers this question. By statute, an arresting officer 'need not have the warrant in [his] possession at the time of the arrest.' Me. R.Crim. P. 4(c)(3). It is uncontested that Peary was told by a court employee that a valid warrant had issued. The district court concluded, as do we, that it was reasonable for defendants to rely on the representation of a district court official, and that a reasonable actor would have believed that the warrant had issued. The Towers argue that the district court improperly failed to engage in an analysis of the defendants' subjective intent and absence of 'good faith.' In evaluating the officer's conduct, 'we do not focus on the official's subjective state of mind, such as bad faith or malicious intention ... we [must instead] make an objective analysis of the reasonableness of conduct in light of the facts actually known to the officer and not consider the individual officer's subjective assessment of those facts. Nor are actual motives for conduct to be considered in evaluating a qualified immunity defense.' Sheehy v. Town of Plymouth, 191 F.3d 15, 19 (1st Cir.1999) (internal quotations omitted) (quoting Floyd v. Farrell, 765 F.2d 1, 4-6 (1st Cir.1985)); see also Harlow, 457 U.S. at 818, 102 S.Ct. 2727. Because objectively reasonable officers would not have known they were violating the Towers' Fourth Amendment rights by entering their home, the defendants enjoy qualified immunity.”).

Tang v. State of Rhode Island, 120 F.3d 325, 327, 328 (1st Cir. 1997) (“We think that the Harlow-Anderson objective test does not automatically resolve a qualified immunity defense in favor of the defendant in a case of alleged racial discrimination or retaliation. The essence of such claims, or at least one standard version, is that official actions that might otherwise be defended as reasonable become illegitimate when taken out of racial bias or in revenge for a prior complaint. . . . To employ a wholly objective test would wipe out many, if not most, of these claims. The objective test focuses on the reasonableness of the official’s conduct independent of motive. It is rarely going to be manifestly unreasonable, judged apart from motive, to assign particular tasks to an employee, move her file cabinet, alter her parking arrangements or do most of the things of which Tang complains. But because of special constitutional or statutory protections, some motives can convert relatively minor slights into causes of action. . . . An unresolved tension exists between such specific-intent torts and the objective Harlow-Anderson qualified immunity test. That test was designed to meet, not claims of racial bias or retaliation, but rather ill- founded allegations that an official action was “malicious” or taken “in bad faith”—characterizations that defeated qualified immunity at common law. . . In all events, the circuit courts have almost uniformly refused to apply a strictly objective test of qualified immunity in racial and retaliation cases.”)

Broderick v. Roache, 996 F.2d 1294, 1297-98 (1st Cir. 1993) (holding that the district court did not err in taking into consideration defendant’s intent in course of qualified immunity analysis, where state of mind was an essential component of plaintiff’s underlying constitutional claim).

Feliciano-Angulo v. Rivera-Cruz, 858 F.2d 40, 46 (1st Cir. 1988) (“Harlow will not bar inquiry into a defendant’s state of mind when the applicable law makes the defendant’s state of mind . . . an essential element of plaintiff’s constitutional claim.”).

Facey v. Dickhaut, No. CA 11-10680-MLW, 2014 WL 8105164, at *21-22 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2014) (“Some courts have found that the qualified immunity analysis and the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference analysis fold into each other, reasoning that a reasonable officer would know that conduct amounting to deliberate indifference violates the Eighth Amendment. [collecting cases] However, neither the First Circuit nor the Supreme Court has decided whether qualified immunity poses a discrete question from deliberate indifference. Assuming, without deciding, that the question of whether a prison official’s conduct violates ‘clearly established law’ for purposes of qualified immunity is a question distinct from whether the officer acted with deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable official in the defendants’ position would have known that his conduct violated the plaintiff’s clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. As of 2010, when Facey was attacked, it was clearly established that prison officials violate a prisoner’s Eighth Amendment rights when they knowingly place him at a substantial risk of attack from other inmates. [citing cases] Most significantly, in 1994, in Farmer, 511 U.S. at 842–44, the Supreme Court held that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they knowingly place a prisoner in a setting that puts the prisoner at a substantial risk of violent assault from another inmate. . . . Like Farmer, Facey has presented evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to find that the defendants knowingly placed him at a substantial risk of being attacked by other inmates and that they violated Facey’s clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. Therefore, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Thayer v. Dion, No. 2: 09-cv-00435-DBH, 2010 WL 4961739, at * 16 (D. Me. Nov. 30, 2010) (“I agree with the defendants that there is a potential for an entitlement to qualified immunity under the Fourth Amendment standard even though there is sufficient evidence to warrant a trial on the Saucier v. Katz-esque [footnote omitted]excessive force claim in the absence of the immunity defense. [footnote omitted] However, it baffles me how a court could reach a conclusion that even though there was sufficient evidence that the force was applied impermissibly because it was motivated by a desire to punish or was malicious or sadistic the defendants are still entitled to summary judgment because ‘the contour of the right’ was not sufficiently clear and objectively a reasonable officer would not have understood that applying force to punish contravened the clearly established law. . . . The defendants’ argument on this score comes very close to a suggestion that given the misbehavior of Thayer, they thought a reasonable officer would think he or she could get away’ with the application of a little punitive, rights-violating force.”)

Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1170778, at 6-8 (D.Me. Apr. 18, 2007) (“[T]he defendants argue that the absence of probable cause for an arrest is a required element of a claim alleging retaliatory arrest, just as it is for a claim alleging retaliatory prosecution as indicated in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, ___, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 1706-07 (2006). . . . There is a Circuit split on the question of whether or not, what is now the Hartman rule, of pleading and proving the absence of probable cause applies to retaliatory arrests. [citing cases] I am simply not convinced that the rationale of Hartman applies to a claim such as Hrichak’s against the arresting officers involved in a spur-of-the-moment, warrantless arrest. . . . Even if Pion and Durham, under one version of the facts, were motivated by a desire to retaliate against Hrichak because of his threat to complain to federal authorities, they still claim they are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions because of the probable cause for the arrest. . . . Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9 (1st Cir.1994) and the ‘but-for’ test has been the clearly established law regarding retaliatory arrests in this circuit for over ten years. . . . As explained above, if the court considers the deposition testimony cited in his memorandum, there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether there was violation of a clearly established constitutional right. The difficult analysis occurs under the third prong of the First Circuit qualified immunity standard as it requires the court to determine whether ‘it would have been clear to an objectively reasonable official, situated similarly to [these defendants], that the actions taken or omitted contravened the clearly established right.’ . . . Thus, I find myself in the uncomfortable situation of assessing whether a police officer who under one version of the facts made a decision to arrest an individual because he wanted to prevent that individual from exercising his First Amendment rights, acted as an objectively reasonable police officer given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest. . . . The propriety of conferring Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) qualified immunity in this sort of ‘intent-based’ constitutional tort is anything but clear based upon the majority opinion in Crawford-El. . . . I conclude however, under the facts and circumstances of this case, even if there is some evidence which would support a finding of improper motive, given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest and subsequent guilty plea by Hrichak, Pion and Durham are entitled to qualified immunity.”).

See also Ligeri v. Rhode Island, 2007 WL 3072061, at *9 (D.R.I. Oct. 19, 2007) (“In Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9, 18 (1st Cir.1994), the First Circuit opined on the standard of proof in a § 1983 action alleging First Amendment violations by a police officer. It held that the plaintiff in such a case ‘need only show that the officer’s intent or desire to curb the [protected] expression was the determining or motivating factor in making the arrest, in the sense that the officer would not have made the arrest “but for” that determining factor.’ . . . The Cranston Defendants also neglect to address the application to this case of the Supreme Court’s holding in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 255-56 (2006), that a plaintiff in a § 1983 retaliatory prosecution claim must prove a lack of probable cause. In Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1229404 (D. Me. April 24, 2007), the District Court considered the question of whether the Hartman probable cause rule extended to a claim of First Amendment retaliatory arrest. The Court noted that the First Circuit had not yet addressed the question and that there is currently a Circuit split on the question. Id. at *7 (collecting cases). The Cranston Defendants have simply not sufficiently addressed any of the legal issues arising out of Plaintiff’s First Amendment retaliation claim. An additional complicating issue is that Plaintiff’s claim is one for a retaliatory ticket rather than a retaliatory arrest or criminal prosecution. The bottom line is that the Cranston Defendants have not adequately briefed the issue and thus have not met their burden under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) of demonstrating a failure to state a claim.”)

Pelletier v. Magnusson, 195 F. Supp.2d 214, 241 (D. Me. 2002) (“Because the deliberate indifference standard is subjective, asking whether the defendant consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm, . . . it cannot be said that should Pelletier demonstrate that the defendants acted with a deliberate indifference to Ronald’s medical care and physical safety that the defendants nonetheless reasonably believed that their conduct was lawful.”).

SECOND CIRCUIT

Frierson v. Reinisch, 806 F.App’x 54, __ (2d Cir. 2020) (“Defendants fault the District Court for denying them qualified immunity based on the presence of disputed facts concerning Defendants’ subjective motivations for banning Frierson. Citing the Supreme Court’s decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), Defendants assert that subjective motives are ‘simply irrelevant to th[e] qualified immunity defense.’ . . . Accordingly, Defendants contend, it made no difference to the merits of their immunity defense whether the ban was motivated by a (legitimate) desire to protect the players’ safety or an (unlawful) intent to punish Frierson for expressing negative views about Coach Bearup. In so arguing, Defendants misunderstand Crawford-El and its progeny. As we explained in Locurto v. Safir, ‘[i]n the usual case where intent is not an element [of the plaintiff’s constitutional claim], ... the qualified immunity doctrine focuses only on whether the government official’s actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, without regard for possible subjective malice.’. . . But where a specific illegal intent is an element of the plaintiff’s claim, factual disputes over whether the defendant acted with that intent will preclude the district court from granting qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . . To hold otherwise, we observed, ‘would effectively immunize all defendants in cases involving motive-based constitutional torts, so long as they could point to objective evidence showing that a reasonable official could have acted on legitimate grounds.’. . . Frierson’s First Amendment claim in this case is a motive-based constitutional tort. . . . That is, whether the ban violated his First Amendment rights turns on whether Defendants imposed the ban to punish Frierson for expressing dissatisfaction about Coach Bearup or for a viewpoint-neutral reason. . . . Accordingly, the District Court correctly concluded that Defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity at summary judgment in light of the unresolved factual disputes over Defendants’ motivation for banning Frierson from future sporting events.”)

Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509, 515, 516 (2d Cir. 2013) (“Assuming, as we must, that the factual allegations of the complaint are true, three prison officials wearing masks approached Hogan’s cell and proceeded to spray him with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and ‘some type [of] machine oil.’ The substance burned Hogan’s eyes and left Hogan with other physical injuries. We are unwilling to accept, as a matter of law, the proposition that spraying an inmate with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and machine oil constitutes a de minimis use of force. . . . Moreover, even if we were to assume arguendo that the physical force allegedly used was de minimis—though it was not—spraying an inmate with vinegar, excrement, and machine oil in the circumstances alleged here is undoubtedly ‘repugnant to the conscience of mankind’ and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment. . . . We therefore hold that the district court erred in concluding that the prison officials’ alleged use of force was de minimis and not of the sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind. . . . The conduct alleged in Hogan’s complaint is undoubtedly a form of cruel and unusual punishment proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.”)

DiStiso v. Cook, 691 F.3d 226, 240, 241, 245-50 (2d Cir. 2012) (“Since Gant, it has been clearly established law in this circuit that claims of intentional race discrimination can be based on the ‘deliberate indifference’ of school boards, administrators, and teachers to invidious ‘harassment, in the school environment, of a student by other children or parents.’ Gant ex rel. Gant v. Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 140 (holding that ‘only deliberate indifference to such [racial] harassment can be viewed as [intentional] discrimination by school officials themselves’). . . . Consistent with our obligation to consider a qualified immunity defense ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,” Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. at 201, we separately consider the claims that defendants Uccello and Cook were indifferent to racial name-calling directed at Nicholas in kindergarten and the claims that all defendants were indifferent to racially motivated physical misbehavior directed at Nicholas in both kindergarten and first grade.

We conclude that qualified immunity is not available to defendants Uccello and Cook in the first context on the evidentiary record set forth by the district court. We conclude, however, that qualified immunity is available as a matter of law in the second context. . . . In sum, there are disputed issues of fact as to each element of plaintiff's claims that Uccello and Cook were deliberately indifferent to kindergarten students' repeated use of racial epithets to belittle Nicholas. Because the district court found the record evidence sufficient to allow each of those elements to be decided in favor of plaintiff, and because we must accept that sufficiency determination on this appeal, Uccello and Cook are not entitled to judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . We reach a different conclusion with respect to plaintiff's claims that defendants were each deliberately indifferent to students' racially motivated physical misbehavior toward Nicholas. In so doing, we identify legal error in the district court's analysis, which appears not to have meaningfully distinguished the second element of a deliberate indifference claim as established by Gant, i.e., a defendant's actual knowledge of student-on-student racial harassment, see Gant ex rel. Gant v. Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 141 & n. 6, from the first element, i.e., students' racial harassment of a peer, see id. at 141. Rather, the district court largely elided consideration of the actual knowledge element by relying on an assumption as to the racial harassment element that is not clearly established in law: that evidence of student-on-student racial harassment in any respect can, without more, support an inference that any further student misbehavior directed to the same peer is also racially motivated. That assumption gave rise to another, also not clearly established in law: that evidence of a school official's knowledge of the initial racial harassment is enough, by itself, to permit a finding of his actual knowledge that any further misbehavior was also racially motivated. As we will explain herein, this mistakenly transformed the actual knowledge requirement established by Gant into an imputed knowledge requirement, and imputed knowledge is insufficient as a matter of law to support a claim for deliberate indifference. Where, as in this case, the subsequent misbehavior is of a type routinely engaged in by school children of the age at issue without regard to motivation, there must be some objective evidence linking initial racially hostile acts to such subsequent misbehavior to support a finding that a school official has actual knowledge that the latter behavior, like the former, is racially motivated. . . . To date, no Supreme Court or Second Circuit law clearly establishes that evidence of prior racial name-calling by unidentified kindergarten or first-grade students suffices to demonstrate that any subsequent physical misbehavior directed at the same classmate is also racially motivated. Indeed, we conclude that something more is necessary to support an inference that a teacher or school official actually knew such subsequent misconduct was racially motivated. . . . In sum, because the record evidence is insufficient, as a matter of law, to support a finding that Uccello actually knew that her kindergarten students' routine physical misbehavior toward Nicholas was racially motivated, Uccello is entitled to an award of summary judgment based on qualified immunity for this part of plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim. . . . For the same reasons already discussed with respect to Uccello and Couture, see supra Part II.D.2.a.(1), no clearly established law permits an inference that Cook had actual knowledge that the complained-of physical misbehavior toward Nicholas in kindergarten or first grade was racially motivated in the absence of some objective evidence connecting the latter misbehavior to the earlier racial name-calling. . . . Because plaintiff's claims of deliberate indifference to physical misbehavior fail at the actual knowledge step of Gant analysis, we need not consider defendants' arguments for qualified immunity based on the final, reasonable response, element of a deliberate indifference claim. . . Any such inquiry would of course require us to assume that plaintiff could prove both that the physical misbehavior was racially motivated and that defendants had actual knowledge of that fact.”)

Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 419, 420 (2d Cir. 2006) (“Because previous cases have recognized and defined the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern with reasonable clarity, Hynes would be entitled to qualified immunity only if it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that he could demote an assistant district attorney for making a hyperbolic statement regarding the crime rate without violating that right. . . . Because it would not have been objectively reasonable for Hynes to believe he could demote Reuland in retaliation for his hyperbolic statement to New York magazine, and he did not request that the jury decide if he was motivated by disruption rather than retaliation, Hynes is not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 421 (2d Cir. 2006)(Winter, J. dissenting) (“ I respectfully dissent. A prosecutor’s statement to a magazine about homicide rates within his jurisdiction is not protected by the First Amendment when it was admittedly false, admittedly made without any belief of a basis in fact, and made to promote sales of the prosecutor’s novel. . . . Labeling false speech ‘hyperbole’ does not render it protected. A government employee who purposefully or recklessly misinforms the public about a fact specifically related to his area of employment responsibility in order to profit monetarily should not be rewarded by a money judgment from a federal court when he is demoted. Established First Amendment doctrine provides no support for placing the mantle of victimhood upon such an employee.”).

Mandell v. County of Suffolk, 316 F.3d 368, 385 (2d Cir. 2003) (“Where specific intent of a defendant is an element of plaintiff’s claim under clearly established law, and plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence of that intent to defeat summary judgment, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is inappropriate. . . . In the present case retaliatory intent is an element of plaintiff’s claim, and we have already noted that plaintiff’s evidence of retaliatory animus is sufficient to make defendants’ motivation a triable issue of fact. Until that issue is resolved by a factfinder, therefore, the retaliation claim against defendant [police commissioner] cannot be dismissed on qualified immunity grounds.”).

Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 168, 169 (2d Cir. 2001) (“Defendants further urge upon us that subjective intent is per se irrelevant to the inquiry into objective reasonableness. But this argument betrays a fundamental misconception of the application of the qualified immunity doctrine to constitutional claims for which intent is an element. In the usual case where intent is not an element, bare allegations of malice coupled with otherwise legitimate government action do not yield a viable constitutional claim. In such a case, the qualified immunity doctrine focuses only on whether the government official’s actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, without regard for possible subjective malice. . . . But where a more specific intent is actually an element of the plaintiff's claim as defined by clearly established law, it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law.”).

Sheppard v. Beerman (Beerman II), 94 F.3d 823, 828 (2d Cir. 1996) (“Sheppard asserts that qualified immunity is not available where he has alleged that Beerman had an actual unconstitutional motive in firing him. To a limited extent, we agree. Contrary to the district court’s decision, the employer’s actual (subjective) motive is not irrelevant in a qualified immunity inquiry. Rather, where the subjective state of mind of the actor is part of the constitutional mix, we have developed a rule that balances the interests of the official claiming immunity against the interests of the employee asserting unconstitutional motive: Upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official’s conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts ... supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. [citing Blue] This standard allows an allegedly offending official sufficient protection against baseless and unsubstantiated claims, but stops short of insulating an official whose objectively reasonable acts are besmirched by a prohibited unconstitutional motive.”).

Blue v. Koren, 72 F.3d 1075, 1083-84 (2d Cir. 1995) (“The so-called heightened standard has been applied to address the problem of applying the test of “objective reasonableness” prescribed in Harlow [cite omitted] in circumstances where the constitutional claim asserted contains a subjective component. . . . By imposing that standard, courts have sought to reconcile the goal that led to the adoption of the objective test—permitting the dismissal of insubstantial claims involving objectively reasonable official conduct—with the goal of allowing plaintiffs to present claims that depend upon proof of unconstitutional motive. We believe that imposition of a similar standard is an appropriate way to accommodate these competing interests. . . . We agree that plaintiffs must offer specific evidence of improper motivation, but confess considerable doubt as to whether the “heightened” standard is really heightened or is simply an application of the rule that conclusory assertions are insufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. [cite omitted] When such a motion is based on assertion of qualified immunity, the first issue is whether a clearly established right is at stake. [cite omitted] If it is, the court must then address whether the conduct was objectively reasonable. If not, the motion must be denied. If the conduct was objectively reasonable, a conclusory proffer of an unconstitutional motive should not defeat the motion for summary judgment. The reasonableness of the conduct is itself substantial evidence in support of the motion and requires in response a particularized proffer of evidence of unconstitutional motive. . . . Accordingly, whether the description heightened is accurate or not, we hold: upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official’s conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts . . . supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. In our view, the particularized evidence of improper motive may include expressions by the officials involved regarding their state of mind, circumstances suggesting in a substantial fashion that the plaintiff has been singled out, or the highly unusual nature of the actions taken.”).

Martinez v. City of New York, No. 16-CV-79 (NRM) (CLP), 2023 WL 4627739, at *12 (E.D.N.Y. July 19, 2023) (“As a threshold matter, it is far from clear whether it is ever possible for an officer to be qualifiedly immune on a deliberate indifference claim once the jury has found that officer liable. Indeed, several federal appellate courts have concluded that, unlike in the context of many other constitutional violations, ‘[a] finding of deliberate indifference is inconsistent with a finding of good faith or qualified immunity’ because ‘those deliberately indifferent to the plaintiff’s right could not show that they had not violated established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . [collecting cases] And many district courts have also concluded that ‘deliberate indifference and qualified immunity are mutually exclusive.’ [citing cases] At least one federal appellate court, however, has suggested that there may exist some logical ground for a simultaneous finding of deliberate indifference and qualified immunity, albeit without reaching the issue after dismissing the plaintiff’s claim on other grounds. [citing Miller v. Solem, 728 F.2d 1020, 1025 (8th Cir. 1984)]. . . . This Court shares the view of the numerous courts cited above that have suggested or found that, as a logical matter, it may not be possible for two such findings—liability against a defendant on a deliberate-indifference claim, which is then vitiated by a defense of qualified immunity—to ever coexist in the same case. To do so would require a Court to find that even after a jury has determined, based on legally sufficient evidence, that an officer had the requisite knowledge and mental state to make him deliberately indifferent to a plaintiff’s serious medical need, that same officer still somehow harbored an objectively reasonable belief that he was not violating the detainee’s right to receive appropriate medical attention. Notably, in their motion for summary judgment and in in their oral Rule 50(a) motions, Defendants argued that they were entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s deliberate indifference claim, but in neither instance did they point the Court to any case, from any jurisdiction, in which, as here, the jury concluded as a factual matter that (1) the plaintiff was experiencing extreme pain, (2) an individual defendant actually knew that she was experiencing extreme pain, and (3) the individual defendant did not ‘reasonably believe’ otherwise—yet the court nonetheless concluded that the officers’ failure to provide the plaintiff with appropriate medical care was somehow objectively reasonable. But without clear guidance from the Second Circuit on this particular question, the Court proceeds with a standard qualified immunity analysis.”)

Ismael v. Charles, No. 1:18-CV-3597-GHW, 2020 WL 4003291, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. July 15, 2020) (“The inquiry into whether Sampson, Caruso, and Charles acted maliciously and sadistically is subjective. ‘[S]ubjective motive plays no part in the qualified immunity inquiry.’ . . . And when a ‘specific intent is actually an element of the plaintiff’s claim as defined by clearly established law, it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law.’ . . . So ‘a plaintiff need only show particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts supporting his claim of unconstitutional motive in order to survive a motion for summary judgment on the defense of qualified immunity.’ . . . Ismael has met that burden because he has shown facts adequate to raise a dispute about whether Sampson, Caruso, and Charles acted maliciously or sadistically. And there are disputed issues of fact about what took place during the Main Intake Incident. Ismael testified that the officers punched him and bent his hands at the wrist after he was restrained. Ismael also testified that the officers slammed him onto the gurney with excessive force. If true, that is circumstantial evidence that supports Ismael's claim that the officers acted maliciously and sadistically. That is enough to preclude the officers' qualified immunity defense. At bottom, this case reflects the principle that 'granting summary judgment against plaintiffs on excessive force claims is rarely appropriate.' . . . As in many—perhaps most—excessive force cases, questions of fact pervade the record on this motion. And those questions must be resolved by the jury.”)

Williams v. Koenigsmann, No. 03 Civ. 5267(SAS), 2004 WL 315279, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 2004) (“Suffice it to say that this is not a case where qualified immunity is an appropriate defense. The right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is a clearly established constitutional right and this Court cannot find, as a matter of law, that it was objectively reasonable for defendants to believe that withholding pain medication and treatment did not violate that right. Defendants either were deliberately indifferent to plaintiff's serious medical needs or they were not. Qualified immunity simply does not come into the picture.”).

Rodriguez v. Ghoslaw, No. 98 CIV. 4658(GEL), 2001 WL 755398, at *8, *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 5, 2001) (not reported) (“A conscientious and diligent public officer should not have to fear that his objectively reasonable decisions will subject him to burdensome litigation, and the risk of actual liability, based on the attribution of subjective bad motives inferred from the testimony of hostile parties. Accordingly, the proper inquiry is whether it was objectively reasonable, under the circumstances facing Ghoslaw, for a corrections officer to decide to refrain from immediate action to separate the fighting inmates. If it was, an officer who chose that course of action should be protected from suit by qualified immunity, even if the particular officer might be found by a jury, if the case were tried, to have acted from unconstitutional motives. . . . [C]ertainly, it would not have been ‘clear to a reasonable officer that [waiting for backup before attempting to separate struggling inmates] was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ [citing Saucier] The only factual issue for a jury to resolve in assessing whether the action violated the constitution would be not the reasonableness of Ghoslaw's actions, but whether the apparent reasonableness of Ghoslaw's conduct masked a nefarious motive for inaction. While the defendant's motive is crucial to finding a violation of the Eighth Amendment, it is irrelevant to the issue of qualified immunity. The availability of qualified immunity turns upon the objective reasonableness of Ghoslaw's decision to wait for backup, an issue which may be resolved as a matter of law on summary judgment.”)

Rivera v. Redfern, 98 F.4th 419, 422-25 (3d Cir. 2024) (“In this case, we define the alleged constitutional violation largely as Rivera does: prison officials may not ‘ignore[] ... repeated pleas to move [a prisoner] prior to exposing him to pepper spray despite ‘know[ing]’ that deploying pepper spray without moving him would cause him to suffer an asthma attack,’ where exposure could be substantially reduced without materially hindering institutional interests. . . . We agree with the District Court that Rivera fails to demonstrate that this specific right has been clearly established by: (1) binding precedent from the Supreme Court or the Third Circuit, see Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 361 (3d Cir. 2017); or (2) ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ in our sister circuits. . . . We thus agree with the District Court that the caselaw ‘is not such that “every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule [Rivera] seeks to apply.”’ . . . Rivera makes two arguments in an effort to overcome this dearth of on-point caselaw. First, Rivera cites our decision in Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel for its proposition that ‘a defendant cannot have qualified immunity if she was deliberately indifferent.’ . . . ‘Although a panel of this court is bound by, and lacks authority to overrule, a published decision of a prior panel, . . . a panel may reevaluate a precedent in light of intervening authority.’ . . . Our reasoning in Beers-Capitol that the constitutional merits and qualified immunity inquiries collapse into one requires such reevaluation in light of subsequent Supreme Court precedent. In Taylor v. Riojas, the Court evaluated whether a ‘reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that . . . it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in . . . deplorably unsanitary conditions’ after already determining that ‘at least some officers involved in Taylor’s ordeal were deliberately indifferent to the conditions of his cells.’ . . . This decision makes clear that courts must evaluate the constitutional merits of a claim separate and apart from the question of whether the state actors are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established. Second, Rivera suggests that the constitutional violation here was obvious. We disagree because the facts of this case are far afield from cases in which we or the Supreme Court have applied the obviousness exception. See, e.g., Taylor, 592 U.S. at 7–8, 141 S.Ct. 52 (confining an inmate in cells covered in feces); Hope, 536 U.S. at 733–35, 122 S.Ct. 2508 (handcuffing an inmate to a hitching post for several hours without regular water or bathroom breaks); Mack v. Yost, 63 F.4th 211, 233–34 (3d Cir. 2023) (intentionally suppressing religious worship); Dennis v. City of Philadelphia, 19 F.4th 279, 290 (3d Cir. 2021) (framing criminal defendants with fabricated evidence). . . . The prison officials in this case faced conflicting obligations. By choosing to forcibly extract Miller from his cell without first returning Rivera to his cell, they knowingly caused Rivera to suffer an asthma attack. But because that decision was not made in derogation of clearly established law, the officials are entitled to qualified immunity. We will affirm the District Court’s judgment to that effect.”) Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 404, 405 (3d Cir. 2006)(“Thus, if Perkins-Auguste acted with an intent to suppress Monteiro’s speech on the basis of viewpoint, she violated clearly established law and is not entitled to qualified immunity. In cases in which a constitutional violation depends on evidence of a specific intent, ‘it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law .’” Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 169 (2d Cir.2001). Accordingly, the District Court did not err in holding that whether Perkins-Auguste’s conduct violated clearly established law depended upon her motivation for ejecting Monteiro from the meeting. Furthermore, it was not error to submit this question to the jury because there was sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's viewpoint. Although qualified immunity is a question of law determined by the Court, when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury. . . . Motive is a question of fact that must be decided by the jury, which has the opportunity to hear the explanations of both parties in the courtroom and observe their demeanor. . . Monteiro adduced sufficient evidence at trial from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's speech based upon his opposition to the budget.").

Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 407-12 (3d Cir. 2006) (Fisher, J., dissenting) ("The majority characterizes the jury's finding of improper intent as the dispositive inquiry in assessing both the existence of a constitutional violation and entitlement to qualified immunity. This reflects, in my view, a fundamental misunderstanding of the relationship of motive to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent. . . . The second stage of the qualified immunity analysis is whether, given the existence of a constitutional violation, a reasonable person should have recognized it under 'clearly established' law. The hypothetical 'reasonable person' is an objective observer, who is aware of the facts known to the official but possesses an independent knowledge of governing legal precepts. . . . Subjective intent plays a limited role in this analysis. It is considered as an element of the underlying claim when the right at issue is predicated on the official's motive, but the presence of improper motive does not preclude qualified immunity. Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir.1996). An official who has committed a constitutional violation, even one evincing improper intent, will nevertheless be immune from liability if an objective observer in the same position, given the same facts and knowing of the official's improper motive, would not have recognized a constitutional violation under clearly established law. . . The opinion of the majority defines the right at issue in this case too broadly. It states that a public official in Perkins-Auguste's position 'must conform her conduct to the requirements of the First Amendment' and that 'viewpoint-based restrictions violate the First Amendment.' Maj. Op. at 16. These platitudes bear no relationship to the particular circumstances of this case and do little to define the standard governing Perkins-Auguste's conduct. . . The majority cites to no cases discussing whether and when a member of a legislative body may be removed from a public meeting. This failure is understandable, given the dearth of precedent on the issue. . . . I cannot conclude, on this backdrop, that a reasonable official in Perkins-Auguste's position should have realized that her conduct exceeded constitutional bounds. There is no doubt that Monteiro was being disruptive during the meeting and failed to comply with Perkins-Auguste's rulings. . . . His conduct was, in short, antithetical to the legitimate goals of the forum. A reasonable official in the same position as Perkins-Auguste could have concluded, under existing caselaw, that the decision to remove Monteiro was constitutionally justified, regardless of her actual underlying intent. . . She is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . This conclusion does not cast doubt on the jury's verdict, or its findings that Perkins-Auguste was motivated by a desire to retaliate against Monteiro and that a constitutional violation did occur. That an official is granted qualified immunity does not mean that he or she acted laudably or even constitutionally. To the contrary, an official may act in a morally and legally culpable fashion and yet be entitled to immunity if an objective observer, in the same position, would not have recognized a constitutional infringement . . . The mantle of qualified immunity will be denied to a public official only when a reasonable person in the same situation would have recognized a constitutional infringement. Perkins-Auguste's conduct, even if violative of Monteiro's civil rights, was not so patently unconstitutional under existing caselaw as to deny her immunity. The majority concludes to the contrary. It does so based on a fundamental misinterpretation of the relationship of subjective intent to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. This error will, I fear, have unfortunate ramifications for our jurisprudence in these fields. I respectfully dissent.”).

Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 (3d Cir. 2001) (“We have determined, however, that the plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Burley was deliberately indifferent. Because deliberate indifference under Farmer requires actual knowledge or awareness on the part of the defendant, a defendant cannot have qualified immunity if she was deliberately indifferent; a reasonable YDC worker could not believe that her actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk. Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to YDC residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.”).

Larsen v. Senate of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 154 F.3d 82, 94, 95 (3d Cir. 1998) (“The qualified immunity analysis requires a determination as to whether reasonable officials could believe that their conduct was not unlawful even if it was in fact unlawful. . . In the context of a First Amendment retaliation claim, that determination turns on an inquiry into whether officials reasonably could believe that their motivations were proper even when their motivations were in fact retaliatory. Even assuming that this could be demonstrated under a certain set of facts, it is an inquiry that cannot be conducted without factual determinations as to the officials’ subjective beliefs and motivations, and thus cannot properly be resolved on the face of the pleadings, but rather can be resolved only after the plaintiff has had an opportunity to adduce evidence in support of the allegations that the true motive for the conduct was retaliation rather than the legitimate reason proffered by the defendants. . . . In reaching this result we are not suggesting that a bare allegation of retaliatory motive necessarily is sufficient to defeat an assertion of qualified immunity as to a retaliation claim. In some circumstances, the legitimate basis for the actions might be so apparent that the plaintiff’s allegations of retaliatory motive could not alter the conclusion that under the circumstances alleged in the pleadings, the defendants would have been compelled to reach the same decision even without regard for the protected First Amendment activity.”).

Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir. 1996) (“The City Defendants claim that under Harlow their subjective ‘political or personal motives’ are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. The plaintiffs counter that the City Defendants’ formulation of the qualified immunity standard would effectively prevent any plaintiff whose constitutional claim has as an essential element the state of mind of the public officials from ever getting past qualified immunity. Although we have not directly addressed this issue, . . . several of our sister circuits have. Those courts have held, with virtual unanimity, that, despite the broad language of Harlow, courts are not barred from examining evidence of a defendant's state of mind in considering whether a plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, where such state of mind is an essential element of the constitutional violation itself. . . . We therefore join our sister circuits in adopting the narrower view of Harlow. Accordingly, in evaluating a defense of qualified immunity, an inquiry into the defendant's state of mind is proper where such state of mind is an essential element of the underlying civil rights claim.”).

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Wells v. Fuentes, 126 F.4th 882, 890 n.7, 891n.9 (4th Cir. 2025) (“Some of our cases rightly observe that despite this rule, defendant officers’ motivations really can matter at step one. In First Amendment retaliation cases, for example, or in Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference cases, it’s clearly established that whether an officer broke the law depends on his private, subjective motives—which means we can’t answer the step-one question without knowing something about those real motives. See Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 588–89, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998); Thompson v. Virginia, 878 F.3d 89, 106 (4th Cir. 2017). So although it’s true that we never consider officers’ true intentions at step two, we do still consider officials’ subjective motivations at step one if those motivations are elements of a plaintiff’s claim. But if we take step two first, we don’t need to know—and therefore don’t ask—whether the officers acted with malice. We assume that the plaintiff has made out his claim, including any element of subjective malice, and then ask whether it is clear beyond debate that the conduct pleaded broke the law. . . . As explained, qualified immunity does not foreclose inquiry into officers’ subjective motivations when those motivations form an element of the plaintiff’s claim. But Fourth Amendment claims do not invite this subjective analysis. . . . In a few limited contexts, like inventory searches, we may examine ‘programmatic’ purposes—that is, the reasons for the general policy for inventory searches. . . . But that is not the same as considering individual officers’ subjective motives. When it comes to individual officers, we consider only whether their conduct was objectively reasonable, not what went through their minds as they did it.”)

Younger v. Crowder, 79 F.4th 373, 385 & n.17 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Crowder’s final argument is that even if he was deliberately indifferent, he is still entitled to qualified immunity. We reject this argument, as it was clearly established in 2013 that a warden with Crowder’s knowledge, who did what Crowder did—i.e., nothing—is deliberately indifferent in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.¹⁷ [fn.17: We have effectively done away with the clearly established prong of qualified immunity for a subset of deliberate indifference cases. See Pfaller v. Amonette, 55 F.4th 436, 445–48 (4th Cir. 2022) (discussing Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926 (4th Cir. 2022)). In such cases, we look only to see whether there was a constitutional violation. . . . Because Crowder is not entitled to qualified immunity under the ‘normal’ two-prong approach, we need not decide whether his case falls within this subset.”) Pfaller v. Amonette, 55 F.4th 436, 445-48 (4th Cir. 2022) (“Eighth Amendment claims don’t require the same level of specificity that is needed in, for example, the Fourth Amendment context.

. . The extent of the analysis required for this second prong, however, varies considerably across cases. This Court recently held in Thorpe v. Clarke that “when “plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to” demonstrate an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment, “they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity.””. . That’s because, as Thorpe opined, ‘qualified immunity does not shield “those who knowingly violate the law.”’. . And because the Eighth Amendment’s deliberate-indifference standard requires knowing conduct, an official who was deliberately indifferent could not also believe ‘that [their] actions comported with clearly established law.’. . Thus, in Thorpe, we ‘effectively collapse[d]’ qualified immunity’s two inquiries into one, holding that dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds ‘remains improper so long as the officers’ mental state remains genuinely in issue.’. . We don’t believe, however, that Thorpe directs this Court to eliminate the clearly established law prong in every case where a dispute of fact related to the defendant’s mental state remains. . . Critically, the Supreme Court has not so limited itself. In Taylor v. Barkes, . . . the Supreme Court reversed the lower courts’ denial of qualified immunity. The lower courts had held there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was an Eighth Amendment violation. Yet the Court concluded that, even if that were so, qualified immunity nevertheless attached because the right at issue was not clearly established. . . Thus, we know from Taylor that not all disputes of material fact as to deliberate indifference will freeze our application of qualified immunity where warranted. Instead, Eighth Amendment cases exist on a spectrum of intent and harm. Thorpe most neatly applies to a prison doctor, who doesn’t need case law to tell him his patient deserves fair treatment. Or a prison guard, who doesn’t need case law to tell him he can’t abuse an inmate. Thorpe collapses qualified immunity’s two-pronged inquiry in these cases because each prong merely duplicates the other’s work; these Eighth Amendment violations inherently include knowing disregard for the law. . . But in other cases, there may be more attenuation between the risk of harm and the defendant’s knowledge that his conduct is constitutionally deficient. And in these cases, a defendant is less able to ‘use his own “state of mind” as “a reference point” to “assess conformity to the law,”’ as Thorpe envisions. . . This principle is illustrated by the very cases at hand—Thorpe on one end of the spectrum, Taylor on the other. In Thorpe, we found (and the defendants didn’t even challenge) that the plaintiffs adequately alleged that prison officials knew the harm that long-term solitary confinement caused, yet disregarded it. . . We emphasized the officials’ consciousness of a serious risk of harm: that the plaintiffs suffered a range of severe physical and mental harms, such as schizoaffective disorder, psychosis, bouts of disorientation, and severe weight loss; that for years, the defendants had daily contact with [the p]laintiffs; that the defendants had been pressured to abandon similar solitary-confinement systems several times before; and that numerous studies and judicial precedents had documented ‘the severe and often permanent damage caused by’ such systems. . . In short, the harm was ‘obvious,’ . . . and ‘the pre-existing law [was] not in controversy[.]’ . . Under those facts, which sufficiently alleged ‘an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment,’ we concluded that the plaintiffs “also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity.”. . We relied on the Supreme Court’s decision in Ortiz v. Jordan, where the Court likewise declined to grant qualified immunity to officers who were deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s safety. . . The facts in Ortiz, like those in Thorpe, demonstrated an obvious harm, where prison officials failed to distance the plaintiff from her assailant after they were ‘adequately informed’ of a sexual assault. . . Ortiz indicated that those facts plainly fell under the clearly established law that the Eighth Amendment protects prisoners from situations where an official knows they face a substantial risk of serious harm in the form of violence, but ‘disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.’ . In Taylor, by contrast, the Supreme Court examined whether a prison implemented adequate suicide prevention protocols and concluded that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established. Unlike the defendants in Thorpe and Ortiz, the Taylor defendants had not ‘personally interacted with [the prisoner] or knew of his condition before his death.’ . A constitutional violation could arise, then, only if the prison’s suicide-screening measures were inadequate. . . Yet as the Court opined, no case law actually identified what minimum procedures a prison had to use. . . Thus, the Court held that ‘even if the [prison’s] suicide screening and prevention measures contained the shortcomings that [the plaintiffs] allege[d], no precedent ... would have made clear to [the defendants] that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.’ . Put another way, even if the defendants’ suicide-prevention protocols were wanting, they weren’t clearly unconstitutional. The defendants’ states of mind in crafting those policies, then, could not be a guiding compass to ensuring those policies met constitutional muster, unlike in Thorpe. . . In such a case, the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified-immunity analysis continues to perform work independent of the ‘constitutional-violation’ prong—again, unlike in Thorpe. And so, in cases like Taylor, even where they may be a dispute of material fact as to the underlying constitutional violation, a court may still inquire into whether a right was clearly established to determine if the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. To review, in order to defeat a defendant’s claim for qualified immunity, a plaintiff must show: (1) a violation of a constitutional right, which in the case of alleged deliberate indifference to serious medical needs requires a showing that (A) the alleged deprivation was sufficiently serious (the objective prong) and (B) prison officials acted with deliberate indifference (the subjective prong), which in turn requires a showing that the prison official (i) had actual knowledge of the risk of harm and (ii) recognized that his actions were insufficient to mitigate that risk of harm; and (2) that the constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s actions. If a plaintiff fails to satisfy either prong of the qualified-immunity test, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. But in some cases, like Thorpe, the court need not separately determine whether the constitutional right was clearly established if there remains a genuine issue of material fact as to an official’s deliberate indifference, because that potential deliberate indifference would, if established, necessarily include an awareness of the illegality of the defendant’s actions.”)

Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926, 933-41 (4th Cir. 2022) (“Defendants rightly observe that we assess clearly established law at the time the wrong is committed, . . . and in that way, Porter could not strip them of immunity for acts committed before 2019. But they misapprehend the nature of the Eighth Amendment inquiry and with it, Porter’s import. Eighth Amendment liability comes into play only where a corrections officer appreciates the harm confinement conditions impose yet chooses to disregard it—but qualified immunity does ‘not allow the official who actually knows that he was violating the law to escape liability for his actions.’ . . Because Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded Defendants' deliberate indifference, the district court correctly denied qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage. And Porter only buttresses that holding as it helps illustrate that the harm to Plaintiffs was 'obvious'—to explain, that is, why Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged just such indifference. . . . Here, the Eighth Amendment prohibits only intentional conduct: a minimum of "deliberate indifference" to inmate health or safety' is required. . . . That means correction officers 'must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists' and actually 'draw the inference' before liability attaches. . . . It follows that when 'plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to demonstrate an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment, 'they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity.' Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). '[T]he two inquiries effectively collapse into one.' Delgado-Brunet v. Clark, 93 F.3d 339, 345 (7th Cir. 1996). Dismissal, in other words, remains improper so long as the officers' mental state remains genuinely in issue. That is why, in Ortiz v. Jordan, the Supreme Court declined to grant qualified immunity to officers accused of disregarding prisoner safety where the evidence at trial showed the officers were 'adequately informed' of the danger to Ortiz and could have 'distance[d] Ortiz from the assailant.' . . . The controversy here follows the Ortiz blueprint to a tee. Hard as Defendants try to portray their arguments as questioning clearly established law, 'the pre-existing law [is] not in controversy': It has long been established that 'prison official[s] may be held liable for deliberate indifference to a prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to protection against [inhumane conditions] while in custody if the official knows that the inmate faces a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.' . . . What Defendants actually demur is that they did not know, until this Court's decision in Porter, that the solitary-confinement conditions they promulgated posed 'a substantial risk of serious harm' in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . They may well end up on the winning side of that argument after the evidence comes in, but for now, these 'fact[ual]' issues compel us to move this case forward, . . . unless Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity appears on 'the face of the complaint[.]'. . . . Defendants advance no argument to defeat these long-accepted pleading practices. They ask instead that we shift frames and focus not on their mental state but on the first, objective prong of the Eighth Amendment analysis. They suggest we apply qualified immunity to just that prong, hold that it was not clearly established by 2012 that long-term isolation violated the Eighth Amendment, and dismiss the case before ever reaching the subjective prong. But such a dissociative approach misconceives the purpose of the objective prong and would crumble foundational qualified-immunity precepts Defendants' arguments were presumably inspired by how courts analyze qualified immunity in the Fourth Amendment context. . . . That a reasonable corrections officer might not have known, before Porter, that isolation tends to cause severe injuries, simply does not bear on whether these officers observed the injuries these Plaintiffs have pleaded and drew appropriate inferences as to what caused those injuries. We recognize the Ninth Circuit takes a different tack, applying qualified immunity separately to each Eighth Amendment prong. . . . But the court's analysis fails to persuade us. . . . An officer, the court believes, 'could know all of the facts yet mistakenly, but reasonably' 'draw the inference' that no substantial risk of serious harm exists. . . . That conclusion is at odds with itself. To be deliberately indifferent, an officer must not only know of the confinement conditions but also accurately assess the risk that those conditions deprive a prisoner of minimal civilized necessities. . . . Beyond these conceptual inconsistencies, the Ninth Circuit’s approach writes the subjective inquiry out of the Eighth Amendment and with it, all assessment of Defendants’ conduct. It thus unravels qualified immunity’s very justification, like a loose stitch unravels the entire garment. . . . So, we side instead with the Third, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits and decline to grant qualified immunity on just the first, objective prong where Plaintiffs satisfactorily plead Defendants’ deliberate indifference because Defendants ‘could not believe that [their] actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk.’. . . Reframing the argument yet again, Defendants additionally object we cannot define prisoners’ rights at too-high a level of generality. It is not enough, Defendants insist, to say the law clearly prohibited a knowing disregard of a serious injury: ‘To be clearly established,’ the law ‘must be sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates’ the Eighth Amendment. . . . And, according to Defendants, no reasonable officer would have understood that until Porter decided isolation alone can cause severe injury. This argument suffers from the same flaw as Defendants’ call to sever the two Eighth Amendment prongs: It overlooks the fact that Eighth Amendment liability hinges on whether an officer deliberately ignores the harms confinement conditions cause. As we have posited in the related context of excessive-force claims under the Eighth Amendment, ‘because an officer necessarily will be familiar with his own mental state, he “reasonably should know” that he is violating the law if he acts with a prohibited motive.’. . . [W]hile the Court has regularly insisted on highly particularized law in the Fourth Amendment context, it has not done the same with Eighth Amendment claims. . . . Insistence on finding precedent that held the same exact confinement conditions invalid also transforms the objective prong into something that it is not. The Eighth Amendment ‘does not prohibit cruel and unusual prison conditions.’. . . It asks instead whether the conditions of confinement inflict harm that is, objectively, sufficiently serious to deprive a prisoner of minimal civilized necessities. . . . Defendants cannot protect themselves based on the failure of other plaintiffs in other cases to demonstrate severe enough harm when in this case, Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded both that they suffered extreme injuries and that Defendants were aware of them. The district court was right to deny immunity and give Plaintiffs the opportunity to prove Defendants deliberately inflicted the harm. For qualified immunity cannot shield them if they did.”) Brooks v. Johnson, 924 F.3d 104, 115-20 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2019) (“In sum, whether or not the first use of the taser, standing alone, would give rise to any inference of malice, a reasonable jury viewing the three shocks together – three uses of an instrument designed to inflict excruciating pain in under 70 seconds – could infer ‘wantonness in the infliction of pain,’ intended not to restore order and induce compliance, but to punish Brooks for his belligerence. . . . Here, we hold only that it is for a jury to decide whether the degree of force used against Brooks was disproportionate to the need for his picture in a way that could raise an inference of impermissible ‘[p]unitive intent[.]’ . . . [B]ecause this case arises under Whitley’s subjective standard, we have no occasion to consider whether a hypothetical and objectively reasonable officer could have used a taser against Brooks – once, twice, or three times – in order to compel his compliance with the Detention Center’s photograph policy. . . The only question here is whether these officers actually did use force to induce compliance, or whether, as Brooks alleges, they used force ‘wantonly’ and ‘maliciously’ for the purpose of punishing him. Because the record contains evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer a malicious and therefore excessive use of force, the district court erred in deciding this question as a matter of law. . . . The officers contend that qualified immunity attaches because there are no cases from the Supreme Court or our circuit finding an Eighth Amendment violation under circumstances sufficiently analogous to those presented here and, as a result, Brooks’s right to be free from Sergeant Johnston’s multiple uses of a taser was not ‘clearly established.’. . We note at the outset that this is the unusual qualified immunity case in which we are dealing with a constitutional violation that has ‘wrongful intent’ as an element. . . If Johnston violated Brooks’s rights, that is, then she did so because she used force in subjective bad faith, maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.’. . That state of mind is relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, as we have explained: Because ‘the case law is intent-specific,’ clearly establishing that the bad faith and malicious use of force violates the Eighth Amendment rights of prison inmates, a corrections officer who acts with that culpable state of mind reasonably should know that she is violating the law Like other circuits, we long have recognized the ‘special problem’ raised when the objective qualified immunity standard is applied to an Eighth Amendment violation that requires wrongful intent in the form of ‘deliberate indifference’ to a prisoner’s medical needs. See Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1098 n.6 (4th Cir. 1997); see also Cox, 828 F.3d at 238 n.4 (collecting cases). Thompson [v. Virginia], 878 F.3d 89 (4th Cir. 2017)] makes clear that the same issue arises with respect to Eighth Amendment excessive force claims, which likewise require wrongful intent. . . . [T]he defendants in this case cannot establish a lack of ‘fair notice’ that the use of a taser against Brooks – assuming, as we do for purposes of this alternative argument, that a jury finds that Johnston acted with wrongful and malicious motive – constituted excessive force under the Whitley standard. At the time of the events in question, it was clearly established that a corrections officer’s use of force in bad faith – not to preserve order or induce compliance, but to punish through the ‘wanton infliction of pain’ – violates an inmate’s Eighth Amendment right. . . Johnston also would have had the benefit of cases from this circuit making clear, at a high ‘level of specificity,’. . . that her multiple uses of a taser against Brooks, under the circumstances of this case, could give rise to an inference of ‘wanton[] punish[ment],’. . . in violation of Whitley’s subjective component. . . . In short, we find that Johnston was on ‘fair notice’ of Brooks’s right not to be subjected to excessive force in the form of the wanton infliction of pain, intended to punish rather than to induce compliance. Accordingly, the defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds on this basis, as they argue in the alternative on appeal. We therefore vacate the district court’s grant of summary judgment for the defendants.”)

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 236 n.9 (4th Cir. 2016) (“Although we need not reach the issue here, we note once again the ‘special problem’ of ‘ “applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference”-that is, a knowing violation of the law.’. . Some Circuits have resolved this problem by concluding that qualified immunity is unavailable when the plaintiff presents a genuine dispute of material fact regarding the defendant’s deliberate indifference. The Seventh Circuit, for example, has held that the subjective prong of the Farmer test and the objective, clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test ‘effectively collapse into one’ when the plaintiff raises genuine factual disputes regarding the defendant’s deliberate indifference. Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002). That court explained that when a plaintiff raises genuine disputes of fact on Farmer’s subjective prong, ‘a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity’ even though qualified immunity protects covered government officials from suit, not merely from liability. . . see also, e.g., Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001) (“[T]o the extent that the plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to overcome summary judgment on the merits [of their deliberate indifference claim], they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity.”). But see Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting the view that the deliberate indifference and clearly established inquiries merge).”)

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 238 n.4 (4th Cir. 2016) (“Although we need not reach the issue here, we note that some courts have concluded that it is not necessary to consider the objective reasonableness prong of the qualified immunity inquiry at all when summary judgment is denied on deliberate indifference. See, e.g., Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002); Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference if they are aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837, yet disregard that risk by taking action that they know to be inappropriate, Parrish, 372 F.3d at 303. In other words, for purposes of deliberate indifference, the Eighth Amendment violation must have been committed knowingly. As we have noted in the past, ‘applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference’ — that is, a knowing violation of the law — presents a ‘special problem.’ Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1098 n.6 (4th Cir. 1997). Accordingly, some of our sister circuits have concluded that deliberately indifferent conduct can never be objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity. See Walker, 293 F.3d at 1037 (holding that deliberate indifference and qualified immunity inquiries ‘effectively collapse into one’ and that ‘[i]f there are genuine issues of fact concerning’ a defendant’s deliberate indifference, the ‘defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity’); Beers-Capitol, 256 F.3d at 142 n.15 (‘Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to [juvenile detention center] residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.’). But see Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting approach that ‘collapses the deliberate indifference part of the constitutional inquiry into the qualified immunity inquiry’).”)

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 581 (4th Cir. 2003) (“[W]e are dealing with an alleged equal protection violation predicated on the circumstance that Hansen caused only black officers to be initially interviewed with respect to possible discrimination. In applying Anderson we recognize that cases need not be identical for a public officer to be charged that on the basis of precedent he should have recognized that his conduct violated a right that was clearly established. . . But still it would be a remarkable extension of equal protection principles to hold that the very act of questioning the members of a racial group as to whether they perceived discrimination against the members of that group was in itself unlawful. We are not aware of any case from the Supreme Court or this court that comes close to making such a holding and, in fact, the plaintiffs and the amici curiae do not supply us with any from other jurisdictions. In the circumstances, we cannot reasonably hold that Hansen objectively should have known that his conduct was unlawful when he directed Moyd and Shambley to question only black officers about discrimination against blacks. A reasonable person in Hansen's position was entitled to obtain his legal guidance from law books rather than a crystal ball. Thus, the equal protection right that plaintiffs advance was not clearly established when Hansen directed that the black officers be interviewed and he is entitled to summary judgment on this ground . . .").

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 587 (4th Cir. 2003) (King, J., dissenting) ("When Hansen instituted this investigation almost a quarter of a century after the Supreme Court rendered its decision in Arlington Heights, it was eminently well established that a facially neutral administrative action that is undertaken with an intent to discriminate against a particular racial group is forbidden by the Constitution. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying Hansen qualified immunity from the plaintiffs' equal protection claims. . . . [A] reasonable person in Hansen's position could make no mistake that to adopt with discriminatory animus a facially neutral policy that subjected all and only the African- Americans in his Department to investigation, would be to violate the equal protection rights of the targeted officers.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 315 (4th Cir. 1992) ("Illegal motive on the officer's part need not also be shown...to defeat a qualified immunity defense to a Fourth Amendment claim which itself has no motive element.").

Blankenship v. Warren County, Va., 918 F. Supp. 970, 975-76 (W.D. Va. 1996) ("The instant civil action alleges that the Sheriff impermissibly terminated the plaintiff based upon gender-based animus, and consideration of the Sheriff's subjective motivation is an integral component to the plaintiff's claim. The Sheriff is not entitled to a dismissal based upon the defense of qualified immunity at this stage in the proceeding. . . . The court believes that where the substantive claim requires inquiry into the subjective motivation of the public official, then a defense on the ground of qualified immunity is best decided on a motion for summary judgment after full discovery has been completed.").

Harris v. Wood, No. CIV A 92-0108, 1994 WL 162556, *5 (W.D. Va. April 22, 1994) (not reported) ("In Collinson, Judge Phillips acknowledged the difficulty encountered by other courts in applying the objective component of the test for qualified immunity because a First Amendment claim turns on both the defendant's subjective intent and on the objective reasonableness of his beliefs. Id. at 1001. The court agrees with Plaintiffs that a genuine issue of material fact surrounds [defendant's] motive in discharging Plaintiffs and that the parties disagree as to the reasons behind the decision. Plaintiffs have provided specific evidence of Defendant's improper motive, and Defendant has failed to convince this court that he would have made the decision regardless of Plaintiffs’ speech. Consequently, resolution of this issue shall be in the hands of the reasonable fact-finder. . . .”).

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Oliver v. Arnold, 19 F.4th 843, 854-58 (5th Cir. 2021) (Elrod, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Duncan, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of en banc rehearing) (“Can a teacher in the Fifth Circuit be held liable for money damages for giving an in-class writing assignment? Until now, no. The district court, the panel majority, and the concurring opinion do not identify a single case where this has happened before—not in the Fifth Circuit, not anywhere else. Yet somehow each finds a way to deny Arnold qualified immunity. Federal judges should not be in the business of policing the lesson plans of public-school teachers. But even when we must, qualified immunity should protect a teacher who (until now) could not have known that his conduct violated a student’s constitutional rights. Thus, I respectfully dissent. . . . Importantly and problematically, the panel majority rested its conclusion on the district court’s finding a factual dispute about Arnold’s ‘impure motive’ in giving this assignment. . . . But for qualified-immunity purposes, ‘a particular defendant’s subjective state of mind has no bearing on whether that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.’ Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 457 (5th Cir. 2001). Granted, under some circumstances we do consider subjective intent, like with race discrimination or First Amendment retaliation claims. Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc). But as those examples indicate, we do so when an official’s subjective state of mind is an element of the claim—for race discrimination, motive is key; for First Amendment retaliation, adverse action must be because of the plaintiff’s protected speech. But in determining whether speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, motive is irrelevant. To establish that her speech was compelled in violation of the First Amendment, Oliver does not have to show that Arnold intended to make her pledge loyalty to America. . . . The focus of our inquiry is not the teacher’s motive, but the student’s compelled act. . . . Otherwise, the vindication of a student’s constitutional rights hinges on a teacher’s earnestness rather than the objective reasonableness of the teacher’s actions. True, this approach provides Oliver a short-term win: She may proceed to trial on her claims. But in the long-run, students lose. Because a student must now prove her educator’s ‘impure motive,’ a student is much less likely to prevail at the end of the day. . . . Our sister circuits have wisely steered clear of this improper-motive path. In the Fourth Circuit, a teacher can require a student to write out the Five Pillars of Islam so long as the student is not required to ‘profess or accept the tenets of Islam.’ Wood v. Arnold, 915 F.3d 308, 319 (4th Cir. 2019). In the Third Circuit, a teacher may force a student to ‘speak or write on a particular topic even though the student may prefer a different topic,’ provided that the teacher does not ‘demand that a student profess beliefs or views with which the student does not agree.’ C.N. v. Ridgewood Bd. of Ed., 430 F.3d 159, 187 (3d Cir. 2005). And in the Ninth Circuit, a teacher can make a student ‘write a paper from a particular viewpoint, even if it is a view-point with which the student disagrees, so long as the requirement serves a legitimate pedagogical purpose.’ Brown v. Li, 308 F.3d 939, 953 (9th Cir. 2002). . . . In the meantime, teachers in the Fifth Circuit are left in the lurch. How are they to know whether their lesson plans conflict with ‘fixed star[s]’ in our ‘constitutional constellation’? Read at the interstellar level of generality, qualified immunity provides no safe harbor. I respectfully dissent from the denial of en banc rehearing.”)

Oliver v. Arnold, 19 F.4th 843, 858-59, 863 (5th Cir. 2021) (Duncan, J., joined by Jones (except part III), Smith, Elrod, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from denial of en banc rehearing) (“In our circuit, public school teachers can make students pledge allegiance to Mexico but can’t make students write down our own pledge. The first assignment is a ‘cultural and educational exercise,’ Brinsdon v. McAllen Indep. Sch. Dist., 863 F.3d 338, 349 (5th Cir. 2017), but the second is a compelled patriotic statement forbidden by the First Amendment. Oliver v. Arnold, 3 F.4th 152, 159–60 (5th Cir. 2021). A teacher who gives the first assignment merits qualified immunity, but a teacher who gives the second will have to convince a jury he had a ‘pedagogical purpose.’ . . . I assume the reverse is also true. So, a teacher can make students pledge allegiance to the American Flag as a ‘cultural and educational exercise’ but can’t make students write down the Mexican pledge if he wants to promote el Patriotismo. Our law in this area is, in other words, a dumpster fire. We should have taken this case en banc to put it out. Then we could have addressed in a more coherent way how the First Amendment applies to student speech and public school curricula, an important and developing field. . . . For reasons that baffle me, a majority of my colleagues declines the opportunity. . . . Here, the panel accepts an unprecedented application of Barnette that warps the compelled speech doctrine, splits with another circuit, and sets up federal judges and juries as arbiters of whether teachers should pay damages for giving ‘non-pedagogical’ assignments. A majority of the court unwisely declines to stop this misbegotten experiment in its tracks. I respectfully dissent from denial of en banc rehearing.”)

Heaney v. Roberts, 846 F.3d 795, 802 n.3 (5th Cir. 2017) (“Roberts argues that the district court was wrong to assume, as a factual matter, that Roberts acted with improper motive because the ‘test for the application of qualified immunity does not involve a look into the subjective intent of the official, but instead looks at what a reasonable official would know or think.’ The Supreme Court addressed the issue of unconstitutional motive in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). The Court explained that ‘although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff’s affirmative case.’ Id. at 589. While Roberts is correct that qualified immunity presents a question of law to be determined by the court, ‘when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury.’ Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 405 (3d Cir. 2006). Indeed, Crawford-El recognized that there is a ‘wide array of different federal law claims for which an official’s motive is a necessary element’ and that there should be no heightened burden on plaintiffs at the summary judgment phase to prove improper motive.”)

Lauderdale v. Texas Dept. Of Criminal Justice, Institutional Div., 2007 WL 4465204, at *6 (5th Cir. Dec. 21, 2007) (“Given that actionable sexual harassment under title VII must be ‘objectively ... offensive,’ . . . such behavior cannot be ‘objectively reasonable’ for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry. Thus, qualified immunity can never offer protection for sexual harassment because, if it is actionable at all, the harassment is by definition objectively offensive and unreasonable, and qualified immunity protects only the ‘objectively reasonable,’ County of Comal, 400 F.3d at 289 (citing Hare, 135 F.3d at 325). Because we have already determined that Arthur’s alleged behavior is actionable under title VII and § 1983, we have necessarily determined that such behavior was objectively offensive and, therefore, not objectively reasonable. Thus, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 372, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (“We close our discussion of qualified immunity by noting that, contrary to the position asserted by the Police Officials, the district court’s review of the reasons for the Police Officials’ boycott does not mean that the lower court, or this court, has engaged in a ‘subjective’ analysis of the type condemned in Harlow. The Police Official’s position, apparently, is that they are entitled to qualified immunity as long as there exists some conceivable set of reasons that would have made their actions appropriate. Such factual scenarios doubtless exist. It would have been permissible for the Police Officials to pull their students out of Kinney’s and Hall’s classes if (for instance) the Police Officials learned that the instructors were unskilled. Therefore, the Police Officials suggest, we necessarily engage in a forbidden ‘subjective’ inquiry if we take cognizance of a genuine dispute over the reasons for their actions against the instructors. What the defendants’ approach would mean, of course, is that there can never be liability for any violation for which the elements include the official’s intent or reasons for action. Most § 1983 claims do not include such an element, but First Amendment retaliation claims do: The First Amendment protects employees only from ‘termination because of their speech on matters of public concern,’ . . . not from termination simpliciter. Similarly, the Constitution forbids officials from discriminating on the basis of race only when their discrimination is intentional. . . In such cases, reading Harlow as forbidding all discussion of intent would allow the qualified immunity defense to preclude recovery even when the law was clearly established, for plaintiffs would be barred from proving an essential legal element of their case.”).

Cantu v. Jones, 293 F.3d 839, 845 (5th Cir. 2002) (To extent that jury determined that prison officials had deliberately allowed another prisoner to escape and to perpetrate assault upon plaintiff in retaliation for his act of filing complaints about certain guards, officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil rights liability.)

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 459, 460 (5th Cir. 2001) (“At the outset, we highlight the importance of appreciating the difference between the objective reasonableness standard for qualified immunity set forth in Part II, supra, and the subjective deliberate indifference standard for section 1983 liability set forth in Part IV, supra. These standards are often confused. See Hare III, 135 F.3d at 327- 28. Examples of behavior that does (and does not) constitute deliberate indifference are relevant in assessing the scope of clearly established law and, therefore, are relevant in determining whether the defendants’ actions were objectively reasonable. Id. However, when the defendant moves for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, it is the plaintiff’s burden to demonstrate that all reasonable officials similarly situated would have then known that the alleged acts of the defendants violated the United States Constitution. . . . That is different from the burden of establishing a genuine issue as to the defendant's deliberately indifferent subjective state of mind. When assessing the scope of clearly established law for step two, it is necessary to articulate the asserted constitutional right more specifically.”).

Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff's Dep't, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir. 2000) (“In Hare III, we explained the somewhat confusing relationship between the deliberate indifference and objective reasonableness standards . . . [W]e are to determine whether, in light of the facts as viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the conduct of the individual defendants was objectively unreasonable when applied against the deliberate indifference standard.”).

Mendenhall v. Riser, 213 F.3d 226, 231 (5th Cir. 2000) (“[W]e are compelled by our case law that clearly dictates subjective intent, motive, or even outright animus are irrelevant in a determination of qualified immunity based on arguable probable cause to arrest, just as an officer's good intent is irrelevant when he contravenes settled law.”).

Tompkins v. Vickers, 26 F.3d 603, 607 (5th Cir. 1994) (“Every Circuit that has considered the question has concluded that a public official's motive or intent must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis where unlawful motivation or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation.” citing cases).

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Finley v. Huss, 102 F.4th 789, 809-10 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Finley recommends a different route. He argues that we should effectively skip the ‘clearly established’ inquiry altogether because he has already shown that Huss and Schroeder subjectively knew about and disregarded risks to his psychiatric health. In other words, he invites us to collapse qualified immunity's two prongs into one whenever the plaintiff can prove—as he must in any successful deliberate-indifference case—that the defendant deliberately disregarded a known danger. After all, ‘qualified immunity does not protect “those who knowingly violate the law.”’ . . . Finley's approach isn't without support. Several of our sister circuits have endorsed it. See, e.g., Delgado-Brunet v. Clark, 93 F.3d 339, 346 (7th Cir. 1996); Thorpe v. Clarke, 37 F.4th 926, 934 (4th Cir. 2022); Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). Even this Court has agreed with it, albeit in an unpublished opinion. McKee v. Turner, 124 F.3d 198 (6th Cir. 1997) (unpublished table decision) (“A finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity.” (citation omitted)). Indeed, we are aware of very few Sixth Circuit cases where we have held that a plaintiff satisfied the deliberate-indifference standard but granted qualified immunity on ‘clearly established’ grounds. However, Finley's argument goes too far. It does not automatically follow that someone who knowingly disregards a serious risk also knowingly disregards the Constitution. Some risks, after all, are not objectively serious enough to implicate constitutional protections. And overarching legal standards—like Farmer v. Brennan's rule against exposing inmates to ‘a substantial risk of serious harm’—don't provide much clarification. . . . An official could thus knowingly expose an inmate to a serious risk without realizing that the risk triggered the Eighth Amendment. . . Such an official is grossly irresponsible but not necessarily a knowing lawbreaker. Thus, the ‘clearly established’ analysis retains some teeth in deliberate-indifference cases. . . Indeed, we have used it to grant qualified immunity in cases where reasonable officials might not realize the significance of the risks at stake. . . That said, deliberate indifference’s subjective-culpability requirement arguably plays a role in choosing the appropriate level of generality for a given right. It justifies somewhat less granular principles than, say, Fourth Amendment cases involving split-second decisions where officials genuinely—but perhaps mistakenly—believe their actions to be appropriate. Relatively broad yet deep-rooted rights, such as the right to psychiatric care, are enough to place already culpable officials on notice that their actions were not only wrong but also unlawful. . . In other words, the ‘clearly established’ analysis protects deliberately indifferent officials from liability for violating general legal standards unexpectedly transposed to new contexts.”)

Bishop v. Hackel, 636 F.3d 757, 772 (6th Cir. 2011) (“A government official performing a discretionary function is entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment unless the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, would permit a reasonable juror to find that: (1) the defendant violated a constitutional right; and (2) the right was clearly established. . . An inmate’s right to be free from violence at the hands of other prisoners was clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation. . . Thus, the main issue in this case is whether any of the Deputies violated Bishop’s constitutional rights. To raise a cognizable constitutional claim for deliberate indifference to an inmate’s safety, an inmate must make a two-part showing: (1) the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious; and (2) the defendant subjectively ignored the risk to the inmate’s safety. . . Bishop was young, small, and mentally ill; and he was incarcerated with Floyd, who was jailed for violent felonies including sexual assault. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Bishop, he raises an issue of fact as to whether the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious. Because Bishop raises an issue of fact as to whether Stanley subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to him is AFFIRMED. However, because Bishop fails to raise an issue of fact as to whether Harrell, Anderman, or Cantea subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to them is REVERSED.”)

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 831 n.16 (6th Cir. 2007) (“As a general rule, a claimant cannot defeat qualified immunity merely by leveling ‘bare allegations of malice’ against government officials. . . However, ‘an essential element of some constitutional claims is a charge that the defendant’s conduct was improperly motivated.’ Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 588 (1998). Where improper motivation constitutes an element of the claim—as in the case of Plaintiffs’ First Amendment retaliation claims—and the claimant has shown all other elements, a question of fact remains as to the official’s intent, thereby precluding summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. Post Crawford-El, it remains an open question whether inquiry into motive ‘unrelated to the knowledge of the law’ in the Fourth Amendment context can similarly be taken to preclude summary judgment. Because we need not explore Defendants' motivations in detaining Plaintiffs to find that Defendants do not merit the protection of qualified immunity, we leave that question for another day.”).

McKee v. Turner, No. 96-3446, 1997 WL 525680, *4 (6th Cir. Aug. 25, 1997) (unpublished) (concluding “that Farmer’s deliberate indifference analysis precludes the application of qualified immunity to this case.”).

Wright v. Jefferson County Police Department, 14 F.3d 603 (Table), 1993 WL 503748, *3 (6th Cir. 1993) (“The subjective views of the officers are irrelevant for purposes of determining qualified immunity to a section 1983 action based on an unreasonable search and seizure. However, when intent is an element of the substantive claim, the court must examine the officer’s intent under a qualified immunity analysis to determine if he has violated ‘clearly established’ law. . . . Plaintiff’s allegation that the officers impounded his van in violation of his equal protection rights requires an analysis of the officers’ intent when they impounded the van because intent is an element of an equal protection violation.”).

Taylor v. Hughes, 26 F.4th 419, 430 (7th Cir. 2022) (“Th[e] parallelism between suppression in the criminal context and liability in the civil context makes sound sense here. An officer who procures a warrant in violation of Franks cannot conduct a search in good faith reliance on the validity of that warrant: inherent in a Franks violation is a finding that the officer knows—or at least reasonably should know—that the warrant is not valid. Here, Officer Hughes violated Franks by guessing at Taylor’s address. As such, he reasonably should have known that the warrant was invalid for failure to ‘particularly describ[e] the place to be searched.’. . . Under these circumstances, it is no stretch to say that ‘the affidavit [was] so plainly deficient’ that Officer Hughes ‘should not have applied for the warrant.’. . . He is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity for the search on the basis of his good-faith reliance on the warrant.”) Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 526 (7th Cir. 2004) (amending and superseding prior opinion) (“The first two matters (the objective and subjective components of the eighth amendment) are for the jury in the first instance, with appellate review limited to the question whether any reasonable juror could have found that the requisite level of risk existed, and that Rausch knew it. Immunity, however, is a matter of law for the court, to be decided without deference to the jury’s resolution—and preferably before the case goes to the jury. . . .The district court brushed aside Rausch’s invocation of immunity, writing that a guard cannot benefit from immunity if the action taken was not a reasonable response to a risk actually foreseen. That approach, which merges immunity and the merits, is incompatible with Saucier and its predecessors. . . . Immunity protects officials who act at the ‘hazy border’ . . . between the lawful and the forbidden. That Rausch may have overstepped the line does not mean that every reasonable officer would have been bound to know that Rausch acted improperly. We need not pursue the immunity defense, however, because Saucier calls on appellate courts to address the merits first .

. . and Rausch is entitled to prevail outright: no reasonable juror could have concluded, on this record, that Rausch actually recognized that placing Garcia and Riccardo together exposed Riccardo to substantial risk..”).

Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002) (“[A] plaintiff claiming an Eighth Amendment violation must show the defendant’s actual knowledge of the threat to the plaintiff’s health or safety, the defendant’s failure to take reasonable measures, and the defendant’s subjective intent to harm or deliberate indifference. . . If there are genuine issues of fact concerning those elements, a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity.”)

Hill v. Shelandier, 992 F.2d 714, 717 (7th Cir. 1993) (“[D]espite Harlow’s focus on a purely objective inquiry, the plaintiff must be afforded an adequate opportunity to establish intent when it is an element of the alleged constitutional violation. . . . Because [plaintiff] has thus asserted a constitutional claim requiring proof of intent, he must adduce specific factual support for his allegation of bad intent to survive a motion for summary judgment.”).

Fiorenzo v. Nolan, 965 F.2d 348, 351-52 (7th Cir. 1992) (“In Wade v. Hegner. . . we held that Harlow requires the district court to conduct a two-part analysis when state of mind is at issue: ‘(1) Does the alleged conduct set out a constitutional violation? and (2) Were the constitutional standards clearly established at the time in question? ‘ Id. at 70. Intent is relevant to the first inquiry.”).

Auriemma v. Rice, 910 F.2d 1449, 1453 (7th Cir. 1990) (en banc) (“[W]hen intent is crucial to a party’s claim...the court’s consideration of intent is relevant to the determination of whether a constitutional violation exists but not in deciding if the constitutional standard was clearly established.”).

Olech v. Village of Willobrook, No. 97 C 4935, 2002 WL 31317415, at *23, *24 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 10, 2002) (not reported) (“[T]he law establishing class of one equal protection claims was clearly established in 1995. At the time of the alleged actions, both the United States Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit had held that a municipality could violate an individual’s equal protection rights by intentional and different treatment of others who are similarly situated. . . . The only question is whether the clearly established right in this Circuit required actions motivated by ill will before a constitutional violation could be established. Although the Supreme Court cases established a ‘basic intent’ standard, Esmail interpreted those cases to require ‘ill will.’ However, as explained above, there are disputed fact questions that require a trial on the issue of ill will. Thus, even if the law in 1995, read most favorably to defendants, required ill will as part of a class of one equal protection claim, there is evidence for which a jury could find ill will. Qualified immunity could not be granted at this time because to do so would require the Court to resolve fact questions that are for the jury. . . . The only remaining question . . . is whether Saucier applies to this case, as defendants claim (i.e., defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity if their decisions were based on ‘reasonable mistakes’). We find that the ‘reasonable mistake’ exception carved out in Saucier cannot be used to establish qualified immunity at this time. If a jury finds intentional ‘ill will’ based on the disputed issues outlined above, then there can be no ‘reasonable mistake’ defense to support a qualified immunity defense. Thus, since we have found that there are genuine issues of material fact on the ill will issue, we must find that the defendants’ reasonable mistake argument cannot support a qualified immunity defense at this time.”).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Jackson v. Gutzmer, 866 F.3d 969, 976-78 (8th Cir. 2017) (“Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense governed by an objective standard in which ‘the defendant’s subjective intent is simply irrelevant.’ . . . ‘The immunity standard in Harlow itself eliminates all motive-based claims in which the official’s conduct did not violate clearly established law.’ . . . Thus, just as an arresting officer with probable cause to arrest for a particular violation is entitled to qualified immunity even if that was not his motive at the time of arrest, . . . Gutzmer is entitled to qualified immunity if the totality of the circumstances justified use of the restraint board even if Gutzmer erred in believing Jackson was self-injurious when placed on the board. In addition, the district court erred in construing Walker as equating ‘punishment’ of an inmate with an excessive use of force. ‘The punishment of incarcerated prisoners ... effectuates prison management and prisoner rehabilitative goals.... Discipline by prison officials in response to a wide range of misconduct falls within the expected perimeters of the sentence imposed by a court of law.’ . . . A typical punishment for inmate misconduct is punitive segregation, as in Sandin. But here, because of Jackson’s prior misconduct, he was already in the most segregated living unit in the Minnesota prison system. If Jackson’s additional misconduct on May 13, 2014 warranted additional discipline, no Eighth Circuit case, and certainly no Supreme Court case, has ever held that such ‘punishment’ violates the Eighth Amendment. Turning to the merits of the alleged Eighth Amendment violation, the issue of intent that is an element of Jackson’s claim is whether undisputed facts establish that force was applied ‘in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline,’ or whether Lt. Gutzmer applied force ‘maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.’ . . . We have jurisdiction to review whether, viewing the facts in the summary judgment record most favorably to Jackson, he ‘identif[ied] affirmative evidence from which a jury could find that [he] carried his ... burden of proving’ that Gutzmer’s actions reflected a malicious and sadistic motive. . . . This issue turns on consideration of far more than whether use of the restraint board was unreasonable because Jackson was not self-injurious. . . . As in Burns, we conclude that Jackson presented no evidence whatsoever that Gutzmer’s actions ‘evinced such wantonness with respect to the unjustified infliction of harm as is tantamount to a knowing willingness that it occur.’ . . . Jackson argues that, when he was placed on the restraint board, there was no longer a risk of self-injurious behavior, so the evidence demonstrates that Gutzmer placed Jackson on the restraint board ‘as punishment for seeking medical attention,’ thereby violating the Eighth Amendment. But punishing an inmate ‘to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security’ does not violate the Eighth Amendment . . . unless the punishment or force used is ‘repugnant to the conscience of mankind,’ . . . like the ‘degrading and dangerous’ hitching post restraint at issue in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 745, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). Nor is there evidence of prior contacts or relations between Jackson and Gutzmer that would be specific evidence of a malicious motive to harm. . . For these reasons, we conclude that we have jurisdiction over this appeal and the denial of qualified immunity to Lt. Gutzmer must be reversed because the record fails to establish the alleged Eighth Amendment excessive force violation.”)

Cullor v. Baldwin, 830 F.3d 830, 837-39 (8th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e have yet to address a deliberate-indifference claim, as in the present case, in which an inmate alleges that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his objective medical need for dental care by failing to address a shortage of dentists in the prison, thereby subjecting the inmate to needless pain. Other courts, however, have addressed similar claims and granted qualified immunity to prison officials. [surveying cases] For purposes of this appeal, we will assume that Cullor suffered from an objectively serious medical need. . . But Cullor has failed to establish that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol deliberately disregarded his need for dentures. . . . Contrary to Cullor’s argument, this is not a case in which the defendants are attempting to use costs as a reason for denying constitutionally required medical care. . . . Nor does Cullor dispute that Dr. Deol always offered the maximum salary permitted and sought an increased salary for new dentists with special skills. In that way, Dr. Deol and Director Baldwin ‘neither created the ... shortage of dentists nor the general issues with recruitment and retention.’ . . As a result, we hold that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol are entitled to qualified immunity on Cullor’s deliberate-indifference claim.”)

Borgman v. Kedley, 646 F.3d 518, 523, 524 (8th Cir. 2011) (“Arguable probable cause exists even where an officer mistakenly arrests a suspect believing it is based in probable cause if the mistake is ‘objectively reasonable.’ . . . Kedley’s subjective motivations in arresting Borgman are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . For that reason, even if Kedley had been subjectively motivated to arrest her for refusing to sign the readvisement form, it would not affect the arguable probable cause analysis.”)

Gardner v. Board of Police Com’rs, for Kansas City, Mo., 641 F.3d 947, 953 (8th Cir. 2011) (“Given th[e] legal landscape, we think it was not clearly established as of September 2007 that an officer in Missouri could effect a seizure under the Fourth Amendment without subjectively intending to do so. Ritchie was therefore not on clear notice that he must conform his conduct—including conduct that was a foreseeable consequence of his medical condition—to a rule that might result in liability under the Fourth Amendment for actions that he did not subjectively intend. He is entitled to qualified immunity if the state of the law did not allow him reasonably to anticipate that his conduct may give rise to liability for damages. . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred in denying Ritchie’s motion for summary judgment on Gardner’s Fourth Amendment claim without considering Ritchie’s subjective intent. The district court should determine whether the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Gardner, would support a finding by a reasonable jury that Ritchie subjectively intended to effect a seizure of Gardner by firing his weapon. If not, then Ritchie is entitled to qualified immunity. The portion of the district court’s order denying Ritchie’s motion for summary judgment on the § 1983 claim is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.”).

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 401 (8th Cir. 2011) (“Wright complains that the district court erred in emphasizing her subjective intent in its qualified immunity analysis, particularly with respect to its finding of malice. The subjective intent of the actor is generally irrelevant to the objective reasonableness test at the heart of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Here, however, the actor’s subjective intent is relevant to determine whether the mistreatment was intentional, as required to state a cognizable class-of-one claim. . . . To the extent that the district court considered Wright’s subjective intent, it did so in determining whether a constitutional violation occurred, not whether the right at issue was clearly established. Accordingly, Wright’s objection that the district court improperly emphasized subjective intent fails.”)

McClendon v. Story County Sheriff’s Office, 403 F.3d 510, 515 (8th Cir. 2005) (“An officer’s subjective intent is irrelevant to the question of whether her or his conduct violated a constitutional right by exceeding the scope of a warrant. Indeed, an officer’s subjective intent is never relevant under a Fourth Amendment analysis, so long as an objective basis for the seizure exists. . . . Yet, the district court found a genuine issue as to whether a constitutional violation occurred based solely on the Defendants’ possible subjective intent. . . . Even if we assume, arguendo, that McCaskey and Rogers seized the entire herd solely to punish McClendon for attempting to thwart the seizure, this cannot negate the uncontested fact that two professionals, Dr. Houlding and Nicole Snider, recommended removal of all the horses. On this basis alone, the decision of the district court warrants reversal.”).

Coleman v. Parkman, 349 F.3d 534, 538 n.2 (8th Cir. 2003) (noting “the difficulty courts have experienced when evaluating Saucier’s second step in deliberate indifference cases. E.g., Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049-1053 (9th Cir.2002); Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir.2002); see, e.g., Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff’s Dep’t, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir.2000).”).

Thomas v. Talley, 251 F.3d 743, 746 (8th Cir. 2001) (“The Supreme Court has recently made it clear . . . that the subjective intent that Harlow eliminated from consideration differs from intent that is ‘an essential component of [a] plaintiff’s affirmative case,’ Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 589 (1998). In considering a qualified immunity defense, a court cannot disregard evidence of the intent that is an element of the plaintiff’s case because if it did so the plaintiff could not show that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . . Because evidence of improper motive is an essential component of Mr. Thomas’s affirmative case, we conclude that when ruling on Captain Talley’s motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the district court was indeed required to consider the evidence of Captain Talley’s intent to discriminate.”).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 796-97 (9th Cir. 2018) (“The deputies who used tasers. . . contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law governing the use of tasers was not clearly established in 2008. We disagree. ‘An officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.’ . . This statement applies with particular strength in the context of the Eighth Amendment. A plaintiff cannot prove an Eighth Amendment violation without showing that force was employed ‘maliciously and sadistically’ for the purpose of causing harm. . . Even if particularized notice, specific to tasers, were needed at the time Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado acted, . . . controlling circuit and Supreme Court case law provided it. [collecting cases] Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado argue that limits on the proper use of tasers were still unclear as of 2008, relying on two Fourth Amendment cases decided after the cell extractions at issue in this case: Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc), and Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805 (9th Cir. 2010). Mattos and Bryan clarified the circumstances under which taser use would violate the Fourth Amendment and granted qualified immunity to the officers who acted without the benefit of this clarification. . . However, the deputies’ argument fails to acknowledge the respective standards for Fourth and Eighth Amendment violations. . . We determine whether the Fourth Amendment has been violated by assessing the objective reasonableness of the force used, balancing the degree of intrusion against the government’s interest. . . By contrast, subjective intent is critical in an Eighth Amendment analysis. More than de minimis force applied for no good faith law enforcement purpose violates the Eighth Amendment. . . Objective reasonableness may inform the Eighth Amendment inquiry, providing evidence of good faith or of malice. . . But once a jury has determined on the basis of sufficient evidence that ‘prison officials maliciously and sadistically use[d] [more than de minimis] force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency,’ and thus the Eighth Amendment, ‘always are violated.’ . . Here, the evidence amply supported the jury’s finding that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically.”)

Chism v. Washington State, 661 F.3d 380, 393 & n.15 (9th Cir. 2011) (amending panel opinion and denying reh’g en banc) (“In light of Branch, Liston, and Hervey, we conclude that ‘every “reasonable official would have understood”’ that the Chisms had a constitutional right to not be searched and arrested as a result of judicial deception. . . We therefore hold that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In judicial deception cases, our qualified immunity analysis at the summary judgment stage is swallowed by the question of reckless or intentional disregard for the truth. . . We have explained that this ‘merger’ is sensible because ‘no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense.’”).

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 974, 977 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) (“A mayor’s entitlement to qualified immunity for ejecting a person from a city council meeting ‘depends on whether a reasonable person in his position, acting on his information and motivated by his purpose, would have known that ejecting [the attendee] violated his clearly established rights.’ . . The DVDs show triable issues of fact as to whether Norse was impermissibly ejected because of his viewpoint rather than his alleged disruptiveness. . . . In this case, we are dealing with city officials who ejected one individual from City Council meetings. . . . [T]he decisions to expel Norse were administrative, not legislative, so the defendants are not entitled to absolute immunity.”)

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 979 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) (Kozinski, CJ., joined by Reinhardt, J., concurring) (“I join Judge Thomas’s opinion because it’s clearly right. I write only to observe that, even after the procedural irregularities that deprived Norse an opportunity to present evidence, it’s clear that the council members aren’t entitled to qualified immunity. In the Age of YouTube, there’s no need to take my word for it: There is a video of the incident that I’m ‘happy to allow ... to speak for itself.’ Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 378 n.5 (2007); see <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ZOssHWB6WBI> (last visited Nov. 16, 2010). This video (also found in the record) clearly shows that Norse’s sieg heil was momentary and casual, causing no disruption whatsoever. It would have remained entirely unnoticed, had a city council-man not interrupted the proceedings to take umbrage and insist that Norse be cast out of the meeting. Councilman Fitzmaurice clearly wants Norse expelled because the ‘Nazi salute’ is ‘against the dignity of this body and the decorum of this body’ and not because of any disruption. But, unlike der Führer, government officials in America occasionally must tolerate offensive or irritating speech.”)

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 703 (9th Cir. 2005) (“The district court correctly held that the DOC regulation prohibiting mail that could create a risk of violence and physical harm to any person is constitutional on its face. . . . The question presented in this case is whether the prison officials applied this rule in a fashion that is unconstitutional. Because we must, for purposes of this appeal, accept the facts as laid out by PLN, we cannot determine on this record whether the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. PLN contends that the DOC’s policy was applied by the prison officials in a manner that singled out PLN for discriminatory treatment, while allowing other publishers to deliver similar material. PLN challenges the DOC’s refusal to deliver more than one hundred specific legal documents. PLN suggests that the real motive of the prison officials who prevented third-party legal materials from being delivered was to suppress materials that embarrass the DOC and educate inmates on how to file their claims. Although an improper motive ordinarily will not defeat a request for qualified immunity, . . . if the policy were applied in a discriminatory fashion based on the content of the material, this would clearly violate PLN’s First Amendment rights. . . . Accordingly, we hold that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity regarding PLN’s claim that they violated its constitutional rights in banning the receipt of the third-party legal materials.”).

Covington v. Fairman, No. 03-17003, 03-17004, 2004 WL 2823307, at * 6, *7 (9th Cir. Dec. 9, 2004) (Brunetti, J., dissenting) (not published) (“Because I do not believe that the extraction officers used excessive force in violation of Covington’s Eighth Amendment rights, the supervisors therefore cannot be held liable. . . . Even if I assume that under the facts of this case all Defendants engaged in conduct that violated Covington’s Eighth Amendment rights, all Defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity under the second step of Saucier. . . . I do not dispute that as of September 2, 1998, it was clearly established that a wanton beating by a prison official amounted to a violation of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. However, under this step, the inquiry is whether it was clearly established that the force applied during a cell extraction under these circumstances would have been known by a reasonable officer to be wanton and unnecessary. While it was clearly established in September 1998 that prisoners were entitled to be free from wanton beatings, it was equally clearly established in September 1998 that at times prison officials may have to apply force to prisoners in order to restore or maintain discipline. . . . It was certainly not clearly established at this time that kicking and punching during a cell extraction, especially when the use of force was necessary, would be characterized as a wanton beating and an Eighth Amendment violation. Under the circumstances detailed above, a reasonable officer would have believed that force was necessary and lawful to extract Covington from his cell. A reasonable officer would also suspect that this force might include punching and kicking. Importantly, the extraction officers did not use weapons such as tasers or guns to subdue Covington. Further evidence that the force applied was reasonable under the circumstances is that the injuries resulting from these punches and kicks were very minor. Under the Hudson and Whitley parameters, which allow prison officials certain leeway in order to maintain prison discipline, I cannot conclude that the extraction officers acted unreasonably and beyond those parameters. . . . The majority relies on Covington's allegations that he was repeatedly hit in his groin to bolster the conclusion that the force applied was excessive. However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court have ever held that a prison official's punching or kicking in the groin is a per se Eighth Amendment violation. Indeed, this conduct must be considered in light of the entire factual context. The groin allegations occurred in the heat of a cell extraction, with punches and kicks inevitably flying. The panel may decide today that that type of force should never be allowed. However, we have yet to reach such a conclusion. Because the officers were not put on notice that any physical force applied to the groin would be considered per se excessive force, the officers were reasonable in their actions. . . . Even if I were to agree that some of the minimal force used in this cell extraction was unnecessary, the conduct of the extraction officers and the supervisors demonstrates that they acted in good faith and any mistake made by the officers as to the amount of force necessary was reasonable, in light of all of the circumstances. By the time the extraction officers entered the cell, events had escalated such that it was probable that force would be used to remove Covington from the cell. Force was in fact used, but Covington's injuries suggest it was minimal and did not exceed the amount that was necessary. If there was some punching or kicking that could conceivably be considered excessive, this conduct would be a reasonable mistake made in the furtherance of restoring discipline and was not done to maliciously harm Covington.").

Torres v. Runyon, No. 02-15273, 2003 WL 22598339, at *1, *2 (9th Cir. Nov. 6, 2003) (unpublished) ("In a recent case, Marquez v. Gutierrez, supra, we applied Saucier to an excessive use of force claim and underscored the significance of analyzing the constitutional right apart from qualified immunity. . . . Specifically, even if Torres might establish an excessive use of force, Runyon still may be entitled to qualified immunity for reasonable conduct under the circumstances he faced. . . . Accepting Torres' version of the facts, which placed him on the ground as a victim of other inmates' assaults, a reasonable fact finder might view Runyon's use of deadly force against Torres as an act that violated Torres' Eighth Amendment right. . . . However, there is no evidence that Runyon knew Torres nor carried any animus toward him. At most, Runyon may have been negligent in shooting the wrong person. But we need not resolve this issue because we find Runyon's conduct was reasonable under the following analysis. . . . From his viewpoint in the observation tower, Runyon believed that the inmates on the ground were defenseless as they received kicks and blows from other inmates. And the evidence is uncontradicted that Runyon aimed at and intended to shoot the inmate whom he saw kicking an unconscious inmate to death, whether or not he hit the wrong person or was mistaken about which person was hit. . . . We cannot say that Runyon's conduct was unreasonable under the circumstances. Therefore, Runyon is entitled to qualified immunity from the Torres estate's claims arising out of the prison yard shooting.")

Marquez v. Gutierrez, 322 F.3d 689, 692, 693 (9th Cir. 2003) ("To shoot a passive, unarmed inmate standing near a fight between other inmates, none of whom was armed, when no inmate was in danger of great bodily harm, would inflict unnecessary and wanton pain. . . . Even though there would be a constitutional violation if Marquez were to prove the facts that he posits, Gutierrez may nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed his conduct was lawful. . . . Marquez argues that a prison official cannot act maliciously and sadistically while, at the same time, reasonably believing that his actions conform to clearly established law. However, this argument is the same argument that the Supreme Court rejected in Saucier, and that we rejected in Estate of Ford. . . . Accordingly, Gutierrez's claim of qualified immunity is not defeated simply because a triable issue of fact exists as to whether his decision to shoot Marquez was malicious. Even if Gutierrez's beliefs that Marquez was involved in the kicking incident and that Perez was in danger of serious harm were mistaken, he can still be entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable official standing where Gutierrez was standing—that is, in a tower located 360 feet away from the disturbance—could perceive that both Marquez and another inmate were kicking Perez and threatening Perez with serious injury or death, and that Perez was not capable of protecting himself, even if no kick was actually administered by Marquez. The scenario may look different when gauged against the "20/20 vision of hindsight," but we must look at the situation as a reasonable officer in Gutierrez's position could have perceived it. . . . In that light, we believe that a reasonable officer could believe that shooting one inmate in the leg to stop an assault that could have seriously injured or killed another inmate was a good faith effort to restore order, and thus lawful.").

Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1045 (9th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton has been undermined by Saucier; AEven though the constitutional issue turns on the officers' state of mind (here, deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm), courts must still consider whether—assuming the facts in the injured party's favor—it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful.")) Clement v. Gomez, 298 F.3d 898, 906 (9th Cir. 2002) (" The general law regarding the medical treatment of prisoners was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Furthermore, it was also clearly established that the officers could not intentionally deny or delay access to medical care. . . While a resolution of the factual issues may well relieve the prison officials of any liability in this case, if the prisoners' version of the facts were to prevail at trial, a jury might conclude that the officers were deliberately indifferent to such needs during the four-hour period after the incident. Various supervisory officials may also have been deliberately indifferent to obvious risks of injury. Under such circumstances, the officials' actions are not protected by qualified immunity.").

Butler v. Elle, 281 F.3d 1014, 1024 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[O]ur cases effectively intertwine the qualified immunity question (1) whether a reasonable officer should have known that he acted in violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights with (2) the substantive recklessness or dishonesty question. This merger is ultimately appropriate because, as Branch and Hervey recognize, no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense. On the other hand, should the fact-finder find at trial in the officer's favor, i.e., that he did not act dishonestly or recklessly, that officer's conduct would not have violated any clearly established statutory or constitutional rights. In this regard, because the two issues merge, there need be no separate inquiry at trial, and no discrete instructions, on whether Elle is entitled to qualified immunity. If he was reckless or deceitful in preparing the warrant affidavit, then he both violated Butler's rights and is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Meeks v. Gomez, No. 96-15625, 1997 WL 51518, at *2 (9th Cir. Feb. 21, 1997) (unpublished) ("A public official cannot both be 'deliberately indifferent'. . . and at the same time reasonably believe that his conduct conforms to clearly established law. . . . The district court correctly concluded that the existence of a triable issue of fact as to deliberate indifference precluded granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.").

Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355, 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants have not shown that a reasonable officer could have believed that entry with intent to arrest would not violate clearly established law. Thus summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity would be inappropriate if the intent was to arrest or if facts as to intent are in dispute. A genuine dispute exists as to whether or not defendants ordered the storming of the house primarily for the purpose of arresting [decedent]. The fact that this dispute turns on an essentially subjective element (the officers' purpose), while qualified immunity involves an inquiry into 'objective reasonableness' does not mean that qualified immunity is any more or less available in this context than it would otherwise be. . . In short, the factual issues in this case must be decided by a jury before any determination of qualified immunity can be made.").

Hamilton v. Endell, 981 F.2d 1062, 1066 (9th Cir. 1992) ("A finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity; prison officials who deliberately ignore the serious medical needs of inmates cannot claim that it was not apparent to a reasonable person that such actions violated the law.”).

Vaden v. Summerhill, No. CIV S-06-1836 GEB KJM P, 2008 WL 4370061, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2008) (“Because the point at which a risk to an inmate becomes a substantial risk of serious harm for Eighth Amendment purposes is ill-defined and because St. Andre’s actions fall into this hazy area, he is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Coyle v. Cambra, No. C 02-1810 SBA PR, 2005 WL 2397517, at *15 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 27, 2005) (“Plaintiff alleges that Defendants were responsible for the over six-month delay in his receiving an orthopedic consultation, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. Although the law was clearly established that delay and interference with medical care can violate an inmate’s Eighth Amendment rights, the law does not specifically state the exact amount of delay that would rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . And though it is not necessary to find a case with the exact same fact pattern (e.g., six-month delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation) to hold that Defendants breached a clearly established duty, more specificity as to the amount of delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation must be shown, before the Court could find that Defendants violated clearly established law. Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official that a six-month delay in Plaintiff receiving an orthopedic consultation would expose Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. The circumstances in the instant case include a temporary suspension of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic, however, reasonable alternatives were available for Plaintiff’s routine medical care, including specialty medical care through the use of Telemedicine. Therefore, a reasonable prison officer would not necessarily have drawn the inference that Plaintiff would not be able to receive adequate medical care with the aforementioned plan for emergency medical care that was implemented in place of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic. Because the law did not put Defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate.”).

Moreno v. City of Sacramento, No. CIV-S-01-0725DFLDAD, 2005 WL 2016910, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 19, 2005) (“[D]efendants argue that even though the Ninth Circuit found violations of clearly established constitutional law, that does not foreclose a finding by the court that a reasonable officer would not understand that his conduct violated the law on the specific facts presented in this case. . . . Additionally, they assert that the individual defendants’ personal knowledge of the relevant law is pertinent to this qualified immunity inquiry. . . . They seek to introduce additional testimony from Pino, Vanella, and Fernandez on the following topics: (1) their general reliance on the city attorney for their knowledge of the law; (2) their efforts to keep up with developments in the law; and (3) their understanding and reading of the relevant case law. Defendants’ arguments are premised on a misunderstanding of the qualified immunity inquiry. The qualified immunity analysis contains only two steps: (1) was there a constitutional violation? and (2) if so, was the violation clearly established? . . . Although defendants correctly note that a court must analyze whether a reasonable officer would understand that his actions were unconstitutional on the facts of the present case, that inquiry is subsumed within the ‘clearly established’ analysis. As the Supreme Court has held, ‘the relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . Therefore, when the Ninth Circuit held that the constitutional violations were clearly established, it found that a reasonable officer, confronted with the alleged facts of this particular case, would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. Accordingly, defendants’ assertion that a reasonable officer would not have understood that his actions were unconstitutional on the specific facts is foreclosed by the Ninth Circuit’s ruling. Defendants’ request for additional testimony is equally misplaced. The qualified immunity analysis is objective, not subjective. . . . Thus, the individual defendants’ personal knowledge of the law and their efforts to stay abreast of changes in the law is irrelevant to this constitutional inquiry. In fact, the Supreme Court rejected a subjective component of the qualified immunity inquiry for the very purpose of preventing the need for testimony from individual officers as to their state of mind, subjective motivation, and knowledge of the law.”).

Nelson v. California DOC, No. C 02-5476 SI(PR), 2004 WL 569529, at 8-10 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 2004) (“Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from being required to live in and exercise in just underwear-changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate’s health. Although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of outdoor exercise on a long-term basis violated the Eighth Amendment, and although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of adequate clothing violated the Eighth Amendment, the law was not very well fleshed out on amount of clothing required to avoid an Eighth Amendment violation. Although the court earlier in this decision found that requiring an inmate to live in his underwear for five months was sufficiently serious to establish the first prong of an Eighth Amendment claim, the court recognizes the dearth of authority on the specific point of how much clothing must be given to an inmate. . . . A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not be deliberately indifferent to a serious risk to inmate health could know that Nelson spent five months in no clothes other than boxer shorts and a t-shirt and know that he had only those clothes to wear when he exercised in the occasionally cold weather but reasonably perceive that Nelson’s exposure to any harm was not that high when (1) Nelson spent the vast majority of his time in a climate- controlled environment, (2) Nelson was allowed, but not required, to go outside for an exercise period for up to 3-1/2 hours at a time, (3) the temperature was in the 34-50 degree range on some days, (3) notwithstanding his complaints that it was cold and he was in bad health, Nelson continued to choose to go outside for the exercise period even though he had the option to remain indoors. . . . The information available to defendants did not make it so clear that Nelson would be in pain or face a serious risk to his health while inside his cell or during the six hours of exercise each week that no reasonable officer would have let him remain in just his underwear. Because the law did not put defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate”).

Mooring v. San Francisco Sheriff’s Dep’t., 289 F.Supp.2d 1110, 1120 (N.D. Cal. 2003) (“Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from housing an inmate in a cell containing Soreno gang members when the inmate said he had ‘gang affiliation’ concerns but did not identify himself as a Norteno gang member specifically and was not known to the official to be from the Norteno gang changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm from one of those inmates. A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not recklessly disregard a serious risk to inmate safety could know that Mooring said he had gang affiliation concerns and objected to the cell placement but reasonably perceive that Mooring’s exposure to any harm was not that high when there was no evidence of a specific threat from the inmates in cell E to Mooring. Because the law did not put Gonzalez on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate. . . Gonzalez met his burden of proof in his moving papers. Mooring did not introduce evidence to show the existence of a genuine issue of fact on the defense. Gonzalez is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the qualified immunity defense.”).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Shepherd v. Robbins, 55 F.4th 810, 816 n.3 (10th Cir. 2022) (“On appeal, Plaintiff argues that Defendant may not assert qualified immunity for a sexual harassment claim brought under § 1983. We have addressed § 1983 sexual harassment claims in the past without addressing such an argument. Whether a defendant in this context can raise qualified immunity as a defense remains an open question. Plaintiff failed to raise this issue below and does not argue for plain error. So Plaintiff forfeited the argument and subsequently waived it.”)

Gamel-Medler v. Almaguer, 835 F. App’x 354, ___ & n.7 (10th Cir. 2020) (“In their motions for summary judgment, neither Almaguer nor Robertson argued that assuming a jury could conclude they subjected Gamel-Medler to differential treatment with a discriminatory purposes they could, nonetheless, not be held liable because the law is not clearly established. . . . It is not surprising Defendants did not make such an argument. ‘[Q]ualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . A constitutional right is clearly established if it is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . Assuming, as specifically determined by the district court, a jury could find Defendants denied Gamel-Medler police protection afforded to other residents of Hitchcock because Gamel-Medler’s son is African American, it cannot be argued that a reasonable officer would not be aware such conduct is at odds with the Constitution’s guarantee of equal protection. . . Because Gamel-Medler must prove purposeful (i.e., intentional) discrimination to state a viable claim, the need for a factually symmetrical case to put Defendants on notice their conduct violates the law is reduced. . . Thus, absent some set of extenuating facts, none of which were alleged in this case, a general proposition will often be enough to render the legal right clearly established in cases such as the instant case. See Brown v. Flowers, No. 19-7011, 2020 WL 5509683 at *4-5 (10th Cir. Sept. 14, 2020) (discussing this concept at length).”)

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1248-54 (10th Cir. 2015) (“The requisite showing of an ‘affirmative link’ between a supervisor and the alleged constitutional injury has ‘[come] to have three related prongs: (1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind.’. . . Admittedly, ‘[t]he contours of ... supervisory liability are still somewhat unclear after [the Supreme Court decided] Iqbal, which “articulated a stricter liability standard for ... personal involvement.”’ . . . Our clearly-established-law analysis centers on whether the controlling cases ‘show that [Sheriff Glanz] took the alleged actions with the requisite state of mind.’ . . . This state of mind “‘can be no less than the mens rea required” of [any of his] subordinates [i.e., Jail employees] to commit the underlying constitutional violation.’ . . . Importantly, as our discussion of the pertinent governing caselaw . . . demonstrates, this is a particularized state of mind: actual knowledge by a prison official of an individual inmate’s substantial risk of suicide. . . . Our review of relevant caselaw postdating Hocker and Barrie indicates that the foregoing state of the law in our circuit—which required prison officials to possess knowledge that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide—had not changed in material respects by July 2009. We are not aware of any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decisions that directly answer this clearly-established-law inquiry. However, our view of the requirements of the clearly established law extant when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide (July 2009) does find some support in the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, — U.S. —, 135 S.Ct. 2042 (2015) (per curiam), where the Court resolved a deliberate-indifference dispute on the clearly-established-law prong of the qualified-immunity standard. There, the Court held that, as of November 2004, there was no clearly established ‘right’ of an inmate to be adequately screened for suicide. . . . The Taylor Court emphatically stated that ‘[n]o decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.’ . . . Taylor teaches us that, as of November 2004, there was no constitutional right to such screening or protocols. . . . Consequently, in November 2004, a jail’s nonexistent or deficient suicide-screening measures would not have necessarily indicated that an individual prisoner’s suicide was the product of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In light of Taylor, our reading of the contours of the law a short five years later should not be surprising. That is, irrespective of the alleged deficiencies in the Jail’s suicide-screening protocols, in order for any defendant, including Sheriff Glanz, to be found to have acted with deliberate indifference, he needed to first have knowledge that the specific inmate at issue presented a substantial risk of suicide. Moreover, though not dispositive, our limited corpus of nonprecedential jail-suicide decisions supports our reading of the state of the law when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide. . . . At bottom, when confronting individual-capacity § 1983 claims, our ‘focus must always be on the defendant—on the ... injury he inflicted or caused to be inflicted, and on his motives. This is because § 1983 isn’t a strict liability offense.’ . . . As noted, Sheriff Glanz had no personal interaction with Mr. Jernegan or direct and contemporaneous knowledge of his treatment in July 2009. Therefore, insofar as he had knowledge sufficient to form the requisite mental state, it would have had to necessarily come from his subordinates, notably Ms. Taylor or Ms. Sampson. Because they did not possess such knowledge, the conclusion inexorably follows that Sheriff Glanz could not have possessed such knowledge. Accordingly, though we have not ignored Ms. Cox’s strong assertions regarding the systemic failings of the Jail’s mental-health screening and treatment protocols, which quite understandably troubled the district court, we conclude that Ms. Cox has nevertheless failed to establish that Sheriff Glanz acted as to Mr. Jernegan with the requisite mental state to constitute deliberate indifference. In other words, she has not carried her burden regarding the essential subjective component of the deliberate-indifference standard. In sum, for the reasons stated, we cannot conclude that Sheriff Glanz's conduct constituted an Eighth Amendment violation under the law that was clearly established at the time of Mr. Jernegan's death. Therefore, Ms. Cox cannot satisfy the clearly-established-law component of the qualified-immunity standard. We must accordingly reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Sheriff on Ms. Cox's individual-capacity claim under § 1983.”)

Shrum v. City of Coweta, Oklahoma, 449 F.3d 1132, 1145 (10th Cir. 2006) (“Chief Palmer does not dispute that it was clearly established that non-neutral state action imposing a substantial burden on the exercise of religion violates the First Amendment. If Officer Shrum's factual allegations are correct—that he was singled out precisely because of Chief Palmer's knowledge of his religious commitment—then Chief Palmer's claim of qualified immunity must fail. Only if the finder of fact ultimately concludes, as a matter of fact, that Chief Palmer had a neutral basis for his personnel actions, does he have a defense. This is thus a case where the claim of qualified immunity collapses into the merits. The district court was correct to hold that it should proceed to trial on the free exercise claim.”).

Mimics v. Village of Angel Fire, 394 F.3d 836, 848 (10th Cir. 2005) (“In the context of a summary judgment motion on a qualified immunity defense to a claim involving the defendant's state of mind, the defendant must first show that the challenged conduct was objectively reasonable. . . . Because this court has determined that there is evidence Hasford's entries into MIMICS on December 20, 1996 and January 16, 1997 were not objectively reasonable, we need not conduct any further analysis. Construing the evidence in the Wildgrubes' favor, as we must do on summary judgment, Hasford has failed, at least at this point in the proceedings, to establish that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the Wildgrubes' First Amendment claim.”).

Beard v. City of Northglenn, 23 F.3d 110, 114-15 (10th Cir. 1994) (White, Associate Justice (Ret.)) (“If the court had addressed itself to the proper Fourth Amendment question, it would have found its resolution of that question would have also dictated its conclusion on the second portion of the qualified immunity test. If, after all, a claimant is able to prove the necessary deliberate falsehood or reckless disregard to impeach a facially valid warrant, the reasonableness inquiry has to be resolved against the defendant since no reasonably competent officer could believe an arrest legal where it was his deliberate or reckless deception that led the magistrate into issuing the warrant. Conversely, if a plaintiff cannot prove a Fourth Amendment violation, there is no need to proceed any further; the case ends in defendant's favor. It is clear from this analysis that the trial court's conclusion that the officers violated appellant's Fourth Amendment rights and still acted reasonably is untenable. To reach such a conclusion under the correct Fourth Amendment standard would require a court to hold the knowing or reckless disregard of the truth in an arrest affidavit—the ultimate act of unreason—reasonable as a matter of law.”).

Gallegos v. City and County of Denver, 984 F.2d 358, 363-64 (10th Cir. 1993) (“The ‘objective reasonableness’ standard set forth in Harlow often rests on a determination of whether the defendant’s conduct can be traced to the subjective element of impermissible motive or intent.”), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2962 (1993).

Estate of Roemer v. Shoaga, No. 14-CV-01655-PAB-NYW, 2019 WL 4645441, at *5 (D. Colo. Sept. 24, 2019) (“Some courts have determined that the deliberate indifference part of an Eighth Amendment claim and the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis collapse because ‘deliberately indifferent conduct can never be objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity.’ [citing cases from 3d, 4th, 7th Circuits] However, this is not the law in the Tenth Circuit. See, e.g., Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1122, 1127 (10th Cir. 2018) (assuming that the plaintiff had successfully demonstrated that the defendant had acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm, but concluding that the contours of the plaintiff’s constitutional right were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation); accord Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1045 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding that, even when “the constitutional issue turns on the officers’ [deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm], courts must still consider whether – assuming the facts in the injured party’s favor – it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful”).”)

Estate of Dixon v. Bd. of Cty. Commissioners of Crowley Cty., No. 15-CV-02727-NYW, 2017 WL 1684134, at *3 (D. Colo. May 3, 2017) (“Nor does the court’s ruling on the Motions to Dismiss otherwise dispose of the qualified immunity analysis on summary judgment. The qualified immunity inquiry at the motion to dismiss phase and at the summary judgment phase are separate and distinct—notably, Plaintiffs carry different burdens. On a motion to dismiss, the court determines whether the complaint’s factual allegations state a plausible constitutional claim, not whether the complaint contains all the necessary factual allegations to sustain a conclusion that Defendants violated clearly established law. See Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1249 (10th Cir. 2008). At summary judgment, ‘the record must clearly demonstrate the plaintiff[s] ha[ve] satisfied [their] heavy two-part burden,’ i.e., that Defendants violated Mr. Dixon’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, the court’s conclusion at the motion to dismiss phase that dismissal is not warranted based on the pleadings does not necessarily translate into a determination that Plaintiffs have carried their burden to overcome qualified immunity on summary judgment.”)

Richard v. City of Wichita, No. 15-1279-EFM-KGG, 2016 WL 5341756, at *6 (D. Kan. Sept. 23, 2016) (“The Court takes these three cases with similar facts to show that the question of reasonableness is a very fact-specific inquiry. As alleged, the instant case is a close one. And usually in close cases such as this, reasonableness is properly a question for a jury. . . In Allen, Hastings, and Bleck, the Tenth Circuit determined whether summary judgment was appropriate. But here, Defendants are not arguing that this close case should be decided in their favor on summary judgment. Rather, they are arguing that Plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim upon which relief can be granted. Accordingly, their motion must be denied. Stacy was emotionally disturbed and considering suicide. His wife had called for help. He was alone in the house. Officers entered his home and issued forceful commands. It is plausible that these commands caused Stacy to become more distressed. Stacy was not suspected of committing a crime, and he did not pose any immediate danger to others when he was alone in his house. Given these facts, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief. The Court recognizes that Defendants may have colorable arguments as to why their actions were reasonable, but these arguments do not belong in a 12(b)(6) motion. They are better suited for a motion for summary judgment or a jury determination.”)

Freeman v. Knight, No. 04CV00148MSKPAC, 2005 WL 1896245, at *4 (D. Colo. Aug. 8, 2005) (“The ‘clearly established’ prong of the analysis is often described as inquiring whether a ‘reasonable official would understand’ that his or her behavior violated the constitution. . . . In this Court’s view, this description of the test has resulted in imprecise analysis, as it suggests that the focus of the analysis is on the official’s subjective or objective state of mind. This is incorrect. The ‘clearly established’ prong does not actually examine state of mind; rather, it merely inquires whether, at the time of the challenged act, there was binding legal authority recognizing the existence of a constitutional right in the particular circumstances.”).

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Donald v. Norris, No. 23-11400, 2025 WL 796326, at *7 (11th Cir. Mar. 13, 2025) (“Donald cites one of our decisions for the proposition that ‘[a] finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity [because] prison officials who deliberately ignore the serious medical needs of inmates cannot claim that it was not apparent to a reasonable person that such actions violated the law.’. . . But that argument falls short because we later expressly rejected the statement Donald relies on from Hill because it ‘incorrectly jumble[d] the merits of an Eighth Amendment violation with the separate concept of an immunity defense.’. . . Indeed, the formulation from the Hill dicta would eliminate the ‘clearly established’ part of the qualified-immunity analysis as we know it.”)

Jackson v. Cowan, No. 19-13181, 2022 WL 3973705, at *9 n.6 (11th Cir. Sept. 1, 2022) (not reported) (“Previously in this circuit, qualified immunity was not available as a defense to § 1985(3) claims. See Burrell v. Bd. of Trs. of Ga. Mil. Coll., 970 F.2d 785, 794 (11th Cir. 1992). Subsequently, however, the Supreme Court has applied qualified immunity to § 1985(3) claims. See Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1869 (2017) (“Petitioners are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3).”); see also Chua v. Ekonomou, 1 F.4th 948, 956 (11th Cir. 2021) (recognizing that the Supreme Court in Ziglar abrogated Burrell’s holding that “qualified immunity does not apply to a claim brought under [§] 1985(3).”.)

Chua v. Ekonomou, 1 F.4th 948, 956 (11th Cir. 2021) (“Although we held in Burrell v. Board of Trustees of Georgia Military College that qualified immunity does not apply to a claim brought under section 1985(3), 970 F.2d 785, 794 (11th Cir. 1992), the Supreme Court recently abrogated that holding in Ziglar v. Abbasi, — U.S. —, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1869, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (holding that petitioners were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to claims brought under section 1985(3)).”)

Patel v. Lanier County, Georgia, 969 F.3d 1173, 1185-86 (11th Cir. 2020) (“The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying his claim was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incident in question. . . . It is true, as Patel says, that in Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321–22 (11th Cir. 2002), and Fennell, 559 F.3d at 1216–17, we articulated a sui generis exception to that general rule for Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. But that exception was justified only by an idiosyncrasy of those claims—an idiosyncrasy that, with respect to those arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, Kingsley eliminated. As a result, Patel can no longer rely on our previous holdings but, rather, must prove that his right not to be subjected to prolonged detention in the hot transport van was clearly established. . . . The Johnson/Fennell exception rested entirely on the ‘extreme’ subjective-intent element of Eighth and (then) Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Kingsley, though, expressly eliminated any subjective element for such claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment—at least as to the excessiveness of the force. . . . In so doing, the Supreme Court likewise eliminated the justification for the Johnson/Fennell exception itself—effectively undermining that special rule ‘to the point of abrogation,’ at least as to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims.”)

Mitchell v. City of Jacksonville, 734 F. App’x 649, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (“To the extent Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s race discrimination claim because a reasonable official under the circumstances could have believed that Defendants’ conduct was lawful, we have jurisdiction to review that legal issue on appeal. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, . . . the record establishes that Plaintiff was treated less favorably than his non-minority co-workers. Plaintiff has also proffered some evidence that his treatment was racially motivated. Defendants, on the other hand, contend that a lawful basis existed for utilizing a liaison to communicate with Plaintiff: that it was ‘easier’ for Chief Loput. That Defendants may have acted, in part, with discriminatory motive does not necessarily defeat their entitlement to qualified immunity. See Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534-35 (11th Cir. 1996). When improper motive is part of the underlying constitutional tort -- and where evidence exists of mixed motives -- a defendant is still entitled to qualified immunity if ‘the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.’ Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 (11th Cir. 2000) (emphasis in original). Here, the record does not establish ‘indisputably’ that Defendants’ conduct was in fact motivated at least in part by their proffered reason. Instead, evidence in the record demonstrates that the use of a ‘liaison’ to communicate within a single division was atypical and that the use of a lower-ranking ‘liaison’ to relay orders to a higher-ranking officer would violate the JFRD’s chain-of-command policy. We also note that Defendants have proffered no legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the other conduct alleged by Plaintiff: that Chief Loput avoided one-on-one contact with Plaintiff, excluded Plaintiff from a department-wide email, assigned Plaintiff menial tasks, and denied Plaintiff’s travel leave. At this stage in the proceedings, the district court concluded properly that Defendants were unentitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claim for race discrimination. Because Defendants' remaining arguments on appeal attack the sufficiency of the evidence supporting Plaintiff's substantive claims for race discrimination and retaliation -- and are not pertinent to the core qualified immunity analysis -- we lack jurisdiction to consider them in this interlocutory appeal.")

Joseph v. Gee, No. 17-12185, 2018 WL 345323, at *1 (11th Cir. Jan. 10, 2018) (not reported) ("Officers Echenique, Clark, Jones, and Chester moved to dismiss Mr. Joseph's second amended complaint, arguing that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The officers appeal the district court's denial of these motions. Upon de novo review, . . . and after careful consideration of the record and the parties' briefs, we vacate the orders denying the officers' motions to dismiss and remand to the district court. The district court's orders denying the officers' motions state that the motions were denied because '[i]t is premature to determine ... whether [the officers] are entitled to Qualified Immunity based on the facts of this case. The Court finds that discovery is needed to make this determination.' . . . This was error. As we recently explained, the district court's order requiring discovery 'before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is ... inconsistent with [our] decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted.' . . . When presented with the officers' motions to dismiss, both our precedent and precedent from the Supreme Court instruct the district court to analyze whether, taking Mr. Joseph's allegations as true, the second amended complaint asserted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Because the district court failed to conduct this analysis, we vacate its orders on the officers' motions to dismiss and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 592-93 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the allegations of the second amended complaint, taken with the text of the November 5, 2014 letter canceling the Wall-DeSousas' driver's licenses based on § 741.212, show substantial lawful intent without ruling out some unlawful intent, too. It is undisputed that, at the time of the November 5, 2014 letter, the enforcement of § 741.212 was not enjoined. Florida law did not recognize out-of-state same-sex marriages and driver's licenses based on the Wall-DeSousas' out-of-state marriage license. Once enforcement of § 741.212 was enjoined on January 6, 2015, the requested driver's licenses were issued shortly thereafter. . . . Given our precedent, the circumstances alleged, and the state of the Florida law at the time, we cannot say that the district court erred in dismissing this case against the defendants based on qualified immunity. . . . This is not a case where no legitimate reason in fact motivated the defendants' conduct. Importantly too, at the time of the conduct here, it was not clearly established federal law that the defendants could not act as they did. . . . The dissent suggests that a partial lawful motivation can never be decided on a motion to dismiss. But this ignores the allegations in the Wall-DeSousas' second amended complaint, the text of the defendants' letter which is properly before the Court (see n.3, infra), and the fact that § 741.212 remained the law at the time the letter was sent. Although qualified immunity defenses are sometimes resolved at the summary judgment stage, district courts may grant motions to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity if the undisputed facts in the plaintiffs' own complaint show that the defendants acted lawfully. . . The dissent suggests that the Wall-DeSousas need discovery. But the text of the letter is evidence of at least one of the defendants' motivations. . . And even if the Wall-DeSousas could show an improper motive too in discovery, here we have assumed that fact in the Wall-DeSousas' favor.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 594 (11th Cir. 2017) (O'Malley, J., dissenting) ("Reading Foy broadly would effectively immunize all defendants who luck into lawful post-hoc explanations for otherwise illegally-motivated behavior. Even where flagrant smoking guns exist, plaintiffs will never be able to discover them. And where, by sheer providence, the plaintiffs already have a smoking gun in hand, how can they use it to rebut a motion to dismiss if its contents are disputed? . . . I acknowledge wholeheartedly that the Wall-DeSousas' complaint is not a model of clarity, replacing concrete and particularized allegations with conclusory generalities. Had the district court rejected their complaint as failing outright to provide 'sufficient factual matter' to satisfy the straightforward requirements of Iqbal and Twombly, I would have few qualms in affirming. . . By relying instead on Foy, the district court's analysis begins a dangerous practice, which today's opinion ratifies. I respectfully dissent.")

Brown v. Davis, 684 F. App'x 928, ____ (11th Cir. 2017) ("In the employment discrimination context, the 'clearly established' requirement provides that a state official 'can be motivated, in part, by a dislike or hostility toward a certain protected class to which a citizen belongs and still act lawfully' where 'the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent.' Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1283 (11th Cir. 2008) (quoting Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534 (11th Cir. 1996)). 'Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct—despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act—was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Foy, 94 F.3d at 1535. 'Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Id.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1241-42 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The District Court should have granted the Corrections officials' motion for summary judgment on Mrs. Jackson's claims. Here, the Corrections officials made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters. With respect to this decision, the Corrections officials' entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity should have been determined 'at the time' that they sent the letters to Mr. and Mrs. Jackson. . . This is the case even though the decision, like many decisions made by public officials, had consequences in the future. The purpose for qualified immunity is to permit officials to act without fear of harassing litigation as long as they can reasonably anticipate before they act whether their conduct will expose them to liability. . . . Thus, the entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity is judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions and does not take into account later facts or changes in the law. [citing cases] Therefore, the District Court erred in its characterization of the Corrections officials' decision to terminate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges as having 'continued [to] den[y Mrs. Jackson] visitation long after the end of the hunger strike.' Rather, the record establishes that the decision to terminate. . . Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges was lawfully made when the letters were sent on July 19, 2012, and that the Corrections officials were therefore entitled to qualified immunity from suit for their decision. Accordingly, the Corrections officials are entitled to qualified immunity for both the period during the hunger strike and for the period after the hunger strike ended.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1244-45 (11th Cir. 2015) (Hinkle, District Judge, concurring) ("On the primary opinion's view of the facts, the Corrections officials revoked Ms. Jackson's visitation privileges for both a lawful motive (preventing the security risk and harm to the institution that come with hunger strikes) and an unlawful motive (punishing Ms. Jackson for free speech for reasons unrelated to security and institutional harm). The primary opinion says, '[T]he law of this Circuit is that, where, as here, the facts assumed for summary judgment show both a lawful and unlawful motivation for the decision made by a government official, the official is entitled to qualified immunity.' For this proposition the primary opinion cites Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1535 (11th Cir.1996). Another case supporting the statement is Stanley v. City of Dalton, Ga., 219 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir.2000). This indeed seems to be the law of the circuit. But it should not be. In a proper case, when it makes a difference, the issue should be revisited. . . .In my view, summary judgment is improper when (1) a plaintiff asserts that an officer took action based on a factor that, as a matter of clearly established law, could not constitutionally be considered, and (2) the record presents a genuine dispute over whether that prohibited factor was a but-for cause of the officer's challenged action. In asserting the contrary, Foy and Stanley confuse the subjective standard that governs the merits (what was the officer's actual motivation for taking the challenged action?) with the objective standard that applies to qualified immunity (would a reasonable officer have known that taking action for that reason was unconstitutional?). An officer's actual thought process does not always line up with what a reasonable officer could have thought. None of this calls into question the primary opinion's conclusion that the Corrections officials are entitled to summary judgment here. The record establishes without genuine dispute that in prohibiting Ms. Jackson from visiting her husband, the Corrections officials were motivated at least in part by legitimate concern for institutional security and resources. No clearly established law suggested that acting on that basis was unconstitutional. On this record, a reasonable jury could find that Ms. Jackson's protected activities were a motivating factor in the decision to prohibit her from visiting, but a reasonable jury could not find that her protected activities were a but-for cause of the decision.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1245-47 (11th Cir. 2015) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("The majority awards qualified immunity to three Georgia Department of Corrections officials for their complete and permanent termination of Delma Jackson's visitation privileges with her inmate husband. The officials first revoked Mrs. Jackson's privileges based on her purported role in a prison hunger strike. But they did not restore her privileges when the strike ended on July 26, 2012. Neither did they reinstate her privileges when they returned visitation privileges to all others who had been denied visitation for the same reason. Indeed, by all accounts they have not restored her privileges to this day, nearly thirty months later. Because I am convinced that any stated legitimate penological purpose for revoking her privileges vanished sometime after the end of the hunger strike, and because qualified immunity cannot extend to protect the officials if their sole remaining motivation was to retaliate against Mrs. Jackson for her protected speech, I respectfully dissent. I am not persuaded by the majority's conclusion that our qualified immunity analysis can only look to the initial revocation communicated by the July 19, 2012 revocation letters. Specifically, I reject the idea that we are permitted to consider only the July 19, 2012 communication of the decision (which did not include an end-date for the action, as required by GDOC operating procedures), and must ignore the ongoing impact of that decision which still prevents Mrs. Jackson from seeing her husband now almost three years later. While certainly we must consider the letters, Mrs. Jackson's First Amendment retaliation claim is not so limited. As the District Court correctly noted, Mrs. Jackson challenged the permanent suspension of her privileges. The officials have the authority at any point to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. Their continued failure to do so perpetuates the permanent suspension and should be considered as part of the qualified immunity analysis. The District Court was right in observing that the officials did not offer any valid motivation for the permanent suspension of Mrs. Jackson's privileges once the hunger strike ended. The officials returned visitation privileges to every other prison visitor whose rights had been revoked during the hunger strike. They suggest that Mrs. Jackson's privileges were not restored due to incomplete paperwork. But even if that were true, Mrs. Jackson made clear her request to be able to visit her husband when she sought an injunction for reinstatement of her privileges nearly a year before her husband was allegedly given the proper paperwork. The officials knew then that Mrs. Jackson wanted her privileges back, but did not reinstate them. The majority points out that qualified immunity is 'judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions,' not 'tak[ing] into account later facts or changes in the law.' . . . While that may be true, all the cases they rely upon stand for the unremarkable principle that an officer who performs a single act which does not violate the law when performed, will not be stripped of that immunity just because of a later change in the law. . . . I do not read those holdings to apply here so as to prevent us from considering the officers' ongoing decisions to revoke and refuse to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's privileges. Neither do those cases stop us from evaluating whether the scope of the deprivation was reasonable at the time it was made. The majority acknowledges that a decision that would warrant qualified immunity at the time it is made can have ongoing consequences. . . . And I understand that qualified immunity can attach to inaction just as it does to actions. . . . Our precedent does not require us to turn a blind eye when defendants' ongoing inaction causes harm, especially where, as here, it was the same defendants' earlier action that created the harm in the first place. Our analysis should begin anew once changing circumstances do away with the justification first given. . . . Even if the majority were correct that the officials 'made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters,' . . . I would not hold that the decision is entitled to complete qualified immunity. The letters imposed a permanent revocation of Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. GDOC Standard Operating Procedures require notice of the 'reason for and length of the [revocation].' The officers' stated reason for revocation was related to the hunger strike, but the letters contained neither a date on which the revocation would end nor a statement that the privileges would be reinstated when the hunger strike was over. In light of those facts, I do not believe that defendants have offered a lawful motive for the breadth of the letters for purposes of qualified immunity. I would affirm the District Court's partial grant of qualified immunity.")

Sherrod v. Johnson, 667 F.3d 1359, 1364 (11th Cir. 2012) ("A proper analysis of Johnson and Crutchfield's entitlement to qualified immunity is not whether they knew that terminating Sherrod in retaliation for protected speech was lawful, but rather whether terminating him based upon all the information available to them at the time, to include any knowledge of his protected speech, was objectively reasonable. See Stanley, supra, at 1294. In Foy, we noted that the presence of a jury issue about a defendant's improper intent does not necessarily preclude qualified immunity. Foy, 94 F.3d at 1533. . . . The facts in the record show lawful justifications for recommending Sherrod's termination. On May 16, 2002, Plaintiff received an unsatisfactory evaluation at Olympic Heights from Vice-Principal Christine Hall, with seven areas of concern. As a result, Sherrod was placed on a remedial teaching performance plan. While at Roosevelt Middle School, Crutchfield began to receive complaints from parents about excessive work assignments and deviations from the curriculum. Further, on one occasion, Crutchfield observed unsupervised students standing outside Sherrod's classroom. After consulting with Sherrod, Crutchfield gave him another unsatisfactory evaluation. Plaintiff failed to present any precedent, and the Court is aware of none, to suggest that a reasonable principal and superintendent armed with the knowledge they possessed, to include the unsatisfactory performance reviews, would know they could not recommend and/or adopt a recommendation to terminate Sherrod. Accordingly, Johnson and Crutchfield are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298, 1308, 1309 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Although the initial pepper spraying itself was not excessive force, this is not a case in which a jailer simply sprayed an inmate who had repeatedly failed to obey commands. Danley's complaint groups together the initial spraying and the subsequent twenty-minute confinement as a single instance of excessive force. Although less common than the direct application of force, subjecting a prisoner to special confinement that causes him to suffer increased effects of environmental conditions—here, the pepper spray lingering in the air and on him—can constitute excessive force. . . . Reading the complaint in the light most favorable to Danley, the pepper spray had its intended effect; it disabled Danley before the jailers pushed him back into the small cell. Given that he was disabled, there was no need for the jailers to continue using force after spraying him. The use of force in the form of extended confinement in the small, poorly ventilated, pepper spray filled cell, when there were other readily available alternatives, was excessive. . . . Having established a constitutional violation, the next step in the qualified immunity analysis usually is to determine whether the right was clearly established. . . . However, we have held that 'there is no room for qualified immunity ' in Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases because they require a subjective element that is ‘so extreme’ that no reasonable person could believe that his actions were lawful. . . As a result, we conclude that the district court did not err by denying the defendants’ motions to dismiss Danley’s excessive force claim on qualified immunity grounds.”).

Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1282-85 (11th Cir. 2008) (“If the trier of fact believed Rioux’s showing of pretext, and disbelieved Appellees’ proffered legitimate reason, then a violation of the Equal Protection Clause would be shown. The ‘other’ evidence from which a jury might infer discriminatory animus on the part of Rubin and COO Young, which we have summarized above, constitutes that showing by Rioux, at the summary judgment stage, of the violation of a constitutional right. The trial court below addressed the next step in the qualified immunity analysis by noting that there was no real dispute that the right to be free from employment discrimination was clearly established at the time of Rioux’s demotion. As a general principle, we can all agree with that statement. . . . However, the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity analysis asks the question ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . Rioux must demonstrate at this step in the qualified immunity analysis that a reasonable fire chief and a reasonable chief operating officer of a city would know that demoting a high-ranking, subordinate, discretionary officer in the factual circumstances presented here violated clearly established law. . . And it is this that he cannot show. . . . The events of May 2, 2004 are largely undisputed, and the results of the OPS and Law Department investigations confirmed that Rioux violated department rules. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Rioux, Appellees had adequate lawful reasons to support their decision to demote Rioux, and may have had improper race-based motives to take the challenged action as well. What Rioux has presented, then, is a ‘mixed-motives’ case, which is governed by the analysis set out in Foy. . . . Tracking the reasoning used in Foy to reverse the denial of summary judgment where qualified immunity was interposed as a defense, here no jury could find that it would have been unlawful for a fire chief and the city’s chief operating officer to do as Appellees did if they had lacked discriminatory intent. . . No jury could find that a reasonable fire chief and chief operating officer would never have demoted Rioux but for a discriminatory intent. . . The record here, as in Foy, undisputably establishes that Appellees were motivated at least in part by lawful justifications, supported by the independent investigations conducted by OPS and the Law Department, investigations which these two decisionmakers were not a part of and which there is no evidence they manipulated. . . . The Foy analytical framework was applied in Stanley to a mixed motives case, following the Supreme Court pronouncement in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). In Crawford-El, the Court rejected a rule that would have required a heightened burden of proof from plaintiffs in unconstitutional-motive cases. . . The Crawford-El decision did not address how courts should apply the objective reasonableness test after a plaintiff creates a jury question on improper motive, where improper motive is an element of the claim, as it is here. Stanley concluded that Foy was the correct approach and remained the law of this circuit. . . And so Stanley reiterated that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity only where ‘the record undisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.’ . . . Because pre-existing law did not provide fair warning to Appellees that demoting Rioux under these circumstances would violate clearly established federal law, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity If Rioux had presented his claims under the provisions of Title VII, he would be entitled to have his claims of discrimination heard by a jury. The result we reach here is compelled by the remedy Rioux chose, that is, section 1983 claims against individual decisionmakers rather than his employer, for which the law recognizes the right to qualified immunity. Again, because Rioux has not been able to present any evidence that Appellees' decisions were not motivated, at least in part, by lawful justifications, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

McMillan v. DeKalb County, Georgia, No. 05-17110, 2006 WL 3204829, at *2, *3 (11th Cir. Nov. 6, 2006) (not published) (“Drew misapprehends the analytical framework applicable to qualified immunity in mixed motive cases. The district court observed correctly that the right to be free from racial discrimination in the public workplace was a clearly established constitutional right of which a reasonable official would have known. The district court also recognized correctly that the payroll abuse attributed to Plaintiff could objectively justify Plaintiff’s termination. Qualified immunity was denied at this stage because the pretrial record failed to establish that Drew’s termination decision indisputably was actually motivated at least in part by the payroll incident. Drew takes issue with the district court’s conclusions on the evidentiary sufficiency of her lawful motives. We have jurisdiction to review evidentiary sufficiency issues when core qualified immunity issues also are raised. . . . Viewing the pre-trial record in the light most favorable to Plaintiff—as we and the district court are required to do—the record fails to show indisputably that Drew was motivated (at least in part) by the legitimate reason she proffered.”)

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1273, 1274 (11th Cir. 2005) (“[A]n official acts with deliberate indifference when he intentionally delays providing an inmate with access to medical treatment, knowing that the inmate has a life-threatening condition or an urgent medical condition that would be exacerbated by delay.’ . . . This general statement of law ordinarily does not preclude qualified immunity in cases involving a delay in medical treatment for a serious injury. The cases are highly fact-specific and involve an array of circumstances pertinent to just what kind of notice is imputed to a government official and to the constitutional adequacy of what was done to help and when. Most cases in which deliberate indifference is asserted are far from obvious violations of the Constitution. But the assumed circumstances here are stark and simple, and the decisional language from cases such as Lancaster obviously and clearly applies to these extreme circumstances: the officers knew Haggard was unconscious and not breathing and—for fourteen minutes—did nothing. They did not check Haggard’s breathing or pulse; they did not administer CPR; they did not summon medical help. Given these circumstances, we conclude that the Officers were fairly warned by our case law and that the Officers’ total failure to address Haggard’s medical need during the fourteen-minute period violated Haggard’s constitutional rights, which violation should have been obvious to any objectively reasonable correctional officer.”).

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1274, 1275 (11th Cir. 2005) (Edmondson, C.J., concurring) (“I concur in the judgment. And I concur in the opinion; I believe it accurately presents the current law of the Circuit. I write separately to say that I question whether the law of this Circuit on Eighth Amendment claims of excessive force is correct. Briefly stated, I am inclined to believe that the excessive-force tort created by the Eighth Amendment has an important objective element: The correctional officer's physical conduct (force) used must be objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. So, if the conduct (force) is not outside of the borders of objectively reasonable conduct given the circumstances, the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right would not be violated no matter what the particular officer's subjective state of mind might be. Put differently, the constitutional tort—I suspect—requires objectively unreasonable action (force) plus a subjective, bad faith motive or intent to cause unnecessary suffering. If the officer's act in applying force is objectively reasonable, no need would exist to consider state of mind. Because I am inclined to believe an Eighth Amendment violation based on excessive force requires objectively unreasonable force, I expect that the defense of qualified immunity can apply in cases based on Eighth Amendment excessive force claims. If the force used was not force that the preexisting law had clearly established to be unreasonable given the circumstances, the defendant correctional officer seemingly should be entitled to the defense of qualified immunity on that account. After all, qualified immunity is available in most constitutional torts, including other kinds of excessive force cases. Correctional officers are due considerable deference in how they deal with violent inmates. Our Circuit's law makes it too hard for correctional officers—who have a tough (at times, dangerous) job and are surrounded by hostile witnesses—to avoid suit and trial because our law focuses on the particular correctional officers' subjective motive or intent. I stress that I do not believe that the Supreme Court's decisions compel our Circuit's law to be as it seems to be now. The question I raise here was not briefed in this case. I am also uncertain that, if the Circuit's law operated in the way that I think is likely more correct, the result for this appeal would be different on the excessive force claim. Therefore, I see no point in elaborating or sharpening or finalizing my views at this time; it seems prudent to wait for a case where we have pertinent briefing and where the outcome would doubtlessly be impacted and then to test in that context the ideas advanced for consideration today. But I do hope that this Court and the Bar will keep the ideas that I have raised today under active review. In some cases, I am pretty sure the outcome would be affected if the law of excessive force under the Eighth Amendment was set out differently than we seem to do now, that is, if we took a tack giving real attention to an objective element (unreasonable force) as well as the subjective mental element.”).

Snow v. City of Citronelle, 420 F.3d 1262, 1270 (11th Cir. 2005) (“Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Snow, a jury could find that Chennault subjectively believed that there was a strong risk that Poiroux would attempt suicide and deliberately did not take any action to prevent her suicide. Those facts, if found by a jury, would establish a constitutional violation. Because, at the time of Poiroux's death, it was clearly established that an officer's deliberate indifference to the risk of serious harm to a detainee is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the district court erroneously granted summary judgment on Snow's claim against Chennault.”).

Carter v. Galloway, 352 F.3d 1346, 1350 n.10 (11th Cir. 2003) (“The district court also addressed Defendants' qualified immunity defense. Because Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim fails, Defendants have no need for qualified immunity. If Plaintiff has stated a good deliberate indifference claim, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the law was not clearly established in Plaintiff's favor.”)

Bogle v. McClure, 332 F.3d 1347, 1356 (11th Cir. 2003) (“Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Librarians, the record evidence does not undisputably indicate that Appellants were in fact motivated, at least in part, by objectively valid reasons. Therefore, Appellants were not entitled to qualified immunity under Foy.”).

Skritch v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1301 (11th Cir. 2002) (“In this Circuit, a defense of qualified immunity is not available in cases alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, because the use of force ‘maliciously and sadistically to cause harm’ is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. See Johnson v. Breeden, ___ F.3d ___ (11th Cir.2002). There is simply no room for a qualified immunity defense when the plaintiff alleges such a violation. Id. The only question, then, is whether the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment. If he has done so, that is the end of the inquiry.”).

Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321, 1322 (11th Cir. 2002) (“We are aware of Saucier v. Katz . . . but think that case is distinguishable, because it did not involve a constitutional tort with a subjective intent element. Instead, Saucier involved a Fourth Amendment claim of use of excessive force against an arrestee, and such claims are purely objective. They turn solely on the objective reasonableness of the amount of force used in the circumstances, regardless of the intent or other subjective state of mind of the defendant officer. . . It makes perfect sense to conclude, as the Supreme Court did in Saucier, that with such claims the merits issue and the qualified immunity issue are distinct, so that the existence of a valid Fourth Amendment excessive force claim is not inconsistent with qualified immunity. In other words, a defendant officer could use force in making an arrest that is later judged to be excessive enough that it violates the Fourth Amendment, but if prior decisions did not clearly establish that the use of that amount of force in those circumstances was constitutionally excessive, the defendant officer would be entitled to qualified immunity. That is what Saucier holds. It is different with claims arising from the infliction of excessive force on a prisoner in violation of the Eighth Amendment Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. In order to have a valid claim on the merits of excessive force in violation of that constitutional provision, the excessive force must have been sadistically and maliciously applied for the very purpose of causing harm. Equally important, it is clearly established that all infliction of excessive force on a prisoner sadistically and maliciously for the very purpose of causing harm and which does cause harm violates the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. So, where this type of constitutional violation is established there is no room for qualified immunity. It is not just that this constitutional tort involves a subjective element, it is that the subjective element required to establish it is so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. This is a different situation entirely from the one in Saucier, . . . where the Supreme Court said that, ‘neither respondent nor the Court of Appeals has identified any case demonstrating a clearly established rule prohibiting the officer from acting as he did, nor are we aware of any such rule.’”).

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1031 n.8 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (“In Hill v. DeKalb Regional Yourth Detention Center, 40 F.3d 1176, 1186 (11th Cir.1994), we see some dicta: ‘a finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity’. We reject that dicta because it incorrectly jumbles the merits of an Eighth Amendment violation with the separate concept of an immunity defense.”).

Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 & n.26 & n.29 (11th Cir. 2000) (“We conclude that Chadwick is due qualified immunity under Foy. A defendant is entitled to qualified immunity under the Foy rationale only where, among other things, the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations. . . . In this case—viewing the record in the light most favorable to Stanley, as we must at the summary judgment stage—we can say that the record undisputably establishes (a) that objectively valid reasons did exist for the step Chadwick took, and (b) that Chadwick was motivated, at least in part, by these lawful considerations. Thus, even at the summary judgment stage, we can say that this case is undisputably one of mixed motives. Therefore, Foy commands qualified immunity on mixed-motive grounds in this case. . . . Crawford-El did not separately propose its own analysis for unconstitutional-motive cases, much less reject the kind of analysis we used in Foy. And, because Foy is based on well-settled principles of summary judgment and qualified immunity, we think that the approach taken in Foy is consistent with the Supreme Court’s words and holding in Crawford-El. We, therefore, conclude that Foy remains the law of this Circuit. . . . We emphasize that it is not sufficient for Chadwick to establish that there exists a lawful basis for a reasonable police chief to have terminated Stanley. Rather, in order for the Foy analysis to apply, Chadwick himself must have been actually motivated, at least in part, by that lawful basis.”).

Macuba v. DeBoer, 193 F.3d 1316, 1321 n.8 (11th Cir. 1999) (“The parties devote significant space in their briefs to the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, . . . which rejected a requirement that a plaintiff in a § 1983 case produce clear and convincing proof of improper motive when motive is an essential element of the constitutional claim. The apparent disagreement between the parties is whether, after Crawford-El, a district court may consider a government official’s intent or motive in determining if the official is entitled to qualified immunity, when the claim is for First Amendment retaliation. We have not decided what effect, if any, Crawford-El has on our holdings, such as Mencer v. Hammonds, 134 F.3d 1066, 1070-71 (11th Cir.1998), and Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132-33 (11th Cir.1997), which concluded that a district court should consider, for qualified immunity purposes, evidence of improper motive, but only when motive is part of the constitutional claim. We decline to address this issue here because, even if Macuba has shown that appellants dislike him, he has not produced sufficient evidence to establish they caused him not to be hired.”).

Brown v. Cochran, 171 F.3d 1329, 1333 (11th Cir. 1999) (“The dispute lies in whether a reasonably objective trier of fact could find racial animus on Cochran’s part in light of all the facts. In other words, the issue is whether or not Brown has created a genuine issue of fact that Cochran acted out of racial animus and that Cochran’s proffered reason (Brown’s poor performance record) was merely a pretext for discrimination. After reviewing the record, we are persuaded that Brown has not created a genuine issue of fact in this regard, and that a trier of fact would find Cochran’s actions objectively reasonable. Therefore we conclude that Brown has failed to establish a deprivation of a constitutional right at all, and a fortiori has not established a violation of any clearly established constitutional right.”).

Johnson v. City of Ft. Lauderdale, 126 F.3d 1372, 1379-80 (11th Cir. 1997) (“The holding in Foy rested primarily on the existence of an indisputable and adequate lawful motive on the part of the social service employees such that reasonable officials would disagree as to the legality of their conduct in light of the Mt. Healthy and Arlington Hts. doctrines. Here, the transcripts of the disciplinary hearings against Johnson offer conclusive support for the defendants’ claimed adequate lawful motives for demoting and discharging Johnson. . . . Even assuming that the defendants acted with some discriminatory or retaliatory motives in demoting and discharging Johnson, the law did not clearly establish that a reasonable official faced with the same evidence of disobedience and deception should not have disciplined Johnson in the same manner. We therefore reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment on Johnson’s § 1981 and § 1983 claims. . . . We do not, however, reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment on Johnson’s § 1985(3) claim. . . . We have squarely held that qualified immunity is not available as a defense to a § 1985(3) claim, see Burrell v. Board of Trustees of Ga. Military College, . . . and are not swayed by the defendants’ argument that Burrell is no longer legally viable in light of Lassiter Lassiter does not undermine Burrell’s central rationale: that the narrow intent element of § 1985(3) erects a significant hurdle for § 1985(3) plaintiffs, thereby obviating the need for granting public officials qualified immunity with respect to a § 1985(3) claim.”).

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132 (11th Cir. 1997) (“Defendants are correct that there is generally no subjective component to qualified immunity analysis and that the test is based on objective legal reasonableness. . . . However. . . [w]here the official’s state of mind is an essential element of the underlying violation, the state of mind must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis or a plaintiff would almost never be able to prove that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity. We hold, as every Circuit that has considered this issue has held, that where subjective motive or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation the intent of the government actor is relevant. . . . Defendants argue that denial of qualified immunity here would be equivalent to the court’s holding that once an employee has engaged in First Amendment speech he may no longer be punished for valid reasons. This argument misses the point. An employee may still be punished for valid reasons. However, when the employee can establish a genuine issue of material fact that the true reason for the punishment was actually the speech, then the case must go to trial.”).

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1137 n.3 (11th Cir. 1997) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I note that our precedent is ambiguous regarding the correct analytical framework in a qualified-immunity context when intent is an element of the cause of action. Compare McMillian, 88 F.3d 1554, in which the court assumed, for purposes of qualified-immunity analysis, that the defendants possessed an intent to punish the plaintiff, regardless of possible evidence of a lawful motive on the part of the defendants, with Foy, 94 F.3d at 1534-35 ([W]hen an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field ... Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendants’ conduct—despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act—was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.’). There are other contexts in which the role of evidence of subjective intent of a state actor complicates the qualified-immunity question. Some courts have found, for instance, that a finding of a genuine issue of fact with respect to a defendant’s subjective intent necessarily precludes entitlement to qualified immunity when the claim advanced is deliberate indifference to medical needs under the Eighth Amendment. [citing cases] The claim of deliberate indifference obviously is not at issue in this case. An examination of this claim does serve to highlight, however, the unsettled state of the law as it pertains to the court’s basis for jurisdiction—as well as its analytical approach—in qualified-immunity cases when subjective intent is raised as a disputed predicate question of fact.”).

McMillian v. Johnson, 101 F.3d 1363, 1368-69 (11th Cir. 1996) (On Petition For Panel Rehearing and Suggestion of Rehearing en banc) (Propst, Senior District Judge, specially concurring) (“Since this case, unlike Jenkins and Wright, implicates subjective intent or motive, the issue remains as to how such intent claims are to be considered during the course of a qualified immunity analysis. . . . An issue is whether claims involving subjective intent are appropriate for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity if a legitimate motive is simply posited. I find it difficult to see how such cases can be determined at the summary judgment stage if there is any substantial evidence of an illegal motive in view of the established law which precludes a trial court’s making credibility determinations, weighing the evidence, and interfering with a jury’s drawing of legitimate inferences from the evidence. . . . I suggest that the qualified immunity issues cry out for further en banc consideration, especially as to the claims involving intent or motive as an element vis a vis those which do not.”).

Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1533-35 & n.9 (11th Cir. 1996) (“Our former decisions . . . must not be understood to rule out qualified immunity wherever discriminatory intent appears in the summary judgment record even if discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying constitutional tort. Qualified immunity is too important a right of public servants and too important a public policy to be nullified so easily. The Supreme Court has not instructed us to drop qualified immunity . . . from cases in which discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying tort. . . . So, whenever a public officer is sued for money damages in his individual capacity for violating federal law, the basic qualified immunity question looms unchanged: Could a reasonable officer have believed that what the defendant did might be lawful in the circumstances and in the light of the clearly established law? . . . [S]tate officials act lawfully despite having discriminatory intent, where the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent. [citing Mt. Healthy v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 286-87 (1979)] The Mt. Healthy doctrine is part of the law and, when the concept is presented by a defendant's argument, must not be overlooked in the qualified immunity analysis. . . . One trigger to the doctrine's application depends upon whether the record establishes that the defendant, in fact, did possess a substantial lawful motive for acting as he did act. At least when an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field even at the summary judgment stage. Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct—despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act—was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity. Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity. . . . Here the record, in fact, shows substantial lawful intent, while not ruling out some unlawful intent, too. Unlike McMillian and Ratliff (which involved pointed district court fact findings—that we did not review—about the intent of the defendants and in which the Mt. Healthy doctrine was not discussed), we are deciding the qualified immunity question based on circumstances which include indisputable and sufficient lawful motivations on the part of Defendants.”).

McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1566 (11th Cir. 1996) (“Like every other circuit that has considered the issue, we have held that intent or motivation may not be ignored when intent or motivation is an essential element of the underlying constitutional violation.” citing Edwards v. Wallace Community College, 49 F.3d 1517, 1524 (11th Cir.1995)).

Ratliff v. DeKalb County, Ga., 62 F.3d 338, 341 (11th Cir. 1995) (“In considering a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has held that courts should pay no attention to the subjective intent of the government actor. [citing Harlow] Harlow was intended to make a fundamental change in the law of immunity. And the strict meaning of the words used in Harlow for the immunity standard would protect public officials from personal liability when the pertinent substantive law makes the official's state of mind an essential element of the alleged constitutional violation. Despite Harlow's words, we have said that in one kind of qualified immunity case—where discriminatory intent is an element of the tort—intent remains relevant. [footnote and cites omitted] We are bound by our earlier holding that, in qualified immunity cases, intent is a relevant inquiry if discriminatory intent is a specific element of the constitutional tort; and, we follow that rule here.”).

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 (11th Cir. 1994) (“For qualified immunity purposes, the subjective motivation of the defendant-official is immaterial . . . Harlow's objective standard would be rendered meaningless if a plaintiff could overcome a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity by injecting the defendant's into the pleadings.”).

Wilhite v. Parker, No. 7:20-CV-00847-KOB, 2022 WL 3718502, at *3–4 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 29, 2022) (“At least one district court in this circuit has recently pointed out the significant tension between Skrtich’s bright-line rule and Supreme Court precedent on qualified immunity, which may call for a more fact-specific analysis of whether the particular type and extent force at issue has been ‘clearly established’ as unconstitutional. . . Judge Mizelle aptly notes that the Supreme Court has held that defendants in an excessive force case ‘may nevertheless be shielded from liability’ if they ‘did not violate clearly established [law].’ . . And Judge Mizelle also correctly observes that Skrtich’s rule ‘assumes that all Eighth Amendment excessive force cases are so similar that no court need ever consider whether the law is clearly established as applied to the particular facts,’ whereas ‘the Supreme Court has held that the clearly-established-law inquiry must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . This court adds that the Supreme Court has nevertheless rejected a requirement that facts be ‘fundamentally similar’ or even ‘materially similar’ to past cases for law to be clearly established, holding instead that ‘the salient question’ is whether existing law ‘gave [Defendants] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Plaintiff] was unconstitutional.’ . . This court shares the concerns that Judge Mizelle raises in Stalley but is bound by Skrtich’s bright-line rule and therefore applies it. As a result, ‘[t]he only question ... is whether the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment,’ . . . and the court now turns to that question.”)

Crowley v. Scott, No. 5:14-CV-326 (MTT), 2016 WL 2993174, at *7 (M.D. Ga. May 23, 2016) (“It is undisputed that Scott was acting within his discretionary authority, and the Court has concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Scott violated Crowley’s constitutional rights by using excessive force. Thus, Scott is entitled to qualified immunity only if the law was not clearly established that his conduct was unlawful. To overcome Scott’s qualified immunity defense, Crowley cites the former rule for Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases: a plaintiff can overcome the defense of qualified immunity simply by establishing the violation of his constitutional rights. . . This was the rule because ‘the subjective element required to establish [a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim was] so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violations occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.’ . . However, because the Supreme Court’s decision in Kingsley eliminated the subjective element in Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims, a plaintiff asserting the claim must establish a constitutional violation and that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . Scott argues ‘the law was not clearly established that the amount of forced used was excessive in response to the resistance [Crowley] offered in response to the directions Scott had given him.’ . . At the time of the events in this case, the law was clearly established that a handcuffed, non-resisting, and otherwise compliant person has a ‘right to be free from excessive force.’ . . Therefore, if a jury credits Crowley’s version that Scott used a leg sweep while Crowley was handcuffed, non-resistant, and otherwise not creating the disturbance that Scott described, then no reasonable officer in Scott’s position could have believed that Scott’s use of force was lawful. . . . Accordingly, Scott is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

V. DISCOVERY

In some cases, limited discovery may be needed on the qualified immunity issue to properly establish the contours of the right in question. A court may defer its decision on the immunity question, allow limited discovery to achieve the requisite factual development and decide the issue on summary judgment.

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), the Court noted:

Discovery involving public officials is indeed one of the evils that Harlow aimed to address, but neither that opinion nor subsequent decisions create an immunity from all discovery. Harlow sought to protect officials from the costs of ‘broad-reaching’ discovery. . . and we have since recognized that limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.

523 U.S. at 593 n.14.

But see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1953, 1954 (2009) (“We decline respondent’s invitation to relax the pleading requirements on the ground that the Court of Appeals promises petitioners minimally intrusive discovery. That promise provides especially cold comfort in this pleading context, where we are impelled to give real content to the concept of qualified immunity for high-level officials who must be neither deterred nor detracted from the vigorous performance of their duties. Because respondent’s complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise.”).

D.C. CIRCUIT

Hinojosa v. Livingston, No. 14-40459, 2015 WL 7422990, at *3-6, *9-11, *14 (5th Cir. Nov. 18, 2015) (“[T]o determine whether we have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal, we must determine whether the district court’s order complied with our precedent for issuing such orders. . . First, the district court must determine ‘that the plaintiff’s pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.’ . . . When reviewing a complaint that meets this standard, the district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if ‘the court remains “unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts.”’ . . . Such a discovery order must be ‘narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’ . . . We first ask whether the complaint pleads facts that, if true, would permit the inference that Defendants are liable under § 1983 for an Eighth Amendment violation and would overcome their qualified immunity defense. We conclude that it does. . . Here, the complaint alleges an Eighth Amendment violation. The complaint alleges that Defendants subjected Hinojosa to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like Hinojosa, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. . . . Prison officials cannot escape liability in a conditions-of-confinement case like this one by arguing that, while they allegedly were aware of and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to a discrete class of vulnerable inmates, they were not aware that the particular inmate involved in the case belonged to that class. . . . In sum, then, the complaint adequately alleges an Eighth Amendment violation based on Hinojosa's conditions of confinement. . . . Having determined that the complaint's factual allegations, if true, would establish Defendants' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and overcome a qualified immunity defense, we next ask whether further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the qualified immunity defense. We easily conclude that it was. When reviewing a well-pleaded complaint and a defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity, a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery when 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."' . . . In other words, a district court may elect the defer-and-discover approach 'when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question' that must be answered before a ruling can issue. . . . Here, the district court held that it was unable to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity claim because factual development was needed as to their 'knowledge, actions, omissions and/or policies in regards to TDCJ prison operations in times of extreme heat.' . . . The factual questions of what Defendants knew, when they knew it, and whether they investigated and considered possible remedial measures, are undoubtedly necessary to answer before determining whether Defendants acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. Of course, as detailed above, Defendants' knowledge is central to the deliberate indifference element of Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim. However, their knowledge is also highly relevant to qualified immunity, because it bears heavily on the reasonableness of their actions. . . . The reasonableness analysis must be different from the deliberate-indifference analysis, because '[o]therwise, a successful claim of qualified immunity in this context would require defendants to demonstrate that they prevail on the merits, thus rendering qualified immunity an empty doctrine.' . . . 'In light of these complexities, we have observed that "[a]dditional facts ... are particularly important when evaluating the [reasonableness] prong of the qualified immunity test.'" . . . That holds true in this case. The district court did not err in determining that factual development was needed to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . . Our foregoing discussion establishes that the district court was empowered to defer its qualified immunity ruling and issue a discovery order. However, the breadth of the ordered discovery is critically important. Qualified immunity is immunity not only from judgment, but also from suit We therefore must determine whether the discovery that the district court ordered was "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim." Id. (quoting Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08). While this presents a somewhat close question, we conclude that the district court's discovery order was appropriately tailored. . . . Because, as set forth above, the district court's order complies with our precedent, we DISMISS this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction. We express no opinion on how the district court should rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense.") assertion of qualified immunity, we now face a question similar to that determined by the Fifth Circuit in Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337 (5th Cir.2004): That is, given the function of qualified immunity in protecting government officials against not only civil liability, but the burden of litigation, did its assertion by the appellants require the district court to terminate the litigation at the motion stage without further resolution of the factual questions underlying the determination of the Pickering balance? Upon review of the record, we conclude as did the district court that it is not possible to determine at this stage as a matter of law that Navab-Safavi has not alleged a violation of clearly established law. . . .[W]here the interests underlying the Pickering balancing are as fact-dependent as those in this case, the district court appeared to correctly determine that this decision could not be made at the 12(b)(6) stage and should properly await some evidentiary development. We do not suggest that the determination can never be made on allegations—the relative weight of governmental interest and established constitutional rights on other facts may often be quite evident from the pleadings—but only that it cannot be done on the record before the court in this case.”)

FIRST CIRCUIT

Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. Doe, 51 F.4th 402, 409-18 & n.14 (1st Cir. 2022), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied (1st Cir. Dec. 2, 2022) (“[T]he [district] court denied summary judgment and authorized discovery on the theory that the proper focus was not just on the encounter itself but on the information possessed by the officers and their ‘plans, actions, observations, and means available to respond’ in the lead-up to the encounter. . . . The court also found that it could not ‘fairly rule’ on the qualified immunity defense because the facts were ‘insufficient to determine exactly what the particular conduct was.’ . . . The ‘clearly established’ prong itself comprises two inquiries. . . . The plaintiff must ‘identify either controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority sufficient to put an officer on notice that his conduct fell short of the constitutional norm.’ . . . The plaintiff must also ‘show that an objectively reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the law.’ . . . The plaintiff’s burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established is thus ‘a heavy burden indeed.’ . . . We hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity under each aspect of the ‘clearly established’ prong of the defense. First, we hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because the Estate has not identified any authority that would put the officers on notice that their actions were unlawful. Second, we hold independently that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable officer facing the same fraught situation as Doe 1 and Doe 2 would not have known that the challenged conduct violated the law. And the officers are entitled to qualified immunity whether the focus is on the thirty-second fatal encounter or the fatal encounter plus the officers’ actions in the hour beforehand. . . . The district court found that consideration of the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity defense was premature before discovery. . . . We deem this inconsistent with the Supreme Court’s command to ‘resolv[e] immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . Even where certain facts are disputed, courts must assess whether a plaintiff’s allegations -- or here, the Estate’s allegations as modified by the current undisputed evidence in the summary judgment record -- make out a claim sufficient to overcome qualified immunity before denying a motion for summary judgment and authorizing discovery. . . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the current record for the reasons we now discuss. . . . We hold first that the Estate has failed to meet its burden to identify controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority sufficient to put the officers on notice that their conduct violated the law. . . . While a case ‘directly on point’ is not required, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . And ‘specificity is “especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,” where it is “sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.”’. . . The Estate has not come close to meeting its burden of identifying controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority. The Estate did not advance any argument on this point, much less identify sufficiently analogous precedents. It did not do so despite the fact that the government pointed out this absence of argument both in the district court and in its opening briefs. The fact that the Estate cited -- in the district court, not in its appellate briefing -- to a single, twenty-one-year-old, out-of-circuit case does not satisfy its burden for a number of reasons beyond the obvious reason of waiver by the Estate. That case, Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (9th Cir. 2001), is insufficient as a matter of law to meet the Estate’s burden: it is neither controlling authority nor a ‘consensus’ of persuasive authority. . . . We hold independently that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because objectively reasonable officers in their position would not have understood their actions to violate the law. . . . We hold further that a reasonable officer in this situation would have understood Rahim to have a lethal knife in his hands. We also hold that a reasonable officer, on the undisputed facts, would have understood Rahim’s actions to show that he had every intention to use this knife to kill the officers and, if they were unsuccessful in stopping him, to kill other people. . . . [I]n the case before us the officers reasonably believed that Rahim was a terrorist suspect, that he was armed with a military-style knife and -- from an objective perspective based on intelligence -- intended to kill, and that he posed an imminent threat both to law enforcement and to members of the public. After the Task Force intercepted Rahim’s 5:18 a.m. call on the morning of June 2, 2015, the officers were operating under substantial time pressure to stop Rahim before he could board public transportation. When they approached him in the CVS parking lot shortly after 7:00 a.m., Rahim refused repeated commands to put his hands up. Instead, he advanced on the officers with something in his hands. The officers retreated across the length of the parking lot while repeatedly commanding Rahim to ‘drop it!’ Rahim refused and taunted them to drop their weapons. The officers did not fire until Rahim had refused at least nine total commands, was within twenty-five feet of the officers, and had backed them up against the edge of the parking lot. At this point, two officers made the split-second decision to fire. The entire encounter lasted around thirty seconds. Under these circumstances, an objectively reasonable officer would not have understood the challenged conduct to violate the law. . . . An objectively reasonable officer would have understood Rahim to be dangerous, armed with a military-style knife, and preparing to conduct a terrorist attack, an extremely serious crime. The encounter was precisely the sort of ‘tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving’ situation where officers are forced to make split-second decisions for their safety and the safety of others. . . . The officers gave clear and repeated warnings before employing deadly force, warnings which Rahim ignored. They did not fire until Rahim had advanced and was close enough to them to use a knife. And the fact that two officers simultaneously made the split-second decision to fire supports the objective reasonableness of their decision. The officers had a more-than-reasonable basis for believing Rahim was armed with a military-style knife both before and during the encounter. The officers also had a more-than-reasonable basis to believe that Rahim had left his apartment that morning with an intent to kill a ‘boy[] in blue’ and/or other people. There is no dispute Rahim said exactly those things. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity even if we consider their actions between learning of Rahim’s phone call to Wright at some point after 6:00 a.m. and approaching him in the CVS parking lot shortly after 7:00 a.m. The Estate suggests that, after learning that Rahim was an imminent threat, the officers should have apprehended him sooner and/or acquired a warrant. But the officers were operating under significant time pressure during this period, with at most an hour to develop a plan, call for backup, approach Rahim, and stop him from boarding public transportation. And the Estate’s only theory, that this pre-confrontation conduct may render the officers’ later actions unreasonable by bearing on their ‘intent’ in approaching Rahim, is not viable because the excessive-force inquiry is undertaken ‘without regard to [officers’] underlying intent or motivation.’. . . The Estate has not otherwise asserted a claim based on the officers’ conduct during this earlier period. And the Estate has pointed to no precedent, and we have found none, establishing that the officers’ pre-confrontation conduct violates clearly established law.¹⁴ [fn 14: We disagree with the district court’s interpretation of our precedents on the relevance of officers’ pre-seizure actions. We have not adopted the broad rule that officers have a duty to avoid creating situations which increase the risk that deadly force may be used. See Napier v. Town of Windham, 187 F.3d 177, 188 (1st Cir. 1999); St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 71 F.3d 20, 27 (1st Cir. 1995). And while we have recognized that pre-seizure conduct may be relevant in the reasonableness analysis, we have done so in cases where there is a much closer connection between such conduct and the ultimate seizure. Cf. Young v. City of Providence ex rel. Napolitano, 404 F.3d 4, 22 n.13 (1st Cir. 2005) (distinguishing Napier as ‘not hold[ing] that events immediately leading up to a shooting cannot be considered as part of the totality of the circumstances along with the precise instant surrounding a shooting’ (emphasis added)).] Nor has the Estate shown that an objectively reasonable officer in Doe 1 or Doe 2’s position would understand such conduct to violate the law. The officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.”)

Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. Doe, 51 F.4th 402, 418-24 (1st Cir. 2022) (Barron, C.J., dissenting), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied (1st Cir. Dec. 2, 2022) (“The officers who fatally shot Usaamah Abdullah Rahim seek summary judgment based on qualified immunity. They do so, however, even before the plaintiff, Rahim’s Estate, has had a chance to question them about what they knew at the time that they fired on Rahim. Thus, there is good reason to be concerned that the officers’ request is premature. To be sure, the Estate appears to accept that the record is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers had been reliably informed by the time that they confronted Rahim that a suspect matching his description was on the loose who had threatened to behead someone and was ‘armed with a knife.’ The Estate also appears to accept that the record is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers, upon confronting Rahim, commanded that he drop whatever he may have had in his hands and that he refused to comply.

But, to me, the key question is whether the record also is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers had information at the time that they fired on Rahim that reasonably led them to think that he was advancing toward them while holding in hand what they thought was a deadly weapon or that in so advancing he was at least reaching for one. For, if the record in even its present undeveloped state is also conclusive in that respect, then the officers are entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity, even accepting the District Court's determination that the Estate's questioning of the officers might produce testimony that would give rise to a factual dispute about whether they could have taken steps to defuse the situation. . . I reach that conclusion because, in that event, the summary judgment record conclusively would show that the officers were faced with a split-second decision about how best to address the immediate threat that Rahim posed when they fired on him. And, it would then follow, the Estate would not be able to show that the officers' use of force to subdue Rahim violated clearly established law, notwithstanding that the Estate might be able to show through questioning of the officers that they could have done things to prevent that climactic moment from occurring. . . The Estate contends, however, that the record is not clear in conclusively establishing that the officers reasonably thought that Rahim was holding in hand or reaching for a deadly weapon when they fired on him. And, I agree with the Estate on that score. Thus, I conclude that the summary judgment record -- at least in its present state -- permits a reasonable juror to find that the officers' use of deadly force against Rahim was excessive under clearly established law. . . To conclude otherwise, the majority first relies on the Estate's alleged failure to 'meet[] its burden' to identify 'sufficiently analogous precedents' to show that the use of deadly force against Rahim violated clearly established law. But, a plaintiff seeking to overcome a defense of qualified immunity need not identify an identical case to fend off that defense, . . . and, when prompted below, the Estate offered authority to show that the use of deadly force by the officers would have been excessive if in using such force they did not understand Rahim to have had a deadly weapon in hand or to have been reaching for one[.] . . The majority does not identify a single case that indicates otherwise. . . . The majority may mean to be arguing that the Estate did not identify precedent to show that the officers' conduct would have violated clearly established law insofar as the officers did reasonably believe that Rahim was holding a knife in his hand at the key moment. But, that contention depends on an underlying contention about what the present state of the undeveloped record conclusively shows, which turns out to be the basis for the majority's second rationale for ruling as it does. I thus now turn to that rationale. . . In this second rationale, the majority asserts that 'it is not plausible that any of the officers will probably testify in a deposition that Rahim was unarmed.' . . This assertion does not help the majority if by 'unarmed' the majority is agreeing with the Estate that the record at present conclusively shows that Rahim had a weapon on his person, though not in his hand, and that he was not reaching for that weapon. As I have just explained, the use of deadly force against Rahim by officers who did not think that he was holding a deadly weapon or reaching for one when they fired on him would be excessive under clearly established law. But, the majority may mean to be contending that it is not plausible that the officers 'probably' would provide testimony that could give rise to a genuine issue of disputed fact about whether Rahim was holding a knife in his hand when the officers shot him, such that we must treat the present record as if it conclusively establishes that the officers did reasonably think that Rahim had such a weapon in hand at that key moment. Here, too, though, I am not persuaded. There is literally nothing in the record on appeal that purports to state the officers' own views on that matter, and we must construe the record as it comes to us in the light most favorable to the Estate, because the Estate is the non-moving party. . . In addition, qualified immunity does not protect those who are asserting it from discovery about the information that they in fact 'possessed at the time of [their] allegedly unlawful conduct' if their possession of that information would bear on whether the immunity applies. . . The majority does point to an account of what the officers say they saw in Rahim's hand that the officers themselves offered in affidavits. But, the District Court excluded that account from consideration of the motion for summary judgment precisely because the Estate had not been given a chance to test that account through adversarial questioning. . . and the government, in appealing the District Court's denial of the motion, does not challenge that aspect of the District Court's summary judgment ruling. That appellate waiver aside, it also is not evident that we have jurisdiction to consider the officers' untested account in resolving this interlocutory appeal. After all, we must decide this appeal by taking as given the facts on which the District Court relied. . . Finally, we cannot predict how the officers would be likely to testify if questioned by the party suing them by choosing to credit their as-yet-untested account. Our adversarial system does not permit us to rely on such a say-so understanding of how truth is best discovered. Accordingly, I can see no basis for concluding that it is probable that no evidence would emerge during discovery that would permit a reasonable juror to find that the officers thought that, as Rahim moved towards them, he neither had a deadly weapon in hand nor was reaching for one that was on his person. Indeed, the officers themselves -- once subjected to adversarial questioning -- could provide testimony that would provide support for just such a finding. I should add that no precedent is to the contrary to my conclusion in this regard. . . . [N]o case supports effectively preventing a plaintiff from questioning a defendant about facts critical to the determination of whether qualified immunity is warranted. . . . The majority's final rationale is that the Estate has 'conceded' that the officers '[went] into the encounter' with a reasonable belief 'that Rahim was armed and planned to carry out an imminent attack.' If the majority means to suggest only that the Estate has conceded that the officers had been reliably informed that Rahim had threatened to kill someone and was armed with a knife (in the sense of having one on his person) that day, then I cannot disagree. But, that concession would not on its own permit us to reverse the District Court and order that it grant summary judgment based on qualified immunity to the officers. The record as it presently stands still would not conclusively establish in that circumstance that at the moment that the officers chose to use deadly force against Rahim they reasonably thought that he was holding or reaching for a deadly weapon. Perhaps, then, the majority means that the Estate conceded -- either below or on appeal -- that the officers did have information that reasonably led to them to hold the belief that Rahim had a knife or other deadly weapon in his hand (or even that he was reaching for one) when they shot him. But I can find no support in the record for our concluding that the Estate has made a concession of that kind. True, the Estate's counsel did contend below that his client could survive summary judgment even if that was what the officers thought about what Rahim had in his hand at the key moment. But, the Estate's counsel also repeatedly argued in the alternative that further discovery could produce facts that would call into question whether the officers 'believ[ed] [that Rahim] had a knife' and whether that alleged belief was 'reasonable.' Indeed, as the majority acknowledges, the Estate filed a Rule 56(d) affidavit seeking an opportunity to pursue such discovery. And, the Estate argues on appeal that it ‘disputes all of the[] facts’ about the incident as presented by the officers, and that, ‘[b]ecause there has been no discovery ... [the Estate] has not been able to interview or take depositions of any of the officers ... [or] any of the civilian witnesses ... some of whose accounts differ from those of the officers.’. Qualified immunity prevents many claims of excessive force from succeeding precisely because of the in-the-moment nature of the judgment that officers attempting to subdue suspects must make. It does not permit courts to credit, though, the untested accounts that defendants accused of excessive force offer when the plaintiff has been denied any chance to test those accounts. The Estate pressed below and is pressing to us the argument that summary judgment must be denied to the officers because the Estate has not yet had a chance to test their account of just how much of a threat Rahim posed at the key moment. I am convinced that it is plausible that such testing would reveal a genuine factual dispute about whether the officers thought Rahim had a weapon in hand (or was reaching for one) during their deadly encounter with him. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the majority’s decision to reverse the District Court’s denial of the officers’ motion for summary judgment.”)

Irish v. State of Maine (Irish I), 849 F.3d 521, 523-29 (1st Cir. 2017) (“As to qualified immunity, we recognize the Supreme Court’s admonitions that it is ‘an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability,’ and should thus be decided early in litigation. . . But we are reluctant to make law in the absence of more facts. We thus send the case back to the district court for some development of facts material to those issues. We vacate the district court’s ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions that the parties be permitted to conduct discovery on relevant facts. The discovery should include facts on whether there was any departure from established police protocol or training on, inter alia, the manner in which the police should notify the accused of allegations filed against him or her; what exactly the State Police officers knew about the risk that Lord posed to Irish and when exactly they knew it; and what message they left for Lord. Whether or not the officers followed proper procedure and how much they knew about the attendant risks of leaving a casual voice message, in turn, may bear on the questions of whether Irish has a due process claim that can withstand a 12(b)(6) motion and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .At least eight sister circuits have recognized the existence of the state-created danger theory. . . While this circuit has discussed the possible existence of the state-created danger theory, we have never found it applicable to any specific set of facts. In addition to alleging a sufficient state-created danger, the plaintiff must meet ‘a further and onerous requirement’ to prove a substantive due process violation: “ ‘The state actions must shock the conscience of the court.’. . To meet this standard, the state actions must be ‘so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.’. . Although the circumstances of each case impact whether the state action at issue meets this standard, ‘where actors have an opportunity to reflect and make reasoned and rational decisions, deliberately indifferent behavior may suffice.’. . Finally, we ‘may elect first to address whether the governmental action at issue is sufficiently conscience shocking’ before considering the state-created danger element. . . In our view, the bare-bones nature of the complaint and the record at this early stage of litigation makes vacating the appropriate course. To be sure, our concern is not that the State Police sought to interview Lord for ‘his side of the story.’ Nor is our concern that they identified Irish as the complainant. After all, even had they not identified her by name, her identity might have been clear to Lord, given the one-on-one nature of the crime of rape. What we do question, however, is whether there are standard police protocols that were violated when the officers decided not to be present when they alerted Lord to Irish’s allegations but instead opted to leave Lord a voice message on his phone -- notwithstanding Irish’s specific warning that such notification would ‘incite Lord to terrible violence.’ Assuming the voice message was left on Lord’s cell phone, it is likely that he received immediate notification and was left free to immediately do violence. And given the timeline presented in Irish’s complaint, the police had apparently not taken any prior steps to evaluate Irish’s allegations or Lord’s propensity for violence before leaving him the voice message. Or if they did, the actions are not documented in the record. Neither party at oral argument could provide any detail on acceptable police procedures or training, if any, on how and when to notify the accused of the allegations that have been filed against him or her under similar circumstances. Our developing caselaw in this area helps explain why we pause. . . . [B]ased on this record, we do not know the steps, if any, that officers should take when they have reason to believe that an alleged perpetrator is violent and is likely to retaliate against a victim who reports such serious crimes. And as Stamps and Marrero-Rodríguez illustrate, violation of protocol and training is relevant both to the substantive due process and qualified immunity inquiries. Beyond the dearth of facts on police procedure and training, the record also offers no facts on exactly what the officers knew about the veracity of the allegations that Irish had made, about Lord’s propensity for violence, and about the risk that Lord would act on that propensity to harm Irish. . . . If discovery reveals that the officers’ actions violated accepted norms of police procedure or that they acted despite foreseeing the harm to Irish, it may strengthen the plaintiffs’ argument that the officers exacerbated the danger that Lord posed. It may also directly speak to whether the officers acted in deliberate indifference to Irish’s safety, so much so that their conduct shocks the conscience. By contrast, if discovery reveals that no protocols were violated, then the plaintiffs may have a harder time surviving a 12(b)(6) motion. While the fact that the officers did not take further discretionary steps to ensure Irish’s safety may amount to negligence, mere negligence would be insufficient to maintain a claim of substantive due process violation. . . . Similarly, if no or few protocols were violated, then the officers’ chance of successfully asserting qualified immunity may increase, as a reasonable officer may not have known that acting in line with their own standard procedures and training would violate a private citizen’s constitutional rights. . . . But we cannot reach any of these conclusions without a fuller development of the facts. We vacate the district court’s ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions for discovery not inconsistent with this opinion.”) Hegarty v. Somerset County, 25 F.3d 17, 18 (1st Cir. 1994) (“On May 9, 1994, we entered an order granting the officers’ emergency request to stay district court discovery pending their appeal of the denial of qualified immunity. The request was granted ‘pending further order of this court.’ We now elaborate the basis for our May 9 order and extend the stay of discovery pending our determination of these appeals. A qualified immunity defense is an immunity from suit and the rationale for allowing an immediate appeal from the denial of qualified immunity is that the immunity from suit is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial ... The immunity from suit includes protection from the burdens of discovery. ‘Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.’... We recognize that Harlow’s reference to staying discovery was in the context of the district court’s resolution of the immunity question. But in light of the Court’s later determination that a denial of qualified immunity is entitled to immediate appellate review, . . . we believe that the stay of discovery, of necessity, ordinarily must carry over through the appellate court’s resolution of that question, so long as the appeal is non-frivolous. The rationale for staying discovery applies with no less force while the appeal, to which the officers are entitled, proceeds. It is important to note what is not involved here. As the officers concede, the district court, prior to its ruling on the issue of qualified immunity, properly ordered some discovery limited to that issue What the district court thereafter authorized, and what we have stayed pending these appeals, is more extensive discovery directed at the merits of the case.”).

Drewniak v. U.S. Customs & Border Protection, No. 20-CV-852-LM, 2021 WL 260399, at *2–4 (D.N.H. Jan. 26, 2021) (“First, the court notes that mere invocation of qualified immunity does not necessitate a stay regardless of the contours in which the defense is raised. To the contrary, although qualified immunity seeks to ‘protect officials from the costs of “broad-reaching” discovery ... limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve’ the qualified immunity issue. . . Here, Qualter does not explain why a stay is necessary in light of the precise qualified immunity defense he raises; he merely argues that, because he has raised qualified immunity, the proceedings must be stayed. . . Second, Drewniak’s complaint states both a claim for damages against Qualter in his individual capacity and a claim for injunctive and declaratory relief against Garcia and CBP. Neither Garcia—sued in his official capacity alone—nor CBP are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Most courts confronting cases raising both individual and official capacity claims have denied broad requests to stay all discovery on the basis that the individual capacity claim may be subject to qualified immunity. . . Indeed, the First Circuit has acknowledged the ‘powerful policy reasons why discovery should not be halted’ upon invocation of qualified immunity when a plaintiff pursues both equitable and monetary relief. . . Furthermore, when a plaintiff brings both monetary and equitable claims, any benefit from staying discovery ‘would be totally illusory, because in most cases the scope of discovery as to the injunctive claim is practically the same as that involved in proving damages.’. . Third, even when a qualified immunity defense is raised as to an individual capacity claim, limited discovery may still be permissible as to that claim. . . That is especially true when the immunity is raised in a motion for summary judgment. . . Here, Qualter seeks both dismissal of the complaint as well as summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . In support of his motion for summary judgment, he has provided a statement of material facts supported by ‘declarations’ from himself and Garcia. . . Qualter argues that he is entitled to summary judgment because he reasonably believed that immigration enforcement was the primary purpose of the traffic checkpoint where Drewniak was stopped. Specifically, he states that he ‘knew that the operations plan for this checkpoint underwent legal sufficiency review by the Office of the Assistant Chief Counsel’ and that the checkpoint had been ‘approved by ... [U.S. Border Patrol] Headquarters.’. . It would be unfair to allow Qualter to argue that he reasonably relied on the legal opinion of others without giving Drewniak the opportunity to explore the opinions he claims to have relied on. . . For these reasons, Qualter's invocation of qualified immunity does not warrant the broad stay requested. . . However, the court recognizes that, in order to preserve the effectiveness of Qualter's qualified immunity defense, Qualter may seek a protective order if Drewniak engages 'in any discovery that [is] oppressive, unnecessary or disruptive of' his functions as a public official.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Castro v. United States, 34 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1994) ("Where the claimant's description of the events suggests that the defendants' conduct was unreasonable, and the facts that the defendants claim are dispositive are solely within the knowledge of the defendants and their collaborators, summary judgment can rarely be granted without allowing the plaintiff an opportunity for discovery as to the questions bearing on the defendants' claims of immunity.").

Golio v. City of White Plains, No. 06 CIV. 1691 CM/GAY, 2006 WL 3199140, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2006) ("In short, this is the rare case in which the fact record needs to be more fully developed before the court can rule on the question of qualified immunity in the context of the false arrest claim against Officer Suggs. The motion is denied with leave to renew, either at the close of discovery or at trial.").

Burns v. Citarella, 443 F.Supp.2d 464, 468, 469 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("Plaintiff claims that she is unable to fully and effectively oppose defendants' motion for summary judgment in the absence of discovery—in particular, the opportunity to depose the individual defendants. Accordingly, plaintiff asserts that the present motion should be either stayed until discovery is completed or treated as a Rule 12 motion to dismiss. The court rejects this contention. . . . In keeping with the Supreme Court's observation that, in deciding the issue of qualified immunity, the court must assume plaintiff's version of the facts to be true (rendering defendants' story irrelevant), . . . this Court's Individual Practice Rules require that any defendant claiming qualified immunity (1) file a pro forma motion for summary judgment on that sole ground with his answer; (2) depose the plaintiff and file papers in support of the motion within thirty days thereafter; and (3) obtain a decision on the motion before conducting any further discovery. . . Granting plaintiff discovery about defendants' version of events before deciding the motion is not consistent with the goal of 'resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation,' by assuming plaintiff's version of the facts to be true.")

Elmaghraby v. Ashcroft, No. 04 CV 1409 JG SMG, 2005 WL 2375202, at *13, *21 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 27, 2005) ("In sum, Crawford-El, Swierkewicz, and McKenna suggest the following principles when evaluating qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage: (1) a complaint must meet Rule 8(a)'s requirements: fair notice of the claims asserted and the grounds upon which they rest; (2) the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged in the complaint, including those that defeat the immunity defense; (3) where there is a factual dispute bearing on the qualified immunity question, that dispute should be resolved at the earliest opportunity; and (4) to resolve such a dispute, it may be appropriate to limit discovery in scope (to issues that bear on the qualified immunity defense) and manner. . . . The issue of qualified immunity should be addressed at the earliest appropriate stage. Where, as here, there are factual disputes that bear on the availability of the defense, discovery may be structured accordingly. . . . The personal involvement, if any, of the non-MDC defendants should be the subject of the initial stage of discovery. Accordingly, discovery concerning Ashcroft, the FBI Defendants (Mueller, Maxwell, and Rolince), and the BOP Defendants (Sawyer, Cooksey, and Rardin) will be generally limited to inquiries into their involvement in the alleged denials of due process. Appropriate topics will include whether the individual defendant participated in the creation and implementation of the policy or policies under which plaintiffs were detained, whether he or she had knowledge of the conditions under which plaintiffs were detained, and the defendant's involvement in or knowledge of the clearance process and the alleged bypassing of BOP procedures for challenging administrative segregation of pretrial detainees.”).

Torres v. Village of Sleepy Hollow, 379 F.Supp.2d 478, 484 n. 4 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (“Under this Court’s rules, the plaintiff is deposed before a rule 12(c) motion on qualified immunity grounds is made, so that the plaintiff’s complete story—not just the minimal allegations required of a pleader under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8—is before the Court. No other discovery (including depositions of the defendants) is permitted prior to the determination of the qualified immunity motion, however, because none would be relevant at the commencement of the lawsuit, when the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit require this issue to be decided.”)

Williams v. County of Sullivan, 157 F.R.D. 6, 9 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (“Neither the reasonableness of ... the defendants’ conduct in light of information available to them nor the liability of each defendant can be resolved until all material issues of fact pertaining to these matters have been fleshed out. [cite omitted] A stay of all discovery under such circumstances is inconsistent with expeditious adjudication of the issue of qualified immunity Discovery dealing with the most obviously pertinent sources of information can be permitted to proceed initially, holding in abeyance questions regarding controverted further discovery until the results of initial discovery are known.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

P.F. v. Mendres, 21 F. Supp.2d 476, 483, 484 (D.N.J. 1998) (“We do not perceive our conclusion to be inconsistent with the Supreme Court’s mandate that the immunity issue be resolved at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. The Court’s opinion in Crawford-El indicates approval of the possibility that limited discovery may be necessary where the underlying substantive legal theory requires the Court to engage in some factual analysis to determine whether the defendant’s conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . In light of our conclusion that we cannot resolve the immunity issue at this juncture, we must next address how this particular litigation should proceed. The Supreme Court’s opinion in Crawford-El teaches that we may tailor discovery narrowly and dictate the sequence of discovery so as to protect the defendant’s immunity defense. . . . We must make it clear that this initial discovery phase is limited only to gathering information which bears upon our qualified immunity inquiry. In the context of this case, the initial discovery will be limited to gathering information pertaining to the inquiry that we must undertake in determining if defendant’s conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation of the plaintiffs’ right to privacy. . . [O]nce this information is gathered, defendant may file a motion for summary judgment which raises the immunity defense again in light of the factual development gained through this initial discovery phase. Accordingly, we will deny the motion to dismiss without prejudice to the defendant’s right to assert a qualified immunity defense in a properly supported motion for summary judgment.”).

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Boyle v. Azzari, 107 F.4th 298, 304 (4th Cir. 2024) (“[T]he district court erred in denying Boyle’s motion for discovery because it was on notice that Boyle did not have an opportunity to obtain evidence necessary to oppose Azzari’s motion for summary judgment. It also erred in concluding that the autopsy report could not create a triable issue of fact. To the contrary, discovery of evidence regarding Ham’s position, state, and distance from Azzari at the time Azzari fired the fatal shots could create a material dispute of fact regarding whether Azzari reasonably used force at that time. Given that reality, the district court’s assessment of Azzari’s pre-discovery summary judgment motion based on the underdeveloped record available to it was premature. Accordingly, we reverse the court’s denial of Boyle’s Rule 56(d) motion, vacate its grant of Azzari’s summary judgment motion, and remand the case for additional proceedings.”)

Boyle v. Azzari, 107 F.4th 298, 304-08 (4th Cir. 2024)(Faber, D.J., dissenting) (“In this excessive force case, the majority holds that the district court abused its discretion in denying Boyle’s Rule 56(d) motion for discovery. Because I believe the undisputed material facts in the record establish Azzari’s entitlement to qualified immunity, I would deny the motion for discovery and affirm the decision of the district court. . . . The Supreme Court has ‘emphasized that qualified immunity questions should be resolved at the earliest possible stage of litigation’ given that the immunity exists ‘to protect public officials from the broad-ranging discovery that can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.’ . . . Therefore, this court has instructed lower courts to ‘give a qualified immunity defense at the dismissal stage of litigation a hard look [or] it risks unwittingly the forfeiture of some protections afforded by that defense.’ . . . ‘It is therefore incumbent on the courts to review the immunity defense critically at an early stage of the proceedings to determine the legal questions of whether the plaintiff has asserted a violation of a constitutional right and, if so, whether the constitutional right allegedly violated was clearly established at the time the defendant acted.’ . . . To be sure, there is a dispute as to whether Ham ever stood before the second round of shots was fired. But there is no dispute he was trying to stand and brandishing a knife as he did so. And the district court accepted Boyle’s allegation regarding the distance between Ham and Azzari when the later shots were fired. The court concluded that these disputes were not material. I agree.

. . . Neither Ham's autopsy report nor the other discovery Boyle sought will change the following undisputed facts: (1) that Ham pointed what appeared to be a gun at Azzari; (2) after being shot, Ham dropped to his knees and pulled a knife; (3) that he refused to drop the knife; and (4) attempted to move toward Azzari from approximately 15 to 20 feet. Both Azzari and Mills agreed that Ham was attempting to stand. . . Finally, this is not a case where Boyle is necessarily entitled to discovery because Ham was fatally shot. . . While a court must 'be careful at summary judgment to avoid simply accepting an officer's self-serving statements and must consider all contradictory evidence[,] it need not 'be especially critical of officer testimony' in deadly force cases. . . The district court did not rely solely on Azzari's accounts of what transpired. In addition to the Azzari statements, there was also the statement of an eyewitness (Michelle Mills) and photographs, including one showing the knife found near Ham's body. Both Mills and the photographs largely corroborate Azzari. . . For these reasons, I find no abuse of discretion in the district court's decision to deny Boyle's request for discovery. . . . [E]ven if Azzari had violated Ham's Fourth Amendment rights when he fired the second round of shots, that right was not clearly established at the time of the shooting. No one has identified a case that would inform Azzari that firing the second round of shots in the circumstances presented violated clearly established law. . . This is not a case where Ham merely possessed a weapon. Therefore, Boyle cannot rely on the line of cases holding that 'mere possession' of a weapon does not justify the use of deadly force.")

Raynor v. Pugh, 817 F.3d 123, 130 n.5 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Raynor also argues that the district court erred in denying him any discovery. Generally, a court should not grant summary judgment when, as here, outstanding discovery requests on material issues exist. See Ingle ex rel. Estate of Ingle v. Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 196–97 (4th Cir.2006). The district court stayed Raynor's discovery requests pending resolution of Pugh's qualified immunity defense, in accord with Crawford–El v. Britton. See 523 U.S. 574, 598, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). But, without ruling on the (meritless at this stage) qualified immunity claim, the court granted summary judgment on evidentiary grounds, faulting Raynor for 'not provid[ing] any evidence, other than his own affidavit, to support his allegations.' In so doing, the court erred. On remand the district court should permit appropriate discovery before entertaining any additional motions for summary judgment.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 389 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Based on Mr. Tobey's complaint, it is unclear whether Appellants' behavior was reasonably motivated by Mr. Tobey's 'disruptive' conduct or unreasonably motivated by his protected protest. What is reasonable in this context, therefore, requires greater factual development and is better decided once discovery has been conducted. See Martin, 980 F.2d at 952; DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir.1995) ("[W]here there is a material dispute over what the defendant did ... it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery .").")

McMillian v. Wake County Sheriff's Dept., No. 10-1576, 2010 WL 4366478, at *3, *4 (4th Cir. Oct. 28, 2010) (unpublished) ("McMillian has consistently asserted that, after he was handcuffed and subdued, Defendants knocked him to the ground, repeatedly struck him, and kned him in the head, causing his eye to bleed and injury to his neck. In granting summary judgment to Defendants, the district court accepted Defendants' assertions that they handcuffed McMillian due to his disruptive conduct, and that their use of force was limited to accomplishing that objective. Neither the magistrate judge nor the district court squarely addressed McMillian's allegation that the complained-of use of force occurred after he was handcuffed. Accepting McMillian's allegations and evidence as true, as we must at this procedural juncture, see Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 524 n. 1 (4th Cir.2003), we conclude the district court erred in finding there was no issue of material fact as to the need for the use of force and the extent of force Defendants used. Crediting McMillian's version of the events, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that knocking down, punching, and kicking an arrestee while he is in handcuffs are actions taken in good faith to restore order. . . . Adjudication of this issue is complicated by the fact that the district court denied McMillian's repeated requests for discovery of any videotapes and photographs from the night in question. We review the denial of a request for discovery for an abuse of discretion. . . . McMillian has steadfastly maintained that the jail's surveillance cameras captured the events at issue. The court denied McMillian's request for discovery of any such evidence, finding it was not relevant to Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. We disagree. In evaluating whether a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity, the district court must assess whether there was a constitutional violation. . . . Certainly, evidence that would have confirmed (or dispelled) McMillian's allegations pertaining to the events that form the subject of this lawsuit is highly probative of that issue. . . . Because we conclude the denial of McMillian's discovery requests substantially prejudiced him, we hold the district court abused its discretion in denying these requests. For these reasons, we conclude the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity was premature, particularly in light of the erroneous evidentiary ruling. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's order granting Defendants summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.") Ingle v. Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 195, 196 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In holding that the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity, the district court relied almost exclusively on the officers' assertions that Christopher aimed his weapon at them. Ingle, of course, has no way to directly contradict the officers' statements. Because this is a deadly force case, 'the witness most likely to contradict [the officers'] story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.' . . . In such circumstances, 'a court must undertake a fairly critical assessment of the forensic evidence, the officer's original reports or statements and the opinions of experts to decide whether the officer's testimony could reasonably be rejected at a trial.' . . . Given the facts of this case, the district court could not conduct a thorough assessment of the officers' statements without allowing discovery as to whether videotapes exist and, if so, what they depict. Ingle presented compelling reasons to allow the requested discovery. She alleged that the officers' account—that the decedent aimed the gun at them through the open window of the truck—conflicts with the physical evidence suggesting that the window was closed when the officers shot it out. She even submitted an expert affidavit concluding that the 'shards of glass visible around the entire perimeter of the driver's side window' constitute 'proof that the driver's window was broken when the window was in a complete rolled-up position.' The State Bureau of Investigation echoed that view in its report on the incident, noting that the window was 'in an upward position' when it was shot out. Moreover, Ingle presented a plausible argument that such videotapes may actually exist. She asserted, and defendants' counsel confirmed at oral argument, that the APD instituted a policy of installing cameras in its vehicles in April 2001, several months before the shooting. While it may be that at the time of the shooting no cameras had yet been installed or were operative in any of the six APD vehicles at the scene, or the three additional APD vehicles located along Holiday Inn Drive, this policy clearly distinguishes Ingle's Rule 56(f) motion from cases where 'the evidence sought was almost certainly nonexistent or was the object of pure speculation.'").

Ingle v. Yelton, 2008 WL 398327, at *3 (4th Cir. Feb. 14, 2008) ("[T]he defendants and APD provided numerous affidavits, depositions, and evidence of two thorough investigations. All evidence confirmed that the APD had not produced a videotape and did not possess one. We cannot conclude that the district court abused its discretion in limiting discovery at this point and denying Ingle's motion to compel.")

DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir. 1995) ("A district court may deny a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and allow discovery to proceed only if it has addressed the threshold immunity question, and concluded (1) that the plaintiff alleged a violation of a clearly established right, but (2) that there existed a material factual dispute over what actually occurred, and (3) under the defendant's version, a reasonable official could have believed that his conduct was lawful. In instances where there is a material dispute over what the defendant did, and under the plaintiff's version of the events the defendant would have, but under the defendant's version he would not have, violated clearly established law, it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery. In such circumstances, it simply may be impossible to protect the defendant from all of the burdens that attend the pretrial process. Of course, after discovery and upon a proper motion, the district court may reconsider the question of qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Montgomery County Board of Education, No. CV 21-0356 PJM, 2021 WL 6072813, at *16-17 (D. Md. Dec. 23, 2021) ("Defendants have asked the Court to stay the issuance of a scheduling order in the entire case, pending resolution of their Motion to Dismiss Counts VIII through X. . . Defendants do so, suggesting that, if the Court denies dismissal of the § 1983 Counts against them on qualified immunity (which the Court has done), Defendants may immediately note an appeal to the Fourth Circuit under the collateral order doctrine. . . Defendants suggest that if, on appeal, the Fourth Circuit determines that Defendants Crouse and Sullivan are in fact entitled to qualified immunity, it is highly likely that the extent of discovery in the case would be less. Additionally, say Defendants, a stay of discovery would facilitate opportunities to engage in meaningful settlement negotiations. . . Plaintiffs oppose a stay of discovery and accuse the Defendants of using all means at hand to delay the litigation. . . More to the point, they argue that a stay of discovery would interfere with development of the remaining claims other than the § 1983 claims and would jeopardize evidence-gathering activities. . . The Court agrees with Plaintiffs. The power of a district court to stay trial proceedings is discretionary and 'the power to stay proceedings is incidental to the power inherent in every court to control the disposition of the causes on its docket with economy of time and effort for itself, for counsel, and for litigants.’ . . . Regardless of whether Defendants ultimately appeal the issue of § 1983 qualified immunity with respect to Defendants Crouse and Sullivan, the Court sees no reason why discovery cannot go forward on Plaintiffs’ other claims. Even if Defendant Crouse and/or Defendant Sullivan are found to be entitled to qualified immunity, the factual basis of the other remaining claims would not be affected. Those claims involve facts, witnesses, and circumstances virtually identical with those relevant to the § 1983 claims. Judicial economy would be served by the case going forward on the non-§ 1983 claims right away; there would be no hardship or inequity to Defendants if it does; and the potential prejudice to Plaintiffs is that their much broader case will be prejudiced until any appeal by Defendants is decided, presumably several months from now. Accordingly, the Motion to Stay is DENIED.”)

H.H. v. Chesterfield County School Bd., 2007 WL 4246487, at *5 (E.D.Va. Nov. 29, 2007) (“Having determined that plaintiffs’ complaint does allege the violation of a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, the Court now must inquire as to whether any facts material to defendants’ claim of qualified immunity are in dispute. The parties dispute whether defendants kept H.H. restrained in her wheelchair for long periods of time, and this disputed issue of material fact is central to defendants’ qualified immunity claim. The Fourth Circuit has held that ‘ordering discovery on the issue of immunity ... [is] well within the discretion of the district court.’ American Civil Liberties Union, Inc. v. Wicomico County, 999 F.2d 780, 787 (4th Cir.1993). The Court finds that it must permit plaintiffs to conduct discovery to obtain the facts from Moffett and Minguzzi necessary to resolve the disputed issue of material fact before it can rule on defendants’ qualified immunity claim. Accordingly, the Court will deny defendants’ motion for protective order.”).

Delph v. Trent, 86 F. Supp.2d 572, 575-77 (E.D. Va. 2000) (“[T]here is a complex intersection between qualified immunity and supervisory liability. If a plaintiff can establish the requisite indifference in the face of a policy or widespread and pervasive abuses caused by a policy, the plaintiff may hold the responsible official liable in a supervisory capacity. However, if the official can respond that a reasonable person would not have known of the effects of the policy or that the policy violated clearly established laws, then that official is entitled to qualified immunity from suit. . . . To permit the plaintiff to seek discovery would expose an official to the types of abuses qualified immunity was intended to prevent. . . . [T]he Court has constructed two hurdles the plaintiff must overcome to win the right to discovery. First, the trial court must insure that plaintiff has alleged a cognizable injury with sufficient specificity that officials are not subject to burdensome or unnecessary discovery. . . . The trial court may require the plaintiff to make specific factual allegations or may grant motions by defendant for more definite statements under Rule 12(e). Second, once plaintiff has made a sufficient allegation, the trial court must then resolve the threshold issue of immunity before proceeding to discovery. In doing so, the trial court must determine whether the officials violated clearly established law, assuming the plaintiff’s allegations as true. If so, plaintiff may be entitled to discovery, subject to the discretion of the trial court and the limits of Rule 26. . . . After he receives the requested information, plaintiff will either be able to establish supervisory liability or he will not find sufficient proof of widespread abuse. If plaintiff cannot prove supervisory liability, there is no need to reach the issue of qualified immunity and plaintiff's action may be dismissed. If plaintiff can prove supervisory liability, then the Court may proceed to determine defendants' qualified immunity defense.").

Asante-Chioke v. Dowdle, 103 F.4th 1126, 1129-32 (5th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, No. 24-387 (U.S. Jan. 13, 2024) ("[O]ne of the most important benefits of the qualified immunity defense is protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time-consuming, and intrusive." [citing Carswell] . . . The district court here cited Zapata in support of denying Defendants' limited discovery request. This court has jurisdiction to review discovery orders under the collateral order doctrine that do not follow Zapata's 'careful procedure.' . . In Zapata, the district court deferred ruling on the defendants' threshold qualified immunity defense raised in their motion to dismiss, instead issuing an order allowing the plaintiffs pre-dismissal limited discovery on the issue of qualified immunity. . . The defendants appealed, contending that the district court failed 'to rule on their immunity claim before permitting discovery pertaining to qualified immunity.' . . This court recognized the 'careful procedure' under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain that defense: first, the district court must 'find "that the plaintiffs [sic] pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity."' . . 'Thus, a plaintiff seeking to overcome qualified immunity must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.' . . And second, '[a]fter the district court finds a plaintiff has so pleaded, if the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts, it may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.' . . The Zapata court held it had jurisdiction to review the district court's order and vacated it because the district court did not follow the procedure set forth above. . . Zapata and Backe apply the 'careful procedure' to cases prior to a ruling on a motion to dismiss. In both cases the district courts refused to rule or deferred ruling on the defense of qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. . . And in Hutcheson v. Dallas County, this court applied the 'careful procedure' to the plaintiffs' motion for limited discovery, wherein plaintiffs sought to contradict the defendants' defense of qualified immunity in a motion that was converted by the district court from a motion to dismiss to summary judgment. . . In ruling on summary judgment, the district court had the benefit of relying on video evidence showing that there was no dispute of material fact as to whether the defendant officers used unreasonable force. . . The plaintiffs reasoned that they needed limited discovery to rebut defendants' defense of qualified immunity because of uncertainty surrounding the decedent's death due to the lack of sound in the video. . . This court held that, for purposes of qualified immunity, further discovery was not necessary because 'plaintiffs faltered at the first step of our two-step procedure.' . . Most recently, Carswell clarified the use of this 'careful procedure.' In Carswell, the plaintiff sought to depose defendants who had asserted qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss by relying on the district court's scheduling order that allowed limited discovery ‘if the plaintiff believes discovery is necessary to resolve’ the qualified immunity defense. . . The court held that the scheduling order was an abuse of discretion because it allowed discovery against defendants while deferring resolution of their qualified immunity defense. . . The court explained that ‘[t]he Supreme Court has now made clear that a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer claiming [qualified immunity] must survive the motion to dismiss without any discovery.’. . The court emphasized that a defendant’s entitlement to immunity ‘should be determined at the earliest possible stage of the litigation—full stop.’. . The only exception to this rule was the ‘careful procedure’ explained above ‘to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’. . Notably, Carswell directs defendants to two choices after a motion to dismiss is denied: (1) ‘the defendant can immediately appeal the district court’s denial under the collateral order doctrine’ or (2) ‘—à la Lion Boulos and its progeny—the defendant can move the district court for discovery limited to the factual disputes relevant to whether [qualified immunity] applies, then reassert [qualified immunity] in a summary judgment motion.’. . Carswell, Zapata, and Backe follow the reasoning set forth in Lion Boulos, that is, a party asserting the defense of qualified immunity is immune from discovery that is ‘avoidable or overly broad,’ and that when the district court is ‘unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts’ and when the discovery order is ‘narrowly tailored to uncover those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim,’ an order allowing such limited discovery is neither avoidable nor overly broad. . . Here, the defense of qualified immunity turns on whether Dowdle continued using deadly force by firing shots at Asante-Chioke after he became incapacitated. The district court was correct in recognizing that to have continued shooting is a clear violation under this circuit precedent. . . But there were multiple alleged shooters from at least two different law enforcement agencies, thirty-six rounds fired, and a dispute as to whether a single defendant (Dowdle) used deadly force after Asante-Chioke became incapacitated. On the present record, it is not known whether Dowdle fired any shots; how many if so; and when, in relation to Asante-Chioke’s actions and death. Through limited discovery, this information may well be discernable. Yet the district court denied Defendants’ request for limited discovery in light of Plaintiff’s issued discovery requests—which include requests for information and documents not limited to the defense of qualified immunity—staying only discovery as to claims against Dowdle and issues regarding his qualified immunity on appeal. Our court may review an order under the collateral order doctrine that exceeds the requisite ‘narrowly tailored’ scope. . . . In this case, the district court’s failure to limit discovery was tantamount to the denial of qualified immunity. And our jurisprudence strongly favors limited discovery in a case like this where a plaintiff alleges facts to overcome the defense of qualified immunity. . . For the foregoing reasons, this court has appellate jurisdiction over the district court’s discovery order. The district court is directed to limit discovery to uncover only the facts necessary to rule on qualified immunity. We VACATE and REMAND in line with this opinion.”)

In re Paxton, 60 F.4th 252, 256-57 (5th Cir. 2023) (“Our recent decision in Carswell v. Camp, 54 F.4th 307 (5th Cir. 2022), withdrawing and replacing Carswell v. Camp, 37 F.4th 1062 (5th Cir. 2022), confirms the district court should have first ruled on Paxton’s assertion of immunity. . . There, the plaintiff sought to depose defendants who had asserted qualified immunity, relying on the district court's scheduling order that allowed limited discovery 'if the plaintiff believes discovery is necessary to resolve the [qualified immunity] defense' or if discovery was in the defendant's capacity as a 'witness.' . . We held that the scheduling order was an abuse of discretion because it allowed discovery against defendants while deferring resolution of their asserted immunity. . . We explained that '[t]he Supreme Court has now made clear that a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer claiming QI must survive the motion to dismiss without any discovery.' . . In so doing, we emphasized that a defendant's entitlement to immunity 'should be determined at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.' . . The only exception to this rule is where the plaintiff has pleaded facts which, if true, would overcome immunity, but the court 'finds itself "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."' . . Under those circumstances, the district court may allow discovery 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.' . . Those circumstances are not present here because, as explained below, no clarification of the pleaded facts is needed to evaluate Paxton's immunity defense. Plaintiffs insist Carswell is inapposite because their subpoenas are 'to obtain hearing testimony,' not discovery, and because Paxton is being called as a 'witness' with relevant knowledge, not as a party. We disagree. Even assuming such distinctions make any difference, . . . Paxton is a defendant, not a third party, and to the extent his statements are relevant to Plaintiffs' claims, it is because of his status as a defendant. Moreover, Carswell already rejected similar arguments. The plaintiff there brought two sets of claims: § 1983 claims against the individual defendants and a Monell claim against the county. The plaintiff tried to couch deposing the immunity-asserting defendants as obtaining their testimony as 'witnesses' for the Monell claim, not as defendants for the § 1983 claim. . . We rejected this gambit, explaining that it 'turn[ed] qualified immunity on its head' by opening the defendants to deposition before adjudication of their immunity defense. . . So too here.") Carswell v. Camp, 54 F.4th 307, 310-14 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 73 (2023) ("Under the collateral order doctrine, we have jurisdiction to review orders denying qualified immunity. . . Likewise for district court orders 'declin[ing] or refus[ing] to rule on a motion to dismiss based on a government officer's defense of qualified immunity.' . . Such orders are 'tantamount to ... order[s] denying the defendants qualified immunity.' . . The collateral order doctrine permits immediate appeals of these orders because a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity must be determined 'at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.' . . That's because qualified immunity is more than 'a mere defense to liability.' . . It's also 'an immunity from suit.' . . And one of the most important benefits of the qualified immunity defense is 'protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time-consuming, and intrusive.' . . We have jurisdiction over the scheduling order here because the district court refused to rule on qualified immunity 'at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.' . . Defendants asserted qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss. That motion was the earliest possible opportunity for the district court to resolve the immunity question. It declined to do so. Instead, it required defendants to assert their qualified immunity defense by way of answer. And it postponed ruling on the immunity issue until summary judgment. That 'effectively ... denied [defendants] the benefits of the qualified immunity defense' and 'vest[ed] this court with the requisite jurisdiction to review the discovery order.’ . . We review the scheduling order for abuse of discretion. . . We hold the district court abused its discretion by deferring its ruling on qualified immunity and subjecting the immunity-asserting defendants to discovery in the meantime. . . Where public officials assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, a district court must rule on the motion. It may not permit discovery against the immunity-asserting defendants before it rules on their defense. . . It is true that to ensure qualified immunity can be decided at the earliest possible time, we have authorized ‘discovery narrowly tailored to rule on [defendants’] immunity claims.’ . . We’ve described that limited-discovery process as ‘a careful procedure,’ which permits a district court to ‘defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.’ . . The district court must first find that the plaintiff has pleaded ‘facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.’ . . If it still finds itself ‘unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts,’ . . . then we allow the district court to order discovery ‘narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim[.]’ . . Three points about this ‘careful procedure’ bear emphasis. First, its purpose is only to allow the district court to rule on the defendant’s assertion of QI; its purpose is not to provide a backdoor for plaintiffs to circumvent the defendant’s immunity from suit. . . Second, where the QI-asserting official determines that any pre-ruling discovery sought or ordered in the district court crosses the line from permissible Lion Boulos discovery to impermissible vitiation of the official’s immunity from suit, the collateral order doctrine authorizes an immediate appeal like the one we entertain today. . . And third, Lion Boulos and its progeny must be understood in light of subsequent Supreme Court precedent. The Supreme Court has now made clear that a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer claiming QI must survive the motion to dismiss without any discovery. . . . Iqbal squarely prohibits interpreting our ‘careful procedure’ as allowing tailored discovery before a district court rules on an official’s motion to dismiss. When defendants assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, the district court may not defer ruling on that assertion. It may not permit discovery—‘cabined or otherwise’—against immunity-asserting defendants before it has determined plaintiffs have pleaded facts sufficient to overcome the defense. . . The rule is that ‘a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity should be determined at the earliest possible stage of the litigation’—full stop. . . None of this means, of course, that the QI determination must be made once-and-for-all at the motion-to-dismiss stage. Today we only hold that where the pleadings are insufficient to overcome QI, the district court must grant the motion to dismiss without the benefit of pre-dismissal discovery. Similarly, where the pleadings are sufficient to overcome QI, the district court must deny the motion to dismiss without the benefit of pre-dismissal discovery. In the latter scenario, however, our precedent gives the defendant-official at least two choices after his motion to dismiss is denied. First, the defendant can immediately appeal the district court’s denial under the collateral order doctrine. . . Or second—à la Lion Boulos and its progeny—the defendant can move the district court for discovery limited to the factual disputes relevant to whether QI applies, then reassert QI in a summary judgment motion. . . The district court declined to rule on qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage. It deferred answering that question until the summary-judgment stage. That is, ipso facto, a refusal to rule at the earliest possible stage in litigation. It does not matter that the court promised to rule promptly once it arrived at the next stage of litigation. . . . That the scheduling order here is ‘standard’ in qualified immunity cases tells us nothing about whether it correctly understands the governing law. Today we clarify the governing law. And we trust that will harmonize our circuit’s discovery practices with the Supreme Court’s instructions. . . . Carswell argues that any error in the district court’s scheduling order is harmless because she has clearly stated plausible claims sufficient to defeat the individual defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity in their motion to dismiss. But all agree the district court has not yet ruled on that question. We decline to do so in the first instance. . . . Carswell’s motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction is DENIED. We VACATE the district court’s scheduling order and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Tuttle v. Sepolio, No. 22-20279, 2022 WL 16632994, at *1–2 (5th Cir. Nov. 2, 2022) (not reported) (“Officer Eric Sepolio and several other Houston Police Department employees appeal the district court’s order allowing Plaintiffs to take four depositions relating to their claims brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The parties dispute whether the district court ruled on the Officers’ motions to dismiss, in which the Officers assert qualified immunity among other things. The order provides in pertinent part:

The Court now finds that Plaintiffs have stated sufficient facts in their Amended Complaint to overcome assertions of qualified immunity by Defendants Reyna, Todd, Gonzales, Gallegos, Ashraf, Lovings, Medina, Pardo, Wood, Salazar, and Sepolio against Plaintiffs’ claims based on excessive force, lack of probable cause, and supervisory liability, but the Court is unable to rule on said immunity defenses without further clarification of the facts.... The parties shall notify the Court when the depositions have been completed, following which the Court will enter a briefing schedule relating to the motions to dismiss.

According to the Plaintiffs, the district court declined to rule on the qualified-immunity defenses presented in the Officers’ motions to dismiss with respect to Plaintiffs’ claims based on excessive force, lack of probable cause, and supervisory liability. The Plaintiffs also maintain that the district court did not rule on the qualified-immunity defenses asserted with respect to Plaintiffs’ other claims. The Officers disagree, and ask this court to review the merits of the defenses with respect to each claim. Of course, we lack jurisdiction to review the merits of the Officers’ qualified-immunity defenses unless the district court has ruled on them. But we always have authority to consider our jurisdiction. . . . And so out of an abundance of caution, we return this case to the district court for the limited purpose of determining the construction of the order at issue, and thus the extent of our jurisdiction in this appeal. Therefore, this case is REMANDED to the district court for the following exclusive purposes. First, the district court is instructed to clarify whether it ruled on the qualified-immunity defenses presented in the Officers’ motions to dismiss—both with respect to Plaintiffs’ claims based on excessive force, lack of probable cause, and supervisory liability and with respect to any other claims against which the defense was asserted. The district court must issue this clarification within seven days from the filing of this opinion. Second, because a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity must be decided ‘at the earliest possible stage of the litigation,’. . . if the district court has not ruled on the Officers’ qualified-immunity defenses with respect to each claim against which the defense was asserted, the district court must rule on each pending defense within thirty days from the filing of this opinion. In the event that this ruling is necessary, the district court must do so without allowing discovery. In closing, we note that in briefing and at oral argument, Plaintiffs requested that this case be remanded to the district court to allow them to dismiss their claims against the Officers without prejudice and proceed against the City of Houston only. We reiterate that this limited remand is restricted to the actions listed above and is not for the purpose of allowing the Plaintiffs to dismiss their claims against the Officers without prejudice, or to allow discovery to proceed.”)

Hutcheson v. Dallas County, Texas, 994 F.3d 477, 481 (5th Cir. 2021) (“Because Hutcheson ‘was not in the midst of harming other individuals and because his resistance was mostly passive, the officers were entitled to use only a proportional amount of force.’ . . . The video shows the officers using only the force necessary to restrain Hutcheson, rather than striking or using other force against him. . . . Moreover, the fact that they tried to restrain Hutcheson gently before grabbing him and placing him on the floor weighs in favor of the reasonableness of their actions. . . . It follows that the plaintiffs do not raise a dispute of material fact whether the officers used unreasonable force to restrain a resisting suspect. Therefore, the plaintiffs cannot satisfy the first step of the QI inquiry. The district court properly granted summary judgment as to excessive force. . . . The plaintiffs appeal the denial of limited discovery. In QI cases, we use a two-step procedure ‘under which a district court may defer its [QI] ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.’ . . . First, the court determines whether the pleadings ‘assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of [QI].’ . . . Second, if the pleadings assert such facts, the district court issues a narrowly tailored discovery order ‘to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’ . . . We review for abuse of discretion the decision whether to permit limited discovery on QI. . . . The plaintiffs assert that the district court erred in denying limited discovery. They contend that there is some uncertainty surrounding Hutcheson’s death, particularly because the video does not include any sound. Thus, plaintiffs aver that limited discovery could provide evidence that might contradict the defendants’ account. In the interest of garnering such evidence, the motion for discovery included three interrogatories and two production requests, all with the goal of gaining access to witnesses, including their testimony, that the county might have collected. Before limited discovery is permitted, a plaintiff seeking to overcome QI must assert facts that, if true, would overcome that defense. . . . It is not enough broadly to seek information that might impeach the defendants’ version of events. Thus, the plaintiffs faltered at the first step of our two-step procedure. . . . Moreover, they failed to identify any questions of fact that the court must resolve before determining QI, thereby failing the second step. . . . The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for limited discovery.”)

Converse v. City of Kemah, Texas, 961 F.3d 771, 780 n.8 (5th Cir. 2020) (“Though not the basis of our ruling, we note that the district court seems to have confused our procedure regarding limited discovery in qualified immunity cases. . . . Here, the district court initially ‘den[ied] the Defendants’ Rule 12(b)(6) motion on the issue of the qualified immunity,’ explained that it was ‘unable to rule on the qualified immunity defense ... without further clarification of the facts,’ and ordered limited discovery. Despite Defendants’ suggestion that the fact issues that remained after limited discovery should be resolved on a motion for summary judgment, the court directed Plaintiffs to file an amended complaint and Defendants to file a motion to dismiss. The court explained its understanding that Fifth Circuit caselaw allowed the limited discovery so that plaintiffs could sufficiently plead their case and ‘get ... past 12(b)(6), if you can,’ and therefore a motion for summary judgment was not appropriate after limited discovery. A motion for summary judgment is, however, perfectly appropriate after limited discovery. See Schulte v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (noting that after allowing limited discovery, “the court can again determine whether the case can proceed and consider any motions for summary judgment under Rule 56”); Griffin v. Edwards, 116 F.3d 479 (5th Cir. 1997) (affirming the denial of a motion to dismiss “without prejudice to the rights of the public defendants to move for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity at a later date, after such limited discovery as the district court may deem necessary to determine whether a genuine issue exists as to the illegality of the public defendants’ conduct”).”)

Collie v. Barron, 747 F. App’x 950, ____ (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) (“Contending that the district court abused its discretion in denying him the opportunity to take discovery before it entered summary judgment, Collie decries that practice. He fears it will furnish ‘rogue officers and poorly managed police departments’ a ‘virtual how-to booklet’ to shield themselves from accountability. Collie asserts other Fort Worth Police officers had more information about the events that took place before Officer Barron shot Collie. Thus, discovery would have permitted him to prove Officer Barron either knew or should have known Collie did not fit the description of the robbery suspects and could not be the armed suspect. As relevant here, the goals of qualified immunity counsel no more than a minimum of necessary discovery before the court determines whether the defense attaches: ‘Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.’. . This court has previously recognized ‘[o]ne of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery.’. . The Supreme Court has emphatically directed, ‘qualified immunity is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.’. . Collie’s position fails in several ways – beginning with the fact that he failed to preserve this argument for appeal. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) requires a non-movant to present affidavits and evidence if he feels he needs discovery to properly defend against a summary judgment motion. . . Collie never sufficiently invoked Rule 56(d) in the trial court. Further, ‘[w]hen a defendant pleads the defense of qualified immunity, the district court may ban discovery at this threshold pleading stage and ... need not allow any discovery unless it finds that plaintiff has supported his claim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant’s conduct at the time of the alleged acts.’. . Here, the parties’ competing evidence convinced the court that Collie could not overcome the defense of qualified immunity. The court did not abuse its discretion or misapply the law when denying additional discovery.”)

Patel v. Texas Tech University, No. 17-11234, 2018 WL 3045463, at *1 (5th Cir. June 19, 2018) (not reported) (“ ‘[T]his court has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.’ Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The plaintiff ‘must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.’. . ‘After the district court finds a plaintiff has so pled, if the court remains “unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts,” it may issue a discovery order “narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.”’. . ‘An order that simultaneously withholds ruling on a qualified immunity defense while failing to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity is by definition not narrowly tailored.’. It appears that the district court did not follow this court’s ‘careful procedure.’ The record shows that the court held that the qualified immunity defense had been improperly raised in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, and should instead be raised in a later motion for summary judgment. Whether this decision intimated further that Appellants’ motion was not well taken, because Plaintiff sufficiently carried his pleading burden, we cannot discern. In any event, the district court further failed ‘to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity’ after apparently refusing to pass on qualified immunity in the first instance. . . The record, in sum, does not demonstrate that the court followed the procedures laid out in Backe v. LeBlanc and Lion Boulos v. Wilson. It must do so on remand.”)

Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 223 (5th Cir. 2018) (“Both motions for protective orders noted that the Doctors had asserted qualified immunity. ‘One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery’ Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). Thus, ‘[b]efore allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find “that the plaintiff’s pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome” a qualified immunity defense.’. . Because Bustillos’ claims could not overcome the clearly-established prong of the qualified immunity defense, the district court did not err by declining to grant Bustillos’ discovery requests.”)

Randle v. Lockwood, 666 F. App’x 333, ___ & nn. 5, 6 (5th Cir. 2016) (“The district court’s failure to address the question of qualified immunity violated the tenet that ‘[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved “at the earliest possible stage in the litigation.”’. . Regardless of the pleading standard applicable to Randle’s claims, the district court was required to address whether the jailers were entitled to qualified immunity because the jailers asserted this defense in both their motions to dismiss and their objections to the magistrate judge’s report and recommendation. By failing to address qualified immunity, the district court’s order undercuts the doctrine of qualified immunity’s goal of shielding public officials from ‘unwarranted demands customarily imposed upon those defending a long drawn out lawsuit.’. . As a result, the jailers will likely be exposed to ‘costly, time-consuming, and intrusive’ pre-trial discovery before Randle is required to demonstrate that his allegations defeat the jailers’ qualified immunity defense. . . . While the district court’s order did not explicitly allow any discovery, discovery is the next logical step in the litigation process following the denial of a motion to dismiss. And the magistrate judge’s report explicitly references the need for discovery before ‘passing on the merits’ of Randle’s claim. Therefore the district court’s denial of the motions to dismiss, if left undisturbed, is likely to lead to discovery. . . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred by failing to address the jailers' qualified immunity defense when denying their motions to dismiss. . . . Nor does the district court's order satisfy the narrow exception to the general rule that qualified immunity should be decided as early in the litigation as possible. Under this exception, 'a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of [the qualified immunity] defense.' . . . But in order to properly defer the decision on qualified immunity, the district court must follow the 'careful' two-step procedure that we have established. . . . First, it must 'determine "that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity."' . . . Second, if the district court finds a plaintiff has so pleaded, it can then 'defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if "the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."' . . . Here, the district court did not complete either step of this procedure.")

Mendez v. Poitevent, 823 F.3d 326, 336-37 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs also contend that the district court abused its discretion in ruling on defendants' motions for summary judgment before discovery, implicitly denying plaintiffs' request for a continuance to conduct discovery. Plaintiffs bore a heavy burden below because they sought discovery 'to disprove the applicability of an immunity-derived bar to suit because immunity is intended to shield the defendant from the burdens of defending the suit, including the burdens of discovery.' . . . Courts are authorized under Rule 56(d) to defer ruling on a summary judgment motion and allow discovery, but 'Rule 56 does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.' . . . And under Rule 56(d), deferring summary judgment and ordering discovery is appropriate only if the 'nonmovant shows by affidavit or declaration that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition.' . . . A party 'may not simply rely on vague assertions that additional discovery will produce needed, but unspecified, facts.' . . . Plaintiffs' affidavit here fell short. Plaintiffs' counsel alleged that they had no opportunity to depose Poitevent and the witnesses to the shooting. In support of the motion, counsel asserted that '[t]he testimony of these witnesses and others bear[s] upon the acts and omissions of Taylor Poitevent, and the reasonableness of his conduct in shooting Juan Mendez, Jr.' But plaintiffs did not identify below any reason why it could not obtain the testimony of the witnesses to the shooting through, for example, affidavits; indeed, plaintiffs submitted a declaration from one of them. And the witnesses' accounts were already incorporated into the record through the Texas Rangers' investigation report. In addition, Poitevent himself submitted his own testimony. Plaintiffs presented no reason why either Poitevent's affidavit or the witness accounts in the investigation report were insufficient, and their contention that summary judgment was inappropriate before they were able to depose Poitevent is unsupported. . . . Plaintiffs did not, moreover, identify specific facts below that would alter the district court's analysis. . . . Instead, they vaguely assert before this court that deposing the witnesses would have 'permitted [plaintiffs] to further discover the facts from the witnesses who saw the scuffle.' In other words, plaintiffs did not demonstrate below 'how the additional discovery [would] likely create a genuine issue of material fact.' . . . Instead, the result of the discovery they sought was 'wholly speculative.' . . . We thus hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in implicitly denying plaintiffs' motion for a continuance to conduct discovery.")

Zantiz v. Seal, 602 F. App'x 154, 159-63 (5th Cir. 2015) (“We generally lack jurisdiction to review discovery orders. . . But we have jurisdiction to review certain discovery orders in cases involving the qualified immunity defense. . . In particular, we have jurisdiction to review such a discovery order if the district court does not first determine whether the plaintiff’s pleadings, taken as true, are sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . We also have jurisdiction to consider a discovery order that has not been ‘narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’. . We review such orders for abuse of discretion. . . We have jurisdiction to review such an order if it does not follow the two-step procedure that we have mandated in qualified immunity cases. . . First, the district court must determine that the plaintiff’s well-pleaded facts, taken as true, would overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . Second, ‘if the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts, it may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’. . Such an order must ‘identify any questions of fact [the district court] need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to qualified immunity.’. . We conclude that we have jurisdiction to review the discovery order here because it did not fulfill either step of this analysis. First, the order did not explicitly hold that Zantiz’s pleadings, taken as true, overcame the qualified immunity defense. While some of the language in the discovery order implies that the magistrate judge thought that the pleadings overcame the qualified immunity defense, we have held that this holding must be made explicitly. . . The discovery order also fails the second step of Zapata. Even a ‘limited discovery’ order does not satisfy the second step if ‘he district court [does] not identify any questions of fact it need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to immunity.’. . Here, the discovery order fails under this standard because it does not identify the questions of fact that needed to be resolved before the qualified immunity issue could be addressed. Thus, we conclude that the magistrate judge abused his discretion in issuing a discovery order that did not perform either of the steps described in Zapata.”)

Doe v. Robertson, 751 F.3d 383, *7 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Plaintiffs claim that assessing the Service Agreement violations in isolation is not our task, as discovery has not been taken. In Plaintiffs’ view, focusing solely on the contractual violations presumes that no other evidence could support their Bivens claim. Plaintiffs accordingly assert that they have a ‘right to seek discovery ... to build the necessary record in the case at hand.’ Plaintiffs misunderstand our standard of review at the motion to dismiss stage. We recognize that the question of whether an official ‘had the requisite knowledge of a substantial risk is a question of fact’ generally best resolved by discovery and fact-finding, should a claim survive a motion to dismiss. . . But here, at the motion to dismiss stage, we are tasked with deciding whether Plaintiffs have stated a plausible ‘claim upon which relief can be granted.’. . In so doing, we cannot accept Plaintiffs’ invitation to apply the ‘no set of facts’ test, which the Supreme Court has firmly rejected. Twombly . . . It is, of course, conceivable that some set of facts could make Plaintiffs’ claim plausible. Hypothetically, for example, Robertson and Rosado might have known of Dunn’s dangerous proclivities, or they might have ignored contemporaneous distress calls from victims of or witnesses to the assaults. But ‘a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions’ cannot ‘unlock the doors of discovery.’. . Here, Plaintiffs have proffered a legal conclusion that Robertson and Rosado were deliberately indifferent, and for the reasons detailed above, their factual allegations, even assumed as true, do not make this conclusion plausible. . . Accordingly, the Complaint gives Plaintiffs no right to discovery.”)

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App’x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) (“The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan’s, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts ‘peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,’ . . . and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . . Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court’s ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert’s possession, we do not consider the parties’ remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court’s denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete.”) [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App’x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate’s § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.)]

Dreyer v. Yelverton, No. 07-10970, 2008 WL 3911072, at *5 (5th Cir. Aug. 25, 2008) (“Contrary to Dreyer’s assertions, Schultea does not expressly preclude a district court’s rendering summary judgment without discovery. Dreyer is correct, however, that district courts may be required to allow discovery before ruling on a summary-judgment motion. On the other hand, it is incumbent upon counsel to properly move, under Rule 56(f), for such discovery. Restated, ‘if a party cannot adequately defend [against a summary-judgment] motion, Rule 56(f) is his remedy’. Washington v. Allstate Ins. Co., 901 F.2d 1281, 1285 (5th Cir.1990) (citations omitted). But, ‘Rule 56(f) does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.’ Id.”)

Hinojosa v. Johnson, No. 07-20030, 2008 WL 1924216, at *6 n.12 (5th Cir. May 1, 2008) (“Although qualified immunity is immunity from suit, including discovery, discovery may proceed against a government official where ‘the plaintiff’s allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law,’ Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 526 (1985), as long as such discovery is ‘Anarrowly tailored’ to the question of qualified immunity.’ Maxey by Maxey v. Fulton, 890 F.2d 279, 283 (10th Cir.1989).”).

Alice L. v. Dusek, 492 F.3d 563, 565 (5th Cir. 2007) (“Dusek argues that her appeal of the district court’s denial of qualified immunity is so broad as to divest the district court of jurisdiction to compel her compliance with discovery requests made related to the Title IX claims against Eanes ISD. We disagree. . . . Even though the factual basis of the Title IX claims and the § 1983 claim overlap, the claims are legally distinct—notably, Dusek does not and cannot assert qualified immunity from the Title IX claim against Eanes ISD. To the extent that Dusek is subject to discovery requests on claims for which she does not or cannot assert qualified immunity, such discovery requests do not implicate her right to qualified immunity. The district court may compel discovery disclosures related to the plaintiffs’ Title IX claims because doing so does not interfere with any aspect of Dusek’s appeal.”).

Heitschmidt v. City of Houston, 161 F.3d 834, 840 (5th Cir. 1998) (“Heitschmidt argues on appeal that he should have been allowed limited discovery before the district court granted defendant’s motion for qualified immunity. The district court dismissed Heitschmidt’s claims on the basis that his pleadings did not state facts sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. Qualified immunity is a defense from both liability and suit. . . . Our Court has held that ‘[e]ven limited discovery on the issue of qualified immunity must not proceed until the district court first finds that the plaintiff’s pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.’ . . . Heitschmidt’s motion for limited discovery was denied before the district court’s decision on the defendants’ motion to dismiss. There was, therefore, no error in that decision. Now that Heitschmidt’s pleadings have been judged adequate to at least potentially state a claim, however, discovery can proceed on remand. We do not hold that Heitschmidt will eventually be able to establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, but rather, that his pleadings are sufficient to create that possibility. . . . Should further discovery lead to the conclusion that there is no genuine issue of fact which could support such a claim, there will be no procedural or substantive barrier to the filing of a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.”).

Lion Boulos v. Wilson, 834 F.2d 504, 507, 508 (5th Cir.1987) (“Harlow, Mitchell and Jacquez make clear that qualified immunity does not shield government officials from all discovery but only from discovery which is either avoidable or overly broad. Discovery designed to flesh out the merits of a plaintiff’s claim before a ruling on the immunity defense or discovery permitted in cases where the defendant is clearly entitled to immunity would certainly fall within this category. Immediate appeal would lie from these orders because Mitchell, Harlow and Jacquez require that immune defendants be exempt from avoidable, burdensome pretrial matters. However, a second class of discovery permitted before a ruling on a defendant’s motion to dismiss does not encroach upon his qualified immunity claim. Discovery orders entered when the defendant’s immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question; when the district court is unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts; and which are narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim are neither avoidable nor overly broad. Such orders are not immediately appealable. The instant case falls within the latter category, not the former.”).

Hankins v. Wheeler, No. 21-1129, 2024 WL 4903917, at *2–3 (E.D. La. Nov. 27, 2024) (“In Carswell v. Camp, the Fifth Circuit held that “a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity should be determined at the earliest possible stage of the litigation.’. . To facilitate such quick resolutions, the court defined two situations whereby discovery must be limited on the basis of a qualified immunity defense. . . First, when a defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense at the motion-to-dismiss stage, the district court must stay all discovery and rule on the defendant’s motion before allowing further discovery to proceed. . . Second, once the case has passed the motion-to-dismiss stage, a defendant may ‘move the district court for discovery limited to the factual disputes relevant to whether [qualified immunity] applies, then reassert [qualified immunity] in a summary judgment motion.’. . The SLFPA-E Defendants argue that the Fifth Circuit’s decision in Carswell stands for the proposition that Officer Wheeler and Officer Pierre’s qualified immunity defense must be conclusively decided before they are required to answer any discovery at all. But Carswell has nothing to say about whether an officer’s qualified immunity defense must be decided before discovery as to an entity or supervisor’s qualified immunity defense can be conducted. Rather, it merely holds that a defendant’s qualified immunity defense must be discovered and dealt with before other issues as to that defendant’s liability are addressed. That is all that Plaintiff is requesting here: that the Court open discovery as to the SLFPA-E Defendants’ qualified immunity defense. After this qualified immunity discovery is complete, the SLFPA-E Defendants may then move for summary judgment as contemplated by the second situation identified in Carswell. Simply put, deciding the officers’ qualified immunity defense is not a prerequisite to discovery pertaining to the supervisors’ qualified immunity defenses. The Court refuses to sanction an interpretation of Carswell that would free the SLFPA-E Defendants who are supervisors and entities in this case entirely from the burden of discovery, given the circuit clearly contemplated at least some discovery as to qualified immunity going forward. Plaintiff’s requests are hardly ‘broad’ or ‘far-reaching’ and appear to mirror similar discovery requests made of the HANO Defendants, which were answered without protest and ultimately resolved between the parties. Accordingly, the Court now advises that standard discovery should continue in earnest; any discovery related to Plaintiff’s Monell and supervisory claims already propounded is subject to ordinary response deadlines and will be enforced by the Court as appropriate.”)

T.L. v. New Caney Independent School District, No. CV H-24-1435, 2024 WL 4028726, at *1 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 3, 2024) (“The Fifth Circuit has held that ‘when defendants assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, the district court may not defer ruling on that assertion. It may not permit discovery—cabined or otherwise—against immunity-asserting defendants before it has determined plaintiffs have pleaded facts sufficient to overcome the defense.’. . Under the circuit precedent, discovery against Mr. Morath and the Agency must be stayed until this court resolves their motion to dismiss on the basis of immunity. The plaintiffs point out that the discovery they seek is relevant to claims and parties that are not subject to the stay Mr. Morath and the Texas Education Agency seek. It is unclear whether the Fifth Circuit’s ruling in Carswell permits discovery against defendants who do not assert qualified immunity. Some courts in this circuit have suggested that discovery against a defendant not asserting qualified immunity may proceed if that discovery would not ‘implicat[e], and unduly burden[], the individual defendants who have raised the defense of qualified immunity.’. . Because the plaintiffs’ claims against Mr. Morath, the Agency, and the New Caney ISD are closely related and involve the same facts and events, discovery relating to the claims against the New Caney ISD would necessarily be discovery against Mr. Morath and the Agency. The court grants the motion to stay discovery pending the resolution of the Second Motion to Dismiss.”)

Young v. McLennon County, Texas, NO. 6:23-CV-00608-ADA-JCM (W.D. Tex. Apr. 1, 2024) (“Recently, the Eastern District of Texas extended [Carswell’s] holding. In Young v. Harrison County, the plaintiff sued Harrison County for civil rights violations under Section 1983. The Young defendants requested that the court shorten the deadline for the plaintiffs to amend their complaint or add additional parties and to limit the depositions of any current or former county employees as to qualified immunity. Young v. Harrison Cnty., No. 2:23-CV-00102-JRG, 2023 WL 8101860, at *1 (E.D. Tex. Nov. 21, 2023). The court granted the defendants’ request, holding that ‘the shortened deadline is important to protect the interests of Harrison County employees in having issues of qualified immunity resolved prior to their depositions and to avoid their joinder at the eleventh hour.’ Id. at *3. The court specifically discussed Carswell, noting that the fact that the county employees could not assert qualified immunity was the problem that implicated Carswell. This Court disagrees with the holding in Young as the Fifth Circuit discussed this situation explicitly in Carswell. In Carswell, the Fifth Circuit noted that ‘there are significant differences between naming an individual defendant and then deposing him in two capacities . . . and not suing the individual and deposing him only in his Monell/official capacity.’ Carswell, 54 F.4th at 313. These differences justified staying all discovery against a named individual defendant asserting qualified immunity, implying that they do not justify staying discovery against individuals who have not been sued. Accordingly, discovery against the non-party witnesses should not be stayed.”)

Adelsheimer v. Carroll County, Mississippi, No. 422CV00055MPMJMV, 2022 WL 16706978, at *1 (N.D. Miss. Nov. 4, 2022) (“In its June 17, 2022 decision in Carswell, a Fifth Circuit panel held that qualified immunity defendants in this circuit have the right to obtain an early ruling on any Rule 12 motion to dismiss which they file, even before discovery has been conducted. In so ruling, the Carswell panel noted that pre-existing Fifth Circuit law had granted district courts discretion to defer ruling on qualified immunity motions until after a limited period of qualified immunity discovery, in cases where they concluded that such discovery was necessary to make a correct ruling. . . . In finding that this precedent had been overruled, the Carswell panel wrote that: ‘Call it “careful,” or call it “narrow”; either way, today we call Lion Boulos and its progeny overruled. The Supreme Court has now made clear that a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer must survive the motion to dismiss (and the qualified immunity defense) without any discovery. Our prior decisions to the contrary are overruled. . . .’ In so ruling, the Fifth Circuit appeared to place primary weight upon the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). In Ashcroft, the district court gave the plaintiff discovery before ruling on the officials’ motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . The Supreme Court reversed, holding that ‘the question presented by a motion to dismiss a complaint for insufficient pleadings does not turn on the controls placed upon the discovery process.’ . . This court notes that Ashcroft was a very prominent decision, and yet the Fifth Circuit continued to apply Lion Boulos and its progeny for well over a decade after Ashcroft was decided. . . This arguably suggests that there are some Fifth Circuit judges who do not believe that Ashcroft served to establish a blanket rule depriving district judges of the discretion to defer qualified immunity rulings until after discovery, and it at least seems possible that the full Fifth Circuit will consider this matter en banc. Barring some indication by the Fifth Circuit to the contrary, Carswell will, of course, be fully applied by this court. That being the case, any defendant who files a qualified immunity motion in the context of a Rule 12 motion to dismiss will obtain a ruling on that motion from this court, which he may then appeal to the Fifth Circuit if desired. Assuming that the Fifth Circuit affirms a denial of qualified immunity by this court, it will then presumably remand for discovery, after which the parties may file their summary judgment motions. This court notes that nothing in the law prohibits a defendant from appealing a second denial of qualified immunity on summary judgment, even though his Rule 12 qualified immunity motion was previously denied. . . . This court can envision a scenario developing in which no robustly litigated § 1983 action is deemed complete without not one, but two, qualified immunity appeals to the Fifth Circuit, all before the district court even begins to consider the claims against the municipal and other defendants who are not entitled to assert qualified immunity defenses. This court hopes that this does not come to pass, but it fears that the Carswell framework will prove to be an unwieldy one. This court believes that this circuit was well served by the ‘old’ law in this context, which trusted district courts to decide whether the qualified immunity issues before them were best decided under Rule 12 as a matter of law, or under Rule 56 following a limited and expedited period of discovery. In so stating, this court notes its belief that most district judges who elect for discovery are not interested in shirking their responsibility to give defendants an early ruling on their qualified immunity motions; they simply wish to reach a correct result in the cases before them. It is much easier for district courts to have confidence that they are doing so if they have at least a basic knowledge of the relevant facts of the case. This court notes that, sometimes, strong plaintiffs are represented by lawyers who fail to do as thorough a job as they might in drafting the complaint and/or researching law ‘clearly establishing’ a constitutional violation. By ruling on qualified immunity motions after at least some discovery, district courts are hopefully able to gain a clearer picture regarding how strong a factual case they have before them, and not merely how proficient the parties’ lawyers are. This court further believes that, while qualified immunity defendants may welcome the Fifth Circuit’s decision in Carswell, it may backfire on them in certain cases. Indeed, this court suspects that the Fifth Circuit will quickly tire of hearing two qualified immunity appeals per case (if such occurs), and it may well place the burden upon defendants to demonstrate that separate Rule 12 and Rule 56 qualified immunity motions were strictly necessary. In this event, defendants who choose to assert qualified immunity defenses in the context of Rule 12 motions to dismiss may find that they are unable to assert their best qualified immunity arguments, since those arguments often depend upon helpful facts in the record which cannot be cited in a Rule 12 motion based on the pleadings. In so stating, this court notes that the Fifth Circuit held in Carswell that: When defendants assert qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, the district court may not defer ruling on that assertion. It may not permit discovery—“cabined or otherwise”—against immunity-asserting defendants before it has determined plaintiffs have pleaded facts sufficient to overcome the defense.

Carswell, 37 F.4th at 1067. In the court's view, the key words here are 'pleaded facts,' since that is the relevant issue in the Rule 12 context. If a defendant believes that the facts alleged in the complaint cannot withstand the harsh light of discovery, then that is something which he may not assert in a Rule 12 motion to dismiss, but only a Rule 56 summary judgment motion. This court suspects that some defense counsel will wish to take the new ruling in Carswell 'out for a spin' and accordingly file Rule 12 motions to dismiss simply because the Fifth Circuit has told them they have a right to do so. It seems possible, however, that some defendants will later regret having done so, if it is determined that they had no reasonable basis for questioning the sufficiency of the allegations of the complaint and should have instead litigated qualified immunity issues in the context of a summary judgment motion following discovery. That brings this court to the facts of this case, which presents qualified immunity issues only tangentially related to those in Carswell, but which nevertheless illustrate some points of importance in this context. In this case, which arises out of the suicide of an inmate at a county jail, plaintiff alleges in her complaint that 'Sheriff Walker also knew that Philip E. Adelsheimer was a danger to himself and that he should have been placed on suicide watch.' . . In asserting qualified immunity, defendants filed a summary judgment motion in which they alleged that 'plaintiff has no evidence that Defendants Clint Walker, Sheriff of Carroll County, Mississippi, or any other defendant knew or should have known that Philip Adelsheimer was a suicide risk.' It was defendants' choice to file a summary judgment motion rather than a motion to dismiss, and their arguments about what the plaintiff 'has evidence' of (rather than what she alleges) is clearly one which is appropriately raised in a summary judgment brief and not a motion to dismiss. Moreover, defendants have since conceded that qualified immunity-related discovery is needed, and, without question, evidence developed in such discovery may only be presented in a summary judgment motion, and not a motion to dismiss. It is thus clear that, at this juncture, a summary judgment motion is the proper vehicle in which to resolve the qualified immunity issues in this case. Given that defendants now concede that qualified immunity-related discovery is required, it would have been preferable for them to wait and see what that discovery revealed before making representations to this court in a summary judgment brief about what plaintiff is or is not able to prove. Regardless of whether this was strictly required, it is clear that, in choosing to file a summary judgment motion, defendants were required to follow the requirements of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure relating to such motions. . . . In this case, one key fact which defendants argue cannot be 'genuinely disputed' is that Sheriff Walker lacked knowledge of Adelsheimer's suicidal tendencies. In so asserting in their summary judgment brief, Rule 56(c) required defendants to cite 'to particular parts of materials in the record, including depositions, documents' or other admissible summary judgment evidence. This court cannot simply take their word for it. In so stating, this court emphasizes that the mere fact that a defendant is asserting a qualified immunity defense entitles him to no more lenient standards when asserting a summary judgment motion under Rule 56. The U.S. Supreme Court made this clear in Tolan v. Cotton[.] . . . This court simply wishes to make an informed ruling based upon proper briefing, and it accordingly directs defendants to submit, after the limited period of qualified immunity discovery is complete, an amended motion for summary judgment which complies with the requirements of Rule 56(c). This court notes for the record that it does not suspect that defendants or their counsel are mis-representing the record in this case, and it will not be at all surprised if discovery backs up the contentions which they made in their briefing. This court simply cannot prejudge this matter without proof, however. Defendants are arguably able to assert certain strong qualified immunity arguments in this case, but it is essential that they back up these arguments with competent summary judgment evidence. This court's ruling today simply allows them to do so. In light of the foregoing, it is ordered that defendants file an amended motion for summary judgment after the agreed period of qualified immunity-related discovery in this case.”)

Doe v. City of Austin, No. 1:22-CV-00299-RP, 2022 WL 4234954, at *7–8 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 14, 2022) (“[T]he Court finds that a stay of discovery against the City is appropriate because Doe’s Monell claims against the City are inextricably intertwined with her claims against Dodds. Her claims against the City are predicated on constitutional violations allegedly committed by Dodds. To defend against Doe’s allegations that the City’s policies and procedures was the moving force behind Dodds’ constitutional violations, the City will need discovery from Dodds and likely must depose him. Conversely, in order for Doe to prove that the City is liable under Monell, she must first demonstrate that Dodds committed a constitutional violation, and that the constitutional violation was caused by the City’s policies. Because the Court has granted a stay of discovery as to Dodds, neither party will be able to obtain the necessary discovery to prove or disprove their claims and defenses. Accordingly, the Court finds that a stay of all discovery directed at both the City and Dodds is appropriate pending the outcome of Dodds’ criminal proceedings. . . The Fifth Circuit’s decision in Carswell v. Camp, 37 F.4th 1062 (5th Cir. 2022), supports this conclusion. In Carswell, the district court declined to rule on the qualified immunity defense at the motion to dismiss stage and entered a scheduling order permitting certain discovery of the individual defendants in their capacity as witnesses to the actions of other defendants not asserting qualified immunity. The Fifth Circuit held that the district court abused its discretion by deferring its ruling on individual officers’ entitlement to qualified immunity. . . The court rejected the plaintiff’s argument that the scheduling order was proper because it stayed discovery as to issues of qualified immunity while allowing discovery on the Monell claims, reasoning that ‘bifurcation of discovery would radically complicate the case’ and impose unreasonable burdens on the defendants. . . For these reasons, the Court finds that good cause exists to stay all discovery in this case pending completion of Dodds’ criminal proceedings.”)

Coones v. Cogburn, No. 1:22-CV-090-H, 2022 WL 3701173, at *2–4 (N.D. Tex. Aug. 26, 2022) (“Qualified immunity has historically protected public officials from the burdens of suit, including ‘pretrial discovery which is costly, time-consuming, and intrusive.’ . . Still, until recently, courts maintained that a defendant asserting a qualified-immunity defense at the pleading stage cannot circumvent all discovery—only discovery that is ‘avoidable or overly broad.’ . . For instance, when a plaintiff pled facts in her complaint that, if true, could defeat a qualified-immunity defense, but the court needed further factual clarification before resolving a motion to dismiss, it could allow narrow discovery surrounding just those facts relevant to immunity. . . Courts invoked this ‘careful procedure’ to ensure that only plaintiffs who had stated a plausible claim for relief could subject an immunity-asserting public official to the burdens of discovery. . . Careful or not, the Fifth Circuit eliminated this procedure in Carswell. . . It held that ‘a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims against an officer must survive the motion to dismiss (and the qualified immunity defense) without any discovery.’ . . This rule ‘admits of no exceptions,’ forbidding even ‘minimally intrusive discovery’ unless and until a court determines the plaintiff has overcome the qualified-immunity defense at the pleading stage. . . It is not enough, according to Carswell, to stay discovery only as it relates to the issue of qualified immunity; all discovery must wait until resolution of the motion to dismiss. . . This is because qualified immunity should protect a defendant not just from liability, but from suit itself. . . Coones’s motion to compel discovery cannot stand in light of Carswell. The defendants have filed motions to dismiss, each asserting the defense of qualified immunity. . . Coones has not responded to those motions, and the Court certainly has not made any determination concerning their merits. Because the Court has not yet decided whether Coones has alleged facts in her complaint to overcome the qualified-immunity defense as to each defendant, under Carswell, the outcome is clear: no discovery can be permitted at this stage. Coones argues that the Court should grant her motion because her requests would only minimally burden the defendants, while enabling her to formulate a complaint that best achieves full and fair recovery. . . But the strict language of Carswell preempts the Court from considering her argument, whether under a preliminary-injunction or good-cause analysis. Neither framework applies to a motion to compel discovery before a court has ruled on the merits of a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. Rather, Carswell controls. Coones tries to distinguish her case by noting that Carswell did not involve discovery needed for the plaintiff to bring her claims in the first place. . . Coones is correct. In Carswell, the plaintiff sought to depose immunity-asserting defendants in their capacities as witnesses in other actions, and her ability to bring those actions did not depend on completing the depositions. . . But the Carswell court did not concern itself with the stakes of the requested discovery. In fact, just the opposite: the Fifth Circuit declared that the rule against discovery before resolution of qualified immunity at the pleading stage ‘admits of no exceptions.’ . . It thus expressly overruled the line of cases allowing for even narrowly tailored discovery at that point in the proceedings. . . This Court understands Coones’s fear of losing her chance to be heard if the statute of limitations runs before she can obtain records that might implicate others in her son’s death. Unfortunately, no matter the purpose or extent of the discovery she seeks at this stage, Carswell bars it. Lastly, Coones seems to suggest that because the Fifth Circuit ordered a response to the plaintiff’s petition for en banc review of Carswell, this Court should not apply its holding here. . . But only the Fifth Circuits granting of a rehearing en banc provides grounds for vacating the panel opinion and staying the judgment of the court. . . Here, the Fifth Circuit has not granted the petition for such a hearing. . . In fact, no judge has called for a vote on the matter. . . The Fifth Circuit merely directed the defendant to respond to the plaintiff’s petition for en banc review. . . Unless and until the Fifth Circuit grants the petition, Carswell retains its precedential value. . . Thus, it applies here. . . The Fifth Circuit held in Carswell that a plaintiff may not seek discovery while a defendants motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity remains pending. This rule expressly applies to these facts. Defendants Cogburn, Baker, and Cueto have each asserted a qualified-immunity defense in their respective motions to dismiss. The Court has not yet resolved the motions to dismiss. Therefore, under Carswell, the Court cannot grant Coones any discovery at this time. While the Court recognizes that Coones may lose her opportunity to bring claims against other parties when the statute of limitations runs, she had nearly two years to pursue her claims. For one reason or another, she filed a complaint only recently. Had the Court received earlier notice of the suit, and thereby more time to address the outstanding motions to dismiss, perhaps Coones might have ultimately obtained the discovery she seeks. But that did not happen. And this Court cannot ignore current Fifth Circuit precedent. Coones’s motion to compel is therefore denied.”)

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Kerchen v. University of Michigan, 100 F.4th 751, 761 (6th Cir. 2024) (“[T]his Court has long held that district courts may not avoid ruling on the merits of a qualified immunity defense and permit litigation to proceed further. . . . Similar to sovereign immunity, a decision on qualified immunity at the earliest possible stage of litigation is necessary to vindicate its protection against litigation itself. . . . Thus, the district court also erred in failing to address Defendants’ qualified immunity defense before ordering limited discovery. Upon an independent review of the record, however, we find that the University and Woods in his official capacity are entitled to sovereign immunity, and that Woods in his individual capacity is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

In re Flint Water Cases v. Earley, 960 F.3d 820, 824-25, 828, 830 (6th Cir. 2020) (“The district court recognized that the state defendants must be treated as though they are immune from the claims brought against them until they have exhausted their opportunities to appeal the district court’s denial of their motions to dismiss based on immunity. . . . Accordingly, the district court issued a stay with respect to ‘discovery on claims for which they continue to litigate the issue of immunity.’ . . . Thus, the court ruled, ‘the state and MDEQ defendants will not be subjected to discovery with respect to the sole allegation against them, which is that they violated plaintiffs’ right to bodily integrity, until they have exhausted their opportunities to pursue their qualified immunity claim on appeal.’ . . . The state defendants’ request for a stay of discovery was partly denied in the sense that the state defendants would ‘be treated as non-parties pending the outcome of their qualified immunity appeals.’ . . . That meant that they could be subject to discovery requests only as non-party fact witnesses regarding wholly separate claims against other defendants. The district court explained that, ‘[i]f the state and MDEQ defendants are eventually dismissed as a result of their pending appeals, they will still be required to respond to discovery as a non-party.’ . . . Discovery from the state defendants as non-party fact witnesses therefore was ‘inevitable.’ . . . We disagree with Snyder and Dillon that the district court’s ‘non-party’ versus ‘party’ distinction is meaningless, or that it permits an end-run around their entitlement to immunity. The district court was clear that no party may seek discovery from the state defendants on the particular claim that they continue to litigate with respect to immunity. . . . If these non-party depositions turn out to be a ruse—as Snyder and Dillon assert that they are—Snyder and Dillon are free to object and move for a protective order at the district court level as issues arise. It is inappropriate for us, however, to issue a prophylactic order to stop these depositions from going forward based on hypothetical horrors before a single problematic question has been asked. For all these reasons, we conclude that Snyder and Dillon are not likely to succeed on their appeal from the district court's order denying them a protective order. . . . The critical difference between Skousen/Everson and this case is that Skousen and Everson concerned a district court's delay in ruling on a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. The district courts temporarily denied the defendants' summary judgment motions to permit additional discovery—but we authorized the appeal because that decision operated, for our purposes, as a denial of summary judgment on the question of qualified immunity. Thus, the orders at issue in Skousen and Everson fall into Sinclair's second bucket for the types of rulings that are eligible for immediate interlocutory appeal. The orders in those cases were not discovery orders. The collateral order doctrine is already an exception to the general finality rule. Snyder and Dillon are not entitled to appeal any number of discovery matters that they believe have some impact on their immunity interest. We can only imagine the deluge of appeals that would descend upon us if standard discovery orders could so easily be rebranded as final judgments. Finally, we underscore that the district court's discovery order fully takes into account the need for a pause in discovery regarding the claim on which Snyder and Dillon assert qualified immunity, and it orders limited discovery as non-party fact witnesses regarding other claims in the litigation. The district court took the state defendants' immunity seriously. If the noticing parties fail to comply with the district court's order by pressing an inappropriate line of questioning, Snyder and Dillon may assert their objections in the district court. But ordering Snyder and Dillon to comply with discovery requests as non-party fact witnesses to events regarding wholly separate claims against different defendants does not, in the abstract, interfere with their immunity. We reject Snyder's and Dillon's attempt to dress up the district court's discovery order as an implicit denial of qualified immunity. We accordingly DISMISS for lack of jurisdiction their appeal No. 20-1352.”)

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 623, 624 (6th Cir. 2014) (“In the context of qualified immunity, deferential review of a district court order limiting discovery is imperative. . . .Discovery is disfavored in this context, but ‘limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.’ Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n. 14, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). In Crawford–El, after noting the ‘many options’ a district court judge has in conducting discovery in a qualified immunity case, the Supreme Court explained: ‘Of course, the judge should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, such as the actions that the official actually took, since that defense should be resolved as early as possible.’. Appellants assert that the district court erred when it permitted the appellants to depose certain appellees but limited the depositions to the qualified immunity issue. The district court, after briefing on the issue, authorized three-hour depositions of Verhiley, Cross, Mayer, Faith, Metcalf, and two non-defendant law enforcement officers. This was after appellees had voluntarily disclosed a tremendous number of documents. . . .The district court followed the Supreme Court’s dictates on discovery in qualified immunity cases precisely. . . .Because a plaintiff cannot sustain a § 1983 or Bivens claim without a showing of personal responsibility on the part of the defendant, ... appellants' Fourth Amendment claims—and the accompanying qualified immunity defenses—turned in large part on the individual actions of the defendants in this case. The same is true for the alleged Brady violations. Finally, as to appellants' argument that the conspiracy claims necessitated information about the wider investigation, no conspiracy can exist without the appellees' participation. The district court therefore did not err when it limited discovery to information pertaining to appellees' conduct.”)

Reilly v. Vadlamudi, 680 F.3d 617, 628 (6th Cir. 2012) (“The district court understandably struggled with granting Defendants immunity at an early stage in the litigation. However, as previously emphasized, the purpose of qualified immunity is ‘to ensure that insubstantial claims against government officials are resolved at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’. . . For that reason, district courts in some cases ‘will be able to establish entitlement to qualified immunity ... even before discovery.’. . . This is one of those cases. A thorough review of the pleadings reveals that Dr. Vadlamudi and nurse Payne may have been negligent in diagnosing or treating Plaintiff. However, neither negligent medical care, nor the delay in providing medical care, can rise to the level of a constitutional violation absent specific allegations of sufficiently harmful acts or omissions reflecting deliberate indifference.”).

Alspaugh v. McConnell, 643 F.3d 162, 168 (6th Cir. 2011) (“We . . . note that it is not proper to grant summary judgment without giving Alspaugh an opportunity to engage in discovery merely because the state defendants asserted qualified immunity as a defense. While we held in Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886 (6th Cir.2004), that a district court must address the question of qualified immunity prior to discovery, we did not hold that any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery. Rather, we merely instructed the district court to scrutinize the plaintiff’s complaint to determine whether a violation of a clearly established constitutional right was alleged. . . In Adams v. Metiva, 31 F.3d 375, 387 (6th Cir.1994), we made clear that where the issue of qualified immunity turns on contested issues of fact, its determination is not one for summary judgment.”)

Short v. Oaks Correctional Facility, No. 03-2089, 2005 WL 1002011, at *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 29, 2005) (unpublished) (“The plaintiff in Skousen failed to respond to the defendants’ motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity and failed to file a Rule 56(f) affidavit explaining her inability to file affidavits in opposition to the defendants’ motion. Faced with similar circumstances in the present case, the district court found that there were no facts material to Plaintiff-Appellant’s claims that were genuinely at issue and, therefore, it was proper to consider the motions prior to discovery.”).

Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886, 887(6th Cir. 2004) (“This Court has held on multiple prior occasions that, when faced with a motion based on qualified immunity, a district court can not avoid ruling on the issue. . . In the case of Skousen v. Brighton High School, we concluded that a district court committed legal error in dismissing a motion for summary judgement based on qualified immunity solely because discovery was not complete . . . We held that, because the defense of qualified immunity is a threshold question, if the defense is properly raised prior to discovery, the district court has a duty to address it. . . . Rather than dismiss the [summary judgment] motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine—prior to permitting further discovery—whether [Plaintiff’s] complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Only after the court inquires into whether any facts material to Plaintiff’s claims are genuinely at issue, and only upon a finding that material facts are in fact in dispute is a court at liberty to hold a motion for summary judgment in abeyance pending additional discovery. . . . Because the order denying summary judgment was premised on the legal question of qualified immunity rather than the existence of a genuine issue of material fact, the Court retained jurisdiction and found that an interlocutory appeal was proper. . . . As mentioned above, the district court’s denial of Leis’s summary judgment motion was based on an apparent belief that any decision regarding qualified immunity was premature and should await the close of discovery. When a motion for summary judgment is filed, the party opposing the motion may, by affidavit, explain why he is unable to present facts essential to justify the party’s opposition to the motion. . . . The burden is on the party seeking additional discovery to demonstrate why such discovery is necessary. . . . In this instance, in order to adequately oppose Leis’s motion for summary judgment, Summers should have filed a Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f) affidavit explaining his need for additional discovery.”)

Wallin v. Norman, 317 F.3d 558, 563, 564 (6th Cir. 2003) (“This court has recently held that a district court’s failure to rule on a motion for summary judgment until discovery was complete was legal error. [citing Skousen v. Brighton High School] Even though the defendants are free to renew their motion later, they would in the meantime be forced to go through a large part of the litigation process that the qualified immunity doctrine seeks to avoid. By failing to elaborate on why further discovery was necessary to properly decide the motion, the district court erroneously denied the defendants the benefit of their defense from suit (if that defense is, indeed, meritorious). We therefore conclude that the district court’s refusal to address the merits of the defendants’ motion based on qualified immunity was a conclusive determination for the purpose of allowing an interlocutory appeal. . . . Pursuant to Rule 56(f), a party opposing a motion for summary judgment is allowed to state that he or she is unable to present facts essential to justify the party’s opposition. In that situation, the district court may permit further discovery so that the nonmoving party can adequately oppose the motion for summary judgment. But it is up to the party opposing the motion to state why more discovery is needed. . . . Wallin did not file such an affidavit. In its absence, there is no justification for the district court’s blanket statement that a motion for summary judgment will be premature until the close of discovery.”).

Skousen v. Brighton High School, 305 F.3d 520, 527 (6th Cir. 2002) (“The district court’s failure to rule on the merits of Rambo’s summary judgment motion was legal error. Rather than dismiss the motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine—prior to permitting further discovery—whether Skousen’s complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. At that point, the court should have turned to the question of whether any facts material to Skousen's claims were genuinely at issue, an inquiry that required the court to review the motion and its supporting documents as well as the plaintiff's opposition and its supporting documents. Only then, and only on a finding that material facts were in dispute, was the court at liberty to hold the motion in abeyance pending discovery.”).

Evans v. Gordon, No. 2:24-CV-10289, 2024 WL 2819502, at *1–2 (E.D. Mich. June 3, 2024) (“Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c) authorizes a stay of discovery based on good cause. ‘Trial courts have broad discretion and inherent power to stay discovery until preliminary questions that may dispose of the case are determined.’ . . . Further, ‘[l]imitations on pretrial discovery are appropriate where claims may be dismissed “based on legal determinations that could not have been altered by any further discovery.”’ . . . On April 30, 2024, all defendants filed a motion to dismiss. . . . The motion raises the defenses of qualified immunity and failure to state a claim. . . . If granted in full, the case would be dismissed, making discovery unnecessary. Defendants argue that this means a stay of discovery until the motion is resolved is appropriate. The Supreme Court has said that until the threshold qualified immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed. . . . If defendants file a motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity, the court must ‘stay discovery until that issue is decided.’ . . . If defendants are denied qualified immunity on the motion to dismiss, then ‘plaintiff ordinarily will be entitled to some discovery.’ . . . In slight contrast to the above case, in In re Flint Water Cases, 960 F.3d 820, 826 (6th Cir. 2020), the Sixth Circuit upheld the district court’s crafting of a discovery plan that allowed discovery to proceed on issues that were not subject to defendants’ qualified immunity. Likewise, in Lewis v. Charter Twp. of Flint, No. 15-11430, 2015 WL 6125272, at *2 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 19, 2015), the district court allowed discovery to proceed in the face of a qualified immunity defense because ‘the record [was] in need of more factual development before a determination on whether [the defendant was] entitled qualified immunity [could] be made.’ . . . This case, however, is not like In re Flint or Lewis. Here, defendants’ qualified immunity defense encompasses all of plaintiffs’ claims, and discovery is not needed to answer the legal questions raised by the parties. Plaintiffs argue that they have only served defendants with twelve ‘narrow discovery requests, which in no way are unduly burdensome.’ . . . They cite Young v. Mesa Underwriters Specialty Ins. Co., No. 2:19-CV-3820, 2020 WL 7407735, at *3 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 19, 2020) for the proposition that these discovery requests represent ‘the same burden that nearly every defendant in this Court faces in civil litigation.’ However, Young explicitly stated that ‘[a]bsent a request to dismiss on the grounds of immunity or lack of jurisdiction, it is the rare case where the Court will stay discovery based on a pending dispositive motion.’ . . . Plaintiffs have failed to highlight authority that requires the Court to weigh the burden or hardship of the discovery in considering a stay in the face of defendants’ qualified immunity defense. Therefore, in light of defendants’ pending motion, which raises qualified immunity, there is no need for discovery to continue at this time. If any claims remain after the motion is resolved, the parties will be able to engage in discovery under a scheduling order to be entered by the district judge.”)

Fambrough v. City of East Cleveland, No. 1:22-CV-00992, 2023 WL 5207284, at *4 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 14, 2023) (“Although some prior decisions indicated a preference against motions to dismiss in favor of summary judgment for qualified immunity, the Sixth Circuit explained in Crawford that ‘no such preference applies to the violation-of-a-constitutional-right prong. After all, asking whether there was a violation of a constitutional right resembles the Rule 12(b)(6) question – has the plaintiff pleaded facts that state a claim for relief in the complaint?’ . . . As to the second prong for evaluating qualified immunity, ‘the inquiry is nuanced. Dismissing for qualified immunity on this ground is sometimes difficult because the clearly established inquiry may turn on case-specific details that must be fleshed out in discovery.’ . . . However, ‘a complaint distinguishable from ... past cases on its face will not often survive a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. This is especially true where granting relief to the plaintiff can only be done by recognizing a novel constitutional right.’ . . . In sum, dismissal on qualified immunity grounds is proper when the ‘complaint establishes the defense.’”) Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 762 (6th Cir. 2020).

Mcmillen v. Windham, No. 3:16-CV-558-CRS, 2018 WL 652830, at *2–3 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 31, 2018) (Federal Magistrate Judge Colin Lindsay) (“The Court acknowledges the position taken by Movants and the language in the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit decisions that they cite. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit has stated broadly that ‘[t]he entitlement to qualified immunity involves immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.’ . . . ‘The philosophy behind the doctrine of qualified immunity “is a desire to avoid the substantial costs imposed on government, and society, by subjecting officials to the risks of trial.”’ . . . ‘Thus, when a defendant seeks dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity, “[a] stay of discovery is properly granted until the issue of immunity is resolved.. . . While cognizant of that background, the Court emphasizes that it is not required to grant Movants’ motion to stay. As the Sixth Circuit has noted, ‘its prior holdings should not be interpreted as standing for the proposition that “any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery.”’ . . . ‘Thus, discovery may be permitted, even where qualified immunity is raised, if it is appropriate to frame the immunity issue.’ . . . In a 2013 decision from this district, Locke v. Mooney, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102473 (W.D. Ky. July 22, 2013), for example, the Court permitted limited discovery when a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity was pending. . . . In Locke, the Court also permitted discovery to proceed on certain other claims that would survive regardless of the resolution of the motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . In this case, the Court is persuaded that discovery should not be stayed pending resolution of Movants’ motion to dismiss. As Plaintiffs emphasize, arguments regarding qualified immunity are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . . In this case, Movants seek to resolve the issue through a motion to dismiss and argue that the qualified immunity issue is solely a question of law that does not require any discovery. Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue in response to the motion to stay that qualified immunity is a fact-intensive issue that turns on the particular circumstances of each case. . . . This argument is consistent with Plaintiffs’ position in response to the motion to dismiss, in which they argue that the motion to dismiss should be converted to a motion for summary judgment and more discovery permitted prior to resolving the qualified immunity issue. . . Moreover, while they argue that discovery should be stayed, Movants concede that they served written discovery requests on Plaintiffs and participated in a deposition of Plaintiffs' expert witness. . . Based on the foregoing, the Court concludes that Movants are more amenable to participating in discovery during the pendency of their motion to dismiss than they profess to be in the motion to stay.")

Doe v. Ohio State Univ., No. 2:15-CV-2830, 2016 WL 6581843, at *14 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 7, 2016) (" 'Although an officer's "entitle[ment] to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.' Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 433–34 (6th Cir. 2015) . . . The concern at the Rule 12 stage is whether the plaintiff has alleged 'facts which, if true, describe a violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right of which a reasonable public official, under an objective standard, would have known.' Kennedy v. City of Cleveland, 797 F.2d 297, 299 (6th Cir. 1986). Even if the plaintiff has done so, the defendant may still be entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity 'if discovery fails to uncover evidence sufficient to create a genuine issue as to whether the defendant in fact committed those acts.' . . Doe cites a Fifth Circuit case for authority that 'a district court "may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The Sixth Circuit has not been explicit, like the Fifth Circuit has, about adopting a plan of narrowly tailored discovery to determine the issue of qualified immunity, but such a plan is consistent with the purposes of qualified immunity, namely, that 'insubstantial claims against government officials be resolved....at the earliest possible stage in litigation.' . . But whether the Court defers its ruling or simply denies Defendants' motion to dismiss, the Court will not make a final ruling on the issue of qualified immunity until after limited discovery. Here, the Court will grant in part and deny in part the motion to dismiss and permit limited discovery. If discovery fails to uncover sufficient evidence that the Administrators violated Doe's due process rights, then the Administrators may be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Porter v. City of Dyersburg, TN, No. 07-2638 B/P, 2008 WL 2222693, at *2 (W.D. Tenn. Apr. 2, 2008) ("[A]lthough 'limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity,' . . . neither the motion for leave to permit discovery nor the affidavits from Porter and attorney Richardson set forth with any particularity the 'limited' discovery that Porter needs to address the qualified immunity defense. Instead, Porter asks that the court allow him to proceed to engage in discovery relating essentially to all issues in this litigation. . . . For these reasons, the motion for leave to permit discovery is DENIED, and all discovery in this matter is STAYED until the court decides the issue of qualified immunity.")

McMillen v. Windham, No. 3:16-CV-558-CRS, 2018 WL 652830, at *2–3 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 31, 2018) (Federal Magistrate Judge Colin Lindsay) ("The Court acknowledges the position taken by Movants and the language in the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit decisions that they cite. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit has stated broadly that '[t]he entitlement to qualified immunity involves immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.’ . . . ‘The philosophy behind the doctrine of qualified immunity “is a desire to avoid the substantial costs imposed on government, and society, by subjecting officials to the risks of trial.”’ . . . ‘Thus, when a defendant seeks dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity, “[a] stay of discovery is properly granted until the issue of immunity is resolved.”’ . . . While cognizant of that background, the Court emphasizes that it is not required to grant Movants’ motion to stay. As the Sixth Circuit has noted, ‘its prior holdings should not be interpreted as standing for the proposition that “any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery.”’ . . . ‘Thus, discovery may be permitted, even where qualified immunity is raised, if it is appropriate to frame the immunity issue.’ . . . In a 2013 decision from this district, Locke v. Mooney, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102473 (W.D. Ky. July 22, 2013), for example, the Court permitted limited discovery when a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity was pending. . . . In Locke, the Court also permitted discovery to proceed on certain other claims that would survive regardless of the resolution of the motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . In this case, the Court is persuaded that discovery should not be stayed pending resolution of Movants’ motion to dismiss. As Plaintiffs emphasize, arguments regarding qualified immunity are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . . In this case, Movants seek to resolve the issue through a motion to dismiss and argue that the qualified immunity issue is solely a question of law that does not require any discovery. Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue in response to the motion to stay that qualified immunity is a fact-intensive issue that turns on the particular circumstances of each case. . . . This argument is consistent with Plaintiffs’ position in response to the motion to dismiss, in which they argue that the motion to dismiss should be converted to a motion for summary judgment and more discovery permitted prior to resolving the qualified immunity issue. . . . Moreover, while they argue that discovery should be stayed, Movants concede that they served written discovery requests on Plaintiffs and participated in a deposition of Plaintiffs’ expert witness. . . . Based on the foregoing, the Court concludes that Movants are more amenable to participating in discovery during the pendency of their motion to dismiss than they profess to be in the motion to stay.”)

Hagan v. City of Cleveland, 2007 WL 893825, at 6-8 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 22, 2007) (“Thus, the court finds that ‘limited discovery’ is necessary before the merits of Franko’s motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved. . . . The Supreme Court has instructed that such discovery should be tailored specifically to the question of the officer’s qualified immunity. . . . The court should limit discovery to those issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, ‘such as the actions that the official actually took.’ . . . The constitutional violation alleged here is excessive (deadly) force, not an improper pursuit, nor an arguably ill-advised decision to enter a building in pursuit, without backup assistance. . . . Here, the crime suspected by the police was possession or sale of drugs, and Renshaw was apparently attempting to evade further investigation or arrest by flight. What is contested is whether Renshaw posed an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Franko, or whether he was actively resisting arrest, at the time of their confrontation on the apartment building stairway. No eyewitnesses (other than Franko) to the shooting itself are known to exist. The specific discovery as sought by Hagan cannot be characterized as ‘limited.’ Although Hagan acknowledges that an investigation into the shooting resulted in a Use of Deadly Force Investigation Team report, Hagan apparently seeks to reconstruct that entire investigation step-by-step. Thus, he seeks to depose at least 23 individuals, but only after ‘complete responses to interrogatories and document requests because that information will be used during the depositions.’ . . . Hagan acknowledges that he has already received relevant evidence from the defendants through an open records act request. . . . The court finds that limited discovery into facts underlying the assertion of qualified immunity is appropriate. That discovery shall be limited to that evidence which would directly relate to the disputed events on the stairway that led to Renshaw’s death. In other words, discovery shall be limited to that which would shed light on the factual basis supporting (or not) Officer Franko’s assertion of the necessity of the use of force at that point, such as the forensic evidence, the autopsy, evidence that would indicate the location of the parties at the time of the shooting, and so forth. Hagan is directed to narrow his discovery requests in light of this ruling, and to propound such amended requests to the defendants.”).

O’Neil v. Kiser, Civil No. 03-CV-10001-BC, 2005 WL 579719, at *3, *4 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 8, 2005) (“It is true that the purpose of the qualified immunity defense is to protect government officials from ‘the broad-ranging discovery that can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.’ . . . However, the issue of qualified immunity requires an exploration of the contours of the constitutional rights in issue in the context of the specific facts of the case. . . . Those questions, in turn, will involve exploration of ‘the circumstances with which the official is confronted, and often on the information that he possesses.’ . . . The critical inquiry is ‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation confronted.’ . . . All the dimensions of that ‘situation,’ therefore, are the proper subject of discovery. . . . The matter has been referred to the magistrate judge for pretrial case management, where it soon will return. The Court has no doubt that the magistrate judge is more than equal to the task of managing discovery within the proper framework as outlined by circuit precedent.”).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Hansen v. Cannon, No. 01-3076, 2001 WL 1637660, at *2 (7th Cir. Dec. 18, 2001) (Not published) (“On appeal the Hansens first argue that the district court improperly stayed discovery pending the outcome of the defendants’ motions for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. As the district court observed, one purpose of qualified immunity is to protect public officials from ‘broad-ranging discovery’ that can be ‘peculiarly disruptive of effective government.’ . . . But qualified immunity does not shield public officials from discovery entirely. If the Hansens’ allegations stated a claim that the defendants violated a clearly established law, and the parties disagreed as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.”)

Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at 2-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) (“In their present motion, the District and Jackson seek reconsideration of the Court’s denial of their motions in limine nos. 4 and 10. In those motions, defendants sought an order barring questioning of any School Board members at trial regarding their motivations for what they characterize as the reorganization (plaintiff characterizes it as a termination of his employment) on the grounds of legislative immunity from suit, as well as any comment about those motivations by Trombetta or his attorneys (motion # 4), and any reference to their motives regarding the ‘termination’ (motion # 10). . . . Defendants’ request to preclude any inquiry or mention of their motives amounts to a request for entry of summary judgment. Were the Court to grant what defendants request, the case would be over. A claim of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights requires the plaintiff to prove that he suffered adverse action because of his exercise of protected rights, or, to put it another way, that ‘the defendants’ actions [were] motivated by [the plaintiff’s] constitutionally protected speech.’ . . . The plaintiff cannot conceivably prevail without introducing evidence of, and arguing, the motivation of those who made the decision he attacks—in this case, Superintendent Jackson, Mayor Serpico, and the Board as a whole. Thus if defendants prevail on their motion for reconsideration, they are entitled to judgment in their favor. This request amounts to a motion for summary judgment which is not made in timely fashion. . . . There is another significant reason why defendants’ claim is without merit. The District and Jackson argue that the Board members’ legislative role entitles them to a testimonial privilege against inquiry about their reasons for acting. Even were this a viable claim, it is beyond question that the Board members have waived any such privilege. Each of the Board members appeared, without objection, for a deposition (nearly a year ago) and testified fully and completely about all of the events surrounding the termination / reorganization, including inquiries about their motives in acting as they did. If a testimonial privilege existed, it existed when the depositions were taken. Yet the Board members testified at their depositions about their reasons for acting, and they made no effort to seek a protective order barring inquiries about their reasons for acting as they did. . . . Finally, other than citing a plethora of cases, most of them either state-law decisions or non-controlling decisions of other district courts, defendants have made no effort to focus the Court in on any cases like this one in which the decision under attack is an employment-related decision by a public body and the plaintiff’s claim is one that, as noted earlier, requires inquiry into the motivating factors for the decision. Based on our quick review, most of the cases appear to concern zoning matters, not the termination of a person’s employment. If the purported evidentiary privilege proposed by the District and Jackson barred inquiry into the motivations of the members of a public entity that made employment decisions, it effectively would amount to a grant of immunity not just to the entity’s individual members, but to the entity as a whole. If accepted, this would not only contravene Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), in which the Supreme Court held that municipal bodies sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 are not entitled to the immunities from suit available to government officials, but would also effectively abrogate prohibitions against employment discrimination (Title VII, the ADEA, the ADA) for any municipal body whose “legislative” members are given decision making authority over employment matters. Defendants have marshaled no support for such a sweeping rule.”).

Kaufman v. Saari, 889 F. Supp. 1105, 1113 (E.D. Wis. 1995) (“The plaintiffs state that they have been prevented from engaging in discovery due to stays on discovery imposed by the court prior to resolution of the issue of qualified immunity. They contend that summary judgment is inappropriate because they have not had an opportunity to engage in discovery The plaintiffs ignore the instruction of the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. Forsyth that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials from the burdens of litigation and the corresponding burden of discovery where a plaintiff has failed sufficiently to demonstrate a violation of clearly established law. [cite omitted] While I found the allegations of the plaintiffs’ complaint sufficient to meet the minimal pleading standards imposed by Rule 8(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, I reserved judgment on the question of qualified immunity. The limited information presented by the plaintiffs in response to the defendant’s motion shows that their claims are the type of ‘insubstantial claims’ which should be resolved under the doctrine of qualified immunity prior to the commencement of discovery. [cite omitted] The plaintiffs are expected to have some factual support for their claims prior to commencing their action.”).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Green v. City of St. Louis, 52 F.4th 734, 740 (8th Cir. 2022) (“It is true that this court has held ‘[l]imited discovery is sometimes appropriate “to resolve the qualified immunity question.”’ . . . However, we have also held that if there has been ‘extensive discovery[,]’ and a plaintiff is still only able to allege bare legal conclusions, the case should be dismissed. . . . Green attempts to distinguish the present case from Faulk by saying that this case alleges all the officers were on the SWAT team, were working that night, and have no established alibi during the incident. The complaint did not plausibly allege that the eight officers were personally involved in the violation of clearly established constitutional rights. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of Officers Manasco, Coats, Becherer, Tesreau, Flatley, Busso, Long and Boyce’s motion to dismiss.”)

Johnson v. Moody, 903 F.3d 766, 772-74 (8th Cir. 2018) (“The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit that should be resolved ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation’ to ensure that insubstantial damage claims against government officials are resolved ‘prior to discovery.’ . . . When plaintiff has asserted a § 1983 claim requiring proof of wrongful motive, and defendant asserts a pre-discovery claim of qualified immunity, the district court ‘may insist that the plaintiff put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations that establish improper motive,’ ‘should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense,’ and has ‘broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.’ . . . To defeat a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the plaintiff must put forth facts showing that the officer’s conduct violated a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . . The district court has discretion to decide ‘which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’. . . Thus, when Defendants moved for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for Moody and Mathis, supported by their testimony at the state court suppression hearing and the state court’s finding—however limited—of no bad faith, Plaintiffs were required to respond with affirmative evidence of bad faith if bad faith was an essential element of their Count I claims. . . . Here, in response to Defendants’ qualified immunity motion, Plaintiffs presented no evidence tending to refute or contradict Defendants’ strong evidence from the state court proceedings that their conduct in investigating C.P.’s serious allegation of sexual misconduct, however questionable or incomplete, was not conscious-shocking behavior as a matter of law. Rather, Plaintiffs asked the district court to defer ruling on qualified immunity until after they subjected Moody and Mathis to extensive, burdensome discovery. The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying this request, consistent with the teaching of Crawford-El v. Britton and other Supreme Court and circuit court precedents. Based on the summary judgment record, the district court concluded, as Pearson v. Callahan expressly authorized, that Moody and Mathis were entitled to qualified immunity from the Count I claims, not simply because the law was not clearly established, but because their conduct in investigating did not violate Johnson’s constitutional rights. This ruling was consistent with our decision in Akins v. Epperly, and Plaintiffs do not challenge it on appeal. Evidence that investigators ignored factual inconsistencies in the evidence, negligently failed to look into leads, and did not question the alleged victim’s credibility is insufficient to establish that they investigated in a reckless, conscience-shocking manner. . . . Plaintiffs did not request additional discovery focused on the qualified immunity issue. The district court’s determination that Plaintiffs presented no evidence refuting Defendants’ showing of no bad faith or conscience-shocking investigation was essential in resolving the threshold qualified immunity issue. And that determination proved to be fatal to all of Plaintiffs’ claims against the City and the Police Department Defendants as a matter of law. Plaintiffs requested time to conduct wide-ranging discovery into all aspects of the investigation and numerous Police Department policies. But they made no showing (i) that any sought-after facts are essential to resist summary judgment on any of their claims, or (ii) that any such evidence actually exists. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Plaintiffs’ Rule 56(d) request to defer its ruling until additional discovery was completed and in granting summary judgment dismissing all claims.”) Janis v. Biesheuvel, 428 F.3d 795, 800, 801 (8th Cir. 2005) (“Janis further argues that she could prove that a genuine issue of material fact exists if she is permitted to engage in discovery. Qualified immunity is an immunity from suit, not simply from liability. . . Its purpose is to ‘avoid Asubject[ing] government officials either to the costs of trial or to the burdens of broad-reaching discovery’” in cases where the legal norms the officials are alleged to have violated were not clearly established at the time.’. . . Accordingly, ‘[u]nless the plaintiff’s allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law, a defendant pleading qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal before commencement of discovery.’. . . Janis claims to be seeking the following additional information: 1) what was demonstrated by the tape recordings of radio traffic between the people involved in the incident; 2) what the officers remember regarding the incident that is not contained in the police reports; 3) what Richards stated to officers at the scene; 4) what movements Richards made within his vehicle other than grabbing the steering wheel; 5) how long it took for officers to remove Richards; 6) whether the other officers involved remember the incident the same way as the two primary two officers; 7) what the training of each involved officer was; and 8) whether these officers required to participate in additional training because of other past incidents of excessive force. However, Janis already possessed police reports of the incident, a transcript of the radio traffic between a highway patrol trooper who was involved in the pursuit and the dispatcher, and the daily activity report from the Fall River County Dispatcher. Janis also had affidavits from both officers involved in removing Richards from his vehicle. Finally, Janis had a videotape from one of the officers' vehicles that provided a partially obstructed view of the events that transpired when Richards was pulled over. Thus, the district court reasonably concluded that Janis already had much of the information she might have found with further discovery. Accordingly, Janis failed to meet her burden of establishing that the amount of force used was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, the officers' actions do not constitute a violation of a constitutional right.”)

Lovelace v. Delo, 47 F.3d 286, 287 (8th Cir. 1995) (“[I]f the plaintiffs’ allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law and the parties disagree as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.”).

McCabe v. Macaulay, 450 F.Supp.2d 928, 935, 936 (N.D. Iowa 2006) (“In sum, for the court to make a determination as to whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, Plaintiffs are entitled to know what facts the Individual Federal Defendants were presented with at the time of Plaintiffs’ arrests. . . The mere fact that the Individual Federal Defendants have asserted a qualified immunity defense does not completely eviscerate the Plaintiffs’ right to conduct discovery. . . For the defense of qualified immunity to have meaning, however, discovery in this case must be narrowly tailored to only those facts essential to deciding whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to that defense. . . . For example, in granting Plaintiffs’ Rule 56(f) Motion, the court does not grant Plaintiffs the right to conduct far-reaching discovery to pursue their theory that a nationwide conspiracy existed within the highest levels of the Secret Service to suppress dissent at President Bush’s re-election rallies. Whether or not such a conspiracy existed is immaterial to the qualified immunity defense presently before the court. . . Accordingly, the court shall grant in part Plaintiffs’ Rule 56(f) Motion. Plaintiffs are entitled to limited discovery, that is, to know the circumstances surrounding their arrests, insofar as those facts might reveal what information the Individual Federal Defendants possessed at the time each acted. . . In other words, only discovery that is ‘essential’ to resolve the Individual Federal Defendants’ qualified immunity defenses shall be permitted.”).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Costa v. County of Ventura, 680 F. App'x 545, ____ (9th Cir. 2017) (“The district court abused its discretion by denying all discovery after the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity. ‘[L]imited discovery, tailored to the issue of qualified immunity, will sometimes be necessary before a district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment.’ Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 973 (9th Cir. 2009) (first citing Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 646 n.6 (1987); then citing Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n.14 (1998) (plurality opinion)). Specifically, if the actions alleged by the plaintiff are such that no reasonable officer could have believed them lawful, and if the officer alleges that she took actions different from those alleged by the plaintiff, ‘then discovery may be necessary before [the plaintiff]’s motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved.’ Anderson, 483 U.S. at 646 n.6. Here, the Estate alleged the violation of a clearly established right under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, namely the excessive force allegedly used by an officer, who the Estate claims shot Costa while Costa was immobilized by the officer’s dog. This version of events conflicts with the officer’s declaration that the dog did not succeed in immobilizing Costa. The district court denied the Estate the opportunity to conduct discovery, then granted summary judgment based on exhibits tendered by the defendants. In particular, it relied on the officer’s affidavit and the unsworn interview of the other eyewitness. Under Anderson, the defendants’ claim of qualified immunity did not prohibit the district court from allowing the Estate to obtain discovery. The district court therefore abused its discretion by precluding the Estate from taking the depositions of the only living individuals who witnessed the shooting and instead relying exclusively on the defendants’ declarations supporting their version of the events. At a minimum, the denial of such discovery deprived the Estate of any opportunity to test the defendants’ declarations through depositions, and it thereby prejudiced the Estate.”)

Committee for Immigrant Rights of Sonoma County v. County of Sonoma, No. C 08-4220 PJH, 2009 WL 2382689, at *27, *28 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2009) (“The parties argue at length about the applicability of Iqbal to this case in general and to discovery in particular. As should be apparent from the court’s citation to Iqbal throughout this order, the court finds that notwithstanding the factual distinctions, the Supreme Court’s latest pronouncement on pleading standards applies to this case, just as does Twombly. A quick Westlaw search reflects that Iqbal has been cited nearly 1000 times by district and appellate courts in the few months since its issuance, so the court’s conclusion is no stretch. There is little case law, however, in the wake of Iqbal elucidating the relationship between the adequacy of the pleadings and the plaintiff’s right to engage in discovery and the court has not yet determined exactly how it will apply the reasoning of that case to this and the hundreds of other pending cases on the court’s docket. For now the court relies on Rule 26(c) under which County Defendants have brought their motion for a protective order, while looking to Iqbal for guidance. In attempting to reach an appropriate balance the court has considered several factors. Like Iqbal, this case raises significant issues of qualified immunity. Given that the purpose of a qualified immunity defense is not only to permit the accused government official to avoid liability, but also to free that official from the disruptions, inconvenience and expense of discovery, a goal that would be defeated if discovery were permitted. The court has already found that qualified immunity is a viable defense for the individual federal defendants and County defendants have indicated an intent to raise the defense after the claims are clarified in an amended complaint. On the other hand, this case, unlike Iqbal involves, in addition to government officials, government agencies which are not subject to qualified immunity. Given the sheer scope of the claims and the rulings in favor of plaintiffs that the court has made in this order, it is unlikely that this case will be entirely disposed of on any number of motions to dismiss. Thus, discovery is inevitable. On balance, the court finds that good cause exists to impose a limited stay of discovery. Thus, County Defendants' motion for a protective order is granted and plaintiffs' motion to compel is denied. County defendants need not respond to the outstanding discovery and no new discovery may be propounded pending plaintiffs' filing of the first amended complaint and County Defendants' response. Following the court's review it will be determined whether discovery should proceed against either the government agencies or the individual defendants or both.”).

Tubar v. Clift, No. C05-1154JCC, 2006 WL 521683, at 2-4 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 2, 2006) (“The seemingly broad prohibition on discovery announced in Harlow has not gone unqualified, however. First, qualified immunity is available only to individual government officials, not governmental entities. . . . Second, where there is a dispute as to both the reasonableness of the official's actions and the factual characterization of those actions, the U.S. Supreme Court has acknowledged that a plaintiff may be permitted to carry out a limited amount of discovery ‘tailored specifically to the question of [an official's] qualified immunity.’[citing Anderson] In effect, the defense of qualified immunity only protects government officials from ‘broad-reaching’ discovery. . . . With respect to the first and second categories of discovery requests that Defendants seek to stay, the Court finds that Defendant Clift is entitled to protection against discovery requests propounded to him personally. However, because there appears to be a factual dispute as to the underlying events in this case, Defendant Clift should be required to answer any discovery seeking information relating to the actual events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Therefore, Clift individually is required to provide responses to requests for written discovery and documents if those requests specifically relate to the parties’ factual disputes concerning the shooting incident at issue in the present case. Further, Defendant Clift may be deposed, but the scope of the deposition must be strictly limited to questioning regarding the events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Any discovery that is outside this limited inquiry will be stayed. . . . The Court must undertake a more detailed analysis with respect to the written discovery requests propounded to Defendant City. At the outset, the Court notes that Defendants’ motion to stay has been filed on behalf of both Officer Clift and the City. However, Defendant City is not permitted to assert a defense of qualified immunity and is accordingly not entitled to a stay of discovery on the written discovery enumerated in the motion, even if such requests seek personal information concerning Defendant Clift Although the Court is mindful of the various policy justifications for the Harlow rule, the Court does not read Harlow so broadly as to necessarily prohibit any and all discovery relating to a government official asserting a defense of qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, a stay on Plaintiff’s written discovery requests to Defendant City merely because the information concerns Defendant Clift would exceed the proper reach of a stay justified by Defendant Clift’s assertion of qualified immunity in this case. Defendant City argues, however, that certain items of discovery directed to it can only be answered by Defendant Clift and that the mere fact that Plaintiff has directed discovery to the City in name only should not undermine Defendant Clift's protection from discovery in this matter. . . This argument has merit, because allowing such conduct would circumvent the policy underlying Harlow. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendant City is required to answer Plaintiff's requests for written discovery. However, in keeping with the protection from discovery of Defendant Clift himself, the Court makes the following exception to the City's requirement to answer discovery. To the extent that an answer to any of Plaintiff's requests (1) legitimately would require Defendant Clift's personal knowledge or consultation of documents exclusively under his control, and (2) bears upon matters beyond an inquiry into the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City need not include that information in its responses. However, as to requests that do bear upon the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City must provide answers, even if such answers require consulting Defendant Clift, because Defendant Clift is not protected from such discovery. Further, in the event that Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense is denied, Defendant City will be required to supplement its responses in accordance with the discovery rules. The limited stay on discovery ordered here is not an invitation for Defendants to avoid legitimate discovery requests by trumpeting Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense. Accordingly, Defendants are advised to review written discovery responses to ensure that they are consistent with the dictates of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(g) and 37(g).").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Brown v. City of Tulsa, 124 F.4th 1251, 1269-70 (10th Cir. 2025) (“[C]onducting Pickering balancing is usually inappropriate – if not impossible – at the motion to dismiss stage. Several of our sister Circuits have echoed this point, . . . and we have likewise recognized it, though in unpublished, non-precedential decisions. . . This same rationale is why, in a First Amendment retaliation claim in the public employment context, qualified immunity usually cannot be afforded at the motion to dismiss stage either. . . Practically speaking, the plaintiff will not know what interest the government will assert, how it will assert it, or what disruption the government claims the speech caused, making it impossible for the plaintiff to (1) allege facts sufficient to show that the defendant ‘plausibly violated their constitutional rights,’ and (2) identify a materially similar case where the employee prevailed to demonstrate that their First Amendment right was clearly established. . . In sum, ‘application of the Pickering balancing test will be possible only after the parties have had an opportunity to conduct some discovery.’ . . By granting the motions to dismiss, the district court erred by jumping the gun on conducting the balancing test before the parties proceeded to discovery.”)

Stonecipher v. Valles, 759 F.3d 1134, 1148, 1149 (10th Cir. 2014) (“The Stoneciphers make one last procedural argument. They contend the district court abused its discretion when they were denied the opportunity for additional discovery before it granted the defendants’ motions for summary judgment. . . But because qualified immunity protects against the burdens of discovery as well as trial, a district court may stay discovery upon the filing of a dispositive motion based on qualified immunity. . . The court may grant pre-discovery summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity if the plaintiffs cannot explain ‘how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant’s showing of objective reasonableness.’ . . . If, however, the district court determines it cannot rule on the immunity defense without clarifying the relevant facts, the court ‘may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.’ . . . The district court concluded, and we agree, that Valles possessed arguable probable cause for the arrest and charging decision. The Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery would enable them to rebut this showing. In their reply brief, the Stoneciphers mention that discovery would allow them to obtain the complete correspondence between Valles and Jennings, but they do not explain how this material would rebut the finding of arguable probable cause. . . . Both Valles and Jennings averred that Jennings independently reviewed Mr. Stonecipher’s file. Because the Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery will allow them to rebut the finding of objective reasonableness, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment for the defendants without allowing for discovery.”)

Jones v. Hernandez, 2007 WL 4269052, at *3, *4 (10th Cir. Dec. 6, 2007) (“While a ruling on qualified immunity ‘should be made early in the proceedings,’ . . . discovery as to evidence central to the qualified immunity analysis must be allowed. . . . On the record before the district court, there was doubt as to whether the scoring protocol employed by the interview panel was subjective or objective. The district court should not have granted summary judgment while that factual dispute was still unresolved. . . . For the same reason, the court’s dismissal of Ms. Jones’ claims against Sheriff Hernandez was erroneous. Ms. Jones has alleged and may be able to prove that she had a property interest in promotion, based on a nondiscretionary mode of selection. Ms. Jones’ claims against Sheriff Hernandez cannot be resolved in his favor as a matter of law, but require factual development, along with the claims against the other defendants.”).

Mee v. Ortega, 967 F.2d 423, 430 (10th Cir. 1992) (factual disputes required more development before district court could rule on qualified immunity).

Lewis v. City of Ft. Collins, 903 F.2d 752, 754, 758 (10th Cir. 1990) (“Qualified immunity is not a shield from all discovery. . . . In some cases, discovery may be necessary to determine whether the defendants’ challenged conduct violated clearly established law and thus, whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. However, until the threshold immunity question is determined, discovery shall be limited to resolving that issue alone. [cites omitted] Based on the record before us, the order of the district court does not limit discovery to the resolution of the qualified immunity issue. As such, defendants have been denied their entitlement to be free from the burden of overbroad discovery. Accordingly, we have jurisdiction over this appeal. . . . Liberal application of rule 56(f) should not be allowed to subvert the goals of Harlow and its progeny. [cite omitted] Accordingly, in response to a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity, a plaintiff’s 56(f) affidavit must demonstrate ‘how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant’s showing of objective reasonableness’ or, stated alternatively, demonstrate a ‘connection between the information he would seek in discovery and the validity of the [defendant’s] qualified immunity assertion.’ [cite omitted] To that end, it is insufficient for the party opposing the motion to merely assert that additional discovery is required to demonstrate a factual dispute or ‘that evidence supporting a party’s allegation is in the opposing party’s hands.’” [cites omitted]).

Estate of Mirabel v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. 2:24-CV-146 JCH/KRS, 2024 WL 1376810, at *1 (D.N.M. Apr. 1, 2024) (“ ‘Standard practice in this District is to stay discovery—as to all defendants—when the defense of qualified immunity has been raised.’ Higgins v. Saavedra, 2017 WL 1437317, at *1 (D.N.M.). This is because ‘[q]ualified immunity is an entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation. The privilege is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability[.]’ . . . Thus, in general, when a defendant asserts the defense of qualified immunity, the district court should stay discovery until the immunity issue is resolved.”)

White v. Stone, No. 21-CV-1207-SCY-JFR, 2023 WL 402215, at *4-5 (D.N.M. Jan. 25, 2023) (“If an exception similar to the one described in Nieves applies to the arrest of parolees, and if the alleged parole violations for which Plaintiff was arrested are the type for which otherwise similarly situated individuals (parolees committing similar violations) who are not engaged in protected activity are not arrested, Plaintiff might be able to overcome Defendants’ qualified immunity defense. Thus, this category of information is directly related to Defendants’ qualified immunity defense. Moreover, in their summary judgment motion, Defendants argue that Plaintiff has failed to produce any evidence to support his argument under the Nieves exception. . . . But Plaintiff is unlikely to have access to admissible evidence related to whether parolees are typically not arrested for violations similar to those alleged against Plaintiff. The Court is not inclined to accept Defendants’ absence-of-evidence argument without first giving Plaintiff an opportunity to explore whether such evidence exists. As a result, the Court will allow Plaintiff to attempt to obtain evidence related to this Nieves-type exception through discovery. . . . In sum, the Court will allow Plaintiff to conduct limited discovery on who, if anyone, at APD contacted someone at New Mexico Probation and Parole Office between the time of the BLM protest and the issuance of the arrest order. The Court will further allow Plaintiff to inquire about what information, if any, was shared in such communication(s) and whether anyone at APD requested anyone at New Mexico Probation and Parole Office to issue an arrest order. Finally, the Court will allow Plaintiff to inquire about whether Plaintiff was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech are seldom, if ever, arrested. The parties shall confer in an attempt to agree on narrowly tailored discovery related to these two categories of information.”)

Encinias v. New Mexico Corrections Department, No. CV 21-1145 KG/SCY, 2022 WL 2341629, at *2 (D.N.M. June 29, 2022) (“[T]he Supreme Court has instructed that all discovery should be stayed upon the assertion of qualified immunity, even for those defendants not asserting the defense. . . . In addressing the same argument as the one Plaintiff presently raises, Judge Sweazea held that ‘[t]he Court is bound by Supreme Court and Tenth Circuit precedent that requires a stay of all discovery when a qualified immunity defense is raised, and standard practice in this District is to stay discovery—as to all defendants—when the defense of qualified immunity has been raised.’ Mathis v. Centurion Corr. Healthcare of New Mexico, LLC, No. 1:22-CV-20 JCH/KRS, 2022 WL 1987713, at *1 (D.N.M. June 6, 2022) (citing Higgins v. Saavedra, 2017 WL 1437317, at *1 (D.N.M.)). The Court agrees with this assessment.”)

Estate of McClain v. City of Aurora, Colorado, No. 20-CV-02389-DDD-NRN, 2021 WL 307505, at *2–4 (D. Colo. Jan. 29, 2021) (“There are certain circumstances when discovery is permissible despite an assertion of qualified immunity, including cases alleging official-capacity claims, requests for injunctive (as opposed to monetary) relief, and claims against entities, not individuals. . . Additionally, permitting discovery up until the point that qualified immunity is raised may be appropriate, particularly when the defense is not advanced until the filing of a motion for summary judgment. . . The Court finds that a balance of the above factors does not favor a stay in this matter. The individual Defendants’ mere assertion that they are entitled to qualified immunity does not end the analysis. Even when qualified immunity is raised, courts in this District generally disfavor a stay of all discovery. . . . I note that discovery will continue against the Defendant entity, the City of Aurora, for whom the defense of qualified immunity is not available. The individual Defendants would likely be witnesses with respect to the claims against the City of Aurora and will be deposed in any event. It makes no sense to have the individual Defendants be deposed as witnesses now, only to be re-deposed as parties later in the event their qualified immunity defenses are unsuccessful. Furthermore, the String Cheese factors weigh in favor of proceeding with discovery. . . . The plaintiffs here are family members of a dead young man. Elijah McClain’s family deserves answers to the questions of why he died and whether anyone or any entity is to be held to account. The wheels of justice turn slowly in any event, but issuing the requested stay would cause those wheels to simply grind to a halt, delaying for months or even years the process of answering those important questions. . . . In short, ‘Defendants have established no particularized facts that demonstrate they will suffer a clearly defined and serious harm associated with moving forward with discovery.’. . . Proceeding with discovery also promotes the Court’s interest in efficiently managing its docket. Finally, the interests of persons not parties to the civil litigation and the public interest are not harmed by moving forward with the case. To the contrary, the Court can take judicial notice that this case has received widespread attention locally, state-wide, and nationally. The public, too, has a strong interest in knowing the answers to the same difficult questions being posed by Mr. McClain’s family. It is not in the interest of the public or in the interest of justice to ‘put on the back burner’ discovery in a case that raises significant questions about the City of Aurora’s policing and paramedic practices. It may be that there is nothing constitutionally wrong with the conduct that eventually led to Mr. McClain’s death. If so, then the public will be better served by knowing that hard reality, as fairly determined by the judicial process, sooner rather than later. In short, a stay of discovery is not appropriate in this case.”)

Lowery v. County of Riley, 2008 WL 3562061, at *1, *2 (D. Kan. Aug. 12, 2008) (“There are three alternatives available to the Court concerning the scheduling of discovery in this case while awaiting a ruling by the Supreme Court on a Petition for Writ of Certiorari: (1) allow only discovery on the Monell claims to proceed; (2) stay all discovery; or (3) allow all discovery to proceed. The alternative to allow only Monell discovery presents problems that the Court has previously discussed. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to delineate precisely the scope of any discovery that could take place during pendency of the Petition for Writ of Certiorari on the Monell claims so that it did not include evidence related to the qualified immunity claims Defendants are attempting to vindicate. . . It was this blurred line between discovery related to Monell claims and discovery related to the Defendants' qualified immunity claims which concerned the Court during the Tenth Circuit appeal. As previously stated in the December 27, 2007 Memorandum and Order, if the Court were to allow 'limited' discovery to proceed (only on the Monell claims), there was a very real possibility that there would be a duplication of discovery in the future, particularly if the decision denying qualified immunity were affirmed. This would be both expensive and inefficient. Defendants argue that this fact justifies the second alternative—the continued stay of all discovery in this case pending decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court might agree had there been a dissenting opinion in the Tenth Circuit appeal or some indication that the decision by the Tenth Circuit was in conflict with those of other circuits or was a case of first impression. None of these circumstances are present in this case. There was no dissenting opinion, and only one judge out of the thirteen judges who considered the Petition for Rehearing En Banc voted to grant the motion. Nothing in the Tenth Circuit opinion indicates that it presents a case of first impression on a unique issue of law or that it is contrary to decisions of other circuits. While this is no guarantee that the Supreme Court will deny a petition for certiorari, it is a major indication of the difficulty Defendants face in convincing the Supreme Court that discretionary review is justified in this case. . . Thus, the present circumstances are significantly different than they were at the time this court previously refused to allow discovery to proceed during the Tenth Circuit appeal. Considering all the facts, the Court believes that the third alternative is the appropriate result. It is now time to move forward and complete all discovery so that there will be no further delays in setting a trial on the merits of Plaintiffs' claims. The case has been on file since March 2004, and Defendants have had ample opportunity to make their case for a finding of qualified immunity on the major claims brought by Plaintiffs. While there is still a chance that Defendants will prevail on their claim of qualified immunity in the Supreme Court, weighing that chance against the continued delay to Plaintiffs from their day in court leads the Court to deny the motion for any continued stay of discovery.”).

Howse v. Atkinson, No. Civ.A. 04-2341GTV-DJW, 2005 WL 994572, at *2 (D. Kan. Apr. 27, 2005) (not reported) (“The Court recognizes that staying discovery as to all Defendants has consequences to Plaintiff in that there are risks that witnesses’ memories will fade, witnesses may relocate, and documents may get misplaced or destroyed. The Court, however, finds that in this case the risk is slight because Defendants are only seeking to [sic] a temporary stay of discovery until the Court rules on the Motion to Dismiss, filed on February 25, 2005 and fully briefed on April 11, 2005. The Court finds that Defendant KUPI would be prejudiced from having to proceed with bifurcated discovery while the Court resolves the immunity issues raised by Defendants Atkinson and Hagedorn. The Court further finds that bifurcation of discovery would be inefficient. Although Defendant KUPI has not asserted an immunity defense that would warrant staying discovery pending a ruling on a dispositive motion, the Court finds that the risk of prejudice to Defendant KUPI from proceeding with bifurcated discovery while the Motion to Dismiss is

Rome v. Romero, 225 F.R.D. 640, 643, 644 (D. Colo. 2004) (“Although the Supreme Court recognizes that a well-supported claim of qualified immunity should shield a defendant from ‘unnecessary and burdensome discovery,’ Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 598, invocation of the defense is not a bar to all discovery. . . . Even where a qualified immunity defense is asserted, some limited discovery is still permitted. As the Supreme Court in Crawford-El observed, qualified immunity does not protect an official from all discovery, but only from that which is ‘broad-reaching.’ . . . Limited discovery may be necessary when the doctrine is asserted in a motion for summary judgment on contested factual assertions. . . . A plaintiff faced with a defense of qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment may also be entitled to conduct discovery to explore facts essential to justify opposition to the motion as provided for by Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f). . . . In addition, discovery up to the point when the qualified immunity issue is presented for adjudication may be appropriate. The protection of the governmental actor is best served when the issue of qualified immunity is raised at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. . . . Because the official controls when the issue is presented for adjudication, he cannot be said to be unduly burdened if he foregoes an opportunity to address the issue prior to the commencement of discovery, and instead waits to assert it until some point later in the litigation. In such circumstances, it may be appropriate to stay discovery only after the official presents the issue, and to require responses to existing discovery requests. . . . The foregoing discussion explores the type of discovery that the individual Defendants should be protected against: namely, discovery requests (i) directed against the individual Defendants, (ii) in support of a claim for monetary damages,[footnote omitted] (iii) which seek information other than that relating to disputed factual issues regarding the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense. By contrast, discovery requests directed at the institutional Defendants; relating to any claim for declaratory or injunctive relief; or seeking information regarding the individual Defendants’ version of the incidents in question are properly made, notwithstanding the pendency of the Motion for Summary Judgment.”).

Sonnino v. University of Kansas Hospital Authority, 220 F.R.D. 633, 639 (D. Kan. 2004) (“In this case, the Individual Hospital Defendants have filed neither a motion to dismiss nor a motion for summary judgment. They have only raised qualified immunity as a defense in their answer to Plaintiff’s Complaint. . . . By failing to assert the defense in a dispositive motion, the Individual Hospital Defendants have failed to place the issue of qualified immunity before the Court. While the Court recognizes that defendants are generally entitled to have the Court determine the issue of qualified immunity prior to their being subjected to discovery, they must take the necessary steps to bring the issue before the Court for resolution. Defendants are not entitled to an indefinite suspension of discovery while they ponder whether and when to file a motion to dismiss or for summary judgement. . . . In light of the above, the Court overrules the qualified immunity objections that the Individual Hospital Defendants have asserted in response to many of Plaintiff’s discovery requests.”), reconsidered in part, 221 F.R.D. 661 (D. Kan. 2004).

Quinn v. City of Kansas City, No. Civ.A. 98-2236-KHV, 1998 WL 919129, at *2, *3 (D.Kan. Nov. 6, 1998) (unpublished) (“[W]hile qualified immunity is a powerful defense in other contexts, in excessive force cases the substantive inquiry is the inquiry that decides whether the qualified immunity defense is available to the government actor. . . If plaintiff alleges that police used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the qualified immunity inquiry becomes indistinguishable from the merits of the underlying claim. Whether police used excessive force in a case under Section 1983 has always been seen as a factual inquiry best answered by the fact finder.”).

Van Deelen v. City of Eudora, No. 96-4040-SAC, 1997 WL 445821, at *2, *3 (D. Kan. May 8, 1997) (not reported) (“The defendant Diehl offers no authority for his argument that he cannot be compelled to participate in discovery as a witness to the claims against the other defendants. His protection from discovery extends only to the claims which are brought against him and to which he has properly asserted an immunity defense. Diehl does not contest the magistrate judge’s finding that his deposition ‘is necessary in order to complete discovery against the other defendants.’ . . . Consequently, the magistrate judge correctly permitted the deposition of Diehl to proceed as to the claims against the other defendants. The magistrate judge also allowed the deposition to ‘include the claims against Diehl since these claims may be factually intertwined with the other claims.’ The defendant Diehl does not contest the possibility of a factual relationship between the claims against him and the claims against the other defendants. Diehl simply sets up his right to avoid discovery on claims against him until the district court finally resolves his immunity defenses. In Diehl’s opinion, any intrusion denies him immunity. In this situation, the district court would agree that the deposition of the party asserting an immunity defense generally should proceed subject to the following conditions. The witness may be asked questions which relate to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants or which are likely to lead to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants. The witness may not be asked questions which do not satisfy either of the above relevance standards and which are related to the claims which the witness has asserted an immunity defense. The magistrate judge here avoided this more involved approach in favor of permitting Diehl’s deposition to proceed without a subject-matter limitation but with a time limitation. The magistrate judge balanced the interests of the other parties against the interests of Diehl in avoiding discovery. The magistrate judge found that a deposition limited to two hours was a minor intrusion to Diehl in contrast to the other parties’ interests in moving the litigation forward on the other claims. The district court finds that the magistrate judge did not clearly err in allowing Diehl’s deposition to proceed on certain conditions.”).

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Snead v. Georgia Department of Corrections, No. 24-10511, 2024 WL 4132941, at *3 (11th Cir. Sept. 10, 2024) (not reported) (“Snead insists that the district court properly deferred ruling on the immunity defenses because ‘[d]iscovery is required for [her] to get additional facts about the cause of Mincey’s death and the identity of those involved’ to support her claims. But as the Supreme Court has cautioned, the basic thrust of these immunity doctrines ‘is to free officials from the concerns of litigation, including avoidance of disruptive discovery.’ . . . And ‘the doors of discovery’ do not unlock ‘for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.’ . . . Accordingly, the district court erred in deferring ruling on the defendants’ qualified immunity and sovereign immunity under Georgia law defenses. Consequently, we vacate the district court’s order and remand for the court to decide the defendants’ immunity issues in the first instance.”)

Estate of Todashev by Shibly v. United States, 815 F. App’x 446, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) (“Plaintiff has explained, with as much specificity as he can, the informational disparity that renders him unable to adequately respond to the motion. Indeed, Plaintiff has offered what may well be the most recognized reason why a party should be given the shelter of Rule 56(d) from a pre-discovery motion for summary judgment: ‘[T]he key evidence lies in the control of the moving party.’ . . . And this is especially true in a deadly force case, where ‘the witness most likely to contradict the officers’ story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.’ . . . With regard to the district court’s grant of summary judgment to McFarlane, we vacate the judgment as premature. We express no opinion on the district court’s substantive ruling based upon the facts presented to it. Nor do we endorse Plaintiff’s suggestion that he should be allowed full discovery before the district court reconsiders the qualified immunity issue. We leave the scope of the appropriate discovery to the discretion of the district court on remand.”)

R.F.J. v. Fla. Dep’t of Children & Families, 743 F. App’x 377, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) (“Brady and Perry argue that the district court erred by deferring its ruling on their qualified-immunity defenses until after discovery is completed. . . . We agree. Qualified immunity is not a last exit before liability. Instead, qualified immunity is a right to be free from litigation altogether once the defense is established. . . . Otherwise, parties could be required to expend significant time, money, and energy only to go 90 miles down the road of a dead-end drive. . . . The district court’s deferral of its decision violates these principles. And it is not in keeping with our prior precedent in Howe. Like in this case, the district court in Howe delayed ruling on the officers’ qualified immunity and directed them to commence discovery. . . . We vacated that order and directed the district court to resolve the immunity defense ‘before requiring that the parties litigate Howe’s claims any further.’ . . . Although we understand the district court’s decision below, given the flurry of facts from outside the complaint, Brady and Perry are entitled to a ruling sooner rather than later. Consequently, we must vacate the district court’s order of November 18, 2016, and remand for the district court to take one of two actions: (1) enter a substantive ruling on Brady’s and Perry’s pending motion to dismiss or (2) grant Plaintiffs’ motion for leave to file a third amended complaint. . . . and deny as moot Brady’s and Perry’s pending motion to dismiss. Should the district court make the latter choice and should Brady and Perry again move to dismiss on qualified-immunity grounds, the district court should resolve those motions before requiring the parties to litigate the claims any further.”)

Howe v. City of Enterprise, 861 F.3d 1300, 1302-03 (11th Cir. 2017) (“In the present case, the district court’s order not only reserved ruling on the defendants’ claims to immunity until after Howe filed a second amended complaint, it also instructed the parties to confer and develop their Rule 26(f) report. Under Rule 26(f), the parties must confer and develop a proposed discovery plan, and ‘[i]n conferring, the parties must consider the nature and basis of their claims and defenses and the possibilities for promptly settling or resolving the case’ . . . The part of the order requiring the parties to confer and discuss settlement before the court ruled on the defendants’ motion to dismiss on immunity grounds is inconsistent with our decision in Bouchard Transportation. And the part of the order requiring the parties to develop their Rule 26(f) report before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is also inconsistent with Bouchard Transportation and other decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted. The district court’s order of March 31, 2016, is vacated except to the extent that it denies without prejudice the motion to dismiss on immunity grounds and directs Howe to amend his complaint again. After Howe has filed his second amended complaint, the defendants may file another motion to dismiss that includes assertions of immunity from suit. . . If they do so, the district court should decide those immunity issues before requiring that the parties litigate Howe’s claims any further.”)

S.D. v. St. Johns County School Dist. No., 3:09-cv-250-J-20TEM, 2009 WL 4349878, at 1-4 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 24, 2009) (“In Iqbal, the primary issue resolved by the Supreme Court related to the pleading requirements under Rule 8 and Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, not whether discovery must be stayed pending a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. [discussing Iqbal, Siegert, Harlow, Mitchell, Anderson] The Court notes that the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has used language that discovery should be delayed ‘if possible’ while dispositive motions are resolved to decrease costs to the litigants and save judicial resources. [discussing Eleventh Circuit cases] In the instant matter, unlike many of the aforementioned cases (if not all), the dispositive motion by the lead defendant, St. Johns County School District, has been resolved against it. Thus, the case will proceed. While the defense of qualified immunity with respect to the Individual Defendants have not yet been resolved, their knowledge of the underlying facts regarding this case would appear relevant to the claim against the School District. . . . Although the Court acknowledges that discovery should likely be stayed in situations where the granting of the motion to dismiss could dispose of the entire action, the facts that pertain to the instant matter are unique in the sense that Plaintiffs’ claims against the School District have survived the motion to dismiss stage of the proceedings Unless the Court stays all discovery, the Individual Defendants will nevertheless be subject to pretrial discovery as fact witnesses. . . . [T]he Court will amend its Order to the extent that any discovery sought from the Individual Defendants shall be limited to factual issues relevant to the suit against the School District. Discovery of facts relevant only to individual liability as to the named Individual Defendants is premature at this juncture; therefore, the Individual Defendants shall not be subject to such discovery. . . unless their motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity grounds is denied.”).

Martinez v. McCord, No. 1:06-CV-636-WKW, 2008 WL 2003789, at *6 n.9 (M.D. Ala. May 8, 2008) (“The court is mindful of the broad scope of qualified immunity and frequently faces pre-discovery motions to dismiss in § 1983 cases involving law enforcement actions. As the Eleventh Circuit has acknowledged in dicta, it is important to ‘purs[ue] discovery to a reasonable extent so as to permit appropriate factual showings [because] anything less may result in grants of summary judgment solely because of inadequate discovery.’ . . . With that in mind, however, the court is vested with ‘broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery,’ and expects to hear motions to ‘limit the time, place, and manner of discovery, or even bar discovery altogether on certain subjects,’ . . . so as to ‘Aprotect [] the substance of the qualified immunity defense.’”)

Marshall v. West, 2007 WL 1540231, at *9 (M.D. Ala. May 24, 2007) (“[T]he critical question is whether West and/or Hutson were aware of facts which arguably would have justified a reasonable suspicion of illegal activity. . . . Plaintiff essentially has argued that, without the benefit of discovery, it is impossible for him to allege those facts because he does not know what, if any, information Defendants possessed when they initiated the traffic stop. . . . Given the unique circumstances of this case, the court finds that it is appropriate to deny the motion to dismiss because the qualified immunity inquiry turns on facts which are within the knowledge and control of Defendants. . . . No proper purpose would be served by penalizing Plaintiff and dismissing his claim prior to discovery because he failed to plead facts of which he says he is unaware. As recited in the margin, other courts have denied qualified immunity at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage on similar grounds.[collecting cases]”).

K.M. v. Alabama Department of Youth Services, 209 F.R.D. 493,495 (M.D. Ala. 2002) (“The defendants [argue] that the claims against all of the defendants are so intertwined that allowing discovery to proceed against one is tantamount to allowing discovery to proceed against them all. According to the defendants, to preserve their immunity, should that immunity be found to exist on appeal, requires the prohibition of all discovery for all defendants during the pendency of the appeal. The court agrees that the discovery stay should generally extend to all discovery in this case, as there is no ascertainable line between that discovery needed in the case of the claims against Ziegler and Aseme and the claims of the other defendants. However, there is also equity in saying that this discovery stay should not result in unfair prejudice to the rights of the plaintiffs and their claims against Ziegler and Aseme, from the loss of records or witnesses occasioned by the delay on appeal by the other defendants. . . . Therefore, some leeway is appropriate to give the plaintiffs the assurance that this passage of time will not irrevocably prejudice their claims against the non-appealing defendants. They should be allowed to collect limited information in order to identify potentially critical witnesses and to preserve documents that may well be central to their litigation as to the non-appealing defendants. Because the parties are in the best position to advise the court as to how to achieve this goal with the interest of all taken into consideration, the court will order that the parties confer and submit to the court a joint “preservation” plan that satisfies the goals expressed in this order.”).

VI. WHEN IS RIGHT “CLEARLY ESTABLISHED?”

A. What Law Controls?

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Pina v. Estate of Dominguez, No. 24-152, 2025 WL 581576, at *1–2 (U.S. Feb. 24, 2025) (Alito, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (“To overcome qualified immunity, a party must show that an official violated a federal right that ‘was “clearly established” at the time of [the] alleged misconduct.’ . . . This requirement ensures that officials are not subject to the burdens of litigation or held liable for conduct without notice that such conduct is unlawful. . . . Needless to say, a judicial decision postdating an official’s alleged misconduct is of no use in determining what was ‘clearly established’ at the time. The courts below badly fumbled this basic tenet of our qualified-immunity doctrine by treating a later-in-time Circuit precedent as a basis for the existence of ‘clearly established law.’ I would grant the petitioner’s request for summary reversal to correct this flagrant error. In 2017, officers of the San Jose Police Department procured an arrest warrant for Jacob Dominguez, a suspect in an armed robbery of a gas station. Based on information from a confidential informant, officers believed Dominguez was armed with a revolver. Once the officers had found Dominguez in his vehicle, Officer Michael Pina ordered him to put his hands up. Dominguez complied, but he then “‘quickly dropped his hands’” out of sight and “‘moved forward.’” . . . That led Officer Pina to believe Dominguez was reaching for a firearm. And when Dominguez quickly leaned back, Officer Pina shot and killed him. The whole encounter lasted less than one minute. Dominguez’s estate sued Officer Pina under Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U. S. C. § 1983, and a jury found Officer Pina liable for excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The jury also returned a special interrogatory, answering ‘yes’ to the question, ‘Did decedent Jacob Dominguez drop his hands and lean forward before Michael Pina fired his weapon?’ . . . Following trial, Officer Pina moved for judgment as a matter of law on qualified-immunity grounds, but the District Court denied his motion, anchoring its clearly-established-law inquiry in Peck v. Montoya, 51 F.4th 877 (C.A.9 2022). . . . The Ninth Circuit affirmed in an unpublished decision. Like the District Court, the Ninth Circuit relied on its decision in Peck. It viewed that decision as providing sufficient evidence that Officer Pina ‘violated Dominguez’s Fourth Amendment right under clearly established law’ and was thus ‘not entitled to qualified immunity.’ The lower courts made a serious misstep in their analysis. Even if it is assumed that controlling Circuit precedent may constitute clearly established law, Peck, a 2022 decision, was not the law in the Ninth Circuit when the events of this case unfolded in 2017. As such, Peck, ‘decided after the shooting at issue, is of no use in the clearly established inquiry.’ City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 595 U.S. 9, 13, 142 S.Ct. 9, 211 L.Ed.2d 170 (2021). Perhaps realizing that reliance on Peck was anachronistic, the lower courts tried to backpedal. The District Court acknowledged that ‘Peck was decided after the events that occurred in our case,’ but it asserted that ‘Peck looked to Cruz v. City of Anaheim,’ a 2014 decision. . . . And the Ninth Circuit sneaked into a footnote of its unpublished decision the same suggestion that Peck merely identified ‘the law that Cruz clearly established.’ . . . Those ham-fisted rescue efforts rest on a misreading of Cruz. If Cruz itself could serve as the basis for clearly established law, then the Ninth Circuit presumably could have cited it directly instead of shunting it to a footnote. But unsurprisingly, Cruz alone does not suffice. In that case, officers stopped an allegedly armed suspect in his vehicle and used deadly force when the suspect reached for his waistband. There, the Ninth Circuit held that ‘[i]t would be unquestionably reasonable for police to shoot a suspect ... if he reaches for a gun in his waistband, or even if he reaches there for some other reason.’ . . . In the lower courts’ view, Peck simply restated Cruz’s conclusion ‘that officers may not fire at a suspect ... absent some reason to believe that the suspect will soon access or use [a] weapon.’ . . . But that is not a mere gloss on Cruz. Rather, Peck narrowed Cruz’s holding by eliminating the suggestion that an officer’s use of force may be reasonable if a suspect ‘reaches’ for his waistband ‘for some other reason.’ . . . That alteration may very well have made a difference here.* Read in its proper light, Peck is not a restatement of the law set forth in Cruz. If Peck is removed from the picture, the lower courts would have failed to identify any clearly established law that Officer Pina allegedly violated. * * * The decisions below made more than a trifling mistake. In the Fourth Amendment context, the clearly-established-law requirement provides essential notice at the “‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’” . . . But by holding an officer liable based on a judicial precedent issued after the events in question, the courts below ran roughshod over this key notice-bearing feature of our qualified-immunity jurisprudence. I would summarily reverse the judgment below and reiterate a point that this Court has made time and again: a judicial decision can serve as a basis for clearly established law only if it predates the allegedly unlawful conduct. . . . The Court unfortunately fails to take that step, so I must respectfully dissent.”)

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) (“Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas’ petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit’s determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

City of Escondido, Cal. v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04 (2019) (per curiam) (“Under our cases, the clearly established right must be defined with specificity. ‘This Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . That is particularly important in excessive force cases In this case, the Court of Appeals contravened those settled principles. The Court of Appeals should have asked whether clearly established law prohibited the officers from stopping and taking down a man in these circumstances. Instead, the Court of Appeals defined the clearly established right at a high level of generality by saying only that the ‘right to be free of excessive force’ was clearly established. With the right defined at that high level of generality, the Court of Appeals then denied qualified immunity to the officers and remanded the case for trial. . . . Under our precedents, the Court of Appeals’ formulation of the clearly established right was far too general. To be sure, the Court of Appeals cited the Gravelet–Blondin case from that Circuit, which described a right to be ‘free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance....’. . . Assuming without deciding that a court of appeals decision may constitute clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . the Ninth Circuit’s Gravelet–Blondin case law involved police force against individuals engaged in passive resistance. The Court of Appeals made no effort to explain how that case law prohibited Officer Craig’s actions in this case. That is a problem under our precedents. . . .The Court of Appeals failed to properly analyze whether clearly established law barred Officer Craig from stopping and taking down Marty Emmons in this manner as Emmons exited the apartment. Therefore, we remand the case for the Court of Appeals to conduct the analysis required by our precedents with respect to whether Officer Craig is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1153 (2018) (“The Court of Appeals made additional errors in concluding that its own precedent clearly established that Kisela used excessive force. To begin with, ‘even if a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established law in these circumstances, it does not do so here.’”)

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8 (2018) (“We have not yet decided what precedents--other than our own-- qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Reichle v. Howards, 566 U. S. 658, 665-666 (2012) (reserving the question whether court of appeals decisions can be ‘a dispositive source of clearly established law’). We express no view on that question here. Relatedly, our citation to and discussion of various lower court precedents should not be construed as agreeing or disagreeing with them, or endorsing a particular reading of them. See City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 4 (2015) (slip op., at 14, n. 4). Instead, we address only how a reasonable official ‘could have interpreted’ them. Reichle, supra, at 667.”)

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2044-45 (2015) (per curiam) (“No decision of this Court establishes a right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols. No decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols. And ‘to the extent that a “robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ in the Courts of Appeals ‘could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges,’ . . . the weight of that authority at the time of Barkes’s death suggested that such a right did not exist. [collecting cases] The Third Circuit nonetheless found this right clearly established by two of its own decisions, both stemming from the same case. Assuming for the sake of argument that a right can be ‘clearly established’ by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals, neither of the Third Circuit decisions relied upon clearly established the right at issue.”)

See also Weishaar v. County of Napa, No. 14-CV-01352-LB, 2016 WL 7242122, at *11 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 15, 2016) (“Combining all this — the general rules on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court’s decision in Taylor, and the Ninth Circuit’s in Van Orden — the pivotal question in this case might be phrased thus:

On the ‘particular facts’ of this case, in this ‘specific context,’ did Mr. Foster pose a ‘serious risk of suicide’ so that any ‘reasonable,’ ‘competent’ officer would have known that they could not be ‘deliberately indifferent’ to his plight, and that by failing to do more than they did to protect him from suicide — because what is in question is ‘the violative nature of [the defendants’] particular conduct,’ Hamby, 821 F.3d at 1091 — they were clearly violating his constitutional rights? Viewing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff, the court thinks that a jury question exists on this point. A reasonable juror could conclude that Mr. Foster presented a ‘serious risk of suicide,’ which would have triggered the ‘clearly established right’ that the Ninth Circuit recognized in Van Orden. On the one hand, when asked directly, Mr. Foster repeatedly denied being suicidal. . . On the other, one of Mr. Foster’s intake forms related that, after being arrested, he told the transporting officers that ‘he wished he would die.’ . . Prison officials also knew that he had a history of psychiatric illness, for which he was then on medication, and that he had previously attempted suicide. . . The court cannot summarily hold Commander Wilson immune on these facts. The question must be put to the fact-finder. The court thus declines to grant summary judgment to Commander Wilson on the ground that she is qualifiedly immune from suit. The court recognizes that this holding reflects a tension in the law. On the one hand, in Taylor the Supreme Court has said that, at the time of Mr. Foster’s death in November 2012, through to June 1, 2015 (when Taylor was released), nothing in its precedent established a clear constitutional right to suicide-screening or -prevention protocols. Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2044 45. On the other hand, in a decision that followed Taylor by about a month, the Ninth Circuit held that, since ‘at least’ 2005, there has been a clearly established constitutional right that protects inmates from deliberate indifference when they present a serious risk of suicide. Van Orden, 609 F. App’x at 475. This would suggest that if inmates exhibit a serious suicide risk, then they have a constitutional right guaranteeing that corrections officers attend to their needs. As precedent stands, reading both Taylor and Van Orden, this court holds that a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Foster presented a ‘serious risk of suicide’ that triggered his ‘clearly established right’ to something more than ‘deliberate indifference.’”)

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015) (“[E]ven if ‘a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,’ Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. —, —, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), it does not do so here.”)

Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (“Here the Third Circuit cited only a single case to support its decision that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity—Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 318 F.3d 497 (C.A.3 2003). Assuming for the sake of argument that a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances, see Reichle v.

Howards, 566 U.S. —, —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), Marasco does not clearly establish that Carroll violated the Carmans' Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012) (“Assuming arguendo that controlling Court of Appeals’ authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law in the circumstances of this case, the Tenth Circuit’s cases do not satisfy the ‘clearly established’ standard here.”)

Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 615, 616 (1999) (The Court concluded general Fourth Amendment principles did not apply with obvious clarity to the officers’ conduct in this case. Furthermore, A[p]petitioners [had] not brought to [the Court’s] attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely, nor [had] they identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.”).

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] (“[I]n applying the rule of qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Bivens . . . we have referred to decisions of the Courts of Appeals when enquiring whether a right was ‘clearly established.’ . . . Although the Sixth Circuit was concerned, and rightly so, that disparate decisions in various Circuits might leave the law insufficiently certain even on a point widely considered, such a circumstance may be taken into account in deciding whether the warning is fair enough, without any need for a categorical rule that decisions of the Courts of Appeals and other courts are inadequate as a matter of law to provide it.”).

Elder v. Holloway, 114 S. Ct. 1019, 1023 (1994) (“Whether an asserted federal right was clearly established at a particular time, so that a public official who allegedly violated the right has no qualified immunity from suit, presents a question of law, not one of ‘legal facts.’ [cites omitted] That question of law, like the generality of such questions, must be resolved de novo on appeal. [cite omitted] A court engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should therefore use its ‘full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.’”).

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 384, 386 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (“In this case the principle of constitutional avoidance counsels that we turn directly to the second question. As the Court recognized in Pearson itself, ‘There are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . This is such a case. Therefore the first and, as it happens, only question we address is whether it was clearly established in September 2002 that strip searching an arrestee before placing him in a detention facility without individualized, reasonable suspicion was unconstitutional. To answer this question, ‘we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view,’ Johnson v. District of Columbia, 528 F.3d 969, 976 (D.C.Cir.2008)—if there is one. . . . We conclude the law in 2002 did not clearly establish that strip searching all male arrestees prior to placement in holding cells at the Superior Court violated the Fourth Amendment. The governing precedent was then, as it is now, Bell v. Wolfish, and nothing in Bell requires individualized, reasonable suspicion before strip searching a person entering a detention facility. . . . We are aware of no Supreme Court case . . . that suggests a reasonable officer could not have believed his actions were lawful despite a consensus among the courts of appeals when a precedent of the Supreme Court supports the lawfulness of his conduct. A different reading of Bell by the several circuits to have considered the issue before 2002 could not ‘clearly establish’ the unconstitutionality of strip searches in this context. That Powell and Bull came down after 2002 is of no moment; those opinions simply accord with our own understanding that Bell did not establish the unconstitutionality of a strip search under conditions like those present here. . . . Because there was in 2002 no clearly established constitutional prohibition of strip searching arrestees without individualized, reasonable suspicion, we need not consider whether Dillard had individual suspicion as to each of the plaintiffs.”)

Dormu v. District of Columbia, Civil Action 08-00309(HHK), 2011 WL 2632330, at *8 (D.D.C. June 7, 2011) (“This case presents the question of whether, at the time of Dormu’s arrest, an individual had a clearly established right to be free from a police officer’s injury-inducing application of handcuffs after the individual complained that the cuffs were too tight. Neither the D.C. Circuit nor the Supreme Court have specifically addressed this question. The consensus among other courts, however, is overwhelming. Almost every Court of Appeals has held that overly tight handcuffing can constitute excessive force, where the handcuffing has resulted in injury or where an individual complains about the overly-tight cuffing. [collecting cases] Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Dormu’s arrest that he had the right to be free from injury-inflicting handcuffing where Dormu complained about the tightness of the cuffs.”)

Affifi v. Lynch, 101 F.Supp.3d 90, (D.D.C. 2015) (“The Court finds that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on both of the plaintiff’s Bivens claims because, as discussed more fully below, neither the Fourth Amendment nor First Amendment rights he seeks to vindicate in this suit were clearly established at the time and in the place where the challenge conduct occurred. . . . The plaintiff argues that at the time the individual defendants employed the GPS device, such warrantless use was deemed unconstitutional by this Circuit in United States v. Maynard, 615 F.3d 544, 555–56 (D.C.Cir.2010) The plaintiff also notes that for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, a court ordinarily looks to ‘cases of controlling authority in [its] jurisdiction.’ . . . As a result, the plaintiff argues that the individual defendants’ warrantless use of a GPS device was squarely in violation of binding Circuit precedent and therefore violated clearly established law. This argument ignores two salient features of the present dispute. First, the Circuits were split regarding the constitutionality of the warrantless use of a GPS device at the time of the conduct at issue. . . . Second, the warrantless use of a GPS device was lawful under Ninth Circuit precedent at the time of its use in the present case. In other words, the individual defendants’ warrantless use of the GPS device was valid in California, the jurisdiction in which the individual defendants used the GPS device. . . . Thus, not only were the Circuits split at the time of the individual defendants' conduct, but the conduct was lawful in the jurisdiction in which it occurred. Both factors favor the grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants. . . . To avoid the implication of the Circuit split, the plaintiff seizes upon Youngbey v. March for the proposition that "[i]n determining whether the legal rules at issue are clearly established," a court must look only to cases of controlling authority in its own jurisdiction. . . . Yet, Youngbey did not address the issue of qualified immunity where the defendants acted in a jurisdiction different from the forum of the lawsuit. In such situations, '[w]hen faced with inconsistent legal rules in different jurisdictions, national officeholders should be given some deference for qualified immunity purposes, at least if they implement policies consistent with the governing law of the jurisdiction where the action is taken.' . . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has described the refusal to grant qualified immunity as 'especially troubling' where a defendant's actions 'were lawful according to courts in the jurisdiction where he acted.' . . . A contrary rule would permit plaintiffs to forum shop and might otherwise deter 'national officeholders ... from full use of their legal authority.' . . . Such deterrence warrants 'caution by the Judicial Branch' in refusing to grant qualified immunity, 'particularly in the area of national security.' . . . Applying these principals to the present case, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as their actions, in following the binding precedent of the relevant jurisdiction, were not 'plainly incompetent' and did not violate clearly established law. . . . The plaintiff has failed to cite a single case from any Circuit holding that the warrantless use of a GPS device violates an individual's First Amendment rights. To be sure, the qualified immunity analysis does not require a 'case directly on point,' Al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, but a court must take caution in properly defining the scope of the right violated In this regard, the plaintiff's silence is telling as 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . . The plaintiff's inability to cite a single case in support of his contention that the warrantless use of a GPS device violated his First Amendment rights dooms his claim. . . . The Court need not decide whether the individual defendants' warrantless use of a GPS device violated the plaintiff's First Amendment rights because the law regarding the issue was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. . . . As a result, qualified immunity shields the individual defendants from the plaintiff's First Amendment Bivens claim.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Wadsworth v. Nguyen, 129 F.4th 38, 58-59 (1st Cir. 2025) ("The district court decided the issue on narrow grounds, concluding that Wadsworth had not established the right was clearly established because she failed to cite any First Circuit authority holding that a teacher's non-physical sexual harassment of a student violates the student's equal protection rights where the harassment is devoid of hostility and 'direct sexual advances.' On appeal, Wadsworth argues this was error, pointing us to several out-of-circuit cases that she argues make clear that the equal protection right to be free from non-physical sexual harassment was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. Cavanaugh argues Wadsworth waived this issue by insufficiently addressing it in her principal brief and, secondly, that Wadsworth cannot succeed without citing binding precedent. Neither contention is availing. As we will lay out below, we conclude that the district court erred as a matter of law when it determined that Wadsworth could not demonstrate that the constitutional violation was clearly established and that, given our equal protection analysis, Cavanaugh is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity. . . . [W]e reject Cavanaugh’s assertion that a litigant must point to in-circuit law in order to show that a right is clearly established. It is well recognized ‘that clearly established law can be dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority.’ . . . And, we have made clear that we may ‘look[] to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established.’”)

Heredia v. Roscoe, 125 F.4th 34, 47 n. 11 (1st Cir. 2025) (“[W]e are not limited to the cases cited by the parties. Barton v. Clancy, 632 F.3d 9, 22 (1st Cir. 2011) (“In conducting a qualified immunity analysis, a court should ‘use its full knowledge of its own and other relevant precedents.’” (cleaned up) (quoting Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994))).”)

Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65, 76-80 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) (“A rule is clearly established either when it is ‘dictated by “controlling authority” or “a robust ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’” . . . A ‘robust consensus’ does not require the express agreement of every circuit. Rather, sister circuit law is sufficient to clearly establish a proposition of law when it would provide notice to every reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful. . . . ‘[T]he salient question . . . is whether the state of the law [at the time of the defendants’ conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs] was unconstitutional.’ [citing cases, including Hope v. Pelzer and Taylor v. Riojas] The Supreme Court has established that cases involving materially similar facts are not necessary to a finding that the law was clearly established. . . . The circuits have followed that rule. . . . A defendant’s adherence to proper police procedure bears on all prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . When an officer violates the Constitution, state law, of course, provides no refuge. A lack of compliance with state law or procedure does not, in and of itself, establish a constitutional violation, but when an officer disregards police procedure, it bolsters the plaintiff’s argument both that an officer’s conduct ‘shocks the conscience’ and that ‘a reasonable officer in [the officer’s] circumstances would have believed that his conduct violated the Constitution.’ . . . The defendants’ main argument is that because this circuit to date has not recognized the state-created danger doctrine, the law was not clearly established. That is simply incorrect. The Supreme Court has stated that clearly established law can be dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority. . . . The widespread acceptance of the state-created danger theory, described above, was sufficient to clearly establish that a state official may incur a duty to protect a plaintiff where the official creates or exacerbates a danger to the plaintiff. The defendants’ reliance on Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056 (1st Cir. 1997), is also misplaced. In Soto, this court concluded that the state-created danger doctrine was not clearly established. . . . The broad acceptance of the doctrine ‘militate[d] in favor of finding that there [was] clearly established law in this area,’ but two circumstances prevented the court from holding that the law was clearly established. . . . First, the court noted that at the time of the defendants’ conduct in Soto, the First Circuit had never ‘discuss[ed] the contours of [the state-created danger] doctrine.’ . . . Second, the court relied on the fact that while the Third Circuit had then recently ‘comprehensively described’ the state-created danger theory, the history of the doctrine was ‘uneven,’ and that only ‘more recent judicial opinions ... ha[d] begun to clarify the contours’ of the doctrine. . . All of this had changed by the time Detective Perkins left the voicemail for Anthony Lord. By July 2015, this court had discussed the state-created danger doctrine at least a dozen times, even if it had never found it applicable to the facts of a specific case. And our sister circuits’ law developed as well in the decades since Soto. The officers argue that because the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits have rejected the state-created danger doctrine, . . . the doctrine cannot be clearly established. Again, as a proposition of law this is wrong. A circuit split does not foreclose a holding that the law was clearly established, as long as the defendants could not reasonably believe that we would follow the minority approach. . . After Rivera, the defendants could not reasonably have believed that we would flatly refuse to apply the state-created danger doctrine to an appropriate set of facts. Rivera was a critical warning bell that officers could be held liable under the state-created danger doctrine when their affirmative acts enhanced a danger to a witness. This court did not simply dismiss Rivera’s claim without analysis, as would have been appropriate if the state-created danger doctrine could never apply to any set of facts in this circuit. Instead, Rivera outlined the elements of the state-created danger doctrine and performed a nuanced analysis of why each particular action of the defendants was not the type of affirmative act covered by the doctrine. . . Rivera warned that if an officer performed a non-essential affirmative act which enhanced a danger, a sufficient causal connection existed between that act and the plaintiff’s harm, and the officer’s actions shocked the conscience, the officer could be held liable for placing a witness or victim in harm’s way during an investigation. Defendants also argue that they are immune from suit because no factually similar cases alerted them that their conduct was impermissible. This too is incorrect. As we have just said, a general proposition of law may clearly establish the violative nature of a defendant’s actions, especially when the violation is egregious. . . Not only is the argument wrong, but its premise is wrong; there are factually similar earlier cases. Both were decided after Soto. . . . The plaintiffs allege that the defendants, even in the face of Irish’s expressed fear that Lord would react violently, contacted him in a manner that a reasonable jury could find notified him that Irish had reported him to the police. The plaintiffs also allege that the defendants failed to convey her request for protection to their superiors for several hours and further failed to inform her in a timely fashion that the request had been denied. A jury could also conclude that the defendants played a role in the decision to withdraw all resources from the area without telling the plaintiffs that they had done so, thereby allowing the plaintiffs to believe more protection was available than was actually true. Finally, the defendants’ apparent utter disregard for police procedure could contribute to a jury’s conclusion that the defendants conducted themselves in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the danger they knowingly created, and that they thereby acted with the requisite mental state to fall within the ambit of the many cases holding that a violation of the Due Process Clause requires behavior that ‘shocks the conscience.’ . . Whether the jury will or should conclude as much is, of course, not a question for this court, but it was clearly established in July 2015 that such conduct on the part of law enforcement officers, if it occurred, could give rise to a lawsuit under § 1983.”) Alfano v. Lynch, 847 F.3d 71, 76, 79 (1st Cir. 2017) (“In applying the test for clearly established law, the focus must be on federal precedents. . . Courts may consider state precedents, though, to the extent that they analyze the relevant federal issue. . . . Federal courts of appeals typically look only to precedents from the United States Supreme Court, federal appellate courts, and the highest court of the state in which a case arises to gauge whether a particular right is clearly established. . . . To say more about the clearly established nature of the law would be to paint the lily. We hold that, in July of 2014, controlling and persuasive authority combined to give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that the Fourth Amendment required probable cause to take an individual into protective custody, handcuff him, transport him to a police station miles away, and confine him in a jail cell”) McCue v. City of Bangor, 838 F.3d 55, 61-65 (1st Cir. 2016) (“After reviewing de novo all of the magistrate judge’s determinations, the district court adopted the Recommended Decision in full. This appeal followed. The only issue before us is the pretrial denial of qualified immunity as to the plaintiff’s allegation that the officers used excessive force after McCue had ceased resisting, as well as the corresponding denial of immunity under the MTCA for the state law assault claim. . . . Johnson and its progeny foreclose assertion of appellate jurisdiction over the defendants’ interlocutory appeal. The magistrate judge’s opinion, fully affirmed by the district court, denied summary judgment precisely ‘[b]ecause the record includes factual disputes regarding Plaintiff’s claim that Defendants used excessive force after Mr. McCue allegedly ceased resisting.’. . . In particular, the record contains facts that, when viewed most favorably to the plaintiff, could support a finding that McCue stopped resisting at some point during his encounter with the officers, and that the officers should have realized that he had stopped resisting, but that the officers ‘continued to exert significant force ... no longer necessary to subdue Mr. McCue or to reduce the threat that he posed to himself or others.’. . . And they continued to use such force after McCue told them that they were hurting his neck. In light of these remaining factual issues, we cannot assume jurisdiction over the defendants’ interlocutory appeal. Maintaining that they do not dispute the facts for the purposes of their appeal, the defendants argue that we have appellate jurisdiction notwithstanding the district court’s identification of material factual disputes. They repeatedly assert that they construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and that even so construed, ‘the videotape evidence conclusively establishes that there is at most a timeframe of 66 seconds for which the trial court could have concluded that Mr. McCue may have stopped resisting arrest and the Defendants may have continued to apply force.’ They further argue that ‘this momentary continuance of force’ for up to 66 seconds did not violate McCue’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Plaintiff disagrees and says that the record supports a finding that 4 minutes and 25 seconds is the true period involved. As a matter of law, our circuit has assumed interlocutory appellate jurisdiction where the defendant ‘accepted as true all facts and inferences proffered by plaintiffs, and [where] defendants argue[d] that even on plaintiffs’ best case, they [we]re entitled to immunity.’ Mlodzinski, 648 F.3d at 28. Even ‘a defendant who concedes arguendo the facts found to be disputed is not barred by Johnson from taking an interlocutory appeal on a legal claim that the defendant is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on facts not controverted.’. . . But this avenue is not available to the defendants here because, contrary to their protests, they have not in fact accepted the version of the facts most favorable to the plaintiff. In at least four different places in their brief, the defendants stress that, construing the Car 22 video in the most plaintiff-favorable light, there was at most 66 seconds in which they might have continued to apply force after McCue had stopped resisting. The defendants appear to have arrived at this number by misconstruing a statement of fact by the magistrate judge. Explaining why Blanchard punched McCue's lower back, buttocks, or thigh region after the officers had secured both his wrists and ankles, the magistrate judge observed that Blanchard might have done so because McCue 'squeezed' Blanchard's injured hand 'extremely hard' or, alternatively, in order to 'facilitate bringing together Mr. McCue's ankles and wrists to complete the five-point restraint.' . The defendants inaccurately characterize this observation, asserting that the magistrate judge found that Blanchard could have punched McCue because 'McCue was resisting the Defendants' efforts to put him in a five-point restraint.' Pinpointing this moment when Blanchard punched McCue as the last moment in which the magistrate judge found that McCue had resisted, the defendants count 66 seconds from that point to the point when McCue is lifted off the ground. This insistence on 66 seconds both mischaracterizes the magistrate judge's statements about the facts and fails to present those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. First, neither reason that the magistrate judge cited to account for Blanchard's punch (to prevent McCue from squeezing his hand or to facilitate the five-point restraint) necessarily equates to resistance by McCue. At this point, McCue's wrists and ankles had already been cuffed, thus minimizing his range of movements and the danger that he posed to his own and others' safety. Simply put, there is no indication in the Recommended Decision that the hand squeeze should be construed as continued resistance, much less resistance justifying the force used. The defendants' inference as such, of course, also demonstrates their failure to accept the version of facts most favorable to the plaintiff. Second, our independent assessment of the Car 22 video, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, discredits the defendants' 66-seconds theory. . The video, from 2:18 to 2:22, captures McCue resisting detainment by kicking his legs, thrashing his torso, and shouting an expletive at the officers. In contrast, from 2:22 until the officers lift him off the ground at 7:08, McCue periodically growls and makes other noises but does not kick or thrash his body again. He also complains that the officers are hurting his neck, but we cannot ascertain from the video if the officers adjusted their positions in response. Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, McCue's noises and slight movements after the 2:22 mark -- and even his squeezing of Blanchard's hand -- 'may not constitute resistance at all, but rather a futile attempt to breathe while suffering from physiological distress.' . In short, McCue's movements after 2:22 of the Car 22 video are not dispositive of whether he continued resisting. And from this perspective, there could be close to five minutes -- not 66 seconds -- during which the officers continued to exert force on a nonresisting McCue. Because the defendants have not, in fact, accepted the plaintiff's best version of the facts, we hold that there remains a genuine dispute of fact that precludes appellate jurisdiction over the denial of summary judgment. Finally, this factual dispute is material to the question on the merits. Depending on the amount of time for which the officers exerted force on McCue after he had ceased resisting, a jury could find that the officers' actions were unconstitutional under law that was clearly established in September 2012, the month of McCue's fatal encounter with the officers. The defendants argue that they should win because there was no clearly established law on this point. They are wrong. We 'adhere[] to a two-step approach to determine whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 34 (1st Cir. 2016). First, we ask whether the facts as alleged by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional right. If so, we next ask whether that right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation. . . . In determining whether the law was clearly established, we ‘ask “whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right,” and then consider “whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right.”’. . . Here, we focus on the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity analysis. This circuit has recognized that a ‘First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts’ is not necessary to hold that defendants ‘had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive.’. . . We have also looked to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established. . . . Even without particular Supreme Court and First Circuit cases directly on point, it was clearly established in September 2012 that exerting significant, continued force on a person’s back ‘while that [person] is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.’ Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1155 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 903 (6th Cir. 2004)). At least four circuits had announced this constitutional rule before the events in question here. . . . [A]s the abundant case law demonstrates, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would know or should have known about the dangers of exerting significant pressure on the back of a prone person, regardless of any lack of formal training. In sum, the disputed factual issue -- when McCue ceased resisting and for how long after that moment the officers continued to apply force on his back -- is material to the question of whether qualified immunity is proper.”)

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 270, 271 (1st Cir. 2009) (“An individual’s interest in his pet cat or dog does fall within the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition of unreasonable seizures, though we have not addressed the question before. . . . We reject the Mayor’s argument that this law was not clearly established because this court had not earlier addressed the questions of effects and seizure. Against the widespread acceptance of these points in the federal circuit courts, the Mayor’s argument fails. These are principles of law, and the law was sufficiently recognized by courts to be clearly established. . . . We cannot say on the basis of the pleadings alone that an objective official in the Mayor’s position, as a matter of law, would have reasonably concluded his actions in implementing and executing the pet policy were not a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court was correct to deny the Mayor qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claims based on the pleadings.”)

Starlight Sugar, Inc. v. Soto, 253 F.3d 137, 143-45 (1st Cir. 2001) (“When determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, state, as well as federal, decisions can be considered. . . . In turning to both the state and federal case law in this instance, we find a potential conflict. In Trailer Marine, as noted, we held that the dormant Commerce Clause applies to Puerto Rico; the Puerto Rico Supreme Court took a different view in the R.C.A. case. . . . We conclude that the applicability of the dormant Commerce Clause to Puerto Rico is disputed, and, thus, appellees’ attendant constitutional right is not clearly established. Our holding is consistent with and respects the role of state systems in identifying and defining federal constitutional rights on a parallel basis with the federal courts with ultimate supervisory authority to harmonize any potential conflicts residing in the United States Supreme Court.”).

Hatch v. Dep’t for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, (1st Cir. 2001) (“To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law.”).

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) (“The Supreme Court recently held that an asserted right was not clearly established where the plaintiffs were unable to cite ‘any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely,’ and equally failed to ‘identif[y] a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ [citing Wilson] The Wilson Court’s reasoning is perfectly tailored to the circumstances here. Thompson, which represents the governing law of this circuit, plainly did not render the troopers’ actions unlawful, and the tenuous status of Gay falls far short of the ‘persuasive authority’ that Wilson envisions.”).

Lynch v. City of Boston, 180 F.3d 1, 13, 14 (1st Cir. 1999) (“We assume, without deciding, that the opportunity to serve as a volunteer could constitute the type of valuable governmental benefit or privilege the deprivation of which can trigger First Amendment scrutiny. . . . However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever held that the rule forbidding denial of valuable governmental benefits in reprisal for protected speech announced in Perry v. Sindermann and its progeny extends to the denial of non-compensated positions on voluntary boards. Scant authority in support of such an extension of the doctrine currently exists. Lynch relies primarily upon a Ninth Circuit decision in which the court, applying its own precedents, held that volunteer status is a valuable governmental privilege that cannot be denied on the basis of protected speech. See Holland v. Wonder, 972 F.2d 1129, 1135 (9th Cir.1992). . . A single decision from another court of appeals applying its own precedents is plainly insufficient to meet the requirement ‘that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent’ to a reasonable government official.”).

El Dia, Inc. v. Rossello, 165 F.3d 106, 110 n.3 (1st Cir. 1999) (“[W]e are not inclined to adopt either a hard-and-fast rule that precedent from another circuit is always determinative of whether a law is clearly established . . . or a rule that such precedent is always irrelevant Among other factors, the location and level of the precedent, its date, its persuasive force, and its level of factual similarity to the facts before this Court may all be pertinent to whether a particular precedent ‘clearly establishes’ law for the purposes of a qualified immunity analysis.” citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989).).

Karmue v. Remington, No. 17-CV-107-LM-AKJ, 2020 WL 1290605, at *9-10 (D.R.I. Mar. 18, 2020) (“The critical question for the qualified immunity analysis in Mr. Karmue’s case, with respect to the deliberate indifference claim this court identified as Claim 1, is whether it was clearly established in April 2015 within the First Circuit that it would violate the Constitution to subject an inmate to a significant risk of serious harm to fail to fasten the seatbelt of a handcuffed and shackled inmate in a transport van. There is neither First Circuit nor Supreme Court precedent on that issue. During the relevant time period, even as to inmates who are shackled and handcuffed, courts have concluded that, without more, the failure to provide seatbelts in transport vans did not violate any federal constitutional right. . . . The specific circumstances that attended Mr. Karmue's transport, however, as alleged in the Second Amended Complaint include operative facts that this court described, but did not reiterate when it summarized Claim 1, namely, that the defendant transport officer drove recklessly and that Mr. Karmue's request to be seatbelted was denied. . . . Those allegations, if ultimately shown to be true, would affect the result of the qualified immunity analysis. None of the appellate court cases cited by defendants concern reckless driving and circumstances where the inmate asked to be seatbelted. . . . There is a consensus of persuasively reasoned federal appellate court cases that have addressed the question which have held that qualified immunity is not available with respect to the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims of handcuffed and shackled inmates who have been transported unseatbelted in a van driven recklessly. [collecting cases] Under the circumstances alleged by Mr. Karmue's verified second amended complaint regarding the officers' reckless driving and refusal to seatbelt Mr. Karmue, with knowledge that he could not brace himself in the event of a sudden stop, defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the case. The court thus denies the pre-discovery motion for summary judgment based on the affirmative defense of qualified immunity as to Claim 1.")

Masonoff v. Dubois, No. CIV.A.94-10133-RCL, 2004 WL 2137369, at *8 (D. Mass. Sept. 17, 2004) ("Here, the plaintiffs seek redress for the defendants' failure to maintain reasonably adequate, non-toxic, and sanitary means to dispose of human waste. The right to 'adequate and hygienic means to dispose of [a prisoner's] bodily wastes' was clearly established at the time of the violation, which began. . . in 1991. . . Although I can find no First Circuit authority holding unlawful the precise conduct at issue in this case, the First Circuit long ago held that 'the prison administration must see to it that unsanitary conditions do not continue unabated [just] because the conditions were first caused by the inmates themselves.' . . Furthermore, a chorus of courts in other jurisdictions had held by 1991 that prisons must provide reasonably sanitary facilities, especially when the inmates are confined for long periods of time. . . . By 1983, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts had held that when prisoners must 'eat and sleep next to buckets into which they must urinate and defecate,' the prison conditions, including the procedure for emptying the buckets, constituted cruel and unusual punishment. . . The Supreme Court of the United States had also made it clear that the conditions of confinement may not deprive inmates of 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.' . . Consequently, I think it too plain to be reasonably questioned that, by 1991 it was clearly established that reasonably adequate 'sanitation is one of the basic human needs guaranteed by the [E]ighth [A]mendment.'").

Rodriguez Esteras v. Solivan Diaz, 266 F. Supp.2d 270, 282 (D.P.R. 2003) ("In light of the near unanimity among the Circuits and the factual support found in the persuasive authority, we believe that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized that failing to divulge exculpatory evidence at the arraignment and other preliminary hearings, thereby causing the detention of a criminal defendant, would violate the Fourth Amendment. Since the parameters of the right to be free from malicious prosecution were sufficiently clear at the time of the alleged incident, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Soto v. Bzdel, 223 F.Supp.2d 332, 333 (D. Mass. 2002) (“This court does not believe that the Hope elaboration, recently echoed by the First Circuit in Suboh v. District Attorney’s Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 92-94 (1st Cir.2002), so fundamentally changes the qualified immunity analysis as to necessitate a different result here. First, unlike the situation in Hope, the facts alleged by Plaintiff do not form the basis of an ‘apparent’ constitutional violation. Second, the court neither now nor at the time it issued its summary judgment decision believes that the ‘state of the law’ in October of 1999 gave Defendants ‘fair warning’ that their alleged treatment of Plaintiff ‘was unconstitutional.’ In reaching this conclusion, the court did not rigidly confine itself, as Plaintiff contends, to either ‘published precedent on all fours’ or even to cases with ‘materially similar’ facts. . . In addition to addressing cases having facts similar to the case at bar, the court, as indicated, considered whether there was ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . The court also examined case law which was indirectly on point and still found scant support for Plaintiff’s position. . . Finally, the court specifically addressed the affidavit of the clerk- magistrate of the Northampton District Court, urged upon the court again, and found it wanting. . . The court determined that the affidavit, while informative as to the system concerning recalled warrants, insufficiently demonstrated that any constitutional right was clearly established in October of 1999. . . Unfortunately for him, Plaintiff’s preference that the ‘state of the law’ be statutory, not constitutional, cannot win the day.”).

Rodriguez v. Penobscot County Jail, No. 00-253-B-S, 2001 WL 376453, at 3-5 (D. Me. Apr. 11, 2001) (not published) (“The First Circuit has yet to address whether the Sandin analysis applies to pre-trial detainees. The Ninth and the Seventh Circuits have concluded that Sandin does not apply to disciplinary procedures of pre-trial detainees when disciplinary segregation is the imposed punishment. In those cases the liberty interest in not being punished without the full procedural protections requires adherence to rigorous procedures. [citing cases] Other circuits, albeit in unpublished opinions, have determined that the Sandin analysis is appropriate to apply to pretrial detainee complaints concerning disciplinary sanctions. [citing cases] While such cases have questionable value as precedent on the underlying issue of whether or not Sandin should be applied to pretrial detainees, they do form the basis for determining the first element of the defendants’ asserted claim of qualified immunity. The law in this regard is not clearly established. . . . Given the lack of ‘clearly established’ post-Sandin case-law regarding the procedural due process issues raised by Rodriguez and the clear First Circuit precedent which authorizes reasonable disciplinary sanctions against pre-trial detainees, Defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity as to any civil damage claim”).

SECOND CIRCUIT

Martinez for the Estate of Ortiz v. Hasper, No. 21-2975, 2023 WL 4417355, at *2-3 (2d Cir. July 10, 2023) (not published) (“Ortiz next argues that Hasper admitted to violating provisions of the New York Police Department Patrol Guide, which prohibits officers from firing at ‘moving vehicle[s] unless deadly physical force is being used against [a] member of the service or another person present, by means other than a moving vehicle.’. . . But while police policies are relevant to the Fourth Amendment inquiry, they do not define what is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . And while it is true that the New York Police Department Patrol Guide directs officers to refrain from shooting into moving vehicles when the threat of deadly force stems from the vehicle alone, it was, at minimum, not clearly established that the Fourth Amendment includes such a requirement. See, e.g., Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765, 776–77 (2014) (finding no Fourth Amendment violation where police shot at fleeing suspect to end car chase). Put differently, the Patrol Guide policy – while no doubt well-intended and probably even wise in a densely populated city like New York – in no way alters the constitutional standard for the use of deadly force, which requires only that the officer have ‘probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.’. . . Based on the undisputed evidence, we cannot say that Hasper ‘violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.’”)

Jones v. Treubig, 963 F.3d 214, 236-37 & n.13 (2d Cir. 2020) (“It was clearly established at the time of the incident here that, under the Fourth Amendment, the reasonableness of the amount of force used is assessed ‘at the moment’ the force is used. . . . Thus, any reasonable officer would have understood in April 2015 that, if he or she has an opportunity to re-assess a situation after firing a taser, any additional force (such as re-cycling the taser) must be justified under the Fourth Amendment based upon the totality of the circumstances that existed at the time of the re-assessment. This fundamental Fourth Amendment rule of law was not only clear at the time of Lt. Treubig’s conduct from Supreme Court cases and this Court’s decisions, but also was reinforced by a compelling consensus of cases in our sister circuits, including cases where courts held that additional tasing(s) in a rapidly evolving situation could violate the Fourth Amendment if the prior tasing(s) of the suspect would have been sufficient in light of the circumstances. [collecting cases] Although Lt. Treubig objects to reliance on cases outside this Circuit for purposes of the qualified immunity, we have previously held that ‘[e]ven if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts “clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue.”’. . . Therefore, we are permitted to consider this consensus of authority outside the Circuit although, as noted above, we conclude that the right was clearly established by Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent independent of this consensus of other circuits.”)

Sanchez v. Bonacchi, 799 F. App’x 60, __ (2d Cir. 2020) (“In denying qualified immunity, the District Court held in part that, ‘because Defendant essentially testified that he knew [conducting a manual cavity search] violated Plaintiff’s rights, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.’ . . By relying on Bonacchi’s subjective intent or belief as to the state of the law to determine whether he was entitled to qualified immunity, the District Court erred. . . We nonetheless affirm the District Court’s denial of judgment as a matter of law because this Court’s binding opinion in Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30 (2d Cir. 2019), compels that result. Under Sloley, as of 2013, when the search at issue in this case occurred, it was clearly established that a ‘visual body cavity search conducted as an incident to a lawful arrest for any offense must be supported by a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity.’ . . A manual body cavity search, which is more intrusive than a visual search, must at minimum be supported by the same reasonable suspicion as a visual cavity search.”)

Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 33-34, 37-43 (2d Cir. 2019) (“We vacate in part and hold that visual body cavity searches must be justified by specific, articulable facts supporting reasonable suspicion that an arrestee is secreting contraband inside the body cavity to be searched. Moreover, because this requirement was established by sufficiently persuasive authority, it was ‘clearly established’ for purposes of a qualified immunity defense by New York state police officers at the time Eric searched Sloley. . . . [W]e have held that the Fourth Amendment ‘requires an individualized “reasonable suspicion that a misdemeanor arrestee is concealing weapons or other contraband based on the crime charged, the particular characteristics of the arrestee, and/or the circumstances of the arrest” before she may be lawfully subjected to a strip search.’ . . The VanBramers are correct that neither we nor the Supreme Court have ever squarely held that a similar reasonable suspicion requirement applies to visual body cavity searches of persons arrested for felony offenses. Balancing the degree to which visual body cavity searches ‘intrude[] upon an individual’s privacy’ against ‘the degree to which [they are] needed for the promotion of legitimate governmental interests,’ . . . we now hold that such searches do require reasonable suspicion. In other words, a visual body cavity search conducted as an incident to a lawful arrest for any offense must be supported by ‘a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity.’ . . . To be sure, the type of crime for which someone is arrested may play some role in the analysis of whether a visual body cavity search incident to that arrest is supported by reasonable suspicion. But that role has nothing to do with a categorical distinction between felonies and misdemeanors. Rather, the question is whether the criminal conduct for which a person was arrested speaks to the likelihood that he or she secreted contraband inside a body cavity. . . . In short, we have previously held that strip searches conducted incident to a misdemeanor arrest must be supported by reasonable suspicion. . . . We clarify today that that rule applies equally to visual body cavity searches incident to all arrests and hold that such searches must be based on reasonable suspicion to believe that the arrestee is secreting evidence inside the body cavity to be searched. . . . At the time of the search at issue here, this Court had not yet held that visual body cavity searches incident to a felony arrest must be supported by reasonable suspicion. Nevertheless, we have little trouble concluding that that requirement would have been sufficiently clear to a reasonable New York state police officer in the VanBramers’ position. . . . We have, at times, suggested that the proper inquiry is whether ‘the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit [has] affirmed the rule.’ . . However, that is not the only way in which a right may be ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes. In addition to being ‘dictated by controlling authority,’ a right may be ‘clearly established’ if it is supported by ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’ . . . The rule must be more than merely ‘suggested by then-existing precedent.’ . . . Rather, the ‘decisions by this or other courts’ must ‘clearly foreshow a particular ruling.’ . . . Here, every reasonable officer in the VanBramers’ position as New York State Troopers would have known that visual body cavity searches conducted incident to any arrest must additionally be supported by ‘a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity’ and must be conducted in a reasonable manner. . . . This Court has been previously unpersuaded that existing Supreme Court precedent, Second Circuit precedent, and the above-cited body of district court decisions are sufficient to have made it ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes that visual body cavity searches incident to felony arrests require reasonable suspicion. . . . What tips the balance in this case, however, is the decision of the New York Court of Appeals, five years before the search at issue in this case took place, holding that the Fourth Amendment requires visual body cavity searches conducted incident to any lawful arrest. . . . to be supported by ‘a specific, articulable factual basis supporting a reasonable suspicion to believe the arrestee secreted evidence inside a body cavity’—the very rule we adopt today. . . . The VanBramers’ ask our decision in Gonzalez to carry more weight than it can bear. There, we held that it was not clearly established that an officer must have reasonable suspicion before conducting a visual cavity search incident to a felony arrest. . . . However, that holding was based, at least in part, on the observation that ‘Hall was decided after the search at issue in [that] case,’ . . . and for that reason Gonzalez is not a basis for upholding a qualified immunity defense for a search conducted after Hall. Gonzalez also noted that ‘not one case cited in Hall said that an officer needs particular, individualized facts to conduct a visual body cavity search.’ . . . Even if true, that circumstance is not a basis for disregarding the authoritative effect of a decision of New York’s highest court on the availability of a qualified immunity defense for a New York state police officer. The VanBramers cannot draw the conclusive support they seek from a case regarding the state of the law in 2006 when the search at issue in Gonzalez took place, . . . because the legal landscape was different in 2013 when the search here took place. To be clear, we need not and do not decide whether a decision of a state court, standing alone, would necessarily suffice to defeat a Section 1983 defendant’s claim to qualified immunity in every case. Nevertheless, ‘[s]tate court decisions, like the decisions of other federal lower courts, are relevant and often persuasive’ authority on the ‘clearly established’ issue. . . . Nor do we hold that Hall would necessarily tip the balance against finding qualified immunity if this case involved officers from different states in our Circuit. . . . In this case, however, Hall is not just persuasive authority in this Court; it has been binding authority for the VanBramers since 2008. At the time Eric conducted the visual body cavity search of Sloley in 2013, the VanBramers—New York State Troopers—were already forbidden as a matter of federal constitutional law as interpreted by the New York Court of Appeals—the highest court in their state—from conducting suspicionless visual body cavity searches incident to felony arrests. Thus, had they discovered evidence during the course of a suspicionless visual body cavity search incident to arrest, that evidence would have been subject to suppression on Fourth Amendment grounds in any corresponding state criminal proceeding. . . . We therefore do not hesitate to conclude that they were ‘on notice their conduct [was] unlawful.’ . . . We pause to address the dissent’s misplaced concern that our reliance on the caselaw of the highest court of New York will inhibit police activity by forcing police officers to be attentive to the federal law of constitutional rights as developed in both state and federal courts. It is beyond doubt that police officers frequently have difficult jobs. But if the dissent were right, then state police officers could disregard the decisions of state supreme courts without any fear of being held accountable through a § 1983 action. This is inconsistent with our cases, which hold that courts can look to state court decisions to determine if a federal right has been clearly established. . . . And in conjuring up a fictitious world where police proceed as unlicensed attorneys, the dissent overlooks that it is already the job of state police officers to follow the federal constitutional rules articulated by the supreme court of their state.”) Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 47-50 (2d Cir. 2019) (Jon O. Newman, J., concurring) (“In dissent, Judge Jacobs contends that the majority opinion permits a decision of New York’s highest court, People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303, 856 N.Y.S.2d 540, 886 N.E.2d 162 (2008), to establish federal law for purposes of a New York state police officer’s qualified immunity defense. Judge Jacobs also apprehends that the majority’s ruling will oblige police officers to ‘keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law’ . . . I concur in Judge Pooler’s opinion and add these words to point out that the majority considers Hall important to our ruling but by no means the sole basis for deciding that the New York officer, arresting a person for a felony, should have known that he must have reasonable suspicion to conduct a visual body cavity search. I also seek to allay the unwarranted concern about police officers’ difficulty in understanding the constitutional limits on their conduct. The majority announces no general rule that the requirements of federal law, for purposes of a qualified immunity defense to a claim of unconstitutional police misconduct, can be established by a state court decision. The decision of the New York Court of Appeals in Hall is enlisted as part of the guidance available to the New York state police officer in this case because of the following unusual combination of circumstances that existed prior to the visual body cavity search he conducted:

(1) The Supreme Court acknowledged 34 years before the search in this case that visual body cavity searches ‘instinctively give us the most pause.’ . . . (2) The unconstitutionality of a visual body cavity search without reasonable suspicion had been firmly established in this Circuit for those arrested for misdemeanors (3) The distinction between misdemeanors and felonies was highly unlikely to be considered by a police officer hurriedly deciding to make a visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a misdemeanor. . . . (4) The seriousness of the assault that a visual body cavity search inflicts on personal dignity had been repeatedly recognized in federal law[.] . . . (5) New York’s highest court had instructed New York state police officers that a visual body cavity search of all persons arrested requires reasonable suspicion ‘supported by a specific, articulable factual basis[.]’ . . . (6) Decisions of New York’s Appellate Division had reinforced the ruling in Hall. . . (7) District courts in this Circuit had understood that a visual body cavity search requires reasonable suspicion. . . . Although these courts do not establish federal law for purposes of qualified immunity, their consistency contributes to the conclusion that the requirement of reasonable suspicion for visual body cavity searches was established prior to VanBramer’s search.

The combination of these circumstances, not the Hall decision alone, clearly establishes that reasonable suspicion is required for a visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a felony. At a minimum, these circumstances clearly foreshadow the requirement, and we have ruled that a constitutional limitation on police conduct can be clearly established for purposes of a qualified immunity defense if ‘decisions by this or other courts “clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue.”’ . . . Judge Jacobs suggests that New York police officers will have to ‘anticipate new law.’ Not so. Once the highest court of New York ruled that a police officer may conduct a visual body cavity search only if the officer has reasonable suspicion ‘that the arrestee has evidence concealed inside a body cavity,’ . . . all New York police officers were on notice of their legal obligations concerning visual body cavity searches. Whether or not VanBramer could anticipate that this Court would rule, under the particular circumstances outlined in Judge Pooler’s opinion, that reasonable suspicion as a requirement for visual body searches of those arrested for felonies was sufficiently established, or at least foreshadowed, to defeat a qualified immunity defense under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, he was on notice that reasonable suspicion was required. It would be fanciful to think that he said to himself, ‘I know that New York’s highest court has ruled that I need reasonable suspicion, but I will go ahead without such suspicion because I am not sure that a federal court will rule that the federal right not to be subjected to a body cavity search without reasonable suspicion has been clearly established.’ . . . Judge Jacobs expresses concern that under the majority’s ruling police officers ‘would need to keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law as developed in state courts as well as in federal courts.’ . . . But the only state court decisions the majority opinion charges VanBramer or any reasonable New York State police officer with an obligation to follow are decisions of New York courts, which he is obliged to follow no matter how we rule. And though it is concededly unusual to rule that reasonable police officers in Connecticut and Vermont are not subject to the same federal requirement as reasonable New York police officers, I see no reason to impose on them a requirement influenced in significant part, but not exclusively, by a decision of New York’s highest court. . . . For all of these reasons, I concur in Judge Pooler’s opinion, ruling that a remand to resolve a factual dispute is required in order to determine whether VanBramer is shielded by qualified immunity from liability for conducting a visual body cavity search of Maximillian Sloley without reasonable suspicion that narcotics were concealed within his body.”)

Sloley v. VanBramer, 945 F.3d 30, 50-52 (2d Cir. 2019) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent. I would affirm the grant of qualified immunity to New York State Trooper Eric VanBramer, who conducted a body-cavity search when the plaintiff was arrested for a felony offense. Federal constitutional law recognizes that a body-cavity search requires reasonable suspicion if a person is arrested for a misdemeanor[.] . . . There is thus an express distinction between misdemeanors (and other minor offenses) and felonies. . . . [I]f Hall can make the difference to clearly establish the Fourth Amendment right that Sloley contends was violated, then federal constitutional law can be made clearly established by state courts. Moreover, it would follow that clearly established federal constitutional law can differ state-by-state within the same circuit. That is not contested by the majority. . . . Splits could thus be opened state-by-state within this Circuit on issues of federal constitutional law. I don’t see how that can be; and I see no explanation in the majority opinion beyond the shrug that such a ‘strange’ result is ‘simply a quirk of our federal system[.]’ . . . But Hall—which of course is not a decision of the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit—cannot plausibly make federal constitutional law, let alone clearly establish it. . . . To maintain qualified immunity, officers need to know only the settled precepts of federal constitutional law. In order to decide what every police officer should know, the majority opinion splices together: a federal circuit court opinion that goes the other way, a state court opinion, several trial court opinions, and whatnot. If the majority opinion were the law, officers would need to keep ahead of trends in federal constitutional law as developed in the state courts as well as in the federal courts. . . and because the majority opinion shores up its argument with trial court opinions, officers would need to follow developments in the trial courts as well as in the appellate courts: I don’t know what my colleagues think police do all day. The majority has it backwards. The better an officer understands federal constitutional law, the less plausible it would seem to her that settled federal constitutional law could vary in the several states of a single circuit. Certainly, it is news to me. It is hard enough for police to ascertain settled federal constitutional law; it is surely harder to anticipate new law; but it is simply impossible to anticipate error. So a police officer who understood the concept of clearly established federal constitutional law would have no notice that it could be one thing in New York and something else in Connecticut and Vermont. Even among persons trained in the law, few would think that. . . . If the majority’s error prospers, police will have to follow federal constitutional developments in the state courts as well as the federal courts, and apply a learned distinction between state court rulings that are based on the federal Constitution and those that are based on state law. It may be thought that any confusion will be a benign limitation on the police; but it is by no means always good to inhibit police conduct, and it is an error for federal courts to restrict police conduct by imposing liability on individual officers unless the federal Constitution is unambiguously violated. That is not my opinion; that is Supreme Court law. . . . The majority’s idea that federal law can be clearly established state-by-state, or even circuit-by-circuit, is conceptually flawed because federal constitutional law is national and uniform. A circuit court ruling that a principle is clearly established is not pronouncing on local or regional constitutional law; it reflects the understanding of that circuit as to the clear establishment of that law nationwide. That is why a circuit split on what is clearly established becomes a problem for the Supreme Court to resolve. . . . If federal constitutional law is deemed to be made or settled in the courts of each state, the federal constitution will mean different things in different places within each jurisdiction of a single circuit: a kind of circuit splinter.”)

Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015) (“Plaintiffs also cite two out-of-circuit cases denying qualified immunity to officers who arrested protesters after arguably sanctioning their traffic violations through their own directives. See Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 743–44 (7th Cir.2011); Buck v. City of Albuquerque, 549 F.3d 1269, 1283 (10th Cir.2008). We have not been altogether unequivocal as to the relevance of out-of-circuit cases in our assessment of whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity. Compare, e.g., Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010) (“Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue, even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits.”) (internal quotation marks omitted), with Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir.2006) (“When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.”). But we need not resolve that tension here, because the out-of-circuit precedent cited by plaintiffs has not placed the question at issue in this case ‘beyond debate.’. . Extending Cox beyond its due process holding, and agreeing on neither the constitutional right at stake nor its contours, Vodak and Buck—even assuming arguendo that their holdings might otherwise be relevant in the specific factual context of this case—do not foreshadow the law of which a reasonable officer in this circuit should be aware.”)

Terebesi v. Torres, 764 F.3d 217, 231 & n.12 (2d Cir. 2014) (“To determine whether the relevant law was clearly established, we consider the specificity with which a right is defined, the existence of Supreme Court or Court of Appeals case law on the subject, and the understanding of a reasonable officer in light of preexisting law. . . Even if this Court has not explicitly held a course of conduct to be unconstitutional, we may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from this or other circuits ‘clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue.’. . . We do not think that, as some decisions in this Circuit have suggested, ‘[o]nly Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation is relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established.’ Moore v. Vega, 371 F.3d 110, 114 (2d Cir.2004) (emphasis added) (citing Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 144 (2d Cir.1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 964). (The author of this opinion was a member of the panel in Moore.) Townes correctly stated that we consider “whether the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit had affirmed the existence of the right,” Townes, 176 F.3d at 144, but the opinion also made clear that, “[e]ven in the absence of binding precedent, a right is clearly established if the contours ... are sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.” Id. (citing Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640) (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). Though not directly binding on this Court, the decisions of other circuits may reflect that the contours of the right in question are clearly established.”)

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir. 2010) (“Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts ‘clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue,’ Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75, 79 (2d Cir.1997) (internal quotation marks omitted), even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits, see, e.g., id.; Weber v. Dell, 804 F.2d 796, 801 n. 6, 803-04 (2d Cir.1986) (relying on decisions by seven other circuits finding similar searches unconstitutional, even though this Circuit had not yet reached the issue, in concluding that the defendant was not entitled to immunity), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1020 (1987).”)

Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 254, 255 (2d Cir. 2006) (“At the time of Pabon’s Hepatitis C treatment, it was clearly established that the Fourteenth Amendment confers the right to refuse medical treatment. . . The concomitant right to medical information was not clearly established, however, because neither this court nor the Supreme Court had recognized such a right at that time. Thus, no official would have been aware that the failure to provide Pabon with such information as a reasonable patient would find necessary to make an informed decision regarding treatment was a violation of his substantive due process rights. We do not agree with Pabon that White, Benson, and Clarkson render this right to medical information clearly established. When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.”).

Hanrahan v. Doling, 331 F.3d 93, 98 n.6 (2d Cir. 2003) (“We note that the extent to which district court decisions may be taken into account in evaluating whether a right is clearly established for qualified immunity purposes is far from clear.”)

Anobile v. Pelligrino, 303 F.3d 107, 125, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) (“We believe that the issue presented in this case, whether dormitories located on the premises of a highly regulated business deserve the same Fourth Amendment protections afforded to private residences, was hardly clearly established in December 1997. At the time of the search, competing Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent potentially applied to this issue. On one hand, some cases hold that warrantless administrative searches are permissible where the regulatory scheme concerns an important government interest, and the scheme provides notice to the proprietors of commercial premises of the likelihood of searches. . . On the other hand, some cases hold that homes, and even private rooms, are accorded the highest Fourth Amendment protections. . . As of the time of the search at issue, no decision of this Court had addressed, even generally, the permissibility of searching residential rooms on the grounds of a highly regulated commercial enterprise. We therefore agree with the district court that the law governing the searches of dormitories on racetrack grounds was not clearly established at the time of this search.”).

African Trade & Information Center, Inc. v. Abromaitis, 294 F.3d 355, 361 (2d Cir. 2002) (“[T]he question before us is whether, as of September 1998, a bidder or applicant for a new government contract who lacked a preexisting commercial relationship with the government had a clearly established right not to be denied the contract in retaliation for his or her protected speech. Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has yet addressed that question, and thus the right asserted by plaintiffs has not been established by decisions of those courts. This is not necessarily an insurmountable barrier to a finding that the right exists, as the Supreme Court has left open the possibility that a right may be ‘clearly established’ by decisions of other lower courts. . . Although we have consistently held that our own decisions may support the existence of the right in question, as we recently observed in Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123 (2d Cir.2002), our decisions send conflicting signals as to whether the decisions of other circuits may do so as well. . . We need not resolve the issue in this case because the right has not been clearly established by any court.”).

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 142 n.15 (2d Cir. 2002) (“It is unclear the extent to which we may rely on the case law of other circuits to determine whether the law was clearly established. The Supreme Court cases, Anderson and Harlow, from which the ‘clearly established’ rule derives do not provide a clear answer, as the Anderson Court does not discuss the issue, 483 U.S. at 639-40, and the Harlow Court expressly avoids deciding the question, see Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 n. 32 (1982). Our opinions have differed on this issue. [citing cases] Given that the factual situation presented here is unusual in the sense that Pearl was not performing the police functions we usually encounter in such cases and that Leonard, who is indirectly implicated in Pearl’s violation, is the individual whose understanding needs to be evaluated, we rely primarily on our cases to ascertain whether the law was clearly established but discuss other circuits’ cases because they are instructive.”).

Charles W. v. Maul, 214 F.3d 350, 353, 360, 361 (2d Cir. 2000) (“A right may be said to be clearly established when it has been recognized either by the Supreme Court or by the applicable Circuit Court. Whether a right recognized only by a trial court or by a state court is clearly established presents a closer question. . . . The district court held that a single state trial court decision can ‘clearly establish’ the relevant constitutional right in a case such as this one. It reasoned that when the government defendants are the very ones who litigated and lost the relevant state court case, they should not later be permitted to plead ignorance of its holding. We see no need to reach this somewhat problematic question. . . . Although Ritter defined a right with reasonable specificity, the right it posited was at odds with this Circuit’s applicable law. In claiming the existence of a constitutional right, plaintiff may not exploit a lower state court opinion—inconsistent with this Circuit’s precedent—as clearly establishing that right sufficient to deprive state officials, regardless of the level of their positions, of a qualified immunity defense. As a consequence, the right upon which McGhie relies can not be said to have been clearly established. We therefore dismiss McGhie’s equal protection claim against defendant Sarkis.”).

Russell v. Selsky, 35 F.3d 55, 60 (2d Cir. 1994) (“We conclude that in the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedents prescribing a right to have separate review and hearing officers in a state prison disciplinary hearing, there is no such clearly established right . . .”).

Jermosen v. Smith, 945 F.2d 547, 550 (2d Cir. 1991) (“In determining whether a particular right was clearly established at the time defendants acted, this Court has considered three factors: (1) whether the right in question was defined with ‘reasonable specificity’; (2) whether the decisional law of the Supreme Court and the applicable circuit court support the existence of the right in question, and (3) whether under preexisting law a reasonable defendant official would have understood that his or her acts were unlawful.”).

Soto v. City of New York, No. 12-CV-6911 RA, 2015 WL 3422155, at *3 n.1 (S.D.N.Y. May 28, 2015) (“There does not appear to be Supreme Court precedent directly on point and, to date, the Supreme Court has left open the question of whether, in the absence of controlling Supreme Court precedent, controlling circuit precedent constitutes clearly established federal law. See Sheehan, 2015 WL 2340839, at *9 (citing Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam)). The Second Circuit, however, has instructed courts to ‘look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation.’ Garcia, 779 F.3d at 92 (quoting Okin v. Vill. of Cornwall–On–Hudson Police Dep’t, 577 F.3d 415, 433 (2d Cir.2009)). Moreover, the ‘“absence of a decision by [the Second Circuit] or the Supreme Court directly addressing the right at issue will not preclude a finding that the law was clearly established” so long as preexisting law “clearly foreshadow[s] a particular ruling on the issue.”’ Id. (quoting Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 84 (2d Cir.2000)).”)

Franklin v. County of Dutchess, 225 F.R.D. 487, 494 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (“The Second Circuit has held that the law cannot be ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes by district court opinions, but only by the decisions of the applicable circuit court or the Supreme Court. . . . Therefore, this Court’s decision in Murcia is not sufficient to put Sheriff Anderson on notice, as of the date of that decision, that the indiscriminate strip searching of newly-arrived felony detainees was unlawful, nor is the law ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes. That being so, I conclude that, until the Court of Appeals clearly extends the reach of Weber/Walsh/Wachtler/Shain I to a new class of persons–felony detaineesB reasonable law enforcement officials in Sheriff Anderson’s position could come to different conclusions about what the law permits with respect to on-arrival strip searches of such individuals. Thus, to the extent that Ramona Franklin seeks to hold the sheriff liable for enforcing a policy that required the strip searching of accused felons who arrived at the DCJ, the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

James v. New Jersey State Police, 957 F.3d 165, 170 (3d Cir. 2020), reh’g and reh’g en banc denied sub nom Gibbons v. New Jersdy State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (3d Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (“For qualified-immunity purposes, ‘clearly established rights are derived either from binding Supreme Court and Third Circuit precedent or from a “robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals.”’ . . . So we first look to factually analogous precedents of the Supreme Court and the Third Circuit. . . . Then, we examine persuasive authorities, such as our nonprecedential opinions and decisions from other Courts of Appeals. . . . We may consider all relevant cases under this inquiry, not just those cited by the parties. [citing Elder v. Holloway]”)

Randolph-Ali v. Minium, 793 F. App’x 146, ____ (3d Cir. 2019) (“We acknowledge that the Ninth Circuit had held, prior to August 2014, that officers employed excessive force when they used a taser without warning on a potential domestic abuse victim whose ‘crime, if any, was minimal,’ who ‘posed no threat to the officers,’ who ‘minimally resisted [her husband’s] arrest while attempting to protect her own body and to comply with [an officer’s] request that she speak to him outside, and [who] begged everyone not to wake her sleeping children.’. . The facts in Mattos, however, are distinguishable from those presented here. The officer in Mattos used the taser in ‘dart mode,’ which constitutes an intermediate, significant level of force, while Detective Minium tased Randolph-Ali in ‘drive stun’ mode, which causes incapacitating pain, but does not paralyze the entire body. . . In addition, Randolph-Ali refused to comply with Detective Minium’s demand that she allow him inside to search for the suspect. By contrast, the plaintiff in Mattos ‘was attempting to comply with [a police officer’s] request to speak with her outside when she got physically caught in the middle between [another police officer] and [her husband].’. . Finally, Randolph-Ali’s crime was not ‘minimal.’ Instead, she was arrested for, inter alia, endangering the welfare of children, obstructing the administration of law, resisting arrest, and disorderly conduct. Under these circumstances, we conclude that there is no consensus of authority that Detective Minium’s actions under the particular circumstances of this case implicated a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court’s judgment.”)

Hubbard v. Taylor, 538 F.3d 229, 236, 238 (3d Cir. 2008) (Neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has “established a right of pretrial detainees to be free from triple-celling or from sleeping on a mattress placed on the floor. . . . In the absence of direct authority from the Supreme Court or this Court, the Defendants in this case were not obliged to familiarize themselves with, and adhere to, the decisions of district courts outside their jurisdiction when the very court to whose jurisdiction they were subject repeatedly approved of their practices at Gander Hill.”).

Williams v. Bitner, 455 F.3d 186, 194 (3d Cir. 2006) (“In sum, we hold that the Prison Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity from Williams’s First Amendment claim. Although we had not yet addressed the issue raised here at the time of the incident, the Fifth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits had addressed First Amendment claims similar to Williams’s and held that prison officials must respect and accommodate, when practicable, a Muslim inmate’s religious beliefs regarding prohibitions on the handling of pork. Moreover, decisions from the Supreme Court and this Court support the principles underlying the right asserted by Williams. We therefore conclude that the state of the law at the time the violation occurred gave the Prison Officials ‘fair warning’ that their alleged treatment of Williams was unconstitutional.”).

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 321 (3d Cir. 2001) (“District court opinions may be relevant to the determination of when a right was clearly established for qualified immunity analysis. [footnote surveying circuits in terms of weight afforded district court opinions in clearly-established-law analysis] However, in this case, the absence of binding precedent in this circuit,. . . the doubts expressed by the most analogous appellate holding, together with the conflict among a handful of district court opinions, undermines any claim that the right was clearly established in 1995.”).

Pro v. Donatucci, 81 F.3d 1283, 1291-92 (3d Cir. 1996) (“We agree with the district court that Pro’s right to respond to the subpoena without fear of retaliation was clearly established at the time Donatucci acted. . . . Bieregu v. Reno, 59 F.3d 1445, 1459 (3d Cir. 1995)]found law to be clearly established despite a circuit split, as long as ‘no gaping divide has emerged in the jurisprudence such that defendants could reasonably expect this circuit to rule’ to the contrary. . . Thus, the split between the Courts of Appeals for the Fifth and the Fourth [footnote omitted] Circuits at the time of Donatucci’s actions does not preclude our deciding that Pro’s right to respond to the subpoena was clearly established.”).

Brown v. Grabowski, 922 F.2d 1097, 1118 (3d Cir. 1990) (“We believe that Thurman,. . . a lone district court case from another jurisdiction, cannot sufficiently have established and limned the equal protection rights of a domestic violence victim . . . to enable reasonable officials to “anticipate [that] their conduct [might] give rise to liability for damages.” [cites omitted]).

Brothers v. Lawrence County Prison Bd., 2008 WL 146828, *13 & n.10 (W.D.Pa. Jan.14, 2008) (“Defendants argue that the law of the United States Supreme Court and the Third Circuit did not clearly establish that Plaintiff had a First Amendment right not to be strip searched by a female nor was any other constitutional right not to undergo a cross gender strip search clearly established. The Defendants appear to assume, at least in part, that when this court conducts a clearly established analysis, the only proper precedent to look to is that emanating from either the Supreme Court or from within the Third Circuit. However, this court is not convinced that there are such limitations. [reviewing cases] In light of this, and in light of the fact that the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held as early as 1999 in Moore v. Carwell, 168 F.3d 234 (5th Cir.1999), that a cross gender strip search could violate the constitution where no exigent circumstances required a cross gender, as opposed to a same gender strip search, Defendants have not carried their burden at this stage to show the law was not clearly established. . . .Because the Defendants relied upon their mistaken view of the proper analysis to be undertaken to find ‘clearly established’ they simply stated that there were no Supreme Court or Third Circuit cases establishing the right not to be stripped searched. Now that they are relieved of their mistaken belief, any denial of their motion to dismiss based upon a claim of qualified immunity is without prejudice to them reasserting their qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, by making the argument that they are entitled to qualified immunity based on the state of the law even outside this Circuit. It may be that the Fifth Circuit’s decision in Moore v. Campbell is aberrational, or that there is a great deal of conflicting Circuit Court opinion but this will be for the Moving Defendants to ferret out, not this court.”).

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Latson v. Clarke, 794 F. App’x 266, ___ (4th Cir. 2019) (“Although no longer good law, . . . at the time of Latson’s incarceration (2014–2015) we had held that long-term solitary confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . Latson argues that MCTC staff nevertheless had fair notice of the unconstitutional nature of solitary confinement as applied to prisoners with mental disabilities, given a handful of district court opinions from outside this Circuit. [citing cases] The argument fails. These decisions simply do not represent an ‘overwhelming consensus’ of persuasive authority that clearly established and gave fair notice of an Eighth Amendment violation, particularly due to our contrary circuit authority at the time of the alleged violation. See Booker v. S.C. Dep't of Corr., 855 F.3d 533, 545 (4th Cir. 2017). Accordingly, notwithstanding the dreadful conditions imposed on Latson, we can only conclude that MCTC staff are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 539-46 (4th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 755 (2018) (“The Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, articulated that courts may rely on ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ to determine whether a ‘reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . . Since Wilson, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that ‘qualified immunity is lost when plaintiffs point either to “cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident” or to “a consensus of cases of persuasive authority.”’ . . . And in evaluating whether a right is clearly established in a given circuit, the Supreme Court has looked to precedent from other circuits. [citing Pearson and Brosseau] At the outset, we preempt a possible point of confusion—Booker did not allege in his complaint that he has an absolute right to file prison grievances pursuant to the First Amendment. Rather, Booker alleged that he has a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when he does file a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. . . . More particularly, Booker asserts that this right is rooted in the First Amendment’s Petition Clause, which guarantees individuals the right ‘to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.’ . . . Booker contends that an inmate’s right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Booker’s detailed factual allegations and his reference to the First Amendment provide a more-than-sufficient basis for us to analyze whether the right was clearly established under the Petition Clause. . . . The clearly established inquiry asks whether the state of the law gave a reasonable prison official ‘fair warning’ that retaliating against an inmate who files a prison grievance was unconstitutional. It is ‘well established’ in this Circuit that a ‘public official may not misuse his power to retaliate against an individual for the exercise of a valid constitutional right.’ . . . Thus, if an inmate exercises his First Amendment right when he files a prison grievance, retaliation against him for doing so is unconstitutional. The pertinent question in this appeal, then, is whether it was clearly established that an inmate exercises a First Amendment right to petition for redress of grievances when he files a prison grievance. Framed differently, we must determine whether it was clearly established that an inmate’s right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Adams [v. Rice], 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994)] establishes a clear rule: inmates have no constitutional entitlement or due process interest in access to a grievance procedure. An inmate thus cannot bring a § 1983 claim alleging denial of a specific grievance process, for example. But Adams is entirely silent on the issue in this case—whether an inmate’s First Amendment right is violated when he is retaliated against for submitting a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. That a prison is not required under the Constitution to provide access to a grievance process does not mean that prison officials who retaliate against inmates for filing grievances do not violate the Constitution. . . . The Eighth Circuit is not alone in finding that although inmates do not have a constitutional entitlement to and/or due process interest in accessing a grievance procedure, they have a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when they do file. [collecting cases from other Circuits] In short, Adams concerns whether inmates have a constitutional entitlement to or liberty interest in accessing grievance procedures. It says nothing about whether a prison official violates an inmate's First Amendment rights by retaliating against the inmate for submitting a grievance. Therefore, contrary to Appellees' suggestion, Adams does not speak to the right at issue. As such, neither party has cited cases from courts of controlling authority—the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina—that explicitly address an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a prison grievance. . . . We therefore agree with the district court's conclusion that no published decision from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina squarely addresses whether filing a grievance is protected First Amendment conduct. The district court, after determining there were no binding cases that squarely established the specific First Amendment right, concluded that the right was not clearly established. . . . But the clearly established inquiry was not complete: as this Court has stated, and as Booker recognizes, the 'absence of controlling authority holding identical conduct unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity.' . . . The district court failed to consider whether, despite the lack of directly on-point, binding authority, the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority. We now proceed to that task. . . . In the absence of controlling authority that specifically adjudicates the right in question, a right may still be clearly established in one of two ways. A right may be clearly established if 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law [] appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.' . . . A right may also be clearly established based on a ' "consensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions.' . . . Here, Booker argues that his First Amendment right was clearly established in both ways. Arguably, the prohibition on retaliating against inmates for filing grievances was obviously unconstitutional given longstanding principles articulated in controlling authority. It is beyond dispute that prison officials cannot retaliate against inmates for exercising a constitutional right. . . . And Booker presents a logical and compelling argument that, in light of binding Supreme Court precedent, he exercised his constitutional right to petition the government for redress of grievances when he filed an administrative grievance seeking redress for what he believed was the improper handling of his legal mail. . . . In addition to Supreme Court precedent, this Court has long held that prison officials may not retaliate against prisoners for exercising their right to access the courts, . . . which is a component of the right to petition for redress of grievances [.] . . . Given the close relationship between an inmate filing a grievance and filing a lawsuit—indeed, the former is generally a prerequisite for the latter—our jurisprudence provided a strong signal that officials may not retaliate against inmates for filing grievances. Regardless of whether Booker's right was obvious or 'manifestly apparent' from broader principles in the decisional law, we find that it was clearly established based on a robust 'consensus of persuasive authority.' The Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have all recognized in published decisions that inmates possess a right, grounded in the First Amendment's Petition Clause, to be free from retaliation in response to filing a prison grievance. . . . The Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have likewise recognized that inmates possess a First Amendment petition right to be free from retaliation for filing grievances. [collecting cases] Even more, the Third, Fifth, and Tenth Circuits have recognized an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance under the First Amendment (albeit without referencing a particular clause). [collecting cases] Given the decisions from nearly every court of appeals, we are compelled to conclude that Booker's right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment. Consistent with fundamental constitutional principles and common sense, these courts have had little difficulty concluding that prison officials violate the First Amendment by retaliating against inmates for filing grievances. Rarely will there be such an overwhelming consensus of authority recognizing that specific conduct is violative of a constitutional right. The unanimity among our sister circuits demonstrates that the constitutional question is 'beyond debate,' and therefore we find that the right at issue was clearly established. . . . Our 'conclusion that "a reasonable person would have known," Harlow [v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982)], of the violation is buttressed by' the South Carolina Department of Correction's internal policies. . . . Although officials 'do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some statutory or administrative provision,' . . . the Supreme Court has analyzed prison regulations in combination with case law to determine whether an individual had fair warning[.] [citing Hope] Here, the SCDC's detailed policy document concerning the 'Inmate Grievance System'. . . expressly provides that '[n]o inmate will be subjected to reprisal, retaliation, harassment, or disciplinary action for filing a grievance or participating in the resolution of a grievance.' . . . The record further indicates that this prohibition was communicated to prison officials. . . . Again, the fundamental inquiry for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable official in Jones's position had 'fair warning' that the alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . . The unequivocal language of SCDC's own policies provides additional support for our finding that Jones had such warning here. In sum, given the authority discussed above, we conclude that a reasonable prison official had fair warning that retaliating against an inmate who filed a prison grievance was unlawful. Because an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established, we find that Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity on that basis and therefore the district court erred in granting their motion for summary judgment.")

Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 547-53 (4th Cir. 2017) (Traxler, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 755 (2018) ("Relying on decisions from other circuits, the majority concludes that a prisoner's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, when the actions giving rise to this lawsuit took place. Even assuming that that right may have been clearly established in other circuits, the case law from this circuit in 2010 could reasonably be understood as foreclosing that claim. See Adams v. Rice, 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994). Because the controlling law in this circuit did not put the prison officials on notice that their conduct violated Booker's constitutional rights, I believe the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . I do not disagree that the weight of authority outside this circuit holds that the First Amendment is violated when prison officials retaliate against an inmate for filing a grievance under an established grievance system. Where I disagree with the majority is in its conclusion that case law from this circuit was silent on the relevant First Amendment question. In my view, this court's decision in Adams v. Rice could reasonably be understood as holding that an inmate's use of a prison grievance system does not implicate the First Amendment and that grievance-based retaliation against the inmate likewise does not implicate the First Amendment. Because Adams can reasonably be understood to permit the actions of the prison officials at issue in this case, the majority erred by looking outside the circuit to conclude otherwise. . . .[I]f filing a grievance implicates no constitutional right, then retaliation against the inmate because of the grievance does not violate the Constitution. . . . I simply see no basis for concluding, as the majority apparently does, that the act of filing a grievance -- an act that is not constitutionally protected -- somehow imbues the filing with constitutional protections. Accordingly, it seems to me that this court's decision in Adams affirmatively closes the door to the retaliation claim being asserted here. . . .In my view, Adams directly, though not explicitly, forecloses Booker's retaliation claim. But even if the distinction between this case and Adams that the majority apparently embraces were viable, a reasonable prison official could still conclude that the actions alleged in this case were permissible under this court's decision in Adams. . . . I therefore believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In Adams, this court held that 'there is no constitutional right to participate in grievance proceedings.' 40 F.3d at 75 (emphasis added). Because inmates participate in grievance proceedings by filing a grievance, our decision in Adams must be understood as holding that inmates have no constitutional right to file a grievance. The filing of a grievance therefore implicates no constitutional right of the inmate and cannot support a retaliation claim against prison officials. . . .Adams is binding authority that directly rejects the constitutional right asserted in this case. The majority errs by ignoring Adams and relying instead on out-of-circuit cases that are inconsistent with our holding in Adams in order to declare that an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established. Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, I believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's contrary conclusion.")

Owens by and through Owens v. Lott, 372 F.3d 267, 279, 280 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Whether a right has been specifically adjudicated or is manifestly apparent from broader applications of the constitutional premise in question, we look ordinarily to 'the decisions of the Supreme Court, this court of appeals, and the highest court of the state in which the case arose.' . . . When there are no such decisions from courts of controlling authority, we may look to 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions, if such exists. . . . There is no controlling authority that informs our analysis in this case. As we have already noted, the Supreme Court has not addressed the circumstances, if any, under which an 'all persons' provision in a search warrant is constitutional, . . . nor has this court done so. The vast majority of the decisions from other jurisdictions considering the validity of 'all persons' warrants--mostly state decisions--conclude that a search warrant authorizing the search of 'all persons' found on the premises does not violate the Fourth Amendment per se. Beyond that broad conclusion, however, courts impose different requirements for what is necessary to sustain the validity of such a warrant. . . . Moreover, these decisions provide no clear view, let alone a consensus, regarding what factors are most significant in deciding whether sufficient probable cause exists to support the search of 'all persons' found in a private residence being searched for drugs. . . . We conclude that at the time of the search, the law was not sufficiently clear to strip defendants of qualified immunity.")

Rogers v. Pendleton, 249 F.3d 279, 287, 288 (4th Cir. 2001) ("In determining whether a right is clearly established, we may rely upon cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, or a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617. While a consensus of cases of persuasive authority may clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes, the inverse is also true: if there are no cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, and if other appellate federal courts have split on the question of whether an asserted right exists, the right cannot be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . . Therefore, having determined that the United States Supreme Court has, in Oliver and Dunn, established the right to be free of searches of the curtilage based merely on reasonable suspicion, we must survey the cases cited by the officers to determine whether these cases could cause a reasonable officer to believe that the search planned by the officers in this case was constitutional. . . . Because the officers do not claim to have had a warrant, exigent circumstances, or probable cause, it follows that their contemplated search was illegal, and it was plainly so based upon clearly established law at the time of the search.”).

Snyder v. Ringgold, 133 F.3d 917 (Table), 1998 WL 13528, *3 (4th Cir. Jan. 15, 1998) (“The right for which plaintiff contends has not been clearly established by specific adjudication. No Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit case has held that reporters have a constitutional right of equal or nondiscriminatory access to government information that need not otherwise be made available to the public. In fact, the district court opinion below relied only on three, relatively old federal district court decisions and one state court of appeals decision in support of its holding that Ringgold had violated Snyder’s First Amendment rights. . . . On appeal, the plaintiff has cited cases from the First, Second, and District of Columbia Circuit Courts of Appeals that consider issues that she believes to be analogous to the issue in this case. . . . The plaintiff’s resort to these out-of-circuit cases merely underscores the lack of Fourth Circuit and Supreme Court law establishing the right for which she contends.”).

Sauceda v. Lopez, 125 F.4th 634, 638 n.2 (5th Cir. 2025) (“Notably, the Supreme Court has repeatedly reserved the question of whether plaintiffs can rely on circuit court precedents, as opposed to those of the Supreme Court itself, to demonstrate ‘clearly established law.’”)

Ramirez v. Killian, 113 F.4th 415, 426-29 & n.7 (5th Cir. 2024) (“We must first examine the threshold question of whether the legal rule cited by the district court and given to the jury was clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. At the outset, we note that neither the parties nor the district court has cited a controlling case from our circuit. They instead cite cases where we have, in unpublished opinions, addressed dog shootings by police. Two of these predate June 20, 2016, when the events at issue here transpired. . . . Nevertheless, while these cases all announce the relevant legal rule, our unpublished opinions cannot themselves establish binding law for this circuit. . . . While they can still serve as ‘persuasive authority,’ . . . we must look elsewhere to determine whether the legal rule given to the jury was clearly established. ‘[I]n the absence of directly controlling authority, a consensus of cases of persuasive authority might, under some circumstances, be sufficient to compel the conclusion that no reasonable officer could have believed that his or her actions were lawful.’ . . . Looking, therefore, to the other circuits, we find a robust consensus that an officer may not, consistent with the Fourth Amendment, kill a pet dog unless he reasonably believes that the dog poses a threat and that he is in imminent danger of being attacked. We are far from the first to recognize and apply this rule—in fact, we are almost the last. Each of our sister circuits save for the Eleventh Circuit has addressed, in published opinions, the applicability of the Fourth Amendment to state officials’ killing pet dogs. . . . Eight of those opinions were published before June 20, 2016. The legal rule that they announce is clear: killing a pet dog constitutes a seizure of property under the Fourth Amendment, which must then be evaluated for reasonableness to determine whether the killing ran afoul of the Constitution. [collecting cases] We acknowledge that it is difficult for persuasive authority, rather than controlling authority, to clearly establish a legal rule. . . . But if ever a robust consensus of persuasive authority existed, it exists here.⁷ [fn. 7: We are not even the first court to hold that a robust consensus of persuasive authority clearly establishes this exact legal proposition. The First Circuit in Maldonado ‘reject[ed]’ the defendant state official’s argument that the ‘law was not clearly established because this court had not earlier addressed’ whether killing a pet dog could constitute an unreasonable seizure. . . . Rather, because four other circuits had already held as much, ‘the law was sufficiently recognized by courts to be clearly established.’] Crucially, there is no disagreement that we can discern over the contours of this legal rule. Almost every other circuit applies it. District courts in our circuit regularly apply it. And we ourselves have applied it, simply choosing not to publish the opinions that did so. . . . It should come as no surprise to an officer that he may not go around shooting citizens’ nonaggressive dogs. Indeed, it is a matter of ‘common sense.’ . . . Therefore, ‘consistent with [] every other circuit court to have addressed the issue,’ we recognize that the ‘killing of a pet dog can be a seizure.’ . . . Such a seizure is reasonable only if the dog ‘poses an immediate danger and the use of force in unavoidable.’ . . . This law was clearly established when Killian entered Ramirez’s and Gonzales’s home and killed their dogs.”)

Ford v. Anderson County, Texas, 102 F.4th 292, 309 & n. 8, 310 n.9 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Like the nurse in Easter, Dr. Corley knew that an inmate had a serious medical condition but failed to treat her for that condition. We recognize that the prisoner in Easter was denied treatment during an acute period, while Dr. Corley denied Newsome ongoing, day-to-day treatment for her known chronic condition—Addison’s disease. But our case law clearly establishes that refusal to treat in both types of circumstances is a violation of an inmate’s constitutional rights. [relying on Lawson v. Dallas County]⁸ [fn. 8 and fn. 9: While Plaintiffs themselves do not cite to Lawson, in a qualified immunity inquiry ‘we needn’t limit our analysis to the cases cited by Plaintiffs.’ . . . Several of our unpublished opinions are also worth highlighting. This court’s unpublished opinions cannot clearly establish the law for the purposes of qualified immunity, but they nevertheless may ‘aptly illustrate[] the established right.’ . . . Of particular relevance is this court’s decision in Dauzat v. Carter, 670 F. App’x at 298, where we affirmed that a prisoner stated a valid deliberate indifference claim in alleging that a doctor ignored his ‘serious medical need for physical therapy’ by only providing a wellness program conducted by inmates. We further held that the prisoner’s constitutional rights were clearly established by Easter and Lawson. Here, we similarly hold that Newsome’s right to not be denied, by deliberate indifference, treatment for her chronic condition was clearly established by Easter and Lawson. Furthermore, in several other unpublished opinions, we have recognized that an official is deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s serious medical needs when he or she delays treatment or provides only cursory care. [collecting cases]]”)

Dawes v. City of Dallas, No. 22-10876, 2024 WL 2268529, at *4 (5th Cir. May 20, 2024)(not reported) (“The dissenting opinion correctly recognizes that ‘Lytle itself cannot form the clearly established law in this case.’. . . The dissenting opinion instead points to two out-of-circuit precedents to clearly establish the relevant law. . . This contention is foreclosed by our precedent, however. In McClendon v. City of Columbia, 305 F.3d 314 (5th Cir. 2002), we recognized that six circuits sanctioning ‘some version’ of the question at issue was insufficient to give officers ‘fair warning.’”)

Dawes v. City of Dallas, No. 22-10876, 2024 WL 2268529, at *4-9 (5th Cir. May 20, 2024)(not reported) (Dennis, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“While I concur in the majority opinion’s remand of plaintiffs’ claims against the City of Dallas, I dissent from the majority’s decision to affirm the district court’s entry of summary judgment in favor of the two individual officers. Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claims against Hess and Kimpel are based on the officers’ use of deadly force against Dawes and Rosales in the absence of any danger to themselves or others. The majority’s approval of the district court’s misguided judgment extending qualified immunity to Hess and Kimpel is not only incorrect as a matter of law, but also serves to condone the inexcusable incompetence displayed by these two officers—both of whom were suspended or terminated from their positions as police officers for having violated their department’s use-of-force policy. I respectfully dissent. . . Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to them, plaintiffs have met their burden of demonstrating that: (1) the officers violated Dawes’s and Rosales’s constitutional right to be free from unreasonably excessive force; and (2) Dawes’s and Rosales’ right to be free from such force under these facts was both obvious and clearly established. . . Here, we have the benefit of video footage capturing the incident, which makes clear that the ‘videotape quite clearly contradicts’ the officers’ dangerous belief that deadly force—indeed thirteen shots fired—was necessary to stop a boxed-in vehicle from reversing at a crawling speed of under three miles per hour when the officers could have, and in fact did, use a squad car to block Dawes’s vehicle—making it impossible for her to flee. . . While the majority is certainly correct that ‘[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right,’ the ‘focus’ of the qualified immunity analysis is whether the officer had ‘fair notice’ that his conduct was unlawful. . . In light of Kirby and Vaughan’s guidance in interpreting Garner, it was clearly established on the date of Dawes’s death that ‘police officers may not fire at non-dangerous fleeing felons’ where, as here, there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the suspect heard the officers’ prior commands, the at-issue vehicle was boxed-in such that the suspect could not flee, the vehicle was not moving fast enough to objectively present any immediate danger to officers, Dawes made no menacing gestures at the officers besides accelerating her car to a speed of approximately three miles per hour, and any prior collision between the suspect's vehicle and a police vehicle was accidental. . . Moreover, the officers' grotesque, unwarranted killing of Dawes presents such an egregious case of unreasonable use of deadly force so as to excuse plaintiffs' need to identify prior case law. In 'an obvious case' like this one,³ [fn. 3: The majority opinion posits the obvious case exception as requiring both 'extraordinarily egregious facts' and 'a complete absence of exigency.' . . This is incorrect. In Taylor v. Riojas, the Supreme Court certainly noted the absence of 'necessity or exigency' in determining that 'any reasonable officer should have realized' that the conditions of confinement in that case were unconstitutional, yet nowhere did it purport to make a lack of necessity or exigency a requirement under the obvious case doctrine. . . In any event, there was no exigency here justifying the use of deadly force against Dawes given that there was no 'imminent risk of death or serious injury' or that 'a suspect [would] escape.'] the Graham excessive-force factors themselves can clearly establish the right at issue without a body of relevant case law. . . As discussed above, a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer could have believed Dawes was resisting arrest or posed a safety threat by reversing her car at under three miles per hours. Therefore, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Dawes, the defendant officers acted objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law in shooting at an occupied vehicle thirteen times in the absence of any threat to officer safety. In light of the use of deadly force deemed unreasonable by the Supreme Court in Garner and elaborated on by circuit courts, the defendant officers had 'fair notice' that using deadly force against Dawes where no reasonable officer could conclude that she posed any immediate safety threat to anyone would violate her Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonably excessive force. . . In light of clearly established law, as announced in Garner and elucidated in Kirby and Vaughn, it is 'beyond debate' that the officers' use of deadly force against Dawes was unconstitutional. . . Moreover, the unconstitutionality of the officers' use of deadly force against Dawes was plainly obvious under the factors laid out in Graham. . . The panel should reverse and remand the district court's grant of qualified immunity in favor of the defendant officers. I respectfully, but emphatically, dissent.")

Boyd v. McNamara, 74 F.4th 662, 669-70 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub. nom. Johnson v. Boyd, 144 S. Ct. 562 (2024) ("Defendants also assert in a footnote that "it is not clear" whether our precedents, as opposed to the Supreme Court's, can clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity. A proverbial mountain of binding authority is to the contrary. . . We routinely rely on our own cases to determine whether a rule of law has been clearly established. [collecting cases]")

Boyd v. McNamara, 74 F.4th 662, 672-73 (5th Cir. 2023) (Oldham, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied sub. nom. Johnson v. Boyd, 144 S. Ct. 562 (2024) ("I agree with the majority that we should remand Andreas Boyd's policy and practice claims and affirm the dismissal of his deliberate indifference claim. But I respectfully disagree with the majority opinion's analysis of the excessive force claim. As to the latter, I have two principal reservations. First, the majority opinion relies exclusively on circuit precedent to clearly establish the law. But the Supreme Court has never authorized this approach. . . Absent a clear instruction from our Nation's highest court regarding the relevance of circuit precedent, we cannot expect everyday officers to draw the necessary inferences from our large, ever-growing, and often-contradictory precedents. . . . Second, I am increasingly concerned that our excessive-force cases are governed by Justice Stewart’s unsatisfying standard of ‘I know it when I see it.’ Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184, 197, 84 S.Ct. 1676, 12 L.Ed.2d 793 (1964) (Stewart, J., concurring). Justice Stewart regretted that statement later in life. See Al Kamen, Retired High Court Justice Potter Stewart Dies at 70, Wash. Post (Dec. 8, 1985). And that regret is understandable because the statement suggests that constitutional questions hinge on in-chambers video viewings and intuition. But query how our Fourth Amendment approach is different, especially when we combine in-chambers video viewings with the deeply indeterminate corpus of circuit precedent. We certainly have an obligation to watch these videos, . . . but when we are bound only by conflicting circuit precedent, it is unclear to me if and how we are bound at all. . . . The Supreme Court has told us not to substitute the ‘20/20 vision of hindsight’ for ‘the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene,’ who must make ‘split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’ . . . Yet I worry that in-chambers bodycam movie days, especially when combined with our reliance on circuit precedent, lead to predictably unpredictable interpretations of the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’ . . . With deepest respect and admiration for my learned and esteemed colleagues, I think it is unwise to give a panel of three judges the power to set clearly established law and thereby bind every law enforcement officer in three States, governing every conceivable emergency situation in every community from El Paso to Pascagoula. And I think it is particularly unwise when the underlying legal standard is so open-ended and our precedents are so contradictory. If the Supreme Court wants to vest this power in us, so be it. But unless and until the Court does, I would not assert it.”)

Smith v. Lee, 73 F.4th 376, 384 & n.1 (5th Cir. 2023) (“At the second step, we must determine whether Smith’s Fourth Amendment rights were clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Smith’s right to not have her home searched without a warrant, consent, or other legal justification was clearly established in 2018. . . . [fn. 1: The Supreme Court has recently expressed uncertainty about whether circuit-level precedent qualifies as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . However, the Court previously held that officers were entitled to qualified immunity because ‘the Petitioners have not brought to our attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they seek to rely, nor have they identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999) (emphasis added). Accordingly, we look to both Supreme Court precedent and our binding precedent as controlling for purposes of qualified immunity.] Accepting Plaintiffs’ version of the facts as true, the officers did not implicitly or explicitly request permission to enter, but Barker and Lee entered her home anyway. In such a scenario, both Barker and Lee’s entry ‘would be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.’ . . . Every reasonable officer would know they cannot enter a house based on the occupant’s silence without first making an implicit or explicit request to enter. Lee and Barker are not entitled to qualified immunity from Smith’s unlawful entry claims at this stage.”)

Fisher v. Moore, 73 F.4th 367, 371-75 (5th Cir. 2023) (denying reh'g en banc and amending opinion), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 569 (2024) (“Appellants contend that as of November 2019, when the events took place, it was not clearly established that plaintiffs have a right to be free from state-created dangers. Appellants are correct. The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that ‘[n]o State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.’. . . ‘The Due Process Clause ... does not, as a general matter, require the government to protect its citizens from the acts of private actors.’. . . We have recognized just one exception to this general rule: ‘when [a] “special relationship” between the individual and the state imposes upon the state a constitutional duty to protect that individual from known threats of harm by private actors.’. . . However, ‘a number of our sister circuits have adopted a “state-created danger” exception to the general rule, under which a state actor who knowingly places a citizen in danger may be accountable for the foreseeable injuries that result.’. . . M.F. brings her due process claim against Appellants only under the second exception, the state-created danger theory. The problem for M.F. is that ‘the Fifth Circuit has never recognized th[e] “state-created-danger” exception.’. . . In our published, and thus binding, caselaw, ‘[w]e have repeatedly declined to recognize the state-created danger doctrine.’. . . For this reason, M.F. ‘ha[s] not demonstrated a clearly established substantive due process right on the facts [she] allege[s].’ . . The district court thus erred in denying qualified immunity to Appellants. Even though we repeat today that the state-created danger doctrine is not clearly established in our circuit, to our knowledge we have not categorically ruled out the doctrine either; we have merely declined to adopt this particular theory of liability. To be sure, we have suggested what elements any such theory would include—should we ever adopt it, of course. For example, on one occasion, we indicated that a state-created danger theory would require ‘a plaintiff [to] show [1] the defendants used their authority to create a dangerous environment for the plaintiff and [2] that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.’. . . We also stated that the defendant “‘must have used their authority to create an opportunity that would not otherwise have existed for the third party’s crime to occur.’”. . . Nonetheless, as we have held time and again, the right to be free from state-created danger is not clearly established in this circuit. We acknowledge that, as of November 2019, a majority of our sister circuits had adopted the state-created danger theory of liability in one form or another. . . And, as M.F. points out, sometimes a ‘robust “consensus of persuasive authority”’ may suffice to clearly establish a constitutional right. . . But even putting aside our binding precedent that the doctrine is not clearly established in our circuit, our cases foreclose this specific line of reasoning as well. As we have held, ‘the mere fact that a large number of courts had recognized the existence of a right to be free from state-created danger in some circumstances ... is insufficient to clearly establish’ the theory of liability in our circuit. . . ‘We reasoned that, despite widespread acceptance of the [state-created danger] doctrine [in other circuits], the circuits were not unanimous in [the doctrine’s] “contours” or its application.’. . . We therefore reject M.F.’s argument that out-of-circuit precedent clearly established her substantive due process right to be free from state-created danger. . . Finally, M.F. suggests that ‘[t]his is the case the Court has been waiting for,’ and she invites us to—finally—adopt the state-created danger theory of § 1983 liability. We are reluctant to do so. . . . The facts giving rise to this lawsuit are unquestionably horrific. And Title IX may well provide M.F. a remedy. But § 1983 does not, as the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity doctrine “protects government officials ‘from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’” . . . Our precedent has repeatedly declined to adopt the state-created danger doctrine. And a right never established cannot be one clearly established. As we recently put it, ‘A claim that we have expressly not recognized is the antithesis of a clearly established one.’”)

Tuttle v. Sepolio, 68 F.4th 969, 976-77 (5th Cir. 2023) (Oldham, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In my view, Officer Gonzalez is entitled to qualified immunity because neither the plaintiffs nor the district court pointed to any clearly established law holding otherwise. Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, and after it’s raised, it’s the plaintiffs’ burden to overcome it. . . . Plaintiffs can meet their burden by pointing to a Supreme Court case that places ‘the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . That precedent must be ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule.’ . . . Again and again, the Supreme Court has emphasized that the legal principle must ‘clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him.’ . . . Here, however, the district court did not apply the correct standard. In its analysis of the clearly established prong, the district court merely quoted general legal principles from Wanger v. Bonner, 621 F.2d 675, 680 (5th Cir. 1980), and Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249, 253–55 (5th Cir. 2010). But neither case is even close to this one. . . . And the plaintiffs don’t attempt to point to a factually similar case either. . . . I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority’s denial of qualified immunity to Officer Gonzalez.”)

Kemp v. Belanger, No. 21-30752, 2023 WL 2447442 (5th Cir. Mar. 10, 2023) (not reported) (Oldham, J., dissenting) (“The plaintiff in this qualified-immunity case does not specify any Supreme Court holding that clearly established the law and thus put the constitutionality of Officer Belanger’s conduct ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Therefore, I’d affirm.”)

McMurry v. Brunner, No. 21-50888, 2022 WL 17493708, at *7–12 (5th Cir. Dec. 7, 2022) (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) (not reported) (“Clearly established law is all about fair notice. . . . For there to be fair notice, the clearly-established-law standard ‘requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him.’ . . . That is, the ‘rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . There are generally two different paths to show this: (1) an on-point case and (2) the obvious-case exception. . . . Start with the on-point-case requirement. To show that the law is clearly established, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court decision before the time of the alleged misconduct that held there was a constitutional violation on fundamentally or materially similar facts. There’s a lot packed in there. So let’s break that down. First, the on-point case must be a Supreme Court decision issued before the alleged misconduct. . . . The Supreme Court has never held that circuit precedent can clearly establish the law. . . . Until they do, I would not rely on circuit precedent to deny qualified immunity. Second, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court case with fundamentally or materially similar facts. . . . Identification of such a case ensures that the rule has been defined with specificity. Third, the ‘decision must at least hold there was some violation of the [relevant] Amendment.’. . . It also makes sense for that holding to be a constitutional violation. That’s because the best way for a reasonable officer to understand a constitutional rule’s contours is when it’s applied to materially/fundamentally similar facts that result in a holding of a violation. It’d be difficult to say that facts are materially or fundamentally similar if the result in case X is no violation but the result in case Y is a violation. The difference in outcome shows that the facts are fundamentally/materially different, not similar. In sum, to show that the law is clearly established, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court decision issued before the time of the alleged misconduct that held there was a constitutional violation on fundamentally or materially similar facts. . . . The other path is the obvious-case exception. This exception has benefits but often-insurmountable burdens. Benefits first. As best I understand it, the obvious-case exception excuses the on-point-case requirement. In other words, a plaintiff always must point to a Supreme Court decision issued before the time of the alleged misconduct holding a violation of the constitutional right with fundamentally or materially similar facts unless he satisfies the obvious-case exception. . . . The plaintiff may instead rely on ‘general statements of the law’ from a Supreme Court decision to show that the officer had ‘fair and clear warning.’. . . Put another way, the plaintiff may rely on general statements to show that ‘the statutory or constitutional question [is] beyond debate.’. . . But to get that benefit, the plaintiff must meet a heavy burden. The Supreme Court recently made clear that for the obvious-case exception, there are two necessary conditions: (1) ‘particularly egregious facts’ and (2) ‘no evidence’ that the official’s actions ‘were compelled by necessity or exigency.’. . . Under the above framework, the McMurrays have shown that (1) Brunner violated their procedural-due-process rights and (2) this is such an obvious case, on egregious facts, involving no exigency beyond the one Brunner himself created, that Brunner had ample fair notice of his personal liability. . . . Start with the violation. The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no State may ‘deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.’. . . The McMurrays obviously have a fundamental liberty interest. It’s well-established that parents have a ‘fundamental right ... to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children.’. . . Officer Brunner obviously deprived the McMurrays of their liberty interest. JM’s parents ordered JM to continue her homeschooling (via online instruction) on October 26 (a weekday) while Mrs. McMurry was in Kuwait. By staying in the McMurrays’ apartment during school hours, JM was following her parents’ instruction. And while JM was in her parents’ apartment acting lawfully, she was in her parents’ custody. By removing JM from the apartment, Brunner forced JM to violate her parents’ entirely lawful instruction and thus deprived the parents of their right to custody and control of their daughter. Even more, Brunner stopped JM’s father from further directing his daughter when Brunner prevented JM from answering his calls for no conceivable reason. Prong one is thus easily satisfied. . . . The McMurrays also did not receive the process they were due. In fact, they received no process whatsoever. No ex parte court order, no warrant, no notice, no hearing. Nothing. Surely, the McMurrays had a right to at least some predeprivation process before their child was snatched from their home. . . . If predeprivation process is required for property unless there is an exigency, then the liberty interest here requires at least the same, if not more. . . . Therefore, unless Brunner establishes an exigency, the McMurrays’ procedural-due-process rights were violated. Brunner cannot come close to
