me, the video indicates that Aguirre may have continued resisting for a bit. But there is a good deal that is going on that has not been captured by the camera and cannot clearly be discerned. After about three minutes, however, Aguirre was surrounded by nine officers, only three of whom were restraining him—and by that point, he does not appear to be resisting much, if at all. Multiple officers are seen mulling around. So it would appear that, with the additional surveilling officers, the need for the extreme restraint may have lessened. Despite this change, the officers continued to apply the maximal restraint position for another two minutes. For those two minutes, there is a material factual dispute as to whether the restraint continued to be necessary to keep Aguirre from fleeing, given the number of officers available to prevent Aguirre from bolting into traffic. This disputed issue of fact requires a full airing of all the evidence before a fact-finder. Were a jury to find that the restraint used became, at some point, unnecessary to keep Aguirre from escaping into traffic, continuing this restraint against this particular person with some known health risks would constitute excessive force as a matter of law because an objective, reasonable officer would know that such force would not constitute a measured, appropriate degree of force. . . . Excessive force is unreasonable; unreasonable force, unconstitutional. Furthermore, if a jury concludes that the restraint was unnecessary, it would have been ‘obvious’ to a reasonable officer that the use of such a severe tactic against this particular person would be constitutionally proscribed, and he would have no recourse to qualified immunity. See Taylor v. Riojas, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 52, 52–54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020). I therefore concur with the result reached.”)

Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395, 424-25 (5th Cir. 2021) (Higginson, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I write separately only as to our reversal of the district court’s grant of summary judgement on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the plaintiffs’ excessive force claims. I concur on the narrow ground that our court’s clearly established law, though lacking clarity in some respects, had converged by spring of 2013 to stand at least for the proposition that police officers use constitutionally excessive force when they put a handcuffed arrestee, no longer resisting or posing a safety threat to himself or others, and whom the officers observed in an excited state of delirium and suspected to have ingested drugs, on the ground, face down in an asphyxial position, i.e., pulling back his leg and arms into prone restraint, and simultaneously apply vertical pressure to such a prone, immobile arrestee for sufficient time to see his lips turn blue and his breathing stop. Put otherwise, our caselaw had converged by spring 2013 around the clearly established proposition that while such an initial restraint is not per se unconstitutional, the continued application of asphyxiating force may be unreasonable where there is no ongoing threat posed by the suspect. . . . Of course, this evidence of police suffocation of a restrained, prone suspect is in the light most favorable to plaintiffs. One or more circumstance may prove untrue whereupon qualified immunity may attach.”)

Brown v. Tarrant County, Texas, 985 F.3d 489, 496-97 (5th Cir. 2021) (“[W]hen the question is pitched at the right level of specificity, Anderson’s actions do not appear ‘objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law ... at the time the defendant acted.’ . . . The sole relevant act Brown attributes to Anderson is signing the MOU or otherwise agreeing to confine him. But, as Anderson aptly explains, he had solid reason to believe that Brown’s confinement in the Cold Springs Jail was lawful under Brown’s commitment order, the SVPA, and the MOU. Moreover, at the time of the confinement, the Supreme Court had ‘repeatedly upheld civil commitment laws’ similar to Texas’ SVPA against various constitutional challenges, as the district court pointed out. . . And, as we noted in our 2018 opinion, the Texas Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the original SVPA in 2005. . . Brown does not point to any authority that would have alerted Anderson to the unconstitutionality of Brown’s confinement. . . Because ‘it cannot be said that all reasonable sheriffs would recognize the unconstitutionality of [Anderson]’s supervisory or personal acts or omissions,’ . . . Anderson’s acts were not objectively unreasonable. Anderson is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court correctly concluded.”)

Cunningham v. Castloo, 983 F.3d 185, 193-94 (5th Cir. 2020) (“The district court’s reliance on broad pronouncements from Constantineau and Bledsoe evinces a methodological error: It defined clearly established law too generally for any controlling relevance in this case. Courts must ‘frame the constitutional question with specificity and granularity.’ . . The district court did not do that. Instead, the district court appears to have asked whether, generally, the procedural-due-process right to a name-clearing hearing was clearly established. That wording is the wrong way to frame the question, as the Supreme Court repeatedly has told us. . . ‘The dispositive question,’ we emphasize, is whether ‘the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . The answer here is no. To further explain that compact response, we begin by describing the particular conduct for which Cunningham seeks to hold Sheriff Castloo liable. . . Sheriff Castloo’s subordinates—Chief Deputy Sanders, Lieutenant Burge, and Captain Holland—met with Cunningham and fired her for ‘improper use of chain of command and lying,’ without further explanation. In response, Cunningham asked ‘to speak with the Sheriff,’ but Sheriff Castloo’s subordinates did not ‘allow’ her to do so. Sheriff Castloo was not present at the meeting, and there is no evidence that he instructed his subordinates to deny Cunningham’s request ‘to speak with’ him. . . Having first described Sheriff Castloo’s particular conduct, as reflected by the summary-judgment record and viewed in Cunningham’s favor, we now ask whether the ‘violative nature,’ vis-à-vis the Constitution, was clearly established. . . We conclude that it was not. . . Specifically, the law was not clearly established that Cunningham’s request ‘to speak with’ Sheriff Castloo constituted a request for a name-clearing hearing in the context of our ‘stigma-plus-infringement’ test, such that denying the request would amount to a procedural-due-process violation. Our cases are quite unclear, even confusing, on what constitutes a request for a name-clearing hearing. . . What is clear, however, is that none of our cases—and certainly none from the Supreme Court—holds that an employee requests a name-clearing hearing, triggering procedural-due-process protections, when she asks only ‘to speak with’ her boss in the context of her discharge. Of importance, granting Cunningham’s request ‘to speak with’ Sheriff Castloo would not have provided Cunningham a ‘public forum’ of any sort; it would have resulted only in a private audience with Sheriff Castloo. . . . All told, Cunningham has failed to cite ‘adequate authority at a sufficiently high level of specificity’ to put Sheriff Castloo ‘on notice that his conduct is definitively unlawful.’. . She therefore failed to satisfy her burden of defeating Sheriff Castloo’s claim of qualified immunity. Sheriff Castloo is entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court erred in denying that defense.”)

Estate of Bonilla by & through Bonilla v. Orange County, Texas, 982 F.3d 298, 307 (5th Cir. 2020) (“The more specific rights that Plaintiffs claim for Bonilla lack adequate support in the case law to be ‘clearly established.’ For instance, Plaintiffs identify no cases establishing a clear constitutional right to adequate suicide screening or to screening only by medical professionals. In Taylor v. Barkes, a case involving a factually similar instance of suicide by a pretrial detainee, the Supreme Court observed: ‘No decision of this Court establishes a right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols. No decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.’ . . . The Supreme Court has not revisited Taylor. Further, since no ‘robust consensus of cases’ has developed within this circuit on the issue of suicide screening, there is no basis for asserting such a ‘right’ is clearly established. . . . Similarly, Plaintiffs identify no cases establishing that adequate medical care requires the distribution of prescription narcotics to an inmate within hours of her intake.”)

Cotropia v. Chapman, 978 F.3d 282, 287-88 (5th Cir. 2020) (“As Chapman concedes, “Zadeh already contains the very holding Cotropia asks the Court to announce in accordance with this constitutional analysis.’ Chapman thus violated Cotropia’s constitutional rights when she copied documents in Cotropia’s office without any precompliance review of the administrative subpoena. . . . With the first prong satisfied, we address whether Cotropia’s right to precompliance review was clearly established at the time of the search. In Zadeh, even though we concluded that the TMB’s subpoena authority for searching pain management clinics was unconstitutional, we could not conclude that ‘every reasonable official prior to conducting a search under the circumstances of this case would know this Burger factor was not satisfied.’ . . . Zadeh was issued in 2019; Chapman searched Cotropia’s office in 2015. Thus, at that time, it was not clearly established that her search per §§ 153.007(a), 168.052, 179.4(a), and 195.3 was unconstitutional. Cotropia seeks to avoid that conclusion by differentiating Zadeh in several respects. . . . Cotropia tries to distinguish Zadeh by reasoning that, unlike the office in Zadeh, Cotropia’s office was ‘undisputedly not a [PMC].’ Because ‘it was clearly established at the time of this search that the medical profession as a whole is not a closely regulated industry,’ . . . Cotropia contends that ‘[e]very reasonable officer should have known that the closely regulated industry exception did not apply to the instant search of Cotropia’s office.’ . . . Cotropia is correct that his office was not registered as a PMC. The statute that provided the TMB authority to search Cotropia’s documents, however, gives the TMB authority to investigate not only ‘a [PMC] certified under this chapter’ but also ‘a physician who owns or operates a clinic in the same manner as other complaints under this subtitle.’ . . . For instance, in Zadeh, . . . the relevant clinic was not required to be registered as a PMC for an officer reasonably to have relied on the regulatory scheme relevant to PMCs. It is thus irrelevant whether Cotropia registered his office as a PMC. The question, instead, is whether Chapman was investigating a complaint that Cotropia was operating his clinic in the same manner as a PMC. . . . The record provides ample evidence that could lead a reasonable officer to believe that Cotropia operated New Concept in the same manner as a PMC. The TMB received allegations that Cotropia was operating an unregistered PMC. Cotropia, by his own admission, prescribed opioids through March 20, 2015, and previously had operated an unregistered PMC. His practice involved the care of patients whom he had taken over from Tommy Swate, whose medical license was revoked in 2014 for improper treatment of chronic-pain and addiction patients. Based on those undisputed facts, Chapman acted reasonably in relying on § 168.053 as authorizing her to investigate the allegations regarding Cotropia's practice.”)

Taylor v. McDonald, 978 F.3d 209, 214 (5th Cir. 2020) (“[W]e need not, and do not, decide whether the A1-3 Suicide Prevention Program, or others like it, are qualitatively different enough to trigger a liberty interest. It is enough to note that ‘clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality,’ but instead, ‘must be particularized to the facts of the case.’. . . Even viewing the program in the light most favorable to Taylor, as we must on motion for summary judgment, the A1-3 program is not factually similar enough to any behavioral change program we’ve held triggers a liberty interest to constitute clearly established law. And as demonstrated in the above paragraph, whether the program is qualitatively different is not ‘beyond debate.’. . . Therefore, the defendants are entitled to QI.”)

Lansdell v. Miller, No. 20-60143, 2020 WL 4873224, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 19, 2020) (not reported) (“We have held that ‘handcuffing too tightly, without more, does not amount to excessive force.’ Glenn v. City of Tyler, 242 F.3d 307, 314 (5th Cir. 2001). Lansdell cites no controlling precedent that would put every reasonable officer on notice as to how to arrest someone with a preexisting injury. Lansdell points to out-of-circuit precedent, but we can only rely on out-of-circuit cases as part of the clearly-established inquiry when they demonstrate ‘a robust consensus of persuasive authority.’. . . As the First Circuit has observed, the circuit courts ‘have reached different holdings on the constitutionality of handcuffing an allegedly injured arrestee behind his or her back.’ Hunt v. Massi, 773 F.3d 361, 369 (1st Cir. 2014). There is therefore no robust consensus on the issue. Accordingly, at the time of Lansdell’s arrest, it was not clearly established that Miller could not use two sets of cuffs to handcuff Lansdell behind his back.”)

Morgan v. Chapman, 969 F.3d 238, 245-50 (5th Cir. 2020) (“In Castellano v. Fragozo, an en banc majority of this court extinguished the constitutional malicious-prosecution theory. . . . Castellano explained that claims under § 1983 are only ‘for violation[s] of rights locatable in constitutional text.’. . . This makes sense: the people have a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches and unreasonable seizures. In so far as the defendant’s bad actions (that happen to correspond to the tort of malicious prosecution) result in an unreasonable search or seizure, those claims may be asserted under § 1983 as violations of the Fourth Amendment. But that makes them Fourth Amendment claims cognizable under § 1983, not malicious prosecution claims. There is a constitutional right to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures. There is no constitutional right to be free from malicious prosecution. Therefore, qualified immunity bars Morgan’s § 1983 malicious prosecution claims against Chapman and Kopacz. . . . We recognize that previous decisions of this court may have left open the possibility that the freedom-from-abuse-of-process right lay hidden in the constitutional ether. . . . We close the door on that possibility. Putting together Beker, Brown, and Castellano, we observe that facts that constitute the state tort of abuse of process can also constitute an unreasonable search, unreasonable seizure, or violation of another right ‘locatable in constitutional text.’. . Such claims, rooted in the violation of constitutional rights, are actionable under § 1983. But those claims ‘are not claims for [abuse of process] and labeling them as such only invites confusion.’. . Because there is no constitutional right to be free from abuse of process, the district court erred by failing to grant defendants qualified immunity on that claim. . . . The Zadeh search violated the Fourth Amendment even if pain management clinics were a closely regulated industry, we explained. Nonetheless, we concluded that the law was not clearly established at the time, because ‘the defendants reasonably could have believed that the administrative scheme here provided a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.’. . The Zadeh court also concluded, under an alternative theory, that the searches at issue were not pretextual. . . A search is not really administrative if it is used solely to find evidence of criminal wrongdoing. . . Neither the closely regulated industry holding nor the pretextual search analysis would stop Morgan’s claims. In Zadeh, the defendants received qualified immunity because the law of instant searches of closely regulated pain management clinics was unclear. . . Here, accepting the plaintiff’s allegations as true, it is uncontroverted that Morgan was not operating a pain management clinic. Indeed, he alleges that he ‘has never obtained, stored, maintained or dispensed any controlled substances of any kind from either medical practice.’ Because Morgan was not operating a pain management clinic, the qualified immunity available to the defendants in Zadeh would be inapplicable here. The pretext analysis in this case also departs from Zadeh. In Zadeh, we concluded that the searches were not pretext for criminal investigation because there was no evidence that the ‘investigation resulted in a criminal prosecution’ and because the TMB took ‘subsequent administrative action against’ the physician. . . Therefore, we reasoned, the search was not pretextual because it ‘was not performed “solely to uncover evidence of criminality.”’. . Here, neither of those two facts are present. The search did result in a criminal prosecution, and TMB did not take any subsequent administrative action against Morgan. Based on this case law, we cannot say it would be futile for Morgan to add a Fourth Amendment claim for an unreasonable search. . . . A Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim arising from Morgan’s arrest on false charges would also be familiar. We recently concluded that an unlawful seizure claim was cognizable and qualified immunity did not apply where a plaintiff ‘was wrongfully arrested due to the knowing or reckless misstatements and omissions’ in a law enforcement officer’s affidavits. . . We also must address whether it would be futile to remand to allow the district court to consider a due process claim. This court recently announced that there is a ‘due process right not to have police deliberately fabricate evidence and use it to frame and bring false charges against a person.’ Cole v. Carson, 802 F.3d 752, 771 (5th Cir. 2015) (“Cole I”), cert. granted, judgment vacated sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 137 S. Ct. 497 (2016) and opinion reinstated in part, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc). And, although Cole had a peripatetic procedural history, that holding is binding Fifth Circuit precedent today. . . Given the on-point Cole holding, the due process claim would similarly not represent a futile amendment. Remand to allow the district court to consider that claim would not be futile. . . It would not be futile on the merits for Morgan to pursue an unreasonable search, unreasonable seizure, or due process claim. But the decision as to whether Morgan should be allowed to amend is not ours to make. It is unclear what legal theories the plaintiff presented in the district court. And his claims seem to have transformed on appeal. We

Dyer v. Houston, 964 F.3d 374, 381-85 (5th Cir. 2020) (on denial of reh’g and reh’g en banc) (“Pointing to inconsistency in our court’s deliberate-indifference standards, the district court reasoned that ‘there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm.’ The court therefore granted summary judgment dismissing the Dyers’ deliberate-indifference claims against all three Officers. . . Turning first to the district court’s prong one ruling, we agree that the record discloses genuine disputes of material fact regarding whether Officers Heidelberg and Gafford acted with deliberate indifference. But we disagree as to Officer Scott, finding similar fact disputes as to him. The district court correctly found a genuine dispute concerning whether Gafford and Heidelberg were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of a detainee in their custody. A reasonable trier of fact could find that those Officers were aware that Graham, in the grip of a drug-induced psychosis, struck his head violently against the interior of Heidelberg’s patrol car over 40 times en route to jail and thereby sustained severe head trauma. . . . Yet the Officers sought no medical care for Graham when they arrived at the jail. Nor did they alert jail officers (who had no way of knowing what had happened en route to the jail) of the possibility that Graham had seriously injured himself. . . . A reasonable jury could find that Graham’s injuries—from which Graham would die within roughly 24 hours—were so severe, and their cause so plainly evident to the Officers, that the Officers acted with deliberate indifference by failing to seek medical attention, by failing to inform jail personnel about Graham’s injuries, and by informing jail personnel only that Graham had been ‘medically cleared’ before arriving at the jail. . . A reasonable jury could find otherwise, of course, but the district court correctly concluded that the Dyers presented enough evidence that the Officers ‘were aware of a risk of injury to Graham that they did nothing to alleviate,’ allowing the Dyers to survive summary judgment on prong one. . . . The district court’s prong two analysis was legally erroneous. Instead of asking whether controlling authority placed the unconstitutionality of the Officers’ alleged conduct ‘beyond debate,’ . . . the court instead found that our deliberate-indifference case law was too muddled even to attempt the inquiry. Specifically, the district court pointed to ‘confusion’ in our cases over whether deliberate indifference requires proof of an officer’s ‘actual intent to cause harm in medical-inattention claims.’ The court therefore concluded that ‘there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm.’ We disagree with the district court’s prong two analysis. Admittedly, the district court was correct that our deliberate-indifference cases are not a paradigm of consistency. As discussed supra, a panel of our court recently observed that, whereas many of our decisions hew to the traditional deliberate-indifference standard from Farmer v. Brennan, . . . others appear to add the element that the officer ‘subjectively intended that harm occur.’ . . Contrary to the district court’s reasoning, however, this apparent tension in our cases does not ipso facto ‘doom[]’ the Dyers’ deliberate-indifference claim. To the contrary, the district court was still required to analyze whether the Officers’ alleged conduct contravened clearly established law as set by the controlling precedents of this court and the Supreme Court. Reviewing the record de novo, we conclude a reasonable jury could find the Officers' conduct contravened clearly established law. . . . Thompson defines clearly established law in sufficient detail to have notified the Officers that their actions were unconstitutional. . . . Similar to the jail sergeant in Thompson, here the Officers had custody of a delusional detainee who was severely harming himself, and yet—despite being aware of the detainee's dire condition—they did nothing to secure medical help. Arguably, this situation presents a clearer case of deliberate indifference than Thompson. There, although providing Thompson some care, the jailer recklessly misjudged the severity of Thompson's condition that led to the seizure that caused his death. . . . Here, the Officers actually witnessed Graham violently slamming his head against the patrol car over and over again, inflicting the cerebral trauma that would kill him within about a day's time. . . . And yet, instead of seeking medical assistance, the Officers deposited Graham at the jail, told jailers nothing about what Graham had done to himself en route, and informed the jail sergeant only that Graham 'had been medically cleared at the scene.' In sum, Thompson gave officers 'fair warning[]' . . . that their behavior was deliberately indifferent to Graham's serious medical needs.")

Wigginton v. Jones, 964 F.3d 329, 335-39 (5th Cir. 2020) ("We regularly grant qualified immunity in substantive due process cases where the plaintiff fails to establish a clearly-established property interest Because Wigginton fails to identify any state or federal law that placed defendants on notice that his alleged contractual right to a fair tenure-review process was a constitutionally-protected interest, we reverse. . . . The district court acknowledged that Wigginton did not have a protected property interest in 'continued employment,' . . . but it concluded that he presented sufficient evidence to establish a different kind of protected interest—an interest in 'a fair merit-based inquiry free from irrationality as to whether he should receive tenure and promotion.' We hold that the district court erred in denying defendants' motion for qualified immunity because there was neither controlling authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority that placed Wigginton's rights beyond debate. . . . As the party defending against a claim of qualified immunity, Wigginton bears the burden of demonstrating that clearly-established law placed defendants on notice that they were violating his protected property interest. . . . The cases he relies upon do not define his asserted property right with sufficient particularity to defeat defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . . Because Wigginton has failed to demonstrate that clearly-established law placed defendants on notice that he had a protected property interest, we reverse the district court's denial of their qualified immunity defense.")

Goode v. Baggett, 811 F. App'x 227, ____ (5th Cir. 2020) ("[A] jury could find that the Officers lacked reason to believe that Troy committed a crime, posed a threat to anyone, or actively resisted arrest when they hog-tied him. On those facts, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Officers used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The Officers argue that even if they used excessive force, they're entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of their conduct was not clearly established at the time. . . . [T]he question is whether the state of the law in 2015 gave the Officers fair warning that hog-tying Troy would constitute excessive force under the circumstances. To answer that question, we look first to 'controlling authority,' i.e., published opinions of the Supreme Court and the Fifth Circuit. . . . If we find controlling authority on point, our inquiry ends. . . Absent controlling authority, we look to our sister circuits to see whether ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ established the unlawfulness of the conduct at issue. . . At the time in question, the Fifth Circuit had decided three cases addressing whether officers used excessive force when they hog-tied arrestees. . . . As shown by our precedent, Gutierrez presents us with ‘several yardsticks’ by which to measure claims for excessive force involving restraints. . . Unless justified by a threat of serious harm, hog-tying a drug-affected person in a state of drug-induced psychosis and placing him face down in a prone position for an extended period constitutes excessive force. . . Thus, if the facts here are sufficiently similar to those in Gutierrez, then the Officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. The Officers argue that Gutierrez didn’t clearly establish the unlawfulness of hog-tying under any circumstances because the medical study it relied on has been called into question by a study co-authored by Dr. Tom Neuman and three others, including one of the defense experts here[.] . . . In Gutierrez, we relied on a study by the San Diego Police Department and the research of Dr. Donald T. Reay as evidence that hog-tying can become deadly force. . . We were aware of Dr. Neuman’s study, however, and acknowledged that it possibly ‘call[ed] the validity of Dr. Reay’s research into question,’ but we didn’t consider it because it wasn’t in the record. . . We similarly noted Dr. Neuman’s study in Hill and Khan, but it didn’t affect our analysis in those cases; we still applied the Gutierrez factors. . . Dr. Neuman’s study has no bearing on whether the law was clearly established. First, the various studies are relevant to whether hog-tying in certain circumstances is ‘deadly force.’ But ‘whether a particular use of force is “deadly force” is a question of fact.’ . . We must accept the truth of Kelli’s evidence on the degree of force used. . . Second, Dr. Neuman’s study can’t unsettle the law in this circuit. Although a circuit split can sometimes show that the law wasn’t clearly established, . . . the same isn’t true of a ‘battle of the experts’ like we have here[.] . . . Even when other circuits are split, . . . our inquiry ends if ‘the law was clearly established in this circuit.’ . . Gutierrez remains binding precedent. We conclude that Gutierrez clearly established the unlawfulness of hog-tying in certain circumstances. The next step is to determine whether the facts here are similar enough to those in Gutierrez for that case to have given the Officers fair warning that hog-tying Troy would constitute excessive force. . . The facts here mirror those in Gutierrez in all relevant respects. First, the Officers knew that Troy was ‘under the influence of drugs.’ . . Second, Troy exhibited signs of excited delirium. . . In fact, he was running around in circles, sweating profusely, yelling incoherently, and ‘acting really strange,’ similar to how Gutierrez was acting. . . Third, despite Troy’s drug use and bizarre behavior, the Officers hog-tied Troy. . . Fourth, the Officers placed Troy ‘in a face-down prone position’ while hog-tied. . . And unlike the officers in Khan, who removed the restraints almost immediately, the Officers here left Troy hog-tied for ninety minutes—three times as long as the thirty-minute period in Hill, which we described as an ‘extended period of time.’ . . Finally, there’s a dispute as to whether Troy posed a threat to anyone when the Officers hog-tied him, just as there was in Gutierrez. . . Thus, Gutierrez squarely governs this case. . . . In sum, hog-tying a nonviolent, drug-affected person in a state of drug-induced psychosis and placing him in a prone position for an extended period is objectively unreasonable. In light of the similarities between the facts of Gutierrez and those here, the state of the law in 2015 was sufficiently clear to provide fair warning to the Officers that their alleged conduct was unlawful. . . . On the facts as we must take them, the Officers' conduct in hog-tying Troy violated clearly established law. Of course, at trial, Kelli will bear the burden of proving the many facts and inferences that we assume in her favor. Depending on the facts proven at trial and the inferences drawn by the jury, a very different picture may result than the one we confront here. The Officers may ultimately be protected by qualified immunity in the end. But they aren't entitled to qualified immunity at this stage.")

Keller v. Fleming, 952 F.3d 216, 224-27 (5th Cir. 2020) ("[W]ithout a valid exception to the probable cause requirement, the seizure is . . . presumptively unreasonable, and a constitutional violation is present. . . Plaintiffs must still demonstrate that there was a clearly established right at the time of the challenged actions. Thus, the question becomes whether there is precedent that put Deputy Fleming on notice that he was committing a constitutional violation when he drove Simpson several miles to the county line and dropped him off. For purposes of determining whether the right was clearly established, '[t]he relevant question ... is ... whether a reasonable officer could have believed [his or her conduct] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information the ... officers possessed.' . . In other words, Plaintiffs must point this court to a legislative directive or case precedent that is sufficiently clear such that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that law. . . Here, Plaintiffs' burden is not met. Plaintiffs' clearly established law contentions in their briefing are in fact a narrative as to why Deputy Fleming's seizure was unreasonable. Plaintiffs' narrative argument is of no import of a pre-existing or precedential case. . . In turn, there is no binding Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit precedent to anchor our de novo review of whether a similarly situated officer violated a constitutional right acting under similar circumstances. . . Without setting forth a clearly established right for which the analysis can continue, Plaintiffs have not defeated Deputy Fleming's qualified immunity defense. . . Of note, the dissent cites to Hope v. Pelzer for the proposition that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' and 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.' . . The dissent argues that Deputy Fleming was on clear notice that the reasonableness of the seizure of Simpson would be subject to a Fourth Amendment balancing test (weighing individual intrusion against legitimate government interests). Weighing the cognizable interests of Simpson against the government interests here, the dissent's position is that the scale tips starkly in Plaintiff's favor in light of Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville's holding that 'anti-vagrancy' laws are void for vagueness as they permit 'unfettered discretion' in seizing an individual like Simpson. . . Assuming that general statements (under Hope) may suffice, the balance of interests here are not so lopsided. As stated herein and by the district court, there is an argument for the community caretaker function (for example) which would be a legitimate government interest as to public safety. . . Because there are legitimate interests on both sides, this is not a one-sided balancing test where the officer 'do[es] not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the[] scales.' . . Accordingly, Deputy Fleming's qualified immunity defense as to Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim prevails because Plaintiffs failed to prove that a reasonable officer like Fleming would have understood his actions violated clearly established law. Judgment is therefore rendered in Deputy Fleming's favor as he is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . Plaintiffs submit that Deputy Fleming's conduct created the ‘special relationship’ under DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services and a ‘state-created-danger’ resulted thereof. . . The district court held that Fleming was not entitled to qualified immunity under this claim because, inter alia, there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether there was a ‘special relationship’ between Fleming and Simpson that deprived Simpson of his liberty. Deputy Fleming argues that the law does not clearly establish that a special relationship would have existed under the facts of this case. We agree with Fleming because even if a ‘special relationship’ existed, Plaintiffs must show that Simpson’s Fourteenth Amendment right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Again, the dispositive question is ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . Here, while Simpson was killed by a motorist after Fleming dropped him off at the county line, the High Court in DeShaney held that states and their officials have no affirmative duty to protect individuals from violence by private actors. . . . [T]he Fifth Circuit has never recognized this ‘state-created-danger’ exception. Plaintiffs therefore have not demonstrated a clearly established substantive due process right on the facts they allege. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment and render judgment that Deputy Fleming is entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs’ Fourteenth Amendment claim.”)

Keller v. Fleming, 952 F.3d 216, 227-29 (5th Cir. 2020) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (“The district court found that it was genuinely disputed whether Darrin Fleming picked up and transported Gerald Simpson out of the county pursuant to a local unwritten custom of ousting those perceived as vagrants from the jurisdiction, and we must accept these facts as true at this juncture. . . . I agree with the majority that, under these facts, Fleming violated Simpson’s Fourth Amendment rights. I disagree, however, that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that these rights were clearly established. . . . [Q]ualified immunity works only ‘to ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice their conduct is unlawful.’ . . Under this framework, a right may be clearly established even without on-point precedent where a defendant’s conduct clearly and obviously violates the Constitution. . . At the time the incident at issue here occurred, Supreme Court precedent provided clear notice that ‘the reasonableness of a seizure under the Fourth Amendment is determined by balancing its intrusion on the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests against its promotion of legitimate government interests.’ . . When the question of whether a constitutional violation occurred depends on this sort of balancing of interests, qualified immunity should not apply when, ‘given the factual disputes identified by the district court and taking the plaintiffs’ side of those disputes, [a] case does not require any real balancing at all’ because the officers ‘do not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the[] scales.’ . . Accepting the facts that the district court found to be genuinely disputed, there is simply no legitimate government interest against which to balance the significant intrusion posed by Deputy Fleming’s decision to seize Simpson and dump him in the next jurisdiction without his valid consent. The Supreme Court has long made clear that the Constitution does not permit police to ‘roundup ... so-called undesirables’ merely because they are ‘poor people, nonconformists, dissenters, idlers.’ Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156, 171 (1972). With a balance so one-sidedly contrary to an individual’s Fourth Amendment rights, every reasonable officer would have understood that seizing Simpson under these circumstances was arbitrary and unreasonable. . . Further, precedent from the Supreme Court provided notice when these events occurred that a law that provides officers with ‘unfettered discretion’ to arrest persons as vagrants merely on suspicion of future criminality is impermissibly vague. . . . Given the Supreme Court’s well-established jurisprudence limiting an officer’s discretion to act pursuant to an established vagrancy or vagrancy-related law, it follows a fortiori that an unwritten custom—which would provide even vaguer standards and grant greater discretion—is necessarily unreasonable as a matter of law. When combined with this principle, it is even more apparent that the clearly one-sided balancing of interests served as clear and obvious notice to any reasonable officer in Deputy Fleming’s position that seizing Simpson and driving him to the county line violated Simpson’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . Under the facts the district court found genuinely disputed, which we must accept for purposes of this appeal of a denial of qualified immunity, Deputy Fleming’s conduct clearly and obviously violated Simpson’s Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court’s denial of summary judgment on Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Blanchard-Daigle v. Geers, 802 F. App’x 113, ____ (5th Cir. 2020) (“Deputy Geers’ decision did not violate clearly established law. ‘Our circuit has repeatedly held that an officer’s use of deadly force is reasonable when an officer reasonably believes that a suspect was attempting to use or reach for a weapon.’ Valderas v. City of Lubbock, 937 F.3d 384, 390 (5th Cir. 2019); see also Manis v. Lawson, 585 F.3d 839, 844 (5th Cir. 2009) (collecting cases). We have found that officers reasonably used deadly force when a suspect reached for his waistband, see Salazar-Limon v. City of Houston, 826 F.3d 272, 279–80 (5th Cir. 2016), when a suspect reached under a seat while sitting in a parked car, see Manis, 585 F.3d at 844–45, and even when a suspect reached into a nearby boot, see Ontiveros v. City of Rosenberg, 564 F.3d 379, 385 (5th Cir. 2009). In light of these precedents, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would have known that it was unconstitutional to use deadly force against a suspect who reached for something—particularly when Mr. Blanchard had driven 1,000 feet down a private road before pulling over and then exiting his vehicle unprompted. Qualified immunity thus defeats Ms. Blanchard-Daigle’s claim against Deputy Geers.”)

McCoy v. Alamu, 950 F.3d 226, 233 & n.8 (5th Cir. 2020), cert. granted, vacated and remanded in light of Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. ____ (2020) (per curiam), 141 S. Ct. 1364 (2021) (“[O]ur caselaw ‘does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.’ . . . Indeed, QI ‘will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.’ . . . Thus, it’s irrelevant that we hadn’t previously found a use of pepper spray—as distinguished from some other instrument—to violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . But for the law to be clearly established, it must have been ‘beyond debate’ that Alamu broke the law. . . . ‘The Eighth Amendment’s prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments necessarily excludes from constitutional recognition de minimis uses of physical force, provided that the use of force is not of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind.’ . . . Thus, for the law to be clearly established, it must be beyond debate that the spraying crossed the line dividing a de minimis use of force from a cognizable one. . . . Above, we held that the spraying crossed that line.

But it was not beyond debate that it did, so the law wasn't clearly established.⁸ [fn. 8: Some might find this a puzzling result, insofar as QI might have us find a violation in one breath, but, in the next, hold it too debatable to prevent immunity. No matter. What the first prong gives, the second prong will often snatch back. The Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed courts of appeals for failing to define established law narrowly, and we must follow that binding precedent.] This was an isolated, single use of pepper spray. McCoy doesn't challenge the evidence that Alamu initiated the Incident Command System immediately after the spray, nor that medical personnel promptly attended to him and provided copious amounts of water. Nor does he provide evidence to contest the Use of Force Report's finding that Alamu used less than the full can of spray. In somewhat related circumstances, we held that spraying a prisoner with a fire extinguisher 'was a de minimis use of physical force and was not repugnant to the conscience of mankind.' . . . Similarly here, on these facts, it wasn't beyond debate that Alamu's single use of spray stepped over the de minimis line. For that reason, the law wasn't clearly established. In contending that the law was clear, McCoy points to the general principle that prison officers can't act 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.' . . . That won't do. The Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished courts not to define the relevant law too capaciously. . . . Fact-intensive balancing tests alone (such as the Hudson factors) are usually not 'clear' enough. . . . because the illegality of the particular conduct at issue must be undebatable. . . . And even if general standards can clearly establish the law where the constitutional violation is 'obvious,' . . . this is not such a case. Above, we found that two of Hudson's five factors (injury, and efforts to temper force) weighed for Alamu, so the result was hardly obvious. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the summary judgment.")

McCoy v. Alamu, 950 F.3d 226, 234-37 (5th Cir. 2020) (Costa, J., dissenting in part), cert. granted, vacated and remanded in light of Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. ____ (2020) (per curiam), 141 S. Ct. 1364 (2021) ("If a prison guard punched an inmate 'for no reason,' that assault would violate clearly established law. . . . The same would be true if a guard hit an inmate with a baton 'for no reason.' . . . A guard who tased an inmate without provocation could also be held accountable. . . . Should the result be different because Alamu's weapon of choice was pepper spray? Our precedent answers 'No'. . . . Qualified immunity is about notice. . . . If a public official knows that using force is unlawful in a given circumstance, there is no reason to 'protect [him for] apply[ing] excessive and unreasonable force merely because [his] means of applying it are novel.' . . . So just as the use of force in Newman violated clearly established law even though there were no 'tasing' cases on the books, . . . Alamu's gratuitous use of force on an inmate also violated clearly established law despite the lack of published 'pepper spraying' cases so holding. Despite recognizing that an unprovoked assault violates the Constitution, the majority grants the guard immunity because we have not decided a similar case involving pepper spray. That holding is at odds with Newman, which recognizes that the circumstances surrounding the use of force—the need for applying force, 'the relationship between the need and the amount of force used,' etc.—are what matter. . . . The chosen instrument of force does not. . . . And apart from its wisdom in the first place, Newman has put officials on notice for the last seven years that using a unique 'instrument' of force does not allow them to escape liability for constitutional violations. That notice alone defeats qualified immunity. Although the majority purports to recognize that the instrument of force does not matter in a ‘no provocation’ case, its grant of immunity ultimately turns on the fact that the guard used pepper spray instead of a fist, taser, or baton. It relies on the absence of law clearly establishing that wantonly spraying a prisoner with a chemical agent involves more than a de minimis use of force. The same could have been said in Newman about tasing. Unexplained in the majority opinion is why tasing is a more serious use of force than pepper spraying. The use of pepper spray is no small thing. The chemical agent, which temporarily blinds its recipients, is—unlike tasers—banned for use in war. . . . And numerous federal courts have treated pepper spray as a dangerous weapon in criminal cases, which requires a finding that the ‘instrument [is] capable of inflicting death or serious bodily injury,’ . . . a much higher force threshold than clearing the de minimis hurdle. . . . Like tasing, pepper spraying is a far more significant use of force than the ‘push or shove’ the Supreme Court has held out as examples of de minimis force. . . . The majority neglects that the gratuitous tasing in Newman was deemed an ‘obvious’ case of excessive force, . . . a label that also fits the pepper spraying of McCoy ‘for no reason.’ Qualified immunity is often a game of find-that-case, but not always. Common sense still plays a role; when the violation of constitutional rights is ‘obvious,’ there is no immunity. . . . And it is obvious in prison use-of-force cases that ‘the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... constitutes cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment.’ . . . McCoy’s testimony, which we must accept at this stage, is that there was ‘no reason at all’ to spray him. How could any guard not know that an unprovoked use of pepper spray is unlawful? Yet the majority concludes it would have been reasonable for a guard to think the law allowed him to gratuitously blind an inmate. Although the obviousness exception does not often apply, it plays an important role in qualified immunity doctrine. It ensures vindication of the most egregious constitutional violations. Requiring an on-point precedent for obvious cases can lead to perverse results. Because cases involving the most blatantly unconstitutional conduct will not often end up in the courts of appeals, it may be harder to find factually similar caselaw for such cases than it is for cases with conduct presenting closer constitutional questions. But cases involving obvious constitutional violations should be the easiest ones in which to find that an officer was ‘plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate[d] the law.’ . . . The panel agrees that if the jury finds the facts as McCoy presents them—a guard’s infliction of painful force on a compliant, nonthreatening inmate—then Alamu violated the law. Any reasonable guard would know that such an unprovoked use of pepper spray violates the Constitution, so I would allow a jury to decide if that is what happened. Because McCoy’s excessive force claim should go forward under current qualified immunity law, it does not depend on the success of recent calls to reconsider or recalibrate the doctrine. See, e.g., Kisela v. Hughes, — U.S. —, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1162, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting); Ziglar v. Abbasi, — U.S. —, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1871–72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring); Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479–81 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). But with so many voices critiquing current law as insufficiently protective of constitutional rights, the last thing we should be doing is recognizing an immunity defense when existing law rejects it.”)

Ratliff v. Aransas County, Texas, 948 F.3d 281, 288-89 (5th Cir. 2020) (“Prior to Garza, our cases had clearly established that deadly force is not unreasonable when an armed suspect has ignored multiple orders to disarm and has either pointed his weapon at a person or used the weapon in such a manner as to make a threatening gesture. . . . The plaintiff in Garza argued, as Ratliff argues now, that ‘a reasonable jury could find that [the suspect] never pointed his gun at the officers.’ . . . In support of this argument, the plaintiff relied on an affidavit from one of the officer-defendants, which stated that the suspect ‘did not at any time point the gun [at the] cops.’ . . . Although we found that video evidence had conclusively contradicted the affiant’s statement, we explained that this fact was not essential to the outcome and further held that a ‘reasonable officer in any of the defendants’ shoes would have believed that [the suspect] posed a serious threat regardless of the direction [of his] gun.’ . . . Thus, in Garza, we found that it is not unreasonable for law enforcement officers to use deadly force against an armed suspect, irrespective of the pointed direction of that suspect’s weapon, when the suspect has ignored orders to drop the weapon and has displayed erratic or aggressive behavior indicating that he may pose an imminent threat. We can concede that, here, unlike in Garza, the video evidence is inconclusive with respect to the direction of Ratliff’s gun. Moreover, we are willing to accept that the gun’s direction is genuinely disputed. But we cannot agree that the pointed direction of Ratliff’s gun is material in the context of these facts. Once Ratliff had ignored repeated warnings to drop his weapon, the deputies here, like the officers in Garza, had ample reason to fear for their safety.”)

Soto v. Brock, 795 F. App’x 246, ____ (5th Cir. 2019) (“In this case, the specific right at issue was clearly established. At the time of the alleged violation, the law made clear that (1) due process safeguards—specifically, notice of why the letter was rejected and an opportunity to appeal the decision—are required when a prisoner’s letter is rejected, and (2) the fact that Soto’s son was a minor does not change the analysis. . . . Thus, a reasonable official would have understood that failing to provide adequate notice and an opportunity to appeal after rejecting a letter sent to a minor detained in a boot camp would violate the sender’s constitutional rights.”)

Defrates v. Podany, 789 F. App’x 427, ____ (5th Cir. 2019) (“Were Podany’s actions a model of police conduct? Possibly not. Could Podany have used more verbal commands before tackling Defrates? Maybe. And could he have tried a little longer to control Defrates’s arms? Perhaps. But our job is not to decide the best course of action. Our job is to determine whether Defrates has identified law clearly placing the unreasonableness of Podany’s actions under the circumstances beyond debate. That is an uphill battle for any plaintiff. ‘[T]he United States Reports teem with warnings about the difficulty of placing a question beyond debate.’ Morrow v. Meachum, 917 F.3d 870, 874 (5th Cir. 2019). Defrates has not risen to the challenge; Podany’s qualified immunity remains intact.”)

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 452-57 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc), cert. denied sub nom Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) (“Under Mullenix, application of clearly established law is undertaken with close attention to the relevant legal rule and the particular facts of the case. Here, based on the facts taken in the light most favorable to the non-movant Coles, and with reasonable inferences drawn in their favor, the district court determined there were genuine factual disputes as to Ryan’s and the officers’ conduct, upon which a reasonable jury could find ‘[Ryan] ... did not pose an immediate threat to the officers’ when they opened fire. It held that ‘on October 25, 2010, the date of the shooting, the law was clearly established’ that ‘shooting a mentally disturbed teenager, who was pointing a gun the entire time at his own head and facing away from the officer, in an open outdoor area, and who was unaware of the officer’s presence because no warning was given prior to the officer opening fire, was unlawful.’ As we will detail, the officers ask us to consider a different set of facts, but we cannot do so. We lack jurisdiction to reconsider the district court’s factual determinations on an appeal from denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity. . . . The summary judgment facts, as determined by the district court, are that Ryan posed no threat to the officers or others to support firing without warning. The ‘Officers had the time and opportunity to give a warning and yet chose to shoot first instead.’ This is an obvious case. Indeed, Officer Hunter conceded that he would have had no basis to fire upon Ryan unless Ryan had been facing him and pointing a gun at him. This case is obvious when we accept the facts as we must. It is also informed by our precedent. Before 2010, Baker v. Putnal established clearly that Cassidy’s and Hunter’s conduct—on the facts as we must take them at this stage—was unlawful. . . . Rather than engage on the facts as we must take them at the summary judgment stage, the officers repeatedly argue from a different set of facts. . . . The Coles and amicus Cato Institute are correct that it is beyond our jurisdiction to consider the officers’ set of facts, a narrative evolving over time. . . . Whereas the officers will have a chance to present their factual narrative—and to question the Coles’—at trial, they cannot contest the facts in the current appeal. . . . The dissents overlook the fundamental reason most of these facts should not be part of the analysis: we consider only what the officers knew at the time of their challenged conduct. ‘Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant.’ [citing Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (per curiam)]. . . . Despite the many ‘red flags’ listed by the dissents as known to others, only those known to Hunter and Cassidy are relevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . . What Hunter and Cassidy knew before shooting at Ryan, whether they warned him before doing so, and what actions Ryan took before being shot are all disputed. The district court must afford Cassidy and Hunter qualified immunity at the earliest point the defense’s applicability is determinable. Here, we have not yet reached that point. It will be for a jury to resolve what happened on October 25, 2010. The district court did not err in denying the officers qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage.”) [footnotes omitted]

v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) (“Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that police officers confronted in close quarters with a suspect armed and ready to shoot must hope they are faster on the draw and more accurate. The increasingly risky profession of law enforcement cannot put those sworn to ‘serve and protect’ to a Hobson’s choice: place their lives on the line by heroic forbearance or risk their financial security in defense of lawsuits. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated in plain terms that the purpose of qualified immunity is to prevent precisely this quandary. Respectfully dissenting, we are convinced that the Supreme Court’s remand from the original panel opinion denying immunity meant something; the governing Supreme Court law is foursquare in the corner of Officers Hunter and Cassidy; and they were entitled to receive summary judgment confirming their immunity from suit, not simply from liability. . . . The only legal question that needs to be addressed by this court is whether, under the circumstances of this five-second confrontation, every reasonable police officer would have reasonably perceived no life-threatening danger such that deadly force could be used to incapacitate Cole without a preliminary warning. Put otherwise, as a matter of law, was it clearly established that officers may not fire on a suspect, armed and ready to shoot a pistol, who is turning in their direction with one of their brethren ten to twenty feet away, unless the gun barrel points at them or they first shout a warning and await his response? The majority deny qualified immunity, seeming to answer on the basis of disputed fact issues’ that Cole posed ‘no threat.’ The majority’s reasoning is at too high a level of generality. And the majority ignore the critical criterion for qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases: the reasonableness of the officers’ reasonable perceptions. In sum, the majority here double down on the mistakes that got our court reversed in Mullenix. . . . For immunity purposes, the question phrased one way is whether any reasonable officers could have believed that Cole’s split-second turning toward them posed a life-threatening danger such that lethal force was necessary. Alternatively, what “clearly established law” held as of October 2010 that under all of the relevant circumstances, deadly force was not justified unless either a warning was given and the suspect allowed a chance to react, or the suspect actually turned his loaded pistol on the officer? The answer here directly parallels the Supreme Court’s reasoning in Mullenix, which the majority seriously shortchanged. . . . The majority here posit as clearly established law, indeed an ‘obvious case,’ that a police officer may not use deadly force—without prior warning—against an armed, distraught suspect who, with finger in the pistol’s trigger, posed ‘no threat’ while turning toward an officer ten to twenty feet away. But in Mullenix, the Supreme Court reversed this court because ‘[t]he general principle that deadly force requires a sufficient threat hardly settles this matter.’. . . Likewise, here, the majority’s ‘no threat’ and ‘obvious case’ conclusions do not settle the matter of clearly established law. . . . Characterizing this case as a ‘no threat’ or obvious’ Fourth Amendment violation is wrong for additional reasons. Whether, under the material undisputed facts, Cole presented ‘no threat’ to a reasonable police officer is the relevant issue to assess a Fourth Amendment violation. But the immunity question, which the majority elides, is whether every reasonable officer in this factual context would have known he could not use deadly force. . . . The majority’s analysis conflates these inquiries. . . . Like this court’s panel in Mullenix, the majority here offer no controlling Supreme Court precedent, including Garner, to support that ‘clearly established law’ mandated that the officers hold their fire until they had both warned Cole and given him a chance to drop his gun or until he pointed the loaded weapon directly at them. . . . Moreover, to the extent it is relevant, Fifth Circuit law does not support denying qualified immunity to Officers Hunter and Cassidy. . . . To sum up, the majority opinion here repeats every error identified by the Supreme Court when it granted summary reversal in Mullenix and sent the instant case back for reconsideration. The majority’s ‘clearly established’ rule has changed, but not its errors. Tennessee v. Garner does not formulate ‘clearly established law’ with the degree of specificity required by the Supreme Court’s decisions on qualified immunity. The majority’s ‘no threat’ and ‘obvious case’ statements pose the issues here at an excessive level of generality. The majority has no Supreme Court case law demonstrating that Officers Hunter and Cassidy were either plainly incompetent or had to know that shooting at Cole was unconstitutional under the circumstances before them and with the knowledge they possessed—he was mentally distraught; he was armed with his finger in the pistol’s trigger; he was very close to Hunter; he had been walking in the direction of schools for which extra police protection had been ordered; and he had ignored other officers’ commands to stop and drop his weapon. And they had three to five seconds to decide how dangerous he could be to them. The majority cites not one case from this court denying qualified immunity under similar circumstances. Mullenix aptly summed it up for our purposes: ‘qualified immunity protects actions in the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’. . . [T]he constitutional rule applied by the Fifth Circuit was not “beyond debate.”. . . Shooting at Cole may not have been the wisest choice under these pressing circumstances, but the officers’ decision, even if assailable, was at most negligent. Hunter and Cassidy were neither plainly incompetent nor themselves lawbreakers. While we are confident a jury will vindicate their actions, they deserved qualified immunity as a matter of law. We dissent.”)[footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 469-70 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Smith, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) (“Abandon hope, all ye who enter Texas, Louisiana, or Mississippi as peace officers with only a few seconds to react to dangerous confrontations with threatening and well-armed potential killers. In light of today’s ruling and the raw count of judges, there is little chance that, any time soon, the Fifth Circuit will confer the qualified-immunity protection that heretofore-settled Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit caselaw requires. Red flags abound. [listing red flags] Normally we expect police officers to recognize such red flags and to respond appropriately. Instead of protecting these officers from obvious danger to themselves and the public, however, the en banc majority orders them to stand down. What is the hapless officer to do in the face of today’s decision? What indeed is the ‘clearly established law’ that the majority now announces? The judges in the majority do not say.”)

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 470-73 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Willett, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, No. 19-753 (U.S. June 15, 2020) (“I repeat what I said last month: The entrenched, judge-invented qualified immunity regime ought not be immune from thoughtful reappraisal. . . . The real-world functioning of modern immunity practice—essentially ‘heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses’—leaves many victims violated but not vindicated. More to the point, the ‘clearly established law’ prong, which is outcome-determinative in most cases, makes qualified immunity sometimes seem like unqualified impunity. . . . That said, as a middle-management circuit judge, I take direction from the Supreme Court. And the Court’s direction on qualified immunity is increasingly unsubtle. We must respect the Court’s exacting instructions—even as it is proper, in my judgment, to respectfully voice unease with them. . . . Merely proving unconstitutional misconduct isn’t enough. A plaintiff must cite functionally identical authority that puts the unlawfulness ‘beyond debate’ to ‘every’ reasonable officer. . . . The Supreme Court demands precedential specificity. But it’s all a bit recursive. There’s no earlier similar case declaring a constitutional violation because no earlier plaintiff could find an earlier similar case declaring a constitutional violation. . . . In recent years, individual Justices have raised concerns with the Court’s immunity caselaw. Even so, the doctrine enjoys resounding, even hardening favor at the Court. Just three months ago, in a case involving the warrantless strip search of a four-year-old preschooler, a strange-bedfellows array of scholars and advocacy groups—perhaps the most ideologically diverse amici ever assembled—implored the Court to push reset. To no avail. This much is certain: Qualified immunity, whatever its success at achieving its intended policy goals, thwarts the righting of many constitutional wrongs. Perhaps the growing left–right consensus urging reform will one day win out. There are several ‘mend it, don’t end it’ options. The Court could revisit Pearson and nudge courts to address the threshold constitutional merits rather than leave the law undeveloped. Even if a particular plaintiff cannot benefit (due to the ‘clearly established law’ prong), this would provide moving-forward guidance as to what the law prescribes and proscribes. Short of that, the Court could require lower courts to explain why they are side-stepping the constitutional merits question. Or the Court could confront the widespread inter-circuit confusion on what constitutes ‘clearly established law.’ One concrete proposal: clarifying the degree of factual similarity required in cases involving split-second decisions versus cases involving less-exigent situations. The Court could also, short of undoing Harlow and reinstating the bad-faith prong, permit plaintiffs to overcome immunity by presenting objective evidence of an official’s bad faith. Not subjective evidence of bad faith, which Harlow, worried about peculiarly disruptive’ and ‘broad-ranging discovery,’ forbids. And not unadorned allegations of bad faith. But objective evidence that the official actually realized that he was violating the Constitution. Prudent refinements abound. But until then, as Judge Jones explains in today’s principal dissent, the Supreme Court’s unflinching, increasingly emphatic application of ‘clearly established law’ compels dismissal.”)[footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 473-79 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Ho, J., and Oldham, J., joined by Smith, J., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) (“We write to emphasize the en banc majority’s unmistakable message: Four years after Mullenix, nothing has changed in our circuit. . . . The Supreme Court has not hesitated to redress similar intransigence from our sister circuits—often through the ‘extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.’ [collecting cases] So where is our clearly established law at issue here? Unbelievably, the en banc majority says we don’t need any. That’s so, they say, because ‘[t]his is an obvious case.’ . . . That’s obviously wrong for three reasons. . . . First, the Supreme Court to date has never identified an ‘obvious’ case in the excessive force context. . . . Second, the Supreme Court has granted qualified immunity in much tougher cases than this one. [referencing Plumhoff, Brosseau, Kisela, and Sheehan] Third, this is Mullenix all over again. . . . The Supreme Court’s message could not be clearer. Still, somehow, today's majority does not get it. Here, as in Mullenix, the majority attempts to rely on Garner to establish the governing rule of law. From Garner, the majority somehow divines a rule that an officer cannot shoot a mentally disturbed teenager holding a gun near his school. This is demonstrably erroneous. In fact, one thing that unites the Supreme Court's recent reversals in cases involving qualified immunity and excessive force is the attempt by lower courts to extrapolate Garner to new facts. . . . The majority cannot dodge responsibility for today's decision by pointing to the limits of appellate jurisdiction. . . . We obviously lack interlocutory appellate jurisdiction to review the genuineness of an officer's fact dispute . . . But that does nothing to defeat jurisdiction where, as here, the factual disputes are immaterial. That is why the Supreme Court repeatedly has rejected such no-jurisdiction pleas from those who wish to deny qualified immunity. . . . All the fact disputes in the world do nothing to insulate this legal question: Is this an 'obvious case' under Garner—notwithstanding a mountain of SUMREVs, GVRs, and pointed admonitions from the Supreme Court? The majority says yes. . . . They obviously must have jurisdiction to say so. With respect, it makes no sense to say we lack jurisdiction to disagree with them. . . . What explains our circuit's war with the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity jurisprudence? Two themes appear to be at play. First, the majority suggests we should be less than enthused about Supreme Court precedent in this area, because it conflicts with plaintiffs' jury rights. . . . We appreciate the majority's candor. But inferior court judges may not prefer juries to the Justices. Second, some have criticized the doctrine of qualified immunity as ahistorical and contrary to the Founders' Constitution. . . . Subjecting these officers to trial on originalist grounds is precisely the unprincipled practice of originalism that Justices Scalia and Thomas railed against. . . . The majority undoes the careful balance of interests embodied in our doctrine of qualified immunity, stripping the officers' defenses without regard to the attendant social costs. Now that is a one-sided approach to qualified immunity as a practical matter. And as Justices Scalia and Thomas have observed, it's also a one-sided approach to qualified immunity as an originalist matter: It abandons the defense without also reconsidering the source and scope of officers' liability in the first place. . . . Our circuit, like too many others, has been summarily reversed for ignoring the Supreme Court's repeated admonitions regarding qualified immunity. There's no excuse for ignoring the Supreme Court again today. And certainly none based on a principled commitment to originalism. Originalism for plaintiffs, but not for police officers, is not principled judging. Originalism for me, but not for thee, is not originalism at all. We respectfully dissent.") [footnotes omitted]

Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444, 484 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Duncan, J., joined by Smith, Owen, Ho, and Oldham, JJ., dissenting), cert. denied sub nom. Hunter v. Cole, 141 S. Ct. 111 (2020) ("Judge Jones' dissent shows that, even resolving all disputed facts in Cole's favor, the officers did not 'obviously' violate Garner's generalized test during the immediate shooting—that is, when in the space of five seconds at most, the officers met Cole at a distance of 10–20 feet as he backed out of the woods, still armed, and began to turn. . . . But if we include the undisputed facts leading up to the shooting, the notion that this is an 'obvious case' crumbles. To believe that, we would have to blind ourselves to the facts that (1) the officers were searching for an irate, distraught suspect; (2) who was wandering through the woods armed with a loaded semi-automatic handgun;

(3) who had refused police demands to turn over his weapon; (4) who had just that morning deposited a cache of weapons and ammunition at his friend's house; and (5) who had threatened to 'shoot anyone who came near him.' Those were the 'totality of the circumstances' facing the officers, . . . and they were not disputed by Cole or the district court. Given those circumstances, the officers might have taken any number of actions when they met Cole in the woods that morning—they might have warned him, or shot him, or shot in the air, or retreated, or remained frozen in place to see what he would do. But to say it is 'obvious' what they should have done is to denude the concept of an 'obvious case' of any meaning. Once stripped of the conceit that this is an 'obvious case,' the majority has nothing left to justify its holding.") [footnotes omitted]

Marks v. Hudson, 933 F.3d 481, 486 (5th Cir. 2019) ("It is clearly established that Fourth Amendment procedures and standards apply to social workers' investigations. Wernecke, 591 F.3d at 399-400. Process that satisfies Fourth Amendment standards is adequate to protect parents' Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest in their child's custody. . . . It is also clearly established that a constitutional violation occurs if an official makes a knowing, intentional, or reckless false statement or omission that causes the issuance of a warrant without probable cause that leads to the removal of a child from its parent's custody.")

Rich v. Palko, 920 F.3d 288, 294-97 (5th Cir. 2019) ("In sum, QI 'represents the norm, and courts should deny a defendant immunity only in rare circumstances.' . . . Rich alleges that the officers violated Dupuis-Mays's Fourth Amendment rights through unlawful detention, excessive force, and false reporting. The officers assert QI on each claim. . . . Rich points to no case even suggesting that staff at a group home for disabled persons, who have been told by a hospital and a psychiatrist that a patient should be taken to the hospital, are not credible persons under the Texas Health and Safety Code. The district court erred in denying QI on the claim of unlawful detention. . . . Rich has not demonstrated that the officers violated clearly established law by moving Dupuis-Mays—who was increasingly aggravated, repeatedly spitting at the officers, and failing to comply with instructions to stop—to the floor, even though he collided with a cabinet on the way down. The cases Rich cites on appeal do not implicate the situation Palko and Hudgens faced and certainly do not put it 'beyond debate,' . . . that the officers' actions violated Dupuis-Mays's rights. . . . Rich fails to identify a single case suggesting that an individual has a right to be free from inaccuracies in an after-the-fact police report or that an inaccurate report serves as a sort of continuing constitutional violation, as the district court suggested.")

Blake v. Lambert, 921 F.3d 215, 220-22 (5th Cir. 2019) ("We hold that Blake established a Malley violation at the summary judgment stage. Lambert's affidavit simply identifies Blake, recites the charged offense, and cites the corresponding Mississippi statutes. . . . It does not provide any supporting facts from which a magistrate could independently determine probable cause. For example, it does not describe Lambert's experience, the sources of his information and their reliability, his conversations with Blake and the Perrys, Blake's relationship to S.W., or S.W.'s absence record. Lambert's affidavit is indistinguishable from what we called the 'textbook example' of a facially invalid affidavit in Spencer v. Staton. . . . The affidavit in Spencer, like Lambert's, stated that the named person committed the offense but did not provide factual support. . . We also hold that this was clearly established when Lambert swore his affidavit. The general Malley rule dates from the 1980s. And our 2007 decision in Spencer shows Lambert's affidavit violated that rule. It has also been clear since the 1980s that the Fourth Amendment applies to school officials. . . . [T]he right against arrest on a 'barebones' affidavit was well known, and there is no reason to distinguish Blake's right from that of someone arrested on a police officer's affidavit. . . Initially, the rule that 'no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause' is quite uniform. . . The school and social worker cases are distinguishable because they define what Fourth Amendment rights exist in certain contexts. For example, in Roe we held for the first time that the warrant and probable cause requirements apply to a social worker's body cavity search of a child. . . Here, in contrast, Lambert does not dispute that probable cause governs arrest warrant affidavits. As the Supreme Court teaches, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . And Lambert's distinction from a police officer is unconvincing. First, Lambert has some understanding of warrant affidavits. He routinely submitted them to the court and was aware they could lead to arrests. . . . Second, Lambert's claim to limited experience and training goes to subjective good faith, not objective legal reasonableness. '[A] reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.' . . There is some evidence that Lambert's affidavit followed a standard practice for local school attendance officers. But even if proven, this fact also goes to subjective good faith. The Supreme Court has held that agency policy may support an action's reasonableness if Fourth Amendment law is 'undeveloped.' . . But '[s]uch a policy, of course, could not make reasonable a belief that was contrary to a decided body of case law.' . . That was exactly the situation here. Malley, as applied in Spencer, was a decided body of law. We are bound not to 'reintroduce into qualified immunity analysis the inquiry into officials' subjective intent that Harlow [v. Fitzgerald] sought to minimize.' . . Nor does the judge's warrant approval insulate Lambert. 'Although we accord great deference to a magistrate's determination of probable cause, we will not "defer to a warrant based on an affidavit that does not provide the magistrate with a substantial basis for determining the existence of probable cause."' . . The district court correctly denied summary judgment on the Malley claim based on qualified immunity.") Arizmendi v. Gabbert, 919 F.3d 891, 899-904 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The critical question is . . . whether an officer who knowingly or recklessly included false statements on a warrant affidavit can be held liable for false arrest despite having had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff without a warrant for a different offense not identified in the affidavit, an argument with great force. This said, the principle was not clearly established at the time of Gabbert's alleged conduct, so Gabbert is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In sum, Vance rejected the possibility that an officer could arrest someone based on a warrant and then, on its challenge, retroactively justify his conduct by arguing that he had probable cause to arrest the person without a warrant for a different offense. Taking the disputed facts in the light most favorable to Arizmendi, that is exactly what Gabbert has done. . . . Gabbert argues that Devenpeck squarely applies here: he arrested Arizmendi for one crime, but since he had probable cause to arrest her for a different crime, it does not matter whether he committed Franks violations in the course of obtaining the arrest warrant. The parties dispute whether Devenpeck applies solely to warrantless arrests, or also reaches warrant-based arrests. We, like other courts, have not explicitly addressed the reach of Devenpeck in circumstances like these. . . . After Devenpeck, but without addressing it explicitly, we characterized as ‘dubious’ the argument that ‘an officer can give a knowingly false affidavit and avoid liability by the fortuity that, after the fact, he may be able to argue some other basis for the arrest.’ . . . We have since acknowledged the possibility that Devenpeck may be limited to warrantless arrests, though we have not offered further analysis. . . . There are two reasons, however, to doubt that Devenpeck applies here. First, Devenpeck applies with significantly more force in the warrantless arrest context. . . . While Devenpeck held that the validity of a warrantless arrest should not be limited by an insistence that the officer have probable cause for the charged offense or related offenses, it did not disturb our previous recognition that allowing an officer conducting an improper warrant-based arrest to point to another offense for which there was probable cause would ‘unjustifiably tilt [the balance of protection] in favor of qualified immunity.’ . . . Second, and relatedly, Devenpeck hinged on the requirement that we distance ourselves from an arresting officer’s subjective state of mind, focusing solely on the objective facts known to the officer at the time. Yet Franks explicitly requires inquiry into officers’ states of mind to assess the validity of arrest warrants. Only deliberate or reckless misstatements or omissions are Franks violations; mere negligence will not suffice. . . . This stands in stark contrast to the Supreme Court’s emphasis on objectivity surrounding warrantless arrests. . . . Today we cannot conclude that an officer can deliberately or recklessly misstate or omit facts in a warrant affidavit to procure a warrant to arrest someone for a specific crime, then escape liability by retroactively constructing a justification for a warrantless arrest based on a different crime. That said, overarching and reconciling principles bring clarity. Franks and Devenpeck operate in tandem by protecting the validity of an arrest in circumstances where the arrest does not deny a person the protections of the Fourth Amendment—in these circumstances, the mental state of the officer aside, the arrest is lawful. In warrantless arrests, there is no threat to a citizen’s Fourth Amendment rights where the officer had probable cause to arrest, albeit not for the offense he chose to charge. With a warrant, even where there was ultimately no probable cause for the arrest, an officer instead gains the protection of Franks—invalidating the warrant only for misstatements willfully or recklessly made, and then only for misstatements necessary to the finding of probable cause for the charged offense. As of Gabbert’s conduct, we had not yet explained this common ground between warrantless and warrant-based arrests—let alone established that these principles do not mandate further protection for an officer who arrests someone based on a Franks-violating warrant, then later points to probable cause to have effected a warrantless arrest for another offense. A reasonable officer in Gabbert’s position may not have recognized that by proceeding with an arrest based on a warrant, the validity of the arrest would not be judged by standards applicable to warrantless arrests, standards he could have met. In short, one could have reasonably taken Devenpeck to protect the validity of Arizmendi’s arrest, even if—based on the facts in the light most favorable to Arizmendi—Gabbert should have known that the warrant itself was invalid under Franks. Knowing or reckless false statements in a warrant affidavit are not to be condoned. But Arizmendi has not persuaded us that Gabbert’s actions were then illicit by clearly established law. Gabbert is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Anderson v. Valdez, 913 F.3d 472, 476-78 (5th Cir. 2019) (“We conclude that Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity. It was not clearly established as of May 2014 that where a briefing attorney swore as part of his employment to comply with a code of conduct requiring him to report judicial misconduct to a specific state authority, he nonetheless spoke as a citizen in reporting a judge to that authority. . . . Garcetti left for later the line between citizen and public-employee speech. As relevant here, after Garcetti, we repeatedly held that employees speaking in discharge of job-imposed obligations to report wrongdoing did so as public employees—not as citizens. . . . Clarity came with Lane v. Franks’ holding that ‘[t]he critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee’s duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.’ . . . Under Lane, a general job-imposed obligation to detect and prevent wrongdoing does not qualify as an employee’s ‘official duty’ because ‘such broad [obligations] fail to describe with sufficient detail the day-to-day duties of a public employee’s job.’ . . . Lane and our post-Lane caselaw make clear that a general obligation to report judicial misconduct does not constitute an ‘official duty’ demarcating employee speech under Garcetti. That said, Lane was decided in June 2014—roughly one month after Anderson’s employment offer was withdrawn—leaving unsettled whether Anderson then spoke as a citizen or as an employee. Anderson argues that this issue is no different from the one addressed in Anderson I, where we held that a general duty as a lawyer to report judicial misconduct cannot constitute an ‘official duty’ under Garcetti because ‘there is an analogue to speech by citizens who are not public employees.’ . . . His argument is essentially that a job-imposed duty with a ‘citizen analogue’ is never an official duty for the purposes of Garcetti. But this relies on an implicit premise—that when an employee is obligated to speak under both the terms of employment and an analogous citizen obligation, the employee speaks only as a citizen and not also as a public employee—that we have explicitly declined to adopt. . . . We conclude that it was not clearly established that Anderson’s original complaint to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct was not employee speech. It follows that Valdez is entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds concerning Anderson’s later contact with the District Attorney. There may be cases where a public employee’s later, protected speech as a citizen was sufficiently attenuated from his earlier, unprotected speech as an employee that it can ground a retaliation claim. Not here. . . . As Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation, we end our inquiry and reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment on the individual-capacity claim.”)

Shumpert v. City of Tupelo, 905 F.3d 310, 321-23 (5th Cir. 2018) (“Plaintiffs have the burden of demonstrating that Officer Cook violated a ‘clearly established law at the time the challenged conduct occurred.’ Plaintiffs do not provide any legal authority to demonstrate that Officer Cook violated clearly established law by releasing the K9. Instead, they contend generally that Shumpert had a constitutional right to be free from excessive force. This court has previously rejected such general contentions. Even if Plaintiffs had included case law to support their argument, they would still be unable to demonstrate that Officer Cook’s conduct violated clearly established law. At the time of the challenged conduct, neither the United States Supreme Court nor this court had addressed what constitutes reasonable use of K9 force during an arrest. After that date, this court decided Cooper v. Brown, which addressed the issue. . . . [U]nder Cooper, the law is now clearly established that when ‘[n]o reasonable officer could conclude that [a suspect] pose[s] an immediate threat to [law enforcement officers] or others,’ it is unreasonable to use K9 force to subdue a suspect who is complying with officer instructions. Even if Cooper were applicable, Officer Cook’s conduct would not violate clearly established law. We emphasized in Cooper that ‘[o]ur caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced.’ Because the officer in Cooper continued to use force and even increased its use while the threat to officers decreased, he violated clearly established law. By contrast, Officer Cook did not use or increase the use of force after Shumpert was subdued; instead, Shumpert ignored Officer Cook’s instructions and retreated further under the home, preventing Officer Cook from determining whether he was armed. While caselaw establishes that it is unreasonable to use force after a suspect is subdued or demonstrates compliance, this court has repeatedly held that the ‘measured and ascending’ use of force is not excessive when a suspect is resisting arrest—provided the officer ceases the use of force once the suspect is subdued. Because it is undisputed that Shumpert was violently resisting arrest and that Officer Cook did not know whether he was armed, Plaintiffs have not met their burden of demonstrating that—under the discrete facts of this case—Officer Cook’s use of K9 force was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. The district court properly determined that Officer Cook was entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.” [footnotes omitted])

Mote v. Walthall, 902 F.3d 500, 505 n.12 (5th Cir. 2018) (“We recently remarked in another First Amendment case, Davidson v. City of Stafford, 848 F.3d 384 (5th Cir.2017):

On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have ‘reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that “clearly established law” should not be defined “at a high level of generality.”’. . . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. See, e.g., Deville v. Marcantel, 567 F.3d 156, 166 (5th Cir.2009); Evetts v. DETNTFF, 330 F.3d 681, 687 (5th Cir.2003).

848 F.3d at 394. But we recited the ‘high level of generality’ standard in another First Amendment case soon thereafter. See Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 686 (5th Cir.2017). Because we believe, as shown below, that the First Amendment law here meets this higher standard, we need not analyze whether the ‘high level of generality’ language perforce applies to cases outside of the excessive force line of cases.”) Collie v. Barron, 747 F. App’x 950, ____ (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) (“An officer’s use of deadly force is justified when the officer reasonably perceives an immediate threat of serious bodily harm or death to themselves or to others. . . . Neither post-incident proof that Collie carried no weapon, nor the fact that Collie never directly pointed at Flores changes this analysis. Nor do the stop-action shots made by Collie’s expert from the dash cam video change this analysis, because they give a false perspective on events that transpired in a few seconds. The district court properly focused on whether Officer Barron’s actions were justified in the heat of the moment. . . . The district court's determination that Officer Barron acted reasonably in light of the facts before him is well supported. . . . Collie fails to address the Supreme Court's explicit directive in Pauly that although claims of excessive force do not require a case that is directly on point, the standard hugs the line closely by requiring a case 'under similar circumstances.' . . . Instead, Collie relies on Graham v. Connor for the general rule that an officer's actions must be objectively reasonable. He then contends that because he did not fit more complete descriptions of the suspects, did not point in the direction of Deputy Flores, and did not have a weapon in his hand, Officer Barron's claim to believe his partner's life was in danger should be given no more weight than Collie's own testimony. We note that the summary judgment evidence does not show that the officers had received the height/weight/age descriptions of the suspects at the time they encountered Collie. Collie's position also excludes the relevant facts that he was a shirtless black male on foot in the near vicinity of the robbery who encountered the officers in a dimly lit area and did not stop in response to their commands. Accordingly, Collie's argument failed to discharge his legal burden to 'find a case in his favor that does not define the law at a "high level of generality."'"")

Winfrey v. Rogers, 901 F.3d 483, 494-98 (5th Cir. 2018), cert. denied sub nom Johnson v. Winfrey, 139 S. Ct. 1549 (2019) ("Here, the clearly established constitutional right asserted by Junior is to be free from police arrest without a good faith showing of probable cause. Since Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 98 S.Ct. 2674, 57 L.Ed.2d 667 (1978), it has been clearly established that a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights are violated if (1) the affiant, in support of the warrant, includes 'a false statement knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth' and (2) 'the allegedly false statement is necessary to the finding of probable cause.' . . . In Franks, the Supreme Court observed that the warrant requirement is meant 'to allow the magistrate to make an independent evaluation of the matter.' . . . It requires affiants to 'set forth particular facts and circumstances underlying the existence of probable cause,' including those that concern the reliability of the information and the credibility of the source to avoid 'deliberately or reckless false statement[s].' . . . Still, 'negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity.' . . . '[A] proven misstatement can vitiate an affidavit only if it is established that the misstatement was the product "of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth."'. . . Recklessness requires proof that the defendant ' "in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth" of the statement.' . . . Here, we conclude that Junior alleges a clearly established constitutional violation. . . . In short, the evidence presented is sufficient to support a finding that [Johnson's] conduct was unreasonable in the light of the well-established principle requiring probable cause for the issuance of an arrest warrant. . . . The primary question on remand appears to be whether Johnson acted recklessly, knowingly, or intentionally by presenting the judge with an arrest-warrant affidavit that contained numerous omissions and misstatements. This case should go to trial without delay in a manner not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 256-57 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Even if we agreed that the professional-judgment standard applies to persons detained pre-trial for competency restoration, Perniciaro still would have failed to establish that defendants' conduct violated clearly established law. . . . Perniciaro has not cited a single case—either in his briefing before the district court or before us—clearly establishing that the particular conduct at issue here violates the professional-judgment standard. Thus, he has failed to address the dispositive question: ‘[W]hether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ .Perniciaro relies on the general statement that, under Youngberg, his due-process rights to care and safety were violated because defendants’ actions ‘[were] such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment.’ But general propositions of law defined at ‘high level[s] of generality’ are insufficient to define clearly established law for purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . Even assuming that the Youngberg standard applies, Perniciaro has failed to establish that defendants’ conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . . But assuming—as did the district court—that the deliberate-indifference standard applies, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity. The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Perniciaro, fails to establish a dispute of material fact as to whether defendants’ conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.

Romero v. City of Grapevine, Texas, 888 F.3d 170, 178 n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) (“Even if Clark had used excessive force in violation of Villalpando’s Fourth Amendment right, Clark would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the right, defined at a fact specific level, was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The Supreme Court has explained that courts must not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . Instead, the question is ‘whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the officer’s conduct in the “situation [he or she] confronted.”’ . . . Romero does not cite to any controlling authority nor does she point to a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ that suggests Clark’s actions were obviously unconstitutional. . . . While authority need not be exactly analogous to aid the court in determining whether a right was clearly established, ‘this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case,’ and the authority must ‘squarely govern[]’ the circumstances. . . . There simply is no such authority.”)

Hale v. City of Biloxi, 731 F. App’x 259, ____ (5th Cir. 2018) (“Hale must point to case law clearly establishing that Lea and Garner acted unreasonably based on facts similar to the particular circumstances they faced—the use of deadly force and a taser where a person suspected of a nonviolent crime ignores repeated warnings to keep his hands visible and step outside of a confined area when he knows the people warning him are armed police officers, even if they have not told him he is under arrest. . . . Hale does not cite any such case on point. Hale does try to distinguish our prior cases where officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they reasonably believed the suspect was reaching for a weapon. As discussed, Hale argues that, in those cases, the suspect was wanted for a violent crime, resisting or fleeing arrest, or clearly brandishing a weapon. We have already explained that Manis shows Hale cannot prevail on this front. Moreover, the fact that in previous cases we found qualified immunity where such factors were present, but where we did not state that those factors were required for qualified immunity, would hardly provide ‘fair warning’ to Garner and Lea.”)

Sam v. Richard, 887 F.3d 710, 714 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2018) (“On the facts as recounted by Sam, Richard’s use of force was objectively unreasonable at the summary judgment stage. Although Sam initially ran, he states in deposition that he was lying face down on the ground with his hands on his head when Richard kned him in the hip and pushed him against a patrol car. Such a use of force on a compliant suspect is excessive and unreasonable. . . Furthermore, it was clearly established at the time of this incident that pushing, kneeling, and slapping a suspect who is neither fleeing nor resisting is excessive. . . Richard’s contention that the force alleged by Sam would have produced more serious injuries is a question of credibility which is not appropriate for resolution at this stage. Accordingly, we hold that Sam’s evidence of excessive force is sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. . . We note that the Supreme Court recently reversed denial of qualified immunity in an excessive force case. See Kisela v. Hughes, — U.S. —, 138 S.Ct. 1148, — L.Ed.2d — (2018) (per curiam). But, as that decision instructs, ‘[u]se of excessive force is an area of the law “in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.”’ The facts at issue in Kisela bear little resemblance to those before us here.”)

Lincoln v. Scott, 887 F.3d 190, 197-98 (5th Cir. 2018) (“[A]lthough the officers violated Erin’s Fourth Amendment rights by detaining her for four hours without probable cause, the court must determine whether that right was ‘clearly established.’ . . In a recent, related appeal, this court held that it was not clearly established that an officer could not detain the sole compliant witness to a police shooting. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. . . The court disagreed with Erin’s reliance on Dunaway v. New York . . . and Davis v. Mississippi. . . as evidence that the Fourth Amendment right violated was clearly established. Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. It held that those cases did not ‘clearly establish[] that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for . . . two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, [particularly] when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him.’ . . Moreover, Walker similarly determined that the officers did not violate clearly established law when officers forcefully detained witnesses in their own home. . . The intricate facts here—reasonableness of detaining a sole, compliant witness to a police shooting—have never been directly addressed or clearly established by this Circuit or the Supreme Court. See Turner, 874 F.3d at 849. The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly stressed that courts must not “define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.”’. . Our inability to point to a string of cases establishing ‘settled law’ that these facts amount to a Fourth Amendment violation demonstrates that the violated right was not so clearly established that these officers can be liable. . . In sum, this court, as well as other circuits, have determined that officers acting under similar circumstances—detaining a sole witness for questioning and investigative preservation—do not violate any clearly established right. It follows that these officers—Meeks, Scott, and Barnes—similarly were not bound by any such clearly established law. The district court correctly granted these officers qualified immunity.”)

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 262-66 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (“The panel opinion treated Jennings and Hampton as in conflict with Hart. . . However, we, like the parties in this case, interpret our precedents to be in one accord. Thus, an officer who has provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application under Hart has assisted in preparing the warrant application for purposes of Jennings and Hampton and may be liable, but an officer who has not provided information for the purpose of its being included in a warrant application may be liable only if he signed or presented the application. . . . Here, the fact issue that the district court identified was whether Deputy Phillips used the P.I.D. in an improper way while preparing the incident report. The district court determined that this fact issue was material to recklessness and that Deputy Phillips's immunity depended on whether he was reckless because, as the district court understood it, Franks applies to 'any government official who makes a reckless misstatement.' However, even assuming arguendo that Deputy Phillips was reckless in completing the incident report, . . . he is still entitled to summary judgment unless there is a question of fact as to whether he assisted in the preparation of the complaint on the basis of which the capias warrant issued. . . . Melton seeks to create a fact issue as to whether Deputy Phillips helped prepare the complaint by providing information for use in it, asserting that '[a]ny investigator would know' an incident report will be used to obtain a warrant. However, there is no record evidence of a policy or practice at the Hunt County Sheriff's Office that would have allowed Deputy Phillips to anticipate that the incident report would be used to obtain a warrant. . . . Even assuming arguendo that Melton could demonstrate that a fact issue exists on his claim that Deputy Phillips recklessly filled out the incident report, Melton bears the burden of demonstrating that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights. . . . Rather than attempting to demonstrate that his rights were clearly established by cases addressing analogous or near-analogous facts, Melton has repeatedly emphasized that the facts of his case are unique. . . . Moreover, Melton conceded at oral argument that he could not identify a single case applying Franks to a situation in which there was no error in the complaint and no false statement that made its way into the warrant. . . . Indeed, Franks expressly requires a falsehood to be included in the warrant application for there to be a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Particularly in light of Franks's detailed discussion of why its rule must be narrowly construed, we cannot say Franks clearly established the unconstitutionality of Deputy Phillips's conduct. . . . Moreover, even if Melton had attempted to satisfy his burden rather than conceding that his case is unique and that no case applies Franks in similar circumstances, Melton could not have shown that Deputy Phillips violated his clearly established rights without assisting in preparing, presenting, or signing the complaint. Hart and Hampton had been decided at the time Deputy Phillips prepared the incident report. As discussed above, Hampton held that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if he does not prepare, present, or sign a warrant application. . . . Hart held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if he 'deliberately or recklessly provides false, material information for use in an affidavit in support of [a warrant].' . . . Because Melton cannot show that Deputy Phillips prepared, presented, signed, or provided information for use in the complaint, he cannot show that Deputy Phillips violated clearly established law.")

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 268 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Costa, J., concurring in the judgment) ("The en banc court's attempt to reconcile rather than correct our caselaw, with Hart apparently now being a subpart of the Hampton standard, will continue to result in confusion. That confusion is especially problematic for a claim in which individuals can assert a qualified immunity defense as a lack of clarity in the law provides a defense. In a future Franks case, an officer who provided false information ‘for use in’ an affidavit will no doubt argue he was not ‘fully responsible’ for the warrant application and thus is immune under the Hampton and Jennings decisions that we reaffirm today. Such a conflict in the caselaw will support an easy defense of qualified immunity as this case demonstrates. Although the ‘violation of clearly established law’ standard is increasingly being questioned, see Ziglar v. Abbasi, — U.S. —, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1870–72, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) (Thomas, J., concurring) (citing Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2018)), it is hard to imagine that any immunity threshold should hold law enforcement to a higher standard than judges when it comes to interpreting the law. If judges thought (and apparently still think) that the Michalik standard should extend to Franks cases, then an officer like Phillips who has neither the legal training of judges nor the time we can devote to parsing caselaw should not face civil liability for that error. So I join the majority opinion in concluding that Phillips is immune from this suit. . . But I would use the en banc process to recognize the dubious provenance of the ‘sign or prepare’ requirement in our Franks case. Hart alone should provide the appropriate standard for Franks claims. Its ‘for use in’ requirement is more straightforward, consistent with the law in other circuits, and fully captures Franks’s concern that an officer’s misrepresentations to a court should not be a basis for interfering with citizens’ privacy and liberty interests. Our failure to straighten out the strands of Fourth Amendment law that got tangled in Hampton means that the next time one of these cases comes along, perhaps with a stronger case for liability than this one, the important Fourth Amendment concerns that Franks protects might not be vindicated.”)

Melton v. Phillips, 875 F.3d 256, 271-75 (5th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Dennis, J., joined by Graves, J., dissenting) (“The majority opinion’s holding that an officer who makes a deliberate or reckless misrepresentation can only be held liable if he ‘assisted in the preparation of, or otherwise presented or signed a warrant application’ is unsound and, unsurprisingly, is not the law in any other circuit. . . Our sister circuits’ caselaw reflects a common-sense understanding: when an officer, acting with reckless disregard for the truth, includes false, material information in an official report for further official use, leading to an unlawful search or arrest of an innocent person, there is no justification to insulate him from liability. . . . In addition to establishing an imprudent and unfounded rule of law, the court makes serious procedural missteps. On appeal from the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, this court ‘lack[s] jurisdiction to review the genuineness of a fact issue.’ . . We have jurisdiction to review only the materiality of the factual issues. . . In this case, the district court found that the plaintiff ‘has introduced evidence suggesting that Phillips’s identification of [the plaintiff] in his incident report was reckless.’ The majority opinion acknowledges that recklessness is a question of fact, but in the same breath, it concludes that the facts identified by the district court are not ‘material’ to recklessness. . . In actuality, the majority opinion simply overrules the district court’s determination that there is a genuine dispute as to whether Phillips ‘in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of the information included in the warrant application,’ . . and by so doing exceeds this court’s jurisdiction. . . The majority proceeds to absolve Phillips on the additional basis that, even if he did violate the plaintiff's constitutional rights, those rights were not 'clearly established.' Phillips never made such an argument—not before the district court, not in his brief on appeal, and not in his supplemental en banc brief. The majority opinion states that Phillips's assertion of qualified immunity below 'placed the burden on Melton to demonstrate that neither prong of the defense applies.' . . . But it is the appellant's burden to show that the district court erred. . . . Prospective litigants could only dream of receiving the judicial help that the en banc court is giving an officer represented by a highly competent attorney. . . . This court's zeal to protect officers from the prospect of chilling liability cannot justify abandoning our rules and reversing the district court's judgment on the basis of arguments that the appellant has not made. . . . Because I believe that the majority opinion errs in reversing the district court's denial of qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent.")

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 848-51 (5th Cir. 2017) ("As we have already concluded that Erin sufficiently alleged violations of her right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force, the remaining question for qualified immunity purposes is whether those rights were clearly established. . . . The district court held that plaintiffs did not cite clearly established law establishing that an officer cannot 'detain a witness for a period of approximately two hours while an investigation was underway,' although the parties have also consistently addressed Erin's detention as a potential suspect. . . . The reality may be somewhere in between. Turner seized Erin in the aftermath of a police shooting resulting from a SWAT team deployment. Even on Erin's account, the scene was tense, and the officers were acting with incomplete information. In these circumstances, Turner may have been entitled to detain Erin for some amount of time to determine her role in the situation. As we explained, Turner exceeded this authority when he handcuffed Erin and detained her in the back of a police car for two hours. In doing so, Turner violated Erin's constitutional rights. Yet we are not persuaded that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' At this stage, Erin has the burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established in this area on the date of the incident. . . . Davis and Dunaway put officers on notice that probable cause may be required even where an interaction is not labeled an arrest, and Lidster warns officers that the Fourth Amendment applies even in a brief, information-gathering stop. However, none of those cases clearly established that a law enforcement officer could not detain a witness to a police shooting for these two hours while a SWAT team sorted out the scene, at the least when the witness was standing beside a person when the police shot him. Thus, we find that Erin has not shown that the contours of the right were so clearly established that 'a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Finally, we note that there may well be an emerging trend toward holding it unreasonable to detain a police shooting witness for an extended period of time, absent either reasonable suspicion or probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. . . . While we may look to other circuits to find clearly established law, we must consider 'the overall weight' of such authority. . . . A 'trend' alone is just that. As of December 2013, only two circuits had weighed in on the 'contours of the right.' These cases alone do not provide sufficient authority to find that the law was clearly established. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that the Tenth Circuit itself found no 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts,' . . . and the Ninth Circuit relied on intra-circuit precedent to find clearly established law. . . . Although Erin identifies the second step in the qualified immunity analysis, it is not clear that her contention was that the right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in this case. Instead, she suggests that her allegations lead to the conclusion that physically removing Erin in the manner that Turner did was unreasonable, and that her injuries sustain her claim. However, these are arguments that feed into the first step of the qualified immunity analysis—whether there was a constitutional violation. Accordingly, Erin waived argument as to the clearly established law prong and thus cannot overcome qualified immunity. . . . Regardless, we cannot on this record conclude that Erin could overcome qualified immunity on her excessive force claim given the lack of guiding precedent that shows the force used in this particular situation was ‘clearly unreasonable.’”)

Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425, 436-37 (5th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 638 (2018) (“ We have spilled much ink to thoroughly establish our constitutional footing, an effort we found necessary in light of Jones’ limited analysis. That explication does not diminish the Jones holding, however—prolonged detention without the benefit of a court appearance violates the detainee’s Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. . . . The right at issue here was clearly established and its contours ‘sufficiently clear’ that any reasonable official would understand that the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period (months in this case) prior to bringing them before a judge. . . . And so we held in Jones itself, ruling the individual defendants, a sheriff and his deputy, not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Sheriff Halford’s claim to qualified immunity is less compelling than was the claim of those Mississippi law enforcement officers. Tellingly, Sheriff Halford’s arguments relating to qualified immunity do not even mention Jones. In fact, at one point in this litigation, he conceded that that ‘the Choctaw County Sheriff’s Office, Choctaw County District Attorney or Circuit Court Judge clearly should have provided Plaintiff Jauch with an appearance before the Circuit Court of Choctaw County’ within the 30 days provided for by state law. (Emphasis added.) While he attempted to spread the blame to other officials, his actions and decisions are the cause of Jauch’s constitutional injury. Either Sheriff Halford is plainly incompetent, or he knowingly violated the law. Sheriff Halford’s lone argument regarding qualified immunity is that ‘[f]unctions of state officials do not impute legal duties actionable by federal tort to a county official simply because the applicable state official is otherwise immune.’ Translated from legalese, the assertion is that Jauch sued him only because the truly responsible parties, judges of the circuit court, are immune from suit. This is simply wrong. Sheriff Halford is responsible for those incarcerated in his jail, Miss. Code Ann. § 19-25-69, and the capias did not require him to impose the unconstitutional detention policy.)

See also Jauch v. Choctaw County, 886 F.3d 534, 535, 539-41 (5th Cir. 2018) (Southwick, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Owen, Willett, and Ho, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (“I respectfully dissent from our failure to rehear this case en banc. The panel opinion — for the first time in this or any circuit — declared that a sheriff violated the Constitution when an indicted, pretrial detainee was held until the next regular term of the local criminal court before being afforded an opportunity to have bail set. A capias warrant instructed the sheriff to hold her until the term of court, which was when a judge with authority over that prisoner would be in the county. The sheriff did so, following a practice authorized by the state's Supreme Court. There is no law to the contrary that is established with the clarity the United States Supreme Court requires under recent caselaw that was not considered because it postdates the panel opinion. At its most basic, my concern is that in assessing the liability of the County and the sheriff, the panel opinion used precedents that are inapplicable to the process afforded in this case, a process drawn from statutes, court rules, and perhaps even policies of the local judges. I cannot discern how these defendants had any effect on when this plaintiff was considered for release. Thus, as to these parties, I believe the panel was wrong. More relevant to whether to take a case en banc, what rights prisoners have to be released on bail or otherwise before trial is a profoundly significant question due to its implications for individual liberty. The full court should rework the answer. . . . In summary, under state law the sheriff had no clear obligation to take Jauch before a judicial officer for an initial appearance or for a preliminary hearing because she had been indicted. There was no obligation on the sheriff to have Jauch arraigned because that is a duty that falls elsewhere. The explicit obligation under the court-issued capias was to hold Jauch until the next circuit court term, which is just what the sheriff did. Those legal points are clear, to my eyes at least. The controlling question, then, is whether there was other law that with better clarity established that every reasonable sheriff would have known Jauch had a federal right that overrode these state procedures. See Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 641 (1987). The only precedent the Jauch panel considered to be directly on point involved jail procedures in Jackson, Mississippi. Jauch v. Choctaw Cnty., 874 F.3d 425, 429 (5th Cir. 2017) (citing Jones v. City of Jackson, 203 F.3d 875 (5th Cir. 2000)). That is a decision that set no specific time limit for presenting a detainee to a magistrate, did not discuss the practice of waiting until the next term of court, and did not address a sheriff's responsibility in such matters. Absolutely critical, Jones had not been jailed after indictment. Thus, in light of what I have already discussed about indicted detainees, Jones seems all but irrelevant. Silence in these varied respects is itself enough to say Jones did not clearly establish the relevant law for the Choctaw County sheriff. . . . [T]he governing law was not clearly established to justify denying qualified immunity to the sheriff. Under Wesby, Jones is not a closely analogous case. Whether Jauch was detained unconstitutionally while awaiting the return of a circuit court judge is not clearly established by Jones, which did not set a specific time limitation and did not involve a circuit-riding judge. Eldridge and Medina offer general pronouncements about due process without remotely similar facts. Finally, this is not a case about indefinite detention. It is about unfairly delayed consideration for bail, but not a delay yet clearly announced as unconstitutional. . . . My able colleagues on the Jauch panel held that based on Jones and these more general authorities, it was 'clearly established' that Mississippi's 'policy whereby certain arrestees were indefinitely detained without access to courts' violates an individual's constitutional due process rights. Jauch, 874 F.3d at 436. No such clarity was established by Jones — it did not even deal with the relevant post-indictment procedures. The panel also concluded it was 'clearly established' that 'the Constitution forbids confining criminal defendants for a prolonged period' before bringing them before a judge. . . . True, but what was not clear at all to someone responsible for detention is how prolonged detention must be to constitute a violation of rights. The caselaw would not have informed very many officials that the state's post-indictment rules violated the federal Constitution. Thus, qualified immunity applies.”)

Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 343 (5th Cir. 2017) (“[T]his Court’s opinion in Goodson outlines a scenario very similar to this case. Both Goodson and this case involve a plaintiff who was tackled by officers after very minimal physical resistance—pulling away from an officer after the officer grabbed the plaintiff’s arm. The primary distinction between Goodson and this case appears to be the fact that in Goodson, the defendant officers lacked any reasonable suspicion to detain or frisk the plaintiff in the first place. Goodson, 202 F.3d at 740. Here, on the other hand, it is virtually undisputed that the officers had probable cause to arrest Trammel for public intoxication. But we find this distinction is merely a matter of degree. In Graham, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to consider ‘the severity of the crime at issue’ in determining whether police officers used excessive force. . . We interpret Goodson’s focus on reasonable suspicion as a consideration of this factor. So, while in Goodson, the officers lacked reasonable suspicion that the plaintiff had committed any crime, here the officers believed the plaintiff was guilty of the minor offense of public intoxication. Although the severity factor may have weighed slightly more in favor of finding a use of force reasonable in this case than it did in Goodson, we nevertheless conclude that Goodson gave officers ‘fair warning’ that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the law at the time of Trammel’s arrest clearly established that it was objectively unreasonable for several officers to tackle an individual who was not fleeing, not violent, not aggressive, and only resisted by pulling his arm away from an officer’s grasp.”)

Trammell v. Fruge, 868 F.3d 332, 346-47 (5th Cir. 2017) (Southwick, J., dissenting in part) (“The majority concludes there are several genuine factual disputes, but it does not always view the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene. For example, it concludes there is ‘a question of fact as to whether Trammell posed any danger to himself,’ and there is ‘a factual dispute as to whether Trammell was actively resisting arrest....’ When we review a grant of summary judgment in this context, we ‘first constru[e] disputed historical facts in favor of the non-movant,’ but we ‘then ask how a reasonable officer would have perceived those historical facts.’. . So the question is not, for example, whether ‘a reasonable jury might find that [Trammell] was not actually resisting arrest,’ but whether the force used was reasonable ‘under the facts as a reasonable officer would perceive them[.]’. . . [T]he law was not clearly established so that ‘every “reasonable official would have understood”’ that the force used here was unlawful. . . The majority relies heavily on one case to conclude that the law was clearly established. See Goodson v. City of Corpus Christi, 202 F.3d 730 (5th Cir. 2000). That case focused on whether the officers violated the defendant’s right to be free from seizure without reasonable suspicion. . . After reversing summary judgment on that claim, the court also held the defendant raised a fact issue regarding whether the officers, ‘who lacked reasonable suspicion to detain and frisk [the defendant] and from whom [the defendant] was not fleeing,’ used reasonable force. . . Goodson’s import in the excessive-force context is limited because it focused on the officers’ lack of reasonable suspicion. For that reason, we said in Poole that Goodson ‘lack[ed] analytical force in assessing the reasonableness of [the officer’s] actions’ regarding the amount of force used. . .

Griggs supports that the law was not clearly established in our case. . . In Griggs, after the officer told the defendant to stop performing a one-legged stand sobriety test and to put his hands behind his back, the defendant ‘lurched to one side and said “no, no.”’. . The officer ‘immediately placed [the defendant] in a choke hold, swept his legs out from under him, and body-slammed him onto the nearby grass.’. . Once on the ground, the officer punched the defendant several times with a closed fist to the back of the head as he struggled to gain control of the defendant’s hands. . . We concluded that our precedent did not clearly establish that the officer’s takedown maneuver or use of ‘non-deadly punches’ to gain control of the defendant was constitutionally unreasonable. . . We distinguished Goodson because that case ‘turned not on whether the force was excessive, but on whether the force was justified at all because fact issues remained as to whether the officer had reasonable suspicion to initiate the stop.’. . Here, as in Griggs, our precedents do not make clear to every reasonable officer that the force used was unlawful.”)

McClin v. Ard, 866 F.3d 682, 696 (5th Cir. 2017) (“Here, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would understand that McLin was seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. To date, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit has decided that an officer’s acceptance of a voluntary surrender to an arrest warrant constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure. And there is no a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’: only one circuit—the Eleventh—has found a seizure in these circumstances in a published opinion, and a majority of circuit courts have not yet weighed in. Although we now hold that McLin was seized, reasonable officers might not have understood that accepting McLin’s surrender to the arrest warrants, without imposing further pre-trial restrictions, constituted a seizure. We therefore hold that McLin fails to plead a violation of a ‘clearly established’ constitutional right, and we affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to the Defendants and dismissal of McLin’s Fourth Amendment claim on that basis.”)

Cobarobio v. Midland County, Tex., No. 15-50096, 2017 WL 3495588, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 15, 2017) (not reported) (“As determined by the district court, Cobarobio fails to establish that there was a clearly established First Amendment right for him to record police activity during an on-going emergency situation like the one involved in the instant case. In Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 688 (5th Cir. 2017), this court held that ‘First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.’ However, we did so only after noting that ‘there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner’s [2015 arrest].’. . Because Cobarobio’s arrest occurred in 2012, he cannot satisfy his burden of establishing that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Moreover, because there was probable cause to arrest Cobarobio for interference with public duties, Cobarobio cannot establish a Fourth Amendment violation.”)

Rivera v. Bonner, 952 F.3d 560, 568-70 (5th Cir. 2017) (“[A] few months before Rivera was sexually assaulted, another senior jailer sexually abused a female detainee at the Hale County Jail. This event should have alerted Appellees that a substantial risk of serious harm existed in their facility and that they needed to do more to protect detainees from sexual exploitation. Yet the record suggests that Appellees did not make any modifications to their training, policies, or supervision. Instead, Appellees merely reminded jailers that they should not sexually exploit detainees and posted a sign indicating that ‘sex with inmates’ was prohibited. A jury could conclude that these reminders did not constitute an adequate response to the serious incident of sexual abuse that had recently transpired in the jail. . . . Nonetheless, we must determine whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of Appellees’ alleged misconduct. In doing so, we look to ‘cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule’ or ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable [official] could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . . It has long been clearly established that detainees like Rivera have the right to be protected from sexual abuse, both at the hands of correctional officers and fellow inmates, and that jail officials violate inmates’ constitutional rights ‘by showing “deliberate indifference” to a substantial risk’ of sexual abuse ‘when the official[s] “know[] of and disregard[] an excessive risk’ of that harm occurring. . . . By now, the substantial risk of sexual assault in jails and prisons is well-documented and obvious. . . . Jail administrators are not permitted to ‘bury their heads in the sand’ and ignore these obvious risks to the inmate populations they have an affirmative duty to protect. . . . Accordingly, this Court has previously held that jail officials who provide ‘no training’ on sexual abuse and leave their employees ‘virtually unsupervised’ are deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk that jailers might abuse detainees. . . . Still, in the case at bar, Rivera concedes that officers at the jail received at least some state-sanctioned training aimed at sexual assault prevention. She also agrees that Appellees took some limited responsive action following the prior incident of sexual abuse. In other words, we are not faced with a case in which jail officials took no preventive measures to address the risk of sexual assault. And unfortunately, when Rivera was sexually assaulted, our case law did not provide much clarity on the scope of jail officials’ obligations with respect to protecting detainees from sexual abuse. Indeed, Rivera has not identified any controlling Fifth Circuit authority establishing the constitutional inadequacy of Appellees’ response to the risk of sexual assault in their jail. . . . Furthermore, at the time of the sexual assault in this case, there was not a consensus of persuasive authority such that reasonable officials in Appellees’ position would have known their actions were unlawful. . . . As a result, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct that Appellees needed to make significant changes to their training, supervision, and policies in response to the July 2014 incident of sexual abuse. We hold that the district court did not err in concluding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Rivera’s inadequate training and supervision claims.”) Brinsdon v. McAllen ISD, 863 F.3d 338, 350-53 (5th Cir. 2017) (“[I]t is clearly established that a school may compel some speech. Otherwise, a student who refuses to respond in class or do homework would not suffer any consequences. Students, moreover, generally do not have a right to reject curricular choices as these decisions are left to the sound discretion of instructors. . . . As true of us all, teachers and administrators can exercise their discretion poorly. This case involved a student’s disagreement with a teacher’s curricular choices and First Amendment issues arising from how the disagreement was addressed. We conclude that Santos as teacher, and Cavazos as principal, were not ignoring clearly established law when compelling a non-operative recitation of the Mexican pledge. Qualified immunity on compelled speech was properly granted. . . . Making unauthorized and secret video recordings of secondary-school classes does not represent a recognized First Amendment right, nor does the public dissemination of the video. To use Tinker's formulation, it was an 'invasion of the rights of others[.]'. . . No clearly established law would have counseled these defendants not to respond to such behavior. To summarize, the evidence is that disruptions in mid-October were triggered primarily by dissemination of the secret video that showed students, with their faces blurred, performing the Mexican pledge. School officials did not violate clearly established law when the school reacted to the secretly taken video, and the evidence is that is what the officials did. We agree with the district court that Brinsdon's First Amendment rights were not violated by school officials reacting to the disruptions that had occurred and might continue. Qualified immunity was properly granted to Santos and Cavazos on the claim they violated Brinsdon's First Amendment rights by removing her from class.”)

Brewer v. Hayne, 860 F.3d 819, 824-26 (5th Cir. 2017) (“Plaintiffs argue that the clearly established right at issue here is the due process right to be free from fabricated evidence. We have previously held that ‘deliberate or knowing creation of misleading and scientifically inaccurate [evidence] amounts to a violation of a defendant’s due process rights,’ and that reasonable officers know of this right. . . . As a baseline, we agree with the district court that merely presenting forensic odontology evidence in the early 1990s was not unreasonable or violative of due process. While that sort of evidence has been called into question, . . . at the time of Plaintiffs’ trials, forensic odontology was widely accepted. Plaintiffs are thus tasked with demonstrating not that the evidence Defendants presented is no longer considered trustworthy, but rather that Defendants intentionally created false evidence or intentionally produced evidence that they knew to be scientifically inaccurate by the standards of the day. . . . Plaintiffs have made a compelling showing that Defendants were negligent in their forensic analysis, but negligence alone will not defeat qualified immunity. . . . Viewed in the most favorable light, Plaintiffs’ evidence is not suggestive of an intent to fabricate. . . . Absent some additional evidence, the autopsy form and the result of the biopsy in the Brooks case are not sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that Dr. Hayne either deliberately failed to perform biopsies or withheld exculpatory evidence. At most, Plaintiffs have presented evidence that Dr. Hayne was negligent in failing to perform the biopsies or in failing to examine biopsied tissues. Ultimately, we think that true of all the evidence in the record: viewed in its entirety and in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the record tends to show that Defendants were negligent—perhaps grossly so—but no more. Plaintiffs have failed to raise a genuine issue of fact as to whether Defendants violated their right to due process by intentionally creating false or misleading scientific evidence. Defendants were entitled to summary judgment under the defense of qualified immunity. We affirm.”)

Lincoln v. Barnes, 855 F.3d 297, 301-04 (5th Cir. 2017) (“The question . . . is whether Erin’s detention at the police station for the purposes of questioning her as a witness to her father’s shooting and obtaining her statement satisfied the Fourth Amendment’s ‘reasonableness’ requirement. The relevant facts are as follows: Erin witnessed the events leading up to her father’s death; after her father was lethally shot by members of the SWAT team, the police had an interest in detaining Erin to solicit information from her, including a statement; toward that end, Erin was handcuffed and placed in the backseat of a patrol car; after a period of approximately two hours, she was transported to the police station; and at the station, Barnes and Meeks questioned her for approximately five hours and forced her to write out a statement. . . . Accordingly, police violate the Fourth Amendment when, absent probable cause or the individual's consent, they seize and transport a person to the police station and subject her to prolonged interrogation. . . . Walker is persuasive authority that the prolonged detention of witnesses to a police shooting for the sole purpose of obtaining information from them, including statements, is unreasonable absent any exigencies justifying the detention for investigative purposes. . . . But the clearly established law governing this case derives from Davis and Dunaway, not Walker. . . . While 'the law ordinarily permits police to seek the voluntary cooperation of members of the public in the investigation of a crime,' . . . '[a]bsent special circumstances, the person approached may not be detained ... but may refuse to cooperate and go on his way[.]'. . . Any further detention of such individual constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment, which must satisfy the Fourth Amendment's 'reasonableness' requirement. . . . As a general matter, the detention of a witness that is indistinguishable from custodial interrogation requires no less probable cause than a traditional arrest. Dunaway, 442 U.S. at 216; Davis, 394 U.S. at 726–28.”)

Alexander v. City of Round Rock, 854 F.3d 298, 305, 308 (5th Cir. 2017) (“We do not suggest that officers in this circuit have faced this precise factual situation before. But that is not a condition precedent to denying qualified immunity—‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’. . . Based on these facts alone, we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Garza had reasonable suspicion to detain Alexander pursuant to the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, taking the facts as alleged, the lack of reasonable suspicion was clearly established—the factors we laid out as relevant in Hill, Martinez, Rideau, and Micheletti, as well as the Supreme Court’s decision in Wardlow, do not support reasonable suspicion here. We therefore reverse the district court’s dismissal of Alexander’s unlawful detention claim. . . . Alexander also argues that the officers retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment right to be silent and not answer their questions. This argument was not addressed straight-on by the district court. We hold that Alexander’s claim on this point cannot overcome the officers’ qualified immunity, because ‘it was not clearly established that an individual has a First Amendment right to refuse to answer an officer’s questions during a Terry stop.’ Koch v. City of Del City, 660 F.3d 1228, 1244 (10th Cir. 2011). . . . Surprisingly few courts have ruled on this precise issue; the parties point to no cases from this circuit directly on point. The sparse case law that does exist, however, indicates no consensus that a defendant has a First Amendment right not to answer an officer’s questions during a stop like the one at issue here.”)

Hanks v. Rogers, 853 F.3d 738, 747-49 (5th Cir. 2017) (“‘[C]learly established law must be “particularized” to the facts of the case,’ . . . and ‘should not be defined “at a high level of generality,”’” In other words, outside of ‘an obvious case,’ the law is only ‘clearly established’ if a prior case exists ‘where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. . . In ‘an obvious case,’ Graham and Garner may supply the ‘clearly established law.’. In this case, we conclude that on the night Officer Rogers stopped Hanks, clearly established law demonstrated that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he abruptly resorts to overwhelming physical force rather than continuing verbal negotiations with an individual who poses no immediate threat or flight risk, who engages in, at most, passive resistance, and whom the officer stopped for a minor traffic violation. . . . Though we conclude Deville clearly proscribed Officer Rogers’s actions, we also view this as an ‘obvious’ instance of excessive force in light of the factors set forth in Graham. Graham directs us to consider the ‘facts and circumstances of each particular case, including the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.’. . . As noted above, all of these factors strongly favor Hanks. No reasonable officer who is aiming a taser at the back of an individual such as Hanks—i.e., an individual who (1) was stopped for a minor traffic violation; (2) exited his car and has his hands displayed behind his back, thus presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) has displayed, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest—would escalate the situation via a physical takedown only seconds after ordering that individual to kneel. . . . We hold that on Feb. 26, 2013, clearly established law demonstrated, and Graham makes obvious, that it was clearly unreasonable and excessive for Officer Rogers to abruptly escalate the encounter via a physical takedown where (1) Officer Rogers stopped Hanks for a minor traffic offense; (2) immediately before the takedown, Officer Rogers had his taser aimed at Hanks’s back while Hanks stood against his vehicle, facing away from Officer Rogers, with his empty hands displayed behind his back, presenting no immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) Hanks offered, at most, passive resistance, including asking whether he was under arrest.”)

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 685-90 (5th Cir. 2017) (“The district court’s analysis rested on the second, ‘clearly established,’ prong, so we begin there. . . . At the time in question, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had determined whether First Amendment protection extends to the recording or filming of police. . . . Although Turner insists, as some district courts in this circuit have concluded, that First Amendment protection extends to the video recording of police activity in light of general First Amendment principles, . . . the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly’ instructed courts ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality’: ‘The general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . Thus, Turner’s reliance on decisions that ‘clarified that [First Amendment] protections ... extend[] to gathering information’ does not demonstrate whether the specific act at issue here—video recording the police or a police station—was clearly established. . . . The district court stated that circuit courts ‘are split as to whether or not there is a clearly established First Amendment right to record the public activities of police.’ The circuit courts are not split, however, on whether the right exists. The First and Eleventh Circuits have held that the First Amendment protects the rights of individuals to videotape police officers performing their duties. . . . In American Civil Liberties Union v. Alvarez, the Seventh Circuit explained that the First Amendment protects the audio recording of the police and concluded that an Illinois wiretapping statute, which criminalized the audio recording of police officers, merited heightened First Amendment scrutiny because of its burdens on First Amendment rights. . . No circuit has held that the First Amendment protection does not extend to the video recording of police activity, although several circuit courts have explained that the law in their respective circuits is not clearly established while refraining from determining whether there is a First Amendment right to record the police. . . We cannot say, however, that ‘existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate’ when Turner recorded the police station. . . Neither does it seem that the law ‘so clearly and unambiguously prohibited [the officers’] conduct that “every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates [the law].”’ . . In light of the absence of controlling authority and the dearth of even persuasive authority, there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner’s activities. All three officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Turner’s First Amendment claim. . . . Although the right was not clearly established at the time of Turner’s activities, whether such a right exists and is protected by the First Amendment presents a separate and distinct question. . . Because the issue continues to arise in the qualified immunity context, . . .we now proceed to determine it for the future. We conclude that First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . .We agree with every circuit that has ruled on this question: Each has concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record the police. . . .This right, however, ‘is not without limitations.’ . . Like all speech, . . filming the police ‘may be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.’ . . In this case, however, we need not decide which specific time, place, and manner restrictions would be reasonable. . . Nonetheless, we note that when police departments or officers adopt time, place, and manner restrictions, those restrictions must be ‘narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest.’ . . That said, to be constitutionally permissible, a time, place, and manner restriction ‘need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of serving the government’s interests.’”)

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 696-97 (5th Cir. 2017) (Clement, J., dissenting as to Parts III.A.2 & III.B.1.b) (“I respectfully dissent from the majority’s dicta purporting to clearly establish a First Amendment right to film the police and from the majority’s reversal of the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Officers Grinalds and Dyess regarding Turner’s unlawful arrest claim. . . .The majority does not determine that the officers here violated Turner’s First Amendment rights—perhaps because it would be reasonable for security reasons to restrict individuals from filming police officers entering and leaving a police station. Because the majority does not hold that the officers actually violated the First Amendment, ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances’ in the future will not have violated any clearly established law.”)

Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas, 848 F.3d 384, 392-94 (5th Cir. 2017) (“We agree with the district court that there was no actual probable cause for Davidson’s arrest. At the time Officers Flagg and Jones arrested Davidson, the only crime charged to Davidson was failure to identify under § 38.02. This is further confirmed in Davidson’s police report, which charged Davidson with failure to identify under § 38.02(a). But § 38.02(a) applies only when an officer ‘has lawfully arrested the person and requested the information.’ Tex. Penal Code § 38.02(a). At the time they performed the arrest for the alleged § 38.02 violation, Davidson was not under arrest for any other violation, thus, the ‘failure to identify’ statute clearly was not triggered. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly determined that the officers had no actual or ‘arguable’ probable cause for arresting Davidson under § 38.02. We consider whether they had probable cause under any other statute below. Turning to objective or ‘arguable’ probable cause, and taking the facts in the light most favorable to Davidson, it is clear that the officers were objectively unreasonable in believing that there was probable cause for Davidson’s arrest under the only other section posited here, § 42.03. Based on the information available to Officers Flagg and Jones, Davidson had not ‘render[ed] impassable or ... render[ed] passage unreasonably inconvenient or hazardous’ for Clinic patients. Tex. Penal Code § 42.03. . . .In addition to cases establishing the lack of probable cause, there was fulsome case law clearly establishing that an arrest without probable cause violates both First and Fourth Amendment rights at the time of Davidson’s arrest in 2013. Specifically, Officers Flagg’s and Jones’s conduct violated Davidson’s clearly established rights as demonstrated in federal case law. . . .These federal and state decisions make clear that Davidson’s arrest without probable cause was a violation of his First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . . On the second prong of the qualified immunity defense, recent Supreme Court decisions addressing claims for excessive force have ‘reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that “clearly established law” should not be defined “at a high level of generality.”’. . . Our cases outside the excessive force area involving warrantless arrests and limits on speech have not specifically mentioned this aspect of Supreme Court cases. . . . Assuming arguendo that the specific White/Mullenix admonition applies to all qualified immunity cases regardless of the constitutional violation charged, the officers here still come up short. The cases cited above clearly demonstrate what does and does not violate § 42.03 and also clearly establish the unconstitutionality of warrantless arrests without probable cause. Even if he had not been exercising core First Amendment rights, Davidson was not (even arguably) in violation of § 42.03 when he stood outside of the Clinic. Additionally, his right to protest prohibited the officers’ application of § 42.03 in the manner employed here. Resolving all factual disputes in favor of Davidson, the objective unreasonableness displayed by Officers Flagg and Jones in the face of law clearly establishing Davidson’s rights leads us to the conclusion that qualified immunity cannot shield their actions against Davidson. We conclude that in Davidson’s case, ‘every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates’ Davidson’s rights.”)

Cooper v. Brown, 844 F.3d 517, 524-25 (5th Cir. 2016) (“The undisputed facts establish that Brown’s use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . . To be clear, we do not say that any application of force to a compliant arrestee is per se unreasonable, and we do not opine on the line of reasonableness. Instead, we state only the obvious: Under the facts in this record, permitting a dog to continue biting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee is objectively unreasonable. . . .Cooper’s right was clearly established. Our caselaw makes certain that once an arrestee stops resisting, the degree of force an officer can employ is reduced. [discussing cases] In the same way, Cooper was not attempting to resist arrest or flee, and Brown had no reason to think that he posed an immediate threat. Moreover, the fact that Bush and Newman are not dog-bite cases does not shield Brown. ‘Lawfulness of force ... does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it.

Qualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.’ . . Thus, Brown had ‘fair warning’ that subjecting a compliant and non-threatening arrestee to a lengthy dog attack was objectively unreasonable.”)

Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2016) (“Valdez urges that, even if Anderson stated a retaliation claim, he (Valdez) is entitled to qualified immunity because neither Garcetti nor other relevant contemporary cases clearly established that speech made pursuant to a professional (here, ethical) duty is not speech made pursuant to an official duty. Anderson counters that Garcetti did nothing more than create a limited presumption that speech made by a public employee pursuant to an official duty is unprotected; it did not disrupt the presumption that speech made by a public employee is presumptively protected, including speech made pursuant to an ethical duty. . . . By at least 2014, it was clearly established that an employee’s speech made ‘externally’ concerning ‘an event that was not within [his or her] job requirements’ was entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Taking Anderson’s allegations as true, as we must at this stage of the litigation, Anderson alleges exactly what Cutler requires. First, Anderson alleges that he reported his concerns about Justice Valdez externally, viz., to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. . . Second, Anderson alleges that his complaint to the judicial conduct commission was outside of his job duties. Accepting Anderson’s allegations as true, Cutler decides this appeal. That is not to say that, by 2014, our law applying Garcetti spoke loudly regarding every factual circumstance. Indeed, just after Anderson spoke, the Supreme Court clarified Garcetti in Lane. . . . Lane plainly demonstrates that, following Garcetti, some First Amendment retaliation cases would still result in findings of qualified immunity. That is, Garcetti did not plainly establish all First Amendment retaliation law. Nonetheless, Cutler makes it apparent that Garcetti, and this court’s jurisprudence interpreting it, clearly established some law. The question is how much. Based on the allegations at issue here, Howell v. Town of Ball answers that question. . . There, the plaintiff alleged that he had been fired from his job as a town police officer for cooperating with an FBI investigation into public corruption. . . The plaintiff ‘emphasize[d] that, under the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Lane, the relevant question [was] whether the speech at issue [was] ordinarily within the scope of an employee’s duties.’ . . And, what job duties were ‘ordinary’ was critical to the court’s holding. The plaintiff ‘offered evidence that his involvement in the FBI investigation was outside the ordinary scope [of] his professional duties.’ . . The defendants pointed to the ‘general’ duty of all police officers to ‘detect and prevent crime.’ . . We found that the defendants’ evidence was inadequate because broad general duties ‘fail to describe with sufficient detail the day-to-day duties of a public employee’s job.’ . . Nonetheless, we determined that the individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. . . In doing so, we noted that ‘the Supreme Court did not emphasize that only speech made in furtherance of an employee’s “ordinary” job duties is not protected until nearly three years after [plaintiff] was discharged.’ . . . Reading Howell in the framework of Cutler properly synthesizes Lane’s effect on Garcetti. Namely, Garcetti and our court’s pre-Lane jurisprudence established that when employees speak outside of their chain of command and outside of their job duties they are entitled to First Amendment protection. . . Lane and Howell, however, indicate that some cases are too difficult to be determined pursuant to that rule. Even though in some cases employees might have a general employment duty to speak, that duty is not part of their ‘ordinary’ official duties, so their speech pursuant to that general duty is protected by the First Amendment. Equally clear, however, is that neither Lane nor Howell meaningfully altered the analysis required by Garcetti and Cutler when an employee’s allegations do not concern the distinction between ‘ordinary’ and ‘non-ordinary’ job duties. . . Here, there is not—and at the motion to dismiss stage there can never be—a meaningful factual dispute that implicates Lane’s ordinariness rule. . . Anderson alleges that his speech to the State Commission on Judicial Conduct was made outside of his chain of command and outside of his job duties. Perhaps at the summary judgment or trial phase facts will come to light that implicate Lane. Until then, however, the ordinariness rule simply does not implicate the right at issue here. Accordingly, under Cutler, Anderson has pleaded the violation of a clearly established right. Qualified immunity thus does not apply—at least, not yet.”)

Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 603-07 (5th Cir. 2016) (Jones, J., dissenting) (“I agree with the majority that even after Garcetti v. Ceballos, 547 U.S. 410, 126 S. Ct. 1951 (2006), Anderson has plausibly alleged a violation of his First Amendment rights. Unfortunately, that is the end of our agreement, because I disagree with the majority’s reasoning to this conclusion and would grant qualified immunity. . . . [T]he issue is more complex than the majority’s analysis acknowledges because, under the Texas Constitution, the Commission includes members of the public, . . . but its proposed sanctions against a judge are ultimately reviewable by the Texas Supreme Court. . . The Texas judiciary may thus be considered its own self-regulator. In this situation, Chief Justice Valdez’s argument is far from frivolous that Anderson’s complaint went up the ‘chain of command’ within the judiciary. Consequently, the ultimate constitutional status of Anderson’s speech, and thus his right to a First Amendment shield against employment consequences, are debatable. Debatable constitutional violations demand qualified immunity for public officials, even when this court is bound to conclude that a violation in fact occurred. . . For these reasons, even if Anderson’s allegations are proven to be true, I conclude that Chief Justice Valdez visited unconstitutional retaliation upon Anderson but the law was not ‘clearly established’ such that any ‘reasonable [judicial] official would understand’ that Anderson’s speech was constitutionally protected because it occurred outside the law clerk’s ‘chain of command.’”).

Cowart v. Erwin, 837 F.3d 444, 454-55 (5th Cir. 2016) (“We have little difficulty concluding that in 2009, the time of the incident, it was well-established, in sufficiently similar situations, that officers may not ‘use gratuitous force against a prisoner who has already been subdued ... [or] incapacitated.’ . . Reasonable officers had fair notice that such conduct under the circumstances violated Cowart’s right to be free from excessive force.”)

Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 857-59 (5th Cir. 2016) (“[E]ven if we assume that Huerta violated Gonzalez’s constitutional rights by detaining him without reasonable suspicion, we cannot say that this detention was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. . . Gonzalez argues that the law is clearly established that a police officer’s demand for identification constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment and must be based on reasonable suspicion. But this general claim—that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion—is precisely the type of ‘general proposition’ that the Supreme Court has rejected. See Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011). Instead, the Court has repeatedly emphasized the need to look at the specific facts of a case when determining qualified immunity. . . . With the more specific inquiry the Court requires, the question becomes whether there is either ‘directly controlling authority ... establishing the illegality of such conduct’ or ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful[.]’ . . . Here, it appears that Huerta’s decision to detain Gonzalez was based, at least in part, on his belief that Gonzalez was required to identify himself pursuant to § 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. [section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 provides: The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board’s control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person’s refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property.] And while prior Supreme Court cases have held that police may not detain an individual solely for refusing to provide identification, see Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. at 52, and Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, Humboldt County, 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004), neither of those cases dealt with incidents occurring on school property. This is no small distinction, as the Supreme Court has routinely reconsidered the scope of individual constitutional rights in a school setting. See, e.g., Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007); Vernonia Sch. Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985). Thus, we find that Brown—which Gonzalez relies on—and Hiibel do not meet the ‘sufficiently high level of specificity’ necessary ‘to put a reasonable official on notice’ that detaining an individual for a failure to provide identification on school property ‘is definitively unlawful.’ . . . Accordingly, we do not find that Huerta’s actions were ‘objectively unreasonable in light of a clearly established rule of law.’ . . . Huerta is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”) Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 859-61 (5th Cir. 2016) (Graves, J., dissenting) (“The majority essentially acknowledges that Huerta did not have a reasonable basis to detain Gonzalez, but then determines that the law is not clearly established. I disagree. As an initial matter, I would explicitly conclude that, under the totality of the circumstances, Huerta lacked reasonable suspicion to detain Gonzalez and, thus, violated his constitutional rights. Huerta received only a bare report that originated from an unknown third party of a ‘suspicious’ vehicle in the school parking lot and information of a recent history of automobile burglaries at the same location. Huerta did not receive any information connecting either Gonzalez or the ‘suspicious’ vehicle to that information. As the majority states, the scenario encountered by Huerta was akin to that in Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 52 (1979), and did not justify reasonable suspicion for a stop. As the majority further concludes, based on the totality of the facts and circumstances in this case, any suspicions held by Huerta should have been alleviated when he approached the vehicle. However, after a fairly thorough analysis outlining how Huerta violated Gonzalez’s constitutional rights without reasonable suspicion, the majority then determines that the very law it relies upon is not clearly established. . . . I cannot agree. Further, I disagree with any attempt to make the qualified immunity analysis so fact-specific that it would never be clearly established. Thus, I would conclude that Huerta’s detention of Gonzalez was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law. In so concluding, I disagree with the majority's characterization of Gonzalez's claim as a 'general proposition' rejected by the Supreme Court. Although the law is clearly established that a seizure under the Fourth Amendment must be based on reasonable suspicion, Gonzalez does not merely make a general claim. Instead, he asserts that a police officer's demand for identification constitutes such a seizure and must be based on reasonable suspicion based on the clearly established law of Brown. . . Further, even Huerta acknowledges that the applicable law here is well-settled. . . . The Supreme Court has definitively held that a police officer may not detain an individual he deems suspicious solely for refusing to provide identification, even under a state statute and in a neighborhood frequented by drug users, without reasonable suspicion. See Brown, 443 U.S. at 51-52; Tex. Penal Code Ann., Tit. 8, § 38.02. See also Hiibel v. Sixth Jud. Dist. Ct. of Nev., Humboldt Cty., 542 U.S. 177, 188 (2004). . . Despite the fact that the Supreme Court specifically said in al-Kidd that '[w]e do not require a case directly on point,' the majority concludes that school property is somehow different and there must be a case directly on point. . . The majority cites, as does Huerta, section 37.105 of the Texas Education Code. Section 37.105 says:

The board of trustees of a school district or its authorized representative may refuse to allow a person without legitimate business to enter on property under the board's control and may eject any undesirable person from the property on the person's refusal to leave peaceably on request. Identification may be required of any person on the property. . . . However, section 37.105 says nothing about any authority to detain an individual who does not immediately provide identification upon demand, but rather says only that a person may be ejected. Moreover, it is not clear that Huerta is either a member of the board of trustees of the school district or an authorized representative. Nonetheless, assuming that section 37.105 allowed Huerta to require that Gonzalez provide identification, it would have been unreasonable for Huerta to believe that he could then detain Gonzalez under that same section for failing to immediately do so. Huerta apparently agrees because he argues that he did not detain Gonzalez solely for failing to provide identification, but did so because he had a reasonable basis to suspect a connection between Gonzalez and recent car burglaries under what he refers to as the 'settled law' of Terry and Michelletti. Further, the district court decided the case on reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. But, as the majority's analysis reveals, the record does not support the existence of reasonable suspicion. Both Huerta and the district court attempted to distinguish Brown on the basis that Huerta had more specific information than the officer in Brown, not because Brown did not occur in a school parking lot. However, the record does not establish that Huerta had more information than the officer in Brown and the case law does not support the majority's conclusion that the law is not clearly established. For these reasons, I would reverse the grant of summary judgment on the illegal detention claim. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 669-70 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants argue . . . that the complaint cannot surmount the qualified immunity hurdle because there is no clearly established right to an air-conditioned cell or to around-the-clock medical care. Defendants' argument again misreads the complaint and confuses right with remedy. While the complaint does allege that TDCJ cells are not air-conditioned and that TDCJ fails to employ medical staff during nighttime hours, it does not claim that the Eighth Amendment requires such accommodations. Rather, the right that it asserts is the right to be free from exposure to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate remedial measures. The complaint's description of the lack of remedial measures does not purport to be an exhaustive list of the Eighth Amendment's basic requirements. It is simply a description of several ways in which Defendants could have addressed the risk, but instead chose not to do so. The right that it asserts, however, is the well-established Eighth Amendment right not to be subjected to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate ameliorative measures. Defendants also contend that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, — U.S. —, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015), bolsters their qualified immunity argument. It does not. . . . In sum, the Court found, even if the alleged shortcomings existed, 'no precedent on the books ... would have made clear to petitioners that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.' . . . Here, by contrast, assuming Hinojosa's allegations to be true, our precedent put Defendants on notice that they were 'overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.' . . . Our circuit has made very clear that inmates have a right, under the Eighth Amendment, not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures, and Defendants have not alerted us to any contrary authority.") Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 675-80, 683 (5th Cir. 2015) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("No one doubts the tragedy of a prisoner's life lost to heat stroke during a hot Texas summer. The question here, however, is not whether better prison policies or procedures might theoretically have prevented Hinojosa's death in the Garza West transfer unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice ("TDCJ"). As in all cases of qualified immunity, the question is whether the three top officials of the TDCJ ("Executive Defendants"), whose 111 institutions supervise over 150,000 prisoners at a time, must endure litigation and potential personal liability in damages for this prisoner's death because of some arguably defective 'condition of confinement.' . . . By the lights of Taylor, Mullenix, and many other Supreme Court decisions, the majority opinion is indefensible for two primary reasons. First, it defines the allegedly 'clearly established right' of Hinojosa in an overbroad and ambiguous way, the antithesis of what qualified immunity stands for. Qualified immunity is due these officials as a matter of law. Second, it affords credence to pleadings that are insufficient under Iqbal . . . to raise a question about these officials' liability under any circumstances. The pleadings thus failed to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . . Here, as in Taylor, the Executive Defendants were neither plainly incompetent nor knowing lawbreakers. The alleged actions of the Executive Defendants were not objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established law at the time of the violation, and they are entitled to immunity from suit. . . . The right to be free from extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures is too generalized to be of any use to the Executive Defendants in deciding what actions they should or should not take regarding system-wide policies. The qualified immunity doctrine is 'highly context-sensitive.' . . . And the Supreme Court has repeatedly and frequently instructed—recently with some exasperation—that courts should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . Instead, the right must be defined so that it is 'beyond debate' that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . The Supreme Court's guidance underlines the real world implications of the qualified immunity analysis. General principles are of limited use to prison officials who must often make difficult policy choices in highly fact-dependent situations. Because reasonable mistakes are inevitable in these settings, the ‘clearly established’ requirement protects mistaken judgments. . . . The parallels between Taylor and this case are obvious. Like the Third Circuit majority, the majority here affirm an Eighth Amendment right of medically vulnerable inmates not to be subjected to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures. Like the Third Circuit majority, the panel majority here approve a claim that these defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate’s serious medical needs because their policies failed to provide certain ‘adequate remedial measures’ or ‘measures like those’ mentioned in prior circuit case law. Moreover, as in Taylor, it is alleged that the Executive Defendants knew their system was inadequate because thirteen other inmates died from heatstroke in five years before Hinojosa’s death. The Taylor plaintiffs also explicitly alleged that the Delaware prison officials ‘were aware that the suicide rate in the Delaware prisons was above the national average.’. . . The majority’s analytical mistake in this decision is the same mistake made by the Third Circuit. . . . No prior Fifth Circuit case comes close to giving these Executive Defendants fair notice that they needed additional system-wide housing, medical, or intake policies to avoid running afoul of the Constitution and exposing themselves to personal liability. This court should grant the Executive Defendants’ motion to dismiss.”) Chavis v. Borden, 621 F. App’x 283, 286-87 (5th Cir. 2015) (“Unlike our sister Circuits, we have repeatedly declined to decide whether such a cause of action [state-created-danger claim] is viable in the Fifth Circuit. . . . Nevertheless, we have identified elements that a plaintiff would need to allege if we ever recognized the state-created danger doctrine. First, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant used his or her authority to create a dangerous environment. . . . Second, the plaintiff would have to allege that the defendant ‘acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.’. . . To establish deliberate indifference, the plaintiff must allege that (1) the environment created by the state actor was dangerous; (2) the state actor knew the environment was dangerous; and (3) the state actor used his or her authority ‘to create an opportunity that would not otherwise have existed for the third party’s crime to occur.’”. . . A number of our opinions also state that the plaintiff would also have to allege he or she was a ‘known victim’ of the state-created danger, rather than merely one of many foreseeable victims of the danger in question. . . . Chavis asks us to recognize the state-created danger theory without including the ‘known victim’ requirement as an element of the plaintiff’s prima facie case. . . . We have no occasion to consider whether a plaintiff must be a ‘known victim’ to prevail on a state-created danger claim, or, if so, whether Jones would qualify as a ‘known victim’ under these facts. Nor must we consider whether a state-created danger cause of action exists in this Circuit at all, or whether Chavis’s complaint properly alleges a constitutional violation. Assuming—without deciding—that Borden violated Jones’s substantive due process rights, we conclude that Borden did not violate a constitutional right that was ‘clearly established’ at the time of Jones’s tragic death. . . . As reckless and unprofessional as Borden’s alleged conduct was, none of our Circuit’s prior decisions gave Borden reasonable warning that leaving a drunk driver behind the wheel of his vehicle could violate another motorist’s substantive due process rights. . . . To the contrary, this Court previously held, in a case with relatively similar facts, that a police officer did not ‘offend due process by permitting an intoxicated driver to remain on the highway’ because his ‘decision, while imprudent and ultimately tragic, was not sufficiently willful and targeted toward specific harm to remove the case into the domain of constitutional law.’. . Chavis argues that it is not dispositive that our Circuit has never recognized the state-created danger theory because there is a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ from other Circuits that could support liability under these facts. It is true that this Court ‘may consider the law of other circuits when determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.’. . However, [t]he reluctance of this court ... to embrace some version of the state-created danger theory despite numerous opportunities to do so suggests that, regardless of the status of this doctrine in other circuits, a reasonable officer in this circuit would, even today, be unclear as to whether there is a right to be free from ‘state-created danger.’. . Thus, Chavis’s claim does not satisfy the ‘clearly established law’ element, so Borden is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 627 (5th Cir. 2015) (“Palmer argues she is entitled to qualified immunity because, in light of Beattie, the law was not clearly established that a mere recommendation of termination to a higher authority who makes the final decision causes an adverse employment action. We have already noted ambiguity as to the liability of a person for recommending an adverse employment decision. ‘The doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’. . It was unsettled at the time of Palmer’s actions, and remains so now, whether someone who is not a final decision-maker and makes a recommendation that leads to the plaintiff being harmed can be liable for retaliation under Section 1983. . . In fact, some clear statements in the caselaw have held there can be no liability. . . We conclude the claims against Palmer should be dismissed based on qualified immunity.”)

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App’x 190, 196 (5th Cir. 2015) (“[T]he Supreme Court recently repeated its warning against defining the law in question ‘at a high level of generality.’. . In doing so, the Supreme Court rejected the lower court’s reliance on a generalized assessment of the Graham factors for overcoming qualified immunity in an excessive force case—the same analysis the dissent employs to try and defeat qualified immunity here. . . Instead, to overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiff must identify case law clearly establishing that the ‘official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’. . Notably, the dissent is unable to point to case law with facts anywhere close to the particular circumstances involved here—the use of pepper spray to clear a road filled with protestors who vastly outnumbered law enforcement—that would have placed Darby on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Thus, viewing the facts through the deferential lens of qualified immunity and from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we conclude that Darby’s use of force was not objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. At a minimum, case law did not make it clear to every reasonable officer that use of pepper spray in this situation was unreasonable. . . The district court therefore properly granted summary judgment in Darby’s favor.”)

Singleton v. Darby, 609 F. App'x 190, 196-97, 206-07 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J. concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not reported) (“Regarding the Fourth Amendment claim, the majority incorrectly read the Supreme Court’s decision in Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372 (2007) to hold that in analyzing a motion for summary judgment in an excessive force case in which the record contains a videotape of crucial events in question, a court is not required to determine the relevant facts by adopting the plaintiff’s version of events and reading the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, but rather should decide whether the officer violated the Fourth Amendment solely in light of the facts depicted by the videotape. Scott v. Harris did not so hold. Rather, the Court so proceeded in that case only because the record contained a telling videotape that ‘blatantly’ and ‘utterly’ contradicted and discredited the plaintiff’s version of the facts, so that no reasonable jury could have believed him. . . In a case, such as the present one, in which the record with a videotape does not contradict, but instead corroborates, plaintiff Singleton’s version of the facts, the court is required to apply standard summary-judgment principles, including accepting the plaintiff’s version of the facts as the basis for its decision and viewing the record and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to her. The majority’s failure to do so skewed its entire decisional process, leading it to erroneously affirm the district court’s summary judgment. . . .At the time of the pepper-spraying incident, ‘[Singleton] had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force ... and it was clearly established that the amount of force that [Darby] could use depended on the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect posed a threat to the officer’s safety, and whether the suspect was resisting arrest or attempting to flee.’ . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Singleton, she and the other protesters posed no threat, were not resisting arrest, and were committing, at the very most, a non-violent, minor offense when Darby almost immediately and, without any warning that he would do so, resorted to the significant force of pepper spray. ‘While the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness test is “not capable of precise definition or mechanical application,” the test is clear enough that [Darby] should have known that he could not [use pepper spray against Singleton and the other protesters under the particular circumstances.]’ Bush v. Strain, 513 F.3d 492, 502 (5th Cir.2008) (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396). Accordingly, I would conclude that Darby is not entitled to qualified immunity on Singleton’s Fourth Amendment claim. In reaching the opposite conclusion, the majority erroneously contends that the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012 (2014), requires us to find a case with nearly identical facts to the particular circumstances here in order to conclude that Darby’s conduct violated ‘clearly established’ Fourth Amendment law. In so doing, the majority grossly misreads that decision and altogether ignores the long-established principle that the lodestar in qualified-immunity cases is whether officers had ‘fair warning’ that their conduct would violate a constitutional right. . . In Plumhoff, the Court held that police officers who shot the driver of a fleeing vehicle in order to end a dangerous car chase were entitled to qualified immunity. . . In conducting the ‘clearly established law’ prong of its qualified immunity analysis, the Court emphasized its precedents observing that deadly force cases ‘depend[] very much on the facts of each case,’ meaning that a pure application of the Graham and Garner factors may not be appropriate in such a case. . . Accordingly, in light of the unique fact that the officers utilized deadly force in response to a high-speed car chase, the Court held that Graham and Garner alone did not put the officers on notice that their conduct violated ‘clearly established’

Fourth Amendment law. . . Contrary to the majority’s position, Plumhoff does not eviscerate the long-established principle that a police officer is not entitled to qualified immunity where, as here, he has ‘fair warning’ based on existing precedents that his conduct would violate the constitutional rights of the plaintiff. . . Rather, as even a cursory review of Plumhoff reveals, the Court’s ‘clearly established law’ analysis pivoted entirely upon the unique fact that the case involved ‘deadly force’ in response to a dangerous ‘vehicular flight,’ . . . which is clearly not the case confronting us here. Indeed, unlike the instant case where there was no threat to Darby or the public whatsoever, the officers in Plumhoff ‘shot at Rickard to put an end to what had already been a lengthy, high-speed pursuit that indisputably posed a danger both to the officers involved and to any civilians who happened to be nearby.’ . . Moreover, in addition to ignoring these meaningful factual distinctions between Plumhoff and the instant case, the majority also errs in concluding that Plumhoff militates against applying a ‘generalized assessment of the Graham factors’ in order to conclude that Darby violated ‘clearly established’ Fourth Amendment law. Such logic further reflects the majority’s careless reading of Plumhoff. Plumhoff explicitly and repeatedly endorsed the Court’s earlier decision in Brousseau, wherein the Court made clear that, even in the fact-dependent context of deadly force cases, ‘Graham and Garner alone [can] offer a basis for decision’ that officers violated ‘clearly established’ Fourth Amendment law in ‘an obvious case.’ . As explained above, this is an obvious case: in response to the alleged commission of a non-violent and indisputably minor offense, Darby unleashed pepper spray into the face and eyes of an elderly woman without providing her any warning or opportunity to comply with his command and without attempting to first utilize any less severe alternative whatsoever. . . Given these egregious facts, a reasonable officer in Darby’s position would have ‘fair warning’ that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition on excessive force pursuant to both Supreme Court and this Circuit’s precedents.”)

Trent v. Wade, 776 F.3d 368, 382-84 (5th Cir. 2015), reh’g en banc denied, 801 F.3d 849 (5th Cir. 2015) (“We conclude that hot pursuit—unless accompanied by one of the specific justifications enumerated in Richards—does not justify a no-knock entry. Wade points to no authority to the contrary. The fact that the pursued in a hot pursuit is aware of the officer’s presence says nothing, without more, about the awareness of the other occupants of the home, all of whom are protected by the knock-and-announce rule. Therefore, the mere fact that the district court upheld the constitutionality of Wade’s search of the Trents’ home as one carried out in hot pursuit does not justify Wade’s failure to knock and announce. . . . As explained above, Wilson and Richards placed the knock-and-announce rule and the justifications for dispensing with it beyond debate. With respect to the justifications, any reasonable officer would know that he was violating the rule if he did not have reasonable suspicion that knocking and announcing would be dangerous or futile or that it would inhibit effective investigation of the crime. . . The rule and the justifications are therefore clearly established. . . Any reasonable officer would understand that, because the knock-and-announce rule serves to alert the occupants of a home of an impending lawful intrusion, the futility justification requires reasonable suspicion that the occupants of the home to be searched are already aware of the officer’s presence. The Fifth Circuit’s decision in Seelig and the Supreme Court’s decisions in Wilson and Richards gave Wade the ‘fair warning’ that the law requires. . .

Although the law in our circuit is not flush with cases explaining specific circumstances in which officers were or were not entitled to rely on the futility justification, the knock-and-announce rule and its accompanying reasonable suspicion requirement are clear. In light of the materiality of the genuine issues of fact regarding whether Wade violated clearly established Fourth Amendment rights when he entered the Trents' home without knocking or announcing his presence, the district court was correct to deny qualified immunity on this ground. The remaining fact issues must be resolved at trial.”), pet. for reh’g en banc denied, 2015 WL 5432089 (5th Cir. Sept. 14, 2015)

Wilkerson v. Goodwin, 774 F.3d 845, 858 (5th Cir. 2014) (“The Wade Defendants contend that, despite subsequent developments in the law, they were objectively reasonable in relying on the assumption in Wilkerson I that a liberty interest could not arise from an initial classification, regardless of the duration or indefiniteness of Woodfox’s solitary confinement. . . . However, the law did not freeze with the decision in Wilkerson I in 2003. As we have said, prior to the 2010 transfer of Woodfox, both our court and the Supreme Court had recognized that even if an initial security classification does not generally implicate a liberty interest, such an interest may arise where an initial classification is also attended by ‘extraordinary circumstances,’ that is, an ‘atypical and significant hardship.’. . . Woodfox was subjected to the sort of 23-hour-a-day in-cell confinement, limited physical exercise, limited human contact, and effectively indefinite placement that gave rise to a liberty interest in Wilkinson. Any differences between the Supermax conditions in Wilkinson and the CCR conditions at Wade are insufficient to render reasonable the conclusion that there is no liberty interest here. . . . In the circumstances of this case, no reasonable prison official could conclude that continuing four decades in indefinite solitary confinement would not implicate a liberty interest protected by due process.”)

Gibson v. Kilpatrick, 773 F.3d 661, 667-73 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Lane seems to us to be an application of prior Supreme Court precedent. It was, after all, undisputed in Lane that ‘Lane’s ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings.’. . . Garcetti had indicated that the mere fact that speech concerns information learned while performing official job duties does not preclude First Amendment protection. . . . More fundamentally, the Court’s reasoning in Pickering indicated that the high value of public employees’ contributions to civic discourse often derives from the knowledge they gain from their public employment, . . . a premise that was reiterated in Garcetti Given that precedent, Lane does not appear to have altered the standard for whether public employees speak pursuant to their official duties, but appears rather to be an application of Garcetti’s rule. Yet three aspects of the Lane opinion merit discussion, as they appear to offer the prospect of new law. The first is Lane’s injection of the word ‘ordinary’ into the ‘pursuant to official duties’ test. . . . The second is Lane’s discussion of the importance of public-employee speech in ferreting out public corruption. The third is Lane’s discussion of the affirmative legal obligation to testify truthfully in reasoning that the speech at issue was speech as a citizen. . . . Whatever may come of Lane’s use of the ‘ordinary’ modifier, at this point it likely has not altered the rule in Garcetti, at least not in any way that can be said to be clearly established. It was undisputed in Lane that the employee had not spoken pursuant to his official duties. . . . As such, there was no occasion for the Court to refine the standard for determining when an employee speaks pursuant to his official duties. Therefore, whatever change in the jurisprudence ‘ordinary’ may augur, we are unable to discern any change in Garcetti’s rule from Lane applicable to this case, for any change resulting from Lane cannot be said to have been ‘ “clearly established” at the time of the challenged conduct.’ Al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2080 (emphasis added). Second, we turn to Lane’s discussion of the context of public corruption and its impact on whether the speech in that case was protected by the First Amendment. Lane’s discussion of whether the plaintiff spoke as a citizen or as an employee concludes by addressing the necessity of public-employee whistleblowing in stemming public corruption. . . . We doubt that this discussion means that speech is ‘as a citizen’ whenever public corruption is involved, as that could conflict with the opinion in Garcetti. . . . In Lane, it was undisputed that the employee was not speaking as part of his ordinary job duties. . . . The testimony of public-employees is frequently necessary to prosecute public corruption. But it cannot be said to be strictly necessary that they be speaking pursuant to their official duties when they testify in order to prosecute public corruption. As such, it cannot be said that Lane’s discussion of public corruption alters Garcetti in a way that is clearly established for purposes of this case. Lastly, we must confront Lane’s discussion of the legal obligation to testify truthfully and its relation to classifying speech as citizen-speech. . . . Lane. . . relied upon an independent legal obligation to tell the truth. . . . Citing this discussion in Lane, Gibson points to 18 U.S.C. § 4 and Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552, 557–58 (1980), as establishing a similar duty of citizens to affirmatively report crime. But any such independent legal obligation is only relevant if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties; otherwise, his speech would be outside of Garcetti’s ambit regardless. And, fatally, if Gibson was speaking pursuant to his official duties and was under an independent legal obligation as a citizen to report crime, it would raise the question that Lane expressly declined to answer, that is, whether there are obligations as a citizen that preempt obligations as an employee for First Amendment purposes. . . . As such, we could not say that such a right was ‘clearly established’ at the time Gibson was allegedly retaliated against. Therefore, we turn to the central issue—whether Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties in reporting Kilpatrick’s use of the gas card to outside agencies. In making that inquiry, one of the factors that we have considered is whether the employee’s complaint was made within the chain of command or to an outside actor, such as a different government agency or the media. . . . [W]hen an employee’s official duties include communicating with outside agencies or the press, it would be in dissonance with Garcetti to conclude that, when he does so, he enjoys First Amendment protection. . . . Further, where, as here, the employee is reporting the misconduct of his supervisor, an outside agency may be the most appropriate entity to which to report the misconduct. . . . In turning to the instant case, we cannot say that Kilpatrick’s reprimanding Gibson for reporting the illegal use of the gas card to outside agencies violated Gibson’s clearly established constitutional rights. Gibson was the Chief of Police for the city, indicating that communicating with outside law enforcement agencies was part of his job responsibilities. The presumption is buttressed by Gibson’s admission that he reported his concerns about the gas card to law enforcement officers at the outside agencies whom he had met through his official duties. It is also supported by his statement in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he worked with the FBI and DEA as part of his role as Chief of Police. Further, Gibson’s statutory duties provide additional support to the notion that he was acting pursuant to his official duties. . . . While we cannot, and do not, rely on official job descriptions, even statutory ones, in applying Garcetti's rule, they can be instructive. . . . Moreover, the facts of this case make plain that Gibson was acting pursuant to his official duties when he made the reports to the OSA. For Gibson did not merely make a report to the OSA on his personal time after work. He met with the investigator in his office, he coordinated his department's resources with the OSA, and he instructed his employees to aid extensively in the investigation. All of this is compelling circumstantial evidence that Gibson reported the misuse of the gas card not as a citizen, but in his official capacity as Chief of Police. . . . The fact that what was being reported in this case was public corruption does not change the result—Garcetti's rule is a broad one, and it must be applied even where it may lead to a potentially distasteful result in an individual case. As such, any reprimand based on Gibson's reports to the OSA cannot be said to violate his clearly established constitutional rights. Similarly, reprimanding Gibson for his report to the Attorney General would not have violated his clearly established First Amendment rights. Gibson communicated his concerns about the gas card at the 'Chief of Police Conference' to the Mississippi Attorney General in person. He spoke with the Attorney General and others who were with him for about twenty minutes. Given that Gibson was attending a chief of police conference when he met with the Attorney General and expressed his concerns, it would not have been objectively unreasonable for Kilpatrick to believe Gibson made the report while performing his official duties. To the extent that additional facts could show that Gibson was not acting pursuant to his official duties when he made his report to the Attorney General, Gibson has failed to meet his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . . The reports to the FBI and DEA present a closer case. Gibson made a call to an FBI agent that he had met through his law enforcement work. He then met with two FBI agents, including the agent he already knew, at schools in Drew rather than at his office. He testified that he believed his report to the FBI was confidential. He also made his initial complaint to the DEA via telephone, then met with DEA agents, and agents from other federal law enforcement agencies, at the DEA office in Oxford, Mississippi, again not at his office in Drew. Gibson testified that he believed his report to the DEA was also confidential. Gibson did, however, testify that he had previously met the agents he contacted at the FBI and the DEA through his official duties. Further, he stated in a letter to the Mayor and Board of Aldermen that he generally worked with outside agencies, including the DEA and FBI, 'to help with crimes within the city of Drew.' Additional facts could elucidate Gibson's role when he made his complaints in this case. Whether he spoke with the agents during working hours, whether he was in uniform, and whether he offered the assistance of local law enforcement would all be instructive as to whether he acted pursuant to his official duties. But those facts are not present in the record, and, there being no genuine dispute as to the facts, we take record as it is. Given the lack of evidence clarifying Gibson's role when he made his reports to the FBI and the DEA, we hold that Gibson has not met his burden of producing evidence sufficient to show that Kilpatrick violated his clearly established constitutional rights, and, as such, summary judgment should have been granted for Kilpatrick. . . . We do not hold that, as the Chief of Police, any report of criminal activity Gibson made to outside agencies was part of his official duties. We hold only that Gibson has adduced insufficient evidence here to meet his burden of producing evidence showing that his reports here were made as a citizen rather than in his official capacity.

He has therefore failed to come forward with evidence showing that his clearly established constitutional rights were violated. As such, Gibson’s communications to the outside agencies in this case are distinguishable from previous cases in which we have held that communications outside the chain of command are speech as a citizen. Therefore, we cannot say that reprimanding Gibson for reporting violations of the law to outside law enforcement agencies violated his clearly established constitutional rights.”)

Stephen F. Austin State Univ., 767 F.3d 462, 472, 473 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Garcetti alone may not ‘clearly establish’ Cutler’s First Amendment right. Garcetti did not ‘articulate a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee’s duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.’. . . After all, Garcetti ‘did not explicate what it means to speak pursuant to one’s official duties, although we do know that a formal job description is not dispositive ... [,] nor is speaking on the subject matter of one’s employment.’. . . Several pre–2010 decisions have, however, given the Defendants the ‘fair warning’ they need. [discussing cases] These cases should have provided Defendants with a clear warning that terminating Cutler on the basis of his speech to Rep. Gohmert’s office—based on the undisputed facts and taking all reasonable inferences in Cutler’s favor—would violate Cutler’s First Amendment right. Assuming that Cutler’s account of his conversations with Rep. Gohmert’s office is credible, as we must do, Cutler’s speech was made externally to a staff member of an ‘elected representative[] of the people’ allegedly about participating in an event that was not within his job requirements. . . . Cutler spoke about concerns entirely unrelated to his job and from a perspective that did not depend on his job as a university employee, but rather emanated from his views as a citizen. . . . Therefore, reasonable officials in the Defendants’ position should have known on the basis of Charles and Davis that Cutler’s speech was protected as the speech of a citizen and that their decision to terminate Cutler on the basis of that citizen speech would violate Cutler’s First Amendment right.”)

U.S. ex rel. Parikh v. Brown, 13-41088, 2014 WL 3906268, *3, *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 11, 2014) (“Properly focused on the claim for payment here, the relevant pleading that we have taken as true is that Appellants knew their compliance certification was false. The key question, then, is whether the contours of the FCA were sufficiently clear at the time such that every reasonable official would have understood that—as Relators pleaded in their complaint—presenting claims for payment, while knowingly falsely certifying compliance with the AKS and Stark Law, violated the FCA. . . . Based on circuit precedent, we answer in the affirmative. . . . In light of our decision in Thompson, every reasonable official would understand that the FCA is violated when (1) ‘the government has conditioned payment of a claim upon a claimant’s certification of compliance with, for example, a statute or regulation,’ and (2) the official ‘falsely certifies compliance with that statute or regulation.’. . . This clearly established statutory right is precisely what Relators alleged Appellants to have violated. Accordingly, we hold that as a matter of law Brown and Campbell are not entitled to qualified immunity.”) viewpoint discrimination regarding private speech is unconstitutional.’ This assertion is generally true. Yet such a broad generalization is exactly the kind of proposition that will not suffice for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, as it simply does not provide the official with any sense of what is permissible under a certain set of facts. . . . When asked at oral argument to name a case that clearly establishes Morgan’s right to distribute the religious gifts, Morgan pointed to Chiu v. Plano Indep. Sch. Dist., 260 F.3d 330 (5th Cir.2001). Yet the case is inapposite. Chiu dealt with after-school meetings whose express purpose was to allow adults to discuss mathematics instruction. . . This Court held that-regardless of whether the meetings were properly classified as public forum or limited public forum-school officials could not prohibit the plaintiffs from distributing material related to certain curriculum options. . . It is difficult to imagine how Chiu establishes a specific rule applicable to this case. The present case does not involve an individual trying to contribute relevant materials to a public forum dedicated to adult dialogue. Instead, a parent asked whether he could distribute religious material during a classroom activity. So while Chiu may indeed be relevant in discerning the nature and extent of Morgan’s rights in the classroom, the case does not itself establish those rights, and its radically different factual context renders Chiu incapable of providing any meaningful guidance to an educator trying to handle First Amendment concerns arising out of a third-grade party. . . .After carefully considering Morgan’s arguments, we find that he has not identified any case clearly establishing the constitutional right asserted here. Nor are we aware of such a case. Where there is no authority recognizing an asserted right, and where the area of law is as ‘abstruse’ and ‘complicated’ as First Amendment jurisprudence, that right cannot be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . Accordingly, Morgan’s allegations are not sufficient to overcome Swanson’s qualified immunity defense. His claim is therefore properly dismissed.”)

Castro v. Cabrera, 742 F.3d 595, 599-602 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Before addressing qualified immunity, we decide the threshold question whether the Fourth Amendment applies to these detainees. As a general matter, it applies to aliens within U.S. territory. . .In Verdugo-Urquidez, however, the Court held, 494 U.S. at 261, that it does not apply to the search and seizure of nonresident aliens on foreign soil. . . Moreover, excludable aliens that have been denied entry into the United States, even when technically within U.S. territory, may be ‘treated, for constitutional purposes, as if stopped at the border.’ . . That is the doctrine of ‘entry fiction,’ which is applied to excludable aliens regarding the constitutionality of indefinite detention and, more specifically, the applicability of substantive and procedural due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. . . There are limitations to our application of entry fiction. In Lynch, we specifically confined it to the contexts of immigration and deportation and held that it ‘does not limit the right of aliens detained within the United States territory to humane treatment.’ . . For purposes of this exception, we have interpreted ‘humane treatment’ as being denied only in those cases involving ‘gross physical abuse.’ . . Therefore, if these detainees are excludable aliens stopped before entry into the United States and their claims arise in the context of immigration, the entry fiction applies and there is no violation of the Fourth Amendment. If, however, they were subject to wanton or malicious infliction of pain or gross physical abuse, the doctrine does not apply, and we consider whether Cabrera was entitled to qualified immunity. . . The detainees, however, were detained as excluded aliens for varying amounts of time—all ten hours or less—as their admissibility was being determined, a situation well within the immigration context. Additionally, neither of the claims involve physical abuse, let alone ‘gross physical abuse’ as in Lynch or Martinez–Aguero. Therefore, these claims fall squarely within the confines of entry fiction, and the Fourth Amendment is not applicable; the detention did not violate constitutional rights. . . and the district court properly dismissed these claims under Rule 12(b)(6). . . . Lastly, we decide whether the entry fiction applies to the detainees’ Fourth Amendment claim of excessive force through the use of harsh interrogation techniques. Although we held in Lynch and Martinez–Aguero that the entry fiction did not apply to the excessive-force claims under, respectively, the Fifth and Fourth Amendments, we did so because the fiction does not apply to ‘gross physical abuse at the hands of state or federal officials.’ . . The present detainees do not allege any physical contact but make bare assertions of ‘threats, insults, and false statements.’ These accusations, without any allegation of conduct that could be considered ‘gross physical abuse’ or the wanton or malicious infliction of pain, do not meet our standard for avoiding application of the entry fiction. . . Therefore, the fiction applies to the Fourth Amendment claim, which was properly dismissed. . . . Even if they individuals are in fact U.S. citizens, dismissal is proper because Cabrera enjoys qualified immunity, . . . as the district court convincingly discussed in its order of dismissal. The detainees point to no authority clearly establishing that Cabrera’s actions in detaining, even for as long as ten hours, individuals who presented facially valid documentation, plus the use of unspecified threats and insults during interrogation, violated the Constitution. . . Instead, the caselaw of the Supreme Court . . . and of this circuit, . . . as well as federal regulations, . . . are to the contrary. Therefore, the claims of any of the detainees who might be U.S. citizens were properly dismissed.”)

Marquez v. Garnett, 567 F. App’x 214, 217, 218 (5th Cir. 2014) (“Stripped of multiple conclusory statements in the amended complaint, the allegation here is that the student was sliding Garnett’s compact disc across a table during class time and Garnett reacted. As in Fee and Moore, the setting is pedagogical, and C.M.’s action was unwarranted. The inference must be that Garnett acted to discipline C.M., even if she may have overreacted. . . . Because Marquez’s pleadings demonstrate corporal punishment rather than a mere attack, the only remaining question is the sufficiency of state remedies. The parties do not dispute that, as we found in Fee and Moore, Texas provides criminal and civil remedies to parents like Marquez. . . . In this case, Garnett was charged in state court with assault causing bodily injury, was placed on administrative leave, and was required to surrender her teaching certificate in response to her conduct. Marquez has not shown that C.M.’s substantive due process rights were violated . . . Fifth Circuit law squarely forecloses Marquez’s claim against Garnett. Accordingly, she was entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Estate of C.A. v. Castro, 547 F. App’x 621, 2013 WL 6155819, *4 (5th Cir. Nov. 25, 2013) (“In addition to the Agwuokes’ failure to make out a cognizable constitutional violation, Castro and Coronado are entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established. The Agwuokes claim that the individual defendants did more than fail to protect C.A. from the inherent dangers of swimming pool: they planned and approved a school project that placed students in a dangerous environment, and did so in a manner that disregarded reasonable and legally required safety measures. . . . Applying this case’s facts to the standard set forth in al-Kidd and Kinney, the Agwuokes would need to demonstrate that reasonable teachers and school officials were on notice that designing and executing a high school science experiment involving a pool violated the constitutional right to life of any student that may drown. The Agwuokes do not identify ‘controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’. . . Instead, they note merely that C.A. had a ‘right to life’ under the Fourteenth Amendment, which the individual defendants allegedly violated through their deliberately indifferent conduct. This falls short of the requirement to show ‘defendants’ actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the law that was clearly established at the time of the actions complained of.’. . . We hold that, even assuming a constitutional violation, the individual defendants were not on notice that their conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right because no case has found a violation under similar facts.”)

McCreary v. Richardson, 738 F.3d 651, 658, 659 (5th Cir. 2013) (“Strip searches have been upheld as constitutional even when conducted in non-private areas in the presence of non-essential personnel, see Elliott, 38 F.3d at 190–92, or on male prisoners in the presence of female officers, see Letcher, 968 F.2d at 510; Tasby v. Lynaugh, 123 F. App’x 614, 615 (5th Cir.2005). Given the present case law in this circuit, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable officer would believe that a public strip search conducted by a male officer on a male offender in the presence of females after an equally public disruption was contrary to clearly established law. Precedent does not clearly establish that a reasonable officer could not perform the strip search in the most efficient manner possible without abandoning his post—the location where the incident occurred. . . . Richardson accordingly deserves qualified immunity relating to Fourth Amendment claims concerning the public nature of the strip search.”)

Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 503-06, 508-10 (5th Cir. 2013) (“Under the Fifth Circuit standard, the doctrine of qualified immunity protects government officials from civil damages liability when they reasonably could have believed that their conduct was not barred by law, and immunity is not denied unless existing precedent places the constitutional question beyond debate. . . . When deciding whether the right allegedly violated was ‘clearly established,’ the court asks whether the law so clearly and unambiguously prohibited the conduct that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates the law. . . . Answering in the affirmative requires the court to be able to point to ‘controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’. . . This requirement establishes a high bar. When there is no controlling authority specifically prohibiting a defendant’s conduct, the law is not clearly established for the purposes of defeating qualified immunity. . . . The Fifth Circuit has never held that a person has a constitutionally-protected privacy interest in her sexual orientation, and it certainly has never suggested that such a privacy interest precludes school authorities from discussing with parents matters that relate to the interests of their children. . . . Therefore, when the magistrate judge in this case held that there is a constitutional right that bars the unauthorized disclosure by school coaches of a student’s sexual orientation to the student’s mother, he proclaimed a new rule of law. . . . In summary, then, when we consider ACLU of Miss. and Fadjo, neither is established—much less clearly established—authority for the claims presented here. It is of major significance that neither occurred in the context of public schools’ relations with their students and the students’ parents. We therefore hold there is no controlling Fifth Circuit authority—certainly not with ‘sufficient particularity’—showing a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment privacy right that prohibits school officials from communicating to parents information regarding minor students’ interests, even when private matters of sex are involved. . . . In our case today, the trial court cited other cases from outside the circuit on its way to denying summary judgment to the coaches. Perhaps the most salient distinguishing factor in all these cases is that none occurred in a school context; together, they establish only the simple and unsurprising proposition that individuals generally can have a privacy interest in some personal ‘sexual matters,’ a broad, general proposition with which we do not take issue. . . . None of these cases approximate the factual context we have before us, and none of them provide any guidance regarding the crucial question: whether a student has a privacy right under the Fourteenth Amendment that forbids school officials from discussing student sexual information during meetings with parents. . . . In sum, then, we hold that Wyatt has not alleged a clearly established constitutional right—drawn either from the Supreme Court’s jurisprudence, from our own precedent or from that of other circuits—that the coaches violated To summarize our opinion today: we hold that the magistrate judge erred in denying Newell and Fletcher summary judgment on the claims of qualified immunity. It was error because there is no Supreme Court or Fifth Circuit case that clearly establishes or even suggests that a high school student has a Fourth Amendment right that bars the student from being questioned by coaches in a locker room or a Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy that bars a teacher or coach from discussing the student’s private matters with the student’s parents. Fletcher and Newell were entitled to qualified immunity for this suit with respect to the federal claims, because, based on undisputed facts, there was no violation of a clearly established federal right.”)

Wyatt v. Fletcher, 718 F.3d 496, 513, 514 (5th Cir. 2013) (Graves, J., dissenting) (“At least five other circuits have recognized a right of privacy regarding personal sexual matters. [collecting cases] Based on the applicable case law set out above, there clearly exists a right to privacy regarding one’s sexual orientation. The findings of the United States Supreme Court and six Circuit Courts of Appeal (including the 5th) that information of a sexual nature is intrinsically private is more than a ‘simple and unsurprising proposition.’ Additionally, the school context does not defeat the very existence of a right, but rather comes into play with regard to a balancing test and whether the government’s interest outweighs a student’s privacy right.”) Waganfeald v. Gusman, 674 F.3d 475, 486 (5th Cir. 2012) (“There is no doubt that Appellees suffered terribly while held in custody after Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. It is equally clear, however, that (1) Gusman’s failure to release Appellees falls within the emergency exception to the rule that a probable cause determination must be made within 48 hours, and (2) Hunter’s failure to allow Appellees to use cell phones was not objectively unreasonable in light of any clearly established law. We therefore reverse and vacate the judgment of the district court, and remand with instructions to enter judgment in favor of Gusman and Hunter on all claims asserted by Appellees.”)

Bishop v. Arcuri, 674 F.3d 456, 466, 467 (5th Cir. 2012) (“In sum, neither Arcuri’s concerns for evidence preservation nor for officer safety amounted to reasonable suspicion based on particular facts, so exigent circumstances did not justify his team’s no-knock entry of Appellants’ home. The entry therefore violated Appellants’ Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that the no-knock entry led by Arcuri violated Appellants’ Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches, we now turn to the second prong of qualified-immunity analysis: whether Arcuri’s conduct was objectively unreasonable under established law. . . . At the time of the search, the Supreme Court’s unanimous decision in Richards rejecting a blanket exception to the knock-and-announce requirement for narcotics searches had been on the books for twelve years. As discussed above, Arcuri’s proffered justifications for his team’s no-knock entry—evidence preservation and officer safety—were based primarily on generalities rather than particularized suspicion, and his position is therefore virtually indistinguishable from the type of blanket rule repudiated in Richards. Moreover, multiple decisions of this circuit, and of the Texas state courts [footnote omitted] have reinforced the applicability of the knock-and-announce requirement to searches indistinguishable from the one conducted on Appellants’ home. Arcuri’s no-knock entry of Appellants’ home, based only on generalized concerns about evidence preservation and officer safety, violated clearly established law and was therefore unreasonable. . . . Because the rights violated by Arcuri’s team were well-established at the time of the raid, Arcuri’s actions were unreasonable, and he is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Cantrell v. City of Murphy, 666 F.3d 911, 921 (5th Cir. 2012) (“Taking the allegations in the Cantrells’ complaint as true, we conclude that they have failed to satisfy their burden of demonstrating the inapplicability of the Officers’ qualified immunity defense. In their brief, they fail to cite any cases involving sufficiently similar situations that would have provided reasonable officers with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to a young child [who was strangled when he became entangled in a soccer net] when they temporarily physically separate the child from his mother. While the Cantrells analogize to cases involving foster care in arguing that Matthew’s putative right was clearly established, this line of cases is materially distinguishable, and therefore could not have provided reasonable officials in the Officers’ position with notice that they had an affirmative constitutional duty to provide medical care and protection to Matthew. Stated differently, Matthew’s asserted right was not clearly established on October 2, 2007.”)

Juarez v. Aguilar, 666 F.3d 325, 336 (5th Cir. 2011) (“Appellants have not shown their entitlement to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. Appellee’s retaliation claim is straightforward. He alleges that because he informed the FBI of illegal activities, the Appellants entered into an agreement not to extend Appellee’s contract. Assuming Appellee’s allegations are true, . . . such conduct would fall well within the clearly established elements of retaliation in violation of Appellee’s First Amendment rights. With respect to the issues we can consider on this appeal, the only distinction between this case and the previous cases we have decided is the fact that Appellants did not formally vote when making the alleged adverse employment decision. That this court has not previously considered an identical fact pattern does not mean that a litigant's rights were not clearly established. . . As long as the officials received fair notice that their conduct violated the litigant's rights, the right was clearly established. . . In this case, it would have been unreasonable for the Appellants to believe that the absence of a formal vote would absolve them of liability. As we explained above, the conclusion that informal actions can result in liability follows clearly from the precedent of this court and the Supreme Court. This was sufficient to provide Appellants with fair notice that even an informal decision to retaliate against Appellee would violate Appellee's First Amendment rights. Accordingly, the district court did not err when it denied summary judgment on Appellants' qualified immunity defense.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Benevides, J.) ("Before discussing the substantive law in this case, we turn to first principles to guide our determination of what it means for the law to be 'clearly established.' . . .Where no controlling authority specifically prohibits a defendant's conduct, and when the federal circuit courts are split on the issue, the law cannot be said to be clearly established. This is true even when the circuit split developed after the events in question. . . . The Supreme Court's admonition in Al-Kidd that we should not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality' sits in tension with its earlier statement in Hope v. Pelzer that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning,' at least in a certain category of 'obvious' cases. In Hope, the Court noted that the general Eighth Amendment prohibition against the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain 'arguably' gave the defendants 'fair warning' that it was unconstitutional to strip a prisoner shirtless and chain him to a hitching post (a painful stress position) for seven hours in the Alabama sun. But the Court's suggestion that generalizations can sometimes clearly establish the law was dicta; the Court did not rest its qualified-immunity decision on such a broad statement. It relied instead on binding circuit precedent prohibiting extremely similar conduct, including 'handcuffing inmates to the fence and to cells for long periods of time.' . . .The Al-Kidd Court, in admonishing lower courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' did not discuss or even cite Hope, nor other earlier opinions reflecting a similar concern that a damages remedy be available for 'obvious' or flagrant constitutional violations. This silence is puzzling given that Al-Kidd reversed a Ninth Circuit decision denying immunity in reliance on Hope. Adding to the perplexity is that, in its next major 'clearly established' opinion after Hope, the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity because there were no cases that 'squarely govern[ed].' That said, this case does not call on us to decide whether the Court's statements in Hope survive Al-Kidd: the constitutional issue in this case is far from 'beyond debate,' as evidenced by a large body of oft-conflicting case law and the variety of opinion among members of this Court. We leave for another day the question of whether and when a constitutional violation may be so 'obvious' that its illegality is clear from only a generalized statement of law." [footnotes omitted])

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 391-94 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Dennis, J., specially concurring in parts and not joining in other parts) ("I . . . do not join fully in Part IV.A of Judge Benavides’ opinion because I disagree with one of its premises in discussing clearly established law. Specifically, I disagree with the blanket statement that ‘generalizations and abstract propositions are not capable of establishing the law.’ . . . [T]he Hope Court reversed the court of appeals not only because it reached the wrong result on qualified immunity based on prior circuit precedent, but also because it had wrongly applied the ‘materially similar’ standard in reaching that result. Indeed, the Court first held that the fair warning standard from Lanier should be used to evaluate whether the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity, and then applied that standard to conclude that they were. . . . Therefore, the Court’s pronouncements on the fair and clear warning standard were an essential part of its holding in Hope. Moreover, in the years since Hope, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed this principle. . . . The Supreme Court’s recent decisions in Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020 (2011), and Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011), do not overrule Hope, Lanier, or any case in that line. In fact, the majority in neither al-Kidd nor Camreta mentions them, and Justice Kennedy’s concurrence in al-Kidd cites Lanier affirmatively as supporting the ‘fair and clear warning’ rule. . . . In sum, pursuant to the line of cases described above, I believe that certain official conduct may so obviously fall within the prohibition of a general or abstract rule of the Constitution that any reasonable official would have ‘fair warning’ that his actions are unconstitutional, even absent a prior court decision to that effect. However, I agree with Judge Benavides that this case does not present a situation where the defendants had fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional, for substantially the reasons given by Judge Benavides in his opinion.”)

Swindle v. Livingston Parish School Bd., 655 F.3d 386, 401 (5th Cir. 2011), reh’g en banc denied, 662 F.3d 328 (5th Cir. 2011) (“[I]t has been clear since Goss that when state law directs local authorities to provide public education, a student’s ‘total exclusion from the educational process’ must be accompanied by the procedural protections required by the Due Process Clause. . . . In Nevares and Harris, this court made clear that no deprivation of the liberty and property interests associated with public education occurs when a student is removed from her regular school environment and transferred to an alternative education program. . . . In a disciplinary alternative education model like those in Nevares in Harris—and like the Louisiana statutory scheme at issue here. . . . a student’s expulsion from her regular school does not deny her access to the educational process, because she continues to receive a public education in the form of alternative programming. . . . Under these decisions, a constitutionally relevant deprivation occurs when an official denies a student access to alternative education to which she has an entitlement based on state law We conclude that these ‘precedents ... placed ... beyond debate,’ [citing Ashcroft v. Al-Kidd] the question of whether procedural due process safeguards had to be complied with in connection with Pope’s refusal to permit Morgan access to alternative education.”)

Good v. Curtis, 601 F.3d 393, 400-02 (5th Cir. 2010) (“In the instant case, Curtis is alleged to have intentionally secured a false identification that produced a wrongful conviction in retaliation for a suspect’s failure to cooperate in an unrelated matter—a Malley ‘knowing violation of the law.’ . . . In keeping with Geter I and II, we conclude that knowing efforts to secure a false identification by fabricating evidence or otherwise unlawfully influencing witnesses constitutes a violation of the due process rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. A plaintiff need not undertake the impossible task of satisfying the Brathwaite test where an officer's intentional conduct was designed to artificially produce precisely the sort of witness certainty that otherwise justifies the admission of suggestive lineups and the criminal defendant has been exonerated in the meantime. Moreover, we find that any reasonable official would know that framing an individual for a crime they did not commit by securing such an identification represents a constitutional violation. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed on his Fourteenth Amendment claim. With respect to the Fourth Amendment, Curtis's efforts to secure Good's arrest notwithstanding the fact that Curtis affirmatively knew he manufactured probable cause constituted a clearly established violation of Good's Fourth Amendment rights at the time of the arrest such that the appeal on this claim must also be dismissed.").

Wernecke v. Garcia, 591 F.3d 386, 399, 400 (5th Cir. 2009) ("In the light most favorable to the Werneckes, a reasonable person would not believe that an immediate danger would be posed by JW and JW remaining in the home. Therefore, the Werneckes have asserted a Fourth Amendment violation by Garcia. Although the Werneckes have asserted a constitutional violation, the question whether the applicable law was clearly established remains. The Werneckes argue that the general contours of the Fourth Amendment sufficed to give 'fair warning' to reasonable officials of the alleged unlawfulness of the seizure of the boys. Although '[i]t could plausibly be asserted that any violation of the Fourth Amendment is "clearly established,"' we recall that 'the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity before a court can determine if it was clearly established.' . . . Therefore, we must consider the state of the clearly established law in 2005 and whether it gave TDFPS employees 'fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs was] unconstitutional.' . . . As of June 1, 2005, Fifth Circuit precedent clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governs social workers' investigations of allegations of child abuse. . . We indicated in Roe v. Texas Department of Protective & Regulatory Services that '[s]ocial workers retain the power to seize a child if exigent circumstances" exist; if they have reason to believe that life or limb is in immediate jeopardy," they need not obtain a court order.' . . . The quoted language from Roe, combined with the reference to 'evidence of danger' in Wooley, clearly established that, at the very least, some evidence of imminent danger to a child was required to justify a warrantless seizure. . . Officials do not receive the protection of qualified immunity when 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [of the challenged act is] apparent,' and in the light of Roe and Wooley, Garcia's actions (as alleged by the Werneckes) were clearly unlawful. . . . On the facts as stated by the Werneckes, Fifth Circuit law clearly established in June 2005 that the warrantless seizure of the Wernecke boys—in the absence of any imminent danger—was a constitutional violation.").

DePree v. Saunders, 588 F.3d 282, 288 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Because this court has not formally applied Burlington to First Amendment retaliation claims, the interrelation among Harrington, Dorsett, and Burlington yields no 'clearly established law' that Saunders would have known she was violating by revoking DePree's teaching duties and access to the business school. At most, these cases create a fact issue [as] to whether DePree suffered a material adverse employment action. Similarly, no clearly established law dictated that Saunders could not impose discipline, notwithstanding a few references to DePree's 'speech,' in light of the uniform reports about his intimidating and disruptive behavior. In sum, this court cannot conclude that Saunders's action was objectively unreasonable, 'assessed in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.'").

Brown v. Miller, 519 F.3d 231, 327, 238 (5th Cir. 2008) ("We . . . hold that the deliberate or knowing creation of a misleading and scientifically inaccurate serology report amounts to a violation of a defendant's due process rights, and that a reasonable laboratory technician in 1984 would have understood that those actions violated those rights. The district court did not err in denying qualified immunity on this theory. . . . Brown also alleges that Miller concealed, suppressed, or destroyed lab results that were conclusively exculpatory with respect to Brown. The Supreme Court held in Brady v. Maryland that a criminal prosecutor's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant violates a defendant's right to a fair trial. . . . A police officer's deliberate concealment of exculpatory evidence violates this same right, and can give rise to liability under § 1983. . . . By 1967, a public official's concealment of exculpatory evidence was a constitutional violation in this circuit. . . . Therefore, the law was sufficiently clear in 1984 that a state crime lab technician would have known that suppression of exculpatory blood test results would violate a defendant's rights. Miller does not argue otherwise. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in denying the qualified immunity defense on this theory.")

Bolton v. City of Dallas, 472 F.3d 261, 266 (5th Cir. 2006) ("Although we now conclude that ' 5 of the Dallas City Charter creates a vested property right in employment at a former rank for executive-level officials, this decision is not apparent from Muncy. There we were considering a due process claim in the context of demotion, but we stated that executive rank officials are 'employees at will, and the city was free to discharge them without cause.' . . . If we are to respect the principle underlying qualified immunity to the effect that officials must be able reasonably to 'anticipate when their conduct may give rise to damages,' we cannot hold an official liable for taking action that was arguably supported by decisions of this court. . . . Bolton's claim against Benavides in his personal capacity must be dismissed based on qualified immunity, because reasonable public officials could have differed on whether discharging Bolton would violate his constitutional rights.'").

Williams v. Ballard, 466 F.3d 330, 333 (5th Cir. 2006) ("The fundamental question is whether the state of the law gave defendants fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Because at the time there was no binding precedent clearly establishing the right, we must determine if other decisions at the time showed 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' . . . As the district court noted, in 1998 only the Ninth Circuit had recognized a non-sex offender's right against mandatory sex-offender registration and treatment as a condition of parole, . . . and it unsurprisingly held the law not clearly established Moreover, another Ninth Circuit panel that same year declined to recognize a non-sex offender's right against registration under a community notification statute as a condition of parole. . . We cannot conclude from this that Williams’s right was clearly established.”).

Porter v. Ascension Parish School Board, 393 F.3d 608, 620 (5th Cir. 2004) (“Because Adam’s drawing was composed off-campus, displayed only to members of his own household, stored off-campus, and not purposefully taken by him to EAHS or publicized in a way certain to result in its appearance at EAHS, we have found that the drawing is protected by the First Amendment. Furthermore, we have found that it is neither speech directed at the campus nor a purposefully communicated true threat. However, a reasonable school official facing this question for the first time would find no ‘pre-existing’ body of law from which he could draw clear guidance and certain conclusions. Rather, a reasonable school official would encounter a body of case law sending inconsistent signals as to how far school authority to regulate student speech reaches beyond the confines of the campus. Given the unsettled nature of First Amendment law as applied to off-campus student speech inadvertently brought on campus by others, the contours of Adam’s right to First Amendment protection in the present case cannot be deemed ‘clearly established’ such that it would be clear to a reasonable EAHS official that sanctioning Adam based on the content of his drawing was unlawful under the circumstances. Thus, Braud is entitled to qualified immunity. Even if Adam’s rights were clearly established at the time of his expulsion, Braud’s determination that the drawing was not entitled to First Amendment protection was objectively reasonable. The Supreme Court has observed that, even when a particular legal doctrine is clearly established, ‘[i]t is sometimes difficult for an [official] to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the [official] confronts.’ . . . The record indicates that, at the time he recommended Adam for expulsion, Braud was aware that Adam was responsible for the drawing, that the drawing was two or three years old, and that the drawing had been brought to Galvez Middle School by Adam’s younger brother. These facts raise the subtle but important legal questions of whether the drawing constitutes on-campus speech, or an intentionally communicated threat. Although we have answered both of these queries in the negative, we cannot say that all reasonable school officials facing these circumstances would reach the same conclusion.”).

Collins v. Ainsworth, 382 F.3d 529, 544, 545 5th Cir. 2004) (“For essentially the same reasons we find no error in the district court’s denial of qualified immunity against Ainsworth on the Fourth Amendment issue, this Court agrees with Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs presented evidence that after failing to dissuade the Concert sponsors from proceeding with their plans for the 2 Live Crew event, Ainsworth chose to erect an indirect (but fully effective) bar in the guise of a facially valid pair of driver’s license checkpoints on either side of OPG Road, flanking the only entrance to Collins Field. By setting up these checkpoints to stop the Concert from taking place, Ainsworth abused his discretionary power to deny in advance the use of Collins Field for First Amendment-protected musical expression and association. No procedural safeguards were put in place to prevent censorship of legitimate speech and music. Therefore, we find Ainsworth’s use of the driver’s license checkpoints amounted to an impermissible prior restraint on the Concert. Most Plaintiffs thus have clearly alleged a constitutional violation by Ainsworth. As to most Plaintiffs, we find under these circumstances that no sheriff could reasonably believe his actions aimed at stopping the Concert were legal and would entitle him to qualified immunity.”).

Hart v. Texas Dep’t of Criminal Justice, No. 03-40274, 2004 WL 1682757, at *4, *5 (5th Cir. July 26, 2004) (not for publication) (“In fact, the Hope Court’s discussion of ‘clearly established’ constitutional rights casts serious doubt on the continued viability of the rigid standard laid down in Pierce v. Smith and Thompson v. Upshur County. In Hope, the Supreme Court expressly disapproved of Eleventh Circuit precedent requiring that ‘the facts of previous cases be ‘materially similar’ ‘to the situation before the reviewing court, explaining that ‘[t]his rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard ... is not consistent with our cases.’ This is significant because Pierce, the foundation of our own rigid standard on the ‘clearly established law’ question, itself borrowed that standard from Lassiter v. Alabama A & M University, Board of Trustees—a case specifically noted by the Hope Court as being inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent. Thus, Hope pushes us toward a more general description of the constitutional right at issue both by describing a level of specificity lower than that we have used in the past, and by undermining the case law that originally established the more rigid standard and thereby eroding the foundations of our precedent on this point. It is in this context that we must consider whether the right at issue in the instant case was ‘clearly established.’ As we must take the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, the real question is whether a public official in charge of inmate medical care may ignore system-wide problems—especially when they are repeatedly brought to her attention by another similarly credentialed public official—that threaten the health and safety of inmates, thereby (as Hall has alleged) knowingly, i.e. consciously, pursuing a path of complete inactivity—affirmatively deciding to do nothing— in the face of these problems. We must ask rhetorically whether the more general formulations of the Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care give ‘fair and clear warning’ that such inaction is impermissible, despite the ‘novel factual circumstances’ of the instant case. We think that they do. Were we to define the right at issue as narrowly as Dr. Adams urges, we would, in effect, be freezing the law as it exists today. No plaintiff could ever successfully allege a violation of a constitutional right, as long as the violation was perpetrated in even a slightly new and unusual way. This appears to be exactly the situation about which the Hope Court was concerned.” [footnotes omitted]).

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 371, 372 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (“While some of the relevant First Amendment retaliation precedents in place in the fall of 1998 involved schools . . . and others of them . . . have involved police departments, we concede that our past cases do not include one that has specifically addressed retaliation against instructors at a police academy. We do not see the absence of such a case as an embarrassment to our conclusion that the Police Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity. If we accepted the defendants’ view of what it means for the law to be clearly established, qualified immunity would be available in almost every case, even those cases in which ‘in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [was] apparent,’ Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640. As the Supreme Court has recently admonished, ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Although we are sensitive to the fact that reasonable officials might not always be able to predict the outcome of a balancing test such as that used in Pickering cases, . . . we believe that in this case the illegality of the Police Officials' conduct is sufficiently clear that they can fairly be said to have been on notice of the impropriety of their actions. Indeed, given the factual disputes identified by the district court and taking the plaintiffs' side of those disputes, this case does not require any real balancing at all, for the Police Officials do not have any relevant, legitimate interests to put on their side of the Pickering scales. Our cases show that it is entirely appropriate to deny qualified immunity when the balance of cognizable interests weighs so starkly in the plaintiff's favor.").

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 398 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (Jolly, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent and agree with Judges Jones and Barksdale that the defendant law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity and should be released from personal liability. It seems disingenuous to hold that the law is clearly established when it takes 20,467 words to explain, and when six United States Court of Appeals judges sharply disagree about it. To my way of reasoning, the majority has turned the words, and the doctrine, of 'clearly established' on its head when it denies immunity in this novel case.").

Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1007, 1011, 1012 (5th Cir. 2003) ("In sum, Ybarra, Stewart and Watt dispel any doubt that the law was clearly established by the night of the raid in April, 1995, that strip searching individuals, about whom the police had no individualized probable cause of weapon or drug possession, was unlawful. . . .Although we hold today that the prolonged detention of plaintiffs was unlawful, we nonetheless agree with the district court that qualified immunity shields Harris from liability. Even though Summers does not sanction Harris's conduct, neither did it establish a clear rule warning defendants that such conduct was illegal. . . . In the instant case, there is no doubt that the illegal strip search of plaintiffs corrupted the legality of their detention by extending it unnecessarily. Still, the objective unreasonableness of Harris's conduct in ordering a strip search of plaintiffs does not automatically make his conduct in unduly detaining plaintiffs for the duration of the search objectively unreasonable in and of itself. Whereas Ybarra established the clear rule that any full search of plaintiffs required individualized probable cause, Summers allows a seizure without probable cause when the proper balance is struck between law enforcement and personal security interests. Thus, Summers left the state of the law more ambiguous as to what constituted an unlawful detention in a premises search like the one here. In other words, under the law as it existed in April, 1995, Harris had fair warning that his generalized law enforcement safety interests did not justify strip searching plaintiffs; the law was less clear about whether these same interests were sufficient to permit detention of plaintiffs until the completion of the otherwise unlawful search. We agree with the district court's grant of qualified immunity on plaintiffs' unlawful detention claims.").

Barrow v. Greenville ISD, 332 F.3d 844, 848 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Brantley and Fyfe . . . confirm that the constitutional right of public-school employees to select a private-school education for their children was clearly established when Smith refused to consider Barrow for the position of assistant principal. Smith argues that Brantley and Fyfe does not give fair warning to all reasonable officials in his place that refusing to consider Barrow for the assistant principal position would be unconstitutional. Initially, we note that the question whether there was a clearly-established right does not turn on the existence of a court decision determining that conduct identical to that which is at issue here is unlawful.”)

Austin v. Johnson, 328 F.3d 204, 210 (5th Cir. 2003) (“Defendants do not dispute the accuracy of Gipson’s log, nor its literal interpretation. Before 3:00 p.m., defendants’ conduct was perhaps only negligent, but their failure to call an ambulance for almost two hours while John E lay unconscious and vomiting rises to the level of deliberate indifference. Since Estelle v. Gamble . . . state officers have been on notice that deliberate indifference to a prisoner’s serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. Defendants’ contention that no case has specifically proscribed the withholding of medical treatment for boot camp attendees reads the right too narrowly; officers need only have ‘fair warning’ that their conduct is unlawful. . . . Given the serious medical consequences of dehydration, a reasonable person would not have waited nearly two hours to call an ambulance once John E became unconscious.”)

Estep v. Dallas County, Texas, 310 F.3d 353, 360, 361 (5th Cir. 2002) (“Although we have stated that the constitutional right at stake is Estep’s right to be free from a vehicle search unless an officer has a reasonable belief that he is in danger, we must further evaluate whether the contours of that right were ‘clearly established’ in a more particularized way. . . . As applied to this case, we must consider whether it is clearly established law that a reasonable officer could not conclude that he was in danger when faced with a citizen who exited the car prior to the approach of the officer, continuously asked why he had been stopped, showed the officer a key chain with mace, possessed camoflaug[e] [sic] gear, and possessed an NRA sticker? There is no Fifth Circuit case which directly addresses whether a reasonable officer could conclude, based on these specific facts, that a citizen posed a danger and could gain immediate control of a weapon. [footnote omitted] However, there does not have to be a case directly on point for the law to be ‘clearly established.’ . . . Our cases make clear that a Long ‘frisk’ of a vehicle is only constitutional if there are specific, articulable facts from which a reasonable police officer could believe he was in danger. In our view, the constitutional violation in this case is clear-cut and obvious. No reasonable police officer could have really believed that a search was constitutional under the circumstances presented.”).

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 331-33 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)(“[I]n the instant case we must assess whether those cases from our sister circuits recognizing the existence of a substantive due process right to be free from state-created danger established the contours of that right with sufficient clarity to provide a reasonable officer in Detective Carney’s position with fair warning that providing Loftin with a gun would violate McClendon’s rights. . . . [W]hile a number of our sister circuits had accepted some version of the state-created danger theory as of July of 1993, given the inconsistencies and uncertainties within this alleged consensus of authorities, an officer acting within the jurisdiction of this court could not possibly have assessed whether his or her conduct violated this right in the absence of explicit guidance from this court or the Supreme Court. . . . [E]ven if a ‘consensus’ of circuits had adopted some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, this consensus did not at that time establish the contours of an individual’s right to be free from state-created danger with sufficient clarity to provide Detective Carney with fair warning that his conduct violated that right.”).

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 341 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc) (Robert M. Parker, J., joined by Judges Wiener and Harold R. DeMoss, Jr., dissenting) ([T]he majority contends that the numerous cases which had adopted the state-created danger theory by 1993 do not constitute a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ on this point of law because slight variations existed among the circuits concerning the level of culpability required to hold the state actor constitutionally liable. This conclusion strikes me as plainly inconsistent with the more liberal approach to the ‘clearly established law’ inquiry as set forth in Wilson. . . .By July of 1993, a consensus of cases of persuasive authority existed to put reasonable police officers on notice that they may violate the Constitution if (1) they create or increase a danger to a known victim; and (2) act with deliberate indifference towards the known victim during the creation of such danger.”).

Roe v. Texas Dep’t of Protective and Regulatory Services, 299 F.3d 395, 408-11 (5th Cir. 2002) (“In Hope, the Court recently elaborated on what is required for a particular right to be ‘clearly established’ in the context of qualified immunity. . . . On July 10, 1999, Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit precedent plainly established the following: (1) A strip or body cavity search raises serious Fourth Amendment concerns, Watt, 849 F.2d at 199; and (2) The Fourth Amendment governs the lawfulness of a social worker’s entry into a dwelling to resolve a child custody dispute. Mary and Jackie need not prove that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . . . We had not, however, ever addressed whether the traditional test or the ‘special needs’ doctrine applies to a social worker’s visual searches of naked juveniles. . . . The Supreme Court’s previously vague test for finding a ‘special need’ caused the federal circuits to diverge over this precise substantive question and to disagree again as to whether the rights were ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity. It is difficult to argue that a matter of law is clearly established for state actors in this circuit where this court has not opined on the issue in question and the other circuits are in disagreement as to whether the challenged acts constitute a constitutional violation. We need not even reach the question whether, or to what extent, the law of other circuits may be relevant to our qualified immunity jurisprudence, in the absence of plain guidance from our own circuit’s caselaw, because here the other circuits were inconsistent in their treatment of the rights here alleged. . . . In July 1999, there was insufficient legal guidance, even under the standard enunciated in Hope, to inform a CPS worker that what Strickland did in reaction to the reports received about Jackie’s conduct ultimately would be considered a constitutional violation.” [footnotes omitted]) .

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 460, 463 (5th Cir. 2001) (“As to the scope of clearly established law, the question is whether an unmarried adult, under no guardianship or finding of incompetency, who is a pretrial detainee at the jail of a small rural county, holding him on transfer from and as accommodation to a larger neighboring county where he is charged and was arrested for DWI, and who while at the smaller county jail becomes delusional and hallucinatory from DTs, has a clearly established constitutional right to have his jailers at the smaller county either force him to submit to medical care for his DTs against his clearly communicated refusal to do so, or make reasonable efforts to locate a substitute decision maker, in lieu of promptly returning him to the custody of the larger county's jail from which he was transferred and which has detoxification facilities the smaller county's jail lacks. . . . In these circumstances, and given the lack of precedent on the matter, we conclude that not all reasonable sheriffs situated similarly to either sheriff Cross or sheriff Tefteller would realize that the United States Constitution required them to have their jail personnel medically trained respecting the likely medical seriousness of an inmate suffering from DTs and the need to have such an inmate promptly receive medical care or respecting the inability of such an inmate to legally or competently refuse medical treatment despite being able to adequately communicate such refusal. The failure of the sheriffs to furnish such training cannot reasonably be analogized to welfare officials selling foster children into slavery . . . , at least not so long as the doctrine of qualified immunity is to retain any significance beyond the strictly aberrational or symbolic. “). Brown v. Nationsbank Corp., 188 F.3d 579, 592 (5th Cir. 1999) (“Applying the Lewis analysis to the FBI’s alleged activity in this case, we conclude that the FBI made decisions which harmed the Plaintiffs after ample opportunity for cool reflection. In fact, they invested almost two years and thousands of man hours in developing the sting operation. Thus, the due process clause protects the Plaintiffs from any harm that arose from the officers’ deliberate indifference. The facts, as pleaded, establish at least that level of federal agent culpability as Operation Lightning Strike evolved into a disastrous boondoggle. We therefore hold that Hodgson’s allegations that federal agents inflicted damages on him, an innocent non-target, during this particular undercover operation and refused him compensation states a claim under Bivens. However, because we address today for the first time the parameters of due process protections afforded innocent third parties injured by law enforcement sting operations run amok, and because the Supreme Court’s language that drives our analysis appeared in a case decided in 1998, we cannot say that the due process rights claimed by Hodgson were clearly established during 1992- 94. . . . We therefore affirm the district court’s dismissal of Hodgson’s Bivens claims on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.”).

Harris v. Victoria Independent School District, 168 F.3d 216, 224 (5th Cir. 1999) (“The Defendants are not insulated from their unconstitutional conduct merely because a balancing test is involved in our analysis. While employee speech cases are a likely vehicle for varied fact scenarios, the law is clearly established that a ‘mix of public and private speech’ may be constitutionally protected.”).

Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 899, 908, 911-14 (5th Cir. 1998), denying pet. for reh’g and superseding opinion at 133 F.3d 330 (5th Cir. 1998), (“[O]ur review of the record shows that Rivera is entitled to the defense of qualified immunity based on the undisputed fact that the Petta children alleged purely psychological harm as a result of Rivera’s actions. At the time of these events, it was not ‘clearly established’ in our law that such non-physical harm gave rise to a constitutional tort. . . . Between July 5, 1989 and February 25, 1992 . . . Johnson v. Morel was ‘clearly established law’ regarding an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. As we have noted above, this is the relevant ‘legal window’ within which we must look to determine whether Officer Rivera’s actions on January 15, 1990 were ‘objectively reasonable.’ . . . Our inquiry here is very narrow. We are not asking whether the Petta children’s psychological injuries were redressable under the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1990. We are merely asking whether a § 1983 plaintiff at that time had a clearly established right under the Fourteenth Amendment to be free from purely emotional harm resulting from an officer’s use of excessive force. We have already demonstrated . . . that such a right was not clearly established in January, 1990, under the Fourth Amendment. What we hold here is simply that the same right was equally ‘unclear’ (for qualified immunity purposes) under the Fourteenth Amendment. We do so for essentially two reasons: (1) our cases following Graham v. Connor do not clearly distinguish between Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment analyses in this context; we are thus persuaded that Johnson v. Morel and Dunn v. Denk. . . , although admittedly addressing the Fourth Amendment right, also affected the Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force; and, (2) under the particular facts here, we see no principled reason for drawing an analytical distinction between the Petta children’s due process claim and an arrestee’s Fourth Amendment claim, given the substantially similar concerns implicated by the two claims (e.g., the right to be free from excessive force in an arrest situation and the need for a police officer to use reasonable force in effecting arrests). . . . [O]ur precedents, such as Johnson v. Morel . . . and Dunn v. Denk. . . interjected as much uncertainty into our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence as into our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, regarding whether a purely non-physical injury rose to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . We must therefore hold that in January, 1990, the Petta children had no ‘clearly established’ constitutional right under the due process clause to be free from a police officer’s use of excessive force where the only injuries allegedly suffered were psychological.”).

Petta v. Rivera, 133 F.3d 330, 346, 347 (5th Cir.1998) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (“The contours of the right of helpless and innocent bystander children of tender years, such as the Petta children, to be free from potentially lethal assault, such as being fired upon with a .357 magnum, was sufficiently clear on January 15, 1990 that a reasonable official in Rivera’s alleged position would have understood that what he was doing violated the Petta children’s constitutional rights. Even in the absence of any analogous judicial precedent, a reasonable officer would or should have known that such egregious conduct was unlawfully excessive and unconstitutional. . . . I am persuaded that on January 15, 1990 a reasonable law enforcement officer knew or should have known that to attack a family suburban automobile occupied by an unarmed mother and her three and seven year old children by firing on the vehicle with a .357 magnum, bludgeoning its window, pointing the .357 magnum in the direction of the mother and three year old child while threatening to kill the mother, and other acts of excessive force and violence, in connection with minor traffic violations, was constitutionally impermissible. Rivera’s misbehavior was simply too egregious to justify concluding that because of language in cases involving an entirely different context, i.e., the arrest, detention and seizure of adult suspects, offenders or prisoners, a reasonable officer in Rivera's situation would not know or should not know that his actions in assaulting helpless and innocent bystander children with deadly force for no justifiable reason violated the Petta children's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process constitutional rights and subjected him to liability under § 1983 for their severe psychological damage."), pet. for reh'g denied and opinion superseded by 143 F.3d 895 (5th Cir. 1998). (In the superceding opinion, Judge Dennis adopts his original dissenting opinion. See 143 F.3d at 914)

Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 445-51 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e have jurisdiction to consider the officers' contention that issues of law separable from the merits exist—namely, whether hog-tying violates clearly established law and whether their conduct was objectively reasonable. . . [Defendants] initially argue that the right to be free of hog-tying was not clearly established in November 1994 because neither the Supreme Court nor the Fifth Circuit (or any other circuit) had specifically held that hog-tying constituted excessive force. Such a dogmatic argument is unjustified. . . . [W]e will examine whether a reasonable police officer in November 1994 would have known whether hog-tying falls within the bounds of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of the use of excessive force 'in the light of pre-existing law.' . . . Although guns represent the paradigmatic example of 'deadly force,' Garner failed to address whether other police tools and instruments can also be characterized as 'deadly force.' Lower courts since have struggled with whether to characterize various police tools and instruments as 'deadly force.' . . . These courts have generally described 'deadly force' as force 'carry[ing] with it a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.' . . . Although we have not had occasion to adopt this description, both the Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 employed it. . . . The Texas statute and SAPD procedures in effect in November 1994 also conformed to Garner's holding that an officer can use 'deadly force' only against a suspect who poses a threat of death or serious physical harm to the officer or to others. . . . Accordingly, we find both the definition of 'deadly force' and Garner's holding to have been clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . The question thus becomes whether hog-tying in these circumstances creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury, and hence, becomes deadly force. . . . Gutierrez thus presents sufficient evidence that hog-tying may create a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury in these circumstances and thereby become deadly force. . . . Assuming this evidence to be true, hog-tying in these circumstances would have violated law clearly established prior to November 1994. . . . In arguing that their conduct was objectively reasonable, [Defendants] first present the affidavit of Commander Albert Rodriguez, who states that the official policies of the SAPD, the Texas Department of Public Safety, and the International Association of Chiefs of Police Use of Force Model Policy in November 1994 did not prohibit the use of hog-ties. He further avers that SCDS was not known to reasonably well-trained police officers in Texas at that time, and that hog-tying was reasonable under these circumstances. To counterbalance this affidavit, Gutierrez presents that of Lou Reiter, former Deputy Chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, who analyzes the facts of this case and states that [Defendants'] use of force and actions were unreasonable. Claiming that a 'battle of the experts' thus exists, [Defendants] assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because 'if officers of reasonable competence could disagree on this issue, immunity should be recognized.' [citing Malley v. Briggs] We do not believe that the Supreme Court intended by this statement to mean that summary judgment must be granted in favor of the police whenever they can find an expert to testify that their actions were reasonable; in such a scenario, the police would virtually always win summary judgment. Moreover, an expert's opinion does not establish reasonableness as a matter of law, especially when directly contradicted by another expert's well-supported opinion. . . . [B]ased on the combination of the multiple factual issues in dispute and the evidence weighing against the officers, we cannot determine whether [Defendants'] conduct was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. . . . Accordingly, we dismiss the officers' appeal from the district court's denial of summary judgment on Gutierrez's Fourth Amendment claim for lack of jurisdiction.").

Sorenson v. Ferrie, 134 F.3d 325, 328, 330 n.12 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Sorenson cannot satisfy Siebert's first prong—the need to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right—merely by asserting that the right not to be arrested without probable cause is clearly established. Instead, she must show that the legality of her conduct was clearly established. That is to say, she must demonstrate that, at the time of her arrest, it was clearly established in Texas that one may lawfully possess a handgun in one's trunk. . . . We hold only that, for purposes of qualified immunity in this civil case, the law was not clearly established on this question as of the date of this incident. We do not mean to express a view as to whether ' 46.02 does or does not prohibit the possession of a weapon in one's trunk. That is for the state courts to decide.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 402 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) ("This is a case controlled by the law applicable from 1989 to 1992, a window created by our decision in Johnson v. Morel, 876 F.2d 477 (5th Cir.1989) (en banc), and Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992), the decision of the Supreme Court effectively overruling it. . . . Given the explicit language of Johnson, and its footnote 1 in particular, we conclude that the law at the time of this arrest was uncertain regarding whether 'a significant injury will be caused by unnecessary force without significant physical injury.' On the present facts, Denk was entitled to qualified immunity from the claims asserted in this case.").

Dunn v. Denk, 79 F.3d 401, 407 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (Reavley, Circuit Judge, joined by Politz, Chief Judge, Wiener, Benavides, Stewart, Parker and Dennis, Circuit Judges, dissenting) ("Once an officer uses objectively unreasonable force to effect an arrest, he loses his qualified immunity, whether the other elements of an excessive force claim are clearly established or not.").

Kiser v. Garrett, 67 F.3d 1166, 1173 (5th Cir. 1995) ("[I]t is apparent that, although a substantive due process right to family integrity has been recognized, the contours of that right are not well-defined, and continue to be nebulous, especially in the context of a state's taking temporary custody of a child during an investigation of possible parental abuse. Even assuming that such a right exists under the circumstances involved here, it certainly was not clearly established when the appellees engaged in the conduct at issue.").

Foster v. City of Lake Jackson, 28 F.3d 425, 430 (5th Cir. 1994) (“[W]e hold that the right of access, as clearly established in 1985-1988, encompassed a right to file an action, but not the right to proceed free of discovery abuses after filing. . . . [E]ven assuming that the contours of the right of access have been expanded since 1988 to include the Fosters’ definition, those contours were not clearly established at the time the claimed violations occurred.”).

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 455 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (“The ‘contours’ of a student’s substantive due process right to be free from sexual abuse and violations of her bodily integrity were clearly established in 1987”).

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 465 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Higginbotham, J., and Politz, J., specially concurring) (“Justice Scalia pointed out in Anderson v. Creighton, [cite omitted] the hazards of framing the legal question at too great a level of generality. The error can be made in the opposite direction—a search so narrowed that legal nuance rises to uncertainty and ultimately confounds common sense. Qualified immunity reflects the judgment that an official ought not to be mulcted for choices made that only later prove to have been ‘illegal.’ I don’t think we today put any school principal in peril or unfairly second guess this one. This was not an episodic act of an interloper to the school scheme nor the private act of a student. Rather, it was the persistent pattern of indefensible conduct of a school official, the principal’s subordinate.”).

Doe v. Taylor Independent School Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 467 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (Garwood, J., joined by Jones, J., Smith, J., Garza, J., and DeMoss, J., dissenting in part) (finding it not clearly established that the Constitution protects a fifteen-year-old schoolgirl from being sexually fondled and having “consensual” sexual relations with a public schoolteacher.).

Colle v. Brazos County, 981 F.2d 237, 246 (5th Cir. 1993) (“We are persuaded that Sheriff Miller knew of or should have known that if he staffed the jail with persons having no authority to transfer a seriously ill detainee to a hospital, and if he pursued a policy of failing to monitor the critical medical condition of a detainee, these actions would be constitutionally impermissible. If the allegations in Plaintiffs’ complaint are true, and they must be accepted as true, Miller should have known that such a policy would result in the deprivation of a detainee’s right to reasonable medical care. At this stage of the proceeding, Miller is not entitled to a 12(b)(6) dismissal.”).

White v. Taylor, 959 F.2d 539, 546 (5th Cir. 1992) (“[W]hile we think the law was clearly established...that a warrantless misdemeanor arrestee had a right to a prompt determination of probable cause, we hold the contours of that right were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that such a person, arrested late at night in a city without a night magistrate, could not be held overnight before [being taken] before a magistrate.”).

Ordonez v. Gonzalez, No. EP-23-CV-99-KC, 2024 WL 1250181, at *9 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 25, 2024) (“Although Officers may have violated Ordonez’s constitutional rights by arresting her without a warrant or exigent circumstances in the curtilage of her home, they are still entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed exigent circumstances justified pursuit of Ordonez into the home's curtilage to arrest her. . . In June 2021—two months after the incident here—the Supreme Court noted that '[c]ourts [we]re divided over whether the Fourth Amendment always permits an officer to enter a home without a warrant in pursuit of a fleeing misdemeanor suspect.' Lange, 141 S. Ct. at 2017 & n.1 (collecting cases). And it appears the Fifth Circuit had yet to resolve the question. . . 'In other words, the law of exigent circumstances based on hot pursuit of a misdemeanant was not clearly established as of June 2021.' . . Because the issue was being resolved by the Supreme Court at the time of the incident, the Court cannot say that the question was 'beyond debate' when Officers followed the fleeing Ordonez into the curtilage of her home to arrest her for misdemeanor offenses. . . Thus, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity as to Ordonez's false arrest claim, and their Motions are granted as to that claim.")

Linares v. Maze, No. 3:19CV133-MPM-RP, 2023 WL 5969690, at *1-5 (N.D. Miss. Sept. 13, 2023) ("This court acknowledges that it is bound by the U.S. Supreme Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence, including its daunting 'clearly established' prong. This court is well aware that this prong is a stringent one, and defendant certainly has a good faith argument that its requirements are not met in this case. However, this court believes that its requirements are met, and, moreover, in situations where there are two arguable legal positions, its preferred approach is to err on the side of doing what it believes to be the right thing. . . . Officer Maze espouses what this court regards as a very myopic view of Fourth Amendment liability which does not withstand close scrutiny. Specifically, Maze writes in his motion to rehearing that: The law is clear that an officer must first seize the plaintiff before any seizure can be considered excessive force. There must be an underlying seizure for direct liability Section 1983 claims against an officer. . . . If defendant's understanding of the law were correct, then there would be no such thing as bystander liability claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . . While this court has, regrettably, not had a great deal of free time during this trial to fully research the case law in this context, it is confident that there are a large number of decisions which have found liability under facts such as these. To give merely one example, this court submits that the Fifth Circuit's entire body of bystander liability case law is based upon the principle that when one officer's unreasonable seizure of a suspect and another officer's unreasonable decision to stand and watch that seizure combine to cause a Fourth Amendment violation, both officers may be held liable. Considered as a matter of substance, this strikes this court as simply a different way of expressing Gates' holding. In both the bystander liability and Gates contexts, there are multiple objectively unreasonable acts or omissions by multiple officers which combine to cause a Fourth Amendment violation even though, in most cases, only one of the defendants personally 'seized' the suspect. This court believes that the fact that both Gates and the bystander liability case law provide for liability of each officer in this context is not some extraordinary leap of logic applicable only to supervisors or bystanders, but, rather, a common-sensical application of joint causation principles which is applicable whenever two officers commit two objectively unreasonable acts or omissions which combine to cause a seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Under these circumstances, what possible rationale would permit dismissal of one of the officers, who – again – committed an objectively unreasonable act which was a proximate cause of a Fourth Amendment violation, simply because another officer was the only one to physically seize the suspect? None that makes any sense to this court. . . . [T]he common-sensical principles of joint causation which undergird the supervisor and bystander liability bodies of case law strike this court as fully applicable in this case, and any use of the ‘clearly established’ prong to get around this fact would, in this court’s view, represent an improperly narrow application of that prong. Considered in this vein, this court will deny defendant’s motion for reconsideration, but it will attempt to strengthen its recitation of clearly established law by relying not upon a single decision such as Gates, but rather upon the Fifth Circuit’s general approach to joint causation issues in excessive force cases. . . . [P]laintiff is simply seeking to hold Officer Maze liable for an unlawful Fourth Amendment seizure which Ismael Lopez allegedly suffered as a proximate result of Maze’s objectively unreasonable conduct. That is basic Fourth Amendment law, well established at the time of the relevant events in this case. This court notes that the basic principle of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence stated above is set forth in many hundreds of federal appellate cases, as well as the model Fifth Circuit jury instructions in this case. Having said that, this court does not deny that there are, as many commentators have recognized, aspects of the US Supreme Court’s qualified immunity jurisprudence which are unclear. . . . This court believes that the basic principles of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence discussed above are clear, however. As precedent supporting this court’s reference to Fifth Circuit law above, it relies upon the Fifth Circuit’s entire body of bystander liability and supervisor liability case law, including but not limited to Gates. This court notes that, in its view, citation to these Fifth Circuit cases is quite arguably unnecessary, since it merely serves to confirm that the basic rule of Fourth Amendment liability stated above applies in multi-officer situations. In this vein, this Fifth Circuit case law merely serves to negate Maze’s invalid and legally baseless argument that he, unlike other officers, should not be held liable for his objectively unreasonable conduct which proximately causes a suspect to suffer an unlawful Fourth Amendment seizure, merely because some other officer was the only one to strike the suspect. The Fifth Circuit’s bystander and supervisor liability case law makes clear that this is an untenable argument set forth by Maze, but the ‘clearly established law’ supporting his liability is already set forth in the basic principles of Fourth Amendment law discussed above. This court makes an express finding that the bodies of Fifth Circuit case law discussed above are not some aberration applicable only to bystanders and supervisors, but, rather, flow naturally from joint causation principles, the basic Fourth Amendment principle stated above, and basic common sense. This court therefore finds the common-sensical approach in those bodies of case law to be fully applicable here. The above approach makes complete sense to this court, and it believes that refusing to apply this common-sensical approach to joint causation issues simply because Maze is neither a supervisor nor a bystander would be an absurd result. Of course, the ‘clearly established’ prong is known for producing absurd results, . . . and it at least seems possible that this case will eventually end up mounted above its fireplace as another example of this fact. But this court will not be the one to put it there. This court will accordingly deny defendant’s motion for reconsideration, but it will attempt to strengthen the conclusions of law discussed in its prior order in the manner discussed above.”)

Estate of Chapa v. City of Alvin, No. 3:20-CV-00362, 2021 WL 3077671, at *5 (S.D. Tex. July 21, 2021) (“[C]onsider what the Cole court held was ‘clearly established’ as unlawful, dooming the officers’ chance at qualified immunity: “shooting a mentally disturbed [person], who was pointing a gun the entire time at his own head and facing away from the officer, in an open outdoor area, and who was unaware of the officer’s presence because no warning was given prior to the officer opening fire.” . . . This case is different. Chapa was aware of the officers, and they gave warning. He was instructed to drop his weapon and he complied. But when he was then ordered to get down on the ground, he refused, begged the officers to shoot him, and picked up his gun again. He pointed it back at himself, but now the officers were facing a mentally unstable man who was defying their instructions, had rearmed himself, had already discharged his weapon at least once, and who could turn it on them in a moment. Judge Edith Jones had a point when she wrote in her Cole dissent:

Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that police officers confronted in close quarters with a suspect armed and ready to shoot must hope they are faster on the draw and more accurate. The increasingly risky profession of law enforcement cannot put those sworn to ‘serve and protect’ to a Hobson’s choice: place their lives on the line by heroic forbearance or risk their financial security in defense of lawsuits. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated in plain terms that the purpose of qualified immunity is to prevent precisely this quandary.

The plaintiffs bear the burden to show the inapplicability of the defendants’ qualified-immunity defense. . . . In this case they have failed to do so on both qualified-immunity inquiries. First, there was no Fourth Amendment violation, as the force the officers employed was reasonable under the circumstances. Second, the officers violated no ‘clearly established’ law. The plaintiffs’ excessive-force claim is dismissed.”)

I.M. by his next friend M.M. v. Houston ISD, No. CV H-20-3453, 2021 WL 2270271, at *3 (S.D. Tex. June 3, 2021) (“The amended complaint does not plead facts plausibly alleging a special relationship between I.M. and Swearer, the school official. The Fifth Circuit has noted, but not adopted, a ‘state-created danger’ exception to the special-relationship rule. See Hernandez, No. CV H-19-915, 2019 WL 1934674, at *8 (collecting cases). The exception requires that the state official ‘used [his or her] authority to create a dangerous environment for the plaintiff’ and ‘acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.’ . . . The amended complaint alleges that I.M. informed Swearer about Student O.’s assaults, and that she nevertheless continued to leave him unattended, allowing the assaults to take place. This may be sufficient to allege a state-created danger exception to the special-relationship requirement, but the Fifth Circuit has repeatedly declined to recognize that exception. . . . The amended complaint does not plausibly allege a special relationship between I.M. and Swearer. Qualified immunity precludes a state-created-danger theory because when Swearer failed to respond to I.M.’s report of abuse, there was no clearly established law that held her responsible for a state-created danger.”)

Dyer v. Fyall, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2018) (“The confusion surrounding medical-inattention claims in the Fifth Circuit dooms the Dyers’ medical-inattention claim. The officers in this case have qualified immunity, which means the Dyers can hold them liable for violations of only clearly established rights. A right is clearly established only if ‘the contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . So, given that some Fifth Circuit cases require plaintiffs to show intent to cause harm in medical-inattention cases and other do not, there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm. Here, the Dyers neither argue nor present evidence that any of the officers in this case actually intended to harm Graham by withholding medical care. Thus, because qualified immunity bars the Dyers’ medical-inattention claim, the Court GRANTS the officers’ motion for summary judgment on that claim.”)

Luna v. Valdez, No. 3:15-CV-3520-D, 2018 WL 684897, at *14-15 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 2, 2018) (“The court concludes that, with respect to Luna’s § 1983 claims against Sheriff Valdez based on the County’s alleged policy of refusing to release on bail inmates with an immigration hold, or on the County’s alleged policy of holding inmates with an immigration hold for 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, Luna has failed to present evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that Sheriff Valdez’s conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Luna’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . . Luna has failed to meet his summary judgment burden with respect to the second prong of Sheriff Valdez’s qualified immunity defense. In his response brief, Luna contends that ‘there can be no dispute that the extant jurisprudence at the time in question required the Defendants to have probable cause to believe Mr. Luna had committed another crime, which the Defendants did not have. The ICE detainer did not give the Defendants that required probable cause.’ . . . But the only authority Luna cites is Mercado II, which post-dates Luna’s period of confinement by more than a year and a half. . . . Luna does not point to any controlling authority (or to a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’) that would establish the following critical element: that at the time Luna was detained pursuant to the Immigration Detainer, all reasonable officials in Sheriff Valdez’s position would have known that honoring federal immigration detainers by denying pretrial release to detainees with immigration holds, or by holding inmates subject to ICE detainers for up to 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release, resulted in a clear violation of Luna’s constitutional rights under the circumstances. For example, in holding in Mercado II that 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d) does not mandate that local law enforcement detain persons who are subject to detainers, it was necessary for this court to piece together out-of-circuit authority, relying on Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014), and the decisions of several district courts that agreed with Galarza. The court specifically noted that “the Fifth Circuit has not yet addressed the issue.” Mercado II, 229 F.Supp.3d at 514. And the court held that, “[a]bsent Fifth Circuit authority to the contrary, [it would] follow Galarza and the district courts that rel[ied] on its reasoning or otherwise reach[ed] the same result.’ . . . The law does not require that, to be entitled to qualified immunity, reasonable officials accurately predict how the court might decide a new legal issue. . . . Accordingly, under the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Sheriff Valdez is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Luna’s § 1983 claims asserted against her.”).

Basler v. Barron, No. CV H-15-2254, 2017 WL 784895, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 1, 2017) (“In denying Deputy Barron’s motion on the grounds of qualified immunity, this court analyzed the second prong and concluded that filming the police is a clearly established First Amendment right. . . However, later, in Turner, the Fifth Circuit noted divergent district court opinions in analyzing the second prong of the qualified immunity defense in determining whether filming the police is a ‘clearly established right.’ . . The Fifth Circuit’s holding in Turner is directly applicable to Deputy Barron’s assertion of a qualified immunity defense against Basler’s First Amendment claim. . . In light of Turner, the court reconsiders the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Like the police officers in the Turner case, Deputy Barron asserted the defense of qualified immunity in his motion to dismiss. . . Basler responded that the right to film the police is a ‘clearly established’ First Amendment right. . . Basler was arrested in 2014, prior to Turner’s 2015 arrest and prior to the Fifth Circuit’s 2017 decision in Turner. Applying the Fifth Circuit’s reasoning in Turner, the court concludes that First Amendment right to film the police was not clearly established ‘at the time’ of Basler’s arrest.”)

Estate of Gray v. Dalton, No. 1:15CV061-SA-DAS, 2017 WL 564035, at *1–2 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 10, 2017) (“The Court entered a Memorandum Opinion and Order on January 6, 2017 granting in part and denying in part the Defendants’ Motion for Summary Judgment. Those Defendants have asked for a reconsideration of three points: (1) the Court’s denial of qualified immunity for the individual officer, (2) the Court’s lack of finding as to the County’s liability under the Fourth Amendment, and (3) the Court’s denial of summary judgment as to Plaintiffs’ state law wrongful death and gross negligence claims. After reviewing the motion, responses, rules and authorities, the Court hereby GRANTS IN PART the request for reconsideration and alters its judgment as follows: As noted in the Memorandum Opinion, Wilburn Gray claimed that Defendants illegally detained him in violation of the Fourth Amendment at the Alcorn County Jail from December 23 until December 26 without a judicial hearing on probable cause being held. The Court held that based on the United States Supreme Court’s general presumption that “[j]udicial determinations of probable cause within 48 hours of arrest will, as a general matter, comply with the promptness requirement of Gerstein”, County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56, 111 S. Ct. 1661, 114 L. Ed. 2d 49 (1991), together with the state statute citing 48 hours as the threshold for probable cause hearings, and no explanation from the Defendants as to why there would be that delay, that the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity analysis was satisfied. The Court then found that genuine issues of material fact as to whether Dalton’s actions were objectively reasonable existed based on the absence of a factual record. Defendants now seek reconsideration based on a recent United States Supreme Court proclamation regarding the blanket of qualified immunity. [Court notes White v. Pauly] Instead of focusing on the more general constitutional issue regarding time, the Court should have, and now does, examine the facts and circumstances of this particular case to determine whether Wilburn Gray’s constitutional rights were affected. Here, Wilburn Gray was physically arrested by Deputy Scott Dalton who immediately handed Gray over to Deputy David Harrison for transport to the Alcorn County Jail. Dalton was soon thereafter placed on administrative leave due to his role in the shooting incident. Dalton was not released from administrative leave until January or February of the next year. The record is undisputed in these regards. Plaintiff failed to put forth any case law showing facts approximating those present here. The United States Supreme Court recently admonished a lower court for ‘fail[ing] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The Supreme Court quoted the Circuit Court’s pronouncement that the case ‘presents a unique set of facts and circumstances’ as indicative that the officer’s conduct did not violate a clearly established right. . . . Under the qualified immunity standards as articulated, to demonstrate that Defendants unreasonably detained Gray, Plaintiff must present controlling authority that ‘squarely governs the case here,’ . . . and that would have put ‘beyond debate,’ . . . the question of whether Wilburn Gray’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated. Plaintiff did not carry this burden. There is no controlling case law involving sufficiently similar circumstances that would apprise every objectively reasonable officer that he had further duties and obligations to ensure a probable cause hearing to a suspect once custody of that suspect is relinquished to another officer and even after he was placed on administrative leave. This case presents a ‘unique set of facts and circumstances’ which require the Court’s reconsideration. Accordingly, Deputy Scott Dalton is entitled to the protections of qualified immunity.”)

Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *11-12 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) (“Sanders alleges that Lt. Vincent, Officer Bagley, and Officer Jones deprived him of his ‘constitutional rights under the First Amendment to videotape the activities of the Addison Police Department by harassing, detaining, seizing and arresting’ him. . . Assuming arguendo that defendants’ actions violated Sanders’ First Amendment rights, defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on these allegations because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that the First Amendment protects an individual’s right to videotape police activities. . . . Sanders has failed to point to any controlling authority that would establish that he had a constitutionally-protected First Amendment right to videotape police activity. Nor is there a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority,’ . . . that such activity is protected. . . . [U]nder the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, the court holds that Lt. Vincent, Officer Jones, and Officer Bagley are entitled to qualified immunity to the extent Sanders bases his § 1983 claim on defendants’ alleged deprivation of his First Amendment rights.”)

Bishop v. City of Denton, No. 4:14-CV-608, 2015 WL 8273986, at *4 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 8, 2015) (“As discussed above, the Court concludes that Bishop has presented sufficient evidence to establish that a question of fact exists as to whether Porter violated Bishop’s right to be free from the use of excessive force. However, Porter argues that his conduct was not a violation of clearly established law. To support this contention, Porter cites Justice Alito’s dissent in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which states that it has not been determined whether a pretrial detainee may bring a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against a detention facility employee. . . . However, the Fifth Circuit has allowed pretrial detainees to assert Fourth Amendment excessive force claims against detention facility employees. . . . If bystander liability for excessive force based on the Fourth Amendment was clearly established law as of January 2010, direct liability for excessive force was also clearly established. Therefore, within the Fifth Circuit, there was clearly established law at the time the event at issue occurred that detention facility employees could be held liable under the Fourth Amendment for using excessive force against pretrial detainees.”)

Cauley v. Walker, No. CV 1:10CV326, 2015 WL 5521972, at *6 & n.4 (E.D. Tex. Sept. 16, 2015) (“Plaintiff has presented competent summary judgment showing that the amount of force used against him was objectively unreasonable and that he suffered more than a de minimis injury. Moreover, plaintiff’s right to be free from having excessive force used against him was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . .The right of a pretrial detainee to be free from the use of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. However, as indicated above, at that time courts considering an excessive use of force claim against a pretrial detainee asked whether force was used maliciously and sadistically, for the very purpose of causing harm, or in a good faith effort to maintain and restore discipline, rather than whether the force used was objectively unreasonable. As stated above, plaintiff’s testimony at his deposition indicates that he was not presenting any threat while in the defendant’s office and, accordingly, there was no need for any force to be used to maintain or restore discipline. Plaintiff has therefore demonstrated excessive force was used against him even under the test previously applied.”)

Modica v. Humphrey, 2007 WL 2777779, at *5 (W.D.Tex. Sept. 21, 2007) (“At the time of Modica’s termination, the law regarding public employees’ First Amendment rights was well-established, by Pickering, Givhan, and many other Supreme Court and appellate court decisions. All that Garcetti did was to reduce the class of plaintiffs who can prevail on such claims by making it clear that only public employees who are speaking outside of their official duties may bring retaliation claims. It otherwise did not change the general rule, set out in Pickering and countless other cases, that it is unlawful to terminate an employee for exercising their First Amendment rights. In other words, given the facts of this case, Humphrey cannot plausibly contend that she relied on law existing at the time she took actions against Modica, and then that law was changed by Garcetti to her detriment. Indeed, it is quite the opposite; Humphrey filed the instant motion because she contends that Garcetti changed the law in a manner favorable to her (i.e., to eliminate the Plaintiff’s claim). Because Garcetti narrowed the class of people who may sue under the First Amendment, but that narrowing did not eliminate Modica’s claim, nothing about the change affected by Garcetti is relevant to the question of whether Modica’s right infringed upon by her harassment and firing was ‘clearly established’ at the time it took place.”).

Caudillo v. Lubbock ISD, No. Civ.A. 5:03-CV-165-C, 2003 WL 22670934, at *6, *7 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2003) (“The Court finds the appropriate level of generality in this case relates to the issue of whether a school and its officials may deny a gay-straight student group access to the campus. In a more highly specific query relevant to this case, the issue presented here is whether a school superintendent may deny access to the school’s bulletin boards, PA system, and group meeting areas if a prospective student group 1) lists as one of its goals that it will discuss subject matter relating to sexual activity and birth control other than abstinence—a subject matter the school's administration and board of trustees have declared inappropriate for the forum; and 2) seeks to advertise itself by posting fliers with the group's website address which has direct links to sites that contain explicit sexual material and discussions. . . . Under the circumstances of this case, this Court cannot say that the unlawfulness of Defendant Clemmons' particular actions should have been apparent to him in light of clearly established law at the time of the actions. The relatively few cases addressing the issue on a level of generality relevant to this case occurred not only outside of this circuit, but also in federal district courts. None of the cases consisted of opinions handed down by a circuit court. Such a fact seems relevant since the Fifth Circuit has stated that 'even if a Aconsensus" of circuits had adopted' the relevant rule, such an adoption still may not have provided a defendant with fair warning. McClendon, 305 F.3d at 332-33 (emphasis added to show that the consensus of cases should be from a higher level than obscure district court orders). Clemmons may have had fair warning that generalized limits on a student's free speech might violate the First Amendment; the law was less clear whether, in the context of secondary school students, limits on the speech of a group of minors whose goals included discussing safe sex and providing a website with direct links to materials that clearly discussed explicit sexual acts, might violate the First Amendment.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Clark v. Abdallah, No. 23-1730, 2025 WL 798971, at *11 (6th Cir. Mar. 13, 2025) ("As long ago as 1942, 'the Supreme Court held that when a witness perjures himself because of threats from police officers, the defendant suffers "a deprivation of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution."' . . . Because of this, Defendants were surely on notice in 2002 that threatening Stewart and Wiseman to give false testimony to convict Plaintiffs was a violation of Plaintiffs' clearly established due-process rights. . . . Defendants insist that this defines the right 'too generally.' . . . They argue that 'there was no caselaw putting the Officers on notice that their interrogation techniques would cross the line from coercion to fabrication,' so they could not have known that they were violating Defendants' constitutional rights. . . . Defendants' argument is simply another attempt to relitigate the question whether a jury could infer that they knew the statements were fabricated. We have already addressed that question. The relevant question at this juncture is whether, when an officer knows that evidence is fabricated, it is clearly established that introduction of that evidence at trial violates an individual's rights. That proposition of law was firmly established when this violation occurred.")

Clark v. Louisville-Jefferson County Metro Government, 130 F.4th 571, 58-83 (6th Cir. 2025) ("Thurman next makes the standard qualified-immunity argument over which we have jurisdiction: he asserts that the caselaw at the time of Hardin's 1995 trial did not 'clearly establish[]' that Brady's duty of disclosure could apply to forensic scientists. . . . On this question, too, our precedent compels us to reject Thurman's argument—this time on the merits. . . . At the outset, he concedes that, by 1990, courts had clearly established the legal rule that forensic scientists cannot 'deliberately' fabricate incriminating evidence or conceal exculpatory evidence in bad faith. . . . But the district court rejected Hardin's fabricated-evidence claim. . . . According to Thurman, this holding shows that he did not act in bad faith and thus that the clearly established rule does not apply. That brings us to the question at the crux of the parties' debate: do forensic scientists have a Brady-like duty of disclosure even absent bad faith? Thurman argues that Brady's generic legal rule reads the right at 'too high a level of generality.' . . . Even if prosecutors had an absolute duty of disclosure in the 1990s, Thurman reasons, that rule does not establish that everyone else connected to the investigation (including forensic serologists) also had such an absolute duty. Hardin counters that our caselaw has already rejected this claim. Hardin is right. To be sure, Thurman correctly notes that Brady and the Supreme Court cases applying it have imposed the disclosure duty on 'prosecutors,' not investigators like police officers or forensic scientists. . . . Yet we have held that pre-1990 cases clearly established that the police also have a 'Brady-derived' duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence to the prosecution. . . . Admittedly, this caselaw addressed claims against police officers rather than forensic scientists. But 'every reasonable' scientist would have recognized that this extension of Brady covered them too. . . . At this stage, . . . our precedent requires us to assume what the district court held a reasonable jury could find about these notes: that their exculpatory nature was 'apparent' and that they were material to Hardin's innocence. . . . And, as explained, it was clearly established in 1990 that a scientist could violate Brady by failing to disclose material exculpatory evidence. That rule suffices to rebut Thurman's qualified-immunity defense under our caselaw. . . . Contrary to Thurman's claim, these cases do not require plaintiffs to identify a decision that addressed exactly the same type of Brady evidence.")

Ermold v. Davis, 130 F.4th 553, 559, 560 n.2 (6th Cir. 2025) ("[T]he law-of-the-case doctrine dictates that we refrain from reconsidering Davis's qualified-immunity defense. This court has already decided all legal issues involved in that defense. In the first appeal, we held that Plaintiffs 'adequately alleged the violation' of their right to marry—a right that 'was clearly established when Davis acted.' . . . In the second appeal, we held that 'discovery proved the facts plaintiffs pleaded,' so Davis was 'still not entitled to qualified immunity.' . . . Qualified immunity has been decided twice by the same court in the same case—so the 'same result' should follow this time. . . . Even if we were not bound by the law of the case and could properly entertain Davis's assertion of qualified immunity, Davis's argument is weak. Qualified immunity protects government officials from personal liability so long as they do not violate a plaintiff's 'clearly established' constitutional rights. . . . The defense ensures that an official facing a claim asserting the violation of a constitutional right had 'fair notice that her conduct was unlawful.' . . . An official has fair notice where it is clear that her 'particular conduct' was unconstitutional. . . . In making that determination, we do not define a right at 'a high level of generality.' . . . Davis argues that Obergefell did not establish a constitutional right to same-sex marriage with the specificity needed to put her on notice that her acts were unconstitutional. We disagree. The 'particular conduct' for which Davis is being held liable is her decision—in her capacity as a state official—to deny Plaintiffs a marriage license. And in Obergefell, the Supreme Court held that 'States are required by the Constitution to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples.' . . . Indeed, one set of Plaintiffs in Obergefell was a same-sex couple from Kentucky who sued state officials and argued that 'the Fourteenth Amendment requires a State to license a marriage between two people of the same sex.' . . . This court 'held that a State has no constitutional obligation to license same-sex marriages,’ . . . but the Supreme Court reversed and held the opposite. Thus, after Obergefell, no reasonable state official could claim to lack notice that it is unconstitutional to refuse to ‘issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples.’”)

Moore v. Oakland County, Michigan, 126 F.4th 1163, 1169-70 (6th Cir. 2025) (“Moore’s case differs in kind and degree from Saalim’s case. Moore not only failed to produce her license, but she also kept her car running, shifted her hands toward the center console, and leaned away from Officer Wilson. After Wilson tried to control Moore’s hands, she screamed and twisted to evade him. By contrast, Saalim did nothing more than verbally decline to produce his license and turn to ask ‘what he had done wrong’ after being shoved against his car. . . Even with Moore’s active resistance, Wilson did not ‘pull’ her out of the car, ‘shove[]’ her against the cab when she exited, or tase her as the officer in Saalim did. . . The two fact patterns reconcile themselves. Moore contends that the video footage shows that she did not move her hands toward the center console. But it does not show her hands, one way or another, at that point. That leaves three pieces of uncontradicted evidence that she moved her hands toward the console during the encounter: Officer Wilson’s case report, his deposition, and his state-court testimony. Because Moore did not provide any testimony or other evidence to the contrary, we must rely on the evidence in the record on this score. . . Moore insists that the video shows that she moved toward the center of her vehicle only after Officer Wilson grabbed her. That misapprehends Officer Wilson’s argument. Everyone agrees that Moore ‘pull[ed] away’ once he reached into her car. . . Before that, however, Officer Wilson testified that she put her hands ‘in to the center console area’ outside the dashcam’s view. . . Only Wilson’s testimony, reaffirmed by his case report and deposition, addresses Moore’s earlier maneuver. Moore claims that two other cases show that a reasonable officer would not conclude that a suspect posed a threat by moving her hands toward the center console. But in the first one, Browning, the police tased an unconscious minor in the backseat of a crashed car who made no threatening movements. . . In the second one, Wright, after the suspect complied with orders to turn off the car and raise his hands, an officer pepper-sprayed him at point-blank range when he put his hand ‘on the center console ... to better situate his torso’ around a colostomy bag to exit the car in compliance with the officers’ orders. . . Officer Wilson’s efforts, in contrast, fairly amount to a reasonable officer’s ‘split-second judgment[]’ in ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ circumstances to use some force to stop or arrest a suspect. . . On this record, no clearly established Fourth Amendment violation occurred.”)

Segler v. City of Detroit, No. 23-1897, 2024 WL 5135735, at *6-7 (6th Cir. Dec. 17, 2024) (Moore, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I join Part III of the majority opinion and concur in the judgment, but write separately to address defendant James Craig’s qualified-immunity defense. Plaintiff Gerald Segler alleges that, while acting as City of Detroit Police Chief, Craig violated Segler’s procedural-due-process and Second Amendment rights when Craig publicly (but mistakenly) identified Segler as a person of interest in a series of shootings, citing Segler’s propensity openly to carry firearms in the area of the shooting. But Segler has not shown that either of those rights was clearly established in the context of this case, which he must do in order to defeat Craig’s qualified-immunity defense. ‘Where a defendant raises the defense of qualified immunity, “it is the plaintiff's burden to show that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity". . In his answer, Craig raised qualified immunity as a defense. . . The burden thus shifted to Segler to demonstrate that Craig violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . Ordinarily, and as relevant here, '[a] plaintiff can meet his burden [to show a right is clearly established] ... by presenting caselaw "with a fact pattern similar enough to have given fair and clear warning to officers about what the law requires."'. . Although courts have recognized that a government actor's stigmatizing false statement may work a due-process violation where it deprives an individual of an independent liberty or property interest, . . . Segler has proffered no cases finding a due-process violation where, as here, the alleged defamatory action prompted third parties, rather than the government, to deprive a plaintiff of their liberty or property interest. Nor has Segler presented any cases establishing a Second Amendment right to openly carry a gun without stigma or retaliation. Both fact patterns are instrumental to the constitutional violations that Segler alleges and Craig's notice thereof. Accordingly, Craig is entitled to qualified immunity, and Segler's claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 cannot succeed. For the foregoing reasons, I concur in the judgment.")

Jackson-Gibson v. Beasley, 118 F.4th 848, 857-58 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Considering the totality of the circumstances and the application of the three Graham factors, Sgt. Beasley's decision to tase Jackson-Gibson was objectively unreasonable. Jackson-Gibson's alleged crimes were not serious. He did not pose an immediate threat to any officer. And he was not actively resisting or evading arrest. Therefore, the district court did not err in holding that a reasonable jury could find that Sgt. Beasley violated Jackson-Gibson's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . We next consider whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established as of June 2019. To make that determination, 'we must look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to decisions of this court and other courts within our circuit, and finally to decisions of other circuits.' . . Although 'clearly established law "should not be defined at a high level of generality,"'. . . a case with near-identical facts need not exist for a right to be clearly established[.] . . Indeed, 'the sine qua non of the "clearly established" inquiry is "fair warning."'. . 'The relevant inquiry is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . When Sgt. Beasley tased Jackson-Gibson, 'it was clearly established in this circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he or she is not actively resisting.' .")

Josephson v. Ganzel, 115 F.4th 771, 789-90 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity for two main reasons. First, they argue it was not clearly established that each Defendant's conduct, in isolation, was an adverse action sufficient to show retaliation against a professor because of his protected speech. Second, they argue it was not clearly established that the First Amendment protected statements like those Josephson made in October 2017. Resolving Defendants' first argument is not complicated. Defendants argue that Josephson's rights were not clearly established because no court had specifically addressed whether isolated actions against a professor because of his speech were adverse actions. In other words, Defendants believe they can act as they choose until there is a case on all fours. We disagree. As we have explained, ‘we do not require an earlier decision that is “directly on point.”’ . . . At the same time, ““existing precedent” must place the contours of the right “beyond debate.”’ . . . During the relevant period, it was beyond debate that ‘the First Amendment bar[red] retaliation for protected speech.’ . . . By the fall of 2017, both the Supreme Court and this court had held that, absent a disruption of government operations, a public university may not retaliate against a professor for speaking on issues of social or political concern. . . . And we had established that a retaliatory ‘adverse action’ is one that ‘would deter a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to engage in that conduct.’ . . . We had further established that campaigns of harassment, when considered as a whole, may amount to adverse actions. . . . It was also established that legitimate threats ‘to the nature and existence of one’s ongoing employment is of a similar character to the other recognized forms of adverse action—termination, refusal to hire, etc.—even if perpetrated by a third party who is not the employer.’ . . . We have, moreover, ‘repeatedly held that “[a]n act taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutionally protected right is actionable under § 1983 even if the act, when taken for a different reason, would have been proper.”’ . . . Thus, a reasonable university official during the relevant period would have understood that he could not lawfully terminate or threaten the economic livelihood of a professor because of his protected speech. Defendants’ second argument does not fare much better. That is because the protected nature of Josephson’s speech was also clearly established. ‘To be clearly established, a legal principle must have a sufficiently clear foundation in then-existing precedent.’ . . . The principle ‘must be settled law.’ . . . Settled law ‘means it is dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’ . . . In the First Amendment retaliation context, ‘we ask whether any reasonable official would have understood that [Josephson’s] speech was protected, and thus that the official could not retaliate against him.’ . . . The answer: It is, and has been, clearly established that public employees have a right to speak ‘on a matter of public concern regarding issues outside of one’s day-to-day job responsibilities, absent a showing that Pickering balancing favors the government’s particular interest in promoting efficiency or public safety.’ . . . It can no doubt be difficult to determine if speech is public or private. . . . Even so, by 2012, ‘[w]e had held that employees speak as private citizens (not public employees) at least when they speak on their own initiative to those outside their chains of command and when their speech was not part of their official or de facto duties.’ . . . ‘Would this “firmly established” rule have “immediately” alerted a reasonable person that’ Josephson spoke in his private capacity? . . . We think so. Defendants also argue that Josephson’s Heritage Foundation panel remarks were a part of his official duties. Even if that were the case, it was clearly established that such speech is protected. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Josephson, as we must, Josephson has shown that he engaged in protected speech when he spoke as part of the Heritage Foundation panel. Defendants should have known that Josephson’s speech was protected and that retaliating against Josephson for his speech would violate his First Amendment rights. Therefore, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Barton v. Neeley, 114 F.4th 581, 591-93 (6th Cir. 2024) (“[W]e hold that it is clearly established that public employees cannot be compelled to make false statements on matters of public concern in response to threats of retaliation. Neeley is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity in this procedural posture. . . . Any reasonable citizen, let alone a publicly elected official, would know that threatening a government employee to make false statements on a matter of public concern—rooted in the official’s own personal campaign interest and that would have covered up public employees’ discriminatory conduct—or face a loss of employment would violate multiple clearly established First Amendment principles. . . . In sum, considering the relevant, clearly established law from the Supreme Court, Sixth Circuit, and other circuits, . . . Barton’s right not to speak on a matter of public concern in response to threats of retaliation was clearly established at the time of his firing. Neeley is not entitled to qualified immunity at the pleadings stage of these proceedings.”)

Finley v. Huss, 102 F.4th 789, 808-12 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Proving an Eighth Amendment violation isn’t enough to defeat qualified immunity. Finley must also show that the law ‘clearly established’ the unconstitutionality of Huss and Schroeder’s challenged conduct. . . . Although it is a close call, Finley can defeat qualified immunity with existing precedent. Existing precedent clearly establishes a violation when controlling authority—that is, a Supreme Court decision, published Sixth Circuit decision, or here, a Western District of Michigan decision—bars the official’s conduct. . . It can also establish a violation when an on-point and ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ places the violation beyond debate. . . Such authority cannot just suggest that the officials’ conduct was unlawful. . . Rather, it must make apparent that the conduct was unlawful under the circumstances. . . The critical threshold step is defining the right at issue. The Supreme Court has repeatedly commanded inferior courts not to define rights at too high a level of generality. . . A right must be defined with enough specificity to address ‘whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’ . . Thus, general propositions of law usually aren’t enough to clearly establish a right. . . That said, Finley need not point to a case ‘on all fours’ with the instant fact pattern. . . Against that backdrop, we frame the inquiry as follows: Did the law clearly establish in 2016 that an official violates the Eighth Amendment by subjecting an inmate with known psychiatric disorders and a history of self-harm to conditions that, due to a medical professional’s warning, the official knows poses a substantial risk of dangerously aggravating the inmate’s psychiatric health? That articulation isn’t too general. . . At the same time, the articulation does not unreasonably narrow the right by focusing on specific features of the confinement. . . . Having defined the right, we turn to the cases. By 2016, Sixth Circuit caselaw had clearly established the principle that officials violate the Constitution by failing to take basic steps to address mentally ill inmates’ known psychiatric needs. Consider Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693 (6th Cir. 2001), and Clark-Murphy v. Foreback, 439 F.3d 280 (6th Cir. 2006). . . . Comstock and Clark-Murphy both show that prison officials violate the Constitution by failing to take appropriate action to protect inmates under their care who suffer from known severe psychiatric disorders. Granted, these cases are hardly on all fours with Finley’s situation. . . . [M]ost significantly, Comstock and Clark-Murphy involved failures to take affirmative steps to treat psychiatric disorders; they don’t spell out the rule that it is also unconstitutional to take steps known to risk worsening psychiatric disorders. But they nonetheless suffice to put Huss and Schroeder on notice that their actions violated Finley’s rights. The first reason is fairly intuitive. Any reasonable person would know that if it is unconstitutional to fail to step in and address known risks, it is also unconstitutional to affirmatively and knowingly worsen those risks. . . . [I]t is hardly a novel proposition that the Eighth Amendment extends to affirmative acts that endanger inmates. In fact, a robust consensus of persuasive authorities showed even in 2016 that officials commit cruel and unusual punishment by subjecting inmates to particularly egregious forms of solitary confinement. . . . Granted, none of those cases reached the special risks of solitary confinement to those with mental illnesses. . . . But the point is that reasonable officials shouldn't be caught off guard that Comstock and Clark-Murphy's principles apply even in the context of placing mentally ill inmates in dangerous forms of solitary confinement. Huss and Schroeder are not entitled to qualified immunity against Finley's Eighth Amendment claim.") Finley v. Huss, 102 F.4th 789, 830-31 (6th Cir. 2024) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority's solution to this predicament is to climb to a 'less granular' and '[r]elatively broad' level of generality. . . . Because Comstock and Clark-Murphy prevent officials from failing to treat an inmate's illness in one manner (failing to properly evaluate or monitor the inmate), the majority reasons it must be unconstitutional for an official to knowingly exacerbate the illness in another manner (housing the inmate in segregation). But that's exactly the type of inferential step the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly stressed' needs to be spelled out in binding caselaw. . . . Otherwise, the unlawfulness of defendants' conduct doesn't 'follow immediately' from the precedent. . . . Even if prison wardens were expected to perform this type of off-the-cuff legal analysis, the inference isn't sound. Not every action that knowingly exacerbates an inmate's mental health is unconstitutional—even if the inmate is constitutionally entitled to psychiatric care. Comstock might require a doctor to evaluate suicidal inmates, but that doesn't mean it's unconstitutional for an official to loan the inmate a razor and monitor him while he shaves. Or to segregate the inmate when he threatens to harm his cellmate. That's because the constitutionality of the conduct depends on the size of the risk, the nature of the risk, and the officials' response to the risk. . . . And because those factors affect the constitutionality of an officer's action, the clearly established analysis must account for them, too. So even if Comstock and Clark-Murphy required defendants to treat Finley's mental illness, Finley must still find a case holding (a) segregation poses risks that rise to an unconstitutional level and (b) defendants' reactions to those risks, including their mitigation efforts and reliance on mental-health professionals, were unreasonable. Comstock and Clark-Murphy don't come close. Thus, even if we could ignore the Supreme Court's instructions, set aside the 'particular circumstances' of Finley's case, and climb to a 'less granular' level of generality, defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity. One final point on the clearly established inquiry. The majority justifies its climb to a high level of generality by pointing to the merits of the Eighth Amendment analysis. As part of that analysis, we ask whether defendants 'knew' their conduct posed 'a substantial risk' of harm. . . . Because that accounts for the official's subjective culpability, the majority says it's 'justifie[d]' in using a broader level of generality in Eighth Amendment cases. . . . That reasoning has two problems. First, knowing that an action is risky is different from knowing that an action is unlawful. While the merits deal with the former, the clearly established prong deals with the latter. . . . Second, the merits ask whether an official 'subjectively' knew her conduct was risky. . . . By contrast, 'subjective beliefs ... are irrelevant' to the clearly established prong. . . . Thus, the fact that the merits account for an officer's subjective culpability has no bearing on whether a right is clearly established. And nothing about the merits' subjective prong justifies a lower bar on the clearly established inquiry. In sum, to allow Finley's claim to proceed, the majority bypasses the Supreme Court's instructions, draws an unsound inference, and offers a doubly erroneous justification. As a result, the warden's already difficult task is made even harder. Approximately 20% of male Michigan inmates show symptoms of severe mental illness. . . . If these inmates can't be placed in segregation, what are wardens to do when they threaten safety? Keep them in general population and put others at risk? That might be unconstitutional. Move them to intensive treatment centers? But what if, as here, medical staff decline to refer the inmates to the center? Or what if, as here, the center lacks space or resources to accommodate the inmates? Are wardens expected to second-guess the medical staff's judgments? Or to divert resources from other needed programs? Those options might invite their own set of deliberate-indifference suits. Nothing in the Constitution forces wardens into such a quandary. And qualified immunity certainly gives them more leeway to find a solution.")

Heeter v. Bowers, 99 F.4th 900, 915 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Officer Bowers would have known Mr. Heeter had 'a clearly established right not to be shot' unless he posed a threat of serious or deadly harm to the officers in his home. . . . He concedes as much. But it was also clearly established in November 2018 that, even if Mr. Heeter was armed and had disobeyed the officers' commands, these facts do not alone amount to a threat of serious or deadly harm. . . . In short, any officer would have known it violated the Constitution to shoot a suicidal individual that had moved slightly, even if the person held a gun in their pocket or could grab a gun within reach. Officer Bowers is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Heeter v. Bowers, 99 F.4th 900, 920-21 (6th Cir. 2024) ("The Supreme Court established in 1983 that an officer has an obligation under the Due Process Clause to provide adequate medical care to suspects shot during apprehension. City of Revere, 463 U.S. at 244, 103 S.Ct. 2979. As discussed above, the standard applicable in November 2018 required a plaintiff to show an officer knowingly and deliberately disregarded a detainee's risk of harm in order to prevail on an adequate medical care claim. . . . Since at least 2005, we applied the rule to officers who engaged in banal chatter as a suspect they had asphyxiated sat without breathing. . . . Since at least 2008, it was clear that a police officer who calls paramedics for a critically injured suspect violates the Constitution when he can safely attend to the suspect's obvious injuries, but instead does nothing. . . . Officer Bowers's conduct fits squarely within this precedent; from these rules it 'follow[s] immediately' that he violated the Constitution. . . . He is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the adequate medical care claim. The defendants argue that existing precedent defined the rule at too high a level of generality for it to have clearly established that Officer Bowers needed to provide basic first aid after shooting Mr. Heeter. . . . They correctly note that the cases are each fact dependent. But 'there is no requirement of absolute factual identity before the law may be found to be "clearly established."' . . . And the cases we have described would put officers on notice that their actions (or inactions) were unlawful. . . . True, our qualified immunity analysis rests in part on a fiction that police officers read our cases. That's why only a factually similar case can put officers on 'fair notice' that their actions would violate the law. Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity's Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 619 (2021) (emphasis omitted) (quoting Brosseau v. Haugen, 543

U.S. 194, 198, 125 S.Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004)); see also Sosa v. Martin Cnty., 57 F.4th 1297, 1304 (11th Cir. 2023) (Jordan, J., concurring) (analyzing claim of qualified immunity ‘under the legal fiction’ of ‘a reasonable police officer who read [the relevant] cases’). Supreme Court precedent compels us to sustain that fiction. But that instruction also means we must reject officers’ attempts to use a case’s generalized statements of law, devoid of factual context, to shield themselves from their clearly established constitutional obligations. That a case announces a general rule of thumb tells us little about what is lawful under these facts and circumstances. For ‘fair notice,’ we look to analogous cases (and sometimes, common sense). . . Based on the law in November 2018, the ‘unlawfulness of doing nothing to attempt to save’ Mr. Heeter’s ‘life would have been apparent to a reasonable officer’ in Officer Bowers’s position. . . As the district court concluded, Officer Bowers is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

Gordon v. Burt, No. 23-1775, 2024 WL 1842873, at *2–3 (6th Cir. Apr. 24, 2024) (not reported), pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-73 (U.S. July 23, 2024) (“We previously concluded that Gordon stated an Eighth Amendment violation. . . And notwithstanding the novelty of the coronavirus, it was clearly established before the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic that prison officials cannot exhibit deliberate indifference to an inmate’s exposure to dangerous communicable diseases. . . Although Helling dealt specifically with prison officials’ deliberate indifference to the health risks posed by an inmate’s exposure to environmental tobacco smoke, . . . Helling and cases including Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103-04 (1976), and Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 833 (1994), clearly established the legal principle that, because prisoners have limited or no ability to protect themselves, prison officials have a duty to protect them from involuntary exposure to dangerous prison conditions. . . This duty certainly encompasses not exhibiting deliberate indifference to safety risks to inmates presented by the COVID-19 pandemic. . . For these reasons, we conclude that a reasonable prison official would have understood that she could not exhibit deliberate indifference to the risk to inmate safety presented by the COVID-19 pandemic. Moreover, a reasonable prison official would have understood that, by purposefully commingling infected prisoners with uninfected prisoners, as Gordon alleged here, she was violating the Eighth Amendment. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in ruling that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity at the pleading stage.”)

Chaney-Snell v. Young, 98 F.4th 699, 719-20 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Some courts have suggested that plaintiffs must show more than a de minimis injury to establish a Fourth Amendment violation. See Westfall v. Luna, 903 F.3d 534, 549–50 (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam). Others have suggested that plaintiffs must show more than de minimis force to establish such a violation. See Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 906 (8th Cir. 2011); Nolin v. Isbell, 207 F.3d 1253, 1257 (11th Cir. 2000). In the end, these differing standards are beside the point. ‘[S]ince 1991,’ our precedent has turned on the gratuitous nature of the force—not the de minimis nature of the force or of any resulting injury. . . No matter what other circuits say, we must follow that precedent here. This conclusion rebuts the officers’ final argument: that our cases did not give Chaney-Snell a ‘clearly established’ right against the purportedly de minimis force that he alleged. . . Undoubtedly, the Supreme Court has adopted a demanding test for Chaney-Snell to prove the violation of a clearly established right at the second step of the qualified-immunity analysis. He must show that ‘every reasonable’ officer would have realized that Young and Teichow’s conduct violated the Fourth Amendment under our then-existing precedent. . . In the fact-dependent excessive-force context, moreover, this test generally requires a plaintiff to identify a highly specific right or a case with analogous facts. . . Still, Chaney-Snell has met this demanding test. To begin with, our cases have ‘clearly established that an officer may not use additional gratuitous force once a suspect has been neutralized.’ . . We have stated this legal rule at a specific-enough level of generality for purposes of this case because ‘the unlawfulness’ of the gratuitous force that Chaney-Snell alleges ‘follow[s] immediately from [our] conclusion that [the rule is] firmly established.’ . . In addition, our cases addressing similar levels of force put Young and Teichow ‘on notice’ that the alleged conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . We end with two disclaimers. As for the first disclaimer, courts have suggested that § 1983 does not provide a cause of action for ‘trifling’ injuries—whether a plaintiff alleges a violation of the First Amendment, the Fourth Amendment, or any other right—because the statute incorporates the common-law maxim de minimis non curat lex (the law does not concern itself with trifles). . . We need not consider this statutory question, though, because the officers raise only a constitutional argument about the Fourth Amendment. As for the second disclaimer, courts have suggested that the minor nature of the force or injury supports an officer’s claim that the officer used reasonably necessary force to subdue an arrestee. . . We also need not consider this constitutional question because Young and Teichow do not attempt to justify the alleged kneeling and dragging as reasonably necessary. Rather, they argue that even unnecessary force falls outside the Fourth Amendment when it is de minimis. That rule conflicts with our law.”)

Chaney-Snell v. Young, 98 F.4th 699, 725-26 (6th Cir. 2024) (“If each use of force happened so fast, how could the district court deny qualified immunity on these failure-to-intervene claims? Its decision rested on a legal error about qualified immunity’s second step. The court treated all the challenged actions (the two punches, the kneeling, and the dragging) as one ‘ongoing’ use of force rather than as ‘discrete’ episodes. . . The court thus relied on the length of the entire encounter to conclude that the observing officer (primarily Teichow) had a ‘long enough’ time to prevent seemingly all the applications of force. . . Yet the only case on which it relied to combine the separate actions in this way—Goodwin—considered the continuous use of a taser for 21 seconds. . . This case, by contrast, involves different types of ‘fleeting’ acts. . . When should a court treat distinct acts at different times as a single episode of continuous force? Perhaps the answer should depend on whether Young’s earlier actions (say, the two punches) sufficed to alert a reasonable officer that Young might engage in other types of force (say, the dragging) when completing the arrest. In the end, though, we need not answer this question. Because Goodwin’s facts do not resemble this case’s facts, Chaney-Snell has identified no ‘clearly established Fourth Amendment’ law that compelled the district court’s conclusion. . . So the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Little v. City of Morristown, Tennessee, No. 23-5302, 2024 WL 1530468, at *2–3 (6th Cir. Apr. 9, 2024) (not reported) (“[O]ur 2021 decision in Browner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021), altered our approach for pretrial detainees. Browner reduced the level of mental culpability with which a defendant must act from ‘knowing’ to ‘reckless disregard.’. When it comes to qualified immunity, the timing of this change matters. That is because the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry focuses on ‘whether the officer had fair notice that her conduct was unlawful’ based on ‘the law at the time of the conduct.’. In several qualified-immunity appeals following Browner, we apparently assumed that the new standard applied, even when the conduct at issue pre-dated Browner’s publication. See, e.g., Greene v. Crawford Cnty., 22 F.4th 593, 603–04, 606–07, 614–15 (6th Cir. 2022) (applying Browner standard in qualified-immunity context for conduct that occurred in 2017); Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., 60 F.4th 305, 311, 316–17, 326–27 (6th Cir. 2023) (same); Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 308, 311–12, 317–18 (6th Cir. 2023) (applying Browner in qualified-immunity context for conduct that occurred in 2018); Mercer v. Athens Cnty., 72 F.4th 152, 156–57, 160–61, 164 (6th Cir. 2023) (same). These opinions do not reflect consideration of—let alone a conscious conclusion about. . . one of the legal issues defendants raise here: whether a pretrial detainee’s right to be free from reckless, rather than knowing, disregard of a risk to serious harm was clearly established before Browner’s publication. While this appeal was pending, another panel of this court resolved that question. In Lawler, we held that pretrial detainees’ right to be free from reckless, rather than knowing, disregard to a serious risk of harm was not clearly established until, at the earliest, Browner’s publication in 2021. . . . When the date of the conduct at issue predates Browner, ‘our older decisions applying Farmer to the claims of pretrial detainees provide the only clearly established law’ as of that time. . . . Without the benefit of Lawler’s clarification, the district court applied Browner’s standard—not Farmer’s—when analyzing whether defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. Because we are ‘a court of review, not of first view,’ we vacate the district court’s denials of qualified immunity to Officers Gillett, McFarland, and Smith for the failure-to-provide-medical-care claim and remand for its consideration under Farmer in the first instance. . . . In addition, the district court analyzed the clearly established prong of the defendants’ immunity claims collectively. On remand, it should instead analyze that prong defendant by defendant.”)

Saolim v. Walmart, Inc., 97 F.4th 995, 1009-10 (6th Cir. 2024) (“As an initial matter of timing, the constitutional right must be clearly established at the time that the officer used the force, meaning the law needed to be clearly established as of April 2020, the time of Saolim’s arrest. This Court has held that ‘by 2019, ... the right to be free from physical force when one is not actively resisting the police was clearly established.’. . . And, even more specifically, by 2020, when Bretzloff tased Saolim, ‘it was clearly established in this circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he or she is not actively resisting.’. . . Because Saolim was not actively resisting arrest, his right to be free from tasing and physical force was clearly established in April 2020. Accordingly, Bretzloff is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation, and the district court erred in concluding that he was.”)

King v. City of Rockford, Michigan, 97 F.4th 379, 397-98 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Under the circumstances faced by Abbate, we cannot say that ‘every reasonable official would have understood’ that King’s behavior did not rise to active resistance and thus that the takedown violated the Fourth Amendment. . . While officers may not use a takedown against a generally compliant suspect, . . . ‘[t]here is no clearly established principle that prevents officers from taking individuals to the ground during an investigatory detention who have acted aggressively, failed to follow an officer’s commands, and whose actions suggest they were trying to flee.’ . . Cases deeming levels of force similar to Abbate’s takedown unconstitutional tend not to entail physical resistance, such as the pulling and turning demonstrated by King as he and Abbate paced near the rear of his vehicle. . . The district court accordingly erred in denying qualified immunity for Abbate’s takedown maneuver. . . Although Abbate was entitled to qualified immunity for his use of a takedown maneuver, the district court correctly determined that a genuine dispute of material fact precludes summary judgment as to the reasonableness of Abbate and/or Bradley’s application of a knee on King’s back after the takedown. . . In this circuit, ‘an officer may not use additional gratuitous force once a suspect has been neutralized.’ . . The parties dispute whether King presented resistance to Abbate and Bradley’s attempts to handcuff him after the takedown, and thus whether King was effectively neutralized in this position. Taking King’s testimony as true, one or both officers applied pressure or a knee to King’s back while he was nonresistant, and potentially already handcuffed on the driveway. During this time, King repeatedly warned officers that he was having trouble breathing. Because the entire interaction between King, Abbate, and Bradley on the ground occurs outside the view of the dash camera footage, the record does not resolve this dispute. . . Accordingly, because Abbate and Bradley’s liability for their conduct on the ground turns on which version of the facts one believes, we affirm the district court’s denial of summary judgment on this issue. . . And prior to 2019, this circuit had clearly established that ‘applying pressure to the back of a prone suspect who no longer resists arrest and poses no flight risk is an objectively unreasonable use of force.’ . . Thus, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity as to Abbate and Bradley for this claim.”)

Brown v. Giles, 95 F.4th 436, 442-44 (6th Cir. 2024) (White, J., dissenting) (“This court has said time and again that qualified immunity and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) are ‘often a bad fit.’ . . For good reason: Qualified immunity demands a ‘fact-intensive’ inquiry, . . yet ‘the precise factual basis for the plaintiff’s claim or claims’ is hard to come by at the pleadings stage[.] . . Further compounding the problem, the ‘burden is not high at the 12(b)(6) stage.’ . . Allegations are deemed true, read ‘in the light most favorable to the plaintiff,’ and need only amount to a ‘plausible’ claim ‘that an official’s acts violated a clearly established constitutional right.’ . . Despite the headwinds of the procedural posture, my colleagues uphold the district court’s dismissal of Brown’s claims out the gate, concluding based on qualified immunity that neither of Officer Giles’s alleged uses of a taser on Brown plausibly state a claim for excessive force. I disagree. . . The lead opinion says that the claim based on Giles’s first alleged use of force—tasing Brown in the head while he was running—cannot succeed because there is no ‘binding opinion’ that has deemed that specific conduct unconstitutional. . . But ‘binding’ precedent holding the specific conduct unconstitutional is not the standard for qualified immunity. What matters is whether the challenged action’s unlawfulness is ‘apparent’ given ‘pre-existing law.’ . . That clarity can come from either ‘controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority, . . . as Judge Gibbons’s concurrence also notes[.] . . ‘[I]n an obvious case,’ even general standards

‘without a body of relevant case law’ suffice. . . . Simply put, ‘it is not necessary to find a “case directly on point” in order to show that the law governing a plaintiff’s claim is clearly established. Some measure of abstraction and common sense is required with respect to police methods and weapons’ . . . Indeed, a contrary conclusion would give officers ‘a free pass to use’ weapons ‘in any manner’ they see fit ‘until a case from the Supreme Court or from this circuit involving that particular weapon is decided.’ . . . Qualified immunity demands no such thing. Regardless, the relevant law is clearly established here. A use of force is considered deadly when it poses ‘a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.’ . . . We have previously noted that tasing in risky situations may cause significant harm. . . . And numerous other courts have held that tasing can cause serious injury or death, particularly when a person’s head is involved. . . . Moreover, it is well established that ‘deadly force is objectively reasonable only when there is probable cause to believe that the suspect poses an immediate threat to the officer or to others.’ . . . Here, Brown’s claim based on the tasing of his head should survive the pleadings stage. Tasing involves a significant electrical charge capable of causing ‘excruciating pain.’ . . . The head is among the most ‘sensitive and vitally important part[s] of [the human] body.’ . . . Unsurprisingly, putting the two together poses ‘a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm[.]’ . . . Brown did not pose an immediate threat of serious harm to anyone. His arrest warrant was from a local mayor’s court for failure to pay a fine. He had no weapons and did not physically threaten Giles or members of the public. All Brown did was run. The lead opinion responds that the Supreme Court has not invoked ‘a “robust consensus” of persuasive authority’ to conclude that the law was clearly established, and the lead opinion will not do so here because police officers have challenging jobs. . . . First, ‘in applying the rule of qualified immunity,’ the Court itself has ‘referred to decisions of the Courts of Appeals’—not binding on the Court—‘when enquiring whether a right was “clearly established.”’ . . . Second, even if the Court had not invoked a robust consensus of persuasive authority, the Court has nonetheless confirmed repeatedly that a consensus can be enough. . . . And our court has used nonbinding decisions to conclude that the law was clearly established. . . . Third, binding precedent concerning deadly force and the lethality of applying normally nonlethal weapons to the head operated to define at a reasonably particularized level of generality the unlawfulness of Giles conduct. And fourth, ‘common sense[.]’ . . . alone suggests an officer should know better than to tase a running person posing no threat to others in the head.”) Bambach v. Moegle, 92 F.4th 615, 623-27 (6th Cir. 2024) (“We must determine whether the law clearly established in December 2015 that the failure to return the Bambach children to Bambach following his implied revocation of consent violated the Bambachs’ constitutional rights. The answer is no. Not only is there no existing caselaw that clearly supports the Bambachs’ argument, but the closest factual analogue the Bambachs can identify—Smith v. Williams-Ash—cuts in the state defendants’ favor. . . . The Bambachs argue for an expansive definition of what it means for a right to be clearly established, pointing to Hope v. Pelzer for the proposition that broad legal principles can clearly establish law and provide sufficient notice to state officials even under novel factual circumstances. . . . But the factual circumstances here—especially the facts at the time as known to the state defendants—are not novel. And the one case—Williams-Ash—with similar factual circumstances cuts in the state defendants’ favor. Indeed, this case’s general sequence of events nearly perfectly matches that in Williams-Ash: first, a parent grants explicit consent to temporary placement; then, days later, asks when he could have his kids back and what would happen next in the investigation. . . In that case, such requests were insufficient to indicate to the social worker that the parents no longer consented to their children’s temporary removal from custody. On that ground, we found that the social worker did not violate the parents’ right to procedural due process. . . We also found, in an earlier appeal in the same case, that none of the social worker’s conduct went so far as to ‘shock the conscience,’ indicating a violation of the parents’ right to substantive due process. . . The same principles govern here. Although the Bambachs fail to raise any meaningful arguments that Williams-Ash should not apply here, we acknowledge that the case does differ in certain aspects from the one before us. . . . These distinctions, however, do not change our analysis. While these differences suggest that the question of whether Moegle committed a constitutional violation might be debatable, the case certainly does not clearly establish the legal standards that govern when parents may impliedly revoke their consent. If anything, Williams-Ash arguably implies that parents must expressly revoke their consent and that Moegle’s actions were fully within the bounds of the law. The similarities between that case and this one underscore why Moegle could not have been on notice that her conduct was unconstitutional. . . . In sum, the scenario here goes beyond being merely a novel factual circumstance, . . . and ventures into the realm of being entirely factually inapposite. Indeed, the similarity of Bambach’s conduct to that of the parents in Williams-Ash underscores that it could not have been ‘apparent’ to Moegle that her actions may have violated the law. . . The closer question is whether Williams-Ash clearly establishes that Moegle’s actions were permissible—and the very fact that we might reasonably debate that question means she could not have been on notice that her actions were unconstitutional. Here, we’re not asking whether a violation occurred—we ask only whether the law clearly established that Moegle should have known her acts were unconstitutional. Williams-Ash makes clear that the answer is no. Even assuming a violation existed, then, it’s clear that Moegle ‘reasonably misapprehend[ed] the law governing the circumstances she confronted’—Williams-Ash—and is entitled to qualified immunity because the Bambachs’ Fourteenth Amendment rights were not clearly established under the circumstances here.”)

Mosier v. Evans, 90 F.4th 541, 547-48 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Mosier has not met his burden of identifying a case that should have put Evans ‘on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.’. . He relies heavily on Lawler v. City of Taylor, 268 F. App’x 384 (6th Cir. 2008). But ‘a plaintiff cannot point to unpublished decisions to meet’ the burden of showing a clearly established right. . . And, in any event, the facts of Lawler do not put Evans’ conduct ‘beyond debate;’ and neither do the facts of Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295 (6th Cir. 2002), the published case on which Lawler relied. . . . The dissent introduces two more cases, not presented by Mosier, which it argues clearly establish that Evans acted unconstitutionally. First, it relies on Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356 (6th Cir. 2009), in which Harris, who was handcuffed like Mosier, ‘stepped back’ and was taken down without warning. . . Second, it relies on Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462 (6th Cir. 2013), in which Burgess was ‘compliant’ and merely made an inappropriate comment, which was met with force. . . Those cases do not control because unlike Harris and Burgess, Mosier did not merely step back, and he was not compliant. Rather, Mosier admits that he was ‘attempting to pull away’ from Evans, . . . and the district court found that he did so ‘forcibly[.]’. . . That is consistent with the video evidence, which clearly shows that Mosier forcefully pivoted away from Evans, stepped backward while Evans directed him forward, and swung his elbow upward toward Evans’ arm. As the dissent notes, the parties dispute the extent to which Mosier posed a threat. But the district court concluded, based on the video evidence, that Mosier was resisting and that there was no genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Mosier posed ‘at least some threat.’ . . . Therefore, Evans was permitted to respond with at least ‘some force.’ . . . And the cases the dissent relies on do not clearly establish that Evans responded with too much. . . . The district court properly granted Evans summary judgment on this claim because Mosier has not met his burden of establishing that Evans violated his clearly established rights.”)

Mosier v. Evans, 90 F.4th 541, 556-59 (6th Cir. 2024) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“This case considers whether a plaintiff who was slammed to the ground after briefly attempting to pull away from a deputy can proceed with his civil rights and state law negligence claims. In all but one respect, the majority says he cannot. Because our case law allows the plaintiff to proceed on his Fourth Amendment claim and negligence claims under state law, I respectfully dissent in part. . . . In our Circuit, ‘there undoubtedly is a clearly established legal norm precluding the use of violent physical force against a criminal suspect who already has been subdued and does not present a danger to himself or others.’ . . . Thus, at the summary judgment stage, qualified immunity is inappropriate if there is a genuine dispute of fact as to whether a handcuffed defendant posed a threat to an officer. . . . Stripped of disputed facts, the majority’s analysis is left with only Mosier’s admission that he briefly attempted to pull away from Evans. Harris, a case that also involved an intoxicated and handcuffed arrestee, provides a fair warning that this fact alone does not permit an officer to perform a takedown. . . . In response to Harris, the majority attempts to draw a line between stepping back and briefly attempting to pull away. That strained distinction demands too much. Although qualified immunity presents a high bar, our case law has repeatedly warned that a plaintiff need not show the exact same fact pattern to overcome it. . . . The majority disregards that admonition. It holds that Mosier cannot overcome qualified immunity, although there exists a case involving an intoxicated arrestee, who like Mosier was in handcuffs and already at the jail, just as Mosier was, because he ‘pivoted,’ rather than ‘stepped back.’ In light of our case law, there is a genuine dispute of fact as to whether Mosier posed a threat to Evans by momentarily resisting being pulled along by his clothing, and therefore whether Evans violated clearly established law. Certainly, Mosier is entitled to argue that Evans engaged in excessive force, under these circumstances, by slamming Mosier to the floor. On this basis, I dissent from the majority’s conclusion that qualified immunity bars Mosier’s Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983.”)

Ashford v. University of Michigan, 89 F.4th 960, 975-76 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Even if this argument were not forfeited, . . . there is no doubt that there is a clearly established constitutional right to speak, even as a government employee, on a matter of public concern regarding issues outside of one’s day-to-day job responsibilities, absent a showing that Pickering balancing favors the government’s particular interest in promoting efficiency or public safety. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ashford, as the non-moving party, Ashford has shown that he was engaging in protected speech when he spoke to Hunter about the UM-D's missteps in handling a sexual-assault case. Reasonable officers should have known that penalizing him for doing so would violate his First Amendment rights. Because Ashford's rights were clearly established at the time he was suspended without pay, we hold that the officers involved in his suspension are not shielded by qualified immunity.")

O'Connor v. Eubanks, 83 F.4th 1018, 1022 (6th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, No. 231167, No. 23-1227 (U.S. Oct. 15, 2024) ("The Fifth Amendment's Takings Clause provides that 'private property' shall not 'be taken for public use, without just compensation.' U.S. Const. amend. V. In his complaint, O'Connor alleges that the officials violated the Takings Clause. But under circuit precedent, Eubanks and Stanton are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims. See Sterling Hotels, LLC v. McKay, 71 F.4th 463, 468 (6th Cir. 2023). Earlier this year in Sterling Hotels, we held that individual liability for takings claims is not 'clearly established.' Id. ('[N]o court in this circuit had yet decided whether an officer could be liable for a taking in his individual capacity ... and at least one case suggested the contrary.') (citing Vicory v. Walton, 730 F.2d 466, 467 (6th Cir. 1984)). Thus, we granted qualified immunity to an official sued in his individual capacity. . . Because Eubanks and Stanton are also being sued in their individual capacities for takings claims, they are entitled to qualified immunity under Sterling Hotels."')

O'Connor v. Eubanks, 83 F.4th 1018, 1024-25, 1029 (6th Cir. 2023) (Thapar, J., concurring), cert. denied, No. 231167, No. 23-1227 (U.S. Oct. 15, 2024) ("The Takings Clause sets 'a simple, per se rule: The government must pay for what it takes.' . . But what happens when the government doesn't? Usually, you'd go to court. Yet our circuit has closed the federal courthouse doors on takings claims. First, in Vicory, we arguably foreclosed claims against officials. . . Then, in DLX, we shielded states from suits in federal courts. DLX, Inc. v. Kentucky, 381 F.3d 511 (6th Cir. 2004). Sometimes, a plaintiff can find a municipality to sue for a taking. But other times, as here, there aren't any involved. In these cases, the only remedy is in state court. Neither federal law nor the Constitution dictates this odd result—and recent Supreme Court precedent rejects it. See Knick v. Township of Scott, 139 S. Ct. 2162, 2171 (2019). I write separately to make four points about Vicory. First, Vicory's focus on individual liability supplies the wrong inquiry for qualified immunity. Under the 'clearly established' prong, we should ask 'what happened,' not 'whom can you sue.' Second, despite what Vicory suggests, our constitutional history establishes a strong tradition of takings suits against individual officials. Third, when we combine Vicory with our sovereign immunity precedent in DLX, we effectively require parties to litigate takings claims in state court. And that requirement directly conflicts with the Supreme Court's decision in Knick. Finally, it's unclear that Vicory is actually controlling. Eubanks and Stanton are off the hook for O'Connor's takings claim. But in the future, our circuit can and should permit takings claims against officials. . . . The right to just compensation shouldn't depend on any statute—the Constitution requires it. . . Perhaps, then, plaintiffs could sue an official directly under the Takings Clause. There's certainly more to say on this topic, and we need not resolve that question today. For now, it suffices to say this: our circuit ought to abandon Vicory. It's inconsistent with our constitutional history, and, when combined with DLX, it violates Knick. Instead, we should hold that section 1983 provides a cause of action against officials who inflict unconstitutional takings.”)

Siggers v. Alex, No. 22-1182, 2023 WL 5986603, at *4-6 (6th Cir. Sept. 12, 2023) (not reported) (“On appeal, Alex does not dispute that his conduct conceivably violated Siggers’s Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. . . Rather, his argument focuses on the lack of clarity of the law at the time of the violation; namely, that even if the Kelly and Fuqua information might constitute Brady material today, that point was not clearly established by 1984. Thus, he argues, he is entitled to qualified immunity and reversal of the district court. . . . In evaluating the state of the law in 1984—the time in question for this appeal—we consider Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent. . . In limited circumstances, we may consider out-of-circuit decisions as well, but these decisions must be ‘so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority’ that there can be no doubt of their holding. . . With the stage set, we start by asking what Brady obligations a police officer had as of 1984. In 1963, the Supreme Court first held that prosecutors have an affirmative duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence to criminal defendants. . . By 1984, this circuit and others had extended that disclosure obligation to police officers as well. . . Alex does not seriously dispute that it was clearly established by 1984 that he had an obligation to disclose Brady evidence to the prosecution. But he argues Brady established only a general obligation too broad to clearly establish that either the Kelly or the Fuqua information had to be disclosed. We disagree with respect to the Fuqua statement and threat but agree with respect to the Kelly material. . . . Siggers argues that it was clearly established by 1984 that evidence of a legitimate alternative suspect is ‘favorable’ under Brady and thus had to be disclosed. . . Though we agree as a general matter, Siggers conflates the Fuqua and Kelly information in formulating his standard. Brady provided ample notice that Alex had an obligation to disclose the Fuqua statement and threat but not the Kelly information. From Brady alone, it certainly was not obvious that a statement implicating someone who was cleared as a suspect of the crime, but who might have been mistaken for a second suspect, was Brady material. And Siggers identifies no pre-1984 case from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court, and we cannot find one, that clearly establishes that point. To be sure, with the benefit of hindsight, it is conceivable that the Kelly evidence could have supported Siggers’s theory of Red as an alternative suspect. But had Alex consulted precedent before acting in 1984, he would have found no caselaw that put the issue of whether to disclose the Kelly statement and exclusion of Garland as a suspect ‘beyond debate.’. . Carrillo v. County of Los Angeles does not alter the calculus. 798 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2015). This out-of-circuit case found that, by 1984, it was clearly established that police officers violate a criminal defendant’s Fourteenth Amendment right to due process by withholding evidence of alternative suspects. . . But while we agree that Brady fairly implies that some evidence of alternative suspects must be disclosed, Carrillo does not define alternative suspect evidence, nor is its conclusion ‘so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority’ that there can be no doubt as to its holding. . . We disagree that Brady clearly established a general right as of 1984 to all evidence of alternative suspects. . . Therefore, we find that Alex is entitled to qualified immunity for failing to turn over the Kelly statement to the prosecution.”)

Siggers v. Alex, No. 22-1182, 2023 WL 5986603, at *7 (6th Cir. Sept. 12, 2023) (not reported) (Siler, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“As to the merits, I agree with the majority that clearly established law informed Alex of his obligation to disclose the Fuqua evidence; however, I would also affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity as to the Kelly statements. The majority reviews each alleged violation in isolation; however, we ‘evaluate the material effect of exculpatory evidence by examining the evidence collectively, not item-by-item.’ . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Siggers as we must, Alex was on sufficient notice that withholding the Kelly evidence—evidence of which, as Siggers contends, lends further credibility to Red being a legitimate, alternative suspect when considered collectively with the Fuqua evidence—was a Brady violation. . . In Moldowan v. City of Warren, which dealt with allegations of similar exculpatory evidence, we acknowledged that ‘[d]ecisions from other circuits recognizing the type of “Brady-derived” claims that Moldowan asserts here date back as far as 1964.’ . . While this language could be read as addressing only the issue of whether a police officer had a duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence, we still had to conclude that the claims at issue ‘implicate[d] a clearly established constitutional right,’ which we found that they did. . . And even if this binding precedent’s conclusions do not compel the outcome here, at least four other circuits similarly held that, by 1984, this ‘type of Brady-derived’ evidence must be disclosed. [citing cases] Thus, Alex was sufficiently on notice of his obligation to disclose both the Kelly and Fuqua evidence, and I would affirm, in full, the district court’s denial of qualified immunity.”)

Reed v. Campbell County, Kentucky, 80 F.4th 734, 745-47, 751 (6th Cir. 2023) (“In light of the lack of evidence corroborating the 911 report, a jury could conclude that the officers did not have a reasonable basis for believing that there was someone inside of Reed’s home who needed immediate aid. Thus the officers violated Reed’s constitutional rights by entering his home without a warrant. . . . As in Williams, ‘a reasonable jury could find that Defendants’ warrantless entry into Plaintiff[’s] home violated the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against unreasonable searches.’ . And if the jury finds that there was no exigent circumstance, then, as in Barton, Defendants’ warrantless entry into Plaintiff’s home ‘violated clearly established law.’ . . Foundational principles of the Fourth Amendment establish that forced warrantless entry into an individual’s home is presumptively unreasonable, and when an officer has no objectively reasonable basis for believing that the warrantless entry was supported by exigent circumstances, the officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . It is clearly established that an arrest warrant is required to seize an individual in their home, even if an officer has probable cause. . . And as of 2020, both Payton and Welsh had been the law for more than thirty-five years, ‘making it clear that a double presumption guarded against warrantless entries into a home to arrest a misdemeanor suspect.’ . . The offenses that the officers contend that they reasonably believed Reed had violated are both misdemeanors; . . . it has been reaffirmed by this court as recently as 2013 that warrantless arrests of a misdemeanor suspect inside the home are impermissible. . . Without exigent circumstances, the arrest was presumptively unreasonable. And as above, without an objectively reasonable basis for concluding that someone inside the home needed emergency aid, it is clearly established that the officers could not enter to arrest Reed. . . . Even though we can simply draw the line at active resistance, we have in the past held that ‘it [is] clearly established ... that brandishing a firearm without a justifiable fear that [an individual] was fleeing or dangerous was unreasonable and constituted excessive force.’ . . . We determined that this was clearly established at least as of 2016. . . . Curtis was therefore on notice that it is unreasonable and constitutes excessive force to point a firearm at Reed without a justifiable fear that Reed was dangerous or fleeing. . . . A reasonable jury could find that, by intruding into Robert Reed’s home without a warrant and without any exigent circumstances to excuse their warrantless entry, Curtis and Gray committed a constitutional violation. It was clearly established before the date of their intrusion that a warrantless entry without exigent circumstances was unconstitutional. A reasonable jury could also find that it was a constitutional violation to seize Reed from his home without a warrant, and it was clearly established that such an action violated the Fourth Amendment. Finally, a reasonable jury could find that Curtis violated Reed’s constitutional right to be free from excessive force when he pointed his gun at Reed’s head and that Gray violated Reed’s right to be free from excessive force when he pulled Reed into the driveway and pushed him against the car. It was clearly established that using force against an individual who is not actively resisting the police is unconstitutional. For the above reasons, we AFFIRM the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to both Curtis and Gray on the unlawful-entry, false-arrest, and excessive-force claims.”)

Reed v. Campbell County, Kentucky, 80 F.4th 734, 751-53 (6th Cir. 2023) (Rogers, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I dissent from the holdings that by entering the house and seizing Reed the officers in this case violated clearly established constitutional law. . . . In sum, plaintiff has not adequately shown clearly established law that prevents officers, on reasonable suspicion of domestic physical abuse, from insisting on talking with possible victims. . . . For similar reasons, Reed’s false arrest claim also fails on the clearly established prong. The district court borrowed its clearly established analysis on the false arrest claim from the warrantless entry claim, reasoning that it ‘was clearly established at the time of [Officer] Gray and [Officer] Curtis’s alleged violation’ that ‘absent an exigent circumstance, police may not detain someone inside their home.’ As explained above, the absence of exigent circumstances in this case was not clearly established under existing case law. However, I agree with the majority’s opinion that at this stage the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for engaging in the degree of force that they employed—rough handling and briefly pointing a weapon at Reed’s head—and a jury should resolve those issues.”)

McElhaney v. Williams, 81 F.4th 550, 559-60 (6th Cir. 2023) (“In this day and age, one need not look (or scroll) far to find speech she deems disrespectful. Many of us might share her sentiment. But that does not mean the disrespectful speech opens one up to government retaliation. The First Amendment muscularly protects most types of speech. For today’s purposes, it is enough to say that those protections encompass a parent’s criticism of the ways in which school employees treat the parent’s child at school. . . . In that situation, it is clearly established at a low level of generality that a school official may not retaliate against the parent for the content of his speech. . . . Accordingly, McElhaney has satisfied the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. That leaves the threshold question of whether a constitutional violation in fact occurred, a determination best made by the district court on remand. Cf. Novak, 932 F.3d at 430 (remanding a First Amendment retaliation qualified immunity claim). Back in the district court, the evidence might show that none (or only some) of defendants' actions were motivated by McElhaney's speech, rather than the time, place, or manner of that speech. Or it might show that the ban was not a sufficiently adverse action. . . Either way, these questions are best answered by the district court in the first instance.")

Raimey v. City of Niles, Ohio, 77 F.4th 441, 449-51 (6th Cir. 2023) ("Our court has a line of precedent addressing the use of deadly force against suspects fleeing in cars. When an officer uses deadly force in that situation, we ask whether the officer had 'reason to believe that the car present[ed] an imminent danger' to the lives of 'officers and members of the public in the area.' . . . Deadly force is justified against "a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car," but generally not "once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety," unless "the officer's prior interactions with the driver suggest that the driver will continue to endanger others with his car." . . . In the factual setting in which deadly force was used, a reasonable officer in Mannella's position would not have had reason to believe that Burroughs posed a threat of imminent harm. We therefore affirm the district court's decision that Mannella's use of deadly force was unreasonable and violated Burroughs's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Like the plaintiff in Cupp, Burroughs posed no threat of imminent harm to officers or others, making this an 'obvious case where Tennessee v. Garner clearly establishes the law.' . . . Kirby and Sigley reinforce this conclusion and make clear that it is constitutionally unreasonable to use deadly force where an officer is positioned to the side of a car or is not in danger of being hit, and Cupp gave Mannella fair warning that a reasonable officer would not perceive imminent harm based merely on the fact that the decedent looked at the officer with his hands on the wheel of a vehicle. . . . Moreover, '[g]eneral statements of the law are capable of giving clear and fair warning to officers even where "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful."' . . . Garner long ago established that a non-dangerous fleeing suspect has the right not to be seized with deadly force. Mannella had clear warning of the unconstitutionality of using deadly force to apprehend Burroughs. We affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity.")

Brown v. Knapp, 75 F.4th 638, 655 (6th Cir. 2023) ("Cherrington established in 2003 that officers are assumed to be aware of an individual's right to a probable cause determination within 48 hours. . . . And Drogosch confirmed almost a decade before Brown was arrested that, in Michigan, arresting officers have an obligation to try to secure a probable cause hearing for the person they arrest, including by filing appropriate paperwork. . . . It was therefore clearly established at the time of Brown's arrest that her arresting officers had a duty to take her before a magistrate for a probable cause hearing. The MSP Defendants made no efforts to do so, and they are not entitled to qualified immunity on Brown's Riverside claim.")

Linden v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 75 F.4th 597, 603-05 (6th Cir. 2023) ("Willis held that leaving an injured driver untreated based on the mistaken belief that the driver was dead, which in turn led to the 'jostling' of the pickup truck to secure it for towing so that responders could extricate the presumed-dead body from the wreckage, was insufficient to state a claim under the state-

created danger doctrine because the decedent was not exposed to a private act of violence. . . So it is hard to see how it could be ‘clearly established’ that the First Responders exposed Beauchamp to a private act of violence when they mistakenly believed she was dead and left her in her family’s care to be processed for routine funeral proceedings, which included the Funeral Home employee’s act of putting Beauchamp’s presumed-dead body into a body bag to transport her to a funeral home. . . To be sure, Linden identifies a potential distinction between this case and Willis—the Funeral Home employee in this case was a private actor, whereas Linden says there was no private action in Willis at all. But Willis does not say whether the person who secured the pickup truck to the tow truck worked for a government or for a private entity, nor does the decision rely on that consideration when concluding that the ‘jostling’ of the pickup truck did not amount to a private act of violence. . . And for qualified immunity purposes, any lack of clarity in Willis would only support the First Responders’ position that Linden has failed to identify a ‘clearly established’ right. . . In any event, it is Linden, not the First Responders, who bears the burden of pointing to legal authority that clearly shows that the constitutional question in this case should be resolved in his favor. . . To meet this burden, Linden argues that the viability of a state-created danger theory was clearly established at the time of the First Responders’ conduct in this case. But that argument establishes only the ‘general proposition’ that a state-created danger theory can sometimes be viable, not how the theory applies ‘in light of the specific context of [this] case.’ . . Reviewing those cases in which we have upheld a constitutional claim based on a state-created danger theory reveals that all dealt with situations far afield from this one. . . . Accordingly, Linden cannot overcome qualified immunity with respect to his state-created danger theory. . . . We therefore affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment to the First Responders as to Linden’s constitutional claims on the alternative ground of qualified immunity, without deciding whether the First Responders’ conduct violated Beauchamp’s constitutional rights.”)

Mercer v. Athens County, Ohio, 72 F.4th 152, 164-65 (6th Cir. 2023) (“Because a jury could find that Nurse Gray was deliberately indifferent to Ohlinger’s serious medical needs, we must determine whether the right was clearly established at the time of Ohlinger’s death in June 2018. ‘For a right to be clearly established, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . The ‘unlawfulness must be apparent ... in the light of pre-existing law,’ but ‘[w]e need not ... find a case in which the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . . Several times, we have acknowledged that as early as 1972, ‘where the circumstances are clearly sufficient to indicate the need of medical attention for injury or illness, the denial of such aid constitutes the deprivation of constitutional due process.’ . . ‘Furthermore, we reiterated in 2013 that it is clearly established that a prisoner has a right not to have [her] known, serious medical needs disregarded by a medical provider or an officer.’ Howell, 67 F.4th at 318 (quoting Helphenstine, 60 F.4th at 327). Those cases show that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established in 2018. . . . Nurse Gray knew or should have known of a substantial risk of serious harm to Ohlinger because she had lost consciousness, had a headache, had been reported to have had multiple seizures, and had urinated on herself. Yet when his examinations did not line up with the facts as reported to him by Ohlinger, other inmates, and Officers Jarvis and Lowery, he gave Ohlinger ibuprofen and sent her back to her cell rather than calling for a doctor or sending her to the emergency room, which a jury could find was deliberate indifference. Therefore, we find that Nurse Gray was on notice that his conduct was unlawful, and he is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Sterling Hotels, LLC v. McKay, 71 F.4th 463, 467-68 (6th Cir. 2023) (“To overcome McKay’s qualified-immunity defense as to this claim, Sterling must also show that its due-process rights were ‘clearly established,’ meaning that ‘existing precedent’ placed the relevant ‘statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the Due Process Clause requires ‘that an individual be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest.’ . . . McKay does not argue that any exception to that clearly established rule even arguably applied to his conduct here. Thus, Sterling’s right to advance notice was beyond debate, and McKay is not entitled to qualified immunity. Sterling next argues that McKay engaged in an unconstitutional regulatory taking when he sealed the elevators. At the time of the alleged taking, however, no court in this circuit had yet decided whether an officer could be liable for a taking in his individual capacity—which is the capacity in which Sterling sued McKay here—and at least one case suggested the contrary. See Vicory v. Walton, 730 F.2d 466, 467 (6th Cir. 1984) (“Plaintiff cites no case, and we can find none, that suggests that an individual may commit and be liable in damages for a ‘taking’ under the Fifth Amendment”). McKay’s potential individual liability for a regulatory takings claim was not clearly established when he sealed the elevators. That means McKay is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

MacIntosh v. Clous, 69 F.4th 309, 320-21 (6th Cir. 2023) (“Like the Zilich defendants’ verbal threat to shoot the plaintiff, . . . Clous responded to MacIntosh’s request to condemn violence by displaying a high-powered rifle—a visceral threat of harm made clear by the context of the parties’ discussion of political violence. The remote nature of the Zoom meeting makes no difference, as Zilich made clear that a threat to shoot a person is a qualifying adverse action regardless of whether the targeted person witnesses the threat or whether the threatened harm is likely to occur immediately. . . . Zilich established that threatening gun violence to silence a political opponent constitutes unconstitutional adverse action. Clous had fair warning that it was impermissible to brandish a firearm in response to a citizen’s request that he condemn violence. . . . Zilich and Thaddeus-X therefore clearly proscribe Clous’s conduct. But even if we assume that Clous’s brandishing of a firearm presented a ‘novel factual circumstance[],’ he still had “fair warning” that his actions were prohibited. Where ‘the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful,’ officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law if a general statement of the law gives ‘fair and clear warning.’ . . . The law’s proscription of ‘adverse action’ plainly encompasses threatening a speaker with a high-powered rifle. That the conduct at issue is independently proscribed by state and federal criminal law provides more evidence that brandishing a weapon at someone is ‘fairly and clearly’ adverse. . . . No reasonable official could believe that it was permissible to brandish a deadly weapon in response to MacIntosh’s public comment asking the official to condemn violence. Taken as true, MacIntosh’s allegations plausibly show that Clous is not entitled to qualified immunity because it was clearly established that Clous’s conduct violated MacIntosh’s First Amendment rights. The district court properly denied him qualified immunity. . . .First Amendment law is ‘particularly context-driven,’ . . . and further development of the record is frequently necessary to decide whether qualified immunity is appropriate. . . .At the 12(b)(6) stage, taking MacIntosh’s well-pleaded facts as true, MacIntosh has alleged a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. We AFFIRM the district court’s decision denying Clous’s motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds and remand the case for further proceedings.”)

MacIntosh v. Clous, 69 F.4th 309, 324-26 (6th Cir. 2023) (Sutton, C.J., dissenting) (“The question . . . is not whether MacIntosh had a clearly established right to be free from retaliation for exercising her First Amendment rights; it is whether she had a clearly established right to be free from the display of a rifle (or equivalent actions) during a virtual Board of Commissioners meeting. That simply has not been shown. Had Clous been an avid consumer of the Federal Reporter, not a single case as of January 2021 would have made it ‘apparent’ to him that his display of a rifle during a virtual meeting focused on the right to bear arms was an adverse action that would have deterred a person of ordinary firmness from engaging in public comment. . . .In facing this deficit of case law, MacIntosh primarily invokes Hope v. Pelzer[.]. . . Hope is not a First Amendment case. It is not a retaliation case. And it does not arise in the vexed setting of this case, in which the alleged retaliatory action is a form of speech itself. Hope is an Eighth Amendment case in which the Court said that some cruel and unusual punishments can be ‘so obvious’ that the public official does not need a case to clearly establish the right. . . .But such cases are ‘rare.’ . . .Else, the clearly established inquiry would come to naught. And MacIntosh does not cite a single such case that arose in the First Amendment arena, in which there can be, indeed often are, two sides to the free speech debate. Clous’s actions, moreover, have no fair-minded parallels to the conduct that occurred in Hope. It arose from the handcuffing of a prisoner to a hitching post for hours at a time in the blazing Alabama sun. . . .Any comparison to Clous’s conduct gives comparison a bad name. Tasteless though it was, Clous’s action involved a form of symbolic speech, lasted a few seconds, and was offered in response to a demand from MacIntosh that he say something about a prior resolution to designate the County as a Second Amendment sanctuary and about the actions of the Proud Boys in other places. No clearly established law in this complicated, multi-view setting showed that this conduct amounted to First Amendment retaliation. Once it becomes clear that this case is not covered by the ‘rare’ Hope exception to qualified immunity, . . .that requires MacIntosh to use actual cases involving actual free-speech retaliation. She cannot identify any from the U.S. Supreme Court. She proposes three from our Court: Zilich v. Longo, 34 F.3d 359 (6th Cir. 1994), Thaddeus-X v. Blatter, 175 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 1999) (en banc), and Bloch v. Ribar, 156 F.3d 673 (6th Cir. 1998). The cases do not close this gap.When applicable, qualified immunity is designed to avoid trials, litigation, and discovery. . . .That is why district courts have ‘a duty to address’ qualified immunity ‘prior to discovery,’ . . .and why we must resolve the defense through interlocutory appeals, an exception to the general ban on piecemeal appeals[.]The second prong of the defense, the clearly established inquiry, is particularly well suited for resolution at the motion to dismiss stage because it turns only on issues of law, and in this case almost exclusively on a video of the event. . . .That reasoning controls today’s case in which the parties, to say nothing of the video of the meeting, are of one mind about the essential and material facts.”)

Leftwich v. Driscoll, No. 1575, 2023 WL 3563207, at *___ (6th Cir. May 19, 2023) (not reported) (“Defendants contend that even apart from whether Leftwich’s pistol was pointed at Phillips, the fact that he opened his front door and racked a weapon justified deadly force. It does not. First, the racking of the firearm is also disputed. Second, even assuming Leftwich racked his pistol, this action alone is insufficient to justify deadly force. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Leftwich, Defendants used deadly force against Leftwich when all they knew was that he had opened his front door and likely had a loaded weapon—he had made no threatening remarks and had not pointed his pistol at anyone. Instead, Leftwich armed himself and opened his front door in response to a ‘commotion out in front of [his] house’ in the middle of the night. On these facts, we cannot say that Leftwich posed ‘an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others.’ . . . We agree with our sister circuit’s recent holding that ‘[r]acking a [firearm] inside one’s home, without more, is no more threatening than coming to the door with any other loaded firearm. Indeed, any reasonable officer would presume that an individual carrying a firearm has already loaded it.’ Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 219 (4th Cir. 2022) (citing McLaughlin v. United States, 476 U.S. 16, 17 (1986)). . . . Accepting Plaintiffs’ account of the facts, Defendants violated Plaintiffs’ clearly established rights by using deadly force against them following Leftwich’s opening his front door while holding a pistol but without pointing it at anyone. . . . Here, the question is whether it was clearly established in 2019 that police officers could not use deadly force against a homeowner who, although investigating a nighttime disturbance with a firearm, was not threatening the officers with imminent deadly harm. It was clearly established in 2019 that an individual had the right to arm himself for the purpose of self-defense in his own home. See District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 628–29 (2008). Also, it was clearly established that an individual had the right not to be shot unless there was ‘probable cause to believe that they pose a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.’ . . . And we have repeatedly held that when a suspect possesses a weapon but does not have it pointed at anyone, qualified immunity is generally inappropriate. . . . Therefore, it was clearly established in 2019 that an individual had the right to possess a weapon for self-defense in his own home and cannot be shot simply for possessing a weapon in a nonthreatening manner. Defendants used deadly force against Leftwich only three seconds after he opened his front door while holding a pistol within his home. Although Defendants believed they heard Leftwich rack his pistol, he was holding his pistol down at his side when he opened the door. Because the contours of Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights were sufficiently definite in 2019, we hold that clearly established law precluded Driscoll and Baugh from using excessive force against the Plaintiffs.”)

White, on behalf of Estate of Riley v. Goforth, No. 22-5409, 2023 WL 3546527, at *3-7 (6th Cir. May 18, 2023) (not reported) (“Riley does not contend that Goforth personally violated her constitutional rights. Instead, she seeks to hold Goforth liable for failing to intervene in two alleged constitutional violations committed by Wilkey—an unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment and a coerced baptism in violation of the First Amendment’s Establishment Clause. Successful failure-to-intervene claims are rare and largely limited to one context—the use of excessive force. . . . The Supreme Court has not extended failure-to-intervene liability beyond those borders.³ [fn. 3: The Supreme Court has not yet made clear whether any precedent other than its own can clearly establish law for § 1983 purposes. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8 (2021).] At the time of the incident, our court had found officers liable for failing to intervene in an unlawful arrest in one published case. . . And we know of no case from this or any other circuit that has held an officer liable for failing to intervene in an Establishment Clause violation. From the start, then, Riley’s claims against Goforth are on shaky ground because, for a right to be clearly established, the ‘legal principle must have a sufficiently clear foundation in then-existing precedent.’ . . And the plaintiff usually must produce a case illustrating that legal principle at work in a closely analogous factual setting, so that every reasonable officer would have fair warning that his conduct was unlawful. . . Riley’s claims fail because she cannot do so. . . . Goforth’s involvement with Wilkey and Riley was limited both in duration and in terms of what he knew. He knew what minimal information Wilkey had conveyed, and everything Goforth personally observed largely indicated that Riley was at the boat launch of her own volition and free to leave at any point. Based on these facts, we could surely say that every reasonable officer should have known that this situation was highly unorthodox. But that is not the question before us. The Fourth Amendment question asks whether Riley was being held against her will; the duty-to-intervene question asks, among other things, whether Goforth should have known it; and the qualified-immunity question asks whether every reasonable officer in Goforth’s position would have understood that he had a duty to intervene. Given what Goforth knew at the time, we cannot say that every reasonable officer in Goforth’s situation would have known that Riley was not a willing participant, free to leave when she wished, but had instead been unlawfully seized. And without knowledge of the underlying constitutional violation, Goforth cannot be liable for failing to stop it. . . . [W]e can find no case that had ever found an officer liable where his fault was not his own endorsement of religion, but his failure to intervene in someone else’s. . . Absent any such case, we struggle to see how the contours of any duty to intervene could be ‘so well defined’ that it would have been ‘clear’ to Goforth ‘that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . Whatever one might say about Wilkey’s conduct, his case is not before us. And we must assess Goforth’s liability individually. Given that there is no evidence in the record that Goforth knew of any coercion, Goforth’s liability is not ‘obvious.’ . . He is entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim.”) Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 317-18 (6th Cir. 2023) (“In response to the deliberate indifference claim, the individual Hamilton County Defendants assert qualified immunity. . . .As explained above, the Estate fails to carry its burden of showing a constitutional violation on the part of Deputy Collini and Sergeant Hunt, so they are entitled to qualified immunity. But because a jury could find that Deputy Erwin violated Howell’s constitutional right to be free from deliberate indifference to his serious medical need, we analyze whether that right was clearly established in 2018. . . . ‘As early as 1972, we stated that “where the circumstances are clearly sufficient to indicate the need of medical attention for injury or illness, the denial of such aid constitutes the deprivation of constitutional due process.”’ . . ‘Furthermore, we reiterated in 2013 that it is clearly established that a prisoner has a right not to have his known, serious medical needs disregarded by a medical provider or an officer.’ . . Under comparable circumstances, in Phillips v. Roane County, we denied qualified immunity to officers who inadequately monitored an inmate exhibiting signs of a serious medical condition. . . The officers were tasked with monitoring the inmate in an observation room, observed her concerning symptoms, and disregarded prison protocols, ultimately leading to a failure to pursue further medical intervention. . . The same is true in this case; Erwin observed Howell’s condition, was tasked with monitoring him, and failed to follow policy in doing so, which a jury could find amounted to deliberate indifference. We hold that Erwin was sufficiently on notice that such conduct was unlawful and is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Miller v. Gettel, No. 22-1034/1046, 2023 WL 2945340 (6th Cir. Apr. 14, 2023) (not reported) (“The Supreme Court has held that ‘the Constitution does not require the Government to disclose material impeachment evidence prior to entering a plea agreement with a criminal defendant.’ United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622, 633 (2002) . . . But Ruiz did not address whether the same is also true for exculpatory evidence, and the circuits are divided or undecided on that question. . . In the § 1983 context, however, we have held that there is no ‘clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining.’ Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 621-22 (6th Cir. 2014). Because under Robertson a right to pre-plea disclosure of exculpatory evidence was not clearly established when Miller pleaded guilty, the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to Gettel and Fondren as to Miller’s Brady claim.”)

Miller v. Gettel, No. 22-1034/1046, 2023 WL 2945340 (6th Cir. Apr. 14, 2023) (not reported) (Larsen, J., concurring) (“I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately to point out an additional reason why Miller’s failure to intervene claim is barred by qualified immunity—Miller has not cited (and cannot cite) any clearly established law in support of his claim. The majority opinion correctly notes our ‘recogni[tion], in some circumstances, that “officers must affirmatively intervene to prevent other officers from violating an individual’s constitutional rights.”’. . . When considering the ‘clearly established’ prong of a qualified immunity claim, it is the particular circumstances that do all the work. . . So, ‘to show a violation of clearly established law, [Miller] must identify a case’ that would have put Gettel and Fondren on notice that their ‘specific conduct was unlawful.’. . . Miller does not have one. Each case Miller offers is readily distinguishable. Two involved an officer’s failure to intervene in the violation of a different constitutional right. Bruner v. Dunaway, 684 F.2d 422, 426 (6th Cir. 1982) (excessive force); Jacobs v. Vill. of Ottawa Hills, 5 F. App’x 390, 395 (6th Cir. 2001) (false arrest). And the third, Smith v. Ross, 482 F.2d 33 (6th Cir. 1973), didn’t involve a failure to intervene claim at all. Such ‘materially distinguishable’ cases are not sufficient to show clearly established rights. . . Bunkley cannot help Miller either. Bunkley was an ‘unjustifiable arrest’ case. . . So the most Bunkley can do is clearly establish that officers have a duty to intervene in false arrests that are ‘materially indistinguishable’ from the circumstances of the false arrest at issue in Bunkley. Bunkley’s broad language gesturing toward other constitutional violations not at issue in that case cannot clearly establish that officers have a duty to intervene in any constitutional violation under any factual circumstances. Instead, the clearly established ‘inquiry “must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.”. . Miller readily acknowledges that ‘most failure-to-intervene claims involve allegations of excessive force.’. . And he cites no case holding an officer liable for failure to intervene in any constitutional violation other than excessive force or false arrest. It follows, then, that Miller has not produced a case ‘materially [in]distinguishable’ from his own; and neither is this the ‘obvious case.’. . Gettle and Fondren are entitled to qualified immunity on this basis alone. But, as the majority opinion correctly concludes, Miller’s claim fails on the merits as well, so I concur.”)

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 64 F.4th 736, 750-52 (6th Cir. 2023) (“The district court found that the Sixth Circuit had recognized backward-looking access-to-courts claims and defined the elements of the claim with particularity, thus making it beyond debate that restricting an individual’s access to the courts is a constitutional violation. . . It rejected Marburger’s argument that, based on Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988 (6th Cir. 2017), Jackson was required to identify a specific case with a similar fact pattern. . . The district court reasoned that in contrast to those officers, Marburger had at least several weeks to consider whether redacting the substantive information from Jackson’s file would violate his rights. . . It concluded that Jackson had stated a claim that Marburger knowingly violated Jackson’s rights. . . At the time of Marburger’s actions, it was clearly established that ‘if a party engages in actions that effectively cover-up evidence and this action renders a plaintiff’s state court remedy ineffective, they have violated his right of access to the courts.’. . The contours of this right must be ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.’. . The Supreme Court has repeatedly urged the courts of appeals that general principles can clearly establish law only in obvious cases, . . . and has criticized the courts of appeals for citing cases ‘too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances[.]’ . . The question then becomes whether the principle outlined in Spurlock and Swekel is sufficiently specific or whether the facts of those cases are sufficiently similar that every reasonable official in Marburger’s position would know that concealing exculpatory information by redacting the investigative file violated Jackson’s right of access to the courts. Swekel refers to two examples of situations in which officials engaged in cover-ups that constitute violations of the right of access to the courts: one in which police officers concealed a murder by one of their officers, and one in which prosecutors covered up the fact that a murder had occurred and that one of their fellow prosecutors was the murderer. . . And the court in Swekel denied the plaintiff’s access-to-courts claim because she had not shown that the defendants’ actions had rendered her state-court suit ineffective. . . Spurlock is closer; it considered a prosecutor who engaged in obstructive actions and to whom the Sixth Circuit denied qualified immunity. That prosecutor, however, engaged in egregious conduct that included coercing witnesses to maintain false testimony and concealing evidence that would have revealed a wrongful conviction. . . The rule set out in Swekel and Spurlock, that a violation of the right of access to the courts occurs when an official ‘engages in actions that effectively cover-up evidence, thereby rendering a plaintiff’s court remedy ineffective,’. . . is too general. ‘[T]he unlawfulness of [Marburger’s] conduct’ “does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [the rule is] firmly established.”. . We do not believe that every reasonable official would conclude that redacting exculpatory information included in a response to a public-records request constitutes ‘actions that effectively cover-up evidence’ on par with coercion of witnesses or concealment of a murder. The Sixth Circuit had never considered an access-to-courts claim based on redaction in a response to a public-records request, and a reasonable official, considering the legal landscape at the time, could conclude that they would not be violating constitutional or statutory law by redacting exculpatory information from a response to a public-records request. Marburger did not interfere or coerce witnesses or conceal evidence of a murder, as detailed in Swekel and Spurlock. Ohio state law at the time expressly classified all investigatory work product and trial preparation material as not public records for the purposes of public-records requests, which would arguably allow the refusal to disclose exculpatory information contained in those records. . . State law also created an alternative method for defendants to access investigative records and any exculpatory information therein. . . Furthermore, the Supreme Court has held that defendants do not have a Brady right to exculpatory evidence in the postconviction context and must show instead that ‘consideration of [the] claim within the framework of the State’s procedures for postconviction relief “offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental,” or “transgresses any recognized principle of fundamental fairness in operation.”’. . A reasonable official could conclude that, in light of Osborne, they had no special obligation to provide exculpatory information outside of ordinary state procedures for obtaining postconviction relief, provided that those procedures are adequate. We cannot say that every reasonable official would have apprehended that they were violating Jackson’s constitutional right of access to the courts by redacting exculpatory information when responding to a public-records request, even if they did so purposefully. We hold that Marburger is protected by qualified immunity because in 2016 it was not clearly established that redacting exculpatory information from a response to a public-records request constituted ‘actions that effectively cover-up evidence’ and thus actions that violate the right of access to the courts.”)

Helphenstine v. Lewis County, Kentucky, 60 F.4th 305, 327 (6th Cir. 2023) (“It has been true since 1972 that ‘where the circumstances are clearly sufficient to indicate the need of medical attention for injury or illness, the denial of such aid constitutes the deprivation of constitutional due process.’. . ‘Furthermore, we reiterated in 2013 that it is clearly established that a prisoner has a right not to have his known, serious medical needs disregarded by a medical provider or an officer.’. . . Just like in Greene, Helphenstine experienced a dangerous medical condition for at least a day before his death. The Lewis County defendants did not provide any medical assistance during that time beyond two doses of antiemetics. Helphenstine’s right not to have his serious medical needs disregarded by the Lewis County defendants was clearly established in this scenario. . . Accordingly, none of the remaining Lewis County defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Caskey v. Fenton, No. 22-3100, 2022 WL 16964963, at *8–11 (6th Cir. Nov. 16, 2022) (not reported) (“The Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from unjust prosecution. . . This separate, constitutionally cognizable claim is ‘entirely distinct’ from the claim of false arrest or seizure without probable cause. . . The tort of malicious prosecution remedies injuries associated not with the absence of legal process, but with the wrongful institution of legal process. . . There are four elements to a malicious prosecution claim under § 1983: (1) a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and the defendant ‘made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute’; (2) there was a lack of probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of a legal proceeding, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial seizure; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff’s favor. . . Despite the name, ‘malice’ is not required to show malicious prosecution under § 1983. . . Here, the third element is conceded by the officers, so we only consider the first, second, and fourth elements. The first element of malicious prosecution ‘is met when an officer “could reasonably foresee that his misconduct would contribute to an independent decision that results in a deprivation of liberty” and the misconduct actually does so.’ . . Satisfying every factor, Caskey presented evidence to establish a constitutional violation of malicious prosecution. However, the heart of the officers’ appeal on this claim is that the violation was not clearly established at the time of Caskey’s arrest and prosecution and therefore should be disregarded. We take up that issue now. . . Although the right to be free from malicious prosecution is clearly established, it is narrow. . . ‘A police officer violates a suspect’s clearly established right to freedom from malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment only when his deliberate or reckless falsehoods result in arrest and prosecution without probable cause.’ . . Thus, a plaintiff must assert that an officer has participated in his prosecution by making deliberate or reckless falsehoods where the officers and the prosecutor would have lacked probable cause absent those falsehoods. . . It is clearly established that officers violate the Constitution by knowingly or recklessly making false statements that form probable cause for the plaintiff’s arrest and prosecution. . . In Caskey’s case, it was therefore clearly established in November 2018 that the right to be free from malicious prosecution extends to deliberate or reckless falsehoods that result in arrest and prosecution without probable cause. . . This standard includes deliberate falsehoods as well as omissions and inconsistencies that evince a reckless disregard for the truth. The officers’ alleged behavior reaches at least the kind of reckless disregard for the truth demonstrated in Gregory. This means Fenton and Harshbarger were on notice that reckless or deliberate falsehoods providing probable cause are actionable as a constitutional violation when they could reasonably and foreseeably lead to arrest and prosecution. Finally, the officers argue that the prosecutor’s dismissal of Caskey’s case was not clearly established as ‘favorable termination’ at the time of his arrest and prosecution. Newly articulated in Thompson v. Clark, 142 S.Ct. 1332 (2022), the modern ‘favorable termination’ standard requires only that the plaintiff’s prosecution end without a conviction. . . However, the officers contend that this precedent is too recent to be ‘clearly established’ at the time of the facts at issue in this case and therefore we must apply the ‘favorable termination’ standard that existed in 2018. The officers are correct that Thompson contradicts this court’s approach, though nonprecedential, that existed at the time of Caskey’s case. . . But the officers’ argument is flawed in two ways: first, the rule in Thompson did not need to be ‘clearly established’ at the time of this case for its rule to apply; and second, even under our old standard, Caskey has shown favorable termination. The standard for favorable termination did not need to be ‘clearly established’ at the time of the wrongful conduct in order to support a malicious prosecution claim because it does not relate to a government actor’s conduct subject to qualified immunity protections. The requirement that a violation be ‘clearly established’ exists to put government officials on notice of wrongful conduct and protect officers acting in discretionary roles. . . . When determining whether a right is clearly established, we ask whether the law was ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand what he is doing is unlawful.’. . . . When measuring the moment when that right needed to be clearly established, we look at the state of the law ‘at the time of the officer’s conduct.’. . . . ‘This “clearly established” standard protects the balance between vindication of constitutional rights and government officials’ effective performance of their duties by ensuring that officials can reasonably anticipate when their conduct may give right to liability for damages.’. . . . In the context of malicious prosecution, the fourth element of ‘favorable termination’ involves no conduct or facet of conduct by officers because any actions have already occurred by the time we consider how the prosecution concluded. It creates no additional notice for officers to describe how the legal process must terminate to give rise to a malicious prosecution claim. Buttressing this point is the question of when the element of favorable termination would have needed to be established. There is no clear answer. The favorable termination element of malicious prosecution need not be ‘clearly established’ in order to bring a § 1983 claim. Further, application of Thompson supports this view. In the wake of Thompson, sister-circuits have applied its new, broader standard to cases where dismissal occurred under an older, different standard, with no indication that the wrongful termination element fails to have been ‘clearly established’ at the time of conduct. . . . Nor did the Supreme Court in Thompson make any indication that its new standard would fail the ‘clearly established’ prong on remand. . . . Even if our pre-Thompson standard applied, the officers’ argument would still fail. Thompson abrogated and expanded the Sixth Circuit’s approach to the issue of favorable termination. Before Thompson, and at the time of Caskey’s case, the rule (albeit nonprecedential) was that ‘termination must go to the merits of the accused’s professed innocence for the dismissal to be “favorable.”’. . . . Determination of whether a termination was favorable was a legal determination to be made by the trial court, unless factual disputes surrounded the dismissal of the case. . . . The district court engaged in a factual inquiry to determine whether the circumstances of a case’s dismissal indicated that the plaintiff was innocent of the charges. . . . Here, the district court (performing its analysis pre-Thompson) correctly determined that Caskey established a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the prosecutor’s decision to dismiss the charges was indicative of innocence. Drawing the facts in the light favorable to Caskey, the record shows the prosecutor sought dismissal due to ‘insufficient evidence to prove identification,’ and Caskey claims that he shared with a prosecutor a video of Robert Taliaferro admitting that he was the driver of the Altima on November 11, 2018. While competing evidence exists about whether Caskey paid court costs associated with dismissal, this court does not balance facts. We fulfill our role by concluding that the district court properly determined that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the circumstances surrounding the dismissal of Caskey’s charges were indicative of innocence and whether Caskey paid court costs. Under the facts pled, the district court correctly denied the officers’ motion for summary judgment on Caskey’s § 1983 malicious prosecution claim.”) respond that they are at least entitled to qualified immunity because no clearly established legal rule gave them ‘fair notice’ that their stop lasted too long under the circumstances. Gambrel v. Knox County, 25 F.4th 391, 400 (6th Cir. 2022) (quoting Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7 (2021) (per curiam)). Yet the Supreme Court has adopted a ‘bright-line rule’ that officers may not detain a driver for longer than necessary to complete a traffic stop simply because they want to investigate other crimes. . . Under Klaver’s view of the facts here, Wilkey and McRae did just that. Indeed, the deputies do not really contest the ‘law’: they do not dispute that if they extended the stop longer than they needed for the traffic infractions, Rodriguez’s rule would apply. . . Rather, they contest the ‘facts’: they claim that they did not extend the stop. . . The legal defense of qualified immunity does nothing to insulate this factual dispute from the jury. . . . [O]ur clearly established caselaw would have left no doubt for any reasonable officer that Klaver’s nervousness and reluctance to cooperate did not create reasonable suspicion, absent additional evidence of criminal activity. . . . A reasonable jury in this case. . . could find that the stop’s traffic-related purposes would have ended well before the dog sniff if the officers had not been investigating drug crimes.”)

Campbell v. Cheatham County Sheriff’s Dep’t, 47 F.4th 468, 480-82 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied sub nom Fox v. Campbell, , 144 S. Ct. 70 (2023) (“Fox . . . contends that he believed Mark was holding a gun when Mark began opening the door. However, this is a genuine dispute of fact, as Mark contends that he was not holding a gun . . . and there is evidence in the record that the officers did not know what, if anything, Mark was holding. We lack jurisdiction to resolve the factual dispute over what Fox perceived that evening when Mark slightly opened the door. . . Accepting the Campbells’ version of the facts, a reasonable jury could find that Fox’s use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, we turn to whether the right was clearly established. . . . [V]iewing the record in the light most favorable to the Campbells, Floyd, . . . decided a decade before the incident here, clearly establishes that Fox’s conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Under the Campbells’ version of events, Floyd is controlling. Mark was in his own home, unarmed, when Fox knocked on his door late in the evening. Though Mark did not make any threatening gestures indicating a danger of physical harm to others, Fox began repeatedly shooting at him without warning. In both cases, the officers had some reason to believe that the suspect had a weapon. Despite this, we determined in Floyd that the officers’ use of force was excessive. This finding comports with our caselaw at the time of Fox’s use of force, which made clear that merely possessing a weapon, without more, is insufficient to justify the use of deadly force against a suspect. . . . Given this clear precedent and the analogous facts of Floyd, any reasonable officer in Fox’s position would know that using deadly force, under the circumstances that the Campbells have asserted, was unconstitutional. . . . Accepting the Campbells’ version of events, as we must in this interlocutory appeal, Fox used deadly force while conducting a welfare check, shooting eight times into the home of two unarmed nonthreatening individuals without warning. The ‘fortuity that [Fox’s] shot[s] failed to strike [the Campbells]’ does not take this case out of the Fourth Amendment’s protection against unreasonable seizures. . . The Campbells were seized when Fox shot at their house, thereby restricting their freedom to leave. There remains a genuine dispute of material fact regarding how Mark appeared to officers that night, but in the light most favorable to the Campbells, Fox's use of deadly force was clearly excessive and unconstitutional. The district court properly determined Fox was not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. We affirm.")

Campbell v. Cheatham County Sheriff's Dep't, 47 F.4th 468, 482-83, 488-90 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied sub nom Fox v. Campbell, 144 S. Ct. 70 (2023) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) ("This excessive-force case involving qualified immunity presents a threshold question: Did Officer Fox seize Mark and Sherrie Campbell under the Fourth Amendment when he fired his gun at Mark eight times, thankfully striking no one? Under current law, including the Supreme Court's recent decision in Torres v. Madrid, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021), I believe the answer is no. And regardless, neither the Campbells nor the majority points to an on-point case that gave Officer Fox notice that his conduct constituted a seizure. Next, even if Officer Fox seized the Campbells, he acted reasonably given that Mark announced he had a gun and then quickly opened the door at point-blank range with something in his hand. And, in any event, no case exists that would have put Officer Fox on notice that his conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. I would grant Officer Fox qualified immunity, so I respectfully dissent Here, neither the Campbells nor the majority 'identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here.' . . . Because I don't believe that Officer Fox seized either of the Campbells, I would stop here and grant qualified immunity. But even if Officer Fox did seize them, his conduct was reasonable. To decide whether Officer Fox's use of force was reasonable, we must balance Officer Fox's use of force with the threat that Mark posed to Officer Fox and his partner. . . . 'If you were a police officer, what risk of getting shot would you be willing to face before' firing your weapon at a suspect who announced he had a gun, then, without warning, opened a door mere feet away from you? . . . That's the choice Officer Fox faced here. And I believe that he made a reasonable one. . . . [I]t's clear that when officers are close to a suspect and have reason to believe he's armed, either because of his statement or other gestures, the use of deadly force is reasonable. . . . Moreover, even if Officer Fox seized the Campbells, the law didn't provide him sufficient notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . . In nonobvious cases like this one, the Campbells must identify a case that put Officer Fox on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. . . . The Campbells land on Floyd v. City of Detroit as that case. . . . Above all, the officers in Floyd had much less reason to feel threatened by Floyd than Officer Fox did by Mark. Those officers were responding to a call about a dispute from more than an hour before regarding a suspect with a weapon. . . . And although the first officer who fired did so without hearing from Floyd first, Floyd testified that he yelled that he didn't have a gun before the second officer fired, striking him. . . . Mark himself announced that he had a gun just seconds before opening the door. What's more, Floyd's hands were empty and extended out in front of his body. . . . It's clear that shooting an unarmed man with his hands out based on a stale tip is markedly different from shooting at someone feet away who announced they had a gun and opened a door without warning. Floyd is thus materially distinct and an improper case for providing Officer Fox notice that his conduct was unlawful.")

Fugate v. Erdos, No. 21-4025, 2022 WL 3536295, at *12–13 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) (“Stoudemire—and more generally, the seminal Supreme Court case, Bell—clearly established that where a corrections official lacks any penological interest for a search, the ‘general’ standard is sufficient to place a reasonable officer on notice because the case is an obvious one. . . . That conclusion is harmonious with the Supreme Court’s admonitions for determining whether a right is clearly established in Fourth Amendment excessive force cases. In excessive force cases, where the constitutional test is ‘objective reasonableness,’ an officer will not be able to fairly ‘determine how the relevant legal doctrine’ applies to his case without a sufficiently similar factual scenario that theoretically places the officer on notice that his conduct is unlawful. . . . The same is true in unlawful search cases: where the constitutional test is one of objective ‘interest-balancing, the point at which the constitutional shades into the unconstitutional will necessarily be gray.’. . . But where there is no governmental interest, there’s nothing to balance against the interests of the inmate, and the outcome of a one-sided ‘apples-only’ balancing test is obvious. . . . Here, under Fugate’s version of the facts, this is an ‘obvious’ case. . . . As discussed at length above, whether the warden had any penological purpose for ordering three daily strip searches for an inmate in a J1 slammer cell turns on the disputed issue of whether an inmate in such a secure, isolated cell could have obtained contraband from an inmate porter (the warden’s asserted justification for the search) or some other way. Under Fugate’s version of the facts, without any legitimate penological purpose for the excessive number of invasive strip searches, the general standards in Stoudemire and Bell suffice to clearly establish the constitutional violation.”)

Fugate v. Erdos, No. 21-4025, 2022 WL 3536295, at *13-14 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) (“We held in 1992 that, in the context of a prison strip search, force applied ‘maliciously and sadistically’ and not in a ‘good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline’ violates the Eighth Amendment’s Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. . . . Although Cornwell is not ‘directly on point,’. . . the ‘operative inquiry’ is “‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’”. . . Under Fugate’s version of the facts, Cornwell would have made it clear to any reasonable officer in the warden’s position that maliciously imposing 90 strip searches in a period of 30 days to punish Fugate violates the Eighth Amendment. True, the Supreme Court has been clear regarding Fourth Amendment violations that specificity of prior cases is ‘especially important’ because it can be difficult for an officer to know whether his conduct is objectively reasonable in a given scenario. . . . But the Court has not required the same level of specificity for Eighth Amendment violations. That lines up with the purpose of qualified immunity: fair notice. . . . It is difficult for an official to conform his actions to the constitution with notice of only a general objective reasonableness standard. It is much easier, however, for a reasonable official to conform his conduct to the Constitution with notice that he cannot impose punishment with a ‘malicious[] or sadistic[]’ subjective state of mind, even without a prior case with facts that specifically match the official’s case. . . . In all, Cornwell is sufficient to make ‘clear to a reasonable officer[.]’ . . . that it violates the Eighth Amendment to impose a draconian number of strip searches ‘maliciously and sadistically’ for the purpose of punishment rather than in a ‘good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline[.]’. . Thus, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity to the warden on Fugate’s Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Grant v. Wilson, No. 21-5642, 2022 WL 3500190, at *8–9 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) (“The question here by analogy would be whether it is clearly established that an officer cannot use deadly force when a person is undisputedly wielding a firearm in close proximity to the officers, but is not aiming the firearm at the officers, and the person does not respond to commands to drop the weapon. The administrator does not point to any cases in which we have held that an officer used excessive force under analogous circumstances. . . . Recent Supreme Court precedent cuts against the administrator’s argument that it is clearly established that officers cannot use lethal force when confronted with a person wielding a firearm. In recent cases, the Court held that officers were entitled to qualified immunity when facing potential threats from weapons that are less lethal than a firearm. [discussing City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. 600 (2015) and City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11 (2021) (per curiam).] In another recent case, we held that the officers’ use of force was reasonable when the officers fired at a man who was holding a firearm pointing up, even though it was undisputed that the man did not at any point aim the firearm at the officers. See Thornton v. City of Columbus, 727 F. App’x 829, 838 (6th Cir. 2018). . . . We further rejected the argument that the officers acted too quickly in using deadly force. . . . The Thornton decision contains several factual similarities to the instant case, most notably that it was undisputed that the victim never aimed his firearm at the officers and it was unclear whether the victim was moving towards the officers when he was shot. While there were other factors at play in Thornton, such as the fact that the police had responded to a report of a man threatening other people with a gun, . . . the reasoning regarding the use of force when the gun was not aimed at the officers is similar enough to the facts of this case to prevent the administrator of Grant’s estate from successfully arguing that it was clearly established that such conduct was prohibited.”)

Shumate v. City of Adrian, Michigan, 44 F.4th 427, 449-50 (6th Cir. 2022) (“In sum, our analysis of the three Graham factors leads to the conclusion that the officer’s use of force was not objectively reasonable considering the totality of the circumstances. The objective facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Shumate, show that the severity of the offense (assuming there was one) was quite low; he posed no immediate threat to officer safety; and he offered nothing more than verbal belligerence or passive noncompliance. Accordingly, the district court did not err in finding that a reasonable jury could find that Powers violated Shumate’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . .By 2019, when this incident occurred, the right to be free from physical force when one is not actively resisting the police was clearly established. . . It was also clearly established in this Circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he is not actively resisting. . . Consequently, Powers violated those rights by tasing Shumate three times and using physical force where Plaintiff was not engaged in active resistance. . . Under Shumate’s version of the facts, there was no indication that he committed a severe crime, posed an immediate threat to Powers, or attempted to evade arrest by flight or resisted arrest. Because the right to be free from being tased and subjected to physical force (in the alleged form of punching, knee strikes, kicking, and hitting) while not actively resisting and while being non-violent was clearly established prior to 2019, Powers was on ‘notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.’. . Thus, a reasonable jury could find that Powers violated Shumate’s clearly established right to be free from excessive force. The district court properly denied Powers qualified immunity for the § 1983 claim.”)

Skatmore, Inc. v. Whitmer, 40 F.4th 727, 739 (6th Cir. 2022) (“[T]here is no clearly established precedent that pandemic-era regulations limiting the use of individuals’ commercial properties can constitute a Fifth Amendment taking. In fact, the overwhelming majority of caselaw indicates that such regulations are not takings.”)

Bell v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 37 F.4th 362, 367-68 (6th Cir. 2022) (“For the tasing, we start and end with the second: Was Bell’s right not to be tasered clearly established in these specific circumstances? The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the right was clearly established. . . And to do so, a plaintiff must point to a case showing that reasonable officers would have known their actions were unconstitutional under the specific circumstances they encountered. . . Except in an ‘obvious’ circumstance, it’s not enough for a plaintiff to offer cases that merely stand for the ‘general proposition’ that the Fourth Amendment bars the use of excessive force. . . Instead, when it comes to excessive force, the Court has repeatedly told us that specific cases are ‘especially important.’. . The unlawfulness of the officer’s acts ‘must be so well defined’ that no reasonable officer would doubt it. . In addition, a plaintiff cannot point to unpublished decisions to meet this burden. Basic logic tells us at least this much. After all, the qualified-immunity inquiry looks at whether a right has been clearly established. For a right to be clearly established, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . So at a minimum, Bell must provide on-point caselaw that would bind a panel of this court. Bell fails to do so. He fleetingly cites a single published case that found tasing the plaintiff constituted excessive force. But there, the defendants offered no video evidence. . . So the court had to adopt the plaintiff’s explanations—that he never resisted arrest, never threatened the officers, and ran away from them during handcuffing to avoid getting hit. . . Here, indisputable video evidence shows Bell actively resisting—he repeatedly pulled his left arm away from Langewicz to avoid the handcuff (even after officers warned that he would be tased if he didn’t comply). . . So Brown, which assumed no active resistance, doesn’t come close to providing the officers notice that tasing Bell was excessive here. Nor do Bell’s other cases help. All are either out-of-circuit or unpublished, and thus do not clearly establish anything as to the officers. Plus, those cases also diverge from Bell’s.”)

Wiley v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 36 F.4th 661, 669-70 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Wiley argues that Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc. ‘clearly established that putting substantial or significant pressure on a suspect’s back while that suspect is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.’. . Champion is distinguishable because in that case Champion was face down, handcuffed, and bound at the ankles by a hobble strap. . . Witnesses testified that officers sat on his back while he was prone on the ground. . . Also, Champion was no longer resisting, and officers continued putting weight on his back. . . In this case Thomas consistently resisted efforts to be restrained and he was not yet hobbled. Shaffner testified that he did not put pressure on Thomas's chest or breathing cavity, and no evidence rebuts this testimony. Champion fails to demonstrate that the actions of Andrews and Shaffner violated a clearly established right. Next Wiley argues that Martin v. City of Broadview Heights clearly establishes a right against the force used on Thomas. . . In Martin a mentally unstable individual that displayed no risk to others was subdued through severe force by law enforcement. This court found in Martin that the level of force used did not match the threat Martin presented. . . Officers lay on Martin, fell on him, dropped a knee into his side, punched his face and torso repeatedly, wrapped his pelvis area with one officer's legs and then gripped his chin and neck, and kneeled on his calves. . . In Martin there was little safety risk to others and the officers applied compressive body weight to his chest. . . In this case Thomas presented a safety risk to officers, paramedics, and himself. Officers here also did not apply compression to Thomas's chest, whereas at one point three officers were on top of Martin. . . The facts in the instant case are distinguishable; Martin does not offer a clearly established right against the measures used to restrain Thomas nor is it applicable to the circumstances presented by Thomas's combative behavior. Finally, Wiley relies upon Griffith v. Coburn, but it is not persuasive. . . In Griffith officers used an unprovoked neck restraint tactic. . . There is no allegation of a similar tactic being used on Thomas; therefore, Griffith does not demonstrate a clearly established right relevant to this case. Wiley cannot meet her burden of demonstrating a clearly established right as of January 14, 2017, prohibiting the use of the techniques used by Andrews and Shaffner on Thomas under the circumstances of his erratic and combative behavior. Because Wiley cannot show that Thomas had a clearly established right against the type of force that was used, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Burnett v. Griffith, 33 F.4th 907, 912-15 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Because we ultimately conclude that Sergeant Griffith did not have fair warning that his specific conduct violated Burnett’s Eighth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force, the circumstances of this case warrant addressing the ‘clearly established prong’ first and obviate the need to address whether Sergeant Griffith in fact violated Burnett’s rights under the Eighth Amendment. The relevant inquiry is thus whether Sergeant Griffith had fair warning that propelling a handcuffed prisoner to the floor, in response to the prisoner’s attempt to break free, was ‘an unreasonable method of regaining control of a prisoner in a [room] occupied only by other jail officials.’ . . . There are indeed similarities between the facts of Cordell and those in the present case. Both Cordell and Burnett were handcuffed and in an area of the jail where only jail officials were present. But unlike in Cordell, Burnett created an immediate exigency by pulling away from Sergeant Griffith in an attempt to break free from Sergeant Griffith’s grasp. The act of breaking away from an officer’s control is a far greater show of resistance than the act of turning toward an officer. Although Burnett was restrained by handcuffs with his arms behind his back, the video plainly establishes that Burnett was resisting control, which was never the situation with Cordell. The fact that Cordell was always under control was a key consideration in this court’s ultimate holding that a reasonable jury could find that the prison officer in that case used excessive force. . . . In sum, the contours of the fair-warning requirement that were satisfied in Cordell do not extend to the circumstances of Burnett’s case. Cordell makes clear that the Eighth Amendment includes the right to be free from a jail official's use of excessive force against a compliant prisoner who is handcuffed and in an area of the jail where only other jail officials are present. Whether the prisoner is under control can thus be characterized as an important determinate of the right established by Cordell. . . The video evidence here shows that Burnett was resisting control at the time that Sergeant Griffith used force to restrain him. Cordell thus cannot fairly be extended to this case to conclude that Sergeant Griffith had fair warning that his use of force to take Burnett to the floor, in response to an exigency created by Burnett, was a violation of Burnett's rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Sergeant Griffith's actions were not so egregious as to obviate the requirement of identifying precedent that places 'the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate' such that Sergeant Griffith was placed on fair warning that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . And in further contrast to Taylor and McCoy, the video evidence in this case establishes that Sergeant Griffith's use of force was motivated by an exigency created by Burnett's actions. . . Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the state of the law at the time that Sergeant Griffith acted did not provide him with fair warning that his actions would violate Burnett's Eighth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. The district court accordingly did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Sergeant Griffith on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Lee v. Russ, 33 F.4th 860, 863-66 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[C]onstruing the record evidence in the estate's favor as we must at this stage, a reasonable jury could find that Russ violated Groom's constitutional rights. Groom did not pose an imminent and serious risk when Russ fired his weapon. Russ, the closest individual, stood near the back of his vehicle 30 feet away. Officer Lee provided cover with his firearm from behind Groom. Aside from telling Russ '[n]ot today' when Russ said they needed to talk, . . . Groom did not make any verbal threats. He stood still for roughly 20 seconds, lowered his knife to waist height, then made one step sideways to Russ. This was not a threatening advance or at least that is what a jury could find on this record. Even so, Russ fired the shot as soon as Groom 'began to move.' . . Granted, Russ knew that Groom had robbed a pharmacy. He knew that Groom had unsheathed a knife when the officers confronted him and disregarded commands to drop it. And he knew that Groom had walked to a position 30 feet away and that Groom told Russ to shoot him. But all record facts considered, Groom's actions in the moments before the shooting did not justify lethal force. Even Officer Lee thought that Groom had calmed down and 'didn't see any reason for a shot to be fired from where' he stood behind Groom. . . On this record, a reasonable jury could find that Russ used excessive force. In the second place, this right was clearly established in this context. . . . What was true in Sova, what was clearly established there, governs us here. Both cases involved a knife-wielding man who disregarded commands to drop the weapon. Each man told officers to shoot him. And each man moved just before being shot. One man opened a screen door and started moving onto a porch where officers stood. The other man took a halting step from 30 feet away after remaining stationary for 20 seconds. When it comes to the threat of imminent and serious harm posed by these fateful movements, there are no material distinctions. If anything, Sova might be the harder case, because the officers were closer to the suspect and at greater risk given his prior aggressive movement onto the porch, and because Sova's movement was directly toward the officers. . . . Russ resists this conclusion. He argues that we should not entertain the estate’s argument concerning the sideways direction of Groom’s fateful step because the estate raised it for the first time on appeal. But the estate argued all along that ‘[t]he video speaks for itself,’ . . . and that Groom’s ‘minimal’ movement did not create an imminent threat[.] . . . It has not abandoned its position, mainly premised on the video, that Groom took a halting step perpendicular to Russ, not toward him. . . . The district court reasoned that Reich v. City of Elizabethtown, decided after the shooting in this case, muddies the water. . . . Reich involved a ‘knife-wielding belligerent’ with severe schizophrenia who was not taking his medication, apparently prompting him to think ‘everybody [was] out to get him’ and apparently prompting him to ignore officers’ ‘demands that he drop the knife.’ . . . Just before being shot, the suspect ‘walked at a fast pace toward the officers,’ had his knife hand raised in a ‘stabbing position,’ and said ‘you’re gonna have to kill me mother*er.’ . . . The law did not clearly establish that the officers’ use of force lacked justification, we held, even granting the plaintiff’s theory that the suspect took a step away just before the shooting. . . . That was in part because the suspect posed a threat not just to the officers, but also to ‘neighborhood residents,’ as the encounter occurred in a front yard and the officers had seen the man ‘pacing back and forth between houses in the neighborhood’ and ‘acting bizarre.’ . . . Groom’s conduct differed materially. He stopped moving toward Russ for 20 seconds and lowered his knife to waist height. And Groom’s step from 30 feet away did not suggest that he posed an immediate threat to anyone in the area. That makes this a meaningfully different case from Reich. Sova, by contrast, constitutes ‘[p]recedent involving similar facts’ sufficient to move this case ‘beyond the otherwise hazy border between excessive and acceptable force and thereby provide an officer notice that a specific use of force is unlawful.’”) Novak v. City of Parma, 33 F.4th 296, 304-05, 312 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 773 (2023) (“Whether Novak’s satirical posts were protected parody is a question of fact. . . . But Novak didn’t just post fake event advertisements mocking the police department. He also modeled his page after the Department’s, using the same profile picture. He deleted comments that let on his page wasn’t the official one. And when the Department tried to clarify that Novak’s page was imitating its own, he copied the official page’s clarification post word for word. . . . Whether these actions—deleting comments that made clear the page was fake and reposting the Department’s warning message—are protected speech is a difficult question. After all, impersonating the police is not protected speech. . . . And for good reason—one can easily imagine the mayhem that a scam IRS or State Department website could cause. . . . But while probable cause here may be difficult, qualified immunity is not. That’s because qualified immunity protects officers who ‘reasonably pick[] one side or the other’ in a debate where judges could ‘reasonably disagree.’ . . . That’s just what the officers did—they reasonably found probable cause in an unsettled case judges can debate. Indeed, Novak has not identified a case that clearly establishes deleting comments or copying the official warning is protected speech. So even with Leonard’s protected-speech rule on the books, the officers could reasonably believe that some of Novak’s Facebook activity was not parody, not protected, and fair grounds for probable cause. What’s more, the officers had good reason to believe they had probable cause. Both the City’s Law Director and the judges who issued the warrants agreed with them. Reassurance from no fewer than three other officials further supports finding that the officers ‘reasonably,’ even if ‘mistakenly,’ concluded that probable cause existed. . . That’s enough to shield Riley and Connor from liability. Thus, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Novak’s retaliation claims. . . Little did Anthony Novak know when he launched “The City of Parma Police Department” page that he’d wind up a defendant in court. So too for the officers who arrested him. At the end of the day, neither got all they wanted—Novak won’t be punished for his alleged crime, and the defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Novak’s civil claims. But granting the officers qualified immunity does not mean their actions were justified or should be condoned. Indeed, it is cases like these when government officials have a particular obligation to act reasonably. Was Novak’s Facebook page worth a criminal prosecution, two appeals, and countless hours of Novak’s and the government’s time? We have our doubts. And from the beginning, any one of the officials involved could have allowed ‘the entire story to turn out differently,’ simply by saying ‘No.’ . . Unfortunately, no one did. Because the law compels it, we affirm.”) LaPlante v. City of Battle Creek, Michigan, 30 F.4th 572, 581-83 (6th Cir. 2022) (“[I]n this case, we cannot completely determine the nature of the interaction or the communications between Plaintiff and Officer Ziegler from the video alone. That task is best left to a jury. Plaintiff and the district court rightly compare this case to our opinion in Baker v. City of Hamilton, 471 F.3d 601 (6th Cir. 2006). In that case, we held that qualified immunity is inappropriate where there is a dispute regarding whether a suspect stopped and raised his hands in the air during a police encounter, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the suspect’s movements indicated that he had surrendered. . . This case is factually analogous to Baker in various respects, even considering the fact that, unlike in Baker, the record includes a video depicting the moment when Plaintiff raised his hands in the air ahead of the takedown maneuver. . . That is because a reasonable jury could view the video and determine that Plaintiff surrendered when he raised his hands. Importantly, we have determined that the use of a takedown maneuver, in a variety of scenarios, can amount to excessive force. [collecting cases] Considering the factors outlined by the relevant caselaw, this case presents genuine disputes as to Officer Ziegler’s use of force, both as Ziegler engaged in the takedown maneuver and as he proceeded to ‘put pressure on [Plaintiff’s] back, upper body, arms, and the side of his head.’ . . Where, as here, the available video is not clear as to those factors, . . . we must reject Ziegler’s qualified immunity defense because a reasonable jury could find that his use of force violated Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Viewing the disputed facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Officer Ziegler violated Plaintiff’s clearly established right to be free from excessive force when he employed the takedown maneuver. While Defendants claim that no reasonable officer in Ziegler’s shoes would have known that it was constitutionally excessive to use a takedown maneuver to subdue an intoxicated, uncooperative person, the extent of Plaintiff’s cooperation is disputed here. . . We have held that takedown maneuvers are excessive when officers deal with a ‘generally compliant’ suspect, and that the police may not use physical force against a subdued, non-resisting subject. . . We have also established that such a maneuver is excessive when a suspect surrenders to the police, does not offer resistance, and/or when the interaction happens in the presence of multiple officers. . . Considering the totality of the circumstances, and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, an objective officer in Ziegler’s shoes was on ‘notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.’”)

Murray v. Dep’t of Corrections, 29 F.4th 779, 790 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Courts have frequently rejected officials’ contentions that a ‘legal duty need ... be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury’ in the context of Eighth Amendment claims. . . Murray argues that in 2011 and 2012—when Dr. Heyd was treating him—the two constitutional rights at issue in this case were already clearly established. Those rights are (1) the Eighth Amendment right to be free from the denial or delay of adequate treatment for serious medical needs, and (2) for prison officials to diligently carry out the prescribed treatment plan. As discussed below, both rights were clearly established at the time that Dr. Heyd was treating Murray. [discussion of rights and precedents]”)

Trozzi v. Lake County, Ohio, 29 F.4th 745, 760-61 (6th Cir. 2022) ([W]e need not decide whether Snow’s decision not to seek immediate emergency help for Trozzi amounted to a constitutional violation. For when that same conduct ‘does not violate clearly established ... [federal] rights of which a reasonable person would have known,’ it is not necessary to decide whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . In other words, finding that Snow did not violate a clearly established right is a separate ground by which we may affirm the district court. . . Turning, then, to the clearly established inquiry, qualified immunity is appropriate unless the officer in question had ‘fair notice’ that her conduct was unlawful. . . To provide such notice, the scope of the constitutional right must be ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [she] is doing violates that right.’ . . Whether the official had such notice is ‘judged against the backdrop of the law at the time of the conduct.’ . . Critically, we do not define clearly established law at a ‘high ... level of generality.’ . . While a case need not be ‘directly on point for a right to be clearly established,’ the burden is on the plaintiff to show that closely analogous precedent has placed the ‘constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . As an initial observation, we agree with Trozzi that pre-Browner case law—that is, cases that consider whether the government official was subjectively aware of the detainee’s serious medical issues—is the appropriate focus for determining what constitutional rights are clearly established. After all, a change in the law (such as Browner) that occurs after the official’s conduct is ‘of no use in the clearly established inquiry.’ . . This view joins that of the majority of our sister circuits who have held that Kingsley modifies the Farmer test. See Balsewicz v. Pawlyk, 963 F.3d 650, 657 & n.5 (7th Cir. 2020); Ross v. Corr. Officers John & Jane Does 1-5, 610 F. App’x 75, 77 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015). But see Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 672 (9th Cir. 2021).”)

Montgomery v. Whidbee, No. 21-5327, 2022 WL 1008284, at *3 (6th Cir. Mar. 16, 2022) (not reported) (“It is clearly established that the voting rights of pretrial detainees are protected by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See O’Brien v. Skinner, 414 U.S. 524, 529–30 (1974). Jamison argues she is protected by qualified immunity unless Montgomery can identify a case that found a constitutional violation in the precise circumstances she faced, which Montgomery failed to do. A case with the precise factual scenario need not be found, however,

‘for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right’ such that the right is clearly established. . . The relevant inquiry is whether the law was clear enough that a reasonable official in her position would have recognized that her actions were unconstitutional. . . There are no controlling cases directly on point to this factual scenario, but it is arguable that a reasonable official would have recognized that delaying the processing of a pretrial detainee’s absentee ballot would unconstitutionally interfere with the detainee’s right to vote. The right is thus clearly established. Montgomery’s complaint, construed liberally and in his favor, must plausibly allege that Jamison was deliberately indifferent to the fact that her conduct would violate his right to vote. See Brawner v. Scott Cnty., Tenn., 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021). The deliberate indifference standard is an objective one and requires more than mere negligence. . . Montgomery must show that Jamison ‘disregarded a known or obvious consequence of [her] action.’ . . . Given the twenty-day delay in giving Montgomery his requested application and four-day delay in returning the notarized application in the face of the clearly stated deadline, Montgomery plausibly alleges that Jamison was deliberately indifferent that her conduct would violate his right to vote. A reasonable official in her position would have been aware that her actions were unconstitutional, and she is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.”) Palma v. Johns, 27 F.4th 419, 429-32, 438-44 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Where ‘a plaintiff claims that excessive force was used multiple times, “the court must segment the incident into its constituent parts and consider the officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity at each step along the way.”’ . . Here, Plaintiffs claim that Johns used excessive force in three ways: (1) by tasing Palma three times, . . (2) by taking initial shots at Palma, and (3) by continuing to shoot Palma even after Palma bent over with his hands on the ground. After viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Palma, if ‘a jury could conclude that [the defendant] engaged in gratuitous violence by using force beyond the scope of that which was reasonably necessary or justifiable,’ then the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . . Johns could not have tased Palma merely for refusing to stop and show his hands unless he had some other reason to fear for his safety. . . Palma never physically resisted. However, the parties agree that Palma ignored Johns’ orders to stop moving and take his hands out of his pockets. Even so, this defiance, alone, cannot justify Johns’ decision to tase Palma. . . If the jury accepts Johns’ version of events—that Palma ‘aggressively’ approached him with a ‘crazed look on his face,’ . . then the taser applications may have been reasonable. At the summary judgment stage, however, we do not blindly “accept the officers’ subjective view of the facts.” . . As discussed below in relation to the shootings, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Palma’s mere failure to follow orders would not lead a reasonable officer to believe that Palma posed a danger. . . .Accepting the facts most favorable to Plaintiffs, the tasings amounted to excessive force, and Defendants were not entitled to summary judgment on this issue. . . . In reality, mental illness may mitigate the risk in one situation and aggravate the risk in another. Therefore, we cannot simply defer to an officer’s post hoc use of mental illness as a justification for using force. Rather, if a jury could find that a reasonable officer would not perceive an imminent threat of danger—or would use other de-escalation tactics—then qualified immunity is unwarranted. . . Based on the undisputed facts that

Johns knew Palma was mentally ill and that Palma was unresponsive but not threatening throughout the entire encounter, mental illness in this case was a mitigating factor showing that Palma did not pose an immediate threat. . . Furthermore, Palma's mental illness is relevant when considering whether Johns used excessive force. 'The diminished capacity of an unarmed [person] must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted.' . . While we have found that using a taser or pepper spray on a mentally ill person was reasonable, . . . we have never held that shooting a mentally ill person was reasonable when the officers had little reason to suspect that the person was armed. . . A jury is best positioned to balance these considerations. . . It must be remembered that the police were called to the scene only because of a family dispute over a TV remote control. Johns should have waited for backup before engaging with a mentally ill man who posed no immediate threat to anyone. Even after engaging with Palma, Johns still could not use force that was 'grossly disproportionate to the need.' . . After tasing Palma, Johns had the opportunity to subdue him using other, non-lethal methods such as handcuffs or his baton. Indeed, Johns pulled out his baton, extended it, and raised it above his head ready to strike Palma. Ultimately, Johns abandoned any attempt to use the baton after Palma turned back towards Johns. If an officer reasonably unholsters his gun during an encounter, it may be unreasonable to expect him to swap out the gun for a less lethal tool. . . But the opposite happened here; Johns unholstered his gun even though a less deadly alternative was already in his hands. Furthermore, if the entire encounter lasted eight to ten minutes, Johns may have been able to safely pursue other options such as getting into his patrol car and awaiting backup. . . While each of these factual considerations is distinct, none can be considered standing alone. Altogether, the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, raise a triable issue as to the reasonableness of Johns' decision to use lethal force. Defendants focus primarily on Palma's disobedience; Palma purportedly kept walking towards Johns and refused to show his hands. But equally important is that Johns knew Palma was mentally ill; Palma did not commit any crime before Johns arrived; he did not threaten Johns; he did not make any threatening gestures, like raising his fists; and he did not visibly brandish a weapon. Palma walked towards Johns at a normal pace—and it is the jury's job to decide whether this was 'aggressive,' as Johns said. After tasing Palma, Johns saw one of Palma's hands, but still did not see any weapons. According to Melissa, the encounter lasted eight to ten minutes and, even while approaching Johns, Palma never got within ten to fifteen feet of Johns. Under these circumstances, Johns lacked probable cause to believe that Palma posed an imminent threat of serious bodily harm. . . . Finally, Plaintiffs argue that, even if the tasing and initial shooting were reasonable, Johns acted unreasonably by continuing to shoot at Palma with a second volley of shots. Once an officer eliminates the imminent threat, any continued use of force is unreasonable. . . . As Plaintiffs note, the number of shots fired is certainly relevant, but it is not dispositive. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Johns continued shooting even though he could now see that Palma was not holding a weapon, Palma was not moving, and Palma was bent over with his hands on the ground. In that situation, any threat Palma posed dissipated after the first few shots and that Johns acted unreasonably by continuing to shoot Palma. . . . As we held in Wright, officers violate the Fourth Amendment by tasing a man who is not under arrest, does not physically resist, and is not visibly armed, even if the man defies the officers' orders and officers cannot see his hands. . . Thus, a reasonable officer would know that tasing

Palma violated his clearly established constitutional rights. . . Second, ‘it is axiomatic that individuals have a clearly established right not to be shot absent “probable cause to believe that [they] pose[] a threat of serious physical harm.”’. . Under our precedents, reasonable officers would know that Palma did not pose a threat of serious physical harm and, therefore, using lethal force would be unconstitutional. An officer does not have probable cause to justify deadly force just because the person’s hands are in his pockets and the officer cannot see his hands. . . . Under Plaintiffs’ factual account, Johns had no reason to believe that Palma ‘pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm.’. . Under the circumstances, shooting Palma violated clearly established constitutional law. . . Finally, ‘[w]e have held repeatedly that the use of force after a suspect has been incapacitated or neutralized is excessive as a matter of law.’. . Thus, by continuing to shoot after Palma was bent forward or on the ground, Johns violated Palma’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . . Plaintiffs raise genuine disputes of material fact that bear on whether Deputy Johns violated Vincent Palma’s clearly established constitutional rights. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court’s order granting Defendants’ motion for summary judgment and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Palma v. Johns, 27 F.4th 419, 444-45, 454, 456-58, 460-61 (6th Cir. 2022) (Readler, J., dissenting) (“If one were unsure about the power a circuit court can wield, this case is a blunt example. With two circuit judges in agreement, a majority opinion can run roughshod over a well-reasoned opinion by an experienced and dispassionate district court judge. It can selectively amplify arguments barely made by the parties and can willfully resurrect others long ago abandoned. And, perhaps most striking of all, it can entirely ignore our Court’s prior decisions as well as those from the Supreme Court, comforted by the knowledge that few decisions garner review beyond the appellate panel stage. . . .[I]n beating a new path in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, the majority opinion dramatically—and dangerously—limits the ways in which officers can protect themselves during threatening encounters. By the majority opinion’s logic, an officer may not act too soon, for fear of engaging in excessive force. But he also may not wait too long. For if he does, the majority opinion reasons, that proves the threat posed to the officer was not immediate, rendering the officer’s actions excessive. And while the officer waits (and hopefully remains unharmed), he must attempt alternative uses of force. Unless, of course, that alternative is a taser. Yet all of this goes out the window, we learn, if the officer knows the individual has some vague mental health issue. While the majority opinion ties its holding to the individual’s mental health status, it never explains how an officer is to respond to a threatening individual believed to be suffering from mental distress, short of advising officers to hide in their cars rather than intervene in a potentially hostile situation. Instead, the majority opinion erects a seemingly insurmountable standard to justify an officer’s use of force in encounters with a person suffering mental distress. Doing so effectively bars a grant of qualified immunity if the officer is generally aware an individual faces such challenges. That is not how we have previously interpreted the Fourth Amendment. Nor, for even more obvious reasons, is it reflective of a clearly established rule in our Circuit. . . . All things considered, the majority opinion simply ‘substitut[es] [its] personal notions of proper police procedure for the instantaneous decision of the officer at the scene.’. . Nowhere is this more evident than in the majority opinion’s assessment, from its perch on the bench, years after the incident at hand, that ‘[Officer] Johns should have waited for backup.’ . . . This approach tramples our decades old understanding that it is not ‘appropriate for us, in the quietude of our chambers, to second-guess ... [an officer’s] on-the-scene judgment.’ . . . Accordingly, we should affirm the grant of summary judgment to Officer Johns. . . . Assuming, for purposes of argument, that the Palmas’ claims satisfy the first step of qualified immunity, they wildly fail the second. Step two’s legal framework is familiar. . . . To prove that Vincent’s right in this instance was clearly established, the Palmas bear the burden to either ‘identify a case that put [Officer Johns] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful’ or show that the case is an ‘obvious’ one, such that the generalized Fourth Amendment standards set forth in Graham and Garner “‘clearly establish” the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . . In other words, a plaintiff faces a fork in the road: present controlling, on-point contemporaneous case law, or show that the violated right was obvious. Yet standing at that fork, the Palmas proceeded down neither path. Officer Johns’s assertion of qualified immunity obligated the Palmas to explain why Officer Johns’s conduct—either the tasing or the shooting—violated clearly established law. . . . On appeal, however, they left those questions largely unanswered. Here again, the Palmas’ litigating decisions should spell the end of the case. Enter the majority opinion. Once again, it comes to aid the Palmas, both crafting an argument on the Palmas’ behalf—this time, that Officer Johns violated clearly established law—and then evaluating that argument. And, unsurprisingly, the majority opinion agrees with the argument it advocates. This approach is as disrespectful to the legal process as it is unprecedented. . . . [T]he district court did not address the clearly established prong at all, and . . . the appellant did not raise the issue on appeal. . . . In a situation like this, where the district court did not consider a potentially case-dispositive issue, the ordinary and more prudent practice is to remand the matter to the district court for further consideration. . . . And the majority opinion’s decision to issue a published case declaring the clearly established law of our Circuit without prior consideration by the district court and full development of the record is, quite literally, a rush to judgment. . . . Were it appropriate for the clearly established inquiry to make its debut on appeal, Officer Johns’s conduct did not violate clearly established law. The Palmas effectively concede that there is no on-point, controlling case law prohibiting Officer Johns’s conduct. In their appellate briefing, the Palmas confessed that ‘there is no Sixth Circuit precedent directly on point with the facts of this case.’ They likewise failed to cite to any on point Supreme Court decision. Those concessions foreclose this manner of overcoming qualified immunity. . . . In the absence of a controlling, on-point case, the Palmas are left to show that this is the rare, ‘obvious’ case where the general excessive force standard articulated in Graham and Garner clearly established the law. . . . But the Palmas essentially concede this argument too. After all, they describe their case in their brief as one involving ‘factually nuanced questions,’ not obvious and blatant misconduct. . . . With the Palmas having failed to offer any manner of argument that Officer Johns violated any clearly established law, we must affirm the judgment of the district court. . . . That surely would be the result in most cases. But not here, we learn. Unwilling to accept the Palmas’ concessions, the majority opinion takes it upon itself to show that Officer Johns violated clearly established law. Setting aside the procedural oddities of the referees taking shots for one team, none of the majority opinion’s cases clearly establishes that Officer Johns’s uses of force were unreasonable. Several of the majority opinion’s cases were decided after the shooting, meaning that they ‘could not have given fair notice to [Officer Johns] and are of no use in the clearly established inquiry.’ . . . And all of the cases involved factually different circumstances. . . . [T]he majority opinion essentially duplicates its analysis as to whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred when it addresses the separate clearly established prong. That approach, however, eviscerates the two-step qualified immunity inquiry. . . . It deems a finding that an officer’s use of force violated the Fourth Amendment (because he lacked probable cause to believe the person posed a sufficient threat) as tantamount to a finding that the officer violated a clearly established right. Here too, the majority opinion runs afoul of bedrock Supreme Court precedent, this time cases holding that resolution of step one does not automatically resolve step two. . . . The majority opinion, of course, has some company of its own. But it is not respectable company to keep. By my count, the Supreme Court has summarily reversed our sister circuits at least ten times in as many years for incorrectly analyzing the clearly established prong. [collecting cases] The majority opinion bears a striking resemblance to, among other cases, the decisions reversed in Emmons, Kisela, White, and Mullenix. In each instance, the Supreme Court reiterated the courts of appeals’ error in failing to identify on-point, controlling precedent holding that the official’s conduct was unconstitutional, and instead erroneously relying on the general statement that excessive force violates clearly established law. . . . Regrettably, we have not learned from these past mistakes. At day’s end, qualified immunity ‘protects “all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.”’ . . . Because the Palmas have not come close to satisfying that demanding standard, I would affirm the judgment of the district court.”)

Moser v. Etowah Police Dep’t, 27 F.4th 1148, 1151-52 (6th Cir. 2022) (“On appeal, we consider Moser’s allegations as one excessive-force claim because Davis’s actions cannot be meaningfully separated into two distinct uses of force. When Davis decided to intervene on the porch, he took Moser to the ground, and he immediately pinned her to the ground. . . . In other words, Davis’s alleged kneeling on Moser was effectively a continuation of his efforts to bring Moser to the ground. To be sure, we typically analyze ‘the subject event in segments when assessing the reasonableness of a police officer’s actions.’ . . . On the other hand, however, we have considered immediately consecutive uses of force as one excessive-force claim when the plaintiff asserted that the uses of force were excessive for the same reasons. . . . Since Davis’s actions cannot be meaningfully separated into two different uses of excessive force, we consider Moser’s allegations as one claim that Davis used excessive force to throw Moser to the ground and pin her there. . . . On these facts, which of course may ultimately be rejected in whole or part by the jury, Davis violated a clearly established constitutional right, and Davis was therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the excessive-force claim. Of course, to prevail on an excessive-force claim, Moser must show that Davis’s use of such force amounted to a violation of Moser’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . . By September 2017, it was clearly established in this circuit that a person has a constitutional right to be free from injury-threatening physical force when he or she is not actively resisting the police, and Davis violated this right by taking Moser to the ground with such force that she broke two bones and then pinning her to the ground. Put another way, since a reasonable juror could conclude that Davis knew Moser was not actively resisting arrest, Davis was not entitled to throw Moser to the ground and pin her there.”)

Wood v. Eubanks, 25 F.4th 414, 427-28 (6th Cir. 2022) (“In Henry v. City of Flint, we denied qualified immunity because ‘there was no ground for believing there was a basis for arresting [the plaintiff]—other than his profanity and verbal abuse of the officers, which we have clearly held is not, standing alone, a basis for an arrest.’. . . Henry was decided in 2020, so the defendants contend it cannot clearly establish Wood’s right to be free from arrest in 2016. But Henry did not represent a change in the law. Henry relied on our decisions in Greene v. Barber and Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, which we decided in 2002 and 2011, respectively. . . In Greene, we held that the plaintiff’s ‘right not to be arrested for insulting a police officer [was] ‘clearly established.’”. . . The same goes for Kennedy. Although the plaintiff in that case ‘used coarse language,’ he ‘did not pose [a] risk of public alarm’ because there were ‘no third parties ... whom an arrest would protect’ or whom the plaintiff disturbed. . . We said then that ‘the First Amendment requires ... police officers [to] tolerate coarse criticism,’ and ‘[e]ven crass language used to insult police officers does not fall within the “very limited” unprotected category of “fighting words.”’. . . Beyond Greene and Kennedy, we had already made clear by 2016 that profanity alone is insufficient to constitute fighting words under Ohio’s disorderly conduct statute. [collecting cases] Given this backdrop, it was clearly established in 2016 that there was no probable cause to arrest Wood for disorderly conduct.”)

Young v. Kent County Sheriff’s Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *6 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (not reported) (“Clark is not entitled to qualified immunity for tasing Young where Young was partially incapacitated by the time he was tased. Young testified that he was never warned he would be tased and was returning to his cell. Passive resistance includes noncompliance with an officer’s order without evidence of ‘volitional and conscious defiance’ of that order. . . But taking the facts in the light most favorable to Young, as the district court did, a reasonable jury could conclude that Young did not consciously defy the officer’s orders. Where an individual is complying and at most passively resisting, tasing would violate a clearly established right. . . Here, based on the district court’s factual determination that Young’s resistance was passive, not active, the use of a taser against him would be a violation of his clearly established constitutional rights. Ultimately, the outcome of this case rests on how the jury views the facts, and who the jury finds most credible. Put simply, if Young was fully subdued and incapacitated and did not see or hear any orders to get on the ground, a second or third use of force was excessive. On this record, it is possible that a jury could find the facts to be so. But the jury could just as easily view any one of those facts in the deputies’ favor. And it is not this court’s place to determine which is correct: ‘Where, as here, the legal question of qualified immunity turns on which version of facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.’. . . We must defer to the district court’s determination of facts in favor of Young.”)

Young v. Kent County Sheriff’s Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *6-10 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (not reported) (“The Supreme Court recently made one thing clear when summarily reversing circuit courts for refusing to grant qualified immunity to officers: A plaintiff alleging an excessive-force claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 generally ‘must identify a case that put [the officers] on notice that [their] specific conduct was unlawful.’ Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8 (2021) (per curiam). And a case cannot satisfy this notice requirement if its facts are ‘materially distinguishable’ from the facts that the officers confronted. Id.; City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11–12 (2021) (per curiam). My colleagues depart from the Supreme Court’s framework by denying qualified immunity to Deputies William Jourden and Bryan Clark for their use of pepper spray and a taser on a pretrial detainee who violated a jail’s security-based rules. The cases on which my colleagues rely to find the deputies’ actions unlawful are ‘materially distinguishable’ from this case in obvious ways. . . . Most of the cases, for example, did not involve this jail setting—a setting with unique dangers and security needs. So none gave the deputies the ‘fair notice’ that the Supreme Court demands. . . . I thus respectfully dissent from the denial of qualified immunity. . . . Before 2015, our cases would have clearly established, if anything, the propriety of Jourden’s and Clark’s use of force. We traditionally treated a pretrial detainee’s excessive-force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment’s substantive-due-process protections as analogous to a convicted prisoner’s excessive-force claim under the Eighth Amendment’s ban on cruel and unusual punishments. . . . To show that force was excessive, therefore, a pretrial detainee needed to meet a demanding subjective test and prove that an officer used force maliciously to cause harm. . . . Under this test, we had held that officers may use ‘stun guns’ or ‘chemical agents’ on ‘recalcitrant prisoners’ merely for disobeying orders. . . . If this precedent remained the law, this case would be easy. Young identifies no evidence suggesting that Jourden and Clark used force ‘maliciously and sadistically’ to harm Young without any security-related purpose. . . . Since 2015, however, the law has been in a state of flux. . . . In Kingsley, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment’s objective-reasonableness test (not the Eighth Amendment’s subjective-maliciousness test) applies to the use of force on pretrial detainees (as opposed to convicted prisoners). . . . Critically, however, the Court left no doubt that the objective-reasonableness test in this jail context comes with different rules than the objective-reasonableness test outside a jail. . . . So it held that courts must ‘acknowledg[e] as part of the objective reasonableness analysis’ the deference due ‘to policies and practices needed to maintain order and institutional security’ at a jail. . . . A reasonable officer thus could find that this institutional environment affects the force objectively justified when an inmate makes a jail disturbance—whether that inmate is a convicted prisoner or a pretrial detainee. . . . [N]o case of ours clearly established that their split-second decision to deploy pepper spray and a taser on an inmate who had caused a disturbance in a jail was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . . My colleagues cite only one jail-specific case holding that an officer used excessive force: Guy v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville & Davidson County, 687 F. App’x 471 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Guy does not rebut Jourden’s and Clark’s qualified-immunity defense. To begin with, I question whether we can rely on this unpublished decision at all to show that the law clearly prohibited the deputies’ conduct. Other circuit courts have noted that ‘[u]npublished cases ... do not serve as binding precedent and cannot be relied upon to define clearly established law.’ . . . That is because another panel of our court could simply refuse to follow Guy at a later date in a published decision. . . . How can Guy ‘clearly establish’ anything for officers if it does not clearly establish anything for us? Regardless, ‘[t]he situation in [Guy] and the situation at issue here diverge in several respects.’ [distinguishing facts of two cases] My colleagues suggest that our caselaw in the “arrest” context clearly established the excessiveness of Jourden’s use of pepper spray and Clark’s use of a taser. Yet I find our caselaw in this context unclear on the dividing line between when officers may use pepper spray or a taser and when they may not. And the deputies’ actions in this case fell within this ‘hazy border’ that our precedent creates. . . That fact also confirms that we should grant the deputies qualified immunity. . . Our pepper-spray caselaw distinguishes between the use of pepper spray on individuals who do not voluntarily go into custody from the use of pepper spray on those who do. On the one hand, we have upheld the use of pepper spray on arrestees whom officers could conclude were not cooperating or might pose a threat. [collecting cases] On the other hand, we have found the use of pepper spray excessive when an officer had fully subdued an arrestee or when the arrestee had unambiguously surrendered. [collecting cases] Our cases on the use of a taser fit the same mold. There, we have held that officers generally may tase arrestees who actively resist but may not tase arrestees who passively resist or who do not resist at all. . . What qualifies as ‘active’ resistance? It obviously reaches arrestees who physically struggle with police. . . Yet we have defined the word to cover conduct that is not all that ‘active. . . How about ‘passive’ resistance? It includes mere noncompliance with an officer’s order without evidence of ‘volitional and conscious defiance’ of that order (whether verbal or physical). . . . I do not think that these cases establish a clear line dividing the permissible use of pepper spray or a taser from the impermissible use of that force. And we have granted qualified immunity when an officer’s force fell within the unclear border between the two. . . . Young’s claims against Deputies Jourden and Clark fall within the same gray area. Even outside this case’s jail setting, it is not clear whether our caselaw would treat Jourden’s use of pepper spray and Clark’s use of a taser as excessive. . . .My colleagues respond that a reasonable jury could find that Young had been ‘subdued’ after the first pepper spray. Yet the video shows him plainly walking around the pod. . . . In retrospect, perhaps Deputies Jourden and Clark could have casually walked up to Young, handcuffed him, and led him out of the pod without incident. But that sort of after-the-fact speculation engages in the type of hindsight bias that judges must avoid when identifying the safety risks that the Constitution imposes on officers who confront dangerous situations. . . . While any reasonable officer would know that a gratuitous pepper spraying or tasing of a subdued detainee would violate clearly established law, those are not this case’s facts. For these reasons, I would reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity. Because my colleagues see things differently, I respectfully dissent.”)

Greene v. Crawford County, Michigan, 22 F.4th 593, 614-15 (6th Cir. 2022) (“County Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that they could not rely on mental healthcare providers like CMH to assess the medical condition of an inmate experiencing severe alcohol withdrawal and delirium tremens. . . . As discussed earlier, we have denied qualified immunity to an officer who failed to seek medical assistance for an individual suffering from delirium tremens in a situation of obvious illness even when the officer knew that the detainee was on withdrawal medication and being observed. . . . No case answers the precise question of whether it is reasonable to rely on a mental health professional to provide a medical assessment of a detainee exhibiting symptoms of delirium tremens. But to ask that question is to answer it. In the end, Greene experienced a clearly established life-threatening medical condition for at least two days prior to his incapacitation. County Defendants did not provide any medical assistance during that time. Greene's right not to have 'known, serious medical needs disregarded by' County Defendants was clearly established in this scenario.")

Browning v. Edmonson County, Kentucky, 18 F.4th 516, 525, 529 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Certainly by 2018 when Jones tased C.S., it was clearly established in this circuit that an individual has a constitutional right not to be tased when he or she is not actively resisting. Jones violated this right by tasing an unconscious C.S., who, after experiencing a major automobile collision as a backseat passenger, was not visibly engaged in active resistance. Consequently, the denial of qualified immunity was proper here. Put differently, the district court denied qualified immunity on the facts that, following a collision resulting from a dangerous car chase, the defendant officer tased a passenger of the vehicle who did not respond to the officer's instruction to show his hands, where the passenger showed no signs that he was even conscious beyond rocking back and forth, a movement that may have been attributable to rocking of the car and was not interpreted as hostility or active resistance. It is clearly established that such a preemptive tasing is an objectively unreasonable use of force. . . .C.S. had a clearly established constitutional right not be tased under the circumstances. Jones violated that right by tasing C.S. despite observing that C.S. was not resisting and expressed no verbal or physical behavior that was hostile or threatening. On these facts, a reasonable jury could find that use of a taser was not objectively reasonable and therefore amounted to excessive force under the law. Thus, the district court properly denied qualified immunity for the § 1983 claim.")

Browning v. Edmonson County, Kentucky, 18 F.4th 516, 536-40 (6th Cir. 2021) (Murphy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("If you were a police officer, what risk of getting shot would you be willing to face before using your taser to incapacitate a suspect who may (or may not) be armed after he appeared to ignore your commands to show his hands? A 25% risk? 10%? 5%? 1%? It seems to me this is the basic question that Officer Jordan Jones needed to answer in a matter of seconds when he decided to deploy his taser on C.S. while securing the accident scene following a high-speed chase. My colleagues say that the risk that C.S. had a firearm was too 'remote' to make Jones's use of a taser objectively reasonable. I do not think that our cases clearly establish that conclusion, so I must respectfully dissent from their decision to deny Jones qualified immunity on C.S.'s excessive-force claim. . . . Combining the Fourth Amendment's fact-specific test with qualified immunity's fair-notice test makes this defense especially difficult to defeat for plaintiffs who allege excessive-force claims. The Supreme Court's many decisions granting qualified immunity to officers on these claims illustrate this point well. [collecting Supreme Court cases] A plaintiff cannot argue simply that the Supreme Court has 'clearly established' that the police may not use excessive force or that the force must be objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . These general legal tests typically will not show that an officer's specific use of force was plainly excessive. See Rivas-Villegas, 2021 WL 4822662, at *2. In all but the most egregious of cases, the plaintiff instead 'must identify a case that put [the officer] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.' . . And if a circuit court's prior cases are 'materially distinguishable,' they cannot provide the required notice. . . We may resolve this two-part qualified-immunity test in any order we choose, so I would jump immediately to the clearly established prong. . . C.S. has not identified a sufficiently analogous case that would have put Jones on notice that his use of the taser was excessive under the circumstances. . . . We must ask: Did our cases clearly establish that Jones could not tase a passenger in a crashed vehicle who did not show his hands upon request and who Jones suspected might be hiding a firearm in the uncertain moments following a high-speed chase? I do not think so. Whether or not the use of the taser actually violated the Fourth Amendment, our caselaw would not have made Jones ‘plainly incompetent’ in thinking that it did not. . . Jones could have reasonably believed that the tasing was constitutionally permissible based on the three general questions that the Supreme Court uses for evaluating excessive-force claims. . . . [W]hat is the specific level of risk of getting shot that an officer must identify to render the use of a taser objectively reasonable? Should it be the reasonable suspicion test from Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)? Something lower? Something higher? I am unsure, which means I do not think our caselaw clearly establishes the answer. Indeed, our prior cases ‘have found no clearly established right of a suspect to be free from tasing where he or she disobeys police orders and may be in possession of a weapon.’. . . My colleagues respond that a reasonable jury could find it objectively unreasonable for Jones to believe that C.S. might have had a firearm. I disagree. To begin with, I do not think this question is a factual one (for the jury) rather than a legal one (for the court). As we have recognized, the Supreme Court has held that the ultimate issue—whether the facts construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff rise to the level of unconstitutionally ‘excessive force’—is one of law for the court. Stricker v. Township of Cambridge, 710 F.3d 350, 364 (6th Cir. 2013) (citing Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007)); see Thomas v. City of Columbus, 854 F.3d 361, 366 (6th Cir. 2017). So it is a legal question whether this case’s facts (construed in C.S.’s favor) created a sufficient risk of harm to Jones to render his use of a taser objectively reasonable.”) Redrick v. City of Akron, Ohio, No. 21-3027, 2021 WL 5298538 (6th Cir. Nov. 15, 2021) (not reported) (“Here, Turnure was in position behind Redrick as he walked down the sidewalk with his lawfully carried gun in his pocket or at his side. In these circumstances, Turnure’s failure to warn Redrick to drop his weapon before shooting was unreasonable. Without any other facts indicating an immediate danger beyond possession of a lawful firearm, it was feasible to attempt non-lethal means of deescalating the situation. Turnure could have ordered Redrick to drop the gun. If a jury finds those warnings were given and ignored, this may be a different case. But if the need for deadly force could have been obviated by a simple command to drop the weapon and the officer failed to attempt such less-than-lethal means, deadly force was unreasonable. . . . Accepting Redrick’s account of the facts, Turnure violated Redrick’s clearly established rights when he shot him six times from behind without warning and without any indication that Redrick would use his lawfully carried gun to harm officers or others. . . . In general, cases like Graham and Garner cannot clearly establish a constitutional violation because they are ‘cast “at a high level of generality.”’ . . . But ‘in an obvious case, these standards can “clearly establish” the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . . Under Redrick’s facts, this is a case where no reasonable officer could believe deadly force was justified. . . . And beyond that, a body of relevant case law from this Circuit supports the denial of qualified immunity here. [collecting cases] Holding that using deadly force against Redrick was unreasonable does not dictate that shooting Pruiett was likewise unreasonable. . . But we need not reach the constitutionality of Turnure's actions as related to Pruiett because the law in these circumstances was not clearly established. . . When the shooting occurred, case law did not clearly establish that Turnure's use of deadly force against Pruiett was unconstitutional. . . The situation was unfolding rapidly. Amidst gunfire, Redrick's firearm came out of his hand and Pruiett lunged for it. This quick movement toward a deadly weapon in the heat of gunfire is different from Redrick's simply holding a lawful weapon at his side. Because Pruiett was grabbing for the gun, the immediacy of the situation makes it less feasible that less-than-lethal force, i.e. giving commands to drop the gun, would have sufficed. There was no clearly established law from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that would have informed Turnure that using deadly force against a suspect who lunged for a weapon amidst a dangerous altercation was unlawful. Plaintiffs cite Bougress v. Mattingly to argue that having and holding a weapon is not enough to make deadly force reasonable, but that case does not squarely govern the facts before us. . . More than mere possession of a weapon, Pruiett made a quick movement to grab the gun as his brother was being fired upon. The immediacy of that movement—and the inference that could reasonably be drawn regarding what a person might do with a gun after they grab it during a gunfight—is a material factual difference between this case and those referenced in Redrick's analysis that may otherwise clearly establish the law.”) Sexton v. Cernuto, 18 F.4th 177, 190-93 (6th Cir. 2021) (“The district court correctly identified the constitutional right at issue for Sexton’s § 1983 claims. Under Sexton’s claims against Cernuto for actively facilitating Dunn’s assaults on her and for failing to protect her, this prong examines whether Sexton’s right to be free and protected from a government actor’s sexual assault against her was clearly established at the time Cernuto allegedly contributed to and enabled Dunn to carry out the sexual assaults. Citing precedent from our circuit, the district court explained that ‘there is no dispute that sexual assault is “so contrary to fundamental notions of liberty and so lacking of any redeeming social value, that no rational individual could believe that sexual abuse by a state actor is constitutionally permissible under the Due Process Clause.”’. . . The federal courts have long acknowledged the constitutional right to personal security and bodily integrity. . . .Cernuto argues that the panel must define the relevant constitutional right in very narrow terms, proposing a requirement of near factual identity. Although the court is to consider ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,’ . . . it should also avoid a ‘rigid, overreliance on factual similarity’ that could overwhelm the clearly established prong[.] Because he did not personally assault Sexton, Cernuto contends that the district court should have analyzed whether Sexton, ‘as a probationer in a work program, had a clearly established constitutional right that required Cernuto, a non-law enforcement, nonsupervisory employee, to protect her from or intervene in a sexual assault by his co-worker.’ Cernuto’s formulation is flawed in several respects. First, it compels an ‘overreliance on factual similarity.’ Second, as discussed above, Cernuto’s assertion that § 1983 liability is limited to law enforcement officials has no basis in our case law. Third, although Cernuto was not Dunn’s supervisor, the record shows that he and Dunn were work program co-supervisors, both of whom had considerable authority over program participants. Fourth, his formulation of the constitutional right fails to identify the most pertinent aspect of Cernuto's relationship to Sexton—his authority and control over her in the probationary program. In sum, Cernuto misconstrues the constitutional rights at issue in Sexton's claims by seeking to rehash the special relationship analysis already conducted above. But that formulation improperly ignores the constitutional violation that Sexton claims: that Cernuto violated her right to personal security and bodily integrity both by actively facilitating the assaults and by failing to protect her from the assaults. As to that duty to protect, even under Cernuto's narrower focus on whether it was clearly established that he had a duty, the answer is plain. Our case law has clearly established that government actors owe citizens 'a constitutional duty to keep them from harm ... when the state has acted to deprive an individual of certain indicia of liberty.' . . . Here, any reasonable supervisor would be aware that a probationer is entitled to be free from sexual assault and that facilitating the assault or failing to stop such an assault would contribute to a violation of clearly established rights. Sexton's right to be free from sexual assault was clearly established in July 2017. The district court did not err in finding the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis satisfied and holding that Cernuto was not entitled to summary judgment on the qualified immunity issue.")

Barrera v. City of Mount Pleasant, 12 F.4th 617, 620-25 (6th Cir. 2021) ("The officers directly observed Barrera's refusal to identify himself when ordered to do so. No one doubts what he did. What the parties debate is whether the relevant state law, a Michigan statute, criminalizes this conduct. That reality introduces an analytical complication, one that requires a brief digression. What part of the qualified immunity inquiry does a dispute over the meaning of a state law implicate? The first question: Did the officers violate the citizen's constitutional right? Or the second one: Did the officers violate a clearly established right? Both are in play, it seems to us, and either one permits a federal court to resolve a qualified-immunity defense without deciding exactly what the state law means. One possibility is that a constitutional violation never arises in the first place because, even if the officers misread state law, the mistake was a reasonable one. Just as a reasonable mistake of fact does not violate an individual's Fourth Amendment rights, so a reasonable mistake of law does not violate them either. Heien v. North Carolina illustrates the point. . . . The other possibility is that the ambiguity in state law shows that the officers did not violate a clearly established right—the second prong of the qualified immunity test. While this inquiry is similar to the reasonable mistake-of-law test, it is not the same. The reasonable mistake-of-law 'inquiry is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.' . . . The more forgiving question asks only whether, at the time of the officer's conduct, the law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [understand] that what he is doing' violates the law—so clear that the invalidity of the officer's actions was 'beyond debate.' . . . This rigorous standard covers 'all but the plainly incompetent' officer. . . . Under either approach, we need not decide exactly what the statute means if the officers reasonably interpreted it. . . . Let us start, and largely end, with the Heien reasonable mistake-of-law inquiry. The statute makes it a felony to 'obstruct[]' a police officer who is 'performing his or her duties.' . . . 'Obstruct,' the statute says, 'includes the use or threatened use of physical interference or force or a knowing failure to comply with a lawful command.' . . . That leaves this question: Was it 'objectively reasonable for an officer in

[Murch and Thompson's] position to think that [Barrera's refusal to identify himself] was a violation of [Michigan] law'? . . . Officers Murch and Thompson both repeatedly told Barrera to identify himself. Even knowing that they were police officers, Barrera refused. In these respects, Barrera knowingly failed to comply with the police officers' command, or at least gave the officers reason to believe he had. . . Barrera does not argue otherwise. Today's dispute centers on the third element: Was the command that Barrera identify himself 'lawful'? Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada takes us part of the way to the answer. . . . Hiibel confirms that an officer may detain a person to investigate a crime when the officer has 'reasonable suspicion' that the person 'may be involved in criminal activity.' . . It confirms that, during a Terry stop, an officer may request that the detained person identify himself, so long as the request amounts to one 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the stop.' . . It confirms that a Terry stop suspect does not have a Fourth Amendment right to refuse the request. . . And it confirms that a State may criminalize the failure to comply. . . In today's case, the officers reasonably could believe that their command that Barrera identify himself complied with these principles. . . All in all, the officers reasonably could believe that Michigan's obstruction statute encompassed Barrera's refusal to identify himself and that this interpretation of state law did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Barrera pushes back on this conclusion. He first argues that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to stop him, removing the encounter from Terry's safe harbor. But he never explains why as a matter of law or fact. As a matter of law, he does not cite any cases rejecting reasonable suspicion under similar circumstances. As a matter of fact, he does not explain why the speeding car, the lack of a driver's license for the owner of the car, or the unusual nature of the stop—including the missing owner of the car—did not create reasonable suspicion to stop the vehicle and detain its passengers. Barrera next argues that a State may not penalize someone for failing to identify himself during a Terry stop, invoking dicta from a 1984 U.S. Supreme Court decision and a concurrence from the 1968 Terry decision. The dicta: "[T]he officer may ask the detainee a moderate number of questions to determine his identity and to try to obtain information confirming or dispelling the officer's suspicions. But the detainee is not obliged to respond." Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 439 (1984). The concurrence: "Of course, the person stopped is not obliged to answer, answers may not be compelled, and refusal to answer furnishes no basis for an arrest, although it may alert the officer to the need for continued observation." Terry, 392 U.S. at 34 (White, J., concurring). To the extent these observations once created uncertainty about the rules surrounding this aspect of a Terry stop, Hiibel eliminated it. Hiibel acknowledged both statements, determined they did not control, and concluded that a State may penalize a refusal to identify oneself during a Terry stop. '[W]e cannot view the dicta in Berkemer or Justice White's concurrence in Terry,' the Court explained, 'as answering the question whether a State can compel a suspect to disclose his name during a Terry stop.' . . [E]ven if the officers unreasonably misread state law, Barrera still would come up short. He has not shown that they violated clearly established law that would pierce the officers' qualified immunity shield. He has not cited, and we have not found, 'a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation "under similar circumstances."'. . As the district court aptly put the point, '[i]t would be extraordinary to expect law enforcement officers in the field to make determinations in a matter of minutes that judicial officers themselves cannot come to a consensus on after hours of measured consideration of the law and facts.”)

Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, No. 20-6084, 2021 WL 3913040, at *8 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021) (not reported) (“When viewed in the light most favorable to Colson, a reasonable officer in England’s position would have been aware that she was violating Colson’s right to adequate medical care. We have consistently held that prison officials violate a detainee’s constitutional rights when they ignore a detainee’s obvious, serious medical needs. . . Here, a reasonable juror could conclude that England subjectively knew of and disregarded signs that Colson was at a serious risk of harm including Colson’s difficulties standing and moving her knee. Accordingly, the district court properly held that Colson’s right to adequate medical care was clearly established.”)

Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, No. 20-6084, 2021 WL 3913040, at *8–11 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021) (not reported) (Readler, J., dissenting) (“Officer Mandy England is entitled to qualified immunity. In this setting, I acknowledge, our interlocutory jurisdiction is limited, particularly as factual findings are ‘insulated from review.’ . . As a result, our charge customarily is to ‘take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment’ on legal grounds, yet assess whether, in doing so, the district court ‘mistakenly identified clearly established law.’ . . That said, where the version of the facts presented to us is ‘blatantly contradicted’ by video evidence in the record, we ‘should not adopt that version of facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.’ . . Here, the salient facts either are not in dispute or are confirmed by a video recording of the events at hand. . . . Colson alleges that England evinced deliberate indifference to Colson’s serious medical needs, conduct that fell below constitutional norms. That may or may not be true. Either way, to overcome England’s defense of qualified immunity, Colson must also show that, at the time these events unfolded, our decisions clearly established that England’s actions violated the Constitution. . . . To that end, Colson must identify a fact pattern from a prior case ‘similar enough to have given fair and clear warning to officers about what the law requires’ so that ‘a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates the rule.’ . . In denying summary judgment, the district court determined that ‘a reasonable jury could find that Officer England knew of Colson’s [serious and obvious medical need] and disregarded it despite having reasons to believe that the nurse rendered an unreliable medical opinion, if no medical opinion at all.’ . . Any notion that Russell offered ‘no medical opinion at all,’ however, is ‘blatantly contradicted’ by the body camera video footage of Russell’s examination. . . Video footage plainly shows that Russell had Colson move her legs to assess her range of motion, that Russell bent down to examine each of Colson’s knees for swelling, and that Russell did not discern any unusual swelling, which prompted Russell to believe that no further medical treatment was necessary. And even if a genuine issue exists as to whether this examination was inadequate, the fact remains that Russell conducted an examination for nearly 60 seconds and, at its close, offered her medical assessment, albeit somewhat inartfully. On this record, the clearly established inquiry must account for the medical component underlying England’s qualified immunity defense. In other words, the district court had a duty to address

England's qualified immunity defense with respect to the particularized facts of the case—chief among them, that a medical examination took place—when evaluating the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test. And once this case is framed in the proper factual setting, England is entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable officer in England's position would not have understood the Fourteenth Amendment to require her to override Russell's assessment—condensed as it may have been—of Colson's knee injury. Indeed, neither the majority opinion nor the district court points to any case that addresses with particularity the central factual premise of this one: an officer's deference to a medical professional's evaluation. . . None of the pre-2015 cases the district court surveyed address a scenario where an officer consulted medical personnel with respect to a detainee's medical condition. Rather, they were all cases in which officers failed to consult a medical professional in a timely manner. [collecting cases] At most, these cases establish an officer's obligation to contact medical professionals promptly when a detainee exhibits obvious symptoms of distress. Colson's jailers did so. True, as both my colleagues and the district court have noted, we previously stated in Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit that a 'detainee's right to medical treatment has been established since at least 1987.' . . But Carter's formulation of the right in question is akin to a broad legal principle like 'an unreasonable search and seizure violates the Fourth Amendment,' something the Supreme Court has repeatedly said is 'of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.' . . Nor am I alone in this view—we previously reversed a district court for relying on Carter to establish the 'right to medical care' at a high level of generality, emphasizing that clearly established law 'must be more particularized than that' . . . Proving the point, the facts at hand in Carter did not involve a medical professional, let alone a scenario where a non-medically trained officer relied on a medical professional's evaluation. . . For these reasons, I would not accept the district court's broadly described contours of the constitutional right at play here. Nor would I suggest, as the majority opinion does, that England bears the burden to disprove the generalized contours of a broadly defined right to detainee medical care. . . That puts the inquiry in reverse. After all, Colson, not England, bears the burden of proving the clearly established law specific to the contours of this case. . . Nor, for that matter, may we dispense with the duty to identify a factually similar case. Time and again, the Supreme Court has required us to point to factually specific case law establishing the right in question. . . Sure enough, the Supreme Court has, on occasion, done otherwise in unique instances in which a constitutional violation is self-evident from the particularly egregious conduct of government officials. . . But Colson's case does not fall into that sui generis category of cases embodied by Hope v. Pelzer, and, more recently, Taylor v. Riojas. . . [T]hose shocking circumstances are worlds apart from this case. In short, nothing in our pre-2015 case law instructed England to disregard a medical professional's assessment. That is true even in view of the district court's factual findings—that Russell was not present when Colson fell and had trouble standing, that Russell examined Colson's knee for just about a minute, and that Russell's only statement to England after her brief examination was that she did not see swelling, at which point Russell walked away. The same goes for the inference drawn by the district court that Russell's medical opinion was 'unreliable.' . . Confirming the point, since Colson's arrest, we have held that a non-medically trained officer can 'reasonably defer[]' to a medical professional's opinion, so long as she 'had no reason to know or believe that

DeCrane v. Eckart, 12 F.4th 586, 599-601 (6th Cir. 2021) (“[P]laintiffs generally cannot defeat qualified immunity simply by arguing that they have a clearly established right not to suffer an ‘abridgment’ of the ‘freedom of speech.’ . . . Such a rule (defined at the highest possible level of generality) would not have immediately alerted public officials of the First Amendment’s limits in the specific situations that they confronted. . . . Even Garcetti’s rule (that speech can receive protection if taken as a citizen rather than employee) sometimes cannot provide sufficient guidance because we have recognized that it can be ‘challenging’ to distinguish public from private speech. . . . Eckart thinks that this fact resolves the qualified-immunity issue in his favor. He argues that the then-existing caselaw did not clearly establish that the media leak would have fallen outside DeCrane’s job duties within the meaning of Garcetti. . . . Eckart is mistaken because our cases at the relevant time had already set more specific ground rules to distinguish public from private speech. We had held that employees speak as private citizens (not public employees) at least when they speak on their own initiative to those outside their chains of command and when their speech was not part of their official or de facto duties. . . . Would this ‘firmly established’ rule have ‘immediately’ alerted a reasonable person that the media leak would have been in DeCrane’s private capacity? . . . We think so. Such a leak would have fallen outside his duties. The speech also would have been to journalists, not supervisors. For these reasons, we had already held that a police officer’s disclosure to the media fell outside Garcetti precisely because the officer engaged in the speech on his own time and had no media-related duties. . . . We close by reiterating our ruling’s narrow scope. Eckart made just one argument as to why the media leak was not protected speech: because it would have fallen within DeCrane’s job duties. Eckart did not argue that he could reasonably believe that he could discipline employees for violating a seemingly neutral policy banning unauthorized speech to the media. . . . Nor did he ask us to consider the circumstances in which a public employer may have such a media policy or the manner in which to analyze this constitutional question. We thus do not consider these issues; we resolve only the Garcetti argument presented to us.”)

Dahl v. Kilgore, No. 20-6392, 2021 WL 3929226, at *5–7 (6th Cir. Sept. 2, 2021) (not published) (“To the extent that we have applied the community caretaking exception outside the vehicle context and those applications survive Caniglia, we have done so only when police are ‘totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence relating to the violation of a criminal statute,’ . . . and are instead engaged in activities such as ‘assist[ing] persons who are seriously injured or threatened with such injury[.]’ . . . ‘As we have repeatedly and consistently observed, the critical issue is whether there is a “true immediacy” that absolves an officer from the need to apply for a warrant and receive approval from an impartial magistrate.’ . . . To permit a warrantless search of a Fourth Amendment protected space such as a cell phone when the circumstances are not ‘urgent or life threatening ... would certainly [make] “the presumption of unreasonableness ... difficult to rebut.”’ . . We have found sufficient evidence to justify a caretaking search in cases where the police have been called to the scene of some sort of disturbance or have themselves witnessed persons putting themselves or others in danger. . . . In conclusion, the Supreme Court in Riley clearly established Dahl’s right to be free from an unreasonable search of his cell phone. . . The community caretaking exception does not apply to these facts. Therefore, the district court correctly rejected Kilgore’s arguments for qualified immunity against Dahl’s Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Burwell v. City of Lansing, Michigan, 7 F.4th 456, 476-77 (6th Cir. 2021) (“Because there is sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that Kelley was deliberately indifferent to Phillips’s medical needs, ‘the only remaining question is whether the right was clearly established.’ . . For a right to be clearly established, ‘[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . The ‘unlawfulness must be apparent ... in the light of pre-existing law,’ but ‘[w]e need not ... find a case in which “the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.”’ . . ‘As early as 1972, we stated that “where the circumstances are clearly sufficient to indicate the need of medical attention for injury or illness, the denial of such aid constitutes the deprivation of constitutional due process.”’ . . ‘Furthermore, in 1992, this court explicitly held that a pretrial detainee’s right to medical treatment for a serious medical need has been established since at least 1987.’ . . We reiterated in 2013 that ‘[i]t is clearly established that a prisoner has a right not to have his known, serious medical needs disregarded by his doctors.’ . . That right applies no matter if the defendant is a medical provider or officer. . . Therefore, it was clearly established at the time of Phillips’s detention that declining to render aid to an unconscious detainee lying in a pool of vomit constitutes a constitutional violation.”)

Clemons v. Couch, 3 F.4th 897, 903-06 (6th Cir. 2021) (“Caniglia makes clear that Couch cannot justify his warrantless entry into Richard’s home by calling on the community-caretaker exception. Without any other valid justification for his entry, we hold that Couch violated Richard’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . Here, we must determine whether the law regarding the community-caretaker exception was clearly established such that it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in Couch’s position that the exception did not apply to his warrantless entry into Richard’s home. We now know, based on Caniglia, that the community-caretaker exception, to the extent it exists at all, does not apply to the home. . . But Caniglia, of course, had not been decided by the date of the events in question, March 27, 2016. At that time, a reasonable officer in Couch’s position could have determined—based on Cady, and our pre-2016 precedent interpreting Cady—that the community-caretaker exception applied to an officer’s home entry, at least as a general matter. . . . That does not, however, absolve Couch of potential liability. For it was clearly established before March 27, 2016, that if the exception applied to home entry, it could ‘not provide the government with refuge from the warrant requirement except when delay is reasonably likely to result in injury or ongoing harm to the community at large.’ . . That principle made clear that Couch's actions could not fall within the community-caretaker exception. . . Couch may have been engaged in community caretaking when he accompanied Christina to collect her and her son's belongings. Christina was afraid to go to the Clemons' house alone, perhaps for good reason, and Couch was her requested escort. But the need for entry was not urgent. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Richard, any delay in Couch's entry into the residence—to obtain a warrant or court order permitting his entry—was not 'reasonably likely to result in injury or ongoing harm to the community at large.' . . We decline to hold that sufficient injury would have or could have resulted if Christina had been forced to delay the collection of her and her son's belongings. True, the son was to attend school the next day and required his school supplies and attire, but that type of harm does not reach the level of harm required by Washington to permit the state's warrantless entry into Richard's home. . . . The facts in this case more closely mirror those in cases where we refused to apply the community-caretaking rationale to warrantless home entry. . . . At bottom, Richard Clemons has produced evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that Couch's conduct was in violation of Richard's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from the state's warrantless entry into his home. Couch is therefore not entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . .With this decision, we do not intend to cast aspersions on the work done by law enforcement. Although it may seem that holding Trooper Couch potentially liable for his warrantless entry reinforces the old adage that no good deed goes unpunished, that is not our aim. Today we simply acknowledge the sanctity of the home, a notion 'embedded' in our constitutional tradition 'since the origins of the Republic,' that protects against warrantless government intrusion. . . It is not our role as judges to change constitutional safeguards to further what some may argue is better policy. . . Accordingly, we reverse the magistrate judge's grant of summary judgment to Couch based on the community-caretaker exception and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Clemons v. Couch, 3 F.4th 897, 906-12 (6th Cir. 2021) (Nalbandian, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("First, I agree that the community caretaking exception (CCE) does not extend to Trooper Couch's conduct here—as well-intentioned as it was. I do not, however, agree that it was clearly established at the time that what Trooper Couch did was unconstitutional. So I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity. . . . Second, in the absence of qualified immunity, I concur with the majority that the consent issue is a matter for further consideration in the trial court, . . . and I would clarify the legal framework that should guide the consent inquiry. . . . When Trooper Couch helped Christina collect her belongings, little about our circuit's CCE jurisprudence could have been considered clearly established. . . . Before Caniglia cleaned the slate, our circuit's discordant trains of thought on the CCE failed to establish clear rules for officers. . . . Since Trooper Couch did not disregard clearly established law when he acted, . . . he should not bear the consequences of our failure to elucidate. I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity. . . . In sum, single-tenant consent can authorize entry even when it cannot authorize a search. In Caniglia, the Court instructed us to process difficult issues like these in the context of the three ways that officers may enter a home: a warrant, an exigency, and consent. Now that the CCE is no longer smothering the finer distinctions between exigency and consent, courts need to pick up where Randolph left off in parsing consent, trespass, and search. In my opinion, the best reading of Randolph is that single-tenant veto negates consent to search but not consent to enter to protect a co-tenant, even without an exigency. Since the majority is not granting qualified immunity, I agree that the consent issue needs further attention in the district court. I leave it to the district court on remand to consider how this issue impacts the case.”)

Hughey v. Easlick, 3 F.4th 283, 289-91, 293 (6th Cir. 2021) (“We apply the three-prong handcuffing test to one specific act: a law-enforcement official’s allegedly placing too-tight handcuffs on a person’s wrists. If a plaintiff creates a genuine dispute of material fact that they complained that their handcuffs were too tight, the officer ignored those complaints, and the plaintiff experienced ‘some physical injury’ from the physical contact between cuffs and wrists, summary judgment is unwarranted. If a plaintiff’s sole allegation is that the cuffs around their wrists were too tight, we need apply only the handcuffing test and our analysis terminates there. But if a plaintiff alleges that excessive force otherwise occurred—even if related to the handcuffing process—we apply the general Fourth Amendment framework to all allegations underlying the excessive-force claim. If the plaintiff creates a genuine dispute of material fact about whether the officer acted unreasonably, summary judgment is likewise inappropriate. Thus, in Hughey’s case, we first apply the handcuffing test to her allegation that Easlick placed overly tight cuffs around her wrists. We then administer the general excessive-force framework to all the alleged events that sustain Hughey’s excessive-force claim, including what transpired before, during, and after the handcuffing. . . . At bottom, Hughey testified that she complained to Easlick about the tightness of the handcuffs, that the handcuffs left rings on her wrists, that a nurse saw these marks, and that Easlick acknowledged that the cuffs caused the marks—all of this being enough to satisfy the handcuffing test’s third element at the summary-judgment stage. . . . No doubt, when we view the facts in the light favoring Hughey, as we must on summary judgment, Easlick violated Hughey’s clearly established rights. We have held that the right to be free from too-tight handcuffing had been ‘clearly established’ by 1991. . . . As we pointed out in McGrew, we clearly established that handcuffing that results in wrist marks is unconstitutional no later than 2009, when we issued Morrison. McGrew[.] . . . At bottom, ‘this Court [has] directly and unequivocally determined, time and time again, that unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing is a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . The plethora of excessive-force handcuffing cases from the last three decades put Easlick on notice that the way that he yanked Hughey’s arm, placed overly tight handcuffs around her wrists, and ignored her complaints of pain violated her right to be free from excessive force.”)

Clark v. Stone, 998 F.3d 287, 298-302 (6th Cir. 2021) (“When a qualified immunity defense is asserted at the pleading stage, we have historically found that the inquiry should be limited to the ‘clearly established’ prong of the analysis if feasible. . . . In the qualified immunity context, a right is considered clearly established when existing precedent has placed the question ‘beyond debate’ and ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating [the right]’. . . . ‘When determining whether the right is clearly established, “we look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.”. . . While the plaintiffs cite an ample number of cases that support the general notion that the Due Process Clause protects the right to bring up one’s children, they point to no case law from either the Supreme Court or this circuit that indicates there is a clearly established right to use corporal punishment that leaves marks. . . . While we can state with ease that there is a general right to use reasonable corporal punishment at home and in schools, that right is not an unlimited one. The Clarks have offered no authority that imposing corporal punishment that leaves marks is reasonable and is therefore a protected right. We find, therefore, that the district court did not err in dismissing the Clarks’ Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . .Social workers are generally governed by the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement. . . Here, the court order fell well below the requirements of a valid warrant. The order contains no facts that detail probable cause, nor does it describe with any particularity the area of the home to be searched. . . The defendants do not assert that they entered the home due to exigency or under any other exception to the warrant requirement. The district court was therefore correct in finding that the entries into the Clarks’ home were Fourth Amendment violations. Our inquiry then becomes whether a reasonable social worker would have known based on these particular circumstances that their actions were violating the Clarks’ constitutional rights. . . .As the district court recognized, . . . Andrews does not clearly establish that a reasonable social worker in this situation would know that his conduct was violating the Fourth Amendment. First, Judge Goff stated in open court that the Fourth Amendment did not fully apply in this context. While his statement may have been in error, it was not unreasonable for the defendants to rely upon instruction from a judge to conclude that their conduct was allowed. More importantly, each home visit by CHFS workers was conducted under the direct provenance of a court order issued specifically for this case. No such order existed in either Andrews or Kovacik, and it is significant in our assessment of what a social worker ought to have known about the legality of their conduct. Given that we have previously found that social workers may rely on police officers in assessing whether they are allowed to enter a home, it is hard to imagine that a reasonable social worker would not also believe that they could rely on an order from a judge, an even more authoritative source on the law. And indeed, at their first home visit Stone and Campbell were accompanied by a police officer. Despite Jacob’s assertion that his rights were being violated, Stone and Campbell proceeded with the visit. If nothing else, this demonstrates an implicit endorsement from the police officer, upon which Stone and Campbell were entitled to rely. . . Because the presence of the court order meaningfully distinguishes this case from Andrews, a reasonable social worker in the position of the defendants would not have understood that he was violating the Clarks’ Fourth Amendment rights. Indeed, this case represents precisely the type of haziness that Andrews alluded to in this area of law. Since the doctrine of qualified immunity is designed to protect ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,’ we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have not overcome the qualified immunity defense.”)

Clark v. Stone, 998 F.3d 287, 303-04 (6th Cir. 2021) (“The Clarks assert that they had a clear First Amendment right to record the home visits conducted by Hazelwood, Stone, and Campbell. In doing so, they cite to numerous cases from other circuits and one from the Northern District of Ohio that stand for the proposition that there is a constitutional right to film an encounter with a police officer. [collecting cases] . . . The Clarks reason that because we have held that social workers are held to the same standard as police officers when it comes to other constitutional rights, the cases listed above are sufficient to demonstrate that the right to film interactions with a social worker is clearly established. We disagree. First and foremost, the Clarks have not cited a single case that applies this right to social workers. While we have clearly established that a social worker is not excepted from the Fourth Amendment, this concerns an entirely different set of rights. We should not take the equivalence of social workers and police officers in one context as determinative in a completely different area of civil rights law. Doing so would violate our mandate to avoid construing rights too generally. . . Furthermore, the cases cited by the plaintiffs do not demonstrate that the right to film a social worker during a home visit was clearly established. A single district court opinion (and here, a district court opinion emanating from an entirely different district than where the events at issue took place) is not sufficient to demonstrate that a right is clearly established in this circuit for purposes of qualified immunity. . . And, as the district court recognized, other district courts in this circuit have found that the right is not clearly established. . . The existence of this conflict is itself evidence that the right was not sufficiently established such that any reasonable social worker in the defendants' shoes would have clear notice of the right.”)

Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 662 (6th Cir. 2021) (“[T]his Court has held that “claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault,” but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention.’ . . . Therefore, Plaintiff’s claims of excessive force based on the Corrections Defendants subjecting Johnson to the horrible conditions of CCCC’s Red Zone, despite his suicidal condition and in response to a non-violent minor infraction, are not categorically barred by the Amended Complaint’s failure to allege that the Corrections Defendants assaulted Johnson. Because it was unnecessary for Plaintiff to allege an assault in conjunction with her excessive force claim, there is no reason to depart from ‘our general preference’ not to grant qualified immunity based only on the pleadings. . . To understand ‘the “facts and circumstances of [this] particular case,”’ and to decide whether, faced with those facts and circumstances, a reasonable official would have understood that placing Johnson in CCCC’s Red Zone constituted objectively unreasonable force, Plaintiff must be provided the opportunity to develop the factual record. Kingsley, 576 U.S. at 397, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, 109 S.Ct. 1865). Although there is limited precedent addressing claims of excessive force without an assault, at this stage, we cannot determine whether discovery will nonetheless establish that the Corrections Defendants’ actions were so ‘egregious’ that ‘any reasonable officer should have realized that’ the force used against Johnson ‘offended the Constitution.’ Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 54.”)

Strickland v. City of Detroit, 995 F.3d 495, 508-09 (6th Cir. 2021) (“There is a genuine dispute of fact as to whether Officer Schimeck ignored Plaintiff’s complaint that his handcuffs were too tight. Plaintiff testified in his deposition that ‘[w]hen I told [Officer Schimeck] the cuffs were too tight, there wasn’t a response.’ . . . The district court recognized ‘there is some question of fact as to how Defendant Schimeck responded to Plaintiff’s complaint that the handcuffs hurt....’...Qualified immunity should have been denied on that basis. However, the district court went on to observe that the disputed fact as to how Officer Schimeck responded to Plaintiff's complaint was not material because 'the issue was ultimately addressed: Plaintiff's handcuffs were loosened and locked into place by Schimeck's partner, and they were ultimately removed upon Plaintiff giving notice to Bliss that they were too tight.' . . It concluded that 'Plaintiff's complaints were not ignored' because someone eventually loosened his handcuffs. . . Officer Schimeck is not immune from suit because it is a disputed fact whether she ignored Plaintiff's complaint of excessively tight handcuffs. Granting summary judgment because Plaintiff's handcuffs were loosened at some later point by someone else was not appropriate. Our decision in Baynes v. Cleland provides much guidance. In Baynes, we reversed a district court's grant of qualified immunity to sheriff's deputies who had ignored the plaintiff's complaints that his handcuffs were too tight. The analysis of the excessive force claim against Deputy Brandon Cleland is particularly instructive. Like Officer Schimeck, Deputy Cleland did not actually handcuff the plaintiff, instead another officer did so. . . As with Officer Schimeck, Deputy Cleland took custody of the plaintiff after the handcuffing, and there was evidence that he ignored complaints that the handcuffs were too tight. . . And just like Officer Schimeck, another law enforcement officer removed the plaintiff's handcuffs sometime after the complaints had been made to Deputy Cleland. . . In Baynes, this was enough for us to conclude that the district court had erred in granting Deputy Cleland qualified immunity on the plaintiff's excessive force claim based on tight handcuffing. . . And the same result is required here. Qualified immunity is inappropriate just because another officer eventually loosens and removes a plaintiff's handcuffs.")

Anders v. Cuevas, 984 F.3d 1166, 1178-79 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Assuming Star Towing's allegations are correct in that Cuevas' removal of Star Towing from the non-consent tow list was based on Anders' speech to state investigators, the law was clearly established that so doing would violate the First Amendment. Indeed, our decision in Lucas, a case in which we had the benefit of looking at summary judgment evidence, is on point and renders the unlawfulness of such conduct, if true, apparent. Marohnic and See also provide strong and firmly grounded Circuit precedent identifying that speech made in the context of cooperating with law enforcement is protected under the First Amendment. And, as explained above, the Amended Complaint contains enough factual allegations to find that Anders' speech was a motivating factor in Anders' alleged adverse actions taken against Star Towing. Cuevas disputes that Marohnic and See provided him with sufficient notice that he may have been violating the Constitution. He argues that, unlike the plaintiffs in Marohnic and See, 'Anders was not a public employee and was directly involved in the wrongdoing.' . . However, our cases foreclose any suggestion that these distinctions should alleviate Cuevas' understanding of the clearly established law in this Circuit. Specifically, in Lucas, we rejected the argument that only public employees or contractors are entitled to First Amendment protection. . . . Factual development of this case might reveal that Anders cooperated with the state investigation in order to insulate himself from any accusation of wrongdoing. However, we cannot make that assumption from the Amended Complaint, and even if we could, Anders' motives underlying his speech should not determine whether it is protected by the First Amendment. Against the backdrop of this Circuit's precedents, we conclude that a reasonable government officer would have known at the time in question that he would be violating the Constitution if he retaliated against Star Towing for Anders' cooperation with law enforcement.”)

Johnson v. City of Saginaw, 980 F.3d 497, 513 (6th Cir. 2020) (“We conclude that Johnson’s right to procedural due process prior to the deprivation of water service was clearly established and the denial of qualified immunity to Appellants on Johnson’s procedural due process claim was proper.”)

Johnson v. City of Saginaw, 980 F.3d 497, 518-20 (6th Cir. 2020) (Sutton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Johnson cannot possibly overcome qualified immunity. She has not identified any case clearly establishing that government officials must provide pre-deprivation process before discontinuing utilities to a business that endangered the public in so many life-threatening ways. Her key case, Memphis Light, gives comparison a bad name. It concerned the routinized discontinuance of residential water services due to nonpayment. It has nothing to say about the targeted discontinuance of commercial water services due to repeated public safety and welfare violations. As one might suspect, the prevailing law in truth tacks hard the other way, supporting Saginaw, not Johnson. The Supreme Court and this court have both authorized more dramatic and final government actions without process when officials identified a concern for the safety and welfare of others. . . . I remain bewildered by Johnson’s claim that the city’s actions violated clearly established law. Memphis Gas & Light is no more useful here than it was above. That case involved an automatic shutdown of water for nonpayment of a bill to a home whose residents could use the water and indeed needed the water to live. This case involves an earned shutdown of water to a business based on serial violations of public safety, and the owner could not use the water until the business could obtain its license to operate again.”)

Barnett as next friend of M.G.W. v. Smithwick, No. 20-5010, 2020 WL 6625028, at *4 (6th Cir. Nov. 12, 2020) (not reported) (“Although qualified immunity typically presents a two-step analysis, we have discretion to skip the first step in certain instances. . . For example, we may pass over the constitutional violation question when the parties’ briefing on the issue is ‘woefully inadequate,’ or where the issues are ‘so factbound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases.’. . Both of those traits are present here. Barnett’s briefing on the constitutional questions ‘lacks clarity and detail, posing a risk that we will decide the issue incorrectly.’. . And the exigency determinations in this case turn on circumstances so fact-specific that our ‘law elaboration purpose’ will not be well-served by deciding those questions today. . . Thus, faced with a quintessential ‘poorly presented constitutional question but an easily resolved clearly established question,’ we decline to reach the constitutional questions in this case and proceed straight to the clearly established law inquiry. . . Barnett points to Kovacik as evidence that the warrantless removal of M.G.W. violated clearly established law. . . But Kovacik is unlike today’s case. For one thing, qualified immunity was denied there because the social worker in question was relying on ‘weeks-old’ information, whereas here, the situation unfolded in real time. . . For another, Kovacik ‘turned on the greater constitutional concerns surrounding government intrusion into a citizen’s home,’ as there, children were removed from their mother’s home without a warrant. . . Here, by comparison, M.G.W. was warrantlessly removed from a hospital, not her home. And because ‘the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house,’ removing a child from a hospital presents different constitutional implications and raises unsettled questions of constitutional law. . . The upshot of those implications was not clearly established as of 2016. Since that time, we have granted qualified immunity to social workers who conducted a warrantless in-school interview because a warrantless seizure in that location was not a clearly established constitutional violation. . . That decision helps explain why the principle was not clearly established in 2016. Suffice it to say, a reasonable officer in Smithwick’s position would not have known that emergency removal from a location outside the home was a clearly established constitutional violation. Especially so for someone in Smithwick’s shoes, who, as a lawyer, would recognize the special protections in our constitutional system for searches and seizures in the home. . . Qualified immunity grants state actors the space to make just this kind of reasonable, if imperfect, decision. . . All told, Smithwick was entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Lipman v. Budish, 974 F.3d 726, 750 & n.13 (6th Cir. 2020) (“[C]ases finding qualified immunity in the DeShaney context have relied on the fact that the plaintiff failed to show that state actors actually ‘created the danger—either by increasing the risk of harm to third parties by its affirmative conduct or by doing something that endangers a discrete member or group of the public.’ . . But the right to be free from such state-created danger was clearly established at the time of Defendants’ actions. Accordingly, their assertion of qualified immunity must fail. . . While not addressed by Defendants in their limited discussion of qualified immunity, it is worth noting that describing the right at issue as the right against a state-created danger of bodily harm does not broadly expose officers to suit any time they take an affirmative act. This is because, while an affirmative act that increases the plaintiff’s risk of harm can give rise to a due process claim, this is only true when the defendant commits this act with the necessary mental state, usually meaning deliberate indifference as to whether her actions will harm the plaintiff. . . Thus, while the right at issue within the qualified immunity inquiry should be defined with an appropriate level of specificity, because the right at issue here is the right against a state official acting to increase an individual’s risk of private violence with the knowledge of or at least deliberate indifference to that increased risk, the right is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’”)

Hammond v. County of Oakland, Michigan, 825 F. App’x 344, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“Any reasonable officer would have understood that commanding a dog to bite a handcuffed suspect who was not attempting to flee would violate the Fourth Amendment. Cadotte thus is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the bites. Hammond also claims that Deputies Salyers and Welch violated the Fourth Amendment when they failed to stop the bites. Whether they did depends upon whether they ‘had both the opportunity and the means to prevent the harm from occurring.’ . . But Hammond cites no caselaw clearly establishing that officers who are not trained as dog handlers have a duty to intervene and control a dog notwithstanding the presence of the dog’s handler. Salyers and Welch are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from Hammond’s claim.”)

Abdur-Rahim v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 825 F. App'x 284, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (“Analysis of the propriety of the district court’s call on Masters’s entitlement to immunity here encompasses two questions: (1) whether Masters violated Abdur-Rahim’s constitutional rights; and (2) whether those rights were clearly established. . . Because the second disposes of the issue, we opt to address only it. . . A clearly established right must be ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . Existing precedent must place the constitutional question ‘beyond debate.’ . . The court cannot ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Instead, caselaw must ‘clearly and specifically hold that what the officer did—under the circumstances the officer did it—violated the Constitution.’ . . Specificity proves especially important in the excessive force context, an ‘area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case, and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.’ . . As an initial matter, Masters contends that he did not seize Abdur-Rahim and that the district court therefore erred by analyzing the excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment, rather than under a heightened Fourteenth Amendment standard. Rather than confront this issue, we assume that the Fourth Amendment governs because, in any event, no clearly established law barred Masters’s conduct. In finding that Masters violated clearly established law, the district court failed to define the right with requisite specificity and failed to identify a case where an officer acted under similar circumstances. First, the district court found that ‘the right to be free from physical force when one is not resisting the police is a clearly established right.’ . . Perhaps, but defining the right at this level of generality misses the Supreme Court’s admonition that ‘the clearly established law must be “particularized” to the facts of the case.’ . . Indeed, in the sole published case cited for this proposition, an officer tasered a lone arrestee—a markedly different circumstance. . . . Second, the district court found that Masters had ‘notice that the use of force after mace has incapacitated a suspect is excessive.’ . . But again, none of our cases has extended that proposition to apply when using pepper spray to disperse a crowd. Rather, the cases cited by the district court and Abdur-Rahim each pertain to the reasonableness of using force against an individual arrestee whom officers already have restrained or subdued. . . . Abdur-Rahim has not provided a Sixth Circuit case that would have put Masters on notice that it constitutes excessive force to pepper spray directly a lingering individual blocking an intersection after forty-five minutes of dispersal orders and warnings, followed by a general spray over a crowd. Abdur-Rahim also suggests out-of-circuit cases to support her stance. We generally, however, disregard such authority because ‘we can’t expect officers to keep track of persuasive authority from every one of our sister circuits.’ . . Regardless, those cases address distinguishable circumstances that don’t clearly establish the specific right alleged here. . . . With no existing precedent that “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue’ in this appeal, qualified immunity shields Masters from Abdur-Rahim’s excessive force claim, and we reverse the denial of qualified immunity to Masters.”)

Bard v. Brown County, Ohio, 970 F.3d 738, 754-55 (6th Cir. 2020) (“The clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis is straightforwardly satisfied here. As the Supreme Court observed in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 121 S.Ct. 2151, 150 L.Ed.2d 272 (2001), ‘there is no doubt that Graham v. Connor clearly establishes the general proposition that use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness.’. . At the time of the alleged unconstitutional conduct, the proscription against the excessive use of force was clearly established. As to the objective reasonableness of the use of force, the fact that both the excessive-force and qualified-immunity analyses involve assessing whether the force was objectively unreasonable does not render the latter assessment ‘merely duplicative’ of the former. . . Indeed, ‘[t]he qualified immunity inquiry ... has a further dimension’ that ‘acknowledge[s] that reasonable mistakes can be made as to the legal constraints on particular police conduct.’. . As discussed above, the only theoretical reason for yanking Goldson out of the vehicle by his lower body, guaranteeing that his upper body would immediately fall to the ground, was that Goldson had recently attempted to escape from the officers. But we have repeatedly rejected this argument when the officer ‘used [such] force well after securing [the individual] and defusing the situation.’. . ‘A reasonable officer would understand that, after compliance is secured and a threat is no longer posed, force should not be employed.’ Cole v. City of Dearborn, 448 F. App’x 571, 576 (6th Cir. 2011). Because there is no indication in the record that Goldson posed a threat to the officers, I believe that the district court erred in concluding that Huff’s use of force was objectively reasonable and granting him qualified immunity on this basis.”)

Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 673-75 (6th Cir. 2020),), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) (“As a threshold issue, it should be noted that Rhodes’s choice to enter the vehicle, and his choice not to exit the vehicle when it was stopped for ten to fifteen seconds, is irrelevant in assessing the reasonableness of his use of force. . . But having no duty to retreat does not mean Rhodes could use deadly force; his actions must still be reasonable under the circumstances. Here, some of the circumstances support the reasonableness of Rhodes’s actions. Stewart drove into a police car at the beginning of the interaction; his vehicle, for whatever reason, unexpectedly stopped in the middle of an intersection; and twice he drove onto a pedestrian sidewalk. All of this occurred at approximately 7:00 a.m. in a residential neighborhood with a school nearby. Stewart certainly presented some danger to the general public in the area. So too do the circumstances show some danger to Rhodes. He was unsecured in a vehicle doing those things listed above. From the beginning to the end of the interaction, Stewart continued to put the car in drive and rev the engine, showing his commitment to driving the vehicle despite Rhodes’s efforts to stop him. But the question is ‘whether the totality of the circumstances’ justifies deadly force. . . It does not. . . . Most importantly, Rhodes admits the car was in neutral at the time of the shooting and, in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, the car was not moving forward. Even were Stewart to get the car back in gear, it seems doubtful that Stewart’s driving alone was threatening enough to justify shooting him. . . . Here, Stewart went up on the curb twice at low speeds as Rhodes hit and tasered him. . . . A jury could find that Stewart’s use of the vehicle was not threatening lives around him and thus Rhodes’s use of force was unreasonable. . . Finally, no reasonable officer in Rhodes’s position would believe he was being kidnapped by Stewart. In fact, the circumstances here are the opposite of a kidnapping: Stewart was attempting to flee officers. While Rhodes had no duty to retreat from the vehicle, his entry into the vehicle and the availability of an exit speak to the totality of the circumstances informing his use of deadly force. A reasonable officer in Rhodes’s position would have known that it was his own choice, and not any sort of pressure by Stewart, that caused him to enter the car. While these are acts Rhodes was legally entitled to do, a reasonable officer in his position would have understood he was not being kidnapped. Some of the circumstances in this case suggest that Rhodes's use of deadly force was reasonable. Others—specifically, Stewart's lack of aggression toward Rhodes, the low speeds at which he was driving, and the fact that the car may have been already stopped at the time he was shot—allow a reasonable jury to find facts showing Stewart did not present an immediate danger of serious physical injury and thus the use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . . Regardless of whether a constitutional violation occurred, however, the district court was correct to find the contours of the right were not clearly established in these circumstances. . . . Other than in the 'obvious' case, . . . the Supreme Court has indicated these general propositions are 'not enough' to delineate the contours of the right—to alert officers to the beginning and end of the right in the particular circumstances they face. . . . Given the competing concerns noted earlier, this is not an obvious case. Stewart has pointed to no cases in this circuit involving an officer being driven in a suspect's car, much less a case that shares similar characteristics such as the suspect's level of speed, aggression, or recklessness. While it is correct that the Sixth Circuit has established precedent for use of deadly force on those who flee in a vehicle, the two cases cited by Stewart involve officers standing outside a vehicle with wholly different concerns than an officer inside the vehicle. Those cases primarily focused on whether the officer was at risk of being hit or run over by the vehicle, a threat Rhodes did not face inside Stewart's car. . . . Put simply: cases about when officers may use deadly force against the driver of a vehicle bearing down on them explain very little about whether that force is appropriate as a passenger of the vehicle. While plaintiff need not provide a case factually on all fours, existing precedent must be similar enough to place the question beyond debate. . . . This circuit has not debated the types and level of threat faced by an officer inside a fleeing suspect's vehicle, much less placed it beyond debate. . . . Further, Stewart's reference to two out of circuit cases does not provide the 'robust consensus' required for the right to be clearly established. . . . Neither controlling nor persuasive precedent has clearly established Stewart's rights in the 'particular circumstances' Rhodes faced. . . . Indeed, few cases have ever considered the danger faced by an officer inside a fleeing suspect's vehicle and at what point it justifies the use of deadly force. Rhodes is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 677-84 (6th Cir. 2020),), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) (Donald, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“While I agree that the district court should be reversed on the state law claims and that Officer Rhodes violated Luke Stewart's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures, I would also find that the constitutional right was clearly established and that, therefore, Rhodes is not entitled to qualified immunity. The majority evaluates the clearly-established prong too narrowly and provides immunity to an officer who created a dangerous situation and then used that situation to justify the fatal shooting of a man who did not present an immediate danger of serious physical injury to the officer. In fact, it is debatable whether Stewart presented any danger to the officer or the public, or if he even knew that Rhodes was a law enforcement officer, since neither Rhodes nor Catalani announced themselves as police officers. . . . Despite § 1983's categorical decree that all persons under color of state law who cause the deprivation of a constitutional right ‘shall’ be subject to liability, the Supreme Court overlaid qualified immunity onto the statute’s directive in an effort to balance its underlying policies. . . . More specifically, the doctrine—as we know it today—was deemed necessary to protect public officials from unforeseeable developments in the law. . . . Today, the seemingly endless struggle with applying the doctrine is in defining the extent of a clearly established right. . . . Judge Willett from the Fifth Circuit recently highlighted some of the issues with the clearly-established standard in his dissent in Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willett, J., dissenting). Noting the courts’ division over what level of ‘factual similarity must exist,’ he wrote that ‘the “clearly established” standard is neither clear nor established among our Nation’s lower courts.’ Id. He also emphasized that deciding immunity issues based on a too-narrow construction of clearly established law prevents the vindication of constitutional rights[.] . . . Of course, the problems do not end there, as courts have increasingly begun to skip the constitutional question and simply ask whether the right was clearly established. . . . Here, the majority answered the constitutional question first but construes the clearly-established prong too narrowly. The sole purpose of the clearly-established prong, as created and announced by the Supreme Court, is to protect officials from unforeseeable or unknowable developments in the law. . . . It is not a blank check to engage in specific acts that have not previously been considered by a court of controlling authority. . . . Nor is it ‘a license to lawless conduct.’ . . . When defining clearly established rights, we must have in the forefront of our mind this question: would a reasonable officer have known that his actions were unconstitutional? The majority notes that Rhodes had no duty to retreat. However, Rhodes likewise had a duty to only use such force as was necessary under the totality of the circumstances. The fact that Rhodes shot Stewart five times at near point-blank range defies reasonableness. This is the type of wantonness that does not require a case on point to put an officer on notice that his conduct is unreasonable. As Judge Gorsuch opined, ‘some things are so obviously unlawful that they don’t require detailed explanations’ or happen so rarely that there will be no case on point. Browder v. City of Albuquerque, 787 F.3d 1076, 1082 (10th Cir. 2015). Had Rhodes been standing outside of the car when he used lethal force, this would be a very simple case—he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . However, in this Circuit, the Court has not encountered the exact situation that occurred in this case—the officer being inside of the car at the time of the shooting. That lack of precisely-analogous controlling law can oftentimes sound the death knell to a § 1983 claim. . . . Here, the majority sounds the death knell for Stewart’s § 1983 claims and finds that the right was not clearly established, but I disagree. In addition to this being a situation where precisely-analogous law should not be required, both in-circuit cases and out-of-circuit cases show that Rhodes violated Stewart’s clearly-established right to be free from excessive force when he shot Stewart five times and killed him, even though he posed no imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . The law is clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the suspect is presenting an imminent threat of physical injury or death to the officer or the public. . . . Although Rhodes asserts that he felt that he was in danger while the car was moving, and that he feared that he may be in danger if the car were to begin moving again, the fact remains that the car was not moving at the time Rhodes chose to shoot Stewart. This lack of imminent threat of serious physical injury renders lethal force objectively unreasonable in this circumstance (despite Rhodes' individualized concern to the contrary). . . . Although this case presents unique factual circumstances within this Circuit, there are at least four factually similar cases from other jurisdictions. [discussing cases] While it is arguable that these four cases establish the 'robust consensus' that would put a reasonable officer on notice of Stewart's specific rights, . . . what is more persuasive is that these four cases illuminate the application of the specific—and clearly established—right that an individual has to be free from lethal force when fleeing arrest in a car that is not presenting an imminent threat of serious physical harm to anybody. . . . Moreover, these four cases applied that specific right when the suspect's car was actually moving, whereas in our case Stewart's car was stopped when he was killed. That distinction makes it even more apparent that a reasonable officer would have known that lethal force was inappropriate in this case. As such, I would find that Stewart's rights were clearly established at the time that Rhodes shot and killed him. . . . I find myself writing separately about the dangers of unchecked police powers with unsettling and increasing frequency. Six years ago, I dissented from a decision affirming summary judgment for several officers who killed Leroy Hughes, an African American man suffering from mental illness, by shocking him with tasers twelve times in five minutes. See Sheffey v. City of Covington, 564 F. App'x 783, 796-97 (6th Cir. 2014) (Donald, J., dissenting). The first eight shocks occurred in a single minute. . . . The total delivery exceeded 14,000 volts. . . . In that dissent, I recalled the names of Amadou Diallo, Sean Bell, Oscar Grant, Jonathan Ferrell, and others. . . . And I exhorted this Court and its readers not to 'ignore the seeds of systemic inequalities sown in our Nation's history and lain bare by diligent review.' . . . We have new names today: George Floyd, Elijah McClain, Rayshard Brooks, and too many others. The world knows why they died. The same seeds whose bitter fruit killed Leroy Hughes killed them too. And on March 13, 2017, in Euclid, Ohio, they killed Luke Stewart. That the seeds of these senseless killings are systemic should not absolve the shooters. Our system of justice bestows upon police great powers and a sacred trust. We rightly protect police from penalties that otherwise would follow from poor conduct when officers act with reason. But when officers fail to act with reason, when they are motivated by impulses that spring from dark corners of the psyche or simply fail implicitly to acknowledge the humanity of the people before them, they violate our sacred trust. And then the same system that empowers and protects police must, if it is to function properly, if it is to be worthy of recognition as a system of justice, strip those powers and protections away. Luke Stewart should be alive today. He was unarmed, unsuspected of committing a serious felony, and behind the wheel of a stationary vehicle when Rhodes opened fire into his torso, chest, neck, and wrist. Qualified immunity should not shield Rhodes from the consequences of that unreasonable decision. I dissent.”) Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 650, 653-55 (6th Cir. 2020) (“For several of Tlapanco’s claims, . . . the ‘breathing room’ granted to officers by qualified immunity is not dispositive given the facts of this case. . . . Specifically, with regard to all of Tlapanco’s Fourth Amendment claims against Elges except the mirroring claim, the primary issue to resolve is whether a reasonable jury could find that, when he applied for the search and arrest warrants, Elges intentionally or recklessly disregarded material facts negating probable cause. Further, while it will sometimes be possible for officers to make ‘reasonable but mistaken judgments’ about the materiality of the information omitted, that is not true here. . . In this case, as described below, the information Elges left out of the warrant applications obviously negated probable cause because it demonstrated that Tlapanco was not the Kik user harassing A.F. Thus, under the circumstances of this case, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity as long as a reasonable jury could find that his omission of this information was intentional or reckless. . . . Because a reasonable jury could find that Elges’s sworn statements supporting the arrest warrant were recklessly indifferent to the truth that Tlapanco did not hack or communicate with A.F., and Tlapanco’s right to be free from arrest without probable cause was clearly established, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . Despite Tlapanco’s substantial showing that Elges possessed information establishing that Tlapanco did not hack A.F. nor communicate with her on Kik, Tlapanco was arrested pursuant to a warrant and therefore needs to prove: ‘(1) that the officer applying for the warrant, either knowingly and deliberately or with reckless disregard for the truth, made false statements or omissions that created a falsehood[,] and (2) that such statements or omissions were material to the finding of probable cause.’ . . . A reasonable jury could find that Elges did not have probable cause to conclude that Tlapanco was connected to the conduct at issue, and that the judge would not have issued the arrest warrant but for recklessly false statements or material omissions by Elges. A reasonable jury could find that Tlapanco was arrested without probable cause, a violation of a clearly established right. Accordingly, Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Tlapanco has provided evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that Elges violated Tlapanco’s ‘clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has “made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff” by ... “knowingly or reckless!” making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.’ . . Elges is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”) Proctor v. Krzanowski, 820 F. App’x 436, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“Here, Proctor claims a property interest in not being restricted from using his medical license to issue certifications to patients seeking a medical marihuana registry card. That right is far from clearly established. As Krzanowski and Mitchell point out, the ‘ “contour” of the [right to] professional licensing and medical marihuana has not been made clear in the federal realm.’ . . Federal district courts have consistently rejected claims that state laws permitting medical marihuana possession can create a constitutionally protected property interest in medical marihuana or medical marihuana patient cards. . . Thus, if in 2016 Krzanowski and Mitchell had surveyed the limited legal landscape of Fourteenth Amendment protections for medical marihuana, they would have found only decisions declaring that the nature of the property interest (in possessing a substance deemed contraband by federal law) disentitled the interest to Fourteenth Amendment protections. . . This is true even though state law imposed substantive restrictions on when medical marihuana licenses could be denied—traditionally an indicator of constitutionally protected property interests. Krzanowski and Mitchell would understandably believe that if the ‘nature’ of the patient’s interest in a medical marihuana registry card disentitled the interest to constitutional protection, the same would be true of the nature of Proctor’s interest in helping patients obtain a registry card. Similarly, Krzanowski and Mitchell might reasonably believe that a physician’s interest in providing a medical certification required for obtaining that patient card is not sufficiently weighty to warrant constitutional protection. Against a backdrop of federal district court cases declining to recognize a constitutionally protected property interest in medical marihuana registry cards, it could not have been obvious to Krzanowski and Mitchell that Proctor had a constitutionally protected interest participating in a process to assist others to obtain a medical marihuana patient registry card.”)

Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 280-84 (6th Cir. 2020) (“[W]e have . . . recognized that ‘just as a court can generalize too much, it can generalize too little. If it defeats the qualified-immunity analysis to define the right too broadly ... it defeats the purpose of § 1983 to define the right too narrowly.’ . . In the present case, we are guided by the Supreme Court’s opinion in Wesby, which was also a false arrest case. . . . [I]t was certainly clearly established at the time of Plaintiff’s arrest in 2014 that ‘absent probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed, was being committed, or was about to be committed, officers may not arrest an individual.’ . . In Logsdon, this Court held that this standard alone, absent any ‘sea change in this body of law since [the plaintiff’s] arrest,’ was sufficient to overcome the defendant’s qualified immunity defense. . . Nevertheless, the district court in this case chose to define the right more narrowly. It considered whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right to be free ‘from the type of arrest Plaintiff experienced: arrest based on the testimony of one eyewitness who has an apparent bias in the matter.’ . . And our case law establishes that she did under these circumstances. In a series of cases, we have refined the governing standard for when an eyewitness’ allegations are sufficient to establish probable cause. [discussing cases] These cases and their progeny clearly establish that Plaintiff had a right to be free from arrest based solely on Mohamad’s unreliable and uncorroborated accusation. This is especially true where Mohamad’s account was the only piece of evidence from which Officer Dottor could even conceivably (although unreasonably) have concluded that he had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff. Our conclusion that Officer Dottor had ‘fair warning’ that his conduct would be unlawful is further supported by our precedent establishing that an officer must consider both inculpatory and exculpatory evidence when assessing probable cause. . . . Moreover, this Court does not require ‘a prior, “precise situation,” a finding that “the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,” or a “case directly on point”’ in order to hold that a right was clearly established. . . Thus, under the applicable case law, we must reject the dissent’s proposed qualified immunity standard because it is too rigid and unyielding. Qualified immunity is not absolute immunity, and our case law establishes that individuals must have some right to sue government officials who knowingly or unreasonably violate their constitutional rights. At the time of the arrest, our case law clearly established that Plaintiff had a right to be free from an arrest unsupported by probable cause. . . And we had clearly held that a single witness’ unreliable accusation is insufficient to create probable cause to arrest a person without further corroboration (especially when that witness is himself a suspect, as here). . . . Accordingly, under the standard announced in City of Escondido and Wesby, Officer Dottor had fair notice that his arrest of Plaintiff would be unlawful in the circumstances with which he was confronted.”)

Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 290-94 (6th Cir. 2020) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I join the majority opinion regarding plaintiff’s excessive-force claim, however regarding the false-arrest and municipal-liability claims, I respectfully dissent because I conclude the district court correctly granted summary judgment in defendants’ favor. . . Time and again, . . . the Supreme Court has admonished lower courts that broad statements of ‘clearly established law do not provide the ‘specificity’ required to put a police officer on notice that his ‘conduct in the particular circumstances before him’ is unconstitutional[.]. . Accordingly, when a court denies qualified immunity to a police officer on a Fourth Amendment claim, it must normally ‘identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ . . Because no such similar case clearly establishes defendant police officer Jordan Dottor unconstitutionally arrested plaintiff Ehsan Ouza, the majority opinion errs in denying him qualified immunity on her § 1983 false-arrest claim. . . .The district court defined the right at issue as whether one may be ‘arrest[ed] based on the testimony of one eyewitness who has an apparent bias in the matter.’ The majority opinion agrees. . . It then relies on three cases to conclude this right was clearly established at the time of plaintiff’s arrest. . . None, however, satisfy the Supreme Court’s similar-circumstances mandate. [distinguishing cases] Qualified immunity is a ‘demanding standard [that] protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . No case unquestionably put Officer Dottor’s decision to arrest plaintiff on the wrong side of constitutionality. At that time, our caselaw was unclear both as to (1) whether an eyewitness’s statement alone is enough to establish probable cause and (2) how much credence a police officer must give to an eyewitness’s account when he may have some reason to doubt at least some aspect of that account. ‘Tellingly,’ neither plaintiff nor my colleagues ‘have identified a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ . . Nor am I aware of a case generally holding that it is unconstitutional for an officer to rely on a complaining witness’s version of events to arrest an individual when an officer might have some reason to discredit some portions of the complaining witness’s story, let alone one involving the ‘complex emotional causes of behavior’ that frequently accompany domestic-violence situations. . . That is the precise circumstance here and caselaw requires that we defer to Officer Dottor’s contemporaneous judgment call regarding the existence of probable cause when he arrested plaintiff. Accordingly, the unlawfulness of [Officer Dottor]’s conduct does not follow immediately” from a review’ of the majority’s three case[.] . . Officer Dottor is entitled to qualified immunity, and I would therefore affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Officer Dottor.”)

Siders v. City of Eastpointe, 819 F. App’x 381, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“To deny qualified immunity here would be to hold that a suspected domestic-violence perpetrator has a clearly established constitutional right to thwart the responding officer by getting into a car and closing the door, to resist restraint by kicking the officer and clinging to the car’s seat, and to refuse the officer’s orders for handcuffing. There are no such rights. To be sure, a reasonable person viewing the video of this incident could characterize the officer’s actions as impatient, overzealous, and perhaps unnecessary. But whether we personally condone or condemn the officer’s conduct is immaterial; the question is whether our constitutional precedent so clearly forbids it that we cannot even construe the officer's actions as a reasonable mistake. Even if we were to agree that the officer was impatient or overzealous, his actions were not wholly unreasonable under the circumstances, and those actions did not violate the suspect's clearly-established constitutional rights. Therefore, he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [I]n deciding this appeal, we rely primarily—almost entirely, in fact—on our own plenary review of the videotape recordings.”)

Siders v. City of Eastpointe, 819 F. App'x 381, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Stranch, J., dissenting) (“To have jurisdiction over Defendants’ interlocutory appeal, we must view the facts in Siders’ favor. . . . The majority opinion fails to do so. When the most favorable view of the facts is conceded in Siders’ favor, . . . genuine disputes remain over whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . Application of the Graham factors to the facts taken in the light most favorable to Patricia shows: (1) that Patricia’s misdemeanor offenses were not serious, (2) there was little basis to believe Patricia was a threat to the officers or others, (3) Patricia’s withdrawal into the van was at most a passive refusal to comply with an unwarranted threat (‘close the door and you’re going to get ripped out of the car’), and (4) she had stopped resisting when Piro tasered her. The majority opinion’s contrary conclusions rely on Defendants’ challenges to Patricia’s version of events, which have no place in our qualified immunity analysis in an interlocutory appeal. The facts viewed most favorably to Patricia, as we must at this stage, state a constitutional violation. We should therefore reach the next constitutional question—whether the violated right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Framed properly, we should ask 1) whether a potential misdemeanor, who has not been placed under arrest and who has neither fled nor resisted investigation, has a clearly established right not to be forcibly removed by her ankles from a passenger seat of her car, and 2) whether a potential misdemeanor has a right not to be tasered when she is lying on the ground and has stopped resisting. I would answer these questions affirmatively because Piro had ‘fair warning’ that his actions were unconstitutional. . . . The majority opinion is fair in acknowledging that Piro could have achieved his goal of investigating or arresting Siders without using any force: ‘he might have been more patient and less threatening (and less profane); he might have ordered Patricia to exit the minivan and given her time to comply voluntarily; or he might have coerced her from the minivan with the threat of tasing, rather than physically overwhelming her and pulling her out.’. . . This honest acknowledgement suggests that the amount of force used was not reasonable and, in my view, shows that the force used was objectively unnecessary to investigating Siders or effecting her arrest. It was therefore excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because Patricia had a clearly established constitutional right not to be pulled from her car by the ankles onto concrete in front of her children when she was, at most, passively resisting investigation, and because she also had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously tasered after ceasing resistance, I would affirm the district court’s denial of summary judgment with respect to the excessive force claim against Piro.”) Kesterson v. Kent State University, 967 F.3d 519, 525-26 (6th Cir. 2020) (“[W]e think the case law, by 2014, had put beyond debate that a coach at a state university cannot retaliate against a student-athlete for speaking out by subjecting her to harassment and humiliation. For decades, employees at ‘state colleges and universities’ have known that those institutions ‘are not enclaves immune from the sweep of the First Amendment.’ . . . Students may exercise their First Amendment rights unless doing so would ‘materially and substantially disrupt’ school operations. . . . And school officials may not retaliate against students based on their protected speech. . . . More specifically, long before these events, our court explained that coaches could not retaliate against a player ‘for reporting improprieties.’ . . . Based on these cases, a reasonable coach would have known at the time Linder acted that she could not retaliate against a student athlete for reporting a sexual assault. All that remains is for a jury to decide whether Kesterson can carry her burden of proof.”)

Kesterson v. Kent State University, 967 F.3d 519, 533-34 (6th Cir. 2020) (Stranch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I disagree. . . with the majority opinion’s dismissive approach to the two cases clearly establishing that Linder’s conduct would violate Kesterson’s constitutional right to equal protection. In Patterson v. Hudson Area Schools, 551 F.3d 438, 448 (6th Cir. 2009), we declined to grant qualified immunity to school officials where the student suffered bullying that was ‘severe and pervasive’ and the officials’ response was inadequate ‘to deter other students from perpetuating the cycle of harassment.’ . . . And in Shively, where the defendants ‘failed to enforce the school policy on harassment,’ we relied on Patterson and held that it was well established by 2011 that school officials’ deliberate indifference to reports of student harassment violate a student’s equal protection rights. . . . The majority distinguished Patterson on the basis that it involved a funding recipient’s liability under Title IX. But we have already established that deliberate indifference in a § 1983 equal protection claim is ‘substantially the same’ as demonstrating deliberate indifference in Title IX cases. . . . And the majority opinion’s attempt to distinguish Shively because it dealt with gender and religious—as opposed to sexual—harassment is simply a distinction without a difference. The law is clear that the plaintiff need only offer evidence that she was subjected to peer harassment, regardless of its form, . . . and then focus on ‘the recipient’s response to [allegations of] harassment or lack thereof’ in evaluating a deliberate indifference equal protection claim[.] . . . The conclusion that the law requires a match of the particulars of the harassment endured is not a part of the applicable legal standard. Here a head coach learned that her son raped a student athlete and the coach intentionally ignored school policy mandating that she report the rape—a coach who had reported similar assaults not involving her family. . . . Patterson and Shively clearly established that Linder could be held liable for acting with deliberate indifference to Kesterson’s claim of harassment. . . . Under our precedent, I think qualified immunity should be denied for Kesterson’s equal protection claim.”)

Jones v. City of Detroit, 815 F. App’x 995, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“To the extent cases from outside our circuit figure into the ‘clearly established’ analysis—they usually do not, Ashford v. Raby, 951 F.3d 798, 804 (6th Cir. 2020)—they tell the same story. No case to our knowledge, and none cited by Jones, elaborates a Fourth Amendment standard for safety restraints, head-guiding, or headroom in transporting wheelchair users. . . . Jones claims the officers used excessive force when they transported him in a van without using traditional safety restraints to secure the wheelchair and without enough headroom. But our cases say the opposite when it comes to the closest analogy, transporting non-wheelchair users. Faced with that question, courts within and outside our circuit have repeatedly rejected constitutional challenges to transportation of detainees without seatbelts. [collecting cases] Jones does not cite any contrary authority. The closest analogy, in other words, would not have warned the officers of a constitutional requirement to transport Jones only with the aid of safety restraints to secure the wheelchair. And those cases would not have shown that what the officers did do—allow an individual to hold the wheelchair in place with his feet in a tight space that left little room for movement anyway—violated clearly established law. Our cases about transporting people in wheelchairs similarly tell the officers nothing about whether they transgressed constitutional boundaries in transporting Jones. Jones identifies just one case about transporting an arrestee who used a wheelchair. [court discusses St. John case] Only one other case in our circuit has involved a claim that an officer used excessive force while arresting a wheelchair user. That case upheld a jury verdict against an officer who pulled a paraplegic driver out of his car by his neck, dropped him on the ground, kicked and kneed him in the head, and dragged him across the ground by his forearms. Koehler v. Smith, 124 F.3d 198, at *5 (6th Cir. 1997) (table). Our circuit thus has decided two cases about excessive force against wheelchair-bound suspects, and neither one could have alerted the officers to constitutional headroom, head-guiding, or safety-restraint requirements. The case’s scarce forebears suggest it ‘presents a unique set of facts and circumstances’ cutting in favor of qualified immunity, . . . not a constitutional rule that is ‘beyond debate[.]’”)

Jones v. City of Detroit, 815 F. App’x 995, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting) (“The majority opinion is wise-like in its analysis of whether Jones’s constitutional rights are clearly established. Rather than considering “‘the salient question’ in evaluating the clearly established prong,’ ‘whether officials had “fair warning” that their conduct was unconstitutional,’ . . . the majority frames the question at the most granular level. It concludes that ‘[n]o case ... elaborates a Fourth Amendment standard for safety restraints, head-guiding, or headroom in transporting wheelchair users.’ . . . If this definition of the constitutional right is not so narrowly defined as to ‘defeat[] the purpose of [42 U.S.C.] § 1983,’ then it is difficult to imagine what definition would be too narrow. . . . The majority treats the fact that Jones is wheelchair-bound as a feature that makes it less likely that a reasonable officer would know that his actions violated our excessive-force precedent because few cases address arrestees in wheelchairs. But this misses the obvious point—because of Jones’s apparent disability and because of the prevalence of persons without disabilities in our excessive-force precedent, we should conclude that this fact makes it more likely that a reasonable officer would be on notice that his treatment of Jones amounted to excessive force. . . . In St. John, we addressed the transport of a person with a physical disability who was in a wheelchair. There, we concluded that the right at issue was ‘the right of a nonviolent arrestee to be free from unnecessary pain knowingly inflicted during an arrest’ and that the right ‘was clearly established.’ . . . This is how we should define the right at issue here. Jones was also a nonviolent arrestee and the portion of his arrest where the defendants pushed his head down is materially indistinguishable from the arrest in St. John. Jones was arrested for disorderly conduct, the same crime as the plaintiff in St. John; he did not present a risk of flight; he posed no threat to others; and there were no exigent circumstances necessitating his immediate transport or confinement in the van. Additionally, the defendants here were aware that they were causing Jones unnecessary pain. First, it was readily apparent that he was wheelchair-bound, like the plaintiff in St. John. . . Second, Jones cried out, ‘ow,’ to the officers as they pushed his head down. . . The fact that Jones did not apprise the officers of the specifics of his disability is not fatal to his case. In St. John, the plaintiff explained to the officers that his legs could not bend due to muscular dystrophy. . . But the issue was whether the officers were aware that they were causing the plaintiff, ‘an obviously disabled and wheelchair-bound man,’ pain—not that he gave a particular verbal warning. . . To that end, we considered the plaintiff’s verbal warning and the fact that he used a wheelchair. . . The majority opinion interprets ‘knowingly’ from St. John to require a particular verbal warning, even if the arrestee has an obvious disability that a reasonable officer would appreciate and has otherwise communicated his pain to the officers. This makes little sense. Moreover, St. John also gave the defendants here fair notice that they could not leave a person with an apparent disability in an unsafe position.”)

Sevy v. Barach, No. 19-2038, 2020 WL 3564660, at *5–7 (6th Cir. July 1, 2020) (not reported) (“First Amendment retaliation claims often involve retaliatory arrests. But to establish a retaliatory arrest, plaintiffs generally must prove that the arresting officer lacked probable cause. [citing Nieves] On appeal in this case, Sevy does not argue that Barach lacked probable cause to arrest him. That means his retaliation claim is not based on the arrest itself. Rather, Sevy’s claim is based on the allegedly excessive force Barach used in carrying out the arrest. This certainly seems like a case where it would be ‘particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer’s malice or the plaintiff’s potentially criminal conduct.’. . . Regardless, we need not untie this Gordian knot, because Sevy’s asserted First Amendment right was not clearly established. . . Recall that to overcome qualified immunity, Sevy must show that (1) Barach violated his constitutional rights, and (2) his right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . A right is ‘clearly established’ when the alleged conduct violates ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’. . . In other words, the right is clearly established if someone in Barach’s position should reasonably have known—based on existing law—that the conduct violated Sevy’s First Amendment rights. . . But it’s not clear whether Sevy even had a viable First Amendment claim on his excessive-force retaliation theory, let alone whether his First Amendment rights were clearly established under existing law. . . . Judge Moore concludes otherwise, reasoning that Sevy’s right to protest was clearly established, and a reasonable officer would have known not to use physical force in retaliation. But this is not a case about physical force in isolation. Rather, the issue is whether the use of excessive force in executing an arrest supported by probable cause can amount to a First Amendment, rather than a Fourth Amendment, violation. This is at least an open question, . . . and existing precedents do not answer that question ‘beyond debate’ in Sevy’s favor[.] . . Thus, Sevy’s First Amendment right to recover under this hybrid theory is not clearly established.”)

Sevy v. Barach, No. 19-2038, 2020 WL 3564660, at *7-8 (6th Cir. July 1, 2020) (not reported) (Moore, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In short, it should not take a previous case holding that officers may not choke individuals in retaliation for their exercise of free speech, such as protest and public criticism of officers, to conclude that Sevy's rights were clearly established. This case is a prime example of 'the easiest cases don't even arise.' . . . For these reasons, I concur in the majority opinion's resolution of Barach's appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity for Sevy's Fourth Amendment claim, and I dissent from the resolution of Barach's appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Wright v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 962 F.3d 852, 866-72 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[B]ased only on Wright's brief stop at the residence, the officers decided to conduct a traffic stop with weapons drawn. These circumstances are very different from those in Heath where the officers had a justifiable fear for their safety given that the defendant, whom they had identified and surveilled for a month, was a large-scale drug dealer and likely to be carrying a weapon. Flagg and Williams at most had a suspicion that Wright had briefly visited with a suspected drug dealer, but given that the officers had not identified Wright himself as a drug dealer or sought any corroboration of their suspicions of criminal activity, there is a genuine dispute as to whether the officers were justified in brandishing their firearms upon approach. Thus, a jury must determine whether their decision to do so was unconstitutionally excessive. . . . When Wright was unable to comply with Flagg's commands because of his stomach staples and colostomy bag, the encounter turned violent. Wright was not armed. According to Flagg, he thought Wright was reaching for a weapon in the center console and considered that movement to be an act of resisting arrest. Wright, however, disputes that his hand movement was threatening to the extent that he moved his hand at all. Although these two versions of events are not inconsistent with each other—that is, Flagg could have reasonably believed Wright was reaching for a gun when in reality he was trying to comply with orders—a reasonable jury could find, based on the totality of the circumstances, that a reasonable officer would not believe that Wright posed an immediate threat to their safety. . . . Even if Flagg is correct that Wright's act of pushing down on the center console constituted some resistance, if the resistance was merely "passive," then the use of a taser was unreasonable. See Goodwin, 781 F.3d at 323. The tasing of Wright was justified only if he engaged in resistance that was 'active,' which 'can take the form of "verbal hostility" or a "deliberate act of defiance."'. . . [A]n officer may not tase a citizen not under arrest merely for failure to follow the officer's orders when the officer has no reasonable fear for his or her safety. Whether the tasing in this instance was constitutionally permissible must be decided by the jury, given the genuine factual disputes described above concerning the circumstances of Wright's encounter with the officers. . . . The district court held that it was 'unaware of any controlling cases that have established a constitutional violation occurred when non-lethal force was used to obtain control over the suspect who reasonably appeared to pose a safety risk to officers.' . . . In so holding, the district court examined the issue of whether the law was clearly established using too specific of a level of generality. . . . The district court also incorrectly framed the issue based upon Flagg's version of the facts by assuming that Wright did in fact 'reasonably appear[] to pose a safety risk' to the officer. Given that this was a summary judgment ruling, the district court instead should have considered whether the law was clearly established using Wright's version of the facts. Wright contends that he had done nothing prior to his encounter with police to justify the officers' brandishing of their firearms. He also maintains that he had a right not to be tased when, during the course of an investigatory detention, he inadvertently broke away from the officer's grip, but presented no threat to others, and did not actively resist arrest. For the reasons discussed below, we hold that, viewing the facts in Wright's favor, Flagg's drawing of his firearm and use of his taser violated Wright's constitutional rights that were clearly established as of the date of the encounter, November 4, 2016. . . . We have also recognized that pointing a gun at an individual can constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. [noting cases] Based on this authority, it was clearly established as of the time of Wright's encounter with the officers that brandishing a firearm without a justifiable fear that Wright was fleeing or dangerous was unreasonable and constituted excessive force. . . . To summarize, a reasonable jury could find that Flagg's actions constituted unreasonable and constituted excessive force. It was clearly established as of November 4, 2016 that drawing a weapon on a suspect who was not fleeing or posing a safety risk and tasing a suspect who was not actively resisting arrest constituted excessive force. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court's grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds to Flagg as to the excessive-force claims. . . . Wright's excessive-force claim against Williams, based on his brandishing of a firearm and use of the pepper spray, largely mirrors the claim against Flagg based on his similar use of a firearm and tasing, and therefore the analysis is largely the same. . . . For reasons similar to those discussed above as they relate to Flagg's use of his taser, we hold that the right to be free from being pepper sprayed when a suspect is not actively resisting arrest was also clearly established at the time of the encounter in question. . . . Wright has produced evidence that would allow a reasonable juror to conclude that he had not committed a serious crime, or any crime at all; that he was not a danger to the officers or the public; and that he was not resisting arrest. Although the officers tell a different story, it should be up to the jury to determine whose story is more credible. Therefore, we REVERSE as to the excessive-force claim against Williams for deploying his pepper spray, as well as for brandishing his firearm.”)

Jones v. Clark County, Kentucky, 959 F.3d 748, 756, 760, 766-67 (6th Cir. 2020) (“Under federal law, a plaintiff must prove four elements to establish a malicious prosecution claim: (1) that a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and that the defendant ‘made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute;’ (2) that the state lacked probable cause for the prosecution; (3) that the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty because of the legal proceeding; and (4) that the criminal proceeding was ‘resolved in the plaintiff’s favor.’ . . . [E]ven though there was probable cause for Jones’ arrest and the grand jury indictment creates a presumption of probable cause for his prosecution, the forensics test results vitiated probable cause for Jones’ ongoing detention. The record is clear that Murray knew by January 11, 2014, that there was no evidence of child pornography on Jones’ devices. But because there is a factual dispute as to whether Murray informed the prosecutors of these results, a genuine issue exists as to whether Murray ‘knowingly or recklessly’ withheld this exculpatory evidence. . . . Ultimately, at the summary judgment stage, it is not for this Court or the district court to ‘weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter.’ . . . There is a genuine dispute as to whether Murray falsely maintained probable cause for Jones’ continued detention by not informing the prosecutors that there was no forensic evidence connecting Jones to the illegal video. Thus, a fact-finder should decide whether, ‘had this information been made known, probable cause for Plaintiff’s continued detention would have dissolved.’ . . . If there was no probable cause for Jones’ continued detention and Murray withheld the forensics test results from the prosecutors, then Murray did violate Jones’ constitutional rights. The greater challenge is the second inquiry: whether the right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation. The right must be ‘so clearly established in a particularized sense that a reasonable officer confronted with the same situation would have known that his conduct violated that right.’ . . . A court is to ‘zoom in close enough to ensure the right is appropriately defined to reach a ‘concrete, particularized description of the right.’ . . . This Court has repeatedly held that ‘individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff.’ . . . The right includes malicious prosecutions in which an officer participates by ‘knowingly or recklessly making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.’ . . . This Court has also held that ‘[f]reedom from malicious prosecution is a clearly established Fourth Amendment right.’ . . . In the present case, Defendants argue that:

The law was not clear in 2013 (and still is not clear) that probable cause to prosecute a suspect on a child pornography charge requires forensic evidence of child pornography or that the identification of the subscriber for an IP address used to download child pornography coupled with other undisputed facts Deputy Murray learned is insufficient to establish probable cause for prosecution.

Br. of Appellees at 29.

Defendants do not demonstrate why their formulation of the requisite ‘clearly established law’ is appropriate. There is an undoubted right ‘to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff.’ . . . This right applies in cases where the officer has falsified statements or withheld evidence and facilitated the continued detention of a plaintiff without probable cause. That is the right Jones argues was violated. And this has been the law since at least 1999, when Spurlock was decided.”)

Jones v. Clark County, Kentucky, 959 F.3d 748, 768-76 (6th Cir. 2020) (Murphy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I must respectfully part ways with the majority’s view that Jones may proceed with his claim that Murray lacked probable cause for Jones’s ‘continued detention’ after January 2014 when Murray received the results of a forensic examination of Jones’s cellphone and tablet computer. I would affirm the denial of Jones’s continued-detention claim on qualified-immunity grounds. My reason is simple: The majority notes that Jones has a clearly established right to be free from a malicious prosecution. But the Supreme ‘Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . The Supreme Court has imposed doubly demanding standards on plaintiffs who seek to hold police officers liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for ‘seizing’ them without ‘probable cause’ in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs must show not just that the officers failed to meet the minimal threshold required for probable cause, but also that the officers were plainly incompetent in concluding that they had met it. . . . To overcome the defense, a plaintiff must show that ‘the violative nature of particular conduct [was] clearly established’ when a police officer engaged in that conduct. . .

These two phrases—‘clearly established’ and ‘particular conduct’—give this test its teeth. . . . That caselaw affirmatively shows the presence of probable cause when Murray arrested Jones in October 2013, and it does not clearly establish the absence of probable cause when Murray received the forensic-examination results in January 2014. Under the Supreme Court’s precedent, then, Jones cannot overcome Murray’s qualified-immunity defense. . . . Under our caselaw governing a ‘continued detention without probable cause,’ Jones must prove that the forensic-examination results ‘dissolved’ the probable cause that initially supported Murray’s arrest (and the indictment in December 2013). . . . I do not think the results did so when assessed through the lens of the demanding qualified-immunity framework. And I do not see a need to say anything more about this closer constitutional question on the merits, both because the constitutional question is ‘factbound’ and because courts regularly provide probable-cause guidance in criminal cases with no qualified-immunity defense. . . . When considering all the facts collectively and objectively, an officer would not have been ‘plainly incompetent’ in believing that probable cause still existed. . . . ‘Tellingly,’ Jones does not cite ‘a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding [the absence of probable cause] “under similar circumstances”’: when police connect child pornography to a residence’s IP address but fail to uncover child pornography on electronic devices at the residence. . . . Yet in this probable-cause context the Supreme Court has stressed ‘the need to “identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.”’ . . . And what is the ‘clearly established’ legal rule that would have given Murray unambiguous notice that probable cause no longer existed after January 2014? . . . I do not think it can be the general ‘right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from continued detention without probable cause.’ . . . That right is far ‘too general’ because the ‘unlawfulness of [Murray’s] conduct “does not follow immediately from the conclusion that”’ it is clearly established. . . . In sum, Jones’s continued-detention claim must fail because he has not proved that Murray’s conduct ‘violate[d] clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Neither Jones nor the majority opinion identifies a clearly established legal rule that would have put Murray on notice that he lacked probable cause after receiving the forensic-examination results. Jones does not even attempt to meet this ‘demanding standard.’ . . . His 47-page brief devotes a single sentence to qualified immunity, asserting that because Murray ‘failed to show that [Murray] did not violate Jones’ constitutional rights, [Murray] is not entitled to qualified immunity.’ . . . This will not do. To rebut qualified immunity, Jones must prove that Murray violated a constitutional right and that this right was clearly established. . . . Jones both flips the burden of proof and collapses the two inquiries, leaving no separate work for qualified immunity apart from the underlying constitutional question. With respect, the majority largely does the same by defining the ‘clearly established’ law at a high level of generality. It correctly notes that our cases establish ‘an undoubted right “to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff”’ and that ‘[t]his right applies in cases where the officer has falsified statements or withheld evidence and facilitated the continued detention of a plaintiff without probable cause.’ . . . But the qualified-immunity inquiry ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . I do not believe the majority identifies its legal rule with the ‘high “degree of specificity”’ that the Supreme Court’s cases demand. . . . Its proposed legal rule is analogous to suggesting that there is a clearly established right to be free from ‘excessive force’—a level of generality that the Supreme Court has repeatedly rejected. . . I concede that the Supreme Court does not require a case directly on point and that courts may face difficulty identifying the ‘correct’ level of generality at which to articulate a legal rule. . . But the Court has recognized these concerns too. It has given us a benchmark to decide whether a rule is too general: Does ‘the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct’ ‘follow immediately from the conclusion’ that the proposed rule is clearly established? . . . If not, the rule ‘is too general.’. . . Apply this question to the majority’s proposed rule: Does the lack of probable cause to detain Jones after the forensic-examination results ‘follow immediately from’ the rule that plaintiffs have a right to be free from a continued detention without probable cause? . . . Not at all. . . . In this probable-cause context, I would think Jones should have identified a ‘body of relevant case law’ setting forth more specific rules over when evidence tying a defendant’s IP address to child pornography does not create probable cause. . . But Jones identifies no such caselaw. The reason is obvious: the caselaw supports the conclusion that probable cause existed here. . . . The majority also suggests that the probable-cause issue is not suited for a summary-judgment resolution because a jury should decide the ultimate question whether probable cause continued to exist after the forensic-examination results. . . Our § 1983 cases have not spoken with one voice on this issue. We have said ‘[w]hen no material dispute of fact exists, probable cause determinations are legal determinations that should be made by a court.’. . . But we have also treated the question as factual. [collecting cases] In any event, I would follow the Supreme Court’s most recent teachings in Wesby. There, the district court had granted summary judgment to § 1983 plaintiffs on the ground that police officers lacked probable cause to arrest them. . . The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the officers were entitled to summary judgment both because they had probable cause and because they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . Wesby tells us that officers are entitled to qualified immunity on this probable-cause issue at the summary-judgment stage when, ‘looking at the entire legal landscape,’ a reasonable officer could have concluded that probable cause existed. . . That is the case here.”)

Rieves v. Town of Smyrna, Tennessee, 959 F.3d 678, 696-97 (6th Cir. 2020) (“It is clearly established that prosecutors may not make a probable cause determination based on unreliable evidence. . . Moreover, a probable cause finding may not be based on ‘information too vague and from too untested a source.’. . . If ‘no reasonably competent officer would have concluded’ that probable cause existed, qualified immunity does not apply. . . Jones and Zimmerman’s actions were objectively unreasonable because their probable cause determinations rested on the inconclusive results in the TBI reports. It is unreasonable to submit an innocuous product to a lab test that is incapable of determining its legality, then rely on that inconclusive evidence to say that the substance was probably illegal. According to the TBI statement—which is corroborated by RCSO officers and, in any case, presumed to be true—Jones and Zimmerman were explicitly informed that the TBI lab reports could not determine the origin of the products or their THC percentages. Meanwhile, the relevant Tennessee statutes, by their plain language, did not criminalize CBD products that were hemp-derived and had less than 0.3% THC. Tenn. . . Without information regarding origin and THC percentage, the TBI could not and would not establish that the plaintiffs' CBD products were illegal. A reasonable officer would know that the mere presence of CBD in products, without any indication as to the products' origin or THC percentage, did not provide probable cause for violations of Tennessee's controlled-substance laws. Concluding otherwise was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, we affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity for Jones and Zimmerman.")

Machan v. Olney, 958 F.3d 1212, 1215 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Machan also argues that, rather than take T.R. to the hospital for a mental evaluation without his consent, Olney should have simply detained T.R. at the school for 90 minutes, until Machan could arrive to take her home. But Olney had reason to fear that T.R. might hurt herself at home, given that T.R. herself had just said that 'she sees things' there (i.e., guns and knives) that made 'her want to hurt herself.' . . . Moreover, seizures by definition are not consensual; and the existence of probable cause meant that Olney did not need Machan's consent to take T.R. to the hospital for a mental evaluation. Olney therefore did not violate the Fourth Amendment when she took T.R. to the hospital and authorized the blood draw. Yet that very same conduct, Machan claims, amounted to a violation of both his and T.R.'s substantive due process rights. To overcome qualified immunity, however, Machan must identify a case whose facts and holding would make 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . And Machan has not remotely identified any such case here. Olney is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Machan's substantive due process claims.")

Hicks v. Scott, 958 F.3d 421, 434 (6th Cir. 2020) ("The right to be free from warrantless entry into a private residence and its curtilage was clearly established at the time of Quandavie's death. As the Supreme Court has recognized, '[n]o reasonable officer could claim to be unaware of the basic rule, well established by our cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.' . . . That conclusion is no different if the door to a private residence is unlocked or even ajar. . . . We recently recognized as much in a case involving material facts nearly identical to those here. . . . Because, as already discussed, there is evidence that the exterior side door of 1751 Chase Avenue opened into the interior of Quandavie's apartment and not a common hallway, we find that Quandavie's right to be free from the defendants' warrantless entry was clearly established.")

Graves v. Malone, 810 F. App'x 414, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Graves identifies three separate segments in which he argues unconstitutionally excessive force was used: First, the segment in which Hedger pried the door to the trailer open and either supervised the unconstitutional use of force and/or failed to protect Graves against the unconstitutional use of force; second, the segment in which Myers and Potratz fired their weapons at Graves; and third, the segment in which Hedger tased Graves. . . . In short, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, the officers used lethal force against an unresponsive, slight, unarmed man who was trapped in his bathtub. His only movement was to raise his hand, which contained an object that—taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves—the officers perceived as no more inherently dangerous than a permanent marker, or a cell phone, or an action figure. Under the second Graham factor, we must then ask whether it was reasonable for the officers to conclude that on these facts, Graves posed an objective, immediate, and severe threat of physical harm. . . . Our case law is clear: no reasonable officer would make such a conclusion. . . . This ends the constitutional inquiry: because the officers did not have probable cause to believe that Graves posed an immediate threat of severe physical harm, the ‘minimum requirement’ to justify the use of lethal force is not met. . . . Graves, it is true, did not comply with officers’ repeated commands to show his hands. But failure to comply with commands alone ‘does not indicate active resistance.’. . . Thus, the totality of facts and circumstances—viewed in a light most favorable to Graves—compel the conclusion that the officers’ use of lethal force was objectively unreasonable. . . . Here, the right of a criminal suspect ‘not to be shot unless he [is] perceived to pose a threat to pursuing officers or to others’ has been established since at least 1988. . . . In short: there is, perhaps, a version of events in which it was reasonable for Myers and Potratz to have shot at Graves. But where the question of qualified immunity depends on which version of events one accepts, it is the jury’s province, not ours, to decide the truth. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, Myers and Potratz applied lethal force against a suspect from whom they perceived no serious physical threat. Those actions violate clearly established law. . . . We have clearly established the straightforward proposition of law that it is objectively ‘unreasonable to tase a nonresisting suspect.’. . . The dissent suggests that this principle is defined at too high a level of generality. But, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly explained, ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning to officers.’. . . Here, our precedent provides a simple decisional rule: every reasonable law enforcement officer in our circuit knows that to deploy a taser against a non-resisting suspect is excessive. That the rule is straightforward makes it more capable of giving fair and clear warning to officers, not less. It is also objectively unreasonable to use a taser against a suspect who previously resisted arrest but was, at the time the taser was deployed, incapacitated. . . . The dissent identifies a limited exception to this rule where the uncontested facts establish that an officer deployed a taser against a suspect who was not resisting at the moment, but had been resisting immediately prior, and—but for the use of a taser—was expected to continue resisting in a manner that would have justified the later use of lethal force. . . . Under such circumstances, we have concluded that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity because the actions ‘were intended to avoid having to resort to lethal force.’. . . The record does not support the application of this exception here for at least two reasons because lethal force had already been applied against Graves—twice—at the time Hedger deployed his taser and it is a genuine dispute of material fact whether it was reasonable to perceive Graves as posing a continued threat. . . . Hedger conceded that he would likely have been in shock had he sustained the injuries that Graves had just sustained. A reasonable jury could therefore conclude that, whatever threat Graves had ever arguably posed to the officers, it had abated during the seven-second span in which he was bloodied and nonresponsive. And if a jury so-concluded, the law of this circuit clearly would prohibit Hedger’s use of a taser.”) Graves v. Malone, 810 F. App’x 414, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Larsen, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In qualified immunity cases, our ultimate inquiry is not whether the officers in question acted reasonably; it is instead whether existing law established ‘beyond debate’ that they acted unreasonably. . . And although we must construe the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, the objective reasonableness of the officers' actions is 'a pure question of law' that is for the court to decide, not a jury. Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 381 n.8 (2007). Applying these principles, I agree with the majority that Hedger is entitled to qualified immunity for Graves' claims that he is liable for supervising an unconstitutional use of force and failure to protect. I disagree, however, with the majority opinion's denial of qualified immunity to the three officers for their uses of force. Even under the version of the facts most favorable to Graves, it is clear that Myers and Potratz perceived that Graves was brandishing a dangerous weapon when he was only six to eight feet away from Myers. No existing precedent establishes that the use of lethal force under these circumstances is excessive; they are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Hedger is also entitled to qualified immunity for his use of a taser. In his case, not only is there no controlling authority that 'squarely governs the specific facts at issue,' . . . but binding circuit precedent affirmatively establishes that an officer who uses a taser—and even lethal force—in analogous circumstances is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The majority identifies no case where we have held, on similar facts, that an officer's belief that a suspect was holding a gun was unreasonable. This is no surprise, because we have never expected officers to adhere to such an exacting standard for distinguishing guns from objects that merely look like guns within a fraction of a second. . . . [E]ven construing the facts in the light most favorable to Graves, it is 'at least arguable,' . . . that an officer in Myers' position would have reason to believe that Graves posed an imminent threat to his life and safety. I would therefore hold that he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As with Myers, the majority identifies no case where we have similarly second-guessed the reasonableness of an officer's belief that a suspect was brandishing a dangerous weapon. . . . Because it is at least debatable that Potratz had reason to believe Graves was brandishing a dangerous weapon, he is entitled to qualified immunity. Myers was only six to eight feet away from Graves at the moment Graves sought to scare the officers off by lifting up the knife handle. Even though Graves would have had to get up out of the bathtub to reach Myers, it would not violate clearly established law for Potratz to conclude that Graves posed an imminent threat to Myers' safety. 'There is no rule that officers must wait until a suspect is literally within striking range, risking their own and others' lives, before resorting to deadly force.' . . . Russo holds that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity when he uses nonlethal force in an effort to deescalate a situation where seconds prior he reasonably believed a suspect posed a lethal threat, even if, in hindsight, the suspect no longer posed a threat. . . . As shown above, when Hedger heard the gunshots, he had reason to believe that Graves posed an imminent, mortal threat to the officers under his command, which would have made the use of lethal force in response proportionate. Since we do not judge officers' actions 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight,' . . . that justification for lethal force did not disappear in the moments between when Hedger heard the gunshots and when he tasered Graves. We have held that '[w]ithin a few seconds of reasonably perceiving a sufficient danger, officers may use deadly force even if in hindsight the facts show that the persons threatened could have escaped unharmed.' . . . It follows a fortiori that Hedger's use of nonlethal force seven seconds after he heard gunshots was not excessive under clearly established law. The majority does not even attempt to grapple with these precedents. The majority reaches a contrary conclusion only by 'defin[ing] clearly established law at a high level of generality,' which the Supreme Court ‘has repeatedly told courts ... not to’ do. . . The majority cites caselaw for the proposition that an officer may not taser an unresisting suspect or a suspect who, although formerly resisting arrest, is now incapacitated. But the majority makes no effort to analogize Hedger’s use of a taser to the facts of any prior precedent. ‘That is a problem’ because, outside of ‘the rare obvious case,’ we must ‘identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. . . The majority protests that ‘every reasonable law enforcement officer in our circuit knows that to deploy a taser against a non-resisting suspect is excessive,’ . . . but that is simply begging the question. In many cases, whether a suspect qualifies as ‘non-resisting’ will not be obvious, hence the need to find a case establishing ‘the violative nature of [the] particular conduct’ at issue. . . Here, Hedger on the one hand could see that Graves had been shot and was seriously injured and possibly in shock. On the other hand, he also had reason to believe that Graves had shot at Myers just a few seconds prior, still had a gun on his person, and was possibly still capable of firing it. Whether, under such circumstances, Graves qualified as no longer resisting is at least debatable, so in the absence of a case finding a constitutional violation under similar circumstances, Hedger must be granted qualified immunity. None of the cases on which the majority relies squarely governs the facts of Hedger’s use of a taser. . . . Hedger. . . had no time to step back and consider whether the threat had abated. The specific principle that we do not second guess officers’ nonlethal use of force when they had reasonably perceived a threat a few seconds prior must prevail over the general principle that an officer may not taser a non-resisting suspect. . . . Our precedents show that Hedger’s use of the taser did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, I would hold that Hedger is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Howse v. Hodous, 953 F.3d 402, 406-07 & n.1 (6th Cir. 2020), rehearing en banc denied, 960 F.3d 905 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1515 (2021) (“We begin our analysis with the second prong—by asking whether the unlawfulness of the officers’ conduct was clearly established at the time they approached and arrested Howse. . . ‘Clearly established’ means that the law is so clear at the time of the incident that every reasonable officer would understand the unlawfulness of his conduct. . . That’s a deferential rule. And for good reason: officers often find themselves in positions where they must make split-second decisions in dangerous situations. In those crucial seconds, officers don’t have the time to pull out law books and analyze the fine points of judicial precedent. To avoid ‘paralysis by analysis,’ qualified immunity protects all but plainly incompetent officers or those who knowingly violate the law. . . With all this in mind, we consider Howse’s claim. Howse argues that the officers violated his clearly established right to be free from ‘unreasonable government intrusions.’. . . But that frames the ‘clearly established’ test at too high a level of generality. The law must be specific enough to put a reasonable officer on clear notice that his conduct is unlawful. . . The right to be free from ‘unreasonable government intrusions’ is much too vague to do that. Instead, we must examine the particular situation that Hodous and Middaugh confronted and ask whether the law clearly established that their conduct was unlawful. To answer this question, we must ask whether every reasonable officer would know that law enforcement cannot tackle someone who disobeyed an order and then use additional force if they resist being handcuffed. Importantly, this question asks about the lawfulness of conduct under the Fourth Amendment. And in that context, the Supreme Court has stressed ‘the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances’ was found ‘to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Without such a case, the plaintiff will almost always lose. . . . Because the alleged unlawfulness of the officers’ conduct wasn’t clearly established, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.¹ [fn. 1: The dissent concludes otherwise after it frames the question as follows: ‘whether it violates a clearly established constitutional right for an officer to throw a person to the ground in order to arrest that person without probable cause.’ . . . Of course, it’s true that an officer cannot arrest someone without probable cause. But it’s also true that an officer doesn’t need probable cause to stop someone—reasonable suspicion is enough. . . . Thus, the level of justification depends on whether the officer is carrying out a stop or an arrest. . . . The mere act of handcuffing someone doesn’t transform a stop into an arrest. That’s because an officer may temporarily handcuff someone during a Terry stop ‘so long as the circumstances warrant that precaution.’ . . . So it isn’t obvious that the officers were effectuating an arrest (rather than an investigatory stop) when they tackled and handcuffed Howse. Acknowledging this point, the dissent cites Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 591 (6th Cir. 1994) to show that the officers arrested Howse when they initially threw him to the ground. But Centanni cuts against the dissent’s conclusion. That’s because Centanni says that an arrest generally doesn’t occur until the officers physically remove the suspect from the scene. . . . Of course, the officers hadn’t removed Howse from the scene when they initially threw him down. So that would mean the officers didn’t need probable cause until they removed him from his home and took him to the station. Even if we assume the officers carried out an arrest unsupported by probable cause, that doesn’t change the outcome here. Howse still needs a case putting the officers on clear notice that their use of force was excessive. And we still aren’t aware of one.]”)

Howse v. Hodous, 953 F.3d 406, 414 (6th Cir. 2020) (Cole, C.J., dissenting in part), rehearing en banc denied, 960 F.3d 905 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1515 (2021) (“The majority asks, ‘whether every reasonable officer would know that law enforcement cannot tackle someone who disobeyed an order and then use additional force if they resist being handcuffed.’ . . . We should instead be asking whether it violates a clearly established constitutional right for an officer to throw a person to the ground in order to arrest. . . . that person without probable cause. I conclude that the answer to that question is yes[.] . . . Accordingly, I would deny Middaugh qualified immunity”)

Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 764-65 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) (“[R]eading the complaint in the light most favorable to the Siefersts, they have alleged a plausible claim that Defendants interfered with their parental rights and they received no process. . . . [I]t must be clear that Defendants’ actions in this particular circumstance—as alleged in the complaint—violated the Siefersts’ due process rights. Plausibly, they did. In case after case, the Supreme Court has emphasized the parent-child relationship’s special place in our society. . . . The right’s importance means that ‘[e]ven a temporary deprivation of physical custody requires a hearing within a reasonable time.’ . . . In short, when Minor Siefert was hospitalized, ‘existing precedent . . . placed the . . . constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . At least, that is, according to the complaint. Defendants argue that the Siefersts cannot overcome qualified immunity because no case says that parents deserve due process when they voluntarily hospitalize their child, the state investigates allegations of abuse, and the parents consent to the ongoing hospitalization. But characterizing the case this way puts the cart before the horse. The complaint does not establish the depth of abuse allegations or that the Siefert's consented to Minor Siefert's ongoing hospitalization. The complaint says the Siefert's routinely demanded that Minor Siefert be discharged. And the complaint alleges that the Siefert's insurance company had a psychiatrist determine that Minor Siefert was no harm to anyone and was medically stable. We REVERSE the district court's holding that the Siefert's failed to adequately plead a violation of their procedural due process rights.”)

Nelson v. City of Battle Creek, 802 F. App'x 983, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“We must . . . inquire whether, as of November 16, 2013, it was clearly established that it was unconstitutional for an officer to shoot when, over the span of two seconds, someone pulls what appears to be a gun, drops it, and raises his hands after being given a warning. We hold it was not. Rivera reasonably perceived a threat of serious physical harm when he saw N.K. reach for and grab what looked like a real gun. It was not objectively unreasonable for Rivera to decide to shoot N.K. as he saw N.K. grip and raise his gun, even if the bullet ultimately struck N.K. after he had dropped the gun. Neither the district court nor Nelson identified any case law where an officer under sufficiently similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. The district court instead relied on what it perceived as ‘sufficient factual disputes’ as to the reasonableness of Rivera’s conduct. . . The dissent similarly says the evidence is ‘equivocal’ as to whether Rivera shot N.K. while N.K. threw away his gun or after doing so. . . To the extent any facts are disputed, however, these disputes do not deprive Rivera of qualified immunity. The dissent highlights testimony from N.K. and his friend suggesting that Rivera shot N.K. after he had already thrown away his gun. But these observations about when N.K. was struck—which Rivera concedes was after N.K. threw his gun away—do not create a dispute of fact as to when Rivera decided to shoot. Rivera claims he decided to shoot when he saw N.K. grab and raise the gun. Nelson fails to dispute this fact because N.K. and other witnesses cannot speak to Rivera’s decision-making or his perception of harm in the two-second span the events unfolded. Even assuming that N.K. dropped the gun—and was raising his hands—before Rivera shot him, this does not alter our analysis. ‘What matters is the reasonableness of the officers’ belief,’ and ‘[t]he fact that [N.K.] was actually unarmed when he was shot is irrelevant to the reasonableness inquiry in this case.’. . Although ‘hindsight reveals that [N.K.] was no longer a threat when he was shot, we do not think it is prudent to deny police officers qualified immunity in situations where they are faced with a threat of severe physical injury or death and must make split-second decisions.’. . Indeed, the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit have repeatedly said that an officer’s employment of deadly force in split-second decisions when faced with a threat of serious injury or death should not be questioned. . . . Thus, Nelson has not met her burden to demonstrate that the contours of N.K.’s right were sufficiently defined such that ‘every reasonable official’ in Rivera’s shoes would understand that using deadly force would violate N.K.’s constitutional rights. . . . The case before us is not an ‘obvious case’ such that, under the general principles of Garner, Graham, and Robinson, a reasonable officer would be aware that shooting N.K. violated his clearly established constitutional rights.”)

Nelson v. City of Battle Creek, 802 F. App’x 983, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting) (“It should go without saying that reasonable police officers do not shoot disarmed young boys with upraised hands. But because the majority misconstrues both the factual record and our circuit precedent to condone that result here, I must respectfully dissent. I would affirm the district court and allow this case to proceed to trial. . . . Fairly read, the parties’ deposition testimony is equivocal as to whether Rivera shot N.K. while N.K. was throwing down his gun and raising his hands or after N.K. had taken those two actions. . . . All told, although a reasonable jury could accept Rivera’s narrative (that he shot N.K. while N.K. was pulling a realistic-looking toy gun out of his pants), it could alternatively accept N.K.’s narrative (that Rivera shot him after he had thrown his gun to the ground and begun raising his hands). And so, for purposes of this appeal, we must accept N.K.’s narrative as true and assume that Rivera shot N.K. under the latter circumstances. Given these facts, the relevant legal question is whether, as of November 16, 2013, our case law put Rivera on fair notice that it is unconstitutional for a police officer to shoot an armed individual after that individual has thrown their weapon to the ground and begun raising their hands, in compliance with officer commands. It did. . . . [T]he majority attempts to sidestep Bletz’s general holding by adjusting the ‘clearly established law’ lens to a microscopic level. . . . But this mode of analysis runs afoul of our precedent cautioning panels against being too particular in defining ‘clearly established’ law. . . . To survive qualified immunity a plaintiff need only point to a ‘reasonably particularized’ constitutional right that the government allegedly violated. . . . The Fourth Amendment rule laid out in Bletz meets that ‘middle ground’ standard. . . . [I]f the jury agrees with N.K.’s version of events, Rivera shot 14-year-old N.K. after he put down his weapon and raised his hands, which would suggest that Rivera did not face a life-or-death decision at the moment he pulled the trigger. . . . For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. This case belongs in front of a jury.”)

Barton v. Martin, 949 F.3d 938, 949-52, 954-55 (6th Cir. 2020) (“Without additional evidence of a threat against the police or bystanders, a report of an armed suspect inside his home does not justify warrantless entry. . . . As the police must have more than just a shots-fired report to justify warrantless entry into one’s home, Vann’s belief that Barton had shot at a stray cat did not indicate “‘real immediate and serious consequences” that would certainly occur were a police officer to “postpone action to get a warrant.”’. . . Evidence that someone has shot at a stray cat does not indicate willingness to shoot at a human being, and there was no indication that Barton was shooting at strays inside his home; thus, Vann’s belief that there was an exigency that precluded procuring a warrant before entering Barton’s home was unreasonable. Taking all inferences in Barton’s favor, a reasonable jury could therefore find that Vann’s warrantless entry into Barton’s home violated the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against unreasonable searches. Moreover, it was clearly established that warrantless entry into a home without an exception to the warrant requirement violated clearly established law. . . . Therefore, Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful entry claim. . . . Here, taking all factual inferences in favor of Barton and viewing the information possessed by Vann at the time of the arrest, a reasonable jury could find that Vann lacked probable cause to arrest Barton for animal cruelty under Michigan law. . . . More specifically, it was clearly established that a non-eyewitness neighbor's call reporting criminal activity without further corroborating information does not provide probable cause for an arrest. . . . We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis that Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on the wrongful arrest claim. . . . Looking to the facts and circumstances of the present case, Barton has presented sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Vann's use of force was reasonable. 'A reviewing court analyzes the subject event in segments when assessing the reasonableness of a police officer's actions.' . . . Thus, we make separate qualified immunity determinations for each of the two grounds offered by Barton for excessive force: (1) Vann's picking up Barton and slamming him against the kitchen cupboard and wrenching his arms behind his back to handcuff him; and (2) Vann's throwing Barton down the front porch steps while he was handcuffed. Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on either excessive force claim. . . . The right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in 2014. The Supreme Court has held that use of force that is not objectively reasonable violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . A compliant, non-threatening individual's right to be free from excessive force during arrest was also clearly established in this circuit. . . . The facts here do not present one of the hazy cases where an officer should be entitled to qualified immunity for making an objectively reasonable mistake as to the amount of force that was necessary. Vann's use of force occurred after he saw that Barton was unarmed, non-threatening, and compliant. We conclude that no reasonable officer would find that the circumstances surrounding the arrest of Barton required the level of force used here. . . . Vann was on notice that his conduct was a violation of Barton's constitutional right to be free from excessive use of force as it was obvious that Vann could not shove a handcuffed detainee off a front porch about three feet off the ground when there was no threat to the safety of the officers or others. Accordingly, Vann is not entitled to qualified immunity on Barton's excessive force claims.") Estate of Barnwell v. Grigsby, 801 F. App'x 354, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) ("As the district court noted in its order denying reconsideration and as Gilmore herself recognizes in her brief, the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity turns on whether they restrained Barnwell in order to punish or incarcerate him or in order to assist the paramedics in their provision of emergency medical care. This is because 'whether the [defendants are] entitled to qualified immunity depends on whether they acted in a law-enforcement capacity or in an emergency-medical-response capacity when engaging in the conduct that' was allegedly violative of Barnwell's constitutional rights. . . . And there is no clearly established right to be free from unintentional, invasive medical care provided by a defendant-officer acting in an emergency-medical-response capacity. . . . Here, . . . the evidence clearly indicates that the defendants' conduct served a medical-emergency function, rather than a law-enforcement function. The paramedics requested that Stooksbury and Grigsby place Barnwell in handcuffs so that they could better treat Barnwell. . . . In our analysis of the defendants' conduct pertaining to the restraint of Barnwell, there is no evidence or facts indicating that they acted in a law-enforcement role or with a punitive purpose, and Gilmore's mere speculation is insufficient to create a genuine dispute and withstand summary judgment. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Gilmore and drawing reasonable inferences in her favor,

Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“The determinative question becomes whether th[e] right was ‘clearly established,’ so as to overcome qualified immunity. . . . There are two aspects to qualified immunity’s ‘clearly established’ element that the district court overlooked or misunderstood. The first is that, ‘to determine if the law is clearly established ... , we look principally to the law of this circuit and to the Supreme Court.’ . . . The district court relied on a single case from the District of Massachusetts. As a general principle, it is doubtful that decisions from out-of-circuit district courts carry such authority. . . . But even assuming that decisions from such other courts can provide ‘clearly established law,’ we have explained that, to do so, such ‘decisions must both [1] point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and [2] be so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable [official] that his conduct, if challenged on constitutional grounds, would be found wanting.’ . . . The second noteworthy aspect is that ‘[c]learly established law is not defined at a high level of generality but must be particularized to the facts of the case.’ . . . Korthals’s contention is that Deputy Strozeski violated her constitutional right to be protected from a substantial risk of serious harm because he failed to walk behind or alongside her, failed to watch her carefully for a stumble or fall, and failed to hold her or provide physical support when she attempted to mount the stairs, drunk and physically wobbly. ‘The dispositive inquiry ... is whether the violative nature of [that] particular conduct [wa]s clearly established.’ . . . Korthals has pointed us to no clearly established precedent from the Supreme Court or this Circuit to support that contention, and the cited out-of-circuit district court case (Carroll) does not qualify as clearly established law. Even if Deputy Strozeski’s failure to exercise caution when taking the drunken and handcuffed Korthals up the stairs were not merely negligent, but deliberately indifferent, such that it rose to the level of a constitutional violation, we cannot conclude that the constitutional impropriety of that particular conduct was clearly established.”)

Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (White, J., concurring) (“As to the question of qualified immunity, I agree that Deputy Strozeski’s conduct, while surely negligent, likely did not rise to the level of conscious disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm. And I agree that even assuming it did, Korthals has not shown that Strozeski’s actions violated her clearly established constitutional rights. I do not agree, however, with my colleagues’ characterization of Korthals’s asserted constitutional right as a ‘right to be closely guided, intently watched, and physically supported when walked from the car to booking, drunk and physically wobbly,’ . . . because precedent does not require a plaintiff to define her constitutional right so exactly. Although ‘[a] plaintiff can meet [her] burden ... by presenting caselaw “with a fact pattern similar enough to have given ‘fair and clear warning to officers’ about what the law requires,” [t]hat case “need not be on all fours” with the instant fact pattern to form the basis of a clearly established right.’”)

Hudson v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 943 F.3d 792, 798 (6th Cir. 2019) In qualified immunity cases like this one, we also ask whether the claimant (1) established a constitutional violation (2) that was clearly established. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 227, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009). In this case, only one question matters. We have repeatedly held—we have repeatedly clearly established—that employers may not retaliate against employees based on their protected speech. Buddenberg v. Weisdack, 939 F.3d 732, 741 (6th Cir. 2019); Chappel v. Montgomery Cty. Fire Prot. Dist. No. 1, 131 F.3d 564, 579–80 (6th Cir. 1997). All that concerns us today is the constitutional question.”)

Dolbin v. Miller, 786 F. App’x 52, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) (“Dolbin confuses the two issues presented in this case. The district court considered both whether Officers Whelan and Miller actually had probable cause and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they had the reasonable but mistaken belief that they had probable cause. . . In District of Columbia v. Wesby, for example, the Supreme Court recently considered both whether police officers responding to complaints of loud music at a vacant home had probable cause and whether they were entitled to qualified immunity because they ‘reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.’. Here, although the district court found a genuine issue of fact material to the former issue, . . . it is squarely within this court’s jurisdiction to consider the legal issue of whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity based on their reasonable, but mistaken, belief that they had probable cause. . . As recently as this past term, the Supreme Court ‘stressed the need to “identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,”’ to deny an officer qualified immunity. . . Dolbin cannot identify a single controlling precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar enough circumstances to put the question beyond doubt. That failure is fatal to his attempts to defeat qualified immunity. . . . In this case, it was no doubt difficult for Officers Whelan and Miller to determine how best to proceed. Presented with a report from his own daughter that he was actively suicidal, his admission that he had made a statement that indicated he was experiencing active suicidal ideation, and arrest instructions from his supervisor, we cannot conclude that it would be clear to a reasonable officer that transporting Dolbin for a mental health evaluation violated a clearly established constitutional right. We thus reverse the district court’s decision and hold that the officers are protected by qualified immunity.”)

Rudolph v. Babinec, 939 F.3d 742, 747-48, 750-51 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Although the officers had a reason to show up at Rudolph’s door for a wellness check, a jury could reasonably find that the officers lacked probable cause when they executed this mental-health seizure. . . . A review of the facts provides a basis for the officers to have arrived at Rudolph’s house to check on her. Upon arrival, however, the totality of the circumstances ‘would have caused a reasonable officer to question the veracity of the attempted suicide report.’ Fisher, 398 F.3d at 843. Or at least a jury could see this case that way, and consequently a jury reasonably could determine that the officers lacked probable cause. . . . Although qualified immunity grants officers leeway for mistakes on probable-cause determinations, based on the facts of this case, the probable-cause question is better left to the jury. . . . The officers propose a bright line rule: ten minutes of handcuffing is not long enough for excessive force. And in a prior case, albeit unpublished, we noted that simply complaining during a ten-minute car ride was not enough to state a claim. Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528, 533–34 (6th Cir. 2010). But Fettes did not set a bright-line rule. Instead, it noted that during a short trip, where officers adhere to police protocol and act reasonably, they cannot be held liable. . . Conduct, not time, is the measurement of a violation. To see why, imagine that someone was handcuffed so tightly that she was bleeding from her wrists and screaming in pain while an officer ignored the complaint. The law would not require us to ignore that excessive force claim because the bleeding went on for ten minutes instead of eleven. Rather than specific time limits, what matters in an excessive force claim is whether the Miller requirements—complaint, ignoring of complaint, and injury—are met, and whether the officers acted reasonably in the circumstances.”)

Rudolph v. Babinec, 939 F.3d 742, 753-56 (6th Cir. 2019) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“To get the right answer, we must ask the right question. For qualified immunity, the right question is not whether Officers Babinec and Atkinson took the best possible course of action when they brought Leticia Rudolph to the hospital for a mental health evaluation. The right question is not even whether they were correct to fear that Rudolph might harm herself. Instead, the right question is whether the officers were ‘plainly incompetent’ in fearing that Rudolph might harm herself. . . They were not. . . . Given the information known to the officers—that Rudolph’s gun had been confiscated, that her own son was concerned, and that her ex-husband told the officers that Rudolph might harm herself—the officers were not plainly incompetent to err on the side of caution. . . . Courts must remember that law enforcement officers must protect the public in an uncertain and dangerous world, not the cold crucible of the courtroom. . . In that world, officers don’t have time to debate whether the emergency in front of them falls ‘more on [one] side of the line’ of precedent than another. . . Indeed, the specificity requirement of qualified immunity protects officers from this very paralysis by analysis. As the Supreme Court repeatedly reminds us, ‘[a] rule is too general if the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct does not follow immediately.’ . . In short, the rule must ‘obviously resolve whether the circumstances ... constitute[d] probable cause.’ . . The majority’s ‘which side of the line rule’ simply does not. . . . I fear we have placed officers in an untenable catch-22. No doubt, if the officers here had failed to act and were wrong, they would have faced significant criticism and personal guilt. Maybe even legal consequences. Qualified immunity does not enforce a regime of ‘damned if they do, damned if they don’t.’ Just the opposite. It protects reasonable but mistaken judgment calls made in extremely difficult situations. Because the officers could have reasonably believed that they had probable cause for a mental health seizure under these facts, they should receive qualified immunity. Thus, I respectfully dissent from the denial of qualified immunity for the mental health seizure and concur on all other issues.”)

Buddenberg v. Weisdack, 939 F.3d 732, 741-42 (6th Cir. 2019) (“We have long recognized that a public employer may not retaliate against an employee for her exercise of constitutionally protected speech. . . Buddenberg’s right to report public corruption, unethical conduct, and sex-based discrimination within her workplace was clearly established. Budzik is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this phase of the litigation.”)

Richards v. City of Jackson, Michigan, 788 F. App’x 324, ____ (6th Cir. 2019) (“In determining whether the district court erred in denying Peters qualified immunity for shooting Kane, we begin with the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established on November 28, 2014, and then address whether the plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Peters’s seizure of Kane violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .Despite this court’s holding in Brown, Peters argues that the right at issue was not clearly established for two reasons, neither of which is convincing. First, Peters argued that Brown was issued in 2016, which is later-in-time than the conduct at issue and therefore cannot suffice to clearly establish the law. This argument misreads Brown, where we unequivocally stated that the ‘constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment to not have one’s dog unreasonably seized ... was clearly established in 2013.’. . . Because the right was clearly established in 2013, it was also clearly established when Peters shot Kane on November 28, 2014. Second, Peters argues that he could not have been expected to anticipate our recognition in Smith v. City of Detroit, 751 F. App’x 691, 692 (6th Cir. 2018) that unlicensed dogs are property under the Fourth Amendment. Had Peters argued that he shot Kane because he believed Kane was unlicensed and that Harris and Richards had no property interest in an unlicensed dog, this argument might have some force. But Peters gives no indication that he knew or even considered whether Kane was unlicensed at the time of the shooting. . . .Thus, Peters’s ability to anticipate this court’s ruling in Smith has no bearing on whether Peters should reasonably have known that his actions were unconstitutional.”)

McGrew v. Duncan, 937 F.3d 664, 668 (6th Cir. 2019) (“The officers do not dispute that McGrew complained and that they did not loosen the handcuffs. So whether they are entitled to qualified immunity turns on whether McGrew suffered an injury and whether the right she claims they violated was clearly established when they acted. On these two points, the officers present essentially the same argument: bruising is not enough. They contend that ‘[h]andcuffing that results in bruising does not violate any clearly established constitutional right and ‘[t]here was no manifest evidence of a clear physical injury.’ This argument is without merit. In Morrison, we held that ‘allegations of bruising and wrist marks create a genuine issue of material fact’ on whether a plaintiff has suffered a physical injury. . . . Thus, under Morrison, bruising is enough. That means McGrew has created a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the officers violated her right to be free from excessively tight handcuffing that causes physical injury. Further, because we decided Morrison before the events in this case, McGrew’s right was clearly established at the time defendants acted. Thus, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on this variant of McGrew’s excessive-force claim.”)

J. Endres v. Northeast Ohio Medical University Board of Trustees, 938 F.3d 281, 301-02 (6th Cir. 2019) (“When a university student faces a serious sanction like dismissal over allegations of disciplinary misconduct, he is entitled to a ‘fundamentally fair hearing.’. . . Endres received a hearing. But his allegations, which we must take as true at this stage, reveal that hearing was far from fair. For one, the student has a ‘right to be present for all significant portions of the hearing,’ provided the hearing is live. . . And even when the hearing is not live, the university must ‘provide the accused with the opportunity to “respond, explain, and defend.”’ . . Endres, however, alleges he was not allowed in the room while Emerick presented her case to the CAPP panels. That alone establishes a due process violation, but Endres’s allegations do not end there. Doe also says that the university must provide the student with ‘an explanation of the evidence’ against him, but Endres’s allegations show that NEOMED repeatedly failed on this front. . . .Endres has alleged more than enough to establish a due process violation, but that does not end the matter. Because Emerick has claimed qualified immunity, Endres must also show that the constitutional rights Emerick violated were clearly established when the violation occurred. . . . Emerick alleges that the law defining Endres’s due process rights was not clearly established, and on this front, she is correct. To be sure, the Supreme Court’s decisions in Goss and Horowitz make clear that a student facing a serious sanction for disciplinary misconduct is entitled to a fair hearing, but neither those cases nor our own decisions have articulated a bright-line rule to distinguish academic from disciplinary matters. Moreover, clearly established law ‘must be “particularized” to the facts of the case,’ yet no case from the Supreme Court or this court has held that cheating is a disciplinary matter warranting more robust procedures under the Due Process Clause. . . . And because no precedent clearly established that Endres was even entitled to a hearing, it follows that his right to be present at the hearing and to hear the evidence against him was not clearly established, either. We therefore hold that Emerick is entitled to qualified immunity. We note, however, that qualified immunity “only immunizes defendants from monetary damages”—not injunctive or declaratory relief.’ . . Thus, our ruling shields Emerick from monetary damages. But the qualified immunity doctrine does not preclude Endres from continuing to pursue the injunctive and declaratory relief that he has also requested in his § 1983 claim.”) Ermold v. Davis, 936 F.3d 429, 436-37 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Here, Obergefell both recognized the right to same-sex marriage and defined its contours. . . .For a reasonable official, Obergefell left no uncertainty. For Davis, however, the message apparently didn’t get through. And it still doesn’t appear to have gotten through: She now argues that Obergefell doesn’t even apply to her conduct. Because she stopped issuing licenses to all couples regardless of their sexual orientation, she claims, she ‘obviate[ed] any equal protection issue.’ That might be so, but the right to marry also arises from the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause. . . . Davis further contends that Obergefell doesn’t apply for another reason: Obergefell involved a total ban on same-sex marriage, but here plaintiffs could’ve obtained marriage licenses elsewhere in Kentucky. She also presents two other arguments with similar thrusts: (1) The relevant inquiry is whether Kentucky violated plaintiffs’ right to marry, not whether she violated it, and (2) Obergefell didn’t clearly establish a right to demand marriage licenses from particular state officials. The common denominator is a claim that we should focus broadly on Kentucky instead of narrowly on Davis. Yet Davis provides no legal authority for that proposition. We can find none. And we know why: that’s not how qualified immunity works, and that’s not how constitutional rights work. Qualified immunity protects government officials from lawsuits against them in their individual capacities. . . . The focus of the analysis, then, is on what the law requires of them individually. And nowhere in the Constitution—or in constitutional law, for that matter—does it say that a government official may infringe constitutional rights so long as another official might not have. All government officials must respect all constitutional rights. And that means Obergefell's holding applies not just to monolithic governmental entities like Kentucky but to the officials acting for those entities as well. . . . In the presence of Obergefell's clear mandate that 'same-sex couples may exercise the fundamental right to marry,' . . . and in the absence of any legal authority to support her novel interpretation of Kentucky law, Davis should have known that Obergefell required her to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples—even if she sought and eventually received an accommodation, whether by legislative amendment changing the marriage-license form or by judicial decree adopting her view of the interplay between the Constitution and Kentucky law. In short, plaintiffs pleaded a violation of their right to marry: a right the Supreme Court clearly established in Obergefell. The district court therefore correctly denied qualified immunity to Davis.”)

See also Ermold v. Davis, No. CV 15-46-DLB-EBA, 2022 WL 830606, at *3 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 18, 2022) (“Defendant Davis once again uses arguments recycled from her Motion to Dismiss briefing to argue that she is entitled to qualified immunity in her personal capacity. . . . Again, this Court finds that Davis is not entitled to qualified immunity. Although this Court, and the Sixth Circuit, explained this analysis ad nauseum in its previous orders, it will briefly address this issue. . . . It is readily apparent that Obergefell recognizes Plaintiffs’ Fourteenth Amendment right to marry. It is also readily apparent that Davis made a conscious decision to violate Plaintiffs’ right. Both the Ermold and Yates Plaintiffs sought marriage licenses from either Defendant Davis or the deputy clerks who were acting in conformance with the policy instituted by Davis—a policy directing deputy clerks to refuse to issue marriage licenses in the wake of Obergefell. . . . The explicit holding in Obergefell was that states could not exclude same-sex couples from civil marriage. The logical next step is clear. Davis, an elected county official who was tasked by her constituents to manage marriage licensing in Rowan County, could not exclude same-sex couples from civil marriage. . . . Davis. . . . argues that her conduct was ‘objectively reasonable’ and ‘[q]ualified immunity allows for mistaken judgments and balancing reasonable uncertainties.’ . . . Davis did not make a mistake. Rather, she knowingly violated the law. . . . Any argument that Davis made a mistake, instead of a conscious decision to violate the law, is not only contrary to the record, but also borders on incredulous Ultimately, the qualified immunity inquiry involves a determination of whether Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights were violated, not whether Davis’s actions should be excused by her claim to religious freedom. The question is simple—did Davis knowingly violate the law? The answer here is clear—yes. Davis is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Butler v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 936 F.3d 410, 425 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Butler—that he was fully cooperative and yet was gratuitously ‘slammed’ into the wall—Meadows has no claim to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. Assaulting an unarmed and compliant individual has been a clearly established violation of the Fourth Amendment for decades. . . And the Constitution says nothing about free passes for just ‘one shove against the wall,’ even during drug raids.”)

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 587 (6th Cir. 2019) (“That Coffey was suspected of committing only a misdemeanor raises the bar for law enforcement, erecting a ‘double presumption’ against warrantless entry, one, that a warrant is ordinarily necessary, and two, that a misdemeanor offense is not serious enough to justify an otherwise unreasonable search. . . . This ‘double presumption’ is well settled. Indeed, six years ago we observed that the ‘double presumption’ had been clearly established by the Supreme Court for more than 25 years. . . . By the time the officers entered Coffey’s home then, the relevant law had been clearly established for more than three decades, contrary to the officers’ contention. To sum up, the officers did not have a warrant to enter Coffey’s home, there were no exigent circumstances identified by the officers justifying their entrance, and there is an issue of material fact as to whether David Coffey gave the officers consent to enter. If the issues of fact are ultimately resolved in Coffey’s favor, the officers violated the clearly established constitutional prohibition against unlawful entry. Thus, the district court correctly denied summary judgment to the officers on Coffey’s unlawful-entry claim.”)

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 589 (6th Cir. 2019) (“A suspect has a clearly established constitutional right to be free from the use of physical force by police officers when he is not resisting efforts to apprehend him. . . . Drawing the line at a suspect’s active resistance defines the right at a level of particularity appropriate for a claim pursued under § 1983. . . . Measured against this legal backdrop, Coffey’s claim survives the officers’ qualified immunity defense. He has articulated a specific, precise, and established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying the officers qualified immunity and summary judgment on this claim.”)

Coffey v. Carroll, 933 F.3d 577, 590-91 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Given the nature of Coffey’s malicious-prosecution claim, our decision in Sykes v. Anderson, 625 F.3d 294 (6th Cir. 2010), is instructive. We held there that an officer can influence or participate in the decision to prosecute a defendant when the officer testifies at a preliminary hearing in which the decision was made to bind over the defendant. . . . In view of this precedential backdrop, we cannot say the district court erred in concluding that Coffey had submitted sufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that Officers Carroll and Pranger violated Coffey’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution. As the two officers testified at the preliminary hearing, a jury reasonably could conclude that the officers influenced or participated in the decision to prosecute Coffey. And viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Coffey, there is an issue of material fact as to whether the officers’ testimony was false. . . . We likewise agree with the district court regarding the existence of a right to be free from malicious prosecution. While clearly established, the right is a narrow one. . . . Providing false testimony (both written and oral), as alleged here, could have resulted in Coffey’s arrest and prosecution without probable cause. Reading the facts in the light most favorable to Coffey, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officers Carroll and Pranger deliberately provided untrue testimony at the preliminary hearing, which resulted in the court finding probable cause to continue legal proceedings against Coffey. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying the two officers' motion for summary judgment on Coffey's malicious-prosecution claim.")

Fineout v. Kostanko, 780 F. App'x 317, ____ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Recognizing that police entered plaintiffs' residence without a search warrant and the house was not, in fact, red-tagged, we conclude this case is best decided on the second qualified-immunity question—whether it would have been apparent to a reasonable police officer that his or her conduct violated plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that a reasonable officer in defendants' position would have believed entry into the residence was lawful based on all of the circumstances in this case, including the 9-1-1 call reporting child abuse, the outstanding arrest warrant for Fineout, and the dispatcher's confirmation that the residence was red-tagged. Police officers have the 'right to rely on dispatch information' and courts therefore consider an officer's reasonable reliance on such information when determining whether the officer is protected by qualified immunity. . . . We note that Lansing's practice of conducting warrantless entries into occupied, red-tagged homes is troubling. However, in this case, plaintiffs have identified no case supporting that it was clearly established that police cannot lawfully enter an illegally occupied structure without a warrant.")

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 429-30 (6th Cir. 2019) ("If the police did not have probable cause to arrest Novak, then he may bring a claim of retaliation. Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1725. . . . If the officers did have probable cause, on the other hand, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has said as much. 'This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.' Reichle, 566 U.S. at 664–65, 132 S.Ct. 2088. The Supreme Court said that in 2012, and it remains true today. The Supreme Court decided two retaliation cases after Reichle. Neither case clearly established Novak's right to be free from a retaliatory arrest based on probable cause. First, the Supreme Court decided Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach. There, the Court held that a plaintiff can bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest but only against official municipal policies of retaliation. . . . So Lozman does not apply where, as here, the plaintiff sues individual officers. . . . Second, the Court held most recently in Nieves that a plaintiff generally cannot bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest. . . . Though Nieves also created an exception to that general rule that we will discuss later, the exception does not apply here because the officers would not have been aware of it at the time of Novak's arrest since the case was decided later. Nor has our circuit clearly established the law on this issue. In Sandul v. Larion, the Sixth Circuit denied an officer qualified immunity for a First Amendment retaliation claim and held that 'protected speech cannot serve as the basis for a violation of any of the ... ordinances.' . . . But in that case, the ordinance criminalized the plaintiff's speech directly, and there was little question whether the speech was protected. . . . Plus, it is not clearly established how we reconcile the apparent holding in Sandul that protected speech cannot be the basis for probable cause with the rule that protected speech can be a 'wholly legitimate consideration' for officers when they decide whether to arrest someone. Reichle, 566 U.S. at 668, 132 S.Ct. 2088. '[I]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’ . . . Simply put, Ohio’s statute appears to punish the effects of speech (interruptions), not the speech itself, and whether enforcing such a statute in these circumstances violates the First Amendment is not clearly established. So the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. To sum up, to resolve the retaliation claim, the factfinder below will have to decide: (1) whether Novak’s Facebook page was a parody, and thus protected speech, and; (2) whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Novak under the Ohio statute. If the officers did not have probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity, and Novak can attempt to show the arrest was retaliatory. If the officers did have probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity even if Novak’s page was protected speech because the law at the time did not clearly establish that charging Novak under the statute would violate his constitutional rights.”)

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 433-34 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Novak argues that when Officers Riley and Connor deleted comments on the official police Facebook page, they unlawfully censored speech in a public forum and violated his right to receive information. These claims fail because they are not based on clearly established law. The First Amendment no doubt applies to the wild and ‘vast democratic forums of the Internet.’ . . . But when it comes to online speech, the law lags behind the times. And rightly so. ‘The forces and directions of the Internet are so new, so protean, and so far reaching that courts must be conscious that what they say today might be obsolete tomorrow.’ . . . Courts have not reached consensus on how First Amendment protections will apply to comments on social media platforms. So far, the courts that have considered the issue have taken different approaches. . . . No doubt, any right Novak or the commenters may have to post or receive comments was not ‘beyond debate’ at the time the officers deleted the comments. . . . Riley and Connor are entitled to qualified immunity from these claims.”)

Berkshire v. Beauvais, 928 F.3d 520, 536-38 (6th Cir. 2019) (“The evidence surveyed above shows that both Beauvais and Sermo, despite knowing that Berkshire was suicidal, ‘rendered “grossly inadequate care.”’ . . . The expert report, Berkshire affidavit and Lang declaration, deposition testimony, and the email all provide more than ample support for the inference that Beauvais and Sermo knew of and were deliberately indifferent toward a potential risk of suicide. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Berkshire, Beauvais’s and Sermo’s approach was not merely ‘wait and see if Berkshire gets better,’ but rather, they took a ‘medically deprive and hope the problem goes away’ approach. . . . To the extent that these two Defendants contest this evidence, at this stage we do not have jurisdiction to address factual disputes. . . . Berkshire had a clearly established right to have his suicidal tendencies attended to, and evidence supports the inference that Beauvais and Sermo acted with deliberate indifference toward Berkshire’s medical needs. Beauvais and Sermo are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Berkshire’s claim against Sergeant Nelson entails a different Eighth Amendment analysis, one based on Berkshire’s conditions of confinement. This claim also has an objective and subjective prong. . . . Based on Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and Barker v. Goodrich, Sergeant Nelson is not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage. In Hope, the Supreme Court held that ‘the Eighth Amendment violation is obvious’ when an inmate was handcuffed in a restrictive position for seven hours in the sun without access to water or bathroom breaks. . . . In so holding, the Supreme Court explained that ‘[a]mong unnecessary and wanton inflictions of pain are those that are totally without penological justification.’. . Then in Barker, we relied on Hope and similar cases to hold that the defendants in that case ‘had fair warning in 2007 that their conduct was unconstitutional.’. . . Notably, we viewed seven hours (the length of time in Hope) as an ‘extended period.’. . The Barker court further reasoned that ‘our sister circuits have found shorter deprivations to violate the Constitution when they lack a penological purpose’. . Accordingly, we adopted the reasoning of Hope and other circuits that addressed ‘shorter deprivations’ and concluded that the case law was ‘thus sufficient to give the Defendants fair warning.’. . So too for Sergeant Nelson. The differences between Hope, Barker, and the cases surveyed therein are immaterial and do not overcome the fact that Sergeant Nelson denied Berkshire a bathroom break and then left Berkshire to lay in his own urine and feces for several hours. Sergeant Nelson had fair warning that this conduct, if without a penological purpose, constitutes a denial of life’s necessities, subjects Berkshire to a significant risk of pain and damage to the bladder (as well as humiliation), and therefore could rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The district court correctly concluded ‘that there is a material question of fact whether [Sergeant Nelson’s] actions were taken for a legitimate penological reason’”)

Watson v. Pearson, 928 F.3d 507, 511-13 (6th Cir. 2019) (“[W]e agree with the district court’s conclusion that the officers violated Watson’s constitutional rights by searching the curtilage of the home without a warrant. . . . Watson stated that his girlfriend lived in the house and that he had left his keys inside. As explained above, Watson reasonably communicated that he was at least an overnight or social guest. This would afford him a legitimate expectation of privacy in the residence. . . . In addition, Watson had just exited the house and stated that his girlfriend was still inside. The residence was therefore clearly not abandoned. No officer could have reasonably believed that Watson disclaimed his privacy interest in the residence or that the property was abandoned by its owners or tenants. . . . The officers also contend that their warrantless intrusion into the curtilage was not prohibited by clearly established law when the search occurred in December 2013. They claim that a reasonable officer could have believed that the ‘knock and talk’ exception, as discussed in Hardesty v. Hamburg Township, 461 F.3d 646 (6th Cir. 2006), extended to their actions. . . . In September 2006, this court concluded that the ‘knock and talk’ exception permitted officers to proceed around a house and knock on the back door if they have reason to believe that an individual is inside the house and no one answered the front door. . . . But in March 2013, the Supreme Court clarified in Jardines that a police officer without a warrant is limited to ‘approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.’. . The Court held that ‘a police officer not armed with a warrant may approach a home and knock, precisely because that is “no more than any private citizen would do.”’. . . And in September 2018, the Sixth Circuit explicitly stated that Jardines had overturned Hardesty and Turk. Morgan v. Fairfield County, 903 F.3d 553, 565 (6th Cir. 2018). The officers argue, however, that Jardines was not understood in 2013 to have clearly superseded Hardesty and Turk. They claim that the scope of the ‘knock and talk’ exception was not clearly established until the Sixth Circuit decided Morgan in September 2018. The officers rely on Brennan v. Dawson, 752 F. App’x 276 (6th Cir. 2018), an unpublished case concluding that Hardesty was good law until Morgan was decided. . . Brennan posited that Jardines did not clearly govern situations in which a police officer had reason to believe that someone was inside the home and the officer entered the curtilage in an attempt to contact that person. . . We are not persuaded. First, Jardines clearly rejected the kind of intrusion into the curtilage that Hardesty had permitted. A plain reading of Jardines does not allow an officer to intrude into the curtilage by walking around the house. . . Although Brennan interprets Jardines differently, it is an unpublished case and clearly conflicts with then-existing Supreme Court caselaw. We are not bound by Brennan. . . Moreover, even if Jardines was not understood in 2013 to have overturned Hardesty and Turk, those cases do not permit an officer to enter the curtilage to engage in a search. Hardesty and Turk at most held that the scope of the ‘knock and talk’ investigative technique permitted officers to walk to the backyard of a residence in an effort to communicate with individuals thought to be inside. Those cases did not permit officers to enter the curtilage with the intent of performing a search. . . . In sum, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity because they violated Watson’s constitutional rights and because those rights were clearly established when the incident occurred. The district court accordingly erred by granting summary judgment in favor of the officers based on qualified immunity.”)

Cavin v. Michigan Dep’t of Corr., 927 F.3d 455, 461 (6th Cir. 2019) (“[I]t is notoriously difficult to predict the outcome of a balancing test in advance, making it even more important that precedent place the question beyond doubt. Cf. Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 485 (6th Cir. 2017). Cavin hasn’t identified cases that do so. Cavin instead points us to two out-of-circuit district court opinions involving Wiccan prisoners’ religious rights. See LaPlante v. Mass. Dep’t of Corr., 89 F. Supp. 3d 235 (D. Mass. 2015) (RLUIPA claim); Rouser v. White, 630 F. Supp. 2d 1165 (E.D. Cal. 2009) (RLUIPA and First Amendment claims). But district courts, let alone those in other circuits, don’t provide clearly established precedent. . . Cavin adds that we should deny Leach qualified immunity because precedent can put an official on notice even if it does not involve ‘fundamentally similar’ or ‘materially similar’ circumstances. . . But the Supreme Court has also told us not to do the qualified immunity analysis from 60,000 feet. See White v. Pauly, — U.S. —, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Instead, ‘the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.’. . That isn’t so here.”)

Campbell v. Mack, 777 F. App’x 122, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) (“Because a reasonable jury could find that Mack lacked any objective basis for the traffic stop, and because Campbell’s Fourth Amendment rights were clearly established, qualified immunity does not shield Mack from Campbell’s Fourth Amendment claim arising from the traffic stop. . . . Having determined that Campbell established a First Amendment violation for purposes of summary judgment, we must analyze whether Campbell’s First Amendment right to be free from retaliation was clearly-established. We find that it was. Therefore, Mack is not entitled to qualified immunity on Campbell’s First Amendment retaliation claim. ‘[I]t is well-established that a public official’s retaliation against an individual exercising his or her First Amendment rights is a violation of § 1983.’. . Further, ‘the courts that have considered qualified immunity in the context of a retaliation claim have focused on the retaliatory intent of the defendant’ rather than on the retaliatory action the defendant allegedly undertook. . . This is because ‘[t]he unlawful intent inherent in such a retaliatory action places it beyond the scope of a police officer’s qualified immunity if the right retaliated against was clearly established.’ . . Recognizing that the unlawful intent aspect of a public official’s retaliatory action violates clearly-established law, this Court has denied qualified immunity to a police officer who arrested a citizen in retaliation for protesting and failing to comply with his order to return to his home, McCurdy v. Montgomery Cty., 240 F.3d 512, 516 (6th Cir. 2001), and to a police officer who effectuated an arrest in retaliation for being called a derogatory term, Greene v. Barber, 310 F.3d 889, 897–98 (6th Cir. 2002). Mack is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Campbell’s First Amendment retaliation claim. When the events at issue occurred, the right to be free from retaliation at the hands of police officers for asserting one’s First Amendment rights was ‘sufficiently clear’ that a reasonable officer would have understood that retaliating against Campbell as a result of his complaints would violate his First Amendment rights. . . Further, just as the police officers in McCurdy and Greene should have known that arresting someone in retaliation for asserting his or her First Amendment rights violated clearly-established law, Mack should have known that further tightening Campbell’s handcuffs and engaging in aggressive strip search and/or body cavity searches in retaliation for Campbell’s asserting his First-Amendment rights violated clearly-established law. In fact, Mack argues that while ‘this case involves a claim of a retaliatory search, rather than a retaliatory arrest or prosecution, [this] is a distinction without a difference, particularly in the context of applying qualified immunity.’. . . Mack makes this statement in arguing that qualified immunity protects searches supported by probable cause from First Amendment retaliation claims, just as it protects arrests and prosecutions supported by probable cause. But the inverse is also true—just as arrests or prosecutions without probable cause can support a First Amendment retaliation claim, so can a retaliatory search. Mack argues that the district court erred by denying him qualified immunity on this claim because it failed to cite a case with sufficiently analogous facts to place him on notice that his conduct violated Campbell’s First Amendment rights. However, ‘the Supreme Court “do[es] not require a case directly on point [if] existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.”’. . ‘Instead, the operative inquiry is “whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.”’. . Based on Sixth Circuit precedent that existed before 2016, a reasonable officer would have known that retaliating against Campbell for complaining about Mack’s conduct by tightening his handcuffs to the point of injury, subjecting him to strip and/or body cavity searches, and conducting these searches in an overly aggressive manner would violate the First Amendment. Accordingly, Campbell’s failure to locate a case with perfectly analogous facts does not entitle Mack to qualified immunity.”) Guertin v. State of Michigan, 924 F.3d 309, 311-15 (6th Cir. 2019) (Sutton, J., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied sub nom. City of Flint v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) (“Negligent, even grossly negligent, conduct by local officials does not generally violate citizens’ substantive due process rights. Least of all would these actions clearly violate such rights, as there is very little that is clear about substantive due process. If that’s what happened here, this litigation needs to end—promptly. It is a distraction to the key goal (fixing Flint’s water supply), and it is unfair to the public servants to boot. Their mistakes may deserve public criticism, but they do not deserve the tag of violating clearly established constitutional rights and what comes with it: exposure to crippling monetary judgments. But an intentional or reckless effort to poison Flint's water supply is another matter. If that's what happened, the case must proceed. So which account is the right account? It's too early to say. At the pleading stage of a case, plaintiffs are entitled to make plausible allegations in their complaint and use the discovery process to ferret out support for their preferred account through depositions, emails, and documents. At this early stage of the case, we must give the benefit of the doubt to the plaintiffs' preferred theory of the case and allow the discovery process to determine whether plausible allegations in their complaint mature into fact-supported allegations. In view of the starkly different nature of these two accounts and in view of the starkly different outcomes for each of them, I would have written the majority opinion—permitting this case to proceed to discovery—in a different key. . . . The precedent the panel majority found 'especially analogous' to today's case, Guertin v. Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 921 (6th Cir. 2019), has no business in the inquiry. It is a district court case. . . And district court decisions do not mark appellate law—the relevant benchmark for ascertaining well-established constitutional law. . . Cautionary feature three. Even aside from the one-off nature of these cases, the inscrutable nature of the inquiry by itself gives pause. While many acts of public officials might theoretically affect the right to bodily integrity, only an official who 'shocks the conscience' violates the right. . . Missing from this case so far is any recognition that the purpose of the test is to restrain judges, not empower them; to remove claims from the constitutional arena, not to expand nebulous notions of substantive due process. . . Also missing is an appreciation of the imperative that we not apply the 'clearly established' prong of qualified immunity at a nose-bleed level of generality, but rather must find precedent 'particularized to the facts of the case.' . . Whatever else the shocks-the-conscience test means in the context of an effort to pierce public employees' qualified immunity, it at a minimum requires 'an exact analysis of circumstances,' . . . measured by truly comparable cases. In the often 'unfamiliar territory' that cases like this one present, 'mechanical application' of prior precedent usually does little good. . . . Having urged our court and the district court to address these claims with caution and restraint, I must accept a dose of my own medicine. Two features of this case offer some support for these decisions—sufficient support to wait and see before granting a petition to review the case as a full court. One reasonable explanation for waiting to review the dispute is the stage of the case—Rule 12(b)(6)—from which these decisions arose. This is not a barebones complaint based on implausible allegations. It comes in at 89 pages. And it offers plenty of details that at least plausibly allege public acts of recklessness and intentional misbehavior. The point of discovery is to allow claimants and the courts to determine whether facts support plausible claims. That opportunity should help us all in resolving this case fairly. A second reasonable explanation for waiting to review this case as a full court is the hard-to-pin-down nature of the clearly established inquiry. The officials, it is true, can be found liable only if this lawsuit falls into the narrow category of cases so egregious, so obvious, that all reasonable officials must have known what they did was wrong. . . What's tricky is figuring out what counts as reckless or intentional behavior—in the context of a clearly established conscience-shocking standard of care. For better or worse, the case law seems to present a sliding scale—the more evidence of unforgiveable intent, the less necessity to identify a case just like this one. That is what seemed to happen in Hope v. Pelzer. The facts were unique. No correctional officials before then, at least in a litigated case, had thought to chain inmates to a hitching post in the unrelenting heat of the Alabama sun for seven hours as a form of prison discipline. What permitted the U.S. Supreme Court to hold that the state officials violated clearly established norms turned not on any one precedent but on the egregiousness of the state officials' state of mind. . . . So long as that is an appropriate approach to qualified immunity claims, it would seem that allegations like these—intentional or reckless poisoning of citizens—plausibly clear the clearly established hurdle and warrant discovery. . . . That discovery should proceed does not eliminate a role for the district court. One would hope that the court, in view of the seriousness of the allegations and the potential protections of qualified immunity at summary judgment, would not deploy a laissez-faire approach to document and deposition discovery. Carefully tailored and prompt discovery should answer whether the intentional and reckless poisoning allegations hold up. If not, this case needs to return to the court of public opinion, where one suspects it should have remained all along.”)

Guertin v. State of Michigan, 924 F.3d 309, 315-17 (6th Cir. 2019) (Kethledge, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied sub nom. City of Flint v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) (“To state the obvious, the sympathies of every decent person run entirely to the plaintiffs in this case. But sometimes the law, evenhandedly applied, leads to a result contrary to the crush of popular opinion. This is one of those cases. Respectfully, the majority’s decision on the issue of qualified immunity is barely colorable. To overcome qualified immunity, the plaintiffs must show that ‘existing law’ made not merely the legality, but ‘the constitutionality of the [state] officer’s conduct “beyond debate.”’. . . Here, the putative constitutional violation concerns the vaguest of constitutional doctrines, namely substantive due process. The doctrine purports to protect—‘specifically,’ no less—‘those fundamental rights and liberties which are, objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed.’. . . That formulation (along with any number of alternative ones) is more oratory than legal rule, which has made the doctrine malleable enough to generate an array of constitutional rights over the years. [collecting cases] But just as crowbars are not made out of tin, substantive due process’s easy malleability makes it a notably poor instrument for prying away an officer’s qualified immunity. For to overcome that immunity in a case (like this one) where the claim is constitutional, the ‘contours’ of the relevant constitutional rule ‘must be so well defined that it is “clear to a reasonable office”’ that his conduct would violate the rule. . . . That requirement—often repeated by the Supreme Court, but sometimes, as here, overlooked—presents two obstacles to the majority’s decision in this case. The first concerns the particular ‘fundamental right’ (or rule) that the majority relies upon, namely a ‘right to bodily integrity[.]’. . . The sheer vagueness of that formulation illustrates that its ‘contours’ are shapeless rather than crisp, subjective rather than objective, unknowable until judicially announced. Even the majority acknowledges (as it stretches the right further) that the right presents ‘far from a categorical rule.’. . . The second problem is related: the ‘bodily integrity’ caselaw fails to provide the ‘high “degree of specificity[.]”’. . . necessary to overcome qualified immunity, at least as to the claim here. Instead that caselaw for the most part provides a handful of data points, which form more of a dusty nimbus than a planetary ring. But the caselaw does reveal a sine qua non for the right’s violation: that the officer’s invasion of the plaintiff’s bodily integrity be intentional. . . . No official—no matter how blameworthy he might be on moral grounds—can be expected to recognize in advance that a court will recast a legal rule so that it applies to conduct to which it has never applied before. That in part is why the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly stressed that courts must not “define clearly established law at a high level of generality[.]”’. . . Yet that is precisely what our court’s opinion does here. The Supreme Court has also repeatedly said that courts must not turn substantive due process into ‘a font of tort law to be superimposed upon whatever systems may already be administered by the States[.]’ . . . Yet our court’s opinion does that too, by expanding substantive due process to reach claims based on negligence rather than intent. Our court’s opinion, ‘in other words, does exactly what the Supreme Court has repeatedly told us not to do.’ . . . I respectfully dissent from the order denying rehearing en banc.”) Rayfield v. City of Grand Rapids, Michigan, 768 F. App’x 495, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) (“[E]ven if Rayfield has plausibly alleged that the City defendants violated his Fourth Amendment rights when they failed to ensure that he receive a probable-cause hearing within 48 hours, this right was not ‘clearly established’ as applied to Rayfield’s case. . . . Although we have recognized that, per County of Riverside, officers are on notice that defendants have a right to a probable-cause hearing within 48 hours, . . . Cherrington does not deal with the factually and legally distinct situation presented by Rayfield’s case, namely when two municipalities, both of which have authority to process a detainee, jointly manage the custody of a pre-hearing detainee. Indeed, when discussing his wrongful-detention claim, Rayfield cites only Cherrington. . . . Moreover, in support of his municipal liability claim against the City and County, Rayfield states:

The question is whether an arresting authority may be liable for constitutional violations committed by another municipal entity to whom it has regularly transfers [sic] custody of its arrestees. The Sixth Circuit has never answered this question.

. . . While we can plausibly conceive of a situation in which City and County officials would violate a detainee’s rights under County of Riverside by failing adequately to inform the other municipal authority regarding the status of the individual’s detention, Rayfield does not provide us with such a case and we have been unable to identify one. Consequently, because it was not clearly established that Defendants’ failure to communicate regarding Rayfield’s detention would necessarily violate Rayfield’s constitutional rights, Hornbacher, Glowney, and John Doe City defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Gardner v. Evans, 920 F.3d 1038, 1063-64 (6th Cir. 2019) (“[W]e conclude that the inspectors are immune from suit on the entirety of the due-process counts against them. Plaintiffs insist that Flatford clearly established their right to receive notice, at some point, about their right to appeal. We agree that plaintiffs had a clearly established right to receive notice of their right to appeal, but they did not have the right to receive it from the inspectors who red tagged their homes. In Flatford, we explained that the actions of City’s Director of Building and Safety were objectively unreasonable because ‘despite actual knowledge of the [tenants’] possessory interests,

[the director] took no action on their behalf. It is too plain for argument that the [tenants], who were barred from entering their home, have at least a clearly-established right to process of the sort that [the director] afforded to their landlord.’. . We immediately distinguished our holding, however, from a similar case in the Seventh Circuit:

The Seventh Circuit reached a different conclusion in McGee v. Bauer, 956 F.2d 730 (7th Cir.1992), where a homeowner was dispossessed of his home under perceived exigent circumstances. Although troubled by the building inspector’s failure to advise the plaintiff of his right to a hearing, the court reasoned that the inspector’s omission was not unreasonable since it was not his but a city attorney’s duty to advise the plaintiff of his legal rights. This case, however, is distinguishable by the fact that [the director] is not merely a building inspector but the highest official of the City’s Building Safety Department, vested with the statutory duties of commencing proceedings against those responsible for dangerous structures.

Id. at 169 n.7. Here, plaintiffs have sued the individual inspectors who red tagged their homes, not any other, higher-up officials. In that respect, the case is more akin to the Seventh Circuit’s decision in McGee and less like our own decision in Flatford. Summary judgment for the inspectors on the post-deprivation claims was therefore appropriate.”)

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 925 F.3d 793, 821-27 (6th Cir. 2019) (as amended), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 855 (2020) (“[A] careful reading of King shows that fabricated evidence can be material to a grand jury’s determination of probable cause without being presented to the grand jury. If only evidence presented to a grand jury could be material to that grand jury’s decision, plaintiffs would be faced with the Scylla and Charybdis of either admitting that the fabricated evidence was not material or claiming that it was material because it was presented to the grand jury, thereby gracing the fabricator with the absolute immunity afforded to grand jury testimony. . . Instead, plaintiffs can show that a fabrication was material to the grand jury’s determination by showing ‘that the officer has made knowing or reckless false statements or has falsified or fabricated evidence in the course of setting a prosecution in motion.’. . Here, according to the prosecutor, had Stoiker not fabricated Vernon’s statement, there would have been no grand jury. But even had there been one, Vernon would not have testified falsely before it. Stoiker’s fabrication was therefore material to the grand jury’s determination because it ‘was material to the ultimate prosecution’ of Plaintiffs. . . At issue in this appeal is whether, in 1975, the constitutional rights allegedly violated by Stoiker were sufficiently clearly established to deprive him of the protection of qualified immunity. It is a plaintiff’s burden to show that the right at issue was clearly established. . . Although the Supreme Court ‘do[es] not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . In examining ‘existing precedent,’ ‘we may rely on decisions of the Supreme Court, decisions of this court and courts within this circuit, and in limited instances, on decisions of other circuits.’. . . In 1975, it was clearly established law that prosecutorial withholding of exculpatory evidence violates a criminal defendant’s Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 86–87 (1963). Multiple circuits had also recognized by that time that ‘Brady-derived’ claims could be based on the conduct of law-enforcement officers—as distinct from prosecutors—who had allegedly withheld exculpatory evidence. [collecting cases] The above cases, decided

prior to Plaintiffs’ trials, make clear that the duty to disclose evidence falls on the state as a whole and not on one officer of the state particularly, and it was therefore clearly established by the time of those trials that Stoiker had a Fourteenth Amendment obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence. It was also clearly established that impeachment evidence, such as the fact that a witness was coerced into making a fabricated statement, qualifies as exculpatory. . . . Stoiker is not entitled to qualified immunity on the withholding-of-evidence claims. . . . It is difficult to countenance any argument that a law-enforcement officer in 1975 would not be ‘on notice [his] conduct [was] unlawful’ when coercing a witness into perjuring himself in a capital trial. . . . The obvious injustice inherent in fabricating evidence to convict three innocent men of a capital offense put Stoiker on notice that his conduct was unlawful. . . . Stoiker is not entitled to qualified immunity on the fabrication-of-evidence claims. . . . Stoiker argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs ‘fail to identify a pre-1975 case that would clearly establish that a police officer could be held liable for malicious prosecution where he did not actively participate in the prosecution [and] did not testify before the grand jury or at trial.’. . . Stoiker’s argument admits of two interpretations, one of which is possibly valid but has false premises and the other of which has true premises but is invalid. Stoiker might be arguing that the state of malicious prosecution law in 1975 was in flux and that it was not clear at that time that he could be liable under a malicious prosecution cause of action. That may be true, but it does not follow that he is protected by qualified immunity. Whether a defendant is protected by qualified immunity turns not on whether the defendant was on notice that his actions satisfied the elements of a particular cause of action, but instead on whether the defendant was on notice that his actions violated the laws of the United States. Recently, when presented with a similar argument to Stoiker’s, we responded:

[The defendant] spends a considerable portion of his brief illustrating why it is not clear that he should be liable for malicious prosecution, thus reasoning that he is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, his claim that the contours of our jurisprudence concerning malicious prosecution are not entirely clear misses the point. Our inquiry is whether [the defendant’s] alleged actions—arresting and detaining [the plaintiff] based on false pretenses and then seeking an arrest warrant based on these false statements—violated [the plaintiff’s] clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that they did.

Miller v. Maddox, 866 F.3d 386, 395 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 2622 (2018). In short, ‘the sine qua non of the “clearly established” inquiry is “fair warning,”’. . . and we ask only ‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted[.]’ Stoiker’s argument may, on the other hand, be that it was not clear in 1975 that an officer who fabricated evidence but did not testify for the prosecution had violated the laws of the United States. If this were true, he would be protected by qualified immunity. It is not, and he is not. For Plaintiffs’ claims to survive summary judgment, it must have been clearly established that where an officer fabricates evidence against a defendant and then withholds exculpatory evidence from the prosecution, but does not testify at trial or a grand jury hearing, he is ‘influenc[ing]’ the decision to initiate the prosecution in a way that violates the defendant’s constitutional rights. . . . Stoiker cites no case requiring testimony as an element of a § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution and no case suggesting that testifying is required in order to influence the decision to prosecute. To the contrary, this court held long before 1975 that if officers arrested a suspect without a warrant (in violation of state law), and ‘subjected [that suspect] to fraudulent trial in a criminal case’ that resulted in wrongful conviction, the officers caused the suspect ‘a deprivation of [her] liberty without due process of law.’ McShane v. Moldovan, 172 F.2d 1016, 1019 (6th Cir. 1949). The court in McShane made no mention of whether the officers had testified against the suspect, and with good cause: the crux of the violation is the institution of judicial processes without probable cause, which does not require a testimonial act. In conjunction with the cases cited in section II(C)(2)(b), supra, McShane is sufficient to have clearly established before May 1975 that an officer need not testify in order to violate a defendant’s right to due process. That the phrase ‘malicious prosecution’ was not used in that case to describe the cause of action is immaterial; what matters are the actions allegedly taken by Stoiker, not the name we give to the claim used to seek redress for those actions. Stoiker is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on the malicious-prosecution claims.”)

Cruise-Gulyas v. Minard, 918 F.3d 494, 497-98 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Minard adds that no case put him on notice about this fact pattern—that a second stop after a first stop supported by probable cause violated Cruise-Gulyas’s Fourth Amendment rights. Defined at that specific level of generality, he says, the case law did not clearly prohibit the stop. But Minard misses a point. In making his argument, he fails to acknowledge that the second stop was distinct from the first stop, not a continuation of it. At this stage, we must accept Cruise-Gulyas’s allegations—that Minard stopped her twice—as true. In that light, case law clearly requires independent justification for the second stop. . . No matter how he slices it, Cruise-Gulyas’s crude gesture could not provide that new justification. . . While these cases are not factually identical, they establish clear, specific principles that answer the questions this case asks. . . At this stage, Cruise-Gulyas’s allegations survive Minard’s motion for judgment on the pleadings based on qualified immunity. . . . Cruise-Gulyas also alleges that Minard violated her free speech rights by stopping her the second time in retaliation for her expressive, if vulgar, gesture. To succeed, she must show that (1) she engaged in protected conduct, (2) Minard took an adverse action against her that would deter an ordinary person from continuing to engage in that conduct, and (3) her protected conduct motivated Minard at least in part. . . Precedent clearly establishes the first and second elements. Any reasonable officer would know that a citizen who raises her middle finger engages in speech protected by the First Amendment. . . An officer who seizes a person for Fourth Amendment purposes without proper justification and issues her a more severe ticket clearly commits an adverse action that would deter her from repeating that conduct in the future. The Constitution suggests as much by prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures. . . . Cruise-Gulyas also meets the third element, a fact-intensive question in this instance. She alleged in the complaint that Minard stopped her because she made a crude gesture. That counts as a cognizable, and clear, violation of her speech rights.”)

Harcz v. Boucher, 763 F. App’x 536, ____ (6th Cir. 2019) (“Accepting the allegations in the complaint, precedent clearly established that the state defendants violated the appellants’ First Amendment rights. Over ten years before the events in this case, Parks established that ‘one’s constitutionally protected rights’ do not ‘disappear because a private party is hosting an event that remain[s] free and open to the public.’ . . . As a result, cases stretching back decades requiring that a significant government interest support a valid time, place, and manner restriction controlled here. . . . In addition, previous decisions of this court and the Supreme Court clarify that the government must demonstrate the reality of an asserted interest when justifying speech restrictions and that mere conjecture will not suffice. . . . Moreover, Startzell v. Philadelphia, an analogous case that the district court discussed at length, provided a blueprint for proper police action under the circumstances. . . . There, the officers allowed protestors to enter a permitted event held in a public forum and imposed a constitutionally-permissible restriction only after ‘protestors move[d] from distributing literature and wearing signs to disruption of the permitted activities.’ . . . Accepting the appellants’ allegations as true, these cases placed the state defendants’ constitutional violation beyond debate. . . . We therefore reverse dismissal of the appellants’ First Amendment claim.”)

Rafferty v. Trumbull Cty., Ohio, 915 F.3d 1087, 1095-97 (6th Cir. 2019) (“[T]he Court finds that Sherman has satisfied the objective component of her Eighth Amendment claim. Drennen’s repeated demands that Sherman expose her breasts and masturbate are ‘sufficiently serious’ to implicate the Eighth Amendment under settled case law from the Supreme Court, this Circuit, and numerous other courts of appeals. . . . Drennen argues that he did not violate the Eighth Amendment because he did not physically touch Sherman. But this Court held nearly three decades ago that sexual abuse of inmates can violate the Eighth Amendment even in the absence of physical touching by a corrections officer. . . . This Court has not determined whether deliberate indifference or the heightened malice standard is required to satisfy the subjective component of an Eighth Amendment claim alleging sexual abuse by a prison guard. But the Court need not resolve this issue at present; Sherman prevails regardless of whether malice or the less-stringent deliberate indifference standard applies. Obviously, Drennan could not conceivably offer a legitimate penological justification for his repeated demands that Sherman expose herself and masturbate against her will. Thus, a jury could conclude that Drennen acted with deliberate indifference or acted maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing her harm. . . . When Drennen made his sexual demands towards Sherman in early 2014, it was clearly established that sexual abuse of prisoners could rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . Further, it was clearly established that sexual abuse could be sufficiently severe to implicate the Eighth Amendment even in the absence of physical touching by a guard. . . . Accordingly, when Drennen allegedly sexually abused Sherman, it was clearly established that such abuse could violate the objective prong of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2014 that ignoring known risks of harm to an inmate due to inadequate medical care, inhumane conditions of confinement, or abuse by another inmate could constitute deliberate indifference. . . . A jury could conclude that Drennen’s alleged conduct violates either standard. Accordingly, it was clearly established that Drennen’s alleged conduct could violate the subjective component of the Eighth Amendment. Drennen argues that Sherman’s Eighth Amendment rights were not clearly established because Sherman failed to identify a case with sufficiently analogous facts. But the Supreme Court ‘do[es] not require a case directly on point [if] existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Instead, the operative inquiry is ‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . Based on the settled precedent that existed in 2014, a reasonable officer should have known that making repeated sexual demands of an inmate could violate the Eighth Amendment. Therefore, the fact that Sherman failed to identify a case with completely analogous facts does not entitle Drennen to qualified immunity. . . In sum, a reasonable officer in Drennen’s position would have known that repeatedly ordering Sherman to expose her breasts and masturbate in his presence could violate her Eighth Amendment rights. Therefore, Drennen is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Naselroad v. Mabry, 763 F. App’x 452, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) (“We find that, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Naselroad, summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity is inappropriate. This is so because, first, Naselroad enjoyed a clearly established right not to be shot if he did not present a threat sufficient to justify the use of deadly force. . . Second, on Naselroad’s rendition of the facts, a reasonable juror could conclude that Mabry’s use of deadly force was excessive in light of the threat Naselroad presented. . . This conclusion squares with our prior decisions. . . A jury crediting Naselroad’s account could conclude that his gun was always pointed at the ground, never directly at an officer, and that Naselroad did not indicate, verbally or physically, an intention to harm the officers. Such a jury could conclude that Mabry lacked probable cause to believe Naselroad presented an immediate threat to officer safety. . . It may matter to the jury, as well, that the officers were at the property to investigate a non-violent, low-level crime and had no additional information to suggest that Naselroad was threatening. Mabry cites several out-of-circuit appellate and district court cases as persuasive precedent in support of the proposition that deadly force is constitutionally reasonable ‘when a suspect draws, or merely appears to attempt to draw, a weapon against police.’ None of the cases Mabry cites stands for so broad a claim and all are, moreover, fundamentally distinguishable from the facts of this case.”)

Guertin v. State of Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 933-35 (6th Cir. 2019), reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, 924 F.3d 309 (2019), cert. denied sub nom. Busch v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) (“Given the unique circumstances of this case, defendants argue we should defer to the ‘breathing room’ qualified immunity provides and hold that the invasion of plaintiffs’ right to bodily integrity via life-threatening substances with no therapeutic benefit introduced into individuals without their consent was not clearly established before the officials engaged in their respective conduct. The dissent likewise suggests that ‘plaintiffs must be able to “identify a case with a similar fact pattern” to this one “that would have given ‘fair and clear warning to officers’ about what the law requires.”’ . . But the Court has ‘mad[e] clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . For the reasons that follow, we decline to erect the suggested ‘absolute barrier to recovering damages against an individual government actor.’ . . The lack of a comparable government-created public health disaster precedent does not grant defendants a qualified immunity shield. Rather, it showcases the grievousness of their alleged conductKnowing the Flint River water was unsafe for public use, distributing it without taking steps to counter its problems, and assuring the public in the meantime that it was safe ‘is conduct that would alert a reasonable person to the likelihood of personal liability.’ . . As set forth above, taking affirmative steps to systematically contaminate a community through its public water supply with deliberate indifference is a government invasion of the highest magnitude. Any reasonable official should have known that doing so constitutes conscience-shocking conduct prohibited by the substantive due process clause. . . These ‘actions violate the heartland of the constitutional guarantee’ to the right of bodily integrity . . . and ‘[he] obvious cruelty inherent’ in defendants’ conduct should have been enough to forewarn defendants. . . Furthermore, the long line of Supreme Court cases discussed above—Harper, Cruzan, Rochin, Winston, to name a few—all build on each other from one foundation: an individual’s right to bodily integrity is sacred, founded upon informed consent, and may be invaded only upon a showing of a government interest. The Court could not have been clearer in Harper when it stated that ‘[t]he forcible injection of medication into a nonconsenting person’s body represents a substantial interference with that person’s liberty.’ . . Here we have an even more dramatic invasion, for at least in Harper the state forced medication—something needed to improve or sustain life—into its citizens; here, government officials caused Flint residents to consume a toxin with no known benefit, did so without telling them, and made affirmative representations that the water was safe to drink. . . . Put differently, plaintiffs’ bodily integrity claim implicates a clearly established right that ‘may be inferred from [the Supreme Court’s] prior decisions.’ . . Several defendants take issue with the district court’s definition of the right, contending it deals in generality instead of specificity. . . To be sure, sweeping statements about constitutional rights do not provide officials with the requisite notice. . . . But, the deficiencies of a too-general clearly established test have no bearing on the specifics of this case. Here, the right recognized by the district court—and one we adopt as directly flowing from the reasoning of the long line of bodily integrity and shocks-the-conscience cases—is neither a ‘general proposition’ nor one ‘lurking in the broad “history and purposes”’ of the substantive due process clause. . . In providing a tainted life-necessity and falsely assuring the public about its potability, government officials ‘strip[ped] the very essence of personhood’ from those who consumed the water. . . They also caused parents to strip their children of their own personhood. If ever there was an egregious violation of the right to bodily integrity, this is the case; the ‘affront to human dignity in this case is compelling,’ . . . and defendants’ ‘conduct is so contrary to fundamental notions of liberty and so lacking of any redeeming social value, that no rational individual could believe ... [their conduct] is constitutionally permissible under the Due Process Clause.’ . . We therefore agree with the district court that plaintiffs have properly pled a violation of the right to bodily integrity against Howard Croft, Darnell Earley, Gerald Ambrose, Liane Shekter-Smith, Stephen Busch, Michael Prysby, and Bradley Wurfel, and that the right was clearly established at the time of their conduct. Should discovery shed further light on the reasons behind their actions (as but one example, a governmental interest that trumps plaintiffs’ right to bodily integrity), they are free to raise the qualified immunity defense again at the summary judgment stage.”) Guertin v. State of Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 942, 957-62 (6th Cir. 2019) (McKeague, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied sub nom. Busch v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) (“[E]ven if plaintiffs have alleged the violation of a recognized due process right, their claim nonetheless fails at prong two of the qualified-immunity analysis, which asks whether the right was clearly established. The mere fact that no court of controlling authority has ever recognized the type of due process right that plaintiffs allege in this case is all we need to conclude the right is not clearly established. Accordingly, qualified immunity must shield each defendant from suit. . . . In sum, because the conduct alleged does not appear to rise to the level of conscience-shocking, and because I believe it does not demonstrate the deprivation of a recognized fundamental right, I have serious doubts about whether plaintiffs state a substantive due process claim sufficient to carry them past prong one of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . To the extent plaintiffs do successfully allege the violation of a constitutional right, the novelty of that right just shows that it was not clearly established at the time the alleged events unfolded. Therefore, the doctrine of qualified immunity shields every defendant from suit. . . . Plaintiffs must be able to ‘identify a case with a similar fact pattern’ to this one ‘that would have given “fair and clear warning to officers” about what the law requires.’ . . . Identifying a factually similar case is especially important in the realm of substantive due process, where the inherent ambiguity of what the law protects is best discerned through ‘carefully refined ... concrete examples[.]’ . . . As the majority acknowledges, plaintiffs point to no factually similar controlling case in which a court found that such conduct violated a constitutional right to bodily integrity. ‘This alone should have been an important indication to the majority that [the defendants’] conduct did not violate [plaintiffs’] “clearly established” right.’ . . . Due to the lack of controlling precedent and the many cases suggesting substantive due process does not protect plaintiffs’ asserted right, the majority again falls back on its exaggerated characterization of defendant’s actions and statements, likening them to the ‘systematic’ poisoning of an entire community. Advancing that narrative, the majority concludes that this case is one of the easy’ ones that should never have arisen in the first place. . . . But this is not one of those cases. As already demonstrated, the majority’s systematic poisoning narrative has no basis in plaintiffs’ factual allegations. . . . This is not a case about a government official knowingly and intentionally introducing a known contaminant into another’s body without that person’s consent. It is a case about a series of erroneous and unfortunate policy and regulatory decisions and statements that, taken together, allegedly caused plaintiffs to be exposed to contaminated water. The proper framing of the factual narrative exposes how far off base are the bodily integrity cases relied upon by the majority. . . . In sum, the majority’s opinion is a broad expansion of substantive due process, which contradicts the traditional understanding that due process does not ‘supplant traditional tort law’ or impose a duty on the government to ensure environmental safety. . . . What is more, it effectively ‘convert[s] the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability’ for government officials making policy or regulatory decisions or statements that have any effect on a publicly consumed environmental resource. . . . That turns qualified immunity on its head.”)

Apr. 1, 2019) (“Although plaintiffs plausibly plead that Governor Snyder violated their right to bodily integrity, qualified immunity shields public officials ‘from undue interference with their duties and from potentially disabling threats of liability.’ . . . It provides protection to government officials who make reasonable yet mistaken decisions that involve open questions of law. . . . But an official cannot avail herself of qualified immunity if the right violated was ‘clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.’ . . . If controlling caselaw or a body of persuasive authority has put the constitutional question beyond debate, government officials are on notice that their conduct must conform to an established legal standard. . .As the Sixth Circuit recently held, the right to bodily integrity was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. . . ‘Knowing the Flint River water was unsafe for public use,’ failing to take ‘steps to counter its problems, and assuring the public in the meantime that it was safe’ was “conduct that would alert a reasonable person to the likelihood of personal liability.”’ . . In other words, any reasonable official should have known that ‘contaminat[ing] a community through its public water supply with deliberate indifference is a government invasion of the highest magnitude.’ . . As a result, the Governor is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)] Cahoo v. SAS Analytics Inc., 912 F.3d 887, 903-04, 906-07 (6th Cir. 2019) (“Plaintiffs’ rights to adequate notice and a pre-deprivation hearing were clearly established. . . . It has been nearly fifty years since the Supreme Court held that recipients have a protected property interest in unemployment compensation. . . . Similarly, the Supreme Court held approximately five decades ago that the government violates due process by garnishing employee wages without holding a pre-deprivation hearing. . . . And because tax refunds are ‘significant property interests,’ it was also clearly established that Plaintiffs were entitled to a hearing before the Agency intercepted their tax refunds. . . . Therefore, every reasonable Agency employee should have known that depriving Plaintiffs of their property interests without adequate notice or a meaningful opportunity to be heard violated due process. And, more specifically, every reasonable Agency employee should have realized that the flawed MiDAS system resulted in unconstitutional deprivations of protected property interests. MiDAS rendered a staggeringly high ratio of false fraud determinations, did not entail any meaningful fact-finding measures, and failed to provide adequate notice or an opportunity to be heard prior to terminating claimants’ unemployment benefits, garnishing their wages, and seizing their tax returns. Accordingly, the Individual Agency Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs’ due process claim. The Court rejects the Individual Agency Defendants’ assertion that Plaintiffs’ due process rights were not clearly established. The Individual Agency Defendants contend that Plaintiffs’ due process rights were not clearly established because Plaintiffs failed to locate a case holding that a governmental official violates individuals’ due process rights by ‘not ceasing to use the computerized system that its employing agency contracted for, based on reports of performance issues of the system....’ . . . The Individual Agency Defendants’ argument is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the doctrine of qualified immunity. Contrary to the Individual Agency Defendants’ contention, ‘an official can be on notice that his conduct violates established law even in novel factual situations.’ . . . The operative inquiry is not whether a previous court faced perfectly analogous facts—it is ‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . In this case, any reasonable official would have known that depriving Plaintiffs of their protected property interests in the manner alleged violated their due process rights. If this Court accepted the Individual Agency Defendants’ argument that Plaintiffs must identify cases with virtually identical facts to defeat a qualified immunity defense, this Court would enable state actors to violate citizens’ constitutional rights with impunity simply by employing new technologies. This would give state actors a roadmap for evasion and effectively insulate them from any liability—they would use new technologies to carry out unconstitutional conduct, and avoid liability based on qualified immunity, even when the underlying conduct is clearly unconstitutional. The Court rejects the Individual Agency Defendants’ invitation to allow state actors to evade liability by utilizing new technologies to effectuate unconstitutional conduct. . . . The Court has not located a published opinion from this Circuit that answers the question of whether government actors violate the Fourth Amendment by seizing assets without a warrant if the seizure does not violate privacy interests. However, even if the Individual Agency Defendants’ conduct violated the Fourth Amendment—an issue that this Court does not now decide—Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established in light of the Supreme Court’s decision in G. M. Leasing Corp. and this Court’s decision in Sachs. Accordingly, qualified immunity shields the Individual Agency Defendants from Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claims.”)

Virgil v. City of Newport, No. 18-5129, 2018 WL 6659861, at *1 (6th Cir. Dec. 19, 2018) (not reported) (“Twenty-eight years after a jury convicted William Virgil of rape and murder, newly discovered DNA evidence won Virgil a new trial. The government re-presented Virgil’s case to a grand jury that ultimately refused to indict him. Virgil then sued thirteen individual police officers for violating his constitutional right to a fair trial by, among other things, deliberately withholding exculpatory evidence during Virgil’s original prosecution. Asserting qualified immunity, the individual police officers moved to dismiss. The district court found the officers ineligible for qualified immunity because clearly established law at that time required them to disclose such evidence. The officers appeal. Our review of the record, the applicable law, and the parties’ briefs convinces us that the district court’s opinion comprehensively sets forth the governing law—United States v. Moldowan, 578 F.3d 351 (6th Cir. 2009)—and the correct analysis. None of the officers’ arguments to the contrary undercuts our confidence in the district court’s decision. Thus, rather than duplicate the district court’s careful work with our own opinion, we affirm on the reasoning of Part II(B)(1)(ii) of its January 9, 2018 order denying the Newport Police Officers’ motion to dismiss Count One on qualified-immunity grounds.”)

Virgil v. City of Newport, No. 18-5129, 2018 WL 6659861, at *1 (6th Cir. Dec. 19, 2018) (not reported) (Larsen, J., concurring in the judgment) (“In Moldowan v. City of Warren, this court held that it was clearly established in August 1990 that police officers had a duty to disclose evidence to the prosecutor when its ‘exculpatory value’ was ‘apparent.’. . . The question in this case is whether Moldowan’s rule was also clearly established two years earlier, in September 1988. In D’Ambrosio v. Marino, this court held that the Moldowan standard is ‘the functional equivalent of a requirement that the officer act in bad faith.’. . . On that understanding of the Moldowan test, I concur in the court’s judgment that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Virgil has alleged that defendants deliberately concealed exculpatory evidence that was material to his case. He alleges, for example, that the officers tried to frame him; that they coerced an inmate to testify falsely that Virgil had confessed to the murder; and that they then deliberately suppressed exculpatory evidence regarding alternative suspects. Such conduct, if proved, would surely amount to bad faith or its functional equivalent; and there can be little question that it was well established before September 1988 that police officers could not deliberately conceal material, exculpatory evidence.”)

Estate of Collins v. Wilburn, 755 F. App'x 550, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (“Where video shows an arrestee actively resisting and refusing to be handcuffed, officers do not violate his Fourth Amendment rights by using force—such as a knee strike and a Taser deployment—in subduing him. Rudlaff, 791 F.3d at 639, 642-43. The estate insists that ‘a lesser degree of force is reasonable when the offense is a misdemeanor and not a violent offense.’ This argument conveniently ignores the two other Graham factors, which here include the violence Collins demonstrated in the course of his arrest, including punching Wilburn, and his active resistance to officers’ attempts to subdue him. As held in the district court, the estate has failed to establish a violation of Collins’s clearly established constitutional rights based upon the officers’ use of excessive force. Therefore, the grant of qualified immunity will be affirmed.”)

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 560-65 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Government officials sued in their individual capacities for constitutional violations are free from liability for civil damages unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was clearly established at the time that it was violated. . . Courts can address these two elements in any order. . . And although this decision turns on the second element—whether the law was clearly established—we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed. For that reason, we address both parts of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Because the area surrounding Morgan’s and Graf’s house was curtilage, and curtilage is treated as part of the home for Fourth Amendment purposes, the officers’ entry onto the curtilage could be justified only by a warrant or one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is undisputed that the SCRAP unit had no warrant. As for exceptions to the warrant requirement, the county argues that the entry was justified for three reasons. None, however, is convincing. . . . The SCRAP unit was concerned about general drug activity at Morgan’s and Graf’s house. But the Fourth Amendment prohibited them from entering the property: they had no warrant, no exigent circumstances, and no other exception to the warrant requirement. A “knock and talk” by police was permitted ‘precisely because that is “no more than any private citizen might do.”’ . . Thus, the officers’ right to enter the property like any other visitor comes with the same limits of that ‘traditional invitation’: ‘typically ... approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.’ . . Certainly, ‘[a] visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use.’ . . Neither can the police. By doing so here, the SCRAP unit violated Morgan’s and Graf’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In determining the contours of the right, there is a tension between defining the right at too high a level of generality, on one hand, and too granular a level, on the other. There does not need to be ‘a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . In all, the most important question in the inquiry is whether a reasonable government officer would have ‘fair warning’ that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . For centuries, the common law has protected the curtilage of the house. . . And the Supreme Court long has held that the curtilage is ‘considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.’. . . That means that the police can enter the curtilage on the same terms that they can enter the rest of the home—no more, no less. . . . Under those long-settled principles, warrantless searches ‘are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.’. . . A reasonable officer thus would understand that without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, entering the curtilage violates a clearly established right. Despite these long-settled standards, one case from this circuit, although incorrectly decided, requires that we grant qualified immunity. That case, Turk v. Comerford, decided within a month of the “knock and talk” in this case, found that the law was not clearly settled against a factual background that was, in every material way, the same as here. . . . Central to Turk’s analysis was our published decision in Hardesty, in which we held that ‘[if] knocking at the front door is unsuccessful in spite of indications that someone is in or around the house, an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.’. . . Hardesty’s extension of the knock-and-talk doctrine was, by its terms, limited to particular circumstances. . . . And if our case law ended there, qualified immunity here would be improper. But in Turk, this court read Hardesty more broadly and reasoned that because some limited intrusions of the curtilage were allowed, it was not clearly established that surrounding a house for a “knock and talk” was in the category of unacceptable intrusions. . . . Although Hardesty and Turk are outliers, Morgan and Graf cannot overcome their burden of showing that the law was clearly established at the time of the search in this case. In those two cases, this court should have reaffirmed long-settled Fourth Amendment principles. . . . But it did not. And although unpublished cases do not upset the state of the law, in rare instances they can show that members of this court, during the same time period, facing the exact same question, did not think the law to be clearly established. And ‘[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’. . . For that reason we affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to the officers in their individual capacities. Nevertheless, in light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law. . . . Jardines and, more recently, Collins made clear that, outside of the same implied invitation extended to all guests, if the government wants to enter one’s curtilage it needs to secure a warrant or to satisfy one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . . Our acknowledgment that those cases are no longer good law does not affect the qualified-immunity analysis here, which looks to the law at the time of the challenged action. . . . But it does put officers on notice that principles of Jardines and Collins—and not Hardesty or Turk—should guide their actions going forward.”)

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 567 (6th Cir. 2018) (Stranch, J., concurring) (“I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately only to emphasize the unique circumstances that merit applying qualified immunity in this case. As the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed, it ‘has long been clear that curtilage is afforded constitutional protection,’ and ‘officers regularly assess whether an area is curtilage before executing a search.’. . . Despite this fundamental principle, our jurisprudence has evidenced some confusion related to the police action that we refer to as ‘“knock and talk” investigations.’. . . A materially indistinguishable case, Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App’x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), demonstrates that, at the time of the search at issue, even federal appellate judges were struggling with assessments of curtilage in the limited context of knock-and-talk investigations. It is rare to have a contemporaneous circuit case revealing judicial confusion on the precise question confronted by police officers. The existence of one here supports finding the law sufficiently unsettled that the officers should receive qualified immunity. This case, moreover, presents different circumstances from even Wilson v. Layne, . . . referenced by the majority. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the ‘state of the law’ at the time of the constitutional violation was ‘undeveloped’ and that a circuit split had arisen between the alleged violation and that Court’s ultimate decision. . . The Supreme Court therefore declined to punish the officers’ lack of prescience. . . But the case before us is quite unlike the open question in Wilson, which had percolated up through the circuits on its way to final resolution by the Supreme Court. As explained in the majority opinion, Turk and Hardesty instead stand alone on a doctrinal spur. For purposes of this case, however, Turk is sufficient to show that the law surrounding knock and talk investigations was muddy at the relevant time. Though this is the unusual case in which an outlier may insulate officers from liability, today’s decision forecloses that possibility for future cases.”)

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 574 (6th Cir. 2018) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Turning to the officers, I agree with the majority that the constitutional violation was not clearly established. But, if I was writing on a clean slate, I would remand. And the question I would direct the district court to answer is whether the officers engaged in a purposeful, investigative act to find the marijuana plants. . . .As the county’s policy did not direct a search in Morgan and Graf’s case (and the original meaning approach to the Fourth Amendment would require a remand to determine whether the officers in fact ‘searched’), the court need not go further.”)

Bunkley v. City of Detroit, Michigan, 902 F.3d 552, 566 (6th Cir. 2018) (“The duty of law enforcement officers to intervene to prevent an arrest not supported by probable cause was stated in precedent ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish’ this rule. . . . And the arresting officers here—Dennis, Tanguay, and Washington (and Lucas)—knew that they had not investigated the Knox shooting at all, knew that Knox and Bunkley did not reasonably match the descriptions that Ainsworth had given them, knew that they did not question Bunkley (or Knox) before arresting him, and knew that Bunkley did not have a probation violation (their asserted reason for arresting him). They identified Bunkley, left the room to call Lucas, and returned to arrest Bunkley. Any of these officers had time to stop, intervene, and prevent this arrest-without-probable-cause. Based on Sixth Circuit law, the court properly denied qualified immunity.”) Stillwagon v. City of Delaware, Ohio, 747 F. App’x 361, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (“Despite having different purposes, tight handcuffing and the tight hand taping both constrain the movement of a person’s wrists. From an excessive-force analysis, both can cut off circulation and cause the restricted person’s hands to go numb as a result of restricted blood flow. This court’s tight-handcuffing precedent puts officers on notice that they cannot cut off the circulation to a suspect’s wrists—regardless of how they do it. This means that the right was clearly established at the time Flynn allegedly taped Stillwagon’s hands too tightly. We affirm the district court’s finding that Officers Ailes and Flynn are not entitled to immunity from claims of excessive force.”)

Brent v. Wayne Cty. Dep’t of Human Servs., 901 F.3d 656, 685 (6th Cir. 2018) (“[I]f Wenk violated plaintiffs’ clearly established constitutional rights when executing the removal order, she would not be entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs’ claims. Plaintiffs first argue that Wenk violated clearly established law by executing a removal order that she knew to contain falsehoods, in contravention of the well-established Fourth Amendment principle that an officer ‘cannot rely on a judicial determination of probable cause’ to justify executing a warrant ‘if that officer knowingly makes false statements and omissions to the judge such that but for these falsities the judge would not have issued the warrant.’ . . . Though we entirely agree—and now directly hold—that a social worker, like a police officer, cannot execute a removal order that would not have been issued but for known falsities that the social worker provided to the court to secure the order, this principle was not clearly established at the time Wenk executed the order in this case. Indeed, we held as recently as 2015 that ‘general assertions that “the Fourth Amendment was violated as to [a child] when he was seized pursuant to [an] order” that he claims “was based on false statements and otherwise lacked probable cause” invoke no clearly established right.’ . . . As Barber concerned conduct that occurred after the allegedly unlawful actions in this case, . . . we must grant Wenk qualified immunity here.”)

Hansen v. Aper, 746 F. App’x 511, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (“Aper’s reliance on Fettes, O’Malley, and Lee is misplaced because these cases are all distinguishable from Morrison. First, O’Malley is easily distinguishable because there, ‘[the plaintiff] did not have an obvious physical injury.’ . . . Therefore, the plaintiff did not meet one of the essential elements of the Morrison test. Hansen, though, has presented medical records diagnosing him with a crush injury caused by handcuffing. Fettes and Lee, in addition to being unpublished and therefore non-precedential, are also distinguishable from both Morrison and this case. The plaintiff in Fettes was handcuffed for around ten minutes. . . and in Lee, the handcuffing lasted only between five to ten minutes[.] . . In contrast, the plaintiff in Morrison was handcuffed for forty to fifty minutes, . . and Hansen was handcuffed for thirty to forty minutes. Another pertinent distinction between Fettes and both Morrison and the instant case has to do with the officers’ reactions to being told the cuffs were too tight. . . In both Morrison and the instant case, then, the defendant did not merely ignore the plaintiff’s complaints but actively rebuffed them. Granting Aper qualified immunity here would thus directly conflict with Morrison, which controls in this circuit absent an intervening change in the law. . . Aper was on notice that handcuffing violates the Fourth Amendment if the arrestee is handcuffed, complains about the tightness, law enforcement ignores the complaint, and the arrestee suffers injury. Therefore, the district court correctly denied Aper qualified immunity.”) Przybysz v. City of Toledo, 746 F. App’x 480, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (Gilman, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I fully concur in my colleague’s disposition of Marcia Przybysz’s Monell and state-law claims, as well as their decision to vacate the district court’s sanction order. Where we part company is over their disposition of Marcia's § 1983 claim against Sgt. Karrie Williams, although in the end I agree (for different reasons) that we should affirm the judgment of the district court. The lead opinion holds that no clearly established law governs Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams. . . I respectfully disagree. Although the facts of this case differ from those of Kallstrom v. City of Columbus, 136 F.3d 1055 (6th Cir. 1998), that case sets out a clear standard for constitutional torts premised on the state-created-danger theory. I believe that my colleagues' qualified-immunity analysis is overly rigid because it relies too heavily on factual differences between Marcia's claim and state-created-danger cases in which plaintiffs have prevailed. Nevertheless, I share my colleague's ultimate conclusion because the record contains insufficient evidence to show that Sgt. Williams acted with deliberate indifference to Thomas's safety. . . . True enough, the only similarly situated plaintiffs who have prevailed under the state-created-danger theory in our circuit are those in cases where the state official directly disclosed confidential information. . . . In contrast, Sgt. Williams did not directly disclose Thomas's identity to his supplier, Scott Warnka, or to Warnka's associates. This fact alone appears to be enough, in my colleagues' view, to shield Sgt. Williams from liability. . . I disagree. The Supreme Court has warned the lower courts against placing too 'rigid [a] gloss on the qualified immunity standard' by 'requir[ing] that the facts of previous cases be "materially similar"' to those at hand. . . . The unlawfulness of an official act 'must be apparent' to give rise to individual liability, but the doctrine of qualified immunity does not require that 'the very action in question ha[ve] previously been held unlawful.' . . . Moreover, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and ... a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.' . . . If a state actor is on notice that directly disclosing a confidential informant's name to violent third parties can give rise to liability, then I see no reason why that same actor lacks sufficient notice that affirmative acts that indirectly but unmistakably identify a confidential informant can do the same. Kallstrom and its progeny set forth 'a general constitutional rule' that 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' here. . . . Accordingly, I would find that clearly established law is at issue in this case. But that is not the end of the qualified-immunity analysis. We must also consider whether the facts of the case, '[t]aken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, ... show [that] the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right.' . . . In my view, this prong of Saucier's two-part framework, not the clearly-established-law prong, is the insurmountable barrier to Marcia's claim against Sgt. Williams.")

Scott v. Becher, 736 F. App'x 130, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he inquiry into whether a right is clearly established asks whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . . The standard is 'fair warning' because the purpose of qualified immunity is not to protect malicious behavior that violates constitutional rights in a manner the precise likes of which have not yet been the basis of a lawsuit in this circuit. Instead, qualified immunity has a two-fold purpose: to ensure that government agents are not deterred from vigorous pursuit of their duties due to fear that an honest misstep will expose them to money damages and, at the same time, to provide citizens a remedy for constitutional injuries. . . . After all, qualified immunity 'acts to safeguard government, and thereby to protect the public at large, not to benefit its agents.’ . . . To conclude otherwise in the Eighth Amendment context would ‘encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners.’ . . . Taking the allegations in Scott’s complaint as true, we conclude that Becher was not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of Scott’s Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference through reckless driving. According to the complaint and the attachments, Scott was one of a number of prisoners being transferred from Saginaw Correctional Facility to Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility. Becher was driving above the speed limit, swerving, and generally driving recklessly. When Scott and other inmates ‘beg[ged] him to slow down, before [they] all die[d],’ Becher refused, laughed, and instead accelerated. At some point, the speeding bus hit a bump, sending the front tires of the bus airborne. The inmates went airborne, too. One would assume that all the prisoners were handcuffed at the time, but apparently none were seat-belted. As a result, Scott was catapulted out of his seat, and was then slammed down onto his head, neck, and back. When the bus tires landed, the front tire of the bus went off the road, and in an apparent overcorrection, Becher swerved the bus into the lane of oncoming traffic before regaining control. Scott has alleged actions by Becher that no reasonable corrections official could believe were legal. Caselaw supports that conclusion. Scott points to factually similar cases out of the Eighth and the Fifth Circuits that analyzed under the Eighth Amendment allegations of reckless driving while transporting an inmate without a seatbelt. [discussing cases] Although a number of circuits have not addressed the specific reckless use of a vehicle to harm an inmate, ‘there is a clear consensus among the circuits’ that ‘the Eighth Amendment protect[s] against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering ... in a diverse range of factual scenarios.’ . . . And to use a vehicle maliciously to harm an inmate falls squarely into that category—especially when there is no risk posed by the inmate and no legitimate penal interest. . . . A ‘rough ride’ is ‘a peculiarly cruel means of punishment, as [it] is designed to place the victim in fear for his life. Not only is the prisoner not able to protect himself, but motor vehicles, unlike a controlled spray or direct applications of force, are not designed for use as a means of securing compliance or otherwise subduing a prisoner.’ . . . [F]ailure-to-seatbelt cases ‘involved mere negligence,’ but ‘all cases that have squarely dealt with intentional misconduct’—which Scott has alleged here—‘have found an Eighth Amendment violation.’ . . . In light of the obviousness of the constitutional violation, Becher could not reasonably have believed that driving recklessly while Scott and the other prisoners were not wearing seatbelts was lawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting Becher qualified immunity on Scott’s Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate-indifference by reckless driving.”) Cummin v. North, 731 F. App’x 465, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (“We determined that we did not need to resolve the issue in Johnson, and to date have not decided whether to adopt the ‘continuing seizure’ doctrine. . . . Thus, even if the conditions of Cummin’s release could constitute a seizure under this doctrine, Defendants ‘would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a “continuing seizure” by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established.’ Rapp v. Putman, 644 Fed.Appx. 621, 628 (6th Cir. 2016). Cummin cites several cases in support of his assertion that the right was clearly established. But the cases he cites are distinguishable. . . . Further, Cummin has cited no Sixth Circuit case finding the requirement that he attend five court appearances sufficient to constitute a seizure. In contrast, we have previously held, albeit in unpublished opinions, that requiring attendance at court proceedings does not constitute constitutional deprivation of liberty. [citing cases] In the absence of additional, onerous conditions, we cannot say the requirement to appear in court constitutes a clearly established seizure. This is consistent with many of our sister circuits. . . . Because Cummin was not arrested, incarcerated, required to post bail or pay any bond, and was never subject to any travel restrictions, we cannot conclude that a reasonable government official would understand that the conditions of Cummin’s release constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.”)

Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 754-56 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 567 (2018) (“Defendants also argue that no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against civil contemnor detainees in 2012. Plaintiff relies primarily on this court’s opinion in Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893 (6th Cir. 2004), as notice to defendants that their ‘conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.’ . . . In Champion, we considered an excessive-force claim brought by the family of a severely autistic man who died after several arresting officers restrained him, prone on the ground and handcuffed behind his back, for seventeen minutes. . . . Several witnesses described how the officers were ‘laying on top of’ the man while ‘he was prone on the ground with his face towards the carpet.’ . . . We affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to the officers and explained that ‘[c]reating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force.’ . . . Although the man was also pepper sprayed, the application of asphyxiating force ‘by itself violated a clearly established right.’ . . . Thus ‘the prohibition against placing weight on [Richardson’s] body after he was handcuffed was clearly established in the Sixth Circuit as of’ May 2012. . . . Although not every defendant may have placed his weight on Richardson’s torso, we have cautioned against taking ‘too cramped a view’ of our precedent, and have explained that Champion ‘proscribes the use of “substantial or significant pressure” that creates asphyxiating conditions in order to restrain a subject who does not pose a material danger to the officers or others.’ . . . Even though ‘Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a’ jail. . . . In response to Champion’s admonition, defendants maintain that the presence of medical personnel distinguishes this case because defendants claim they restrained Richardson only to facilitate his medical treatment. No medical personnel were present while force was used on Champion, but defendants do not explain how this distinction is material to our clearly-established analysis here. There is no dispute that Richardson was suffering a medical emergency, or that while he may have kicked and thrashed, defendants did not consider him a threat to anyone after he was handcuffed. Champion, who had created a disturbance in a store and ‘kick[ed] violently’ while on the ground, arguably posed a threat. . . . In any event, neither the mere presence of a third party at the scene nor defendants’ professed reason for using force would excuse defendants’ use of an otherwise unreasonable amount of force or alter relevant, clearly established constitutional guarantees. . . . We are cognizant that plaintiff must identify a case with a fact pattern similar enough to have given ‘fair and clear warning to officers’ about what the law requires. . . . But such a case need not ‘be on all fours in order to form the basis for the clearly established right.’. Defendants also argue that they cannot be held liable for their actions because it was not clear in 2012 whether civil contempt detainees fell within the Eighth or the Fourteenth Amendment. Although some district courts in this circuit may have applied the Eighth Amendment to civil contempt detainee excessive-force claims, the Supreme Court long ago ‘t[ook] the position that the Eighth Amendment is inapplicable to [a civil contempt] sentence.’. . . Moreover, it is well-established that ‘the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one[.]’. . . We decline to accept the defense of qualified immunity based on defendants’ ‘dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.’ See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam). Nor can defendants escape liability merely because the incident in question occurred before the Supreme Court made it clear that the standard of liability applicable to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims is purely an objective one. . . . As defendants acknowledge, we have rejected this argument before because ‘a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity simply because the courts have not agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.’. . . Rather, the relevant question under the clearly established prong is whether defendants had notice ‘that [their] conduct was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.’. . . We agree with the district court that Champion, among other precedent, gave such notice to defendants here. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s conclusion that it ‘[w]as unconstitutional’ on May 19, 2012, to create asphyxiating conditions by ‘forcibly restraining an individual in a prone position for a prolonged period of time’ when that individual posed no material threat.”)

Maben v. Thelen, 887 F.3d 252, 270 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Thelen . . . argues that there was no violation of a clearly established right because our cases dealing with the false issuance of misconduct charges deal with the issuance of major misconduct charges and not minor misconduct charges. We think Thelen’s preoccupation with MDOC’s label of major and minor misconduct is misplaced. Instead of focusing on that classification, Thelen should focus on the action of retaliating by issuing a misconduct ticket and the penalties that come with being found guilty of misconduct. We have made clear that a prison officer may not undertake adverse actions in retaliation for a prisoner’s exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . . We have also made clear that actions comparable in seriousness to the ones at issue in this case implicate a prisoner’s First Amendment rights. . . . [W]e think that a reasonable prison officer would have been aware that issuing a misconduct ticket, even a minor misconduct ticket, in retaliation for the inmate’s exercise of his First Amendment rights could give rise to constitutional liability.”)

Enoch v. Hogan, 728 F. App’x 448, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (Enoch I) (“The Complaint alleges that the Deputies stopped and searched Enoch and Corbin because of their race and despite the fact that their behavior was entirely lawful. It has been the law of this circuit for decades that ‘the reasonable suspicion requirement for an investigative detention cannot be satisfied when the sole factor grounding the suspicion is race.’ United States v. Avery, 137 F.3d 343, 354 (6th Cir. 1997). Enoch and Corbin therefore plausibly allege that they were victims of an unconstitutional search and seizure. Because individualized suspicion is less demanding than probable cause, . . . the same race-related facts necessarily do not satisfy the higher probable cause standard. . . .As of June 2014, the published precedent of this court made clear that an officer may not stop, much less arrest and prosecute, an individual on the basis of her race. . . . Enoch and Corbin have plausibly alleged violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. The Deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on these counts of the Complaint. . . .The Deputies could not constitutionally prevent Enoch and Corbin from or punish them for gathering news about matters of public importance when their actions violated neither rules nor laws. Enoch and Corbin have therefore plausibly alleged a violation of their First Amendment rights. Those rights were clearly established. Decades ago, the Supreme Court established with clarity that the First Amendment protects the rights of both the media and the general public to attend and share information about the conduct of trials, ‘where their presence historically has been thought to enhance the integrity and quality of what takes place.’. . The Court linked the right of access to another fundamental First Amendment right, explaining that ‘[t]he explicit, guaranteed rights to speak and to publish concerning what takes place at a trial would lose much meaning if access to observe the trial could, as it was here, be foreclosed arbitrarily.’. . The same logic necessitates finding a constitutional violation in this case, where Enoch and Corbin’s access to a press conference held immediately after a hearing was foreclosed on the basis of their race. The Supreme Court has likewise been clear for more than fifty years that state officials may not enforce rules or regulations that implicate First Amendment rights in a racially discriminatory manner. . . . [O]n the facts alleged, state officials purported to enforce state law in a racially discriminatory manner, stopping and arresting black citizens for engaging in behavior that was both protected by the First Amendment and permitted for their white counterparts. Based on the Complaint, the Deputy Sheriffs violated Enoch and Corbin’s clearly established First Amendment rights. The Deputies are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law on this count of the Complaint.”)

Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 948 (6th Cir. 2018) (“[I]t was clearly established at the time of Richmond’s incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.”)

Greer v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 884 F.3d 310, 317-18 (6th Cir. 2018) (“In this case, the Greers claim that the officers did not knock or announce their presence before entering the residence, and—taking the Greers’ factual allegations as true—exigent circumstances did not excuse the officers’ disregard of the knock-and-announce rule. Although the search warrant listed controlled substances as items to be seized, which could potentially be destroyed, the presence of drugs alone did not vitiate the knock-and-announce requirement. . . . Moreover, the Greers state that they were in bed when the officers arrived and that they presented no threat of violence. The warrant gives no indication that a person was in peril at the Greers’ home. Finally, facts set forth in the complaint clearly allege that no person within the home knew of the searching officers’ authority or purpose. These facts indicate a lack of exigent circumstances. Furthermore, ‘[n]ighttime searches have long been recognized as more intrusive than searches conducted during the day.’ . . . Consequently, the officers’ failure to knock and announce their presence at the Greers’ home at 4:00 a.m. absent exigent circumstances was clearly unconstitutional. As to the officers’ refusal to show the Greers the search warrant, it is clearly established that the purpose of a search warrant—informing citizens that the searching agents are authorized—cannot be accomplished if executing officers withhold presentation of the warrant despite an occupant’s requests to view it. . . . The Greers claim that they repeatedly asked to see the warrant, and the officers refused. Furthermore, they state that the officers failed to leave a copy of the warrant at the Greers’ home after the search concluded. These alleged facts further support the Greers’ claim that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by conducting the search of their home in an unreasonable manner. Thus, taking the facts alleged in the second amended complaint as true, the district court properly found that the Greers stated a claim for relief that is plausible on its face. . . . Even if the underlying search warrant was based on probable cause, the Greers have posed factual allegations that the officers violated their clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonably conducted searches. Consequently, the district court did not err in denying the officers’ Rule 12(c) motion based on qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Miami University, 882 F.3d 579, 604 (6th Cir. 2018) (“John has. . . sufficiently alleged a claim under § 1983 that Vaughn violated his equal-protection and procedural-due process rights. . . . All of these rights were clearly established in the fall of 2014. John’s ‘right to freedom from invidious [gender] discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause was certainly clearly established at all times pertinent to this action’ Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Twp. of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 681 (6th Cir. 2011). John’s procedural-due-process right to an impartial adjudicator and access to the evidence used against him was also clearly established. First, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to John, we conclude that a reasonable person in Vaughn’s position should have known that she was partial and that she could not, therefore, sit on John’s Administrative Hearing Panel. ‘The impropriety of [Vaughn’s] alleged conduct in failing to disqualify [her]self should have been apparent based on Goss [, 419 U.S. at 579–84], Newsome [v. Batavia Local Sch. Dist., 842 F.2d 920, 927 (6th Cir. 1988)], and other precedent directly on point.’ Heyne, 655 F.3d at 568. Second, John’s right to view all of the evidence against him is clearly established. . . . Thus, we reverse the district court’s holding that Vaughn is entitled to qualified immunity from John’s equal-protection and procedural-due-process claims.”)

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App’x 375, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (“[T]o withstand Panin’s qualified immunity argument, Flanigan must also show that his right to be free from fifteen to twenty hits to the head was clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. ‘In order for a right to be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity, “[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.”’ . . . Sixth Circuit case law supports Flanigan’s ‘right not to be struck ... gratuitously,’ Shreve, 453 F.3d at 688, and Flanigan’s version of events permits the court to draw the inference that he did not fight back against Panin’s attempts to handcuff him. In such a scenario, Panin’s blows to Flanigan’s head were gratuitous. . . . Thus, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Flanigan, a reasonable jury could conclude that Panin used excessive force. . . Accordingly, at this point in the proceedings, Panin ‘is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.’”)

Flanigan v. Panin, 724 F. App’x 375, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (Kethledge, J., dissenting) (“Qualified immunity protects all police officers except ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . Neither label fits Deputy Scott Panin. Hence I would reverse the district court’s partial denial of immunity. The only question on appeal is whether Panin violated Joseph Flanigan’s clearly established rights when he (allegedly) hit Flanigan in the head toward the end of their encounter. Our caselaw says that a police officer may use force to subdue a suspect who actively resists arrest—e.g., one who struggles with, threatens, or disobeys an officer. See Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-42 (6th Cir. 2015). By contrast, an officer may not use force against a suspect who is compliant or has stopped resisting. . . Although in this appeal we must accept Flanigan’s story as true, we must also view it through the eyes of a reasonable officer on the scene. . . In Flanigan’s telling, he ran away from Panin into someone’s backyard, repeatedly ignoring Panin’s orders to stop. After Panin had chased, tased, and maced Flanigan, Panin told him, ‘Don’t get up. Don’t resist.’ Yet Flanigan tried to get up. Only then did Panin hit Flanigan in the head. And only after that did Flanigan give up, follow Panin’s commands, and submit to handcuffing. A reasonable officer in this hectic situation could have viewed Flanigan as actively resisting arrest until he was restrained. Since Panin used only the force necessary to subdue Flanigan—and used no further force thereafter—he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . In holding otherwise, the majority stresses that Panin used too much force to subdue Flanigan. Our cases are to the contrary. For example, we have granted qualified immunity to officers who struck a naked (and obviously unarmed) suspect with batons, maced him, and tased him 38 times, because they needed to use that much force to gain his compliance. See Williams v. Sandel, 433 F. App’x 353, 362-63 (6th Cir. 2011). So it is here. Tasing and macing Flanigan had proven ineffective, so Panin was justified in hitting him, and each blow was necessary to overcome Flanigan’s resistance. See Jackson v. Washtenaw County, 678 F. App’x 302, 309 (6th Cir. 2017). The majority speculates that Panin could have arrested Flanigan with less force, but in Flanigan’s own account, he did not give up until Panin had hit him 15 to 20 times. The majority also draws support from three cases in which we denied qualified immunity, but in those cases officers used force far beyond what was necessary to make prone suspects produce their hands for cuffing, or hit suspects who had already surrendered. See Griffith v. Coburn, 473 F.3d 650, 658 (6th Cir. 2007); Shreve v. Jessamine Cty. Fiscal Court, 453 F.3d 681, 686-88 (6th Cir. 2006); Baker v. City of Hamilton, 471 F.3d 601, 607-09 (6th Cir. 2006). Neither was true here. As shown above, Flanigan remained defiant throughout, refused to stay on the ground, and resisted being handcuffed. Moreover, Panin used only the force necessary to overcome Flanigan’s resistance. Hence Panin did not violate Flanigan’s clearly established rights. I respectfully dissent.”)

Seales v. City of Detroit, 724 F. App’x 356, ____ (6th Cir. 2018) (“In light of these cases, we find Seales had a clearly established constitutional right to be free from continued detention after officers should have known that he was not the person named in the warrant. Accordingly, we find the district court correctly determined that Zberkot was not entitled to qualified immunity. It is for the trier of fact to decide whether Zberkot violated Seales' constitutional rights.”)

Richmond v. Huq, 879 F.3d 178, 196-97 (6th Cir. 2017) (“The proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner’s medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.’ . . This certainly includes the ‘unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.’ . . It is also well-established that right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference extends to psychological needs. . . Further, as noted above, this Circuit’s precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner’s medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment can constitute a constitutional violation. . . Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Richmond’s incarceration in Wayne County Jail that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, intentionally scrubbing her wound to cause unnecessary pain, and failing [to] implement the prescribed plan of treatment could constitute a constitutional violation.”)

Nailon v. University of Cincinnati, 715 F. App’x 509, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) (“[V]iewing all these facts in the light most favorable to Nailon, she has demonstrated a causal connection between her termination and her niece’s protected speech and established a First Amendment retaliation claim. She has thus satisfied the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis by showing a constitutional violation. . . . The Defendants argue that there is no clearly established law putting a university official on notice that terminating an individual in retaliation for speech made by her niece would be a constitutional violation. In their principal brief, they allege it is ‘[n]ot clear at all that a claim of retaliation for the speech of a family member fits under the First Amendment.’ The district court determined that such a right was clearly established based on cases within this circuit that examined claims of First Amendment retaliation where the underlying speech was made by a relative, rather than the plaintiff herself. . . The Defendants revise this argument in their Reply. There they posit that even though there is precedent establishing that a First Amendment retaliation claim may be based on speech made by a relative, these cases involve a ‘closer’ relationship between the speaker and the plaintiff than aunt and niece. They cite Teare v. Independence Local School District Board of Education, No. 1:10-cv-01711, 2011 WL 4633105, at *5 (N.D. Ohio Aug. 18, 2011), in which the district court determined that the plaintiff, a thirteen-year-old girl, had not shown a clearly established right of familial association with her uncle. Again, Nailon does not assert a claim for violation of her associational rights—she alleges that the Defendants retaliated against her based on her niece’s speech. Accordingly, Teare does not control our analysis. The Supreme Court has found that in the Title VII context, a third-party reprisal can form the basis of a retaliation claim. . . Moreover, the Court has explicitly ‘decline[d] to identify a fixed class of relationships for which third-party reprisals are unlawful.’ . . It recognized that there may be ‘difficult line-drawing problems concerning the types of relationships entitled to protection,’ and that ‘the significance of any given act of retaliation will often depend on the particular circumstances.’ . . An examination of the facts in this case confirms that Nailon and Davis’s relationship may form the basis for Nailon’s retaliation claim. As in Ward and Henley, the close familial relationship between Nailon and Davis was known to the Defendants. . . . Given these facts showing the close relationship between Nailon and Davis, as well as the cases establishing that private citizens have a protected First Amendment right to criticize public officials, . . . it should have been clear to a reasonable University official that retaliating against Nailon for Davis's speech would be unlawful. The Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Bays v. Montmorency Cty., 874 F.3d 264, 268-70 (6th Cir. 2017) (“Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they act with ‘deliberate indifference’ to the ‘serious medical needs’ of inmates committed to their charge. . . The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides the same guarantee to pretrial detainees. . . Two inquiries loom over every deliberate indifference case: Was the ailment a serious one? And was the official ‘subjective[ly] reckless[],’ such that she was actually ‘aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also [drew] the inference’? . . . Sigler adds that nothing in the record shows that she subjectively knew, then disregarded, that Shane was at risk of suicide. But the relevant question is not whether Sigler recognized that Shane might kill himself. It is whether Sigler recognized that Shane was suffering from a serious mental illness creating a host of risks and requiring immediate treatment during the fourteen days that Sigler treated him. . . Sigler argues that while she may have committed malpractice, her conduct was not deliberately indifferent to Shane’s plight. If a prison medical official provides treatment, it is true, constitutional liability attaches only if the treatment is ‘so cursory as to amount to a conscious disregard for [the inmate’s] needs.’ . . Taking the Bays’ allegations as true, Sigler’s care fell below this admittedly low bar. She scheduled an appointment weeks in the future despite symptoms that she, Nurse Pilarski, and the Bays’ expert now all agree required immediate or near-immediate care. Yes, she eventually did try to schedule an earlier appointment. But the sum total of her efforts were two phone calls and a message, all while she had the option of getting immediate emergency room treatment or at least putting him on a watch list, and yet she chose to do neither. Sigler looks to Taylor v. Burkes, which held that inmates have no clearly established right to the proper implementation of suicide prevention procedures. . . But the Bays do not argue that Sigler violated Shane’s right to procedures that might have prevented his suicide. They argue that Sigler violated Shane’s right to have a serious psychological illness treated seriously. And that right is clearly established.”)

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 430 (6th Cir. 2017) (“Under the conditions articulated with respect to the particular right at issue, a public employee ‘may rightfully refuse to answer unless and until he is protected at least against the use of his compelled answers.’ . The Supreme Court has made clear that if a state wishes to punish an employee for invoking that right, ‘States must offer to the witness whatever immunity is required to supplant the privilege and may not insist that the employee or contractor waive such immunity.’ . . We therefore reverse the district court’s grant of qualified immunity on the Fifth Amendment claim, and hold that the right articulated in Moody I was clearly established at the time of the violation.”)

Moody v. Michigan Gaming Control Bd., 871 F.3d 420, 433, 436-37 (6th Cir. 2017) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“At ‘a high level of generality,’ . . . a public employee or, in this case, a licensee may refuse to answer questions that may tend to incriminate himself unless and until he has immunity from prosecution on the basis of his answers to the State's questions. Moody I was correct to explain that ‘“a governmental body may not require an employee to waive his privilege against self-incrimination as a condition to keeping his job ... even [when] no criminal proceedings were ever instituted against” an employee who was later successful in constitutional claims.’. . I part ways with the majority, however, because it does not—and cannot—point to ‘clearly established law [that is] “particularized” to the facts of [this] case.’. . The majority finds clearly established Moody I's holding that MGCB violated the drivers' rights when it ‘did not offer [them] immunity before the hearing.’. . Based on my understanding of the Supreme Court's precedent, I cannot agree. . . I cannot agree that Turley, Gardner, and like cases provide the proper lens through which we should assess this case for purposes of qualified immunity. These cases address different situations from the one here. The question, then, is whether MGCB needed to ‘offer’ immunity in the form of notifying the drivers that their testimony could not be used against them. This is where Garrity, which is the progenitor of the other cases I have discussed so far, fits into the picture. . . Interpreting Garrity to mean that coerced testimony cannot be used in a subsequent criminal proceeding, however, leaves an important question unanswered: is that effect of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination a self-executing one, or must the public employer or agency affirmatively make its employee, contractor, or licensee aware of the immunity that Garrity affords? In Moody I, we concluded that MGCB had an affirmative obligation to notify the drivers that they were afforded immunity in exchange for being threatened with the loss of their licenses. In effect, we created a prophylactic rule, but this rule had not been in place before. The district court was therefore correct when it explained that ‘[w]hat was not clearly established in this Circuit [before Moody I] was whether the State was required to offer immunity in the first place.’. . This is the proper lens through which to analyze this case, so I cannot find that the right had been clearly established before Moody I. The Supreme Court has not directly addressed how this right plays out in non-prosecutorial administrative proceedings, as I discussed above. Nor has our circuit addressed this previously. And looking to the other circuits demonstrates precisely why I cannot find that the right announced in Moody I was clearly established, for it is the subject of a circuit split among the various United States Courts of Appeals. . . . This split of authority, although not acknowledged by the majority, supports my conclusion that the law was not clearly established prior to Moody I. To saddle MGCB with the unjustified holding that this issue was clearly established before Moody I runs counter to the qualified immunity doctrine. I therefore respectfully dissent.”) Brenay v. Schartow, 709 F. App'x 331, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) (“If an officer initiates an arrest in a public place, but the suspect flees into a private one, the officer may give chase without stopping for a warrant. . . In other words, a suspect may not defeat an arrest by simply running inside. . . Whether the hot pursuit doctrine applies to this case depends on whether Brenay, Jr. was standing in a public place when Officer Sierras told him that he was under arrest. We know that Brenay, Jr. was standing in the foyer, six inches from the open doorway, for most of his interaction with the officers. The Supreme Court has said that a person who stands in his front doorway stands in a public place because he is ‘as exposed to public view, speech, hearing, and touch as if [he] had been standing completely outside [his] house.’ . . . But this circuit has not addressed whether a person who opens his door voluntarily to talk to police loses his reasonable expectation of privacy within the meaning of Santana. Our sister circuits are split on the issue. . . . And how the analysis might change when the person is standing six inches back from the doorway is even less settled. If this appeal came down to these questions, it would be easy. Government officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless ‘existing precedent ... placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . With so many answers outstanding, how Santana would apply to this case is hardly ‘beyond debate.’ That the officers violated the Brenays’ constitutional rights when they entered the Brenays’ home would not be clearly established. Unfortunately for Officer Sierras, the hot pursuit doctrine may not apply because Brenay, Jr. may have ended his interaction with the police before Officer Sierras told him he was under arrest. . . . Unless and until Officer Sierras initiated an arrest, the Brenays were free to shut the door and walk away.”)

Kulpa for Kulpa v. Cantea, 708 F. App’x 846, ____ (6th Cir. 2017) (“Cantea argues that even if his conduct was objectively unreasonable, the law’s contours were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation with respect to the restraint of pretrial detainees. The gist of his argument is that because the events in this case took place before the Supreme Court adopted the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley, no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against pretrial detainees. At the time of Kulpa’s death in October 2011, we evaluated a pretrial detainee’s excessive-force claim by asking ‘whether the force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.’ . . . Our pre-Kingsley caselaw put Cantea on notice ‘that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . Champion, decided seven years before Kulpa’s death, clearly articulated that driving heavy pressure into a prone, handcuffed, incapacitated detainee’s back was constitutionally impermissible because it posed a serious risk of asphyxiation to the arrestee and was unnecessary to protect the officers. . . . Although Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a pretrial detention center. Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2011 that ‘pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued.’ . . . Cantea argues that—notwithstanding Champion’s clear admonition about this precise conduct—the law permitted him to plant significant weight into a prone, handcuffed detainee’s back so long as he lacked malicious intent. For the reasons explained above, however, sufficient evidence exists that Cantea acted with malicious intent, given the extent of Kulpa’s injury, the minimal threat Kulpa posed to officer safety, and Cantea’s application of unnecessary force. In addition, as the Seventh Circuit recently explained, to buy Cantea’s argument ‘we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.’ Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 833 (7th Cir. 2015). As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the ‘amount of force that was used’ must be roughly proportionate to the ‘need for the application of force.’”).

Mills v. Barnard, 869 F.3d 473, 486-87 (6th Cir. 2017) (“In holding that Mills sufficiently pleaded his claims of fabrication of evidence, suppression of evidence, and malicious prosecution, we determine that at this time qualified immunity is not warranted. Again, in the factually similar Gregory case, we stated that it was clearly established by at least 1992 that knowing fabrication of evidence violates constitutional rights. . . Brady violations are, of course, clearly established violations of constitutional rights. And, as we stated recently, it is also clear that ‘individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has “made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff” by, for example, “knowingly or recklessly” making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.’”)

Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 478, 485-88 (6th Cir. 2017) (“The issue we face is whether periodically conducting group strip searches when the number of jail inmates waiting to be processed makes individual searches imprudent constitutes a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. Under the facts of this case, we answer that question ‘no’ and therefore hold that the jail official who conducted the group searches, defendant Terri Graham, is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . To summarize, on one hand, the group strip searches plaintiff endured in the Registry were especially intrusive; on the other hand, defendants have asserted a legitimate penological justification for periodically conducting the searches. Typically, we would proceed to balance the nature of the intrusion against the penological justification to determine whether the searches were unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. However, we need not go that far in order to determine that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects a constitutional tortfeasor from personal liability unless the contours of the constitutional right she violated ‘were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . The dispositive inquiry, ‘undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, [and] not as a broad general proposition,’ is ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . Nowhere is that specificity as important as in the Fourth Amendment context, where, under the governing ad-hoc interest-balancing test, ‘[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’ . . . Because ‘case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests ... infrequently will provide the “fair notice” that qualified-immunity precedent requires,’ . . . ‘[c]ourts generally accord public officials wide latitude (for qualified-immunity purposes) when the constitutionality of their acts comes down to the subtleties of interest balancing[.]’ . . . Thus, it is imperative that plaintiff rely on a decision that ‘squarely governs’ the outcome of the case. . . . That she cannot do. . . . Both Stoudemire and Williams are distinguishable in one important respect: in both cases, there was no penological justification for the particular searches at issue. This critical difference makes Stoudemire and Williams poor templates for declaring the particularized right at issue in this case—freedom from a group strip search supported by a legitimate penological justification—clearly established. . . . Regardless of how the balancing actually plays out, one thing is clear: Stoudemire and Williams could not have predicted the result since neither case involved penological justifications to weigh against the nature of the intrusion. To put it in more descriptive terms: it is easy enough to predict how scales with one hundred apples on one end will balance out, but it is far more difficult to predict how many oranges must be added to the other side to bring it to equipoise. Tasked with making that second prediction, Graham would have found no clues in ‘apples-only’ cases like Stoudemire and Williams. The dissent starts with the wrong question. It asks whether our case law clearly establishes Officer Graham’s justification for the group searches as a legitimate one. . . But that’s not how qualified immunity works. To overcome an officer’s request for immunity, the plaintiff must show that the ‘right’ she seeks to vindicate is clearly established, not that the officer’s justification is not clearly established. . . The issue is the right to be free from a group strip search where the officer has an administrative need to process a large quantity of inmates at one time. The cases fail to address this situation, and so the right is not (and was not) clearly established. In focusing on only one half of the right at issue, the dissent inverts the burden, leaving the officer, rather than the plaintiff, in need of clearly established law to succeed. The dissent also focuses much of its energy on a question we do not address: whether the searches violate the Fourth Amendment. Its key points—that the jail later changed (or clarified) its policy, that Officer Graham had other alternatives available to her, and that she could have anticipated the situation and planned accordingly—all fail to address whether the law at the time clearly established the searches as Fourth Amendment violations. The absence of a decision that ‘squarely governs’ this situation is particularly detrimental to plaintiff’s claim because, when the constitutional test is one of interest-balancing, the point at which the constitutional shades into the unconstitutional will necessarily be gray. . . Qualified immunity exists to give public officials breathing room to make close calls when the issue is not black-and-white. . . And this breathing room is especially appropriate when the legal standard is flexible and heavily dependent on on-the-ground judgment calls, as it is in this context. . . . Strip searches, even when conducted in the most private circumstances, are intrusive. But in the absence of bright lines and per se prohibitions, whether and when to subject inmates to increasingly intrusive searches depends on the facts confronting the corrections official in each particular case. For these reasons, we need not conduct the Fourth Amendment analysis to its completion in order to conclude that Graham is entitled to qualified immunity. Neither Stoudemire, nor Williams, nor any other case, would have put Graham on notice that conducting group strip searches when the volume of inmates made individual searches imprudent was unreasonable. Thus, regardless of whether Graham, in fact, violated the Fourth Amendment, no reasonable officer would have known that at the time. We therefore hold, as the district court did, that defendant Graham is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 498-500 (6th Cir. 2017) (Clay, J., dissenting) (“The issue as the majority frames it is whether our cases clearly establish that a group strip search conducted to expedite access to medical treatment violates the Fourth Amendment. However, that is definitively not the issue in this case. Rather, the true issue is whether the justification provided by Graham sufficiently demonstrates a special, exigent, or emergency circumstance which necessitated that such an invasive and humiliating jail intake process be conducted in the presence of others who had no reason to view such things. . . . Because the three Registry group strip searches violated Plaintiff’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would hold that Graham is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Miller v. Maddox, No. 17-5021, 2017 WL 3298570, at *7 (6th Cir. Aug. 3, 2017) (“Maddox spends a considerable portion of his brief illustrating why it is not clear that he should be liable for malicious prosecution, thus reasoning that he is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, his claim that the contours of our jurisprudence concerning malicious prosecution are not entirely clear misses the point. Our inquiry is whether Maddox’s alleged actions—arresting and detaining Miller based on false pretenses and then seeking an arrest warrant based on these false statements—violated Miller’s clearly established constitutional rights. We conclude that they did.”)

Darrah v. Krisher, 865 F.3d 361, 374 (6th Cir. 2017) (“The first inquiry of the qualified-immunity analysis asks ‘whether plaintiff has alleged facts which, when assumed to be true, show that the defendants’ conduct violated a constitutional right.’ . . . This inquiry ‘collapses into the analysis of whether [Darrah] has produced sufficient evidence to show that [Defendants] were deliberately indifferent to [Darrah’s] medical needs under the subjective component’ of the deliberate-indifference standard. . . . We have already concluded that a jury could so find. Thus, we turn to the question of whether the right was clearly established. For a right to be clearly established, ‘[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . Further, we are not required to ‘find a case in which “the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,”’ but, ‘in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness must be apparent.’ . . . Initially, ‘[t]he proposition that deliberate indifference to a prisoner’s medical needs can amount to a constitutional violation has been well-settled since Estelle in 1976.’ . . . Furthermore, we have already noted that this Circuit’s precedent is clear that neglecting a prisoner’s medical need and interrupting a prescribed plan of treatment, even for a relatively short period, can constitute a constitutional violation. . . . Thus, it was ‘clearly established’ in 2011, at the time of Darrah’s transfer to MCI, that neglecting to provide a prisoner with needed medication, choosing to prescribe an arguably less efficacious treatment method, and continuing on a treatment path that was clearly ineffective could constitute a constitutional violation.”)

Guy v. Nashville, No. 16-6100, 2017 WL 1476896, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Apr. 25, 2017) (not reported) (“Taking a different tack on appeal, Romines argues that this right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although this argument was not made in the district court, we exercise our discretion to consider the issue because it is a legal question within our jurisdiction and resolution of the defendant’s asserted qualified-immunity defense would further the progress of the litigation. . . . The essence of this argument is that the use of force in this case occurred prior to the Supreme Court’s adoption of the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley. It is true that there was disagreement among the circuits prior to Kingsley about whether a claim of excessive force ‘brought by a pretrial detainee must satisfy the subjective standard or only the objective standard.’ . . . But, a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity ‘simply because the courts have not ‘agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.’ Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) (alteration in original) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202-03 (2001)). Rather, the question under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis ‘is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . . Although there need not be a case directly on point, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . The right must not be defined at a ‘high level of generality,’ and the ‘dispositive question is “whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.”’. . . At the time of the use-of-force incident in September 2013, this court applied analogous standards to excessive-force claims brought under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . That is, under either amendment the question was whether the use of force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. . . . The force need not have been absolutely necessary, but we asked in Griffin ‘whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary.’. . . In Griffin, this court held that the prison officials’ use of a leg-sweep maneuver to gain control over a pretrial detainee who created a disturbance, resisted being moved, and struggled as two officers tried to guide her away from a nurse’s station did not violate this standard. . . . In Williams, prison officials used a chemical agent and assault team on an inmate who was ordered to ‘pack up’ his cell and responded by asking, ‘What for, sir?’ Williams v. Curtin, 631 F.3d 380, 384 (6th Cir. 2011). We concluded in Williams that the facts, if true, could permit a finding that the use of force was unnecessary, was not applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, and was possibly motivated by malicious purpose. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have been on notice in September 2013 that use of a chemical agent on a non-threatening pretrial detainee who did not comply with the officer’s verbal orders and then passively resisted an open-handed escort by hesitating and stopping to turn to ask again about seeing a nurse would amount to constitutionally excessive force. The denial of qualified immunity with respect to this claim was not error.”)

Evans v. Plummer, 687 F. App’x 434, ____ (6th Cir. 2017) (“In sum, Evans ‘fail[s] to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Feehan] was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. . . Thus, ‘in the light of pre-existing law,’ it was not apparent that pointing a taser at Evans violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . We therefore reverse the denial of qualified immunity to Feehan.”)

Littlejohn v. Myers, 684 F. App’x 563, ____ (6th Cir. 2017) (“Myers’ conclusion that Littlejohn constituted a threat rests entirely on a misplaced belief that Littlejohn was armed, and that he previously attempted a robbery. But at the moment that he was shot, it is hard to see what threat of serious harm Littlejohn posed to anyone in the alley. Upon resisting arrest by merely bucking his hips and evading Myers’ grasp, Littlejohn never explicitly threatened Myers, never reached for a weapon, and never attempted to strike the officer. Instead, he immediately began to run. During his flight, Littlejohn did not reach to his side or make any comparable gesture that may have given a reasonable officer the impression that Littlejohn posed a serious threat. And the facts indicate that no one beside Myers was in the alley—removing any threat to an innocent bystander. Consequently, we conclude that a reasonable officer would not have exercised deadly force under the circumstances because Littlejohn did not constitute a threat to either the officer or to any bystanders. . . . Our conclusion is further buttressed by the fact Myers never warned Littlejohn that he might shoot, as required by Garner when feasible under the circumstances. . . . Consequently, we agree that under Littlejohn’s version of the facts, Myers violated Littlejohn’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The district court held that an officer who employs deadly force against a fleeing suspect without reason to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of serious physical harm to himself or others constitutes an excessive force violation. In so doing, the district court relied upon this Circuit’s 2007 decision, Bougress v. Mattingly, to say such a right was clearly established. The aforementioned case clearly establishes a constitutional violation when an officer shoots a fleeing suspect in the back without a basis for believing that the suspect poses an imminent threat, regardless of the previous felony the suspect committed. . . . As we have previously explained, Littlejohn did not pose a threat to the officer or to any innocent bystanders. Accordingly, a reasonable officer in Myers’ position would know that the use of deadly force was not authorized.”) Middaugh v. City of Three Rivers, 684 F. App’x 522, 529-30 (6th Cir. 2017), on remand from Piper v. Middaugh, 136 S. Ct. 2408 (2016) (per curiam) (vacating and remanding for further consideration in light of Mullenix) (“In light of this record, we affirm as a matter of law the district court’s conclusion that the Officers acted unreasonably in violation of the Middaugh’s Fourth Amendment rights. See Cochran, 656 F.3d at 308 (noting that “police officers [who] take an active role in a seizure or eviction” generally “are not entitled to qualified immunity ... when there is neither a specific court order permitting the officers’ conduct nor any exigent circumstance in which the government’s interest would outweigh the individual’s interest in his property”). . . . In sum, Mullenix instructs that the qualified immunity inquiry must be formulated not based on general principles, but rather on officers’ specific conduct, especially in the Fourth Amendment context. Whether the Middaugh’s rights were clearly established depends on the ‘objective legal reasonableness’ of the Officers’ specific conduct. . . . This fact-specific analysis asks whether reasonable officials in the Officers’ positions could have believed that their conduct was lawful at the time. . . . We look to the totality of the circumstances here in light of then-existing precedent. For example, although we find the Officers’ conduct here more similar to the physical interventions in Cochran and Hensley than the distant observation in Coleman, the conduct in both Cochran and Hensley includes some substantive distinctions from the Officers’ conduct here. In those two cases, the officers engaged in direct confrontations with the plaintiffs. The officials in Cochran threatened to arrest the plaintiff, and in Hensley an official brandished his handgun, broke a car window, and pulled the plaintiff out of her car. Although the Officers here came onto the Middaugh’s property, parked a patrol car between the Buick and the Middaugh’s home, and stayed until Chrystal left with the Buick, the Officers neither threatened arrest nor used force. They had no direct interaction with the Plaintiffs. In light of the analysis in Mullenix, we find it not beyond debate that reasonable officers in their position could have believed their conduct was lawful under then-existing precedent. It is important to note that Mullenix does ‘not require a case directly on point,’ 136 S. Ct. at 308, and ‘the very action in question’ need not have ‘previously been held unlawful,’ Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 739 (2002). For example, ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’. . . Mullenix does not undermine our circuit’s longstanding holding that ‘an action’s unlawfulness can be apparent from direct holdings, from specific examples described as prohibited, or from the general reasoning that a court employs.’. . However, there is sufficient daylight between the Officers’ conduct here and the conduct in Cochran and Hensley that those precedents may not ‘apply with obvious clarity to [this] specific conduct.’. . Therefore, Officers Piper and Gipson are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 581-83 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) (“[E]ven if King did impliedly concede probable cause by signing the Alford plea, that does not retroactively prove that there had been probable cause to support King’s prosecution all along. . . .Nothing in Broadus helps Defendants to use King’s vacated Alford plea to prove, at summary judgment, that no reasonable trier of fact could find a lack of probable cause to support King’s prosecution. Further, once the strength of the Alford plea is removed from the district court’s probable-cause analysis, a genuine issue of material fact remains as to whether the ‘facts and circumstances’ known to Harwood would be ‘sufficient to lead an ordinarily prudent person to believe’ that King was guilty of murdering Breeden. . . . [I]n light of the fact that all reasonable inferences must be given to King at the summary-judgment stage, the district court erred in holding that King would be unable to prove the requisite lack of probable cause to win her malicious-prosecution claim. . . .[I]ndividuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a defendant who has ‘made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff’ by, for example, ‘knowingly or recklessly’ making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants. . . .Though our ultimate ruling is based on the written record, Defendants’ arguments at oral argument reflect just how much of the dispute before us consists of contested facts. Summary judgment is therefore inappropriate for disposing of King’s malicious-prosecution claim against Harwood. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment for Harwood on the issue of Harwood’s qualified immunity from suit.”)

Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 992-94 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 738 (2018) (“The second prong resolves this case. Because no case clearly established the unlawfulness of the decisions made during Omar’s arrest and detention, the officers involved are entitled to qualified immunity. Yes, ‘a pretrial detainee’s right to medical treatment for a serious medical need has been established since at least 1987.’. . . And yes, that right encompasses physiological and psychiatric ailments. . . . But these principles do not suffice on their own. . . . The Supreme Court recently reminded us that a plaintiff must identify a case with a similar fact pattern that would have given ‘fair and clear warning to officers’ about what the law requires. [White v. Pauly] The district court, we note, did not have the benefit of Pauly. But we do, and accordingly we must follow its lead. Immunity protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . .Arrington-Bey has not pointed to, and we have not found, any case like this one—a case showing to ‘all but the plainly incompetent’ that the officers at the scene immediately needed to seek medical treatment or that the jailers had to do the same once he arrived at the prison. . . .Arrington-Bey’s case citations are at least one step removed from this fact pattern. We begin with, and could end with, the reality that she points to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case that requires officers to take a delusional arrestee like Omar to a hospital rather than a jail. Each of Arrington-Bey's cases fails to address this point, and not one involves remotely comparable facts. . . .In short, no clearly established law, here or anywhere else from what we've seen, required the arresting officers to drive Omar to a hospital rather than the jail under these circumstances. . . .Even if the jail officers knew that Omar was bipolar and delusional, no clearly established law required them to do more than what they did: They kept him in seclusion for everyone's safety, waited until he was calm to feed him and book him, asked him about any psychiatric diagnoses during the medical screening, and after eight hours of detention uncuffed him and released him from his cell to make a call to be released on bail. Because a reasonable officer in the situations confronted by officers Honsaker, Ellis, Chow, Hill, Lee, Mudra, Sindone, and Leonardi could have believed their treatment of Omar was lawful, they each are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441 (6th Cir. 2017) ("While Scott was being removed from a cell for disruptive conduct, he stepped towards Lyons in close quarters, unhandcuffed and with clenched fists. We have not found other Supreme Court or Circuit precedent that would have put Lyons on notice that his takedown was an excessive use of force in this situation. Because Scott has not met his burden on this inquiry, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Lyons on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Scott v. Kent County, 679 F. App'x 435, 441-42 (6th Cir. 2017) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("I disagree with the majority that Lyons is entitled to qualified immunity. There is ample evidence that 'the right which was violated was clearly established' in our circuit. . . . We have held that an officer's conduct is not objectively reasonable where he performs a 'takedown' of an individual already in custody, who, despite being argumentative and possibly intoxicated, was not actually aggressive against any officers. . . .Although the video confirms that Scott was unruly and yelling in the holding cell, there is no indication that he was being physically aggressive toward any officers.")

Hermansen v. Thompson, No. 16-6197, 2017 WL 438225, at *3-4 (6th Cir. Feb. 1, 2017) (not published) ("As recently as last month, the Supreme Court unanimously and insistently reaffirmed its repeated admonition that, for purposes of qualified immunity, 'clearly established law' is not to be defined 'at a high level of generality,' but must be defined in a 'particularized' sense. . . . The Court reiterated that although 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to government officials, their conduct is protected by qualified immunity unless its unlawfulness was 'apparent' or 'obvious' in light of pre-existing law. . . .Applying this teaching, we find the instant record devoid of support, in fact or law, for the notion that it should have been obvious to defendants that their provision of kosher food products to Hermansen, prepared in a separate kitchen facility, was nonetheless violative of his First Amendment free exercise rights because the same utensils used to prepare or serve otherwise approved meat products had also been used to prepare or serve otherwise approved dairy products, at some point, without having first been kashered and certified by a rabbi. Hermansen contends these defendants are without excuse because they were on notice of the Froman case, where Kosher Meal Program Guidelines were implemented by agreement at KSR as early as 2010. Yet, even if one or more of the individual defendants was actually aware of the guidelines implemented by agreement at KSR, the fact remains that no court had, in authoritative precedent, interpreted the First Amendment as requiring strict compliance with the guidelines, whether at KSR or elsewhere. Even though the Froman agreement was enforced by district court order, it never ripened into a precedential ruling on the merits of the free exercise claim. The Froman agreement simply did not become precedent defining the ‘clearly established law.’ Accordingly, there was no error in the district court’s ruling that defendants are protected from damages liability by qualified immunity and are therefore entitled to summary judgment on Hermansen’s First Amendment claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.”)

Courtright v. City of Battle Creek, 839 F.3d 513, 520 (6th Cir. 2016) (“Having failed to establish that Courtright’s factual allegations did not plausibly allege the violation of a constitutional right, the defendants argue, in the alternative, that it was not clearly established that handcuffing without physically injuring the suspect constitutes excessive force. The premise of this argument is flawed. As discussed, Courtright did suffer physical injury: he suffered pain as a result of the manner in which he was handcuffed. Moreover, the relevant clearly established right in our circuit is ‘freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing.’ . . . ‘Requiring any more particularity than this would contravene the Supreme Court’s explicit rulings that neither a “materially similar,” “fundamentally similar,” or “case directly on point”—let alone a factually identical case—is required, and that the specific acts or conduct at issue need not previously have been found unconstitutional for a right to be clearly established law.’ . . . Therefore, we affirm the district court’s order denying the motion to dismiss the excessive-force claim based on qualified immunity.”)

Stamm v. Miller, 657 F. App’x 492 (6th Cir. 2016) (“We have held that ‘[i]t has been settled law for a generation that, under the Fourth Amendment, “w]here a suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so.”’ . . . Though Walker was decided after the events giving rise to this case, its principle was not new, as we explicitly noted. In that case, which involved a collision similar to the one here, we noted that ‘[i]t is only common sense—and obviously so—that intentionally ramming a motorcycle with a police cruiser involves the application of potentially deadly force.’ . . . Thus, it is clearly established law that an officer may not use his police vehicle to intentionally hit a motorcycle unless the suspect on the motorcycle poses a threat to the officer or others. The evidence, construed in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm, indicates a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Under Mrs. Stamm’s version of the facts, Miller intended to block Stamm’s passage with his police cruiser, causing the deadly collision. As the district court observed, the risk to others at the time of Miller’s use of force was minimal, as there were no other vehicles in sight, and Stamm’s motorcycle posed little threat to Miller, who was inside a much-larger vehicle. Because the facts as interpreted in the light most favorable to Mrs. Stamm indicate a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, and material facts are in dispute, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Miller”).

Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 680-81 (6th Cir. 2016) (“The head-grabbing incident here mirrors the head-grabbing incident in Domingo and involves far less illegitimate force than the act of binding a student to a gurney and gagging him. What was true in Domingo is true here. While Turbiak’s ‘educational and disciplinary methods ... may have been inappropriate’ and ‘insensitive,’ they are not ‘unconstitutional.’ . . . The Fourteenth Amendment’s right to be free from excessive force may include, we have said, protection from physical force that causes only psychological injury. . . . But we have never said that purely psychological bullying can suffice to shock the conscience. And we certainly have not said so with clarity that ‘place[s] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . That necessarily means that the right Gohl asserts is not clearly established, making Turbiak eligible for qualified immunity.”)

Gohl v. Livonia Public Schools School Dist., 836 F.3d 672, 698 (6th Cir. 2016) (Clay, J., dissenting) (“By fundamentally misapplying well-settled summary judgment standards, ignoring some of the most important facts, and disregarding evidence favorable to Gohl, the majority reveals how result-oriented it is in attempting to reach its own conclusions. The majority’s approach to this case sidesteps the Supreme Court’s clear direction that when reviewing a summary judgment decision, an appellate court must examine the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw all inferences in that party’s favor. This basic and fundamental principle of civil procedure seems lost on the majority in this case. All that matters here is that Gohl has presented enough evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact on each of her claims, and as a result, her case should go to a jury. For these reasons, this case should be reversed and remanded. I respectfully dissent.”)

Gavitt v. Born, 835 F.3d 623, 648 (6th Cir. 2016) (“In Osborne, 557 U.S. at 68, the Supreme Court noted that ‘nothing in our precedents’ suggests that the prosecutor’s obligation to disclose Brady material to the defendant before trial continues after the defendant is convicted and the case is closed. Gavitt has failed to cite any contrary authority. To the extent due process could be deemed to include such an obligation, it is not yet a matter of clearly established law and defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

D.E. v. Doe, 834 F.3d 723, 729, 733 (6th Cir. 2016) (Keith, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I cannot join the majority’s interpretation of the Fourth Amendment. In holding that Customs and Border Protection (“CBP”) officers may, without reasonable suspicion, search individuals who are not in the process of crossing an international border, the majority stretches the ‘border search’ exception to its breaking point. . . . While I am inclined to conclude that the right was clearly established, three other judges (the two on this panel, and the district court judge) have concluded—for whatever reason—that our unpublished decision in Humphries can be read as sanctioning the conduct in this case. While I disagree for the reasons explained above, Humphries’ supposed muddling of the waters in this area compels me to conclude that it is less likely that a reasonable official would have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right. See Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) (“If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation, then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right.”). Therefore, I concur in the judgment of the majority to dismiss D.E.’s civil rights complaint.”)

Schattilly, ex rel A.F. v. Daugharty, 656 F. App’x 123, ___ (6th Cir. 2016)(“With respect to her first claim, Schattilly has not identified any cases that support her contention that, in May 2011, it was clearly established that interviewing a juvenile about suspected parental abuse or neglect without parental consent violates a parent’s First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights. This is not surprising. First, these rights are typically grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment, not the First Amendment. . . And second, we recently held that as of January 2011, this right—as it pertains to the Fourteenth Amendment—was not clearly established. See Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 842 (6th Cir. 2015). . . . Additionally, in an unpublished case, we held that, as of January 2010, it was not clearly established that interviewing a child in an abuse-and-neglect investigation without the parent’s consent violated the parent’s Fourteenth Amendment rights. Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App’x 519, 530 (6th Cir. 2014). Schattilly does not provide any bases on which to distinguish Barber or Brent, nor does she point to any developments in the law from January 2011 to May 2011 that would warrant a different conclusion. . . Accordingly, we hold that officials do not violate clearly established First Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights by interviewing a child about suspected abuse or neglect by the parent without the parent’s consent.”)

Williams v. Morgan, 652 F. App’x 365, 374-75 (6th Cir. 2016) (“Officer Morgan also argues that the prohibition against this force was not clearly established. That is, under the facts established for purposes of this appeal, Officer Morgan is contending that he had no forewarning that it would be improper for him to accost a 13-year old girl, without provocation or resistance, use his size advantage to place her physically against a wall; verbally menace or threaten her while he twisted her arm behind her back and lifted her off the floor until he broke that arm; and then maintain pressure on that broken arm, despite her pleas for relief, as he forced her down the hall to the principal’s office with further verbal threats. We disagree. This was clearly established. See Norton v. Stille, 526 F. App’x 509, 513-14 (6th Cir. 2013) (holding that the prohibition against gratuitous force was clearly established as of October 2010). But, even lacking a specific case on point, we conclude that this conduct, as alleged, was so gratuitous that Officer Morgan was nonetheless ‘on notice that [this] conduct violate[d] established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ See Hope, 536 U.S. at 741. Officer Morgan is not entitled to qualified immunity on this basis.”)

Smith v. City of Wyoming, 821 F.3d 697, 711 (6th Cir. 2016) (“On the facts developed thus far, taken in a light favorable to Smith, the officers violated her Fourth Amendment rights when they made a warrantless entry into her home on March 9, 2012. The Supreme Court has consistently validated the right to retreat into one’s home and avoid contact with the police. . . Any reasonable officer would have understood that to enter a private home after being expressly told the occupant could not speak with him, in the course of a routine child welfare check, flies in the face of this clearly established law. Qualified immunity does not protect the officers from liability for the constitutional violation under these circumstances. We therefore vacate the entry of judgment for the officers on this claim.”)

Rapp v. Putman, 644 F. App'x 621, 627-28 (6th Cir. 2016) (“To state a valid Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim, a plaintiff must establish four elements: (1) a criminal prosecution was initiated against the plaintiff and the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceeding, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial seizure; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff’s favor. . . . The sole basis for plaintiff’s retaliation claim against Poston is his refusal to intervene and stop the prosecution. Even reading plaintiff’s complaint generously, it alleges a merely ‘passive[] or neutral []’ role in the prosecution, insufficient to state a claim for malicious prosecution. . . Finally, by far the most evident deficiency in plaintiff’s complaint is his failure to allege the third element, a ‘deprivation of liberty.’ . . Nowhere in his complaint does plaintiff allege that he was ‘seized’ or otherwise detained following the issuance of the citation. . . .The closest he comes is alleging that he ‘was subject to the authority of the 54–B District Court or appellate Courts as a direct and proximate result of the conduct of Defendants.’ This allegation echoes Justice Ginsburg’s ‘continuing seizure’ doctrine from her concurrence in Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266 (1994), in which she argued that ‘a defendant [released pretrial] is ... indeed “seized” for trial, so long as he is bound to appear in court and answer the state’s charges.’ . . However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has adopted the ‘continuing seizure’ doctrine. . . Thus, even if we assume that being ‘subject to the authority of the [court]’ constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure, defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the particularized right alleged—the right to be free from a ‘continuing seizure’ by virtue of a pending criminal charge—is not clearly established. . . .Having failed to adequately allege several elements of his malicious-prosecution claim, plaintiff has failed to show that defendants violated his constitutional rights. As a result, the district court was correct to dismiss the malicious-prosecution claim, not because it was untimely, but because defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Brown v. Chapman, 814 F.3d 447, 460-62 (6th Cir. 2016) (“The heart of the parties’ dispute is over the third factor—whether Brown was actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. . . .The parties’ dispute is resolved by the constraints placed on this court at this point in the litigation. We are obligated to take the plaintiff’s facts as true and make all reasonable inferences from those facts in her favor. Accordingly, for the purposes of summary judgment, we assume that the facts show that Brown broke away from the officers in order to avoid further injury, that he was standing still at the time Chapman tasered him, and that therefore Brown was not actively resisting or evading arrest. Thus, a jury could find that Chapman’s actions were not objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting him. . . . Mindful of the need to define the right narrowly, . . . we frame this question as whether Brown’s right not to be tasered, after having broken away from police officers but while not threatening others or actively resisting arrest, was clearly established as of December 31, 2010. . . .In conducting this analysis, two lines of cases emerge. The first line of cases has held that there is no clearly established right not to be tasered when a suspect is actively resisting arrest. . . .The second line of cases has held that an individual’s right to be free from a taser is clearly established when the individual is not actively resisting arrest or is already detained. . . .The right articulated above fits squarely within this second line of cases: as of December 31, 2010, it was clearly established that tasing a non-threatening suspect who was not actively resisting arrest constituted excessive force. Accordingly, Chapman is not entitled to summary judgment regarding the claimed Fourth Amendment violation based on his use of a taser.”)

Gardner v. Evans, 811 F.3d 843, 846-48 (6th Cir. 2016) (“First, we address whether a constitutional violation occurred. The Tenants argue that the Inspectors violated their due process rights by failing to provide constitutionally sufficient notice of their ability to appeal the red-tag evictions. . . . In response, the Inspectors assert that the telephone number and the offer to answer questions was sufficient to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . . They also assert that, because the Lansing Housing and Premises Code was extant and available to the public, the Tenants had constructive notice of the appeals process. . . . The district court agreed with the Tenants, holding that our precedent in Flatford clearly established that direct and clear notice of an appeals process is necessary to satisfy the constitutional notice requirement. . . . For purposes of deciding this case, we need not determine whether the red-tags provided by the Inspectors meet the constitutional notice standard that we have just outlined. Even if we assume, without deciding, that the Tenants are correct and that the red-tags were constitutionally infirm, the Tenants cannot satisfy the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether this constitutional notice requirement was clearly established. . . . Flatford stands for the principle that the tenant is entitled to the same notice that is afforded to the landlord. But it does not clearly establish the particularity or specificity required for such notice. A diversity of precedent highlights this general lack of clarity regarding the notice requirement for a post-deprivation appeals process. . . . Flatford did not clearly establish that a notice of eviction must include an explicit reference to the availability of any post-deprivation appeals process and the manner in such an appeal may be pursued. The case law is not so clear on this point as to render the Inspectors’ actions unreasonable.”)

Snow v. Nelson, 634 F. App’x 151, ____ (6th Cir. 2015) (“Here, the State did not secure a criminal conviction by improperly withholding exculpatory evidence. On the contrary, the record is clear that the State was complying with discovery requests. Moreover, there is no question that before a plea was discussed or trial dates set, Snow’s attorney learned of the allegedly exculpatory information. Perhaps Snow would have been released earlier had the alleged misidentification come to light sooner, but he can have no complaints about the ultimate outcome of his case. The fifty-two days Snow spent in jail awaiting a plea or a trial is simply not the type of deprivation Brady claims are intended to remedy. Even were we to recognize a Brady claim in this context, defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. As we held in Robertson v. Lucas, our precedent does not support any clearly established right of criminal defendants to receive exculpatory Brady material before plea bargaining. . . . There, the court found that while every reasonable officer ‘would know that they were under an obligation to present Brady material to the prosecutors in time for its effective use at trial,’ the officers were under ‘no clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining.’ . . Here, Snow’s attorney was aware of the alleged misidentification prior to any plea bargaining. Thus, defendants are well within the ambit of qualified immunity.”)

Devlin v. Kalm, 630 F. App’x 534, 538-39 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Devlin also must show that his First Amendment rights in this setting were clearly established when the agency fired him on July 24, 2008. This is rarely an easy question given the fact-specific nature of Pickering-balancing inquiries, but Devlin satisfies the test in this instance. It was well established that Devlin’s speech on the regulation of tribes addressed a matter of public concern. . . And it was well established that he spoke outside the duties of his employment. . . As to the third question, our Pickering caselaw points in the same direction. It was well established by mid-2008 that Devlin’s speech ‘substantially involved matters of public concern’ and thus the officers had to ‘make a particularly strong showing that the employee’s speech interfered with workplace functioning before taking action.’ . . And a reasonable officer could not find that Devlin’s speech was sufficiently disruptive of the internal workplace—which Pickering balancing is primarily focused on—to lose protection. . . . In scenarios such as this one—where the violation of a constitutional right is ‘so obvious that a materially similar case would be unnecessary’—a case directly on point (which is lacking here) is not required. Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, 801 F.3d 630, 651–52 (6th Cir.2015). Devlin’s First Amendment rights were clearly established.”)

Stinebaugh v. City of Wapakoneta, 630 F. App’x 522, 531 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Rains and Krites argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because reasonable officials could have believed that Stinebaugh’s speech was not protected. We disagree. The district court properly found that reasonable officials in Rains’s and Krites’s positions could not have believed their conduct was lawful given the state of the law as it existed at the time of the events giving rise to this action. . . . Likewise, it is clearly established in this circuit that an off-duty public employee who speaks to city council members about city expenditures may be a private citizen for First Amendment purposes, even if those comments involve expenditures by his own agency or department. . . Thus, the district court properly denied qualified immunity.”)

Bible Believers v. Wayne Cnty., Mich., 805 F.3d 228, 252, 257-60 (6th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (“The Supreme Court, in Cantwell, Terminiello, Edwards, Cox, and Gregory, has repeatedly affirmed the principle that ‘constitutional rights may not be denied simply because of hostility to their assertion or exercise.’ . . . If the speaker’s message does not fall into one of the recognized categories of unprotected speech, . . . the message does not lose its protection under the First Amendment due to the lawless reaction of those who hear it. Simply stated, the First Amendment does not permit a heckler’s veto. In this Circuit, a modicum of confusion is understandable with respect to the prohibition against the heckler’s veto due to Glasson’s discussion of a good-faith affirmative defense. However, this defense is inconsistent with subsequent Supreme Court precedent, with the strict scrutiny that must be applied to content-based discrimination, and with the superseding affirmative defense to a § 1983 suit—qualified immunity. . . Therefore, to the extent that Glasson’s good-faith defense may be interpreted as altering the substantive duties of a police officer not to effectuate a heckler’s veto, it is overruled. . . . Whether Deputy Chiefs

Richardson and Jaafar can be held liable for civil damages is a separate question from whether their actions violated the Constitution. . . . Although Glasson spoke about a good-faith defense, qualified immunity—announced seven years after Glasson in Harlow v. Fitzgerald—is the presently available affirmative defense for government officials subject to liability under § 1983. . . . Deputy Chief Defendants Richardson and Jaafar contend that, ‘no “clearly established” law existed on the subject of correct law enforcement response to a situation where speakers may or may not be engaged in protected speech, the audience in proximity to the speech reacts violently, and the deputies do not have sufficient manpower to restrain the audience, to protect the speakers, and to ensure their own safety.’ . . . The Deputy Chiefs’ position is untenable and unsupported by the record. As is evident from the Supreme Court opinions detailed above, and as explicitly stated in Glasson, ‘[a] police officer has the duty not to ratify and effectuate a heckler’s veto.... Instead, he must take reasonable action to protect from violence persons exercising their constitutional rights.’ . . . Defendants were specifically put on notice of this requirement, insofar as the Bible Believers quoted this precise language in a letter that was sent to Wayne County. To the extent that Glasson’s discussion of a good-faith defense confused the issue of whether a heckler’s veto constitutes a constitutional violation, the facts and analysis in Glasson nonetheless alerted Defendants that removing a peaceful speaker, when the police have made no serious attempt to quell the lawless agitators, could subject them to liability. . . . Defendants emphasize the fact that Glasson involved an officer tearing up a sign in response to agitated hecklers, as opposed to officers removing a speaker in an attempt to quell an angry crowd that was actually engaged in violent retaliation. These distinctions are immaterial. The violence here was not substantial, much less overwhelming, and speech, whether it be oration or words written on a poster, is speech nonetheless. Moreover, this case was also about removing from view signs that were considered offensive by a group of hecklers—as Israel informed the Deputy Chiefs, his group was no longer preaching during the latter portion of the onslaught against them. Finally, it should be noted that Glasson involved a more compelling state interest—protection of the President—yet the officers’ actions were still deemed to be unreasonable. . . . Had the Bible Believers refused to leave, and consequently been arrested, charged, and convicted of disorderly conduct, the convictions could certainly be held invalid pursuant to Gregory. . . . The Bible Believers’ decision to comply with the police officers’ demands, under threat of arrest for disorderly conduct—as opposed to the speaker’s decision in Gregory to disregard the officer’s command—cannot stand for the proposition that there was no clearly established law as to whether the police may threaten to arrest a peaceful speaker in order to calm a hostile crowd of hecklers. . . . Gregory, like this case, involved protestors who used offensive language and, in response, were assaulted with debris by a violent crowd of hecklers. On facts such as these, state-sanctioned penalties for alleged breaches of the peace cannot withstand constitutional scrutiny.”)

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App’x 479, 484 (6th Cir. 2015) (“The legal question of immunity will ultimately depend on which version of the facts the jury finds most credible. Brandenburg v. Cureton, 882 F.2d 211, 216 (6th Cir.1989). Thus, we find as a matter of law that it is clearly established that the prison must provide adequate nutrition to prisoners, despite religious restrictions. Welch has demonstrated that his allegations—if accepted by a jury—give rise to a constitutional violation. He has therefore made Plumhoff's required showing to defeat defendants' claim of qualified immunity at this stage, and established a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the particular restricted diet in his case was so lacking as to violate this established right. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court's order denying qualified immunity.")

Welch v. Spaulding, 627 F. App'x 479, 484-88 (6th Cir. 2015) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("This qualified-immunity case presents two purely legal questions of constitutional interpretation. After taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—i.e., that the prisoner (Welch) received only 1,300 calories a day for the month of his religious fast—we must decide (1) whether administering such a diet violated the Constitution; and (2) if so, whether that violation was clearly established at the time of the fast. . . . The majority answered 'yes' to both questions, affirming the district court's denial qualified immunity. I would answer 'no' to both, because Welch has not met his burden of producing evidence that shows a constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. The majority, however, affirms the district judge's improper denial of qualified immunity—improper both because (A) Welch did not meet his burden of producing evidence that the officials violated the Constitution; and because (B) even if they did violate the Constitution, the right at issue was not clearly established. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . It all, then, boils down to this: The majority holds that the First Amendment requires a specific number of calories during a religious fast. That's the only possible way to understand its judgment. It doesn't matter that the lower number of calories didn't cause any substantial burden—none. All that matters is that the number of calories the plaintiff received was less than the other inmates or others in the plaintiff's age group. Lacking even an alleged substantial burden, Welch cannot make out a First Amendment violation. . . . As misguided as the majority's novel constitutional holding is, the error in its determination of the clearly established law is worse. Even assuming the defendants violated Welch's First Amendment right to a nutritionally adequate diet during a prison fast, how can we possibly hold that such a violation was clearly established? There is simply no way that 'every reasonable official would have understood' that administering a 1,300-calorie-per-day diet for thirty days during an inmate's religious fast—with no evident or even alleged adverse effects to the inmate—violates the First Amendment. . . . These officials should not be subject to personal liability because, if nothing else, Welch has not met his burden of showing that they violated a 'clearly established' constitutional right. . . . I've already gone through all the cases the majority cites, and none of them establishes anything more than the generalized right to a 'nutritionally adequate diet' during a religious fast. That was enough for the district court, and it's apparently enough for the majority, too. But it shouldn't be. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . Courts must instead define the law in a particularized sense, by looking for a body of law that 'squarely governs' the conduct at issue. . . . The majority's cited cases no more 'squarely govern' this case than Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), 'squarely governs' all excessive-force cases. . . . Indeed, until now, not one Sixth Circuit case has even allowed this kind of alleged violation to proceed to a jury. How, then, can the right be clearly established? The majority's telling silence on this issue—and its telling failure to even try to support its prong-two conclusion with caselaw—suffices to demonstrate its error. If anything is clearly established here, it's that this was not a clearly established constitutional violation. . . .To affirm on the ground that the defendants violated a clearly established First Amendment right is wrong both because of the startling lack of facts to prove such a violation and because of the even-more-startling lack of caselaw to clearly establish that right.”)

Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, Mich., 801 F.3d 630, 650-51 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Defendants contend that Delecke is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to each of the constitutional claims, but they fail to offer any analysis on this point, other than to say that Delecke’s actions did not offend the Constitution. This failure to address the clearly established prong of our inquiry is unsurprising given the complete absence of case law with remotely comparable fact patterns—a point, which at first glance, seems to weigh in favor of Delecke’s claim for qualified immunity. . . .However, ‘a case directly on point’ is not required to establish that the law is clearly established, Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083, 179 L.Ed.2d 1149 (2011), because ‘[s]ome violations of constitutional rights are so obvious that a materially similar case’ would be unnecessary, Hearring v. Sliowski, 712 F.3d 275, 280 (6th Cir.2013). At bottom, the dispositive inquiry is whether, at the time of injury, the law was ‘sufficiently clear [such] that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d]’ the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. . . .The allegations in this case, if proven, would constitute an obvious violation of Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights of which any reasonable official should have been aware. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the facts suggest that Delecke used his government post to harass and retaliate against Plaintiffs by causing tickets to be issued and by denying Plaintiffs the rights bestowed to them under their SALUs. It is fundamental that the right to be free of such retaliation, arbitrary and capricious state action, and disparate treatment with no rational basis is clearly established.”)

Baynes v. Cleland, 799 F.3d 600, 611-16 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2015) (“In Hope, the Supreme Court established that, for purposes of qualified immunity, the precise factual scenario need not have been found unconstitutional for it to be sufficiently clear to a reasonable official that his actions violate a constitutional right—that is, for the right to be ‘clearly established.’ . . .In fact, the Supreme Court determined that government officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. . . .To be sure, the Supreme Court also has also explained that generalizations and abstract propositions are insufficient to establish the law clearly. . . .Reading these cases together, the Supreme Court has made clear that the sine qua non of the ‘clearly established’ inquiry is ‘fair warning.’ . . .While it is apparent that courts should not define clearly established law at a high level of generality, it is equally apparent that this does not mean that ‘a case directly on point’ is required. . . .In fact, under Hope, a requirement that a prior case be ‘fundamentally’ or ‘materially’ similar to the present case would be too rigid an application of the clearly established inquiry. . . .Rather, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,’ al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, although the specific conduct need not have been found unconstitutional. . . .Our task, then, is to determine whether the contours of the right at issue have been made sufficiently clear to give a reasonable official fair warning that the conduct at issue was unconstitutional. This test has been applied, both explicitly and implicitly, in our own jurisprudence. . . .In applying this test, both pre- and post-Hope, we have found that freedom from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a clearly established right for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The extent of case law in this Circuit suffices to put a reasonable officer on notice that excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing is a constitutional violation under the Fourth Amendment. The cases in this Circuit place it beyond peradventure that such a right exists; thus, the law is sufficiently clear for the purpose of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. These cases define the right that is clearly established not at a high level of generality or on the basis of a broad historical proposition, . . . but rather, in a particularized context: excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing, a type of excessive force, is a type of Fourth Amendment violation, which, in turn, is a constitutional violation. This level of particularity in defining the constitutional right easily meets the standards set out by the Supreme Court, which requires that the contours of a right to be sufficiently clear under preexisting law. . . . Although the court first found the constitutional right at issue clearly established in this Circuit, in its subsequent pursuit of what it called a ‘more particularized inquiry,’ it then determined that the law had not been clearly established, essentially because no prior case presented the exact factual circumstances present in this case. The factual nuances the district court noted to distinguish Baynes’ case from this Court’s extensive precedent on unduly tight handcuffing amount to precisely the kind of rigidity the Supreme Court foreclosed in Hope. Hope was unequivocal in mandating that precise factual similarity is not required In this case, under the guise of determining whether the law regarding excessively forceful handcuffing is clearly established, the district court essentially made a determination of whether it believed that Deputy Cleland’s behavior was reasonable—in other words, whether the deputy should be liable for a claim of unduly tight or excessive handcuffing. But such a determination infringes on the province of the jury and is therefore improper. The trial court had already determined—appropriately so—that Baynes had adduced sufficient evidence to state a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive a motion for summary judgment. Indeed, Baynes had established already that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether the deputies acted objectively reasonably. Then, a few pages later, the district court decided that, based on its view of the facts, there was an ‘absence of ... egregious, abusive, or malicious conduct’ that ‘support[ed] the reasonableness of the deputy’s conduct.’ Such a determination is inappropriate under a ‘clearly established’ analysis. Once a plaintiff demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there has been a constitutional violation, by making out a claim of excessively forceful handcuffing sufficient to survive summary judgment, weighing the evidence and determining whether an officer should be liable are tasks exclusively for the jury. In this case, however, the district court turned the factual determinations best left to the jury into factors militating in favor of qualified immunity. That is not the role of the district court in analyzing the second prong of a qualified immunity analysis; rather, it is to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the allegedly unconstitutional conduct. As discussed, supra, while a right may not be ‘clearly established’ at a ‘high level of generality’ or by broad historical assertions, neither must the specific conduct at issue have been found unconstitutional for a reasonable officer to be on notice that the conduct is unconstitutional. Rather, the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer has fair warning. . . . Such is the case in the Sixth Circuit with respect to the law surrounding excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment. Because, in the Sixth Circuit, the right to be free from excessively forceful or unduly tight handcuffing under the Fourth Amendment is clearly established law, no more specificity in defining this right is required. We recognize, however, that the district court's error was based in part on reliance on our unpublished decisions in Fettes v. Hendershot, 375 F. App'x 528 (6th Cir.2010) and Lee v. City of Norwalk, Ohio, 529 F. App'x 778 (6th Cir.2013). We also note that the case of O'Malley v. City of Flint, 652 F.3d 662 (6th Cir.2011), would seem to disagree with our conclusion here.”).

Coley v. Lucas Cnty., Ohio, 799 F.3d 530, 540-41 (6th Cir. 2015) (“The key inquiry is whether a defendant claiming qualified immunity ‘was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.’ . . . The inquiry ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . We look first to Supreme Court decisions, then Sixth Circuit case law in order to determine if the right claimed was clearly established when the events occurred. . . . The plaintiff ‘has the burden of showing that a right is clearly established,’ while the defendant ‘carries the burden of showing that the challenged act was objectively reasonable in light of the law existing at the time.’ . . . At the time of the incident, pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued. . . . Under the Fourteenth, Fourth, or Eighth Amendments, assaults on subdued, restrained and nonresisting detainees, arrestees, or convicted prisoners are impermissible. . . . The facts alleged show that Schmeltz assaulted the fully restrained Benton so that he fell and hit his head on the cement floor. Schmeltz then attempted to cover up the assault by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators after Benton’s death. These actions reasonably lead us to conclude that Schmeltz violated clearly established law and was ‘on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.’ . . . Schmeltz’s argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law fails. . . . Having determined that Gray violated Benton’s constitutional rights, we turn again to whether the right in question—to be free from deadly physical force such as a chokehold while fully restrained—was clearly established, providing Gray notice that ‘what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.’ . . . Our cases make it abundantly clear that it is constitutionally impermissible to abuse a shackled prisoner to the point of death and then leave him to die in his cell. . . . Chokeholds are objectively unreasonable where an individual is already restrained or there is no danger to others. . . . Gray’s actions as described in the complaint violated clearly established law: Gray put Benton in a chokehold and continued to choke him even after Gray heard him gurgling and another officer told Gray to stop, and Gray left Benton in his cell without medical care. Gray’s efforts to hide evidence of his actions, by filing false reports and lying to federal investigators, reasonably lead to the conclusion that he knew he had violated the law. In short, like Schmeltz, Gray behaved like someone who ‘was on notice that his alleged actions were unconstitutional.’ . . . Gray’s argument that his actions did not violate clearly established law thus also fails.”)

Gradisher v. City of Akron, 794 F.3d 574, 584-86 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Gradisher argues that his ‘right to be free from a warrantless forced entry absent exigent circumstances was clearly established on September 2, 2011, and, therefore, these defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.’ But Gradisher frames the issue at too high a level of generality. . . . The appropriate question to ask is whether, on September 2, 2011, it was clearly established that no exigent circumstance exists when officers enter a residence in response to multiple erratic 911 calls from there and when they believe that someone inside may have threatened the use of a gun. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Gradisher, we are unpersuaded that the defendants violated any of his clearly established rights by entering his house. As our precedent establishes, such an entry may be justified if there is evidence that an individual in a residence has a gun and officials receive a 911 call from within that residence that was hung up. . . . The parties dispute whether or not Gradisher was resisting or refusing to be handcuffed. . . . Thus, whether Gradisher resisted or not and whether he was given an opportunity to comply with commands before, and while, being tased are material facts in dispute. ‘Where, as here, the legal question of qualified immunity turns upon which version of the facts one accepts, the jury, not the judge, must determine liability.’. . . Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s grant of summary judgment to Officer Craft on Gradisher’s excessive-force cause of action.”)

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App’x 520, 525-26 (6th Cir. 2015) (“A remand here will result in the district court developing the factual record. Despite the dissent’s contentions, Shelton’s specific role in the search and his relationship to LaPaglia and the other officers involved in the hospital search cannot be determined on the present record. Despite the lack of record, the dissent improperly reads like an order granting summary judgment against Shelton in Booker’s favor by focusing on various facts irrelevant to Shelton’s liability, like events leading up to the hospital search not alleged to be constitutional violations. While the dissent suggests there is nothing to be gained from a remand, such factual development of the record may very well entitle Shelton to qualified immunity. At the very least, he will have been heard on that issue. But as it stands now, we cannot distinguish between Shelton’s involvement and that of the other officers as is required by our precedent. . . . We therefore vacate and remand for the district court to address Shelton’s role in the search and to properly evaluate his qualified immunity defense.”)

Booker v. Lapaglia, 617 F. App’x 520, 527, 532-35 (6th Cir. 2015) (Karen Nelson More, J., dissenting) (“This appeal is ripe for adjudication because there is nothing more for the district court to do; the record will not change, and neither will the law as of February 12, 2010. . . . When the record is viewed in the light most favorable to Booker, this search violated the Fourth Amendment. A reasonable jury could find that Shelton caused, watched, and was complicit in the unconstitutional searches, and therefore violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Even if we were not bound by Booker I, however, I would have no trouble finding that the law was clearly established in February 2010 that an officer cannot use private parties to conduct illegal searches. . . . I also believe that it was clearly established that this search was far more invasive than other searches the Supreme Court and other circuits have found unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has declared that forcible surgery and induced vomiting are unreasonable investigative searches. . . . I do not have to strain to conclude that penological goals do not justify anesthetizing, paralyzing, intubating, and anally probing someone if induced vomiting is ‘too close to the rack and screw to permit constitutional differentiation.’. . . Both Rochin and Winston significantly predate this search. . . . Finally, our holding that, on February 12, 2010, the right to be free from forced anesthetization, paralyzation, intubation, and warrantless rectal examinations to prevent a suspect from overdosing on drugs lodged in his rectum was clearly established is consistent with the Ninth Circuit. In George v. Edholm, the Ninth Circuit concluded that a warrantless digital rectal examination and forced sedation and intubation violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Not only was it a constitutional violation, but the right to be free of that procedure had been clearly established long before March 13, 2004. I see no reason to create a circuit split, and therefore would hold that no reasonable officer would believe that this search was reasonable under the circumstances apparent in this record.”)

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641-44 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Our cases firmly establish that it is not excessive force for the police to tase someone (even multiple times) when the person is actively resisting arrest. . . Active resistance includes ‘physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers.’. . And it includes refusing to move your hands for the police to handcuff you, at least if that inaction is coupled with other acts of defiance. . .But active resistance does not include being ‘compliant or hav[ing] stopped resisting,’ . . . or having ‘done nothing to resist arrest,’ or having ‘already [been] detained[.]’ . . .A simple dichotomy thus emerges: When a suspect actively resists arrest, the police can use a taser (or a knee strike) to subdue him; but when a suspect does not resist, or has stopped resisting, they cannot. . . .A reasonable police officer observing this scene in the heat of the moment did not need to give Carpenter any more time to comply before tasing him. Because Carpenter ‘actively resist[ed] arrest and refus[ed] to be handcuffed,’ . . . a reasonable jury applying the law of our circuit could conclude only that the officers were constitutionally able to use the force they did to subdue him. . . .Now assume we got it completely wrong. On the constitutional point (prong one), assume Carpenter gets it right: The officers violated the Fourth Amendment because Carpenter did not resist enough to justify the knee strike or the one-time use of a taser. We would still have to reverse. . . .The district court wrote that ‘this case do[es] not fall neatly into the[] categories’ of clearly established taser law. . . That’s a concession that it could find no clearly established constitutional violation, and the court should have stopped there—and held for the defendants. In fact, we have done the same in an excessive-force case that ‘does not fit cleanly within’ our taser case law . . . because qualified immunity operates in the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’”)

Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 644, 647-48 (6th Cir. 2015) (Bernice Bouie Donald, J., concurring only in the judgment) (“In my view, the facts in this case—properly construed in Lawrence Carpenter’s favor—did not justify the level of force employed by the officers. However, in light of the Supreme Court’s recent heightening of the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard, I agree with the majority that the officers in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Because I would hold that the officers’ nearly immediate resort to the use of a taser constituted excessive force, I concur only in the judgment. . . . In its recent pronouncements on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court arguably has heightened the standard to clarify that a right is clearly established if it is ‘sufficiently clear “that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right.”’. . . Prior case law merely required a right to be ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right’—not every reasonable official. . . Nor was any identical case required to be on point Now, however, the law at the time of the officers' conduct must have placed the constitutional question 'beyond debate.' . . . Here, as demonstrated by my disagreement with the majority regarding the constitutionality of the officers' use of a taser in this scenario, the constitutional question is not—as it must be—'beyond debate.' . . . I would hold that the officers' practically immediate resort to the use of a taser in this 26-second encounter violated Carpenter's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. But because the question is debatable, it cannot be said that the officers' mistaken belief in the justification of their actions signals that they are 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowing[] violat[ors of] the law.' . . . Accordingly, I concur only in the judgment.")

Webb v. United States, 789 F.3d 647, 659-60, 662, 670 (6th Cir. 2015) ("To succeed on a malicious-prosecution claim under Bivens or § 1983, a plaintiff must prove the following: (1) the defendant made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff; (2) there was no probable cause for the criminal prosecution; (3) as a consequence of the legal proceedings, the plaintiff suffered a deprivation of liberty apart from the initial arrest; and (4) the criminal proceeding was resolved in the plaintiff's favor. . . . As there is no dispute that Webb and Price were deprived of their liberty as a result of criminal proceedings that were resolved in their favor, we focus on the first and second elements. Within the meaning of the first element, 'the term "participated" should be construed within the context of tort causation principles. Its meaning is akin to "aided." To be liable for "participating" in the decision to prosecute, the officer must participate in a way that aids in the decision, as opposed to passively or neutrally participating.' . . . Webb and Price were arrested and charged following grand-jury indictments. As a general rule, 'the finding of an indictment, fair upon its face, by a properly constituted grand jury, conclusively determines the existence of probable cause.' . . . An exception to this general rule applies when defendants knowingly or recklessly present false testimony to the grand jury to obtain the indictment. . . . A law-enforcement defendant is deliberately indifferent—and therefore not entitled to qualified immunity—if he mistakenly identifies an individual as a suspect when the individual does not match the suspect's description. . . . Because there is a dispute of material fact as to whether Webb and Conrad looked alike, we cannot determine that it was objectively reasonable for Lucas to believe that the person who sold him drugs on October 14, 2005, was Webb unless he undertook appropriate efforts to confirm Webb's identity in light of potential differences. Nothing in the record indicates that Lucas undertook such efforts. Accordingly, a jury could reasonably conclude that Lucas's grand-jury testimony contained knowing or reckless falsehoods as to the identity of the person who sold him drugs, and therefore the grand-jury indictment against Webb cannot be the basis for probable cause at summary judgment. . . . The district court held that all individual Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Price's fabrication-of-evidence claims because there was independent evidence to support probable cause. . . . But there are genuine issues of material fact as to the existence of probable cause against Price. More importantly, even if independent evidence establishes probable cause against a suspect, it would still be unlawful for law-enforcement officers to fabricate evidence in order to strengthen the case against that suspect. . . . Accordingly, it was improper for the district court to grant summary judgment to Lucas, Metcalf, and Faith for fabricating evidence against Price on the basis that there was probable cause to charge Price.")

Northrup v. City of Toledo Police Dep’t, 785 F.3d 1128, 1131-34 (6th Cir. 2015) (“In today’s case, Officer Bright relies on two ‘specific and articulable facts’: Northrup’s open possession of a firearm and the 911 call about what Northrup was doing. The Fourth Amendment no doubt permitted Bright to approach Northrup and to ask him questions. But that is not what he did. He relied on these facts to stop Northrup, disarm him, and handcuff him. Ohio law permits the open carry of firearms, Ohio Rev.Code § 9.68(C)(1), and thus permitted Northrup to do exactly what he was doing. While the dispatcher and motorcyclist may not have known the details of Ohio’s open-carry firearm law, the police officer had no basis for such uncertainty. If it is appropriate to presume that citizens know the parameters of the criminal laws, it is surely appropriate to expect the same of law enforcement officers—at least with regard to unambiguous statutes. Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S.Ct. 530, 540 (2014). Clearly established law required Bright to point to evidence that Northrup may have been ‘armed and dangerous.’ Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 64 (1968) (emphasis added). Yet all he ever saw was that Northrup was armed—and legally so. . . . This requirement and the impropriety of Officer Bright’s demands are particularly acute in a State like Ohio. Not only has the State made open carry of a firearm legal, but it also does not require gun owners to produce or even carry their licenses for inquiring officers. . . . If Bright had no reason to stop and frisk Northrup, he violated clearly established law in handcuffing—fully seizing—Northrup in his squad car for thirty minutes. . . . Unlike Officer Bright, Sergeant Ray is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Sergeant Ray did not arrive until after Northrup was handcuffed in the back of Officer Bright’s police car. Ray was then told Bright’s account of events, including of Northrup’s ‘furtive movement’ toward his gun and his failure to produce identification when initially requested. . . . With this information in hand, Ray contacted the Toledo Police Department detective’s bureau to help determine the proper charge. A detective advised Ray to cite Northrup for failure to disclose personal information, Ohio Rev.Code § 2921.29, which Ray and Bright then did. Northrup has a claim against Sergeant Ray only if we infer that Officer Bright, in his initial conversation apprising Ray of recent events, confessed to an illegal seizure. There is no basis in the record for such an inference. . . . Accordingly, Ray should receive qualified immunity.”)

Wenk v. O’Reilly, 783 F.3d 585, 598-600 (6th Cir. 2015) (“Schott does not contest that the Wenks’ right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment right to criticize school officials is clearly established. Rather, Schott argues that ‘a reasonable governmental official in [Schott’s] position would not recognize that, by following a mandatory obligation to report abuse, she is violating federal law.’ . . . Schott does not cite any federal case law to support her argument, and instead cites only Ohio’s mandatory reporting statutory scheme. . . . Schott points to the fact that Ohio imposes no good faith requirement on mandatory reporters and provides that they are absolutely immune from civil and criminal liability for those reports. Ohio Rev.Code § 2151.421(G)(1)(a). As an initial matter, we note that Schott does not take the facts in the light most favorable to the Wenks in framing the clearly-established-law inquiry, as she must do on appeal. . . . The premise of Schott’s argument is that Schott in fact believed herself to be following her mandatory duty to report child abuse under Ohio law when she reported the Wenks to FCCS. However, this argument ignores the factual disputes that the district court found as to whether Schott would have reported the Wenks absent their protected conduct. Reading those disputes in the light most favorable to the Wenks suggests that Schott did not think that the report she made to FCCS was required under Ohio's mandatory reporting law. . . . A reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that what she did violated the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Our decision in Jenkins, decided in 2008, made clear that school officials can be liable if they make reports of child abuse to retaliate against parents for exercising their First Amendment rights. . . . Although the report in Jenkins was false, the heart of a First Amendment retaliation claim, which we have reaffirmed numerous times before 2011, is that '[a]n act taken in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutionally protected right is actionable under § 1983 even if the act, when taken for a different reason, would have been proper.' Bloch, 156 F.3d at 681–82 (emphasis added). Under this rule, it is clear that the distinction between a completely false report and a partially false report does not matter. At oral argument, Schott appeared to frame the inquiry slightly differently, asking whether a reasonable school official would think that the immunity conferred under Ohio law for reports of child abuse made in bad faith would prevent liability for violating the Wenks' clearly established right not to be retaliated against for exercising their First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court has long held 'that a state law that immunizes government conduct otherwise subject to suit under § 1983 is preempted, even where the federal civil rights litigation takes place in state court, because the application of the state immunity law would thwart the congressional remedy, ... which of course already provides certain immunities for state officials.' Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 139 (1988). . . . In sum, we hold that the Wenks' right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights was clearly established at the time of this case, and that a reasonable official in Schott's position would have understood that filing a child abuse report in bad faith violated the Wenks' rights.")

Flying Dog Brewery, LLLP v. Michigan Liquor Control Comm'n, 597 F. App'x 342, 352, 355 (6th Cir. 2015) ("We begin with the district court's analysis on the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry: whether the constitutional right the Administrative Commissioners are alleged to have violated was clearly established at the time the Commissioners acted. . . . By the time the Administrative Commissioners banned Flying Dog's beer label in 2009, the clear line of Supreme Court commercial speech precedents, coupled with our own decision in Sambo's and the persuasive opinion of the Second Circuit in Bad Frog Brewery, should have placed any reasonable state liquor commissioner on notice that banning a beer label based on its content would violate the First Amendment unless the Central Hudson test was satisfied. Consequently, we disagree with the district court's determination that applicable First Amendment law was not clearly established in 2009 and set aside the grant of qualified immunity to the Commissioners.")

Moore v. Money, 590 F. App'x 562, 565–66 (6th Cir. 2014) ("After the district court issued its opinion, the Supreme Court in Lane v. Franks, — U.S. —, 134 S.Ct. 2369, 2374–75, 189 L.Ed.2d 312 (2014), a case arising from the Eleventh Circuit, held that the First Amendment protects a public employee who provides truthful testimony under oath outside of his ordinary job duties. Nonetheless, the Court upheld qualified immunity for the defendant because at the time of Lane's 2008 and 2009 trial testimony, neither Eleventh Circuit nor Supreme Court precedent provided clear notice that a public employee's testimony, given under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job duties, is entitled to First Amendment protection. . . In so holding, the Supreme Court determined that 'the relevant question for qualified immunity purposes' is whether the defendant could 'reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [the plaintiff], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave....'. . . To answer that question, the Supreme Court looked to Eleventh Circuit decisions addressing whether testimony, either in-court testimony or deposition testimony, is protected employee speech. . . Here, as the district conceded, at the time of Moore's testimony and the alleged retaliatory conduct, neither this Court nor the Supreme Court had addressed whether in-court testimony is protected public employee speech. . . Moreover, as highlighted by the Court in Lane, there was a circuit split among the other circuit courts that had decided this issue. . . Thus, at the time of Moore's testimony, there was no 'controlling authority' or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that could have put Defendants on notice that Moore's testimony was protected by the First Amendment.")

Roberson v. Torres, 770 F.3d 398, 407 (6th Cir. 2014) ("As a theoretical matter, spraying a chemical agent upon a sleeping prisoner might not violate clearly established law where the corrections officer, under the circumstances, reasonably believed that the prisoner was in fact awake but disobeying the order. But that is not Torres's claim here, nor does Roberson concede such a reasonable belief on Torres's part. We are required to 'take, as given, the facts that the district court assumed when it denied summary judgment.' . . On those facts, we agree that using a chemical agent in an initial attempt to wake a sleeping prisoner, without apparent necessity and in the absence of mitigating circumstances, violates clearly established law.")

Baker v. Union Twp., 587 F. App'x 229, 235-36 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The right at issue can be expressed as Baker's right not to be shot with a taser without warning, while offering no resistance to arrest, and while standing on an observably elevated surface. This articulation comports with al-Kidd's mandate that rights not be defined at 'a high level of generality' at the second step of qualified immunity analysis. . . Examining the incident under the facts conceded, it is fairly certain that a reasonable officer would have been 'on notice that [this] conduct violates established law' at the time Ventre tased Baker. . . Baker was suspected of, at most, a minor, non-violent misdemeanor at the time he was tased. The police were called to the scene of a disturbance at the VFW. It is unclear what, exactly, the police suspected him of at the time they gave chase. The police did not even positively identify Baker as the suspect of the reported incident, they merely chased someone they saw running away. This is a far cry from the scenarios implicitly contemplated by Graham in which a heightened level of caution may be warranted in the apprehension of someone suspected of a violent felony. Under the facts conceded, Baker did not resist arrest before Ventre deployed his taser the second time. . . In the past, this court has held that an officer violates a suspect's clearly-established Fourth Amendment rights when 'he pepper sprays a suspect who has not been told she is under arrest and is not resisting arrest.' . . Other courts have held similarly. . . . Here, Baker was not resisting arrest. . . A reasonable officer would have known that it was unlawful to deploy a taser against an un-resisting suspect standing stock-still in a well-lit hallway. Moreover, Ventre should not have tased Baker without a warning. The tasing of a suspect without warning is, at the very least, an additional factor useful in determining whether an officer violated a suspect's Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. . . Here, Ventre's tasing of Baker before giving Baker an opportunity to comply with instructions was a violation of clearly established law.") Bolick v. City of E. Grand Rapids, 580 F. App'x 314, 318-23 (6th Cir. 2014) ("The officers contend that a reasonable officer would have interpreted Matthew's actions as active resistance. . . We have jurisdiction when a defendant appeals the 'denial of a claim of qualified immunity,' . . . but the scope of our jurisdiction is narrow. We may only review the denial of qualified immunity based purely on issues of law, . . . meaning the officers must accept 'the plaintiff's facts, taken at their best[.]' . . . In other words, we do not have jurisdiction insofar as the officers solely contest 'whether or not the pretrial record sets forth a "genuine" issue of fact for trial.' . . . The officers in this case appeal the denial of qualified immunity as to two discrete police actions against Matthew on the night of his death: Parker's alleged use of a taser while Matthew lay handcuffed on his stomach, and Davis's alleged pressure against Matthew's back under the same circumstances. . . . Yes, Matthew assaulted Parker and attempted to evade arrest. But, taking the facts in his favor, Matthew could barely move, had stopped resisting, was under control, and thus posed little risk to himself or anyone else by the time he was in handcuffs—at which point Parker tased him and Davis (who knew Matthew suffered from a diminished mental state) put the weight of his body into Matthew's upper back. For these reasons, a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers' post-handcuff actions were not calibrated to the threat Matthew posed, and thus were objectively unreasonable uses of force. . . . We thus ask: whether it was clearly established in November 2009 that it was excessive for an officer to apply the weight of his body to the back of a handcuffed suspect who did not resist, all while the suspect lay on his stomach with another officer controlling his legs; and whether it was excessive for an officer to tase the arrestee in drive-stun mode under the same circumstances. The answer to both questions is yes. . . . Champion also applies to Parker's use of the taser in drive-stun mode. To be sure, Champion addressed the use of pepper spray (not a taser) on a hobbled and handcuffed suspect. But the Champion court did note that, as of 2004, we had 'consistently held that various types of force applied after the subduing of a suspect are unreasonable and a violation of a clearly established right.' . . . Here, if it was 'clearly established that the Officers' use of pepper spray against [an arrestee] after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive,' . . . it was clearly established that Parker's tasing of Matthew under substantially similar conditions was also excessive. . . . The officers counter that not every reasonable officer in their position would have understood that Matthew did not struggle or resist. . . . Again, this argument asks us to view the facts in a light most favorable to the officers, which we cannot do. A view of the record in Matthew's favor (which shows that he was barely able to move and did not resist) controls our analysis, not one that considers whether every reasonable officer would have acted differently under a situation drawn more in their favor. . . . In this case, even though the district court declined to grant summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity, it improperly dismissed qualified immunity as a defense. Reinforcing our conclusion is the fact that the officers complied with the only requirement necessary for them to invoke the defense at trial: raising qualified immunity as an affirmative defense from the outset. . . We thus reverse the district court’s decision to dismiss qualified immunity as a defense to the police actions that remain at issue.”)

Cordell v. McKinney, 759 F.3d 573, 587, 588 (6th Cir. 2014) (“To sum up, at this stage in the litigation, we must accept Cordell’s version of events without weighing the evidence or assessing the credibility of prospective witnesses. The district court failed to do so and, thus, committed error. If we do accept Cordell’s testimony and allegations as true—that Deputy McKinney rammed Cordell headfirst into the wall while he was handcuffed and controlled—a reasonable jury could conclude that Cordell suffered severe pain that objectively violated our contemporary norms of human dignity. Thus, Cordell has demonstrated that summary judgment on the objective component of his Eighth Amendment claim was inappropriate. . . . While there may be much sense in stating that it is inappropriate to grant qualified immunity whenever a jury could find that a jail official acted with malicious and sadistic intent, it seems that Plumhoff requires us to frame Cordell’s Eighth Amendment right at a lower level of generality. In the past, we have held that ‘if there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether an officer’s use of force was objectively reasonable, then there naturally is a genuine issue of fact with respect to whether a reasonable jail official would have known such conduct was wrongful.’ Kostrzewa v. City of Troy, 247 F.3d 633, 642 (6th Cir.2001). Under this standard, as discussed above, we conclude that any reasonable official would know that ramming a handcuffed and controlled prisoner headfirst into a concrete wall is an unreasonable method of regaining control of a prisoner in a hallway occupied only by other jail officials. . . . Therefore, Cordell’s rights were clearly established as of July 20, 2009, and granting qualified immunity at this time is inappropriate.”)

Daily Services, LLC v. Valentino, 756 F.3d 893, 901-04 (6th Cir. 2014) (“The applicability of Parratt . . . is irrelevant to the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As a colleague on our sister circuit noted, ‘Granting immunity based on the lack of clarity as to whether the State bears responsibility would turn the qualified immunity doctrine on its head. The official would in effect be seeking immunity based on a “reasonable” belief that his conduct was so wrong—i.e., it was “random and unauthorized”—that it could not provide the basis for a procedural due process claim.’ San Gerónimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vilá, 687 F.3d 465, 500 (1st Cir.2012) (en banc) (Lipez, J., concurring). Qualified immunity exists to shield actions reasonable in light of current law without protecting abuses of office. . . . It would undermine that doctrine’s purpose to find a due process violation but provide no remedy because the defendant could have thought that Parratt would let him (and the state) off the hook for his violation of clearly established due process law. San Gerónimo, 687 F.3d at 500 (Lipez, J., concurring). Indeed, the Supreme Court has never looked to the Parratt doctrine when assessing whether a defendant deserves qualified immunity because the claimed procedural due process right was not clearly established. Nor has our court ever held that uncertainty about whether Parratt applies gives rise to qualified immunity. . . . Some of our sister circuits and other courts also have suggested that uncertainty about the Parratt doctrine does not affect the ‘clearly established’ inquiry. [collecting cases] A handful of other cases have discussed the Parratt doctrine while assessing whether the claimed procedural due process right was clearly established, but none have examined whether the Parratt doctrine is properly part of the clearly established law inquiry in the first place. [collecting cases] These cases therefore fail to provide meaningful guidance on the question before us. Thus, while courts may consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the plaintiff has alleged a procedural due process violation, courts should not consider the Parratt doctrine to determine whether the due process right at issue was clearly established. The doctrine simply has no place in assessing whether ‘it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . Here, the district court erred when it granted qualified immunity based on its understanding that the law ‘is unsettled as to whether the failure of a public official to follow established procedure constitutes “random and unauthorized” conduct, thereby triggering Parratt.’ Simply put, the court focused on the clarity of the wrong law. The inquiry is not whether a reasonable official would understand that his wrongful denial of predeprivation process might not ultimately amount to a due process violation by the state under the Parratt doctrine. Rather, in the context of this procedural due process claim, the ‘clearly established law’ inquiry should ask whether a reasonable official would understand that the plaintiff was entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the official filed a judgment or lien against the plaintiff. . . . At the time of the defendants’ actions, it was clearly established that ‘even the temporary or partial impairments to property rights that attachments, liens, and similar encumbrances entail are sufficient to merit due process protection.’ . . . As the Supreme Court stated many years ago, ‘the root requirement’ of due process protection is ‘that an individual be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest.’ . . . Ohio law recognizes these requirements by requiring the Bureau and its employees to provide notice and an opportunity to be heard before filing a judgment or lien for unpaid premiums. . . . It is well-established and unassailable that ‘a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.’ . . . Thus, if Daily Services has alleged facts that make out a violation of its constitutional right to predeprivation process, discussed infra, the only basis for qualified immunity would be the defendants’ reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented ‘extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest’ justified postponing notice or the opportunity to be heard until after the deprivation. . . . The facts of this case present no such uncertainty. Reasonable officials in the defendants’ positions would know that predeprivation process—notice and an opportunity to be heard—was required before filing the judgments and liens against Daily Services.”)

Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 473, 474 (6th Cir. 2013) (“In the instant case, the district court applied the ‘shocks the conscience’ standard of the Fourteenth Amendment to find that there was no evidence that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically. . . . The district court found that the claim did not fall under the Fourth Amendment because the right to be free from excessive force as a pretrial detainee in the booking process was not clearly established until our decision in Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858 (6th Cir.2010), well after Burgess’ arrest. . . . However, a review of our case law, including Aldini, compels the opposite conclusion, and we find that the district court erred in not applying the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness standard to the facts of this case. . . . To be sure, Aldini did set forth a new principle. The Aldini court clearly established in 2010 that the dividing line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment zones of protection was the probable cause hearing for warrantless arrests. . . . However, the district court missed a critical point of the decision—it was already clearly established that the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness standard applied at least through the booking process. . . . Indeed, the court held that the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness standard applied to a set of facts arising in May 2006, over two-and-a-half years before Burgess’ car was stopped on January 23, 2009. . . . Because it was a reversal, the Aldini decision necessarily held that the Fourth Amendment right was clearly established in 2006. Therefore, the right was no less established in January 2009 when Burgess was allegedly assaulted. Consequently, the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment’s ‘shocks the conscience’ standard rather than the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness standard.”)

Hidden Village, LLC v. City of Lakewood, Ohio, 734 F.3d 519, 529 (6th Cir. 2013) (“To defeat the qualified immunity defense, . . . Hidden Village must also show that precedents on the books when the defendants acted (in 2006 and 2007) clearly established that their conduct violated § 3617 even though it violated nothing else in the Fair Housing Act. That in turn requires pointing to either ‘controlling authority’ or ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’ . . . Hidden Village does not have controlling authority on its side. Until today, the Sixth Circuit has never held that a defendant can violate § 3617 without violating §§ 3603–3606. To the contrary, we had left the question open. . . . Nor was there a ‘consensus’ of cases of ‘persuasive authority.’ Just the opposite. By 2007, the Fifth Circuit had held that a violation of §§ 3603–3606 is indispensable to a § 3617 claim. . . . The Seventh Circuit had twice reserved the question. . . . Another Seventh Circuit opinion implied that the defendants’ interpretation was right. . . . Hidden Village, meanwhile, does not identify a single federal appellate court decision that had clearly come out on its side of this debate. The best we have found is dictum to that effect from the Ninth Circuit, see Smith v. Stechel, 510 F.2d 1162, 1164 (9th Cir.1975), and a handful of decisions from district courts. This state of affairs circa 2007 does not amount to the ‘robust consensus’ that the qualified immunity test demands. Hidden Village invokes Bloch v. Frischholz, which interpreted § 3617 as we do today. 587 F.3d 771, 781 (7th Cir.2009) (en banc). But that decision came out in 2009; it did not clearly establish anything in 2006 or 2007. More telling is Bloch’s observation about the state of the law on whether liability under § 3617 depends on a violation of §§ 3603–3606: ‘Courts are split on the issue.’ Id. at 781. In the final analysis, Hidden Village may carry on with its Fair Housing Act lawsuit against the city. But the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jasinski v. Tyler, 729 F.3d 531, 540, 544 (6th Cir. 2013)(“Under the circumstances presented here, the contours of the substantive due process right to be free from government action increasing the risk of harm was not sufficiently clear under our case law that a reasonable official would understand that the state’s actions in pursuing Oliver for use of the cattle prod and then failing to immediately remove Nicholas would violate Nicholas’s substantive due process rights. Accordingly, Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity [on substantive due process claim]. . . . Given the previous decisions of our court, we cannot say that a reasonable CPS official would understand that the failure to file a petition under § 722.638 would constitute a denial of procedural due process. No decision has yet found a procedural due process right in a similar context. In the future, CPS officials are on notice that if a petition is mandated based on a substantive predicate, the failure to file a petition when the predicate is met may constitute a denial of procedural due process under statutes similar to the instant one.”)

Kovacik v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 695-700 (6th Cir. 2013) (“The social workers argue that the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, contending that exigent circumstances existed and that the relevant Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not clearly established as of March 26, 2002. . . . While there certainly remain unresolved issues relating to the Fourth Amendment, as noted by the dissent, . . . the issue at hand—whether a government official can seize children from their homes without a warrant or exigent circumstances—is simply not one of them. . . .In sum, there is an absence of pre-2002 case law specifically mentioning social workers, which under our binding precedent is insufficient to upset the presumption that all government searches and seizures are subject to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. . . .We thus agree with the district court that at the time of the social workers’ actions, it was clearly established that Fourth Amendment warrant requirements, including the exigent-circumstances exception, apply to the removal of children from their homes by social workers. . . .Concerning the Fourteenth Amendment due-process right, we established in Doe that in the context of child removal, due process requires, among other things, that ‘parents be given notice prior to the removal of the child ... stating the reasons for the removal ... [and that] [t]he parents be given a full opportunity at the hearing to present witnesses and evidence on their behalf.’. . . The district court did not err in concluding that the due-process right at issue was clearly established in 2002.”)

Kovacik v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 724 F.3d 687, 703, 708-10 (6th Cir. 2013) (Sutton, J., dissenting) (“The defense prompts a present-tense and a past-tense inquiry: Does the seizure violate the requirements of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments? If so, were those requirements clearly established at the time of the seizure—here in 2002? I would skip the first question, . . . and answer no to the second. . . . All appellate law considered, the social workers acted reasonably from the vantage point of 2002. Even had they consulted a lawyer at every turn, consider the many questions implicated by this case. Do the normal Fourth Amendment standards apply? Is there a special needs exception for child endangerment cases? Does it make a difference whether the state officials are engaged in investigating criminal conduct or protecting children? Does past abuse suffice? Must the evidence of danger be within the past 24 hours? Or will evidence over the last month suffice? The majority may have some confidence in answering some of these questions today. But in the face of our previous silence, the Supreme Court’s continued silence and the conflicting signals sent by other circuits, I doubt even the most sophisticated social worker, accompanied by the most sophisticated attorney, could have distilled one framework for answering all of these questions in 2002. That is the purpose of qualified immunity, and that is why it applies here. . . . When a social worker has concerns that immediate removal is required and when a state court judge later vindicates those concerns after a hearing, it is a strange notion of qualified immunity that would permit the social workers to be found liable under § 1983. We should pause before making social workers retroactively liable for a three-day temporary seizure when the state court judge is insulated from liability for the ten months of custody that followed. No such oddity occurs if we respect the state court's contemporaneous finding that probable cause of an exigency existed, which confirms that the social workers at most made a mistake. In the end, these social workers faced two state laws allowing them to act, set against a murky backdrop of federal court precedent. And they had evidence of abuse, enough in fact to convince a magistrate that they acted correctly and that Nancy's children ought not stay in Nancy's care. Qualified immunity applies.”) Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 569-71, 574, 575, 578-80 (6th Cir. 2013) (“Plaintiff predicates her first deliberate indifference claim on her being shackled during labor and postpartum recovery. In bringing such a claim, Plaintiff finds herself in the recent ‘burgeoning movement to end the practice of shackling pregnant women prisoners, particularly during labor and delivery.’ . . . Though the push to end the practice is fairly new, sadly, it is a practice that has been around for at least a century. . . . In spite of this history, the law on the shackling of pregnant women is underdeveloped, and this Court has not previously decided a deliberate indifference claim based on the practice. Therefore, we must at the outset determine a framework under which to analyze such a claim. . . . In dealing with deliberate indifference claims in the past, this Court has enumerated some specific types of claims for factual scenarios that frequently arise. These types include, but are not limited to, conditions-of-confinement, excessive-force, and medical-needs. . . . The district court as well as the parties in their briefing discuss this as a medical-needs claim, . . . but as we explain below, the nature of Plaintiff’s claim does not quite square with our medical-needs jurisprudence nor our other refinements of the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . A shackling claim does not necessarily involve the denial of or interference with medical treatment; rather, it may be premised on the notion that the shackles increase Plaintiff’s risk of medical complications. We should hasten to add that there may be circumstances where shackling could interfere with medical treatment—where, for example, the shackles are not removed so that the medical treatment may proceed unimpeded; however, such were not the circumstances in this case. This problem led one court to analyze the shackling claim it faced as a conditions-of-confinement claim. . . . While a shackling claim does in some respects resemble some of our conditions-of-confinement cases, see, e.g., Barker, 649 F.3d at 434 (analyzing the use of handcuffs on a mentally ill prisoner under a conditions-of-confinement, as well as excessive-force, rubric), the nature of the medical proof offered by Plaintiff is different than we have previously addressed in the conditions-of-confinement context. Similarly, we believe that the excessive-force type of claim is also not well adapted for analysis of Plaintiff’s claim. . . . In sum, it seems to us that none of the refinements we have made to the general deliberate indifference principles in order to more easily analyze common factual scenarios are particularly well-suited to the theory and proof offered by Plaintiff. The Eighth Circuit in Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522 (8th Cir.2009) (en banc), seems to have similarly recognized the crossover nature of a pregnant shackling claim. . . . [R]ather than attempt to pigeonhole Plaintiff’s shackling claim into a more specific subcategory of deliberate indifference claims, we think it best to analyze her claim under the general deliberate indifference principles. . . . Consistent with the general principles discussed above, we analyze Plaintiff's claim in two steps, addressing first the objective component and then the subjective one. . . . On the objective component, we ask whether shackling pregnant detainees in the manner and under the circumstances in which Plaintiff was shackled creates a substantial risk of serious harm that society chooses not to tolerate. . . . On the subjective component, the inquiry is whether the officers were aware and understood (or should have been aware and understood) that they were exposing Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Two things are clear from Plaintiff's evidence on the objective component. First, the shackling of pregnant detainees while in labor offends contemporary standards of human decency such that the practice violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain'—i.e., it poses a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . The universal consensus from the courts to have addressed this issue as well as the chorus of prominent organizations condemning the practice demonstrates that, without any extenuating circumstances, shackling women during labor runs afoul of the protections of the Eighth Amendment. Second, it is equally clear, however, from both courts and commentators that the right to be free from shackling during labor is not unqualified. . . . To be sure, this evidence shows that the jail's classification procedures were followed in this case. However, because of Plaintiff's obvious, physical condition as a pregnant woman in labor, a reasonable factfinder could nonetheless conclude that Plaintiff was not a flight risk despite the jail's conformity with its classification procedures. This potential dispute renders summary judgment inappropriate. . . . In light of the material factual disputes surrounding whether Plaintiff was shown to be a flight risk, whether Defendant's officers had any knowledge about a no restraint order, and the conflicting expert testimony about the ill effects of Plaintiff's shackling, we conclude that the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on her shackling claim. On remand, a jury will need to determine whether Plaintiff was a flight risk in her condition and whether Defendant had knowledge of the substantial risk, recognized the serious harm that such a risk could cause, and, nonetheless, disregarded it, . . . recognizing that such knowledge may be established through the obviousness of the risk. . . . Absent proof that the breast pump was prescribed, as is necessary under a diagnosed medical-needs theory, Plaintiff must show that it was so obvious that even a layperson would recognize the need to provide Plaintiff with a breast pump. . . . Unlike her shackling claim, where Plaintiff pointed to specific statements by outside organizations and testimony from Defendant's officer, Plaintiff on this claim has only pointed to the opinion testimony of Torrente and DeBona, who both opined that a breast pump was necessary to allow Plaintiff to express her milk and relieve her breast pain. Such testimony regarding the harmful consequences of being denied the breast pump does not specifically speak to the obviousness of the risk to Plaintiff. Therefore, Plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient evidence to make out the objective component of her breast pump claim, and therefore, the district court improperly granted summary judgment to Plaintiff on this claim as well.") Villegas v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 581, 582, 584 (6th Cir. 2013) (Helene N. White, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. The district court determined on the parties' cross-motions for partial summary judgment that shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum recovery absent any indication that she was a flight risk or posed a risk of harm to herself or others, and denying her the breast pump hospital staff provided her on discharge, constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The material facts—the facts that might affect the determination of Defendant’s liability—were not in dispute. . . . Villegas was not being held for a crime of violence and had not been convicted of any crime. She was not individually assessed for flight risk or risk of harm to herself or others, and she had not engaged in any conduct evidencing such. . . . The subjective component of a deliberate indifference claim goes to whether Defendant’s officers were deliberately indifferent to substantial risks of serious harm posed by shackling. Defendant’s experts did not address several of the serious medical risks to which Villegas’s experts attested and did not rebut that shackling Villegas while en route to the hospital, during labor and postpartum, increased the medical risks of serious harm to Villegas and her unborn child. . . . I agree with the district court that no genuine or material factual dispute remained regarding whether Defendant’s officers knew of and disregarded the substantial risks of harm posed by shackling Villegas during labor and postpartum and denying her the breast pump hospital staff gave her on discharge.”)

McAdam v. Warmuskerken, Nos. 12–2330, 12–2331, 2013 WL 1092729, *2 (6th Cir. Mar. 15, 2013) (unpublished) (“First, may an officer tase an individual who is subdued on the ground and is not resisting arrest, even if the officer does so only once? No. See Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff’s Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509–10 (6th Cir.2012); Austin v. Redford Twp. Police Dep’t, 690 F.3d 490, 497–98 (6th Cir.2012). A single tasing violates a plaintiff’s clearly established rights if he is neutralized and is not resisting an officer’s efforts to restrain him. The district court thus properly denied the officers’ qualified-immunity defense. Second, may an officer tase an individual, who is handcuffed to a hospital bed and is verbally resisting medical treatment, but does not pose a safety risk to hospital staff or police officers? No. See Austin, 690 F.3d at 497–98. Again, the right of an individual to be free from an officer’s force if he is cooperative and non-aggressive is clearly established. See Hagans, 695 F.3d at 509–10. Taking McAdam’s factual description of the hospital tasing as true, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. Because McAdam has put forward plausible factual bases for his legal claims, he is entitled to a trial.”)

Quigley v. Tuong Vinh Thai, 707 F.3d 675, 685 (6th Cir. 2013) (“Because a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Thai consciously exposed Quigley to a substantial risk of death through his medical treatment without so much as a warning, the estate has shown that Thai violated a clearly established right. That there is no federal case directly on point does not undermine this conclusion. The principle at issue—namely, that a doctor cannot ‘consciously expos[e a] patient to an excessive risk of serious harm’ while providing medical treatment—is enshrined in our caselaw. . . . The estate has established that Thai violated a constitutional right and that the right was clearly established. Thai is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Stoudemire v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 705 F.3d 560, 571, 575 (6th Cir. 2013) (“According to Stoudemire, the relevant constitutional question is not whether clearly established law proscribes same-sex strip searches in prisons, but whether clearly established law proscribes a strip search that served no legitimate penological purpose and was intended only to harass. [Defendant] focuses on whether the law regarding same-sex strip searches is ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes. However, the applicable inquiry is whether the strip search was reasonable under the circumstances and whether Stoudemire’s constitutional rights in this regard were clearly established at the time of the search. We address both issues. [Defendant’s] position is that inmates have no right to be free from same-sex strip searches. But that is not the right that Stoudemire is seeking to vindicate. Rather, Stoudemire has ‘identified a well established right, the right not to be subjected to a humiliating strip search in full view of several (or perhaps many) others unless the procedure is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest.’ . . . Based on the state of the law in existence at the time of the strip search, it was clearly established that suspicionless strip searches were permissible as a matter of constitutional law, but only so long as they were reasonable under the circumstances and performed pursuant to a legitimate penological justification.”)

Sutton v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 700 F.3d 865, 877 (6th Cir. 2012) (“The district court summarily concluded that the law clearly established that an arrest without probable cause and a Terry stop without reasonable suspicion violate the Fourth Amendment. But the court’s bare-bones analysis is far too general, failing to recognize that the right violated must be clear in a particularized context so that a reasonable official would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. . . . Still, taking the facts alleged in the complaint as true, Sutton’s constitutional rights were clearly established in this context and the court properly concluded that the qualified-immunity defense fails at this juncture.”)

Andrews v. Hickman County, Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 858-64 (6th Cir. 2012) (“The State Defendants argue that while the Andrews have asserted facts that taken as true, ‘may establish a formulation of a general Fourth Amendment claim,’ they have failed to assert sufficient facts to establish that ‘a clear violation of the Fourth Amendment as it applies to social workers has occurred....’ Although the State Defendants do not cite any authority for their contention, their argument seems to imply that social workers engaging in their statutorily mandated investigative functions are not governed by the same requirements of the Fourth Amendment that apply to law enforcement officers or other state actors.[footnote omitted] If their implication is that social workers are not state actors for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has established that the Fourth Amendment’s restrictions on unreasonable searches and seizures extend well beyond the police In other circuits, defendant caseworkers and social workers have unsuccessfully attempted to argue that the Fourth Amendment should not apply to their actions when entering homes to investigate allegations of child abuse. . . . Although this court has not yet had occasion to definitively address this issue, other courts have found that the Fourth Amendment governs entries and searches of homes made by social workers. [collecting cases] Given the presumption that state actors are governed by the Fourth Amendment and the sanctity of the home under the Fourth Amendment, we agree that a social worker, like other state officers, is governed by the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement. This would simply mean that social workers would have to obtain consent, have sufficient grounds to believe that exigent circumstances exist, or qualify under another recognized exception to the warrant requirement before engaging in warrantless entries and searches of homes. . . . Given that the Fourth Amendment's strictures apply to social worker actions, the Andrews have asserted a violation of their constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches unless an exception to the warrant requirement is established. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to the Andrews, the State Defendants have not demonstrated that an exception to the warrant requirement applies. . . . The State Defendants argue that it was not clearly established at the time of their actions that social workers may not enter a home without a warrant or an applicable exception to the warrant requirement. . . . The Supreme Court has not expressly held that the Fourth Amendment prohibition on warrantless searches of homes does or does not apply to social workers carrying out investigations regarding the welfare of children. . . . [W]e must examine whether our own decisions have addressed the issue in order to ascertain whether the law was clearly established at the time the State Defendants entered the Andrews' home. . . . While Jordan is not binding precedent, it is the only case from our court that bears on the issue of whether the reasonable social worker, facing the situation in the instant case, would have known that her conduct violated clearly established law. Yet, Jordan fails to give clear guidance to the social worker faced with the decision to enter the Andrews home. First, the Jordan footnote referencing the views of other circuits does not endorse them, explicitly or otherwise. The footnote does not hint at whether the court believes a social worker exception to the application of the Fourth Amendment should apply. The footnote is merely an observation about the existence of an issue not explored in Jordan. Moreover, the court in Jordan concluded, using fairly broad language, that social workers should not 'have to second guess' the decisions of officers. . . . Although the court mentions that the officer told the social worker the children in the house were in immediate physical danger—a circumstance not present here—the opinion makes no effort to delineate the situations in which reliance on officers' decisions would be appropriate and those in which it would not. Consequently, a social worker could not determine, based on Jordan, whether she might reasonably rely on the officers' decision under the circumstances presented here. In fact, to the extent Jordan suggests an answer to the question of whether the social worker could rely on an officer's decision, it suggests that she could do so. . . . Quite simply, the reasonable social worker faced with the circumstances of this case could not ascertain from clearly established law the legality of her conduct. [footnote omitted] [G]iven the lack of clarity of Jordan, it was not objectively unreasonable for the State Defendants to enter the home. . . . As we have explained, the actions of social workers in entering a home are governed by the Fourth Amendment, and we have concluded that no social worker exception applies in such situations. Nonetheless, there is still a question, going forward, about whether social workers can rely upon the actions of police officers in deciding whether they can enter a home, although, to be sure, there is a question of fact in this case about whether reliance on the officers occurred. While we recognize that social workers have a duty to cooperate with police officers and, perhaps, a natural inclination to defer to their decisions, exempting social workers from the Fourth Amendment whenever they rely upon a police officer's actions is tantamount to recognition of a 'social worker exception' to the Fourth Amendment's requirements. We join other circuits in recognizing that Fourth Amendment standards are the same, whether the state actor is a law enforcement officer or a social worker. [collecting cases] Nonetheless, if social workers cannot be treated better than police officers under the Fourth Amendment, they should not be treated worse, either. Social workers are frequently asked to make decisions based on information provided to them, directly or indirectly, by the police. When social workers rely in good faith on information from police officers which suggests they can enter a home under an exception to the warrant requirement, or can reasonably infer that an exception applies from their actions, they are entitled to rely on that information. . . The social workers' position is the same as that of a police officer who reasonably relies on another police officer.”)

Patrizi v. Huff, 690 F.3d 459, 465-67 (6th Cir. 2012) (“Construing the facts in Patrizi’s favor, we conclude it is clear that Patrizi’s actions did not constitute an affirmative act under the obstruction ordinance. Patrizi asked the officer questions in a calm and measured manner; she did not continuously interrupt so that the officer could not speak to the subjects of his investigations. She did not ignore instructions from him to cease her questioning—in fact, she was never even given such instructions—and she did not in any way exhibit aggressive, boisterous, or unduly disruptive conduct. . . In short, it is evident that Patrizi’s actions were of the same nature as those held not to constitute an affirmative act by the Ohio Court of Appeals in Kristoff. Therefore, under clearly established law the officers lacked probable cause to arrest her. . . . [D]espite any arguable ambiguity in the Ohio state courts’ jurisprudence, the U.S. Supreme Court has clearly established that nonaggressive questioning of police officers is constitutionally protected conduct. . . Patrizi’s actions fall precisely within that protected ambit because, when the facts are viewed in her favor, her conduct did not cross the line into fighting words or disorderly conduct prohibiting the officers from conducting their investigation.”)

McGlone v. Bell, 681 F.3d 718, 735 (6th Cir. 2012) (“State university officials in their individual capacities were not entitled to qualified immunity in § 1983 action by Christian evangelist challenging university’s policy requiring nonaffiliated individuals to obtain permission before speaking on certain parts of its campus; evangelist had clearly established right to engage in his desired expression on campus free from requirements imposed by university.”) Clemente v. Vaslo, 679 F.3d 482, 492, 493 (6th Cir. 2012) (“What is clearly established is only that public employers may not coerce their employees to abdicate their constitutional rights on pain of dismissal, and that is not what happened here. . . . Defendants’ actual conduct highlights the blurriness of the Fourth Amendment’s contours in the context of an employer-employee relationship. Bartok and White acted on a gradient, applying more pressure at each step to obtain consent (simply asking, then citing to a city ordinance, then giving a direct order as supervisor), but never forced Plaintiffs to choose between letting them in or losing their jobs. Though we do not decide the issue, we note that a supervisor’s direct order may be coercive in some situations, as it may be reasonable for an employee to believe that disobeying it will result in termination. The question, however, is not whether such conduct could possibly constitute a Fourth Amendment violation but whether, according to settled Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent at the time, such conduct was so clearly violative of the Fourth Amendment that it is beyond debate. . . Short of threatening termination, what public employers could do to obtain an employee’s consent to conduct an inspection was not clearly established. Duchane and Bartok are thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Whitney v. City of Milan, 677 F.3d 292, 299 (6th Cir. 2012) (public employee’s “right to speak publicly and participate in a lawsuit addressing workplace discrimination and public corruption in the City’s government was clearly established.”)

O’Neill v. Louisville/Jefferson County Metro Government, 662 F.3d 723, 731, 732, 735 (6th Cir. 2011) (“In concluding that the LMAS officers could constitutionally reenter the O’Neills’ home without a warrant, the district court relied on the consent-once-removed doctrine. This doctrine allows government agents to enter a suspect’s premises to arrest the suspect without a warrant if [undercover agents]: 1) entered at the express invitation of someone with authority to consent; 2) at that point established the existence of probable cause to effectuate an arrest or search; and 3) immediately summoned help from other officers. . . The O’Neills argue that this doctrine does not apply in the present case, where the undercover officers left the premises and then attempted to make a second entry. This court has previously held that, under the consent-once-removed doctrine, an undercover agent or informant in a suspect’s home may signal to agents outside to come in and effectuate an arrest. . . But this court has not extended the doctrine to cover reentry after the undercover agent or informant has left the premises, or where there is no intent to effectuate an arrest, and we decline to do so here. . . .Applying the consent-once-removed doctrine to the LMAS officers’ second entry, where no arrest was intended, would go well beyond the confines of this limited doctrine, which has yet to be adopted by the Supreme Court. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 243-44 (2009) (declining to rule on whether the consent-once-removed doctrine is constitutional by instead resolving the issue of qualified immunity on the basis that no clearly established law was violated). We therefore conclude that the O’Neills have sufficiently pleaded a Fourth Amendment violation based on the second warrantless entry. . . . Given that we are reversing the court’s rulings on the Class A kennel issue, the consent-once-removed doctrine, and procedural due process issue, the court’s analysis of the O’Neills’ Fourth Amendment and procedural due process claims will necessarily change, as will its determination of what law was or was not clearly established. We accordingly remand the qualified-immunity issue to the district court for further proceedings in light of our opinion.”) Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 941-43 (6th Cir. 2011) (“Although we refused to address whether Wheeler’s first Fourth Amendment claim actually presented a constitutional violation, we must address the constitutionality of her second claim in order to determine whether Wirth is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The warrant to search Wheeler’s apartment listed broad categories of stolen property, providing no basis to distinguish the stolen items from Wheeler’s own personal property. Moreover, it appears that officers had additional information about the stolen items to be seized that they could have included in the warrant. . . . Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity from this aspect of Wheeler’s claim, as it would be apparent to a reasonable officer that listing general categories of items to be seized even though further details are available violates the Fourth Amendment’s specificity requirement. . . .Because a reasonable officer would have known that the warrant was deficient, Wirth is not entitled to qualified immunity on this portion of Wheeler's Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Barker v. Goodrich, 649 F.3d 428, 435-37 (6th Cir. 2011) (“Defendants had fair warning in 2007 that their conduct was unconstitutional. Case law from the Supreme Court, this Court, and other circuits established at that time that each condition seen here—restraining an inmate in an uncomfortable position, denying access to water, and denying access to the toilet—could rise to an Eighth Amendment violation if allowed to persist for an extended period. These cases, taken together with the notice given by normal prison practice and the obvious cruelty inherent in the conduct, clearly established that Defendants’ alleged conduct—subjecting Barker to all of these conditions at once for a period in excess of twelve hours—violated Barker’s Eighth Amendment rights. . . . Although Ort and Gates come from the Eleventh and Fifth Circuits, respectively, and so are not binding on this Court, neither are they ‘single idiosyncratic opinions’ from other circuits. . . . Moreover, these cases were thoroughly analyzed and served as the basis for the Supreme Court’s decision in Hope—a decision that is certainly binding on this Court. . . . They are thus sufficient to give the Defendants fair warning. A defendant’s deviation from normal practice and prison policies can also provide notice that his actions are improper. . . . In this case, the evidence establishes that normal procedure would have been to change Barker’s clothing and remove his handcuffs before placing him in the observation cell, thus allowing him full use of his hands to rest comfortably and access the water fountain and toilet. Defendants argue that they deviated from this practice because Barker was resisting the removal of his handcuffs. However, for the purposes of qualified immunity, this Court must take the plaintiff’s evidence as true. . . . Thus, the fact that Defendants deviated from normal procedure, even though Barker was cooperating and removal of the handcuffs would have been simple, provides further evidence that Defendants knew their conduct was unconstitutional. Furthermore, Hope makes clear that the obvious cruelty inherent in a punishment can serve as notice that it is unconstitutional. . . . Taking Barker’s evidence as true, he was handcuffed in an uncomfortable position for over twelve hours for no legitimate purpose, and denied even the basic dignity of relieving himself. The obvious cruelty in Defendants’ actions warned them that they were violating the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, the constitutional right was clearly established and we REVERSE the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to all Defendants.”)

Gaspers v. Ohio Dept. Of Youth Service, 648 F.3d 400, 417(6th Cir. 2011) (“Here, as in Adkins and Sowards, plaintiffs’ right of intimate association was clearly established by the Supreme Court as early as 1984 and by this court as early as 1993—long before William was terminated and Aldine was demoted and transferred. As a result, it was objectively reasonable to require the individual defendants to be aware of and to observe this constitutional right.”)

Pritchard v. Hamilton Township Bd. of Trustees, 424 F. App’x 492, ___(6th Cir. 2011) (“At first blush it might seem unduly harsh to have an expectation that law enforcement officers should know the intricacies of criminal statutes, but this position finds support in other areas of the qualified immunity doctrine that regularly impute knowledge of statutes and caselaw to officers.

Indeed, it is a touchstone of qualified immunity doctrine that ‘a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.’ . . . For instance, we impute knowledge of state-law definitions and state-court interpretations of a statute to police officers when we decide whether an officer could reasonably conclude that probable cause exists under a given set of circumstances. . . . In light of these principles, and the abundantly plain language of the statute at issue here, we hold that the Defendant officers did not have probable cause to arrest Christman for underage drinking because the facts and circumstances known to the officers established a statutorily affirmative justification of the suspected criminal act.”)

Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, Ky., 635 F.3d 210, 214-19 (6th Cir. 2011) (“For purposes of this appeal, Schutzman concedes that a genuine issue of material fact exists about the amount of noise that Kennedy made, and therefore whether Schutzman violated Kennedy’s constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest. At stake is the second question: whether Kennedy’s constitutional right to be free from wrongful arrest in these circumstances was clearly established such that Schutzman should have known of it. We conclude that Kennedy’s right was clearly established. . . . In the context of qualified immunity, preexisting, clearly established law refers to ‘binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point.’ . . . Given the context of the arrest as Kennedy has portrayed it, a reasonable officer could not conclude that Kennedy’s outburst provided probable cause for his arrest. . . . Regardless of why Schutzman made the arrest, the relevant inquiry is whether an officer with no ill will toward Kennedy could have believed that he had probable cause to arrest Kennedy. We answer no, rendering qualified immunity inappropriate on the claim of wrongful arrest. . . . In contrast to its role in the Fourth Amendment context, motive is relevant to Kennedy’s claim that Schutzman arrested Kennedy in retaliation for Kennedy’s exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . . At the summary-judgment stage, this evidence suffices to show that the content of Kennedy’s speech may have been a motivating factor for Schutzman to arrest Kennedy. Finally, Kennedy’s right to be free from retaliatory arrest after insulting an officer was clearly established.”)

U.S. v. Buford, 632 F.3d 264, 276 n.10 (6th Cir. 2011) (“Gant itself underscored the reasonableness of an officer’s reliance on settled law, even if that law is later overturned. The Court noted that qualified immunity will shield officers from liability in civil suits challenging unconstitutional vehicle searches conducted before Gant because such officers acted in ‘reasonable reliance’ on the then-prevailing and ‘widely accepted’ understanding of Belton. . . . That observation directly supports the conclusion that the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule applies in criminal prosecutions because the qualified immunity test turns on the same standard of reasonableness as the good-faith exception.”)

Ellison v. Balinski, 625 F.3d 953, 959 (6th Cir., 2010) (“While police generally are entitled to rely on a judicially secured warrant for immunity from liability for unconstitutional searches, qualified immunity is not appropriate ‘where the warrant application is so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence unreasonable.’ . . . Here, a jury could reasonably determine that this affidavit—mentioning no specific crimes thought probably committed, making no link between Plaintiff's residence and any crime, yet seeking broad authority for a search of Plaintiff's entire residence for any document 'pertaining to' Plaintiff--was so lacking in indicia of probable cause to render Defendant's belief in its existence objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, the district court was correct to deny Defendant's motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Elkins v. Summit County, Ohio, 615 F.3d 671, 676, 677 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Having assumed that the officers received the Mann memorandum and did not divulge it, we must next determine whether that failure violated Elkins' constitutional right to due process. . . . [I]n Moldowan, we held that 'the due process guarantees recognized in Brady also impose an analogous or derivative obligation on the police [to disclose to the prosecutor evidence whose materially exculpatory value should have been 'apparent' to him at the time of his investigation]'. . . Thus, Elkins had a constitutional right to have favorable evidence disclosed to the prosecution and court. . . In Moldowan, we found that 'at least three circuits recognized prior to August 1990 ... this right was clearly established,'. . . and that the right may have been clearly established as early as 1964. . . Thus, Elkins' right to have the Mann memorandum disclosed was clearly established on January 5, 1999.")

Knisley v. Pike County Joint Vocational School Dist., 604 F.3d 977, 982, 983 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The United States Supreme Court has asked us to reconsider this case in light of Redding, in which the Court invalidated a strip search of a female student when looking for ibuprofen tablets. Redding, 129 S.Ct. at 2642-43. The Court, however, found that the officials at issue were nevertheless protected by qualified immunity because (1) there was no clearly established law finding unconstitutional the strip searching of students under materially similar circumstances from the Supreme Court and (2) the appellate courts who had ruled in factually similar circumstances were not in concert. Id. at 2643-44. Essentially, the Redding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit had clearly established case law on point . . . and there was no national consensus on this issue among the Circuits at the time of the Redding search. . . However, this Circuit's law on student strip searches was clearly established as early as 2005, when we published our opinion in Beard. We read Redding to affirm our constitutional holding in Beard. Thus, because Beard remains good constitutional law and because that law was clearly established at the time of the strip search in this case, Redding does not require a result contrary to that reached in Knisley I. . . Our Circuit's clearly established case law on this issue put the school and its employees on notice that this search was unconstitutional, so defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity protection.").

Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Defendants contend that the law was not clearly established because the law was unclear about what standard applies to Harris's excessive force claims (i.e., the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment). We reject that argument because even if there were some lingering ambiguity as to whether the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment applies in this precise context, the 'legal norms' underlying Harris's claims nevertheless were clearly established. A defendant is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity simply because the courts have not ‘agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.’ . . . Under this circuit’s existing case law, there undoubtedly is a clearly established legal norm precluding the use of violent physical force against a criminal suspect who already has been subdued and does not present a danger to himself or others. . . . Thus, even if it were unclear whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs Harris’s excessive force claims, the legal norms underlying those claims were nevertheless clearly established.”).

Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 378, 381-84, 386-89 (6th Cir. 2009) (“Because prosecutors rely so heavily on the police and other law enforcement authorities, the obligations imposed under Brady would be largely ineffective if those other members of the prosecution team had no responsibility to inform the prosecutor about evidence that undermined the state’s preferred theory of the crime. As a practical matter then, Brady’s ultimate concern for ensuring that criminal defendants receive a ‘fundamentally fair’ trial . . . demands that “Brady’s protections also extend to actions of other law enforcement officers such as investigating officers,” White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir.2008). Although this Court has not yet directly addressed the issue, a number of our decisions support this conclusion. . . . If the police can be expected to recognize what evidence must be preserved, certainly it is not too burdensome to demand that they simply turn that same information over to the prosecutor’s office. . . . For most of the same reasons we have laid out here, virtually every other circuit has concluded either that the police share in the state’s obligations under Brady, or that the Constitution imposes on the police obligations analogous to those recognized in Brady. . . . Although our recognition of this type of a claim is more recent and less specific, the overwhelming number of decisions from other circuits recognizing this type of claim satisfies us that any reasonable police officer would know that suppressing exculpatory evidence was a violation of the accused’s constitutional rights. . . . Notwithstanding the concurrence’s argument to the contrary, the cases in this area clearly establish that police actions taken in bad faith are not the only species of police conduct that can deprive criminal defendants of the due process guaranteed by the Constitution. We acknowledge that a number of courts, including the Supreme Court, have held that a showing of bad faith is required to prevail on a claim that the police deprived a defendant of due process by concealing or withholding evidence that is only ‘potentially useful.’ But, where the police are aware that the evidence in their possession is exculpatory, the Supreme Court’s decisions in this area indicate that the police have an absolute duty to preserve and disclose that information. The critical issue in determining whether bad faith is required thus is not whether the evidence is withheld by the prosecutor or the police, but rather whether the exculpatory value of the evidence is ‘apparent’ or not. . . . In other words, the critical issue in determining whether government conduct deprived a criminal defendant of a fair trial is the nature of the evidence that was withheld; it emphatically is not the mental state of the government official who suppressed the evidence. . . . Simply put, where the evidence withheld or destroyed by the police falls into that more serious category, the defendant is not required to make any further showing regarding the mental state of the police. . . . The only difference in the requisite inquiry is that, where the police are concerned, the ‘exculpatory value’ of the evidence must be ‘apparent.’ . . . Where the exculpatory value of a piece of evidence is ‘apparent,’ the police have an unwavering constitutional duty to preserve and ultimately disclose that evidence. . . . The reason no further showing of animus or bad faith is required is that, where the police have in their possession evidence that they know or should know ‘might be expected to play a significant role in the suspect’s defense,’ . . . the destruction or concealment of that evidence can never be done ‘in good faith and in accord with their normal practice,’ Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 242 (1961). Consequently, requiring a criminal defendant or § 1983 plaintiff to show a ‘conscious’ or ‘calculated’ effort to suppress such evidence would be superfluous.”)

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 557 (6th Cir. 2008) (“[Defendants] argue that any constitutional protection Back enjoyed could not have been clearly established because, as in Cope, ‘there was no published decision ... holding that political compatibility is not ... an appropriate requirement for [her former] position.’ . . . In one sense, they are right. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has ever held that the Internal Policy Analyst III job in the Kentucky Office of Homeland Security is a nonpolitical job. But in a more fundamental way, they are wrong. The absence of such a precise holding does not prevent the relevant law from being clearly established, even in the particularized sense that our case law requires.”).

Parsons v. City of Pontiac, 533 F.3d 492, 504 (6th Cir. 2008) (“Detectives Martin and McKinney . . . are entitled to qualified immunity unless their actions ‘were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established right.’ . . . But viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Parsons, a jury could find that their actions were not objectively reasonable. The problem is not that they ignored exculpatory evidence in arresting a suspect as in Gardenhire, . . . but that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether they possessed sufficient inculpatory evidence to reasonably believe that Parsons shot Frantz. We therefore conclude that the decision of the district court with regard to qualified immunity for Martin and McKinney must be reversed.”).

Jacob v. Township of West Bloomfield, 531 F.3d 385, 391, 392 (6th Cir. 2008) (“Because the warrantless searches at issue in this case began in 1999, there is no question that the Fourth Amendment’s protection of the intimate area surrounding Plaintiff’s home was clearly established at the time of Defendant’s entry upon the property. Indeed, the Supreme Court’s longstanding precedents show that it was clearly established at the time of Defendant’s intrusion onto Plaintiff’s land that such a criminal investigation is constrained by the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement.”).

El Bey v. Roop, 530 F.3d 407, 421 (6th Cir. 2008) (“Reasonable officers presented with the circumstances as alleged by El Bey should have known that a warrantless search of El Bey’s home, and an arrest based on an outstanding warrant that was discovered only as a result of the warrantless search, would be unconstitutional.”).

Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 689 (6th Cir. 2008) (“The facts viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff demonstrate that defendants knew because of their NAPPI training that restraining a patient face-down on the floor and putting pressure on a patient's back posed a substantial risk of asphyxiation. Despite knowledge of this risk, defendants chose to restrain Lanman using these dangerous restraint techniques. Their actions were objectively unreasonable given the fact that plaintiff's eyewitness testified that defendants continued to restrain Lanman in this dangerous position five minutes after he wasn't resisting at all and looked like he was passed out. It would have been clear to defendants that it was not necessary to continue restraining a patient who looked like he was passed out with techniques that pose a substantial risk of asphyxiation. A reasonable official in defendants' positions would understand that his actions violated Lanman's constitutional right to freedom from undue bodily restraint."").

Jones v. City of Cincinnati, 521 F.3d 555, 559, 560 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The complaint alleges that the six officers who subdued Jones (1) savagely beat him with batons, striking him at least 33 times without giving him a chance to comply with their orders; (2) sprayed chemical irritant in his face after they had placed him in handcuffs; and (3) used their combined weight to hold him prone on the ground after he had stopped struggling. Such use of force is not objectively reasonable, and hence a violation of Jones's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The right of an unresisting suspect to be free from baton strikes, 'significant pressure on [his] back,' and a dose of chemical irritants was clearly established over three years before Jones died. . . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones are not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . . The defendants argue that this case should be analyzed under the heightened malice standard because there was little time between taking Jones into custody and the time he stopped breathing. We disagree. The complaint alleges that the officers left Jones on the ground for a prolonged time and that they 'stood there and discussed the absence of fire personnel' after they noticed Jones was not breathing. These facts are similar to those in Owensby, in which this Court ruled that the deliberate indifference standard was appropriate because the six minutes between taking the suspect into custody and the time medical care was provided gave the officers 'time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct.' . . . The complaint alleges that each of the officers present—the six who subdued Jones and the three sergeants who arrived afterwards—knew that the handcuffed Jones was not breathing. Therefore each knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to Jones's safety while he was in their custody and disregarded that risk by failing to provide aid. The right of a suspect in custody to receive adequate medical care, even if the suspect had been fleeing and resisting before the officers placed him in custody, was clearly established almost three years before Jones's death. . . . Therefore, the officers who subdued Jones and the sergeants who arrived soon after are not entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to provide medical care claim."").

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The undisputed facts of this case are that King repeatedly interfered with an ongoing criminal investigation, that after King had done so twice, Officer Ambs warned King that 'if he said one more word' he would be arrested for so doing, and that King continued to interfere with the officer's attempt to interview Klein. Based on these facts, and regardless of whether King actually 'spoke over' Officer Ambs, it is clear that King was arrested for the act of disrupting the officer's investigation, and not for the content of his speech. . . . [A]s with our analysis of King's Fourth Amendment claim above, while King's arrest did not violate any constitutional right, and the first step of the qualified immunity analysis is not met, even if the holding in Hill could be extended to apply to King's arrest under the particular facts of this case, Officer Ambs would still be entitled to qualified immunity as to the alleged First Amendment violation. For a violation to be clearly established, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Because a reasonable officer would not have known that enforcement of the Columbia Township obstruction ordinance in the context of this case violated the First Amendment, the right was not clearly established and Officer Ambs would be entitled to qualified immunity at the second step of the Saucier analysis.")

King v. Ambs, 519 F.3d 607, 615, 625 (6th Cir. 2008) (O'Malley, District Judge, dissenting) ("The majority, much like the district court before it, appears loathe to allow a civil rights action to proceed where that action would give voice to the complaints of an obnoxious, disrespectful and likely intoxicated young man, whose own classless conduct led to his arrest. I certainly sympathize with that apparent concern. Established First Amendment jurisprudence counsels against indulging such concerns, however, especially in the context presented here. . . . Put simply, the majority concludes that the First Amendment right was not clearly established because no protected First Amendment conduct occurred. Putting aside its circularity, the ultimate conclusion that the right at issue here was not clearly established can not be squared with the state of the law when the arrest occurred. At least twenty years ago, the Supreme Court made clear that, within reason, individuals may not be subject to arrest merely because they interrupt or challenge police conduct. . . . The majority's decision today provides a broad shield to police officers who seek to enforce obstruction statutes against those engaged in speech-related challenges to police activity. It simply cannot be squared, however, with well-established, and, indeed, important First Amendment jurisprudence.").

Dorsey v. Barber, 517 F.3d 389, 394, 400 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[A]lthough the district court couched its ruling in terms of factual disputes, the pure legal issue legitimately before us on appeal concerns whether Begin's display of his firearm in conjunction with ordering plaintiffs to lie face-down on the ground for a period of time undisputedly no greater than two minutes—until additional law enforcement support arrived and control of the scene was assumed by a superior officer—constituted an unreasonable seizure or an excessive use of force in violation of plaintiffs' clearly established rights, of which a reasonable officer would have known. . . . [W]e have no trouble concluding that Begin made a mistake. Considering that the suspects were wanted in connection with an auto theft investigation, . . . and that plaintiffs did not manifestly pose an immediate threat to anyone's safety or a risk of flight, Begin should have been able to 'stop and hold' them without brandishing his firearm and ordering them to lie face-down on the pavement. Begin's response to the apparent demands of the situation seems to have been exaggerated and the resultant seizure, though supported by reasonable suspicion, was, due to the unnecessarily intrusive means employed by Begin, at least arguably unreasonable. . . . Yet, it does not follow that Begin's mistake necessarily disqualifies him from qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' . . . There is no support for the notion that Begin knowingly and deliberately violated plaintiffs' right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Nor can his mistake be fairly characterized as so egregious as to suggest outright incompetence. At worst, Begin made an error of judgment, erring on the side of public safety. Not knowing the seriousness of the criminal activity for which the suspects were wanted, but knowing that the persons before him, who matched the BOLO description, had first disregarded and then resisted his orders to stop, Begin chose to stabilize the situation by acting with a preemptive show of authority. This approach turned out to be unnecessary, but cannot be said to have been plainly incompetent or objectively unreasonable.”).

Brannum v. Overton County School Board, 516 F.3d 489, 494, 495, 498, 499(6th Cir. 2008) (“Before explaining our Fourth Amendment analysis, we think it might be useful to explain why we do not assess the students’ privacy claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This court has held that the constitutional right to privacy, which includes the right to shield one’s body from exposure to viewing by the opposite sex, derives from the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Due Process Clause. . . We are aware that some circuits have found that the same privacy right is located in the Due Process Clause. . . . However, since the Fourth Amendment approach is the precedent in this circuit, and the Supreme Court seems to prefer it, . . . we will follow our precedent. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever addressed the applicability of video surveillance to the Fourth Amendment’s proscription against unreasonable searches. However, the Supreme Court has applied the amendment’s guarantees to practices that were not in existence at the time the amendment was enacted and has instructed that in such cases, the ultimate measure of the constitutionality of such searches is one of ‘reasonableness.’ . . . We are satisfied that both the students’ expectation of privacy and the character of the intrusion are greater in this case than those at issue in Vernonia and T.L.O. We conclude that the locker room videotaping was a search, unreasonable in its scope, and violated the students’ Fourth Amendment privacy rights. . . . In analyzing whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look ‘principally to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and this circuit to determine whether the law was clearly established at the time of the action.’ . . . The Supreme Court has left it to the lower federal courts to decide, case by case, what ‘clearly established’ means when applied to factual situations not previously confronted by the Supreme Court. The Court provided some guidance in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 199 (2004), when it announced that the specific constitutional right at issue must be clearly established when considered at an appropriate level of specificity and cannot be asserted at a high level of generality. . . . Some personal liberties are so fundamental to human dignity as to need no specific explication in our Constitution in order to ensure their protection against government invasion. Surreptitiously videotaping the plaintiffs in various states of undress is plainly among them. . . . Stated differently, and more specifically, a person of ordinary common sense, to say nothing of professional school administrators, would know without need for specific instruction from a federal court, that teenagers have an inherent personal dignity, a sense of decency and self-respect, and a sensitivity about their bodily privacy that are at the core of their personal liberty and that are grossly offended by their being surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes in a school locker room. These notions of personal privacy are ‘clearly established’ in that they inhere in all of us, particularly middle school teenagers, and are inherent in the privacy component of the Fourth Amendment's proscription against unreasonable searches. But even if that were not self-evident, the cases we have discussed, supra, would lead a reasonable school administrator to conclude that the students' constitutionally protected privacy right not to be surreptitiously videotaped while changing their clothes is judicially clearly established.”).

Figel v. Overton, 263 F. App'x 456, 2008 WL 341458, *3 (6th Cir. Feb. 6, 2008) (“At the time of the alleged conduct, one circuit had already concluded that the RULPA [sic] was constitutional, see Mayweathers v. Newland, 314 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir.2002), and five circuits, including the Ninth, had concluded that the identical operative language in RFRA did not violate the Establishment Clause. . . Thus, at the time of Defendants' alleged unconstitutional acts, the RULPA [sic] was presumptively constitutional, and no federal appellate authority was to the contrary. Thus, at the time of the conduct in question, the constitutionality of the RULPA [sic] was clearly established and Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Figel's RULPA [sic] claim. . . . Defendants' reliance on Key is misplaced. In Key, this Court addressed the applicability of the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Rehabilitation Act to prisoners, noting that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity during the time that there was uncertainty on this issue. . . Unlike those statutes, it is clear from the face of the state that the RULPA [sic] applies to prisoners. Further, as noted above, until November 7, 2003, when Cutter was decided by this Circuit, the RULPA [sic] was valid law requiring compliance by prison officials.”).

Logsdon v. Hains, 492 F.3d 334, 346 (6th Cir. 2007) (“The contours of the First Amendment public forum doctrine are sufficiently clear. Here, Defendants ostensibly arrested Plaintiff for violating Ohio's criminal trespass law. However, if instead, as Plaintiff appears to allege, Defendants arrested him because of the content of his speech, then Defendants acted in violation of the First Amendment in ways that should have been clear to a reasonable officer. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the district court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's First Amendment claims. We reverse because Plaintiff stated a claim, but express no opinion as to whether Plaintiff will ultimately succeed on his claim following discovery.”).

Peete v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 486 F.3d 217, 219, 221, 223 (6th Cir. 2007) (“We find no case authority holding that paramedics answering a 911 emergency request for help engage in a Fourth Amendment ‘seizure’ of the person when restraining the person while trying to render aid. Hence there is no ‘clearly established law’ creating federal liability for a constitutional tort under these circumstances. The district court, therefore, erred in failing to grant qualified immunity to the paramedics. . . . [W]here the purpose is to render solicited aid in an emergency rather than to enforce the law, punish, deter, or incarcerate, there is no federal case authority creating a constitutional liability for the negligence, deliberate indifference, and incompetence alleged in the instant case. The Eighth Amendment ‘Cruel and Unusual Punishment’ Clause raising a ‘deliberate indifference’ standard does not apply here because Becerra was not incarcerated and the purpose of the alleged wrong was not punishment. . . . Assuming arguendo that the restraint techniques used by the EMT's were excessive or medically unreasonable, the plaintiff may be entitled to recovery under the state law of negligence, but improper medical treatment by a government employee, standing alone, does not violate the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . . The custody exception imposes on state officials a ‘constitutional duty to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners ... and those under similar restraint of personal liberty.’. . . The court in Jackson held that a constitutional duty was not triggered where paramedics placed an individual wounded by a gunshot into their ambulance and began transporting him to the hospital. The District Court had held that moving an unconscious patient into the ambulance constituted custody, but we held that ‘the concept of custody does not extend this far.’. . . The facts in the present case similarly fail to allege that Becerra was taken into custody. He was restrained while he was unconscious, and the defendants’ actions were undertaken in an effort to render medical treatment. This is easily distinguished from the archetypical custody exception case where jail or prison officials fail to provide medical treatment to an incarcerated individual.”).

Koulta v. Merciez, 477 F.3d 442, 448 (6th Cir. 2007) (“Even if we assumed for the sake of argument that the officers’ actions violated Koulta’s substantive due process rights, his estate cannot show that these rights were ‘clearly established’ at the time of the accident. Not just in 2002, but since then as well, our cases have failed to recognize a ‘state-created danger’ claim unless the State indeed created the danger-either by increasing the risk of harm to third parties by its affirmative conduct or by doing something that endangers a discrete member or group of the public. . . . The estate has not identified a case from our circuit or any other that clearly establishes the contours of a substantive-due-process right of action on facts like these.”).

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 830, 831 (6th Cir. 2007) (“Here, the ‘contours’ of Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights were ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand’ that detaining Plaintiffs over two hours after they dispelled any reasonable suspicions ripened the investigatory stop into an arrest absent probable cause. . . . Although Defendants confronted novel factual circumstances, the unlawfulness of their conduct should have been apparent in light of well-settled precedent of the Supreme Court and of this Circuit.”)

See also Center for Bio-Ethical Reform Inc. v. City of Springboro, 2007 WL 4322234, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ohio Dec. 7, 2007) (“The Court agrees with Defendants Morris and Shaw that there is a reasonable probability that four Justices of the Supreme Court would grant certiorari in this case and a majority of at least five would vote to overturn the decision of the Sixth Circuit. The Supreme Court in recent years has been particularly solicitous of the doctrine of qualified immunity; it has taken many cases raising that issue and not infrequently reversed courts of appeals on the issue. See, e.g., from the 2006 Term, Morse v. Frederick, 127 S.Ct. 2618, 168 L.Ed.2d 290 (2007)(the “bong hits for Jesus” case); Scott v. Harris, 127 S.Ct. 1769 (2007). These were two out of only sixty-eight cases, the smallest Supreme Court docket since the mid-19th century. However, Defendants Morris and Shaw cannot demonstrate that they will suffer any substantial harm from denial of the stay. They argue, correctly, that the doctrine of qualified immunity protects public officials not only from liability, but also from suit and the inconveniences attendant on defending litigation. . . . Because qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as from damages, a public official who pleads a qualified immunity defense is entitled to have that defense decided before the case proceeds even to discovery. . . . Had Defendants Morris and Shaw sought such relief, they would have been entitled to have their qualified immunity defense decided before any discovery took place and could have taken an interlocutory appeal from an adverse decision. However, they did not exercise that right in this case, but permitted the case to proceed to discovery without objection. They are not now faced with any additional discovery burden: discovery was completed in this case before the pre-appeal summary judgment motions were filed. After remand, the Court conducted a scheduling conference and no party suggested the need for any additional discovery in the case (See Scheduling Order, Doc. No. 102). Thus the only immediate burden Defendants Morris and Shaw face is the burden of briefing the currently pending Motion for Summary Judgment. That burden will fall entirely on the shoulders of their counsel and the performance of their important duties as special agents of the F.B.I. will in no way be impacted. A different situation might be presented if the case were set for immediate trial, but in fact the trial date is not until August, 2008. As Plaintiffs note, the Supreme Court is very likely to decide any petition for certiorari by that time. Of course, if the Court grants certiorari, this Court will then stay its proceedings. Thus Defendants Morris and Shaw will not suffer the harms which the doctrine of qualified immunity shields them from by denial of the stay. Moreover, the stay will work harm to others. The asserted interference with Plaintiffs' constitutional rights occurred in June, 2002; even without a stay, it will be more than six years before they receive a trial. The other Defendants in the case also deserve finality and have not sought a stay Even without a stay, the Court was unable in September, 2007, to confirm a trial date in less than eleven months because of counsels' trial calendars. Unless the Supreme Court decides to grant certiorari, this Court is loathe to lose the currently set trial date.”).

Haynes v. City of Circleville, Ohio, 474 F.3d 357, 364, 365 (6th Cir. 2007) (“In lodging his protests to Chief Gray against the training cutbacks, Haynes was acting as a public employee carrying out his professional responsibilities Haynes’s speech is therefore unprotected as a matter of law because all of the speech at issue in this case, like the speech at issue in Garcetti, was made pursuant to his official duties. As a police officer, Haynes had developed the standard operating procedure for the canine unit and worked with his dog as part of his day-to-day professional activities. His memo to Chief Gray, made pursuant to these professional duties, is not protected under the First Amendment. At the time that Haynes sent his memo in February of 2003, he was simply speculating that someday there could be a negative incident that might result from the reduction in canine training. Haynes’s memo focused on his discontent with the new program, which he later admitted in his deposition was in compliance with Ohio law. The memo thus reflects nothing more than ‘the quintessential employee beef: management has acted incompetently.’. . . Haynes’s invocation in his memo of legal terms such as ‘deliberate indifference’ and ‘failure to train’ do not, without more, render Haynes’s speech a matter of public concern. . . . In short, the district court erred in concluding that Haynes’s memo constituted protected speech even under the law of this circuit prior to Garcetti. Haynes thus has no First Amendment cause of action even if Chief Gray did fire him as a direct result of either the memo or the ill-fated ‘Christmas gift.’ . . . Because Haynes’s speech took place pursuant to his official duties as a police officer, he cannot establish that a constitutional violation took place. . . . Haynes is a fortiori unable to satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis—that the constitutional right was clearly established.”).

Carver v. City of Cincinnati, 474 F.3d 283, 287 (6th Cir. 2007) (“There are no cases that present facts similar to Carver’s situation that would make it ‘clear to [an objectively] reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . The district court, citing to Beck v. Haik, 377 F.3d 624, 643 (6th Cir., 2004), found it clearly established that the officers violated Carver’s constitutional rights. Beck, however, stands for the proposition that the state may not cut off access to private rescue without providing an adequate state alternative of aid. In this case, unlike Beck, there were no allegations of any attempted private rescue. There are no other cases from this circuit or the Supreme Court with analogous facts to the one before us. Therefore, the law was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation.”).

Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416, 427-29 (6th Cir. 2006) (“Here, we have already determined that there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether Rice violated Perez’s Eighth Amendment constitutional right. Thus, though it is a close case, we cannot hold that Rice is entitled to qualified immunity (on summary judgment) based on the first step of the qualified immunity analysis. We thus move to the second step of the qualified immunity test; we determine whether the right violated was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the violation. . . . In the context of a prisoner’s Eighth Amendment medical-care claim, such precedent had to alert Rice that her conduct was deliberately indifferent to a strong likelihood that Perez would try to kill himself. . . . In Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693 (2001), this court held that once a prisoner has been deemed suicidal, it is clearly established that the prisoner is entitled to continuing medical treatment. Here, Perez was not deemed to be suicidal at the time he was moved to the single cell. Additionally, Perez was not generally deprived of medical treatment involving his mental health needs. Thus, Perez Sr. would have to prove that his son’s right to have his serious medical needs treated without deliberate indifference encompassed a right to a correct assessment of his suicide risk or an effective suicide-monitoring arrangement. . . . Perez identifies no pre-November 2002 published decision of the U.S. Supreme Court or this court requiring such a determination, nor have we found any. If no binding precedent is available that directly holds that conduct materially or fundamentally similar to Rice’s was unlawful in October-November 2002 under the circumstances, as is the case here, the court may still find that Rice violated a clearly established right through one other avenue: showing ‘a generally applicable principle from either binding or persuasive authorities whose specific application to the relevant controversy’ is also clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct was unconstitutional.”). . . . However, Perez Sr. failed to show such a principle. On the contrary, by October 2002 this circuit’s published case law had established that inmates have no general right to be correctly screened for suicidal tendencies. . . . The circuit’s published case law also held that ‘the generalized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference [to a known serious medical need] cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide.”).

Baranski v. Fifteen Unknown Agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, 452 F.3d 433, 447-50 (6th Cir. 2006) (en banc) (“Doubtless, the agents would have been wiser to bring a written summary of the items to be seized (presumably signed by the magistrate) or to list the items to be seized in the warrant itself. There seems to be little doubt (and none has been offered by the United States) that agents who choose to rely on an incorporated affidavit typically have good reason and ample means to avoid complaints like this one. But the question is whether the Fourth Amendment demands these things, even when the purposes of doing them have been satisfied and even when the failure to do them has not prejudiced the property owners. On this record and under these circumstances, we hold that no constitutional violation occurred. . . But even if that were not the case, even if the search violated the Fourth Amendment, it did not violate ‘clearly established’ law. . . . Even aside from this mirror-image precedent from another circuit, the prevailing law in this circuit would have led reasonable agents to believe that their conduct was legal at the time they conducted the search. [discussing cases] . . . Groh does not alter this conclusion. The Court could criticize that search as warrantless because the warrant contained a ‘glaring deficiency’ upon issuance recognizable by ‘any reasonable police officer[.]’ . . . Absent any evidence on the face of the warrant that it incorporated the attached affidavit, the Court concluded, the warrant was ‘manifestly invalid,’ ‘warrantless’ and thus ‘constitutionally fatal.’ . . . Today’s facts offer a poor analogy. At the time of issuance, this warrant specifically incorporated the affidavit (‘See Attached Affidavit’), which in turn particularly described the items to be seized. Far from invalidating incorporated affidavits, Groh recognized that they may satisfy the particularity requirement, and in this case no one disputes that the warrant upon issuance appropriately incorporated the affidavit and that the magistrate reviewed, approved and signed the warrant and affidavit. At the time of issuance, in marked contrast to Groh, no amount of study by the agents or the magistrate would have revealed a constitutional infirmity in the warrant. Nor did Groh say that it was clearly established that a warrant valid upon issuance becomes invalid upon execution if the incorporated affidavit does not accompany the search. The words of the Constitution, to which the Court referred in concluding that the Groh warrant was facially invalid, establish particularity requirements that apply by their terms upon the ‘issu[ance]’ of a warrant, not upon the execution of it. Whether a particularized warrant at the time of issuance may become an unparticularized warrant when a cross-referenced affidavit does not accompany the search remains a matter of continued debate among the circuits and remains an issue that neither the text of the Fourth Amendment nor Groh resolves. We thus conclude that even if this search had violated the Fourth Amendment right, it did not violate ‘clearly established’ constitutional law, and accordingly the agents should receive qualified immunity.”).

Silberstein v. City of Dayton, 440 F.3d 306, 316, 317 (6th Cir. 2006) (“The Board Members do not dispute that a City of Dayton employee in the classified service had a clearly established right to a pre-termination hearing at the time of Silberstein’s termination; rather, they argue that Silberstein’s status as a classified employee is disputable such that a reasonable person would not know that he or she was violating Silberstein's rights. . . . No reasonable official reading the plain language of the Charter would reach the conclusion that Silberstein was an unclassified employee. Although some cases reveal disagreement or ambiguity regarding an employee's status as classified or unclassified, these cases address whether an employee's position falls within the particular statutory language defining the categories of unclassified service. . . . Silberstein's position was clearly established as classified not only by the plain language of the Charter but also by general understanding and practice.”).

Caudill v. Hollan, 431 F.3d 900, 913, 914 (6th Cir. 2005) (“We believe that Hall, Heggen, and McCloud make the law in this circuit with respect to patronage dismissals of these types of county employees clearly established with the requisite specificity to satisfy the Supreme Court's requirement that the law ‘clearly establish[] in [a] more particularized sense’ that the act was unconstitutional. . . . The duties of the deputy sheriffs described in Hall are little different from the duties of the deputy clerks here. Deputy sheriffs duties were described in Heggen as ‘including road patrol, serving arrest warrants and civil papers, taking complaints and ‘working’ auto accidents, ... transport [ing] prisoners[,] and providing courtroom security.’ . . . Heggen described all of these duties as ‘nonpolicymaking duties.’ . . . Deputy clerks, whose work is essentially clerical work, also perform nonpolicymaking duties. Although deputy sheriffs and deputy clerks engage in different tasks, their respective levels of responsibility and the nature of their jobs are not so different as to cause this court to find that the law with respect to deputy sheriffs is clearly established, but that the law with respect to deputy clerks is not clearly established. In addition, Hager's duties are also best described as nonpolicymaking duties. It is difficult to understand how a reasonable official could believe that it would be constitutionally permissible to terminate a clerical employee like a deputy clerk through political patronage, when this court has held that it is not constitutionally permissible to terminate a deputy sheriff or a teacher and administrator of a gifted and talented program through political patronage. Furthermore, were this court to hold that Hall, Heggen, and Hager did not make the law clearly established for deputy county clerks, we would be ignoring the Supreme Court's rule that ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . Were this court to require position-specific findings before it found that the law was clearly established, we would be, in effect, requiring a previous finding on the constitutionality of patronage dismissals for every government position before holding that the law was clearly established for that position. Such a finding could lead to the result that similarly situated county officials could engage in political patronage dismissals at least once with impunity, unless and until a court ruled on the constitutionality of political patronage for that particular position. Such a result is not warranted by logic or precedent. . . . In sum, by virtue of McCloud, Heggen, and Hager, Defendant had sufficient notice that patronage dismissals in Kentucky were constitutionally suspect. These cases alone are enough to find that the rule prohibiting patronage dismissals of deputy county clerks was clearly established. The memo from the Boyd County Attorney warning new county executives against patronage dismissals further solidifies our holding that a reasonable official would be on notice that patronage dismissals would violate the constitutional rights of county employees in most circumstances.”).

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 232, 233 (6th Cir., 2005)(“Evans-Marshall has made allegations sufficient to satisfy the first prong of qualified immunity, that ‘the officer[s]’ conduct violated a constitutional right[.]’ . . . Since the Complaint adequately alleges a claim of First Amendment retaliation, there are sufficient allegations to support a claim that the individual defendants violated Evans-Marshall’s constitutional rights by terminating her. . . . Evans-Marshall’s claim also satisfies the second prong of qualified immunity, that ‘the right was clearly established.’ . . . Under a liberal reading of the Complaint, Evans-Marshall was terminated due to a public outcry engendered by the assignment of protected material that had been approved by the Board. Such a claim dovetails with previous, meritorious claims in this circuit. . . . The dissent calls our attention to the comments by several of our sister circuits to the effect that constitutional rights discovered only pursuant to a balancing of interests have special implications for qualified immunity. . . . Yet Cockrel is clearly analogous to the facts at bar. In Cockrel, a teacher was fired because of a public outcry over material she presented in class that had been approved by the school. . . . We held that her presentation of material in class constituted speech that dealt with a matter of public interest.. . . We assumed that the concerns of the school did not outweigh Cockrel’s interest in speaking because the school had approved the very material that gave rise to the disruption. . . . Even were this circuit to adopt the reasoning of some of our sister circuits, surely the fact that Evans-Marshall assigned books, whereas Cockrel brought in a guest lecturer about industrial hemp, does not obscure the constitutional right at issue.”)

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 234-38 (6th Cir., 2005)(Sutton, J., concurring) (“Individual defendants likewise will only rarely be able to establish that the right was not ‘clearly established’ at this stage of the dispute. The case-by-case, incremental decisionmaking of balancing tests, it is true, infrequently will provide the ‘fair notice’ that qualified-immunity precedent requires, as each case may contain unique employee interests in speaking and unique employer concerns in restricting the speech. . . . But just as these considerations frequently will make it difficult for a plaintiff to surmount a qualified-immunity defense after discovery, so they make it difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery and before the parties (much less the courts) know what is being balanced against what. . . . Absent any factual development beyond the allegations in a complaint, a court cannot fairly tell whether a case is ‘obvious’ or ‘squarely govern[ed]’ by precedent, which prevents us from determining whether the facts of this case parallel a prior decision or not. Third, while I am prepared to accept these conclusions in this case, I respectfully believe that our circuit should re-think the way it has applied Connick and Pickering to in-class curricular speech. The Supreme Court has never held that the First Amendment applies to a teacher’s classroom speech, and there is good reason to think that it would not do so. In Connick, the Court said that ‘when a public employee speaks not as a citizen upon matters of public concern, but instead as an employee upon matters of personal interest, absent the most unusual circumstances, a federal court is not the appropriate forum in which to review the wisdom of a personnel decision taken by a public agency allegedly in reaction to the employee’s behavior.’ . . .

Connick, then, draws two dichotomies: (1) between speech by public employees acting as ‘employees’ and speech by public employees acting as private ‘citizens’; and (2) between speech ‘on matters of public concern’ and speech ‘upon matters of personal interest.’ When public school teachers speak as ‘employees,’ even when they speak on ‘matters of public concern,’ the First Amendment thus does not protect their speech under Connick, a conclusion that respects the reality that it is the employer (not the employee) who bears ultimate responsibility for what goes on in the classroom, the reality that virtually all speech by public school teachers in the classroom involves speech in the teacher’s capacity as an employee and the reality that many public school teachers (consider English, History and Government teachers) speak about ‘matters of public concern’ virtually every day of the school year. Only when teachers speak as private citizens on matters of public concern does the First Amendment and the Pickering balancing test apply. . . Submitting issues of this sort to the federal courts is not a sensible way to make decisions about the books that children read in public school or about the way books are taught in school, and it is not something that the Constitution mandates. Because it is the method that our circuit’s case law appears to have adopted, however, I respectfully concur in today’s opinion.”)

Evans-Marshall v. Bd. of Education of the Tipp City Exempted Village School District, 428 F.3d 223, 238 (6th Cir., 2005) (Zatkoff, District Judge, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part) (“I concur in Judge Cole’s majority opinion, which faithfully applies this circuit’s precedent in Cockrel v. Shelby County School District, 270 F.3d 1036 (6th Cir.2001) to the present facts. In addition, I concur in Judge Sutton’s concurring opinion, which calls for a re-examination of this circuit’s First Amendment jurisprudence regarding in-class curricular speech. I disagree with the majority insofar as it would deny qualified immunity to the individual defendants. Because I find that the alleged Constitutional violation was not ‘clearly established,’ I would grant qualified immunity to the individual defendants.”).

Cagle v. Headley, No. 04-6162, 2005 WL 2108367, at *6 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2005) (not published) (“No case ‘squarely governs’ the outcome here. Although the generalized right to be free of a patronage demotion was clearly established at the time of Headley’s actions, the qualified-immunity inquiry ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . As our discussion of the Williamson County lieutenants’ duties fairly indicates, the position at best falls on the ‘hazy border’ between Hall and Heggen. . . Although Cagle need not identify ‘a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied,’ . . . he has failed here to identify a case from the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit that treats as nonpolicymaking a position that is similar for constitutional purposes to a lieutenant’s position with these particular responsibilities. Indeed, there is considerable disagreement among the federal courts of appeals as to whether a deputy sheriff—a position that in most sheriffs’ departments involves fewer responsibilities than a Williamson County lieutenant—falls on the policymaking side of the First Amendment divide.[comparing cases] This division of opinion, as the Supreme Court has explained in a related context, by itself indicates that the ‘cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.’ [citing Brosseau] Neither can we say that Cagle’s right to be free of a patronage dismissal was so ‘obvious’ as to be clearly established by a ‘general test[] ... even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . . He thus also cannot prevail under this option for showing the existence of a clearly established right.”).

Schultz v. Sillman, No. 04-1507, 2005 WL 2175942, at *8 (6th Cir. Aug. 10, 2005) (not published) (“Once we have established that Plaintiff’s version of the facts demonstrates a violation of his constitutional right, the court next decides whether at the time of the suicide, in December 2001, a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful. . . . While this analysis is particularized and fact-specific, the plaintiff does not have to show that the court has had a ‘fundamentally similar’ or ‘materially similar’ case in order for a clearly established right to apply here. . . . The jurisprudence of the Sixth Circuit has established a clear right of a prisoner not to have his psychological medical needs, in the form of suicidal tendencies, treated with deliberate indifference. . . . Based on this case law, a reasonable officer would know that recklessly disregarding a known risk of an inmate’s suicide would violate the inmate’s Eighth Amendment right. Importantly, Sillman does not contest that there is clearly established law that would hold a corrections officer liable for deliberate indifference to the risk of suicide if an inmate demonstrates a strong likelihood that he would commit suicide. Therefore, if a jury determines that Schultz demonstrated a strong likelihood of suicide, and that Sillman was aware of this likelihood but chose to disregard it, Sillman’s actions would constitute a violation of Schultz’s clearly established Eighth Amendment right to receive medical treatment for his suicidal tendencies.”).

Knott v. Sullivan, 418 F.3d 561, 571 (6th Cir. 2005) (“In light of the extensiveness of the search warrant defects at issue in this case, we conclude that the constitutional infirmity of the search warrant executed by the Defendants was clearly established at the time they searched Knott’s 1988 Plymouth Horizon. . . . The Fourth Amendment obviously forbids relying on a warrant to search one vehicle when all of the vehicle-specific descriptors refer to another vehicle, and thus we conclude that the constitutional invalidity of the search warrant at issue in this case was clearly established at the time Knott’s vehicle was searched.”).

Fisher v. Harden, 398 F.3d 837, 846-49 (6th Cir. 2005) (“The specific question at issue is whether it was clearly established at the time of Fisher’s arrest that a law enforcement officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. As we have already noted, in 1997 this court specifically held that ‘[t]he Fourth Amendment requires an official seizing and detaining a person for a psychiatric evaluation to have probable cause to believe that the person is dangerous to himself or others.’ . . . The seizure in this case was not specifically for purposes of a professional psychiatric evaluation. This difference, however, is of no effect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Fisher, we must reject the sentiments of the dissent that the deputies were ‘merely securing the scene.’ . . . This record evidence reveals that the officers seized and detained Fisher, not merely to secure the scene, but for purposes of a mental health evaluation. Under our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, that action requires probable cause. We have not found any case in which this court has stated that officers may restrain an individual’s liberty on the sole basis that they have a reasonable suspicion that the individual suffers from a mental illness. In addition, the other circuits that have examined this issue have similarly held that probable cause is the correct standard. . . . Fisher has alleged facts sufficient to establish a violation of his constitutional rights. It is clearly established that an officer may not affect a mental health seizure without probable cause. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Fisher, we conclude that the Alexanders engaged in conduct that violated a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we find that qualified immunity does not shield them from civil liability.” [footnotes omitted]).

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 973, 974 (6th Cir. 2004) (“In this case, Barrett made a decision to send his son to private school. Barrett’s choice in directing his son’s education is activity shielded by his constitutionally protected right of liberty. The Defendants do not dispute that. Because it has been clearly established that one’s involvement in constitutionally protected activity cannot be the sole basis for denying public employment, any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent’s constitutional right to direct his child’s education is a violation of the law. Nevertheless, Defendants argue that ‘[t]here is no clearly established line of cases out of the Supreme Court or this Circuit which establish that dictating where public school employees send their children to school violates the employees’ parental rights.’ Defendants would have us find that the district court erred by relying on other circuits in its analysis. . . .The cases referenced by the district court point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and are clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority in the Supreme Court. . . . While it was therefore permissible for the district court to rely on these cases in finding that the law was clearly established, it was unnecessary. We do not adopt the district court’s analysis, . . .for we need not rely on law outside of our jurisdiction to find that a clearly established right exists. The Supreme Court has instructed that qualified immunity does not require ‘the very action in question [to] ha[ve] previously been held unlawful,’ but rather ‘in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.’ . . .Defendants cannot escape liability by arguing that no precedent exists that specifically enunciates a law that a public school official cannot deny someone employment solely because that person chooses to his child to a private school. . . .As aforementioned, Barrett has a constitutionally protected fundamental right to educate his child at the school of his choice. There is also a clearly established law that forbids employers from denying one employment based only on ‘person’s involvement in activity shielded by the constitutionally protected rights of privacy and liberty.’ In accordance with these fundamental principles of law, Lucci cannot obtain qualified immunity by claiming that no clearly established right existed.”).

Barrett v. Steubenville City Schools, 388 F.3d 967, 975, 976 (6th Cir. 2004)(Rogers, J., dissenting) (“The majority concludes that ‘any reasonable official would know that denying employment based on a parent’s constitutional right to direct his child’s education is a violation of the law.’ And yet, such a right has not been articulated in the Supreme Court or this circuit. Rather, the majority constructs this right from the parts of two others: the fundamental right of a parent to raise his or her children and direct their education, which is clearly established, and a right the majority describes as a right not to be denied government employment because of a decision to exercise a fundamentally protected right. This second ‘right’ is not a right in all contexts, and has certainly not been clearly established in the context presented by this case. . . . On the facts of this case, it is not clear that ‘every like-situated, reasonable government agent’ would have clearly understood that the right to direct the education of one’s children should be combined with a balancing test used to determine what rights a public employer can require a public employee to give up, with the result that a public school can not require a public school teacher to send his or her child to that public school.”).

Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 902-05 (6th Cir. 2004) (“Our caselaw and the evidence presented at trial about the training that the Officers received demonstrate that the force exerted against Champion violated his clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The particular type of physical force exerted against Champion was unreasonable, and the Officers should have been aware that they were violating Champion’s rights. First, it is clearly established that the Officers’ use of pepper spray against Champion after he was handcuffed and hobbled was excessive. . . . In addition to prior precedent, the Officers’ training demonstrates that they were aware of Champion’s clearly established right to be free from this type of excessive force. The Officers were taught that pepper spraying a suspect after the individual was incapacitated constitutes excessive force. Sergeant Robert Allen, who testified about the training the Nashville Police Officers received, agreed that if Champion were handcuffed and hobbled, spraying him with pepper spray would be excessive. Second, it also clearly established that putting substantial or significant pressure on a suspect’s back while that suspect is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force. This appeal gives us no cause to consider whether leaving a bound suspect on his or her stomach without more constitutes excessive force that violates a suspect’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. This is neither a ‘positional asphyxia’ case nor a case in which the officers lightly touched or placed incidental pressure on Champion’s back while he was face down. The asphyxia was caused by the combination of the Officers placing their weight upon Champion’s body by lying across his back and simultaneously pepper spraying him. Creating asphyxiating conditions by putting substantial or significant pressure, such as body weight, on the back of an incapacitated and bound suspect constitutes objectively unreasonable excessive force. . . . Additionally, the Officers’ training outlined the boundaries of excessive force and made clear that lying on a suspect can cause asphyxiation. All three Officers admitted that they were aware of the potential danger of putting pressure on an individual’s back or diaphragm. . . . Additionally, Sergeant Allen testified that he taught his officers that lying across an individual’s back when that person is on his or her stomach increases the possibility of asphyxia. Just as the Supreme Court determined that the Alabama Department of Corrections Regulations and the communications between the U.S. Department of Justice and the State of Alabama put the state on notice about what constituted cruel and unusual punishment, so too here the training these Officers received alerted them to the potential danger of this particular type of excessive force. . . . It cannot be forgotten that the police were confronting an individual whom they knew to be mentally ill or retarded, even though the Officers may not have known the full extent of Champion’s autism and his unresponsiveness. The diminished capacity of an unarmed detainee must be taken into account when assessing the amount of force exerted. . . . Consequently, the right to be free from the two types of excessive force exerted against Champion was clearly established by the law of this circuit and by the training of the Officers. Either action by itself violated a clearly established right, and the combination of the actions bolsters the conclusion that no reasonable officer could believe that excessive force was not being used. We recognize that the Officers perhaps did not intend to harm Champion; indeed, they may have believed they were helping him. Such a consideration is immaterial, however, because the qualified immunity doctrine is an objective one; motive is irrelevant. The evidence presented in the light most favorable to Champion, and in the light accepted by the jury, demonstrates that the Officers unreasonably applied excessive force to Champion after he had been incapacitated in violation of Champion's clearly established rights. No reasonable officer would have continued to spray a chemical agent in the face of a handcuffed and hobbled mentally retarded arrestee, who was moving his or her head from side to side in an attempt to breathe, after the arrestee vomited several times. No reasonable officer would continue to put pressure on that arrestee's back after the arrestee was subdued by handcuffs, an ankle restraint, and a police officer holding the arrestee's legs.").

Dean v. Byerley, 354 F.3d 540, 558 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Dean had a constitutionally protected right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, in the absence of an applicable time, place, or manner regulation, and retaliation against Dean for exercising that right would violate Dean's First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the first hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that Byerley violated Dean's First Amendment rights. The Sixth Circuit precedent holding that a § 1983 claim can be predicated upon retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights and the Supreme Court precedent holding that peaceful picketing is constitutionally protected predate the March 27, 2001 confrontation, and thus the right to engage in peaceful targeted residential picketing, free from such retaliation, was clearly established at the time of the confrontation. . . . Therefore, Dean has satisfied the second hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by showing that the constitutional right was clearly established. Finally, through his complaint and Doolittle's deposition, Dean has presented evidence that Byerley's alleged conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of Dean's clearly established First Amendment rights. Therefore, Dean has satisfied the third hurdle necessary to survive summary judgment based upon qualified immunity by pointing to evidence showing that what Byerley did was objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established constitutional rights.").

Akers v. McGuinness, 352 F.3d 1030, 1042, 1043 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Having found no constitutional violation, we must answer the qualified immunity question in the affirmative. While this disposes of this question, we note that for a plaintiff to defeat a defense of qualified immunity, he must not only prove the violation of a right, but of a clearly established right. . . . Indeed, the right must be 'so clearly established when the acts were committed that any officer in the defendant's position, measured objectively, would have clearly understood that he was under an affirmative duty to have refrained from such conduct.' . . . However, in the present case the district judge found no violation of a constitutional right at all. Thus, for the plaintiffs to prevail here on the question of qualified immunity, the situation would have to be such that any MDOC official when promulgating the Rule would be aware of the fact that it violated the Constitution, but a United States district judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find such a violation. While such a situation is not logically impossible, and doubtless has occurred from time to time, it certainly must be a very rare one, implicitly casting some doubt on the minimum competency of such a trial judge. Therefore, in cases such as this, unless counsel are prepared to contend that such an extreme and unusual situation occurred, they will not be able to succeed in reversing a grant of qualified immunity.”).

Akers v. McGuinness, 352 F.3d 1030, 1055 n.3 (6th Cir. 2003) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I do take issue with the majority’s statement that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because “a United States District Court Judge, given the benefit of decades of legal training and practice, years of hearings and adversarial briefings by able counsel, was unable to find ... a violation.” With all due respect, my brethren in the district courts have been known to commit legal error, including plain error through the failure to cite and apply clearly established legal precedent. If a district judge’s opinion of the state of the law were somehow dispositive of the qualified immunity issue, the Courts of Appeals rarely would have occasion to reverse a district judge’s ruling on qualified immunity. Thus, whether a district judge failed to find a constitutional violation should not control this Court’s analysis of the issue.”).

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2003) (“Because the case law fails to show that an inmate’s right to marry was so clearly established that an official reasonably would believe that declining to assist an inmate in obtaining a marriage license is unconstitutional, the [Plaintiffs] have failed to meet their burden. We affirm the finding of qualified immunity. [footnote omitted] However, in order to provide more guidance to officials in the future, we note that Turner’s test extends to situations in which an inmate’s right to marry will be completely frustrated without prison officials’ affirmative assistance. Although it was not previously clearly established, we now hold that the distinction between actively prohibiting an inmate’s exercise of his right to marry and failing to assist is untenable in a case in which the inmate’s right will be completely frustrated without officials’ involvement. Therefore, where an inmate will be unable to marry without prison officials’ affirmative assistance, Turner’s strictures apply. The inmate’s right to marry may be curtailed only where the officials’ refusal to assist the inmate is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.”).

Gean v. Hattaway, 330 F.3d 758, 775-77(6th Cir. 2003) (“The law in the Sixth Circuit is not settled regarding whether Rehabilitation Act claims are properly brought pursuant to § 1983. [citing cases] Moreover, federal courts outside of this circuit are not in agreement as to whether Congress intended the remedies available under the Rehabilitation Act to preclude a suit brought under § 1983 to enforce rights created by the Rehabilitation Act. [citing cases] Because, as we explain below, a § 1983 claim to enforce the plaintiffs’ rights under the Rehabilitation Act is barred by qualified immunity in this case and therefore has no chance of success even if it is not precluded by the remedial scheme of the Act, we need not pick a side in that debate. . . . The plaintiffs . . . fail to allege that the defendants' use of plaintiffs' Social Security benefits to pay for part of their current maintenance 'excluded [them] from the participation in, ... denied [them] the benefits of, or ... subjected [them] to discrimination under any program or activity' on the basis of their disability. 29 U.S.C. § 794(a). Rather, as with their claim under the Medicaid Act, their Rehabilitation Act claim alleges discrimination only in highly general terms. In order to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, the plaintiffs must show that the right allegedly violated was 'clearly established in a more particularized ... sense,' Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987), which they have wholly failed to do. Therefore, the plaintiffs may proceed directly under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities, but plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against the defendants in their individual capacities, were that claim allowed to proceed, would be barred by qualified immunity. . . . Only with respect to the plaintiffs' claim brought under the Rehabilitation Act against the defendants in their official capacities—for which sovereign immunity has been waived—may this suit go forward.”)

Thacker v. City of Columbus, 328 F.3d 244, 259, 260 (6th Cir. 2003) (“Although no case has explicitly sanctioned an entry into a private home under circumstances identical to those presented here, such precedent is not required for qualified immunity purposes. . . . It was not apparent that entering plaintiffs' apartment to secure the safety of the paramedics was unlawful. In fact, reasonable officials at the scene would likely disagree over whether the entry into plaintiffs' home violated plaintiffs' rights. . . . Thus, we cannot find that it was clearly established that entering a home without a warrant to secure the safety of paramedics under the circumstances presented in this case would violate the Fourth Amendment.”)

Feathers v. Aey, 319 F.3d 843, 850, 851 (6th Cir. 2003) (“[T]he rights at issue here were clearly established when the incident occurred. Under Hope v. Pelzer, a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving ‘fundamentally similar’ or ‘materially similar’ facts. . . . We see no exception in this analysis for the admittedly ‘somewhat abstract’ problem of determining when the reasonable suspicion requirement is met, Arvizu, 534 U.S. at 274, because Hope specifically states that a right is clearly established when ‘[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,’ of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the ‘premise’ of one case ‘has clear applicability’ to a subsequent set of facts. . . . Here, this standard is met. Terry, which requires reasonable suspicion for investigative detentions, had been clearly established since 1968. The Supreme Court had emphasized the importance of establishing the reliability of anonymous tips in 1990 in White and had re-affirmed that principle in J.L., decided just a few months before this incident. And the principle that an officer may rely on a dispatch for reasonable suspicion only to the extent that the dispatch is itself based on sufficient information had been established since Hensley in 1985. These premises clearly apply to the case at hand, and a reasonable officer would have been aware of the relevant rights. Nonetheless Feathers cannot overcome the officers' qualified immunity. Aey's and Donohue's behavior was not objectively unreasonable, even in light of the clearly established rights, as Williams v. Mehra, 186 F.3d at 691, requires before a plaintiff can overcome qualified immunity. Based on the information that Aey and Donohue had themselves, the Terry stop was reasonable. The dispatcher informed the officers of a suspicious person who was possibly intoxicated and supposed to be carrying a weapon. Although this information was from an anonymous tipster, whose information was not sufficient to create reasonable suspicion under J.L., the officers knew only what had been reported from the dispatch, and efficient law enforcement requires—at least for the purposes of determining the civil liability of individual officers— that police be permitted to rely on information provided by the dispatcher. If the dispatcher’s information were accurate and reliable, as the police presumed, the totality of circumstances would justify the Terry stop. . . . So although the stop violated the Fourth Amendment because the authorities’ collective information did not amount to reasonable suspicion, Feathers cannot prevail in a § 1983 suit because the individual defendants had a sufficient factual basis for thinking that they were acting consistently with Terry. Although there might be a legitimate question about whether the City should be held liable for a policy that does not inform dispatched officers of the reliability of their tip, the dismissal of the claims against the City is not before us.”).

Burchett v. Kiefer, 310 F.3d 937, 945, 946 (6th Cir.2002) (“Burchett claims that his detention in the police car with the windows rolled up in ninety degree heat for three hours constituted excessive force. We agree that unnecessary detention in extreme temperatures, like those that could be reached in an unventilated car in ninety-degree heat, violates the Fourth Amendment’s prohibitions on unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court has noted that under certain circumstances ‘unnecessary exposure to the heat of the sun, to prolonged thirst and taunting, and to a deprivation of bathroom breaks’ can violate the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition on ‘unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.’ . . . Such actions a fortiori violate the Fourth Amendment, which requires a showing of objective unreasonableness rather than any particular subjective motivation. . . . Further, the government’s interest in effecting the seizure in this case did not justify the imposition of extreme heat on the individual. The officers had many equally effective alternative ways of detaining Burchett that would not have subjected him to excessive heat, but their denial of his request that they roll down the windows to allow him air indicates a wanton indifference to this important safety factor. They could have left the windows slightly open, for example, or utilized the car’s cooling or ventilation devices. If the detainee did spit upon officers or passers-by or otherwise disrupted the officers’ search, and the officers could not otherwise effectively separate the detainee from passers-by, a reasonable officer might conclude that closing the windows was necessary. Resolving factual disputes in Burchett’s favor, however, those circumstances were not present here. Thus we conclude that those responsible for detaining Burchett for three hours in ninety-degree heat with no ventilation violated his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. We also conclude that, under the Supreme Court’s recent guidance in Hope v. Pelzer, this right was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. In Hope, the Court made clear that a right can be clearly established even if there is no case involving ‘fundamentally similar’ or ‘materially similar’ facts. . . . Rather, a right is clearly established when ‘[t]he reasoning, though not the holding,’ of a prior court of appeals decision puts law enforcement officials on notice, or when the ‘premise’ of one case ‘has clear applicability’ to a subsequent set of facts. . . Here, this standard is met. We have long recognized, for instance, that the Fourth Amendment permits detention using only ‘the least intrusive means reasonably available.’ . . Similarly, we have recognized that ‘claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault,’ but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention. . . These premises have clear applicability to this case, and the reasoning of those cases should have alerted reasonable officers to the constitutional violations inherent in subjecting a detainee to excessive heat.”).

Farm Labor Organizing Committee v. Ohio State Highway Patrol, 308 F.3d 523, 539, 541, 542 (6th Cir. 2002) (“[E]ven if Trooper Kiefer is correct that the record reveals that he possessed some race-neutral basis for initiating the investigation of the plaintiffs, this fact alone would not entitle him to summary judgment on qualified immunity as long as the plaintiffs can demonstrate that he was partly motivated by a discriminatory purpose. Of course, Trooper Kiefer can still argue, based upon Mt. Healthy and Arlington Heights, that his race-neutral reasons would have caused him to investigate the plaintiffs regardless of any discriminatory motive that may have existed. The question of whether Trooper Kiefer’s allegedly discriminatory motive played a determinative role in the decision to investigate the plaintiffs, however, is a factual dispute best suited for resolution at trial. . . . We disagree with the defendant’s characterization of the state of the law in 1995. While Travis may have been the first case to reach the merits of such an equal protection claim, we expressly acknowledged in a 1992 en banc case, United States v. Taylor, that an equal protection claim could be based upon evidence that law enforcement officers targeted minorities for consensual interviews on the basis of race. . . . We conclude, therefore, that a reasonable officer at the time of the events in question would have known that the Constitution forbade embarking on an investigation of someone for a particular offense on the basis of that person’s race.”).

Bell v. Johnson, 308 F.3d 594, 612, 613 (6th Cir. 2002) (“In sum, we conclude that the plaintiffs’ allegations, if proven, would establish a violation of the law that was clearly established in 1994. Our review of the relevant case law reveals that it was not until McLaurin was issued in 1997 that a reasonable official might expect to escape liability for retaliatory acts falling short of conscience-shocking abuses of power. Prior to that opinion, the published authority in our circuit made it clear that the “shocks the conscience” test did not apply to retaliation claims expressly brought under the First Amendment. We therefore determine that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Waller v. Trippett, No. 01-2716, 2002 WL 31296347, at *4, *6, *7 (6th Cir. Oct. 10, 2002) (unpublished) (“In this Circuit, we have recognized the possibility of using the ‘state-created danger’ theory to hold a state or state actor liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for private acts of violence. See, e.g., Jones v. City of Carlisle, 3 F.3d 945, 949-50 (6th Cir.1993); Gazette v. City of Pontiac, 41 F.3d 1061, 1965 (6th Cir.1994); Sargi, 70 F.3d 907 at 912-13; Stemler, 126 F.3d at 868. However, it was not until Kallstrom that we actually held a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the ‘state-created’ danger theory. . . . We conclude that the district court described the right that the Defendant allegedly violated too broadly. . . . Contrary to the district court's conclusion, we do not believe that the relevant 'legal rule,' here, the 'state-created danger,' was articulated in a particularized sense at the time of the Defendant's challenged conduct in May 1998. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . While each of these cases generally suggests that a state actor might be liable if he or she renders a victim more vulnerable to danger, not one of them convinces us that, in the period after DeShaney and before Ms. Taylor's death, the Defendant should have known that, by acting as he did, he would violate Ms. Taylor's substantive due process rights. Absent law that would have put the Defendant on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Thomas v. Cohen, 304 F.3d 563, 580, 581 (6th Cir. 2002) (" We do not believe that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs' procedural due process claim. The Supreme Court had decided Fuentes and Good Real Prop. long before Plaintiff's eviction. As we stated in Flatford, "it was sufficiently clear at the time of the eviction that [Plaintiffs] were entitled to pre-eviction judicial oversight in the absence of emergency circumstances." . . . Furthermore, Kentucky laws forbidding self-help evictions without judicial process and providing for preeviction notice and forcible detainer actions were well-established. As trained police officers, Defendants should have known that self-help evictions are prohibited in the state of Kentucky, and that the eviction they facilitated was therefore 'patently unlawful.'").

Sheets v. Mullins, 287 F.3d 581, 589, 590 (6th Cir. 2002) ("In denying relief to Mullins, the district court wrote: 'Based upon the state of the law in February 1997, this Court concludes that a reasonable official in the position of Sergeant Mullins should have known that a party's right to substantive due process is violated by a public actor whose conduct significantly increases the risk of injury from a third party.' We think the district judge described the right that Mullins allegedly violated too broadly. As the Supreme Court explained in Anderson v. Creighton, . . . the 'clearly established' standard becomes meaningless if the relevant 'legal rule' is defined in abstract or general terms. Instead, the relevant 'legal rule' must be articulated in a particularized sense, such that the contours of the rule are sufficiently clear to put a reasonable official on notice that what he is doing is probably unlawful. . . . The district court determined that it was clearly established in February, 1997, that an officer would violate the substantive due process clause by significantly increasing an individual's risk of injury from a third party. To be sure, in 1989 in DeShaney, the Supreme Court suggested, but did not hold, that state actors may be liable if they help create the danger that causes an individual's injury by a private party or if they render an individual more vulnerable to injury by a private party. The DeShaney Court did not specify how a state might create the danger causing an individual's injury, what actions of a state would render an individual more vulnerable to danger, or by how much the state must increase an individual's risk of injury from a third party before that individual's substantive due process rights are violated. . . . In Kallstrom, decided in February of 1998, a year after Mullins responded to the call about Sheets, we noted that no court within the Sixth Circuit had yet held the state or a state actor liable for private acts of violence under the state-created-danger theory. Indeed, before Kallstrom was decided and before Mullins acted in February of 1997, there was only one reported decision from a court within this circuit that had even allowed a private-act-of-violence case to survive a motion for summary judgment. Smith v. City of Elyria, 857 F.Supp. at 1203. . . . Absent law that would have put Mullins on notice that his particular conduct offended the Constitution, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Comstock v. McCrary, 273 F.3d 693, 711 (6th Cir. 2001) (“The right at issue in this case is not, as defendants argue, the right to be diagnosed accurately for one’s propensity to commit suicide; Montgomery had already been correctly identified as suicidal by McCrary and the prison staff. As we have discussed above, the right that plaintiff claims on Montgomery’s behalf is the more basic right to continuing medical treatment once a prisoner has been determined to be suicidal. This circuit has consistently recognized a prisoner’s established right to medical attention once the prisoner’s suicidal tendencies are known. . . . Based on case law from the Supreme Court and our circuit, we conclude that a reasonable prison psychologist in 1995 ‘would have clearly understood that [he] was under an affirmative duty’ to offer reasonable medical care to a prisoner whom he knew to be suicidal, in the circumstances confronted by McCrary. . . . Because, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, McCrary’s conduct violated Montgomery’s constitutionally protected right to medical care for his serious medical needs under the Eighth Amendment, and the constitutional right was clearly established such that a reasonable official, at the time McCrary acted, would have understood that his behavior violated that right, we AFFIRM the district court’s denial of summary judgment with respect to McCrary.”).

Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 425 n.4 (6th Cir. 2001) (“The right to representation by counsel in a proceeding affecting custody of one’s child was a clearly established requirement of procedural due process in 1995. . . . The right to be informed of the right to representation by a social worker, who performs a role like that of a prosecutor in that proceeding, was not clearly established at that time, however. The distinction is that Aaron and Janet Rippy do not allege that Appellant Bryant deprived them of their right to counsel, but that she failed to inform them of that right. A reasonable official in Appellant Bryant’s position in May 1995 would not have clearly understood that she bore an affirmative duty to inform Aaron and Janet Rippy of their right to representation by counsel at the May 25, 1995 hearing.”).

LeMarbe v. Wisneski, 266 F.3d 429, 440 (6th Cir. 2001) (“It is clearly established that, if a doctor knows of a substantial risk of serious harm to a patient and is aware that he must either seek immediate assistance from another doctor to prevent further serious harm or must inform the patient to seek immediate assistance elsewhere, and then fails to do in a timely manner what his training indicates is necessary to prevent such harm, that doctor has treated the patient with deliberate indifference.”)

Rodgers v. Hawley, No. 99-2219, 99-2311, 2001 WL 798618, at *5 & n.5 (6th Cir. June 22, 2001) (unpublished) (“In this case, the alleged retaliatory conduct occurred in 1995 and 1996. At that time, the law of this Circuit required that actionable retaliation shock the conscience or involve an egregious abuse of government power. . . In his dissent, Judge Clay suggests that the shocks-the-conscience test did not govern Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood’s conduct in 1995 and 1996. He says the new standard for retaliation claims adopted in Thaddeus-X ‘did not effect a profound change in the law ...,’ but merely recognized the standard for retaliation claims ‘long ago established’ by the United States Supreme Court’s decision in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 395 (1989). We disagree. . . Unlike the Fourth Amendment involved in Graham, the First Amendment does not express any substantive standard governing intrusions on the rights guaranteed thereunder. Including no explicit standard, the First Amendment could not have alerted Kedzierzawski and Kirkwood that they were violating Irvin’s First Amendment rights.”).

McCurdy v. Montgomery County, 240 F.3d 512, 525, 526 (6th Cir. 2001) (Engel, J., dissenting) (“The majority holds that the district court erred in its conclusion that when Officer Cole acted, it was not clearly established that the First Amendment prohibited an officer from effectuating an otherwise valid arrest if that officer was motivated in part by a desire to retaliate against the arrestee’s assertion of First Amendment rights. The majority reasons that because it was well-established then that McCurdy had a constitutional right to challenge verbally Officer Cole’s surveillance, the district court erred in granting Officer Cole qualified immunity on the retaliation claim. . . . Whether a plaintiff may recover for a deprivation of First Amendment rights caused by an allegedly retaliatory arrest which the officer had probable cause to effect was not a matter of clearly established law in 1996. Indeed, it is still an issue that is subject to debate in the federal courts. The majority cites no Supreme Court or published Sixth Circuit cases discussing retaliation claims in the context of an arrest, and I am aware of none.”).

Sowards v. Loudon County, 203 F.3d 426, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2000) (“Neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has evaluated whether a jailer at the LCSD, or a jailer possessing the same duties as those mandated by Tennessee law, falls under the Elrod/Branti exception . . . [H]owever, the position of a jailer is analogous to the position of a prison guard, and the Supreme Court concluded that political considerations are inappropriate for the employment decisions concerning a prison guard in 1990. . . It was objectively unreasonable for Guider to believe that political considerations were appropriate for the position of a jailer in 1995 in light of the Supreme Court’s 1990 Rutan decision. Because the law was so clearly established that he could not reasonably take political considerations into account when terminating Sowards, Guider is not entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity for Sowards’s political association claim.”).

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 771, 772 (6th Cir. 2000) (“We believe that the law is clearly established that the ‘public concern test’ does not apply to the petitioning activity in the instant case. . . . [T]here is no basis in our First Amendment jurisprudence for applying Connick’s public concern test to petitioning activity by a private business woman who is simply supplying services to a governmental agency as an independent contractor. . . .[W]e conclude that the law interpreting the petition clause protects the plaintiff in filing a complaint with the Ohio Highway Patrol claiming sex discrimination, and this law was clearly established prior to the retaliatory conduct found by the jury in the present case. We also conclude that the law was clearly established that the ‘public concern’ test does not apply to plaintiff’s petitioning activity. Hence the doctrine of official immunity is inapplicable . . .”).

Gable v. Lewis, 201 F.3d 769, 773 (6th Cir. 2000) (Nelson, J., dissenting) (“[I]f reasonable members of this court could disagree in March of 1997 over the applicability of the public-concern test in the Petition Clause context, how can we say that the law was so clearly established seven months earlier that there was no room at that time for disagreement among reasonable Highway Patrol officials?”).

Blake v. Wright, 179 F.3d 1003, 1008, 1010, 1011, 1013 (6th Cir. 1999) (“Although we acknowledge that the Fourth Amendment warns of inherent dangers with wiretapping, we agree with Wright that the case law, when examined with the relevant Ohio statute, was sufficiently uncertain regarding the unlawfulness of implementing the DigiVoice system in a police department’s official phones in Ohio. . . . In sum, we hold that Wright is entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983 because the law regarding the administrative monitoring of police phone lines was sufficiently unclear at the time of the alleged violations that a “reasonable” officer in Wright’s position would not have known he was violating clearly established law. . . . Ultimately, we believe that the Court intended to apply qualified immunity to statutory violations and we thus hold that a defendant may claim qualified immunity in response to a Title III claim. We fail to see the logic of providing a defense of qualified immunity to protect public officials from personal liability when they violate constitutional rights that are not clearly established and deny them qualified immunity when they violate statutory rights that similarly are not clearly established.”).

Key v. Grayson, 179 F.3d 996, 997, 1002 (6th Cir. 1999) (“[W]e conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because, prior to 1996, it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to prisoners. . . .[T]he language of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act indicates the statutes’ applicability to prisons but, prior to 1996, there is no published court decision so holding from the Supreme Court, this court or a court within this circuit. At least one circuit has held that, prior to 1994, the statutes did not apply to state prisons. [citing Torcasio] Finally, in a similar—albeit distinguishable—situation, the Eighth Circuit determined that qualified immunity was available to defendants because it was not clearly established that the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act applied to the transportation of arrestees.”).

Bloch v. Ribar, 156 F.3d 673, 686, 687 (6th Cir. 1998) (“Despite what appears to be a possible violation of the Blochs’ privacy interests in this case, their claim against Ribar on this ground must fail because, as the district court held, a reasonable public official would not be on notice that the release of such intimate details of a rape constituted an actionable violation of a rape victim’s privacy interests. A reasonably prudent sheriff should have refrained from unnecessarily releasing the highly confidential and embarrassing personal information, but in light of the dearth of case law on this issue and the complexities stemming from the nature of crimes of sexual violence, it would be unfair to conclude that a reasonable official would have been aware that releasing these details violated a clearly established constitutional right to privacy. . . . In light of our ruling in the present case, however, public officials in this circuit will now be on notice that such a privacy right exists. Therefore, any future violation will not allow an official such as Ribar to claim the lack of reasonable notice that is necessary to sustain a defense of qualified immunity.”).

Daughenbaugh v. City of Tiffin, 150 F.3d 594, 603 (6th Cir. 1998) (“[T]he illegal search occurred before this court’s decision in United States v. Jenkins, 124 F.3d 768 (6th Cir.1997) (holding that one’s backyard is definitely part of the curtilage). In light of Jenkins and the instant case, however, the police will be precluded in the future from relying on qualified immunity as a defense to warrantless searches of garages and backyards in situations similar to those herein.”).

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 348, 349 (6th Cir. 1998) (“While it was clear in 1987 that Tennessee v. Garner governed the use of excessive force by law enforcement officers on free citizens, it was not clearly established that Garner applied in excessive force cases involving escaped convicts. The use of excessive force to recapture an escaped convict creates a different problem than the use of force to apprehend a nonviolent fleeing felony suspect. The Fourth Amendment is not triggered anew by attempts at recapture because the convict has already been ‘seized,’ tried, convicted, and incarcerated. . . . Although Whitley involved the use of deadly force during the suppression of a prison riot, the factors relied on by the Court in that context are also relevant in evaluating the use of force in the apprehension of an escaped felon. Applying these factors in the present case, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Madden’s position may well have deemed it permissible to use deadly force under the circumstances.”).

Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 350, 352-53 (6th Cir. 1998) (Kennedy, J., concurring in the result) (“The cases upon which the majority relies all involve actions taken against convicted persons in the prison context. Because I believe that a convicted person whom prison officials are not hotly pursuing is more analogous to a fleeing felon than to a confined prisoner, I would apply the Fourth Amendment to the claims of escapees. I then would find that the prison officials’ actions violated the decedent’s rights under this Amendment. However, I too believe summary judgment is appropriate because the Fourth Amendment’s applicability to an official’s use of deadly force during an attempt to apprehend an escaped, convicted felon was not clearly established in 1987, when the relevant actions took place. . . . I would hold that the Eighth Amendment applies so long as the officials are in ‘hot pursuit,’ or ‘immediate and continuous pursuit,’ of the escapee. . . . The Eighth Amendment should apply so long as the officials are in ‘hot pursuit’ because we cannot expect prison guards to know, or take the time to learn, for what crime the escapee was imprisoned. In addition, applying the lesser constitutional standard throughout the ‘hot pursuit’ of an escapee would be a deterrent to other prisoners contemplating an escape attempt. This deterrent interest is served when other prisoners are prevented from witnessing successful escapes. Once a convicted person is no longer being hotly pursued, his eventual recapture is less likely to affect other inmates' decision to attempt escape. At that point, the policy reasons militate in favor of Fourth Amendment protection.”).

Cope v. Heltsley, 128 F.3d 452, 460 (6th Cir. 1997) (“Would it have been possible, at the end of 1993, for a reasonable person, newly-elected a Kentucky county clerk, to believe that the law entitled her to take political compatibility into account in deciding whom to retain as her deputy clerks? The answer, we think, is ‘yes.’ . . . [T]here was no published decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit—and certainly no decision of the United States Supreme Court—holding that political compatibility is not, in the words of Rutan, ‘an appropriate requirement for the position involved.’ . . . ‘[I]n the circumstances’ of the present case, pre-existing law did not ‘truly compel’ the conclusion that in selecting her staff—the public face of the county clerk’s office—the clerk could not take political compatibility into account.”).

Hall v. Tollett, 128 F.3d 418, 429-30 (6th Cir. 1997) (“[A]n absence of cases directly on point does not indicate that the constitutionality of a patronage based discharge has yet to be established. In McCloud, we developed a categorical approach to help establish and define which public offices fall within the Branti exception. This approach, however, will not remove all uncertainty. . . . Although Elrod seemingly established that low-level sheriff’s department employees fall outside this exception, we held in Cagle v. Gilley, 957 F.2d 1347 (6th Cir.1992), that it was not clearly established that deputy sheriffs were protected from patronage based dismissals. Unfortunately, we granted a sheriff qualified immunity, without first determining whether there had actually been a constitutional violation. 957 F.2d at 1349. Therefore, Cagle effectively established only that in 1992 the state of the law regarding patronage dismissals of sheriffs’ deputies was not clearly established. In the time between Cagle and September 1, 1994, no further cases added clarity to the status of deputy sheriffs. The split among circuits regarding this issue also indicates the unsettled nature of the law regarding the status of deputy sheriffs. . . For these reasons, we agree with the District Court that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity in this case.”).

Stemler v. City of Florence, 126 F.3d 856, 866-67, 870 (6th Cir. 1997) (“[T]he district court reviewed the relevant case law dealing with claims that state actors violated substantive due process by allowing individuals to become subject to an indirect harm, and found much of that law to be confused and in conflict. It then appeared to reason that, since the doctrine of substantive due process was unclear in its entirety, no such claim could ever survive a motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity This was error. While. . . there is a good deal of uncertainty with regard to the precise contours of substantive due process, it does not follow that state actors are insulated from liability on all such claims, no matter what the underlying facts may be. The fact that the law may have been unclear, or even hotly disputed, at the margins does not afford state actors immunity from suit where their actions violate the heartland of the constitutional guarantee, as that guarantee was understood at the time of the violation. Stated differently, it is simply irrelevant that the definition of the right to substantive due process has been in flux if, under any definition found in the case law at the time, the defendants should have known in February 1994 that their actions violated that right. . . . The very notion that police officers should not have known that they could not force an incapacitated woman to drive off with an obviously drunk man who they had reason to believe had beaten her betrays a chilling and unacceptable vision of the role of the police in our society.”).

Sandul v. Larion, 119 F.3d 1250, 1255, 1256 (6th Cir. 1997) (“In 1990 when Sandul was arrested for his use of the “f-word,” it was clearly established that speech is entitled to First Amendment protection with the exception of fighting words. . . . While the Livonia ordinances are presumptively valid as they have not been challenged, Sandul’s § 1983 claims are unaffected by his failure to challenge the constitutionality of the ordinances.”).

Saylor v. Bd. of Educ. of Harlan County, 118 F.3d 507, 516 (6th Cir. 1997) (“We are aware of no pre-existing law ‘dictat[ing]’ the conclusion that a disciplinary paddling administered by a school teacher in violation of school regulations would ipso facto violate federal constitutional law.” citing Lassiter).

Martin v. Heideman, 106 F.3d 1308, 1312-13 (6th Cir. 1997) (“The district court found that at the time of the plaintiff’s arrest, the law was not clearly established that the overly tight application of handcuffs was a violation of an arrestee’s constitutional right not to have excessive force applied during an arrest, citing conflicting cases from around the country. . . . This circuit, however, has chosen to view an ‘excessively forceful handcuffing’ claim under the general excessive force rubric. . . . Because clearly established law in 1991 . . . prohibited an officer’s use of excessive force, and because a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether Officer Paul used excessive force under the circumstances, the district court erred by granting Paul qualified immunity on the handcuffing issue.”).

Doe v. Claiborne County, 103 F.3d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 1996) (“We . . . hold that Doe had a clearly established right under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause to personal security and to bodily integrity, that such right is fundamental, and that Davis’s sexual abuse of Doe violated that right.”).

McBride v. Village of Michiana, 100 F.3d 457, 461 (6th Cir. 1996) (“The possible scenarios involving retaliatory treatment of persons engaged in protected speech are too numerous to begin to list. . . . [I]t is not essential that a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case discuss each of those imaginable possibilities before finding that the right to be free from retaliation for exercise of First Amendment freedoms is clearly established. At the time of the alleged retaliatory actions, Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent had clearly established that retaliation aimed at chilling fundamental rights was improper. Although no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decisions had...applied time-honored First Amendment principles to a situation specifically involving governmental retaliation against a news reporter, relevant pre-existing case law made the illegality of such retaliation apparent.”).

McCloud v. Testa, 97 F.3d 1536, 1547, 1557 (6th Cir. 1996) (“We conclude that it is improper to grant qualified immunity to every defendant who has taken an adverse employment action against a plaintiff occupying or previously occupying a public office that the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit has not yet explicitly held falls into or outside of the Branti exception. In doing so, we give more precise content to the Branti exception, so that we can better delineate those public positions that as a general matter should receive First Amendment protection, and those that should not. . . . We reject the notion that there must be a separate patronage dismissal decision by the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit involving a particular position before qualified immunity can be denied in such a case. The lack of specific precedent holding that a particular position is outside the Branti exception is a necessary condition to arguing that the First Amendment right to be free from patronage dismissal is unclear as to a particular position, but the lack of such precedent is not a sufficient condition for concluding that the law is unclear on the subject and so qualified immunity must be granted to a defendant. . . . It simply cannot be true that there must be a specific patronage dismissal case in the Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit before qualified immunity can be denied to any otherwise eligible defendant in such a case. If this were true, qualified immunity would be converted into a nearly absolute barrier to recovering damages against an individual governmental actor in patronage cases because the reported case law classifies new positions very slowly. . . . we believe that certain categories of positions falling into the Branti exception can be specified with reasonable certainty. We set these categories out below so that the district courts may apply them in future patronage cases, especially those involving issues of qualified immunity”).

Durham v. Nu’Man, 97 F.3d 862, 867 (6th Cir. 1996) (“Although there has not yet been a case in this Circuit specifically holding that a hospital security officer can be held liable under § 1983 for failing to protect a patient or inmate from being beaten by another hospital security officer, it is not necessary that there be a specific holding in order to find that a constitutional rule in the § 1983 area has been ‘clearly established.’”).

Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 168 (6th Cir. 1996) (“If federal district judges could reasonably disagree over the constitutionality of the regulation [prohibiting prisoners from receiving free advertising and other bulk mail], then it can fairly be said that a reasonable official would not have known that his conduct violated a clearly established right.”).

Hughes v. City of North Olmstead, 93 F.3d 238, 243 (6th Cir. 1996) (“In this case, it is clear that there was a generally established right to privacy and free association at the time of the police investigation. However, at that time, those rights were not so clearly established by the Supreme Court or this Circuit that police department officials would have realized their actions were violating the law. Thus, in the absence of more fact-specific authority defining how an investigation into private sexual matters invades the realm of privacy and free association, the department investigation could not have infringed upon clearly established constitutional rights.”).

Smith v. Williams, 78 F.3d 585 (Table), No. 94-6306, 1996 WL 99329, *5 (6th Cir. March 6, 1996) (“[T]he right to be free from malicious prosecution is a clearly established right, although prior to January of 1994, this circuit analyzed the right as accruing under the Fourteenth rather than the Fourth Amendment.”).

Adams v. Yontz, 73 F.3d 361 (Table), 1996 WL 5563, *2 (6th Cir. Jan. 5, 1996) (“[T]he relevant inquiry for the purposes of our qualified immunity analysis is whether the law clearly established supervisory liability on principals for the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates at the time that the alleged incidents occurred. We believe that it did.”).

Foy v. City of Berea, 58 F.3d 227, 229 (6th Cir. 1995) (“On May 3, 1990, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had held that police officers commit a substantive due process violation if, after receiving complaints from the owner of property that intoxicated persons are causing a disturbance on that property, the officers command these individuals to leave the property and the intruders are injured later by their own actions or those of other private parties. In fact, we find no controlling authority holding that such action by police under generally similar circumstances would constitute a due process violation.”).

Thomas v. Whalen, 51 F.3d 1285, 1292 (6th Cir. 1995) (“[Plaintiff] did not have a clearly established right to invoke the name of the Cincinnati Police Division or display the police department’s insignia in order to enhance his own credibility in advocating [the NRA position against gun control].”).

Cameron v. Seitz, 38 F.3d 264, 275-76 (6th Cir. 1994) (“We hold that, at the time of the relevant actions underlying the complaint in this case, the constitutional protection of the right of marital association did not clearly extend to a dating relationship or to engagement, and qualified immunity attaches to Seitz’s interference with Cindy’s and Larry’s relationship by his employment actions. Whether an engagement to marry is a right protected by the Constitution against any adverse action is a question we need not decide today. The fact that the contours of such protection simply have not been clearly extended to engagements compels the conclusion that qualified immunity is mandated here.”).

Buckner v. Kilgore, 36 F.3d 536, 540 (6th Cir. 1994) (“[A]n officer violates a clearly established right under Brower if he pulls his squad car onto a highway with knowledge or reason to know that an approaching motorcyclist will not have time or the ability to stop or otherwise safely avoid collision with the car.”).

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) (“Defendants argue that because particularized balancing is necessary under Pickering and its progeny, they are entitled to qualified immunity because the contours of a public employee’s free speech rights are unclear We agree that in many public employee free speech cases it would be unclear to a reasonable official what the outcome of the balancing inquiry should be. However, the instant case presents a situation where the employee has spoken out on matters of great public concern, and these statements apparently had only minimal effect on the efficiency of the office. . . [T]his is not a case where the imprecision of the standard makes a difference.).

Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 592 (6th Cir. 1994) (“[W]e conclude that it has been clearly established that—regardless of any exigent circumstances—the seizure and removal to the station house of an individual who is not suspected of any criminal activity constitutes a de facto arrest requiring probable cause.”), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2740 (1994).

Walton v. City of Southfield, 995 F.2d 1331 (6th Cir. 1993) (“[A]t the time of [plaintiff’s] arrest in 1988, there was no clearly established right to personal security forbidding the police from abandoning passengers. . . . [T]he ‘contours of the right,’ if there is such a right, were not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable officer would have known that leaving the children in the parking lot violated that right.”).

Weeks v. Chaboudy, 984 F.2d 185, 188 (6th Cir. 1993) (plaintiff could rely on Eighth Circuit precedent directly on point).

Heflin v. Stewart County, 958 F.2d 709, 717 (6th Cir. 1992) (“There can be no doubt that in 1987 existing law clearly established the right of pretrial jail inmates to receive care for their serious medical needs. At least as early as 1985 we recognized this right as the basis for section 1983 claims involving jail suicides by hanging....The unlawfulness of doing nothing to attempt to save [the inmate’s] life would have been apparent to a reasonable official in [defendants’] position in light of pre-existing law.”), rehearing granted in part on reconsideration, 968 F.2d 1 (6th Cir. 1992).

Rich v. City of Mayfield Heights, 955 F.2d 1092, 1096-97 (6th Cir. 1992) (“[G]eneralized right of a prisoner to be free from deliberate indifference cannot support a finding that there was a clearly established right to be protected from committing suicide....The ‘right’ at issue in the instant appeal is the right of a pretrial detainee to be cut down by police officers when discovered hanging in a jail cell.”).

Daugherty v. Campbell, 935 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1991) (where very action in question, visual body cavity search of prison visitor without reasonable suspicion, had been held unlawful by every circuit considering the issue since 1982, and where cases from other circuits were similar enough to merit reasonable reliance upon them, the contours of the right were clearly established).

Freeman v. Spoljaric, 667 F. Supp. 3d 636, ____ (S.D. Ohio 2023) (“The threshold matter is whether Freeman engaged in a First Amendment protected activity by recording Spoljaric with his cell phone. The United States Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have yet to hold the public enjoys a First Amendment right to record police activities in public places. . . In fact, as recently as July 2020, a district court within this Circuit held the right to record police had not been clearly established here. See Clark v. Stone, 475 F. Supp. 3d 656, 667 (W.D. Ky. 2020). But other circuits have reached a different result. Seven circuit courts have held the public has some right to film police. Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82–83 (1st Cir. 2011); Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 359 (3d Cir. 2017); Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 690 (5th Cir. 2017); ACLU v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 595–602 (7th Cir. 2012); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995); Irizarry v. Yehia, 38 F.4th 1282, 1293–94 (10th Cir. 2022); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000). To this Court’s knowledge, no circuit has squarely held otherwise. . . . This Court agrees that the First Amendment protects the public’s right to film police and other government agents subject to reasonable restrictions. . . . [T]he Court concludes the public has a First Amendment right to photograph and film police activities, ‘subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions.’ . . . Applying this principle here, the Court has no trouble concluding Freeman exercised his First Amendment right by filming Spoljaric on Freeman’s own property. Indeed, given our Constitution’s special reverence for the home and one’s property, . . . the Court struggles to imagine a space more worthy of such protection. It is axiomatic that if one can film police in a ‘public’ place, one can film police on his or her own private property. . . . Freeman filmed Spoljaric on his own property and without interfering with Spoljaric’s efforts to carry out his duties. Indeed, when Freeman filmed Spoljaric with his cell phone, Spoljaric had not yet formed probable cause to arrest him. Based on the allegations to date, Freeman was engaging in First Amendment protected activity when filming Spoljaric. . . . Finally, the Court again notes that Spoljaric has not invoked qualified immunity as to Freeman’s First Amendment retaliation claim. The Court need not consider that defense.”)

Napper v. Hankison, No. 3:20-CV-764-BJB, 2022 WL 3008809 (W.D. Ky. July 28, 2022) (“After a state-court grand jury indicted Hankison for his role in these events, the Court stayed the civil claims against him. . . . Since then, the Commonwealth tried Hankison for wanton endangerment and a jury acquitted him. . . . So at this juncture the Court does not face the question whether the Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim against Hankison—the only Defendant whose bullets allegedly entered the Plaintiffs’ apartment. Instead, this Order addresses the motions to dismiss filed by Louisville Metro Government and the individual defendants aside from Hankison. . . . This case concerns a dispute about a shooting that occurred as officers attempted to serve a warrant at an apartment building. . . . The Plaintiffs were unintended rather than intended targets of police gunshots. The officers were returning fire rather than shooting at a fleeing suspect. Much of the alleged harm concerns fear and a perceived inability to leave, rather than a gunshot that physically restrained and indeed killed the suspect. . . . And the officers at issue in this order are not the ones whose shots directly violated the constitutional rights of the Plaintiffs—even on their own theory. These factual and legal distinctions are dispositive—regardless of whether the claim is analyzed under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments. According to the Supreme Court, the qualified-immunity analysis turns on ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . Decisions from cases that are ‘too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here’ are not enough to deny qualified immunity. . . . This ‘specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where ... “[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.”. . . The same logic applies with equal or greater force in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . . Indeed, more factually analogous caselaw from the Sixth Circuit has made clear that ‘[w]hen a person aims a weapon in a police officer’s direction, that officer has an objectively reasonable basis for believing that the person poses a significant risk of serious injury or death.’. . . On this basis, the court has recognized that the ‘officer may use deadly force whenever he or she, in the face of a rapidly unfolding situation, has probable cause to believe that a suspect poses a serious physical threat either to the police or members of the public.’. . . And, as already noted, in Claybrook the Sixth Circuit dismissed the Fourteenth Amendment claims of a bystander shot by officers engaged in a shootout with a suspect. . . . Certainly, Plaintiffs have pointed to no caselaw and have pled no facts that would proscribe, rather than authorize, the type of force they allege the Defendants at issue used. . . . The tragic events on the night of March 13, 2020, have been hotly debated in the public square and the courts alike. But the questions presented and answered here concern the rights of the neighboring Plaintiffs, not those of Breonna Taylor or Kenneth Walker, whose lawsuit remains pending in this District. The Plaintiffs here haven’t alleged facts showing a deprivation of their own constitutional and state-law rights by officers whose bullets never pierced their walls. The many exceptions Plaintiffs take with the officers’ conduct—even accepting those assertions as true—don’t connect those earlier actions to the ultimate harm. Nor do these alleged errors add up to a violation of the laws the Plaintiffs rely on—either because their legal theories are mistaken or because they simply assume the facts necessary to recover. So the Court grants the motions to dismiss . . . filed by the Defendants other than Hankison. The Court will address the stay of the claims against Hankison, as well as the Plaintiffs’ further requests to amend their complaint . . . in separate orders.”)

Prince v. Scioto County Common Pleas Court, No. 1:20-CV-652, 2022 WL 1569868, at *5 (S.D. Ohio May 18, 2022) (“Each Defendant’s ‘liability must be assessed individually based on his own actions.’. . . To prove his claim, Plaintiff must present evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that each Defendant had notice of his medical need and took some action that ‘was intentional (not accidental)’ and ‘either (a) acted intentionally to ignore [the] serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to [Plaintiff], even though a reasonable official... would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to [Plaintiff’s] health or safety.’ Browner, 14 F.4th at 597. On the record presented, the evidence unequivocally demonstrates that the individuals’ actions were reasonable, while Plaintiff has utterly failed to present evidence that could overcome their assertions of qualified immunity. Even if a reviewing court were to decide that issue differently, any such right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. This is true even if this Court considers the new deliberate indifference standard applicable in the Sixth Circuit under the Due Process Clause. In short, no genuine issues of material fact remain and Defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law even if the lower standard applies.”)

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:21-CV-1679, 2022 WL 515759, at *7 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 22, 2022) (“Defendants argue that, when Ms. Marburger responded to Mr. Jackson’s public records request, no decision from the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit had held that failure to disclose exculpatory evidence in response to a post-conviction public records request violated the right of access to the courts as a prelude to post-conviction litigation. But clearly established law does not require ‘a case directly on point.’ . . . Instead, existing precedent must place the question beyond debate, as the law of this Circuit did before the events at issue here. To the extent Defendants argue that Arrington-Bey places a burden on Plaintiff to identify a specific case with a similar fact pattern, that ruling and the discussion in Pauly on which it relies both involve police officers responding in a matter of moments to life-threatening situations. Here, in contrast, Ms. Marburger took nearly two months to respond to Mr. Jackson’s public records request. . . . She is a trained and experienced lawyer responding in an office setting over a considerably longer period of time. Unlike a police officer responding to a dynamic scene in real time, Ms. Marburger had time to consider whether withholding exculpatory information might violate Mr. Jackson’s rights or prejudice his efforts at exoneration. At bottom, the inquiry turns on whether a reasonable person would know her conduct was unlawful. . . . At this stage of the proceedings, Plaintiff has stated a claim that Ms. Marburger knowingly violated his rights.”)

Cleveland for the Estate of Wicker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 3:16-CV-588-CRS, 2019 WL 1058154, at *8 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 6, 2019) (“Kisela certainly has some level of factual similarity: both cases involved a knife-wielding roommate who did not heed the commands of police to drop the weapon. However, there are also important factual dissimilarities. For example, the suspect in Kisela advanced within six feet of the bystander—10 feet closer than Wicker was to Gadegaard—and had approximately 58 seconds longer than Wicker to respond to the officers’ commands. In such a scenario, Kisela does not provide much guidance. Therefore, the issue is whether Chappell, Scozzari, and Lopez would have clearly demonstrated to the officers that their conduct was impermissible. . . . Chappell was clear that it would be ‘objectively unreasonable’ for police to fire on a knife-wielding suspect when they first saw him and he had not moved in an aggressive way. . . . When a blade-wielding suspect is not ‘quickly advancing toward the officers while holding the knife up and refusing to drop it’ deadly force is simply not authorized. . . . Lopez and Scozzari then further demonstrate the application of the rule laid down in Chappell. Lopez noted that shooting would be impermissible when a suspect is standing still and holding a bladed weapon at his side, even when a bystander was within seven feet. . . . This was because there was no immediate threat of danger. . . . Put another way, the officers lacked probable cause to believe that Lopez would imminently injure the officers or a bystander. However, Scozzari is truly on point and demonstrates most clearly that the officers in this case violated a clearly established right. . . . The cases indicate that, on August 8, 2016, it was clearly established that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force on a subject more than 15 feet away who was moving slowly and, though holding a pruning saw, was not using or brandishing it aggressively. Here, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the officers were between 15.9 and 17.6 feet away from Wicker when they fired, he did not raise the pruning saw at the officers or swing at them in an aggressive manner, and only took two steps towards the officers while moving one-third of a normal human’s walking speed. A reasonable officer would have known that they were not entitled to shoot in that scenario. Therefore, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity and the motions for summary judgment will be denied on that issue.”)

Collett v. Hamilton County, Ohio, No. 1:17-CV-295, 2019 WL 121360, at *7-8, *10, *13, *15 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 7, 2019) (“There is no dispute that failing to seatbelt an arrestee, standing alone, does not give rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . However, as of June 5, 2015, no reasonable corrections official could believe that it was legal to intentionally drive a motor vehicle in a reckless manner so as to cause injury to an arrestee who was handcuffed but not seat-belted. The Sixth Circuit in Scott cited a number of cases predating June 2015 that lead to this conclusion Although Scott was decided under the Eighth Amendment, the law set forth in the decision applies to plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment claim. The court acknowledged in Scott, as plaintiff does here, that an individual has no per se constitutional right to be seat-belted while being transported by a government official. But when an officer engages in additional acts that rise to the level of the ‘malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering’ or that violate the ‘objectively reasonable’ standard of the Fourth Amendment, a constitutional violation occurs. A reasonable official would have been on notice of the applicable law set forth in Scott prior to June 2015. . . . Consistent with Scott, this evidence is sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant McKown used excessive force by intentionally driving recklessly while transporting plaintiff and causing injury to him. Defendant McKown is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. ‘In light of the obviousness of the constitutional violation, [defendant] could not reasonably have believed that driving recklessly while [plaintiff was] not wearing [a] seatbelt[] was lawful.’ Scott, 736 F. App’x at 133-34. Defendants’ motion for summary judgment is denied on the Fourth Amendment claim for reckless driving. . . . Even if plaintiff’s evidence were sufficient to create a genuine factual dispute as to whether too-tight handcuffs prevented him from grasping the strap in the van or breaking his fall from the bench, plaintiff has failed to carry his burden to show that defendants would not be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. An arrestee’s right to be free from unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing has long been established. However, plaintiff has not cited case law to show that a claim for excessively forceful handcuffing has been recognized where the arrestee does not allege injury resulting from the handcuffs themselves or the direct application of physical force to the arrestee after he has been handcuffed and subdued. The constitutional prohibition against unduly tight or excessively forceful handcuffing in the course of an arrest was clearly established for qualified immunity purposes as early as 1991. . . . The Sixth Circuit has recognized since 1991 that freedom from ‘excessively forceful handcuffing’ is included in the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . . Although ‘a case directly on point’ is not required for a right to be clearly-established, the state of the law at the time of the action giving rise to the claim must have been such as to give the defendants fair warning that their actions violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. . . . Plaintiff has not provided any authority which indicates that as of June 5, 2015, a reasonable officer would have been on notice that there was anything about the manner in which defendants handcuffed or transported plaintiff that violated the Fourth Amendment prohibition against excessively forceful handcuffing. Jackson and the cases it cites establish that there was support in the case law for an excessively forceful handcuffing claim under the Fourth Amendment as of June 5, 2015; however, ‘no case permit[ted] an excessive force claim for overly tight handcuffing in the absence of a physical injury caused by the handcuffing,’ such as bruising or nerve impingement. . . Plaintiff points to no evidence in the record that demonstrates a causal connection between his too-tight handcuffs and the physical injuries he sustained. Further, unlike the cases that preceded Jackson where courts found that the use of violent physical force against a handcuffed and subdued individual could constitute a Fourth Amendment violation, plaintiff does not allege that defendants used ‘violent physical force’ by pulling or yanking on any part of his handcuffs or that they applied direct physical force to any part of his body. . . Thus, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and to summary judgment as a matter of law on plaintiff’s claim that defendants subjected him to excessively forceful handcuffing in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Davis-Bey v. City of Warren, No. 16-CV-11707, 2018 WL 895394, at *6 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 16, 2018), report and recommendation adopted, No. 16-CV-11707, 2018 WL 878879 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 14, 2018) (“The parties cite conflicting cases from within this circuit regarding whether the First Amendment clearly establishes a right to film police officers carrying out their duties. . . The existence of conflicting caselaw suggests that an absolute right to record is not clearly established. Furthermore, the court in the Crawford case cited by Plaintiff subsequently reversed its position and held that ‘The Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit have not ruled specifically on the right of the public openly to film police officers and their actions in a public setting.’ Crawford v. Geiger (Crawford II), 131 F. Supp. 3d 703, 714 (N.D. Ohio 2015). Finally, the Glik case, cited by Plaintiff, holds that any recording of police officers must be done from ‘a comfortable remove’ and without interfering with the performance of the officers’ duties. . . As several officers testified, Plaintiff was arrested for remaining ‘too close’ to the scene and interfering with the investigation, despite several officers directing Plaintiff to ‘leave,’ ‘back up,’ and/or ‘walk away.’ Officers testified that this was a safety concern. Accordingly, the Court should find that there is no clearly established right to videotape police officers under the circumstances of this case.”)

S.R. v. Kenton County Sheriff’s Office, No. 215CV143WOBGW, 2017 WL 4545231, at *9–11 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 11, 2017) (“[U]nder the totality of the circumstances, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Sumner’s manner of handcuffing S.R. and L.G. was an unconstitutional seizure and excessive force. . . . On the facts of this case, qualified immunity is a close call. Neither party points to a Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit decision directly on point that would have alerted a reasonable officer in 2014 to the unlawfulness of his actions under these circumstances. In New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), which involved searches of children in a school setting, the Court recognized that public school students’ rights under the Fourth Amendment are not as broad as those of the public and adopted a ‘reasonableness’ test based on all the circumstances. . . . At a general level, one might argue that T.L.O. put police officers on notice that they would be subject to a reasonableness standard in determining whether their search or seizure of a school child passes constitutional muster. However, the Sixth Circuit has rejected such an application of T.L.O. in the qualified immunity context, reasoning that T.L.O. merely established basic principles of law without guidance as to their application in specific situations. Beard v. Whitmore Lake Sch. Dist., 402 F.3d 598, 607 (6th Cir. 2005). In Beard, high school students who were strip searched sued school officials and a police officer alleging Fourth Amendment violations. The Sixth Circuit held that the searches did violate the students’ constitutional rights, but that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, notwithstanding the general principles set forth in T.L.O., the lack of factual context similar to the case before the Court meant that T.L.O. could not have ‘truly compelled’ defendants to realize that they were acting illegally in conducting the strip searches. . . . Similarly here, the broad principles set forth in T.L.O. would not have alerted Sumner to the unlawfulness of his actions under the specific facts of this case. . . . The parties cite no Sixth Circuit authority that would have alerted Sumner to the illegality of his actions. However, at least two other Circuits had denied qualified immunity to police officers who handcuffed young school children. See C.B. v. City of Sonora, 769 F.3d 1005, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2014) (officer who handcuffed calm, compliant but nonresponsive 11-year-old child not entitled to qualified immunity); Gray v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1306 (11th Cir. 2006) (handcuffing of nine-year-old student who had threatened to hit coach was unlawful seizure; incident was over, student posed no threat, and handcuffing by sheriff’s deputy was attempt to punish student and change her behavior in the future). Under the Sixth Circuit’s teaching in Beard, however, these out-of-circuit cases are insufficient to satisfy the ‘clearly established’ requirement. . . . Here, the two out-of-circuit cases cited above both rely on T.L.O., which Beard held is insufficiently generalized to constitute ‘applicable direct authority.’ Therefore, plaintiffs have not shown that it was ‘clearly established’ in 2014 that Sumner’s handcuffing of S.R. and L.G. was unconstitutional, and Sumner is thus entitled to qualified immunity.” [Note that the court did find the County liable as a matter of law for the unlawful handcuffing. See Blum, “Overview Outline”)]

O’Brien v. City of Mason, No. 1:16-CV-391, 2017 WL 2805165, at *4 (W.D. Mich. June 29, 2017) (“Marcia’s First Amendment claim fails because she has not cited a case clearly establishing a First Amendment right to observe the police. A number of circuits have addressed the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record the police activity, and some have found that right to be clearly-established. See, e.g., Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2014); ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 600 (7th Cir. 2012); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000). But the Sixth Circuit has yet to join those courts, and the only district courts in the Sixth Circuit to address that issue have found otherwise. See Williams v. City of Paris, No. 5:15-108-DCR, 2016 WL 2354230, at *4 (E.D. Ky. May 4, 2016); Crawford v. Geiger, 131 F. Supp. 3d 703, 715 (N.D. Ohio 2015), aff’d in part, rev’d in part and remanded, 656 F. App’x 190 (6th Cir. 2016)[.]”)

Cummerlander v. Patriot Preparatory Acad. Inc., No. 2:13-CV-0329, 2015 WL 519308, at *14-15 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 9, 2015) (“At the time of the search at issue, the prior law of the Supreme Court and this Circuit involving searches of students for suspected drug use and possession all clearly establish that Smith’s determination that JT should be subjected to a drug test was unconstitutional. A reasonable principal should have known that students have a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures, and that the standard for a reasonable search of students is reasonable suspicion. . . . The Supreme Court standard for free and voluntary consent to a search under the Fourth Amendment is also well-established. Further, the Supreme Court cases T.L.O. and Safford, as well as the Sixth Circuit case Williams, and the District Court case Fewless, puts Smith on notice as to the indicia of drug use and possession that should be considered in an investigation for and determination of reasonable suspicion of drug use. While it is unfortunate that Smith may have acted in conformity with a school policy to which he was bound, as will be discussed in the following section, such a school policy is unconstitutional and provides no protection to Smith in the individualized qualified immunity analysis. Thus, this Court concludes that it was objectively legally unreasonable for Smith to believe that JT and his mother gave voluntary and free consent to a urinalysis, and unreasonable for him to believe that his investigation into JT's alleged drug use met the well-established standard of reasonable suspicion under the circumstances. As the Sixth Circuit has explained, '[l]ike police officers, school officials need discretionary authority to function with great efficiency and speed in certain situations, so long as these decisions are consistent with certain constitutional safeguards.' . . . While questioning 'an official's every decision with the benefit of hindsight would undermine the authority necessary to ensure the safety and order of our schools,' coercing a student under threat of expulsion to take a drug test without establishing reasonable suspicion under the circumstances is akin to a student shedding his or her constitutional rights at the school gate. . . . Accordingly, the Court does not find that qualified immunity precludes personal liability for Smith.")

Hoskins v. Cumberland Cnty. Bd. of Educ., No. 2:13-CV-15, 2014 WL 7238621, at *12-13 (M.D. Tenn. Dec. 17, 2014) ("Although neither the Court nor the parties has identified a Sixth Circuit case directly on point, at least two courts of appeal have held that law enforcement officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for handcuffing children. [discussing C.B. v. City of Sonora (9th Cir.) and Gray ex rel Alexander v. Bostic (11th Cir.)] The record in this case does not demonstrate whether the principal and the officer actually continued to be afraid for their safety at the time the handcuffs were placed on [8 year-old] T.H., how much time elapsed between T.H.'s threats and rearing back of his fist and the officer's putting him in handcuffs, what T.H.'s demeanor was at the time the handcuffs were put on, or what his demeanor was for any of the forty-five minutes that he sat with handcuffs on in the principal's office. . . .Based on the record before the Court, Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that Officer Tollett is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, Officer Tollett's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's claim of unlawful seizure will be granted on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Combs v. City of Birmingham, No. 12-14528, 2013 WL 4670699, *1, *8, *9, *11, *12 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 30, 2013) ("Michigan is not among the 25 states with a law requiring its citizens to provide identifying information to police officers during a lawful Terry stop. . . .This case is not about the legality of Mr. Combs carrying his rifle openly, or any right he may have to do so. In this 42 U.S.C. § 1983 case, Mr. Combs claims that his unquestionable Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure without probable cause was violated through false arrest and false imprisonment. But, even in the absence of a mandatory state identification law in Michigan, the Court finds that under the totality of the circumstances, including Mr. Combs' youthful appearance, the police officers' request for proof that Mr. Combs was 18 constituted a lawful command; and, Mr. Combs' refusal to provide such proof gave the police officers probable cause to arrest him for resisting their lawful command under Birmingham, Mich., Code of Ordinances part II, ch. 74, art. II, § 74–27 and Mich. Comp. Laws § 750.479. The principles of Terry v. Ohio require a suspect to supply proof of his age when the suspected criminal activity is a minor carrying a loaded weapon in public. And, the failure to supply such proof can lead to charges, including resisting a lawful command, breach of the peace, and brandishing. However, even if the Court had found an absence of probable cause to arrest Mr. Combs, these police officers would be entitled to the protection of qualified immunity because Mr. Combs’ right is not clearly established in the contours of this particular situation: the police officers could have mistakenly concluded that it was reasonable to require Mr. Combs to prove his age so that they could assure themselves that a minor was not openly carrying a loaded assault rifle on a public street. . . . Accordingly, even in the absence of a stop and identify law in Michigan, the police officers’ request that Mr. Combs provide identification that would prove his age was a lawful command, based on this Court’s finding that: (1) Hiibel stands for the proposition that identifying information can be required of suspects during a Terry stop; and (2) a police officer can require proof to dispel reasonable suspicions of underage violations of the law during a Terry stop. The police officers’ requests were reasonably related to the circumstances justifying Mr. Combs’ legal Terry stop; they investigated a suspected violation of the underage weapon statute, based on a reasonable suspicion that Mr. Combs was not 18. . . . Although Hiibel has been the law of the land since 2004, one could argue it only applies in states with stop and identify laws. This case involves a request for identification to verify age in a state without a stop and identify law, but with a law requiring compliance with police officers’ commands. The Supreme Court has only addressed the legality of an arrest for failure to provide a name during a Terry stop. Consequently, probable cause may not be sufficiently clear in the contours of this particular situation, such that police officers would understand that their request for Mr. Combs to prove his age may violate the law. In other words, while police officers always need probable cause to arrest, it may be arguable that Mr. Combs’ failure to supply proof of his age amounted to probable cause to arrest him. Because reasonable police officers could disagree, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Combs’ false arrest and false imprisonment claims, even if the Court found an absence of probable cause to arrest him.”)

Ayers v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12–CV–753, 2013 WL 775359, *7, *8, *10–*12 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 25, 2013), appeal not considered by Ayers v. City of Cleveland, 773 F.3d 161 (6th Cir. 2014) (“[T]his Court has previously held that Brady’s application against police officers who fail to disclose material and potentially exculpatory evidence is clearly established law. . . Defendants do not contend otherwise. Therefore, Defendants Cipo and Kovach do not enjoy qualified immunity as to Plaintiff Ayers’s due process Brady claim, and the claim survives summary judgment. . . . A § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution is cognizable, although ‘the contours of such a claim remain uncertain.’ . . To succeed on such a claim, Ayers must prove the following: first, that a criminal prosecution was initiated against him and that the defendants made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute; second, that there was a lack of probable cause for the criminal prosecution; third, that as a consequence of the proceeding, Ayers suffered a deprivation of liberty; and fourth, that the criminal proceeding was resolved in Ayers’s favor. . . Neither a lack of malice, nor the intervention of a prosecutor, works to absolve an individual officer of liability.

. . . The Court therefore finds that, viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Ayers, there is sufficient evidence that Defendants Cipo, Kovach, and Donaldson violated Ayers's constitutional right to be free of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. Further, the Court finds that through deposition testimony and affidavits, Ayers has created a genuine issue of material fact. Finally, the Court finds that the acts in question—stating falsehoods in warrant affidavits and mischaracterizing key evidence—is well-understood by reasonable officers to be violative of a suspect's rights. . . . Certainly, the right to Brady material, to a constitutionally sufficient indictment, or to counsel during important criminal proceedings is clearly established. But with the failure to intervene claim, the Court must ask whether there was a clearly established constitutional right that a law enforcement officer was required to intervene to prevent another law enforcement officer from violating these rights. For there to be a failure to intervene, there must be a corresponding duty. There is ample Sixth Circuit caselaw regarding police officers' duty to intervene in excessive force cases. . . . But the Court finds no such caselaw (nor does Ayers provide any) regarding a duty to intervene in the situations described in Ayers's complaint. . . . '[G]iven the absence of any case law that has imposed a duty of protection under even roughly analogous circumstances,' . . . it could not be 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . Therefore, the Court concludes that the failure to intervene claim is independent of the other claims and that there is insufficient authority to show that Detectives Cipo and Kovach violated clearly established law.'")

Colebrook v. Kentucky Dept. of Motor Vehicle Enforcement, No. 08-110-JGW, 2010 WL 4979072, at *5 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 2, 2010) ("Officer Scott is entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident in question, Gant had not yet been decided. Rather, at the time of the incident Belton controlled and a reasonable officer would have believed that the search of the vehicle was permissible. As the Court in Gant itself anticipated, '[b]ecause a broad reading of Belton has been widely accepted, the doctrine of qualified immunity will shield officers from liability for search conducted in reasonable reliance on that understanding.'")

Ambris v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:12CV774, 2012 WL 5874367, *8-*10 (N.D. Ohio Nov. 19, 2012) ("Here, if we decided to follow Scarborough and determine that the plaintiff has plead a prima facie constitutional violation, our inquiry would turn to whether the existence of Scarborough is enough to determine that Plaintiff's right to be free from discrimination based on her sexual orientation was 'clearly established.' While the Sixth Circuit's most recent decision is Scarborough and there have been cases, both in other circuits and the United States Supreme Court, that have showed a trend to giving homosexuals such protection, the heavily conflicting case law in the Sixth Circuit would tend to show that there is no 'clearly established right.' The Courts have been all over the place with regard to treating such claims for disparate treatment based on sexual orientation, so it would be difficult to say that Defendant Bahhur knew, or should have known, that he was violating a clearly established right. Plaintiff points to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996) for the proposition that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions violated Plaintiff's 'clearly established rights.' . . . Romer is distinguishable from the facts in the present case. Romer was decided outside of an employment context. There is no mention of Title VII throughout the entire opinion, which this Court is required to implement in an employment discrimination analysis. . . Were the facts to show that this discrimination happened outside of an employment context, the holding and analysis of Romer would serve to put Defendants on notice that their actions were violating a ‘clearly established right,’ as is required to negate qualified immunity. However, there is no binding case law that would ‘clearly establish’ Plaintiff’s rights under this fact pattern, and as such, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Cline v. City of Mansfield, No. 1:07-CV-1070, 2010 WL 3860735, at *27 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 30, 2010) (“In this case, that prior Sixth Circuit caselaw does not name which specific law enforcement official must review the affidavit underlying a search warrant does not immunize the very person responsible for planning and executing a search. It was clearly established that some member of Mack’s team needed to perform that review and it is reasonable to conclude that Mack was charged with either doing it himself or assuring it was done. . . There need not be a Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court case specifically stating that a supervisor has the responsibility to supervise to make it so. . . To the contrary, it was clearly established as of September 12, 2006 that some officer needed to at least look at the affidavit attached to this search warrant . . . and it was objectively unreasonable in view of that clearly established law for Team Leader Mack to fail to ensure that someone did so. . . Again, the Court’s determination rests squarely on the fact that even a simple glance would have revealed the defect in this document.”)

Wilson v. Columbus Bd. of Educ., 589 F.Supp.2d 952, 964, 965 (S.D. Ohio 2008) (“There is no Sixth Circuit case law involving materially similar facts to this case. However, although Sisco confronted a novel factual circumstance, well-settled precedent of the Sixth Circuit recognizes that in a non-custodial setting, a governmental actor can be held responsible for an injury committed by a private person if that governmental actor increases the risk of harm to the plaintiff and acts with deliberate indifference. . . Therefore, it would have been clear to a reasonable person in Sisco’s position that her issuance of the suspension, which placed Jane Doe in a dangerous environment, could subject Sisco to constitutional liability.”).

Hendrickson v. Caruso, No. 1:07-cv-304, 2008 WL 623788, at *10 (W.D. Mich. Mar. 4, 2008) (“The Sixth Circuit has never held that a prisoner has a statutory cause of action for monetary damages under RLUIPA. RLUIPA creates a private cause of action for a prison inmate if section 3 is violated, and further provides that the complaining party, if successful, may ‘obtain appropriate relief against a government.’ 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-2(a). The Eleventh Circuit recently observed, ‘To put it mildly, there is a division of authority on th[e] question [of whether RLUIPA authorizes an award of monetary damages].’ Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d at 1270 (collecting cases). Assuming arguendo that RLUIPA authorizes a cause of action for damages, qualified immunity is undoubtedly an appropriate defense. . . Plaintiff has not addressed much less demonstrated how defendants’ actions violated any ‘clearly established’ rights under RLUIPA. Plaintiff has not identified any authority that clearly established his right to official MDOC recognition of Satanism as a religion, and every court that has considered Anton LaVey’s books on Satanism has determined that they are fundamentally incompatible with prison safety, security, and prisoner rehabilitation. Accordingly, I find that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's claims for monetary damages on the alternative basis of qualified immunity.”)

Yamaha Motor Manufacturing Corp. of America v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 403 F.Supp.2d 601, 607 (W.D. Ky. 2005) (“The court must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of a constitutional or statutory right at all and then, and only then, determine whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Here, the plaintiffs have alleged violations of statutory rights under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act, so the court will turn to the second prong. . . . Here, the plaintiffs argue that the ‘clearly established right’ is ‘meaningful access’ to the Commonwealth’s golf courses. As of the date in question, the requirement that certain types of golf cars must be provided to constitute ‘meaningful access’ to state golf courses was not clearly established. . . . Consequently, the plaintiffs cannot maintain their claims for monetary damages against the Commonwealth Defendants in their individual capacities. There is thus no need for the court to consider the third element of the qualified immunity test.”).

Hainey v. Parrott, No. 1:02-CV-733, 2005 WL 2397704, at *8 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 28, 2005) (“There is no dispute in this case that the coroner’s office retained and then disposed of Plaintiffs’ decedents’ brains without any notice to Plaintiffs. As explained above in Part III.A, Plaintiffs have established uncontested facts which demonstrate that Defendants violated their constitutional right to receive notice prior to the disposal of their decedent’s body parts. The Court also finds that this right was clearly established at the time the coroner’s office committed the acts in question here. As the Court stated above, supra, at 10-15, in 1991, Brotherton very broadly and very clearly held that family members have a property interest in their decedent’s body parts which is protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, a reasonable coroner in this judicial circuit would have known that disposing of body parts without notice to the decedent’s next of kin would have violated that right. That seems especially true where, as Plaintiffs observe, this same coroner’s office was involved in the case that established the right at stake here.”).

May v. City of Springfield, No. 3:03 CV 293, 2005 WL 2338785, at *6 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 23, 2005) (“Immediately before Emmel took Plaintiff to the pavement, she had resumed her vandalism of Hatter’s truck by kicking it. Thus, Emmel had a reason for his actions, to wit: preventing Plaintiff from continuing to damage Hatter’s truck. Moreover, Plaintiff’s ability to resume her destructive acts towards Hatter’s truck, even though she was handcuffed at the time, demonstrates beyond cavil that she had not been completely restrained. Plaintiff has not cited a case which would demonstrate that it was clearly established in December, 2001, that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by using force to bring a suspect to the ground, in order to prevent her from resuming her vandalism of the private property of another. Nevertheless, Plaintiff argues that the evidence raises a genuine issue of material fact concerning the question whether the Fourth Amendment right she relies upon herein was clearly established, because, after a post-incident investigation, Springfield found that Emmel had violated the use of force policy for its Police Department. It bears emphasis, however, that the right must be clearly established at the time the alleged constitutional violation occurred. . . Simply stated, after the fact conclusions by Springfield concerning Emmel's compliance with its use of force policy do not demonstrate that a constitutional right had been clearly established before the incident giving rise to the investigation. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the evidence fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the particulars of Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure through the use of excessive force had been clearly established before December 15, 2001.").

Cahill v. Walker, No. 3:03-CV-00257, 2005 WL 1566494, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. July 5, 2005) ("Certainly, a reasonable police officer would understand that sexually harassing and assaulting an individual violates a constitutionally-protected right; however, this court does not now address Officer Walker's conduct. Here, the conduct at issue is Chief Montgomery's inaction, failing to discipline Officer Walker for his alleged prior sexual misconduct. The appropriate question is whether a reasonable supervisor would have understood that, by failing to discipline Officer Walker, he was allowing the misconduct to continue and thus proximately causing Plaintiff's constitutional right to be violated. . . In Lynn v. City of Detroit, the court found that this question 'turns on whether the defendant[] knowingly acquiesced in [the] subordinates' unconstitutional conduct, to the plaintiffs' injury.' . . In this case, the question of whether Chief Montgomery 'knowingly acquiesced' in Officer Walker's alleged misconduct is dependent on the question of whether he knew of that misconduct. When genuine issues of material fact remain as to an element of qualified immunity, summary judgment on qualified immunity is not appropriate. . . Here, the factual issue of whether Chief Montgomery knew of Officer Walker's prior misconduct is intertwined with the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. Chief Montgomery is therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Shahit v. Tosqui, No. 04-71538, 2005 WL 1345413, at *9 (E.D. Mich. June 1, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court finds it impossible to conclude that Defendants, police officers who are required to make split-second decisions on the street, violated a 'clearly established' right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic violation occurred when only a few months later, in Weaver, a trio of federal appellate judges clearly believed that probable cause was not required. Accordingly, given that the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit had not directly addressed the issue of whether probable cause is always required to stop a vehicle for a civil traffic offense, and Sixth Circuit in Weaver upheld a traffic stop based upon reasonable suspicion shortly after the events of this case occurred, the Court finds that the right to be stopped only upon probable cause that a civil traffic offense occurred was not clearly established when Defendants stopped Plaintiffs' vehicle.").

Rose v. Saginaw County, 353 F.Supp.2d 900, 924 (E.D. Mich. 2005) ("In this case, the right to be free from unreasonable seizures is clearly established. But the qualified immunity defense requires the Court to look beyond the right in the abstract. . . . The Court finds that the contours of the right to reasonable seizures pertaining to pretrial detainees was not sufficiently clear to impose liability on individual actors following the County's policy in effect during the period at issue in this case. Issues relating to strip and body cavity searches, viewing of naked inmates by guards of the other gender, and removal of clothing from unruly detainees have troubled courts over the past several years and have not yielded a uniform set of decisions on the subject. . . . At the time of the detentions in this case, there was no clear precedent that would have provided guidance to the individual defendants, who were attempting to walk the line between protecting detainees from harming themselves and violating their rights to personal privacy. That they transgressed that 'hazy border' here will not forfeit their qualified immunity from suit.").

Magrum v. Meinke, 332 F.Supp.2d 1071, 1082 (N.D. Ohio 2004) ("Defendant directs the Court to Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp .2d 875 (N.D. Ohio 2002), Hale v. Vance, 267 F.Supp.2d 725 (S.D. Ohio 2003), and Joy. . . for the proposition that a reasonable officer in Meinke's position would have concluded that the amount of force employed was lawful. In Hale, the court determined that the use of a choke hold, or escort position, in the context of a Terry stop might give rise to an excessive force claim. The officer, however, was still entitled to qualified immunity because the court could not 'say that it was clearly established as of February 20, 2001, that a police officer may not detain an individual exiting a house reportedly providing sanctuary for at least one suspect in an investigation of gunshots by placing her arm behind her back and holding her in a choke hold.' . . . Likewise, in Ferguson, though the use of a neck hold under the circumstances presented therein might have constituted excessive force, the officer was still entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In reaching its conclusion, this Court observed that the '[p]laintiffs have not presented relevant, controlling authority from this jurisdiction, or a consensus from other jurisdictions, regarding the constitutionality of neckholds.' . . . Subsequently, however, the Fultz court, relying on Hope, declined to follow Ferguson, even though 'there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints.' . . . Instead the Fultz court focused on general excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances presented, and noted that '[a]t the time of the incident in question, the law was clearly established that a police officer should use no more force than necessary to effect an arrest.' . . . Upon further consideration, and in light of Hope, the Court agrees with Fultz's analytical framework. If, as Defendant contends, he employed a takedown maneuver together with a head or neck repositioning technique, then Meinke did not act contrary to any clearly established standards. However, under Plaintiff's version of events, in which Meinke flipped Magrum to the ground and choked him two times, the second time while Magrum was not resisting, Defendant acted in violation of clearly established law.")

Watkins v. The Millennium School, 290 F.Supp.2d 890, 902, 903 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("Applying the Williams test, the Court has already determined that a constitutional violation may have occurred. The next issue then is whether the right was 'clearly established' such that a reasonable official would have known about it. In this case, a reasonable teacher should have known that students have Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Supreme Court decided T.L.O. in 1985, clarifying that the Fourth Amendment applies to searches conducted by school officials. . . . The third prong—whether the official's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established rights—is the most contentious because there are no comparable cases such that it could be said that Defendant Apley should have understood that what she was doing violated Plaintiff Watkins’ privacy rights. Even Thomas, to the extent that it is analogous, was decided after the events in question took place. However, the Williams test is in accord with Anderson v. Creighton, where the Supreme Court considered not whether the defendant should have known, but whether the official’s actions were ‘objectively unreasonable’ in light of the clearly established right. This Court finds that Plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Defendant Apley is entitled to qualified immunity. As explained by the Court in Anderson v. Creighton, the official is not protected by qualified immunity just because this very action previously has not been held unlawful. . . . A reasonable jury could find Defendant Apley acted objectively unreasonable in requesting Plaintiff Watkins to accompany her alone, and into a supply closet, to conduct a second search, despite having no apparent basis to search further. A reasonable jury also could conclude that Defendant Millennium’s School Policy 425 put Apley on notice that her actions in contravention of that policy would be objectively unreasonable.”).

Fultz v. Whittaker, 261 F. Supp.2d 767, 776 & n.6 (W.D. Ky. 2003) (“[T]he fact that there was no direct precedent from the Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court directly dealing with the constitutionality of neck restraints does not necessarily mean that the right to be free from certain types of restraints under these circumstances was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The Court is aware that this is contrary to the holding of Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F.Supp.2d 875, 881 (N.D.Ohio 2002), upon which Defendants heavily rely. In Ferguson, the Court concluded that the right to be free from an unconstitutional excessive neck restraint was not clearly established. Id. The Ferguson court, however, did not reference the Hope opinion. The Court believes that Ferguson defines the issue too narrowly, and that based on Hope a court must look generally at the excessiveness of the conduct in light of the circumstances instead of focusing on whether the precise conduct at issue has previously been held unconstitutional. . . . The appropriate inquiry in this case is whether a reasonable officer could have objectively believed that using a neck restraint in which pressure or force is applied is an acceptable method by which to maintain control over a handcuffed individual not actively resisting arrest or physically threatening the Officers or others under these particular circumstances.”).

Smartt v. Grundy County, Tennessee, No. 4:01-CV-32, 2002 WL 32058965, at *4 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 26, 2002) (“Shooting a fleeing car thief when the officer was not in physical danger, if proven, would violate clearly established law of which a reasonable person should have known.”).

Fewless v. Bd. of Education of Wayland Union Schools, 208 F. Supp.2d 806, 822, 823 & n.17 (W.D. Mich. 2002) (“The Court could not find any cases involving school officials attempting to obtain legally valid consent from youths with disabilities like ADHD. [Relying on Hope v. Pelzer,] [t]his Court finds that Schneckloth gave ‘fair warning’ that Joseph’s personal characteristics, as they affected the totality of the circumstances, rendered him unable to voluntarily consent to be searched. . . . As to the reasonableness of the strip search, a Sixth Circuit case on point, Williams v. Ellington, held the school officials protected by qualified immunity only after an investigation much more extensive and reliable than the one that was conducted here. . . . Thus, the decision to strip search Joseph Fewless was not objectively legally reasonable. Moreover, the decision was highly questionable in light of common sense and general experience. Qualified immunity does not bar the personal liability of Defendants Cutler and Medendorp.”).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Blackmon v. Jones, No. 23-3288, 2025 WL 869045, at *3 (7th Cir. Mar. 20, 2025) (“The officers have not asked for qualified immunity with respect to the counts of Blackmon’s complaint that charge them with manufacturing evidence or coercing testimony. Their appeal is limited to Blackmon’s contention that an unduly suggestive photo array or lineup by itself entitles an accused to damages. And our answer—that it does not—is limited to that issue. Blackmon’s appropriate remedy on that subject would have been exclusion of evidence at trial, not damages. We have so far looked at this suit using the framework established by Vega in 2022. A different perspective would ask whether, in 2002, when the police obtained these identifications, it was clearly established that investigating officers could be personally liable under § 1983 for conducting a suggestive lineup. The answer is no. Before 2002 neither this circuit, nor any other, had held that an officer could be liable for employing suggestive identification procedures. . . . And it did not become clearly established in the years between 2002 and 2022 that officers could be personally liable for suggestive identification procedures. Even as late as 2022, this circuit expressed uncertainty about how the law treats these situations, Holloway v. Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 766 (7th Cir. 2022). At least one other circuit held that damages for suggestive identification procedures would be ‘unprecedented and unwarranted’ unless the officer misled the prosecutor or lied to the judge. Wray v. New York, 490 F.3d 189, 193 (2d Cir. 2007). We agree with Wray that any ‘violation [of the right to a fair trial] was caused by the ill-considered acts and decisions of the prosecutor and trial judge’ (and, here, defense counsel too). . . . Blackmon has not cited, and we have not found, any appellate decision holding police officers liable in damages when judges allowed prosecutors to introduce suggestive identifications into evidence at trial. The absence of a clearly established right entitles the defendants in this case to qualified immunity.”)

Taylor v. Schwarzhuber, No. 23-3151, 2025 WL 829598, at *4-6 (7th Cir. Mar. 17, 2025) (“Our caselaw yields the conclusion that, when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Taylor, Rydzewski and Schwarzhuber violated clearly established law because they lacked reasonable suspicion to stop Taylor. When we take out the disputed material facts and take Taylor’s account to be true, the only basis for the stop was that Taylor was (1) running (2) with a bag (3) in a high crime area. Both our precedent and Supreme Court precedent demonstrate that these facts are insufficient to create reasonable suspicion. The case Gentry v. Sevier, 597 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2010), should have put Rydzewski and Schwarzhuber on notice of this. (We put to one side that the doctrine of qualified immunity operates on the fiction that police officers even follow caselaw development at such a granular level. See, e.g., Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity’s Boldest

Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 630 (2021). . . . Taylor did what many people might do on a cold winter evening: run down the street carrying something. This is exactly the kind of commonplace behavior that could subject people to virtually random seizures if we find the officers' conduct justified. Reid, like Gentry, prevents us from blessing the officers' conduct with immunity before trial. Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski resist this conclusion, arguing that they did not stop Taylor just because he was running down the street. Rather, they insist, they had reasonable suspicion because Taylor was running in an area where there had been a series of robberies. But clearly established law holds that police officers cannot stop people going about their business just because they happen to be in a high-crime area. . . . This proposition is well established in our circuit by multiple cases of which Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski should have taken note. [collecting cases] In sum, after viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Taylor, clearly established law shows Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski lacked reasonable suspicion to stop Taylor. Taylor was doing what any teenager might be doing on a cold December evening—running down the street with a bag. That is not enough to give police officers reasonable suspicion that a crime occurred. The officers do not merit qualified immunity from Taylor's unconstitutional stop claim at the summary judgment stage. . . . For similar reasons, we hold that disputed material facts read in the light most favorable to Taylor demonstrate that Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski violated Taylor's clearly established Fourth Amendment right when they patted him down for weapons. Officers may only search individuals for weapons when they have a reasonable, 'articulable suspicion that the suspect is "armed and dangerous."'. . . Looking at the facts in the light most favorable to Taylor, the officers lacked that articulable suspicion. Taylor states that he ran down the street while holding a bag, and he stopped when the officers asked him to stop. Nothing about those facts suggests Taylor was armed and dangerous. All they suggest is that Taylor was present in an area where Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski had been assigned to patrol. But being present in an area that officers have been assigned to patrol is an insufficient rationale for a search according to the Supreme Court. . . . The officers cannot succeed in their quest at the summary judgment phase for qualified immunity from Taylor's unconstitutional search claim any more than they can his unconstitutional stop claim. . . . By contrast, Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski are entitled to qualified immunity from Taylor's Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claim. To recap, to force the officers to trial in the face of their claim of qualified immunity, Taylor must show (1) a genuine dispute of material fact that the officers violated a statutory or constitutional right and (2) that the right was 'clearly established' at the time. . . . Courts may address those two questions 'in either order,' . . . and '[i]f either inquiry is answered in the negative, the defendant official is protected by qualified immunity.' . . . On the summary judgment record before us, we must conclude that Taylor's suit fails under the first inquiry. Taylor did not present enough evidence to call into question whether the officers violated his constitutional right to equal protection under the law by racially profiling him. . . . [P]laintiffs must show both discriminatory purpose and discriminatory effect. Taylor failed to present the court with any evidence of the second category, discriminatory effect. He did not identify any similarly situated individuals treated differently, present any statistics that suggest discriminatory effect, or provide any other type of proof. He therefore did not satisfy the elements of his Fourteenth Amendment claim, and the court rightly granted

Schwarzhuber and Rydzewski qualified immunity from the claim because Taylor did not show a constitutional violation to begin with.”)

Kilborn v. Amiridis, No. 23-3196, 2025 WL 783357, at *4–5, *8-9 (7th Cir. Mar. 12, 2025) (“[T]he University officials are not entitled to qualified immunity on this issue. Before Garcetti, it was clearly established that the Connick-Pickering test offered qualified protection to public employees, including professors at public universities. . . . Garcetti did not purport to change the law with respect to university teaching and scholarship. . . . And we have not suggested in any subsequent decision that Garcetti would apply in this context—only in different contexts. . . . In fact, we have even recognized that a college or university ‘instructor’s freedom to express [his] views on [an] assigned course is protected’ even though classroom speech is also ‘part of the instructor’s official duties.’ . . . Because our pre-Garcetti cases clearly establish a right to academic freedom in this context, and neither Garcetti nor our more recent case law undermines that right, Garcetti does not supply a basis for granting qualified immunity. . . . We do not suggest that reliance on Garcetti would never be appropriate to support qualified immunity. In some cases, there may be genuine uncertainty about whether the speech at issue falls within Garcetti’s exception for university teaching or scholarship. . . . But where, like here, a plaintiff’s speech falls comfortably within the core of what constitutes university teaching and scholarship, university officials cannot win on qualified immunity merely by proposing an extension to Garcetti that courts have not yet recognized or rejected. . . . Next, Kilborn raises a compelled speech claim. He argues that he was forced to participate in an eight week diversity course where he was compelled to express his commitment to the goals of the program. Even if his factual allegations support such an inference, the University officials are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even if it were reasonable to infer that Kilborn was compelled to express commitment to the goals of the diversity training program, Kilborn still fails to state a claim because the University officials are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Kilborn had to show that existing precedent clearly establishes Kilborn’s right as a public employee not to be compelled to speak. . . . He has not done so. Instead, the cases Kilborn relies on involve the government acting in its sovereign capacity, not as an employer. . . . Janus dealt with compelled subsidies of union speech, not the compelled speech of public employees. . . . And while the Court opined on how it might evaluate compelled speech claims, it expressly declined to clarify which standard applies. . . . As a result, several questions remain unresolved: Is it part of an employee’s official duties under Garcetti to express commitment to the goals of a training program? . . . If not, what level of judicial scrutiny applies? . . . Does the level of scrutiny depend on whether the compelled speech claim involves a ‘blanket requirement’ or a ‘single supervisory decision’? . . . Because existing precedent does not resolve these questions, the University officials could reasonably believe that requiring an employee to express commitment to the goals of a training program germane to his position is constitutionally permissible. We decline to resolve the questions left open after Janus given the lack of briefing on the subject. It is enough to decide that the University officials would be entitled to qualified immunity even if Kilborn’s allegations of compelled speech were plausible. . . . We affirm the district court’s dismissal of Kilborn’s compelled speech claim.”)

Felton v. Brown, 129 F.4th 999, 1012-13 (7th Cir. 2025) (“Citing Martinez, Felton argues that his First Amendment right not to have his outgoing mail confiscated was clearly established. But, given the facts of this case, his argument conceptualizes the right in question at too high a level of generality. . . . Instead, the controlling question is whether it was clearly established that the First Amendment required prison officials to separate and return a noncontraband item that accompanied his contraband letter even though the two were in the same envelope. Courts have addressed the selective confiscation of prison mail, but only in the context of incoming mail, which is governed by Turner rather than Martinez. And, in those cases, we, along with the Supreme Court, have rejected the proposition Felton espouses here that the First Amendment requires prison officials to separate and deliver non-objectionable mail rather than retain the entire mailing. . . . Given the dearth of cases regarding outgoing mail and the cases that reject the notion that prison officials have a duty to separate out non-objectionable content in the context of incoming mail, we cannot say that the defendants’ obligation to do so here was clearly established. At base, this is not the type of ‘obvious’ First Amendment violation. . . . that would preclude qualified immunity.”)

Stewardson v. Titus, 126 F.4th 1264, 1278-79 (7th Cir. 2025) (“The relevant question for purposes of qualified immunity . . . is whether an officer—who previously witnessed another officer’s use of excessive force—should have known he was obligated to prevent additional excessive force that occurred later in time and outside of his presence. The law was, and remains, unclear on that question. . . . The law does not require officers to act as fortune tellers, anticipating when their fellow officers might use excessive force in the future and knowing to intervene before they do. We do not think the court in Byrd meant to impose such a duty when it said failure-to-intervene liability might attach when an officer fails to prevent excessive force ‘within his knowledge.’ . . . Stewardson fails to cite a case that clearly establishes such a rule, and our search reveals none. Biggs is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Stewardson’s failure-to-intervene claim. Nothing indicates Biggs had ‘the ability to prevent’ Titus’s sudden use of additional force when it occurred outside of his presence and some thirty minutes after the leg sweep. . . . Because the law at the time imposed no clear duty on an officer to intervene under the circumstances presented in this case, the district court correctly granted summary judgment to Biggs.”)

Stewardson v. Titus, 126 F.4th 1264, 1280-82 (7th Cir. 2025) (Jackson-Akiwumi, J., dissenting in part) (“I dissent only as to the grant of qualified immunity to Officer Biggs on Blake Stewardson’s claim that Biggs failed to intervene before Officer Titus performed a hip toss on Stewardson. In my view, we should reverse the district court’s decision to shield Biggs from this claim. I join the majority opinion’s resolution of all other issues. . . . [T]he fact that Biggs was not in the cell at the time of Titus’s hip toss did not erase the knowledge that Biggs had accumulated since Stewardson’s arrival at the jail: Titus was subjecting Stewardson to ‘repeated use of excessive force,’ as my colleagues aptly describe it. . . . Biggs saw Titus slam Stewardson’s head into the wall twice and perform a leg sweep on him. Even if Titus’s leg sweep and hip toss happened thirty minutes apart, Biggs knew Titus had been mistreating Stewardson. Further, thirty minutes is not a long time. This is especially true in a county jail where, as surveillance video shows, several officers were solely focused on this one detainee in an ongoing effort to stabilize him. A reasonable jury could thus conclude Biggs knew of the constitutional violation. Based on Biggs’s knowledge, a reasonable jury could also find that he was reckless for not intervening. At the very least, a reasonable jury could conclude that Biggs—a supervisor no less—should have reminded Titus that this detainee was drunk and possibly suicidal. And if Titus somehow feared for his safety before entering Stewardson’s cell, Biggs could have urged Titus to wait for other officers to accompany him. Such warnings are within the realm of officers’ intervention mechanisms to prevent further constitutional violations. . . . In sum, it would not take a ‘fortune teller,’ to use the majority opinion’s term, to foresee that Titus’s use of excessive force would persist. . . . Our clearly established law does not condone an officer’s decision to turn a blind eye to that sort of recurring conduct. Because the question of whether Biggs failed to intervene should have gone to a jury, I respectfully dissent.”)

Manery v. Lee, 124 F.4th 1073, 1080 (7th Cir. 2025) (“At one time, Supreme Court precedent required lower courts to treat the constitutional issue as a threshold inquiry. . . . Today, however, these questions may be addressed in either order. . . . Considering the constitutional question first ‘is often beneficial,’ in part because it ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent.’ . . . Such an approach also can promote the stability and clarity of constitutional precedent. . . . On the other hand, some constitutional standards require, by their nature, very fact-specific assessments conducted at a significant degree of specificity. In such cases, prudential concerns often counsel that we focus on the second prong. . . . The second prong of the qualified immunity analysis ensures that a government official is held liable only when the contours of the right allegedly violated are ‘sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . In the context of excessive force claims, a plaintiff can meet ‘this burden either by identifying a “closely analogous case that established a right to be free from the type of force the police officers used on him” or by showing “that the force was so plainly excessive that, as an objective matter, the police officers would have been on notice that they were violating the Fourth Amendment.”’ . . . Although a plaintiff need not put forth ‘a case directly on point,’ settled authority ‘must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Furthermore, the constitutional right at issue must not be defined at too high a level of generality. . . . With these principles in mind, we turn to the record before us. Mr. Manery contends that it was clearly established that ‘deadly force cannot be used when there is no longer an imminent threat of danger.’ . . . In doing so, he defines the constitutional right at too high a level of generality. . . . ‘[S]pecificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context’ because ‘it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’ . . . Because the inquiry into whether an officer used excessive force is highly fact-dependent, ‘police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’”)

Manery v. Lee, 124 F.4th 1073, 1082-88 (7th Cir. 2025) (Lee, J., dissenting) (“My colleagues conclude that we have jurisdiction to consider Lieutenant Jason Lee’s interlocutory appeal and that he is entitled to qualified immunity. To secure appellate jurisdiction, however, Lieutenant Lee’s qualified immunity argument must rest entirely on undisputed facts or disputed facts that are construed in William Manery's favor. As I shall explain, this is not the case. Indeed, if we take Mr. Manery's version of events (rather than Lieutenant Lee's), the officer's actions are clearly proscribed by precedent. As such, I would dismiss this appeal for lack of jurisdiction, and I respectfully dissent. . . . [A]n officer is entitled to fire at a moving vehicle if the vehicle is speeding towards him, putting him at risk of being run over. On the other hand, if the vehicle is not moving in the officer's direction or if something is impeding the vehicle's path to the officer so as to eliminate any threat, use of deadly force is unreasonable. With that, we turn to the case at hand. . . . To place himself within the zone of reasonableness articulated in Scott and Starks, Lieutenant Lee argued on summary judgment that he was entitled to qualified immunity 'for his split-second decision to fire at Manery as he drove towards him in the Jeep.' According to Lieutenant Lee, Mr. Manery 'drove the Jeep straight toward [him],' and '[a]s Manery drove the Jeep toward [him], [Lieutenant Lee] fired at him.'" But the video footage of the encounter contradicts Lieutenant Lee's account. Rather than a vehicle barreling towards an officer, the footage shows Mr. Manery's white Jeep accelerating in reverse away from the officers, striking the curb at the edge of the parking lot with its rear tires, turning slightly to the left, accelerating forward, immediately colliding with a black unmarked vehicle at a perpendicular angle, and coming to a complete stop. At this point, the truck is trapped. It is hemmed in by the curb behind, the car to its right, and the vehicle in front. And it is only after this that Lieutenant Lee, who is standing off to the side of the truck, fires his weapon into the driver's side where Mr. Manery is sitting. . . . I have explained why Lieutenant Lee's qualified immunity theory is dependent on his view of the facts. Whether the truck was fully stopped at the time the officer fired his gun and, thus, did not pose a threat to Lieutenant Lee or anyone else is at least debatable; a reasonable jury could find either way. The second point—whether the law proscribing Lieutenant Lee's conduct was clearly established—requires some more exposition. . . . The majority opinion is correct to note that, when evaluating the existence of clearly established law, we cannot define the constitutional right in question at too high a level of generality. . . . Rarely will the facts of one case precisely mirror those of another. This is why a case can clearly establish a constitutional right even though its facts are not 'fundamentally similar' or even 'materially similar' to the facts in question. . . . What matters is that 'the contours of the right are sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' I believe that Scott and Starks clearly establish that it is unreasonable for an officer to use deadly force on an individual operating a vehicle when the vehicle is not speeding towards him or others, thereby creating an imminent threat of serious harm. But to my colleagues, 'these cases are not sufficiently analogous to Lieutenant Lee's encounter with Mr. Manery and therefore are not an impediment to the grant of qualified immunity.' . . . As the majority sees it, what distinguishes this case from Scott is that the suspect in Scott was driving away from the officer, while Mr. Manery was not. As for Starks, the majority opinion focuses on the fact that the officer in Starks may have put himself in harm's way, while Lieutenant Lee did not. But, by focusing on these facts, the majority opinion loses sight of the pertinent lesson that these cases teach: an officer is entitled to fire at an operator of a moving vehicle if the vehicle is speeding towards him or others, putting their safety at risk; however, he acts unreasonably if he fires at a vehicle when it is no longer moving towards him or others, abating that risk. This rule does not define Mr. Manery's right at too high a level of generality. Compare this to the broader principle that an officer may not use deadly force unless he ‘has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.’ . . . Or even the rule that an officer may not use deadly force once he no longer faces an imminent threat of harm. . . . The latter propositions are unquestionably general statements of law. By contrast, Scott and Starks apply those general principles to the particular scenario of when an officer confronts an operator of a moving vehicle, and they make it abundantly clear that it is unreasonable for an officer to shoot at an operator of a vehicle when the vehicle is no longer moving directly towards him or others. In other words, Scott and Starks ‘ “squarely govern[]” the specific facts at issue’ here. . . . [A]t this stage, we must construe the present record in Mr. Manery’s favor and give him the benefit of all reasonable inferences. Viewed through this lens, the record shows that Mr. Manery had wedged his truck between the curb and a police car; he made no movement to indicate to officers that he was going to run or confront them in any way; Lieutenant Lee was standing off to the side of the vehicle; and he fired multiple shots at Mr. Manery after the car became lodged and could not move. In this scenario, I believe that Scott and Starks gives [sic] notice to any reasonable officer in Lieutenant Lee’s shoes that he should not fire shots into the vehicle and that doing so would violate Mr. Manery’s constitutional rights. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent.”)

Pryor v. Corrigan, 124 F.4th 475, 489 (7th Cir. 2024) (“The parties discuss two cases, Johnson v. Scott, 576 F.3d 658 (7th Cir. 2009) and Hollingsworth v. City of Aurora, No. 11 CV 4597, 2014 WL 7204083 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 11, 2014). But neither parallels this one. In Johnson and Hollingsworth, officers were granted qualified immunity for tackling suspects. But both cases involved violent underlying crimes. . . . And both involved longer police chases. . . . This case does not present such extreme facts. Relying on these differences, Pryor submits that an officer tackling someone was acceptable in Johnson and Hollingsworth, but this case is not like Johnson and Hollingsworth, so tackling was unacceptable here. Pryor’s argument is flawed because those two cases do not clearly establish when tackling is impermissible. To satisfy his burden, Pryor needs to show that it is ‘beyond debate’ that the tackle here was unacceptable. . . . He must establish that tackling is clearly a constitutional violation in cases like this one. Neither Johnson nor Hollingsworth does that, so Pryor fails to meet his burden.”)

Rakes v. Roederer, 117 F.4th 968, 969 (7th Cir. 2024) (per curiam) (“Each judge of the panel has filed a separate opinion setting forth his view on the appropriate disposition of this appeal. Judge Ripple would reverse the judgment of the district court with respect to both defendants and remand for further proceedings. Judge Scudder would reverse the judgment and remand for further proceedings with respect to the estate of Officer Johnson. He would affirm the judgment with respect to respect to Officer Roederer. Judge Brennan would affirm the judgment of the district court with respect to both defendants. The opinion of each judge is set forth below.”)

Rakes v. Roederer, 117 F.4th 968, 978-79 (7th Cir. 2024) (per curiam) (Ripple, J.) (“Monfils rendered it clearly established in this circuit that a police officer can be liable under the state-created danger doctrine if he recklessly and repeatedly lies to a person about the danger that person faces from an identified and violent third party. Respectfully, this core holding of Monfils remains good law, despite the defendants’ and the statements in Judge Brennan’s opinion to the contrary. To be sure, there is dicta in an earlier decision of ours suggesting that Monfils ‘may well have been superseded by’ Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748 (2005). Sandage v. Bd. of Comm’rs of Vanderburgh Cnty., 548 F.3d 595, 599 (7th Cir. 2008). That speculation was, and is, raw dicta and its cold reception by our colleagues in other circuits confirms its unreliability. . . The officers’ conduct in this case, viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Rakes, falls squarely within that constitutional prohibition. Indeed, this case presents a more egregious situation than the one presented in Monfils. The officers, acutely aware of the danger that Amylyn would face if she were alone at her house with RJ, nevertheless told her to remove RJ’s arsenal before his return. Yet, Officer Roederer himself admitted that he was not willing to remove RJ’s AR-15s from the house unless RJ were detained. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Ms. Rakes, the officers, although aware that RJ might return to the home at any time, falsely assured Amylyn that he would be absent for 24 hours and that, during that time, she should secure RJ’s weapons, a task that they were unwilling to undertake because of its dangerousness. In other words, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, a finder of fact would be entitled to conclude that the officers repeatedly lied to Amylyn about whether they had placed RJ under a mental health hold and told her to retrieve dangerous weapons while knowing that she might well confront RJ as she did so. Amylyn acted on these misrepresentations and, consequently, died at RJ’s hand. On this record, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable jury could find the defendants liable on Ms. Rakes’s state-created danger claim, and the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I would reverse the district court’s judgment and remand the case for proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Rakes v. Roederer, 117 F.4th 968, 988-91 (7th Cir. 2024) (per curiam) (Brennan, J.) (“If the Estate cannot satisfy just one of the three elements underlying the state-created danger exception, the officers cannot be held liable. Because they did not act to create or increase danger, proximately cause death, or act in a manner that shocks the conscience, the district court’s grant of summary judgment should be affirmed. . . . Even if the Estate could succeed on the DeShaney question, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they did not violate a clearly established right. . . . To the Estate, the officers violated a clearly established right, contending ‘[t]here is authority within this circuit and others that false promises of security are deliberately indifferent.’ The Estate cites Paine; Robinson v. Township of Redford, 48 F. App’x 925 (6th Cir. 2002); Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055 (9th Cir. 2006); and Irish v. Fowler, 979 F.3d 65 (1st Cir. 2020). But these authorities do not support a conclusion that the officers violated Amylyn’s clearly established rights. . . . Monfils is described as a case about reckless and repeated lies. But here, Johnson’s statements to Amylyn about the length of RJ’s absence were negligent at most, not reckless. His statements also were not ‘repeated’ like the promise not to release the tape in Monfils was repeated. . . Johnson gave two one-word responses within a lengthy discussion, during which the officers encouraged Amylyn to go to her parents’ house that night. And both representations were made during a roughly ninety-minute interaction among the officers, Amylyn, and RJ. Second, Monfils rests on uncertain ground. This court has noted that Monfils ‘may well have been superseded by’ the Supreme Court’s decision in Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748. Sandage, 548

F.3d at 599. . . .The essential act identified by the Estate and the panel majority is a false promise of security. After Castle Rock, such an act likely does not dispel the protections of qualified immunity. . . .The cases the Estate cites do not place the constitutional question beyond debate. If a constitutional right of Amylyn’s was violated, it was not clearly established when the officers responded to this domestic violence episode. As a result, qualified immunity shields the officers from § 1983 liability. . . . I end where I began: Amylyn was tragically murdered by her husband RJ. The rule is that the state has no duty to protect citizens from private violence. The state-created danger doctrine is a narrow exception to that rule. This decision sends the case against Officer Johnson to a jury when the undisputed facts do not permit liability to attach under the strict limits of this doctrine. And it does so notwithstanding the broad protections of qualified immunity.”) Rakes v. Roederer, 117 F.4th 968, 991-93(7th Cir. 2024) (per curiam) (Scudder, J.) (“This case is difficult on many levels and, in the end, I find myself split on the conclusions reached by my colleagues. I agree with Judge Ripple that the claim against Officer Te’Juan Johnson’s estate should proceed to trial. On the other hand, I agree with Judge Brennan and the district court that qualified immunity defeats the claim against Officer Jonathan Roederer. Above all else, this case presents a tragic example of the risks posed by domestic violence and the consequences of law enforcement’s failure to appreciate those risks. No matter how many times I review the record, the same conclusion rushes to mind: police departments ought to prioritize training on responses to domestic violence. . . . I agree with Judge Ripple that our decision in Monfils supplies the relevant precedent here. Monfils clearly established that a police officer can be liable under the state-created danger doctrine if he makes false promises about the danger a person faces from an identified and violent third party. . . . Like the officer’s false assurances to Thomas Monfils, Officer Johnson’s false assurances rendered Amylyn more vulnerable to a danger than she otherwise would have been had he told her the truth. With these findings available to a jury, Officer Johnson is not entitled to qualified immunity and the suit against his estate should proceed. But not so for Officer Roederer. The record shows that his actions did not add to the risk of harm already created by Officer Johnson. Officer Roederer made no representations to Amylyn regarding how long her husband would be in the hospital or whether it was safe for her to return home. Yes, Officer Roederer was present for Officer Johnson’s conversations with both Amylyn and RJ. But his failure to correct any representations Officer Johnson made to Amylyn is insufficient because ‘mere inactivity by police does not give rise to a constitutional claim.’ . . . And Officer Roederer’s statements to RJ merely repeated back the arrangement Officer Johnson had previously contrived about going to the hospital voluntarily. The evidence of Officer Roederer’s personal involvement falls short of allowing a jury to find that he created a danger to Amylyn. Even if his acts or omissions contributed to her tragic death, no jury could reasonably conclude that he put Amylyn in a position of danger she would not have otherwise faced or that his actions violated a clearly established right. Indeed, on issues of qualified immunity, close calls go to the defendant. . . . So I agree with Judge Brennan that qualified immunity shields Officer Roederer from liability. . . . This case should sound the equivalent of a five-alarm fire for police departments to the risks of domestic violence. In my view, Officer Johnson’s response to what he encountered during the early morning hours of July 19, 2019 remains shocking in the extreme. When you read the facts, you can see the tragic ending coming from a mile away with about 100% certainty. No doubt domestic violence incidents are among the most challenging circumstances that police officers encounter. And federal judges are in no position to advise police departments on how best to respond to 911 reports of domestic violence. But respond they must. And this case shows just how a police officer can take an already dangerous situation and make it worse—fatally so. The district court got it right when observing that a case like this should cause police departments to reevaluate their training related to domestic violence encounters. Under no circumstance should a law enforcement officer act in a way that escalates the danger faced by someone in the vulnerable and trapped position that Amylyn Slaymaker found herself. . . Judge Brennan’s opinion emphasizes that Amylyn was in grave danger before the officers intervened. I could not agree more. Amylyn endured ongoing, violent abuse at the hands of her husband for many months. Nobody could plausibly say that RJ did not pose a serious threat to Amylyn’s life on July 19. While accurate, that observation is incomplete and in no way resolves the question before us. It was Officer Johnson’s response that escalated the risk to Amylyn’s life. He agreed to allow RJ to voluntarily go to the hospital while affirmatively misleading Amylyn about that fact. A jury could easily find that Officer Johnson’s duplicity left her vulnerable to new risk—more immediate and acute risk. These circumstances existed because of Officer Johnson’s actions: yes, Amylyn was in an abusive marriage, but she had no idea that Officer Johnson had cut a deal with RJ that would allow him to return home in less than 24 hours, find her there alone, and murder her with one of the guns known to be in the house. If the state created danger doctrine reflects sound law, it fits this case to a T: a jury could find that Officer Johnson responded to the undeniably difficult situation he encountered on July 19 by putting Amylyn at a very high risk of losing her life. The case against Officer Johnson’s estate should go to trial.”)

Brumitt v. Smith, 102 F.4th 444, 448-49 (7th Cir. 2024) (“Smith argues that the district court erred in framing the right, which it said was clearly established, as the right to be free from force once subdued. Framing the right this way, he says, impermissibly views the incident with 20/20 hindsight. It also, Smith suggests, wrongly assumes that precedent clearly requires reasonable police officers to repeatedly reconsider the use of force throughout an encounter lasting only a few seconds to guarantee that officers know and react to the precise moment that a suspect becomes unconscious. We agree with Smith that Brumitt has not met his burden of showing that Smith violated a clearly established right. When reviewing force for reasonableness, we assess the ‘facts and circumstances that confronted the officer,’ without ‘20/20 hindsight.’. . . Those facts are (1) when Brumitt appeared intoxicated, Smith asked if he was okay and sought his identification; (2) Brumitt dared Smith to take him to jail, cursed at him, and although he was drowsy and uncoordinated, hit Smith in the face with his hand; and (3) Smith responded to that surprise attack with substantial force—four quick punches in four seconds. We will assume that Smith could have interrupted his delivery of force to see Brumitt appear limp. But to conclude that Smith clearly violated Brumitt’s right to be free from excessive force, we must assume that a reasonable officer in Smith’s position would know instantaneously that Brumitt was unconscious and react accordingly within less than four seconds. Brumitt has not, however, identified a case establishing that an officer must do so and must cease force at the precise second a suspect acquiesces. To the contrary, we ‘give considerable leeway to law enforcement officers’ assessments about the appropriate use of force in dangerous situations.’ . . Smith also correctly argues that framing the right as the right to be free from force once subdued is impermissibly broad. The Supreme Court and this court have reiterated that a right is clearly established only if it is clear that ‘the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him’ is prohibited. . . This applies to excessive-force cases. . . Although Brumitt need not point to an identical case, . . . ‘every reasonable officer must have understood that’ Smith’s conduct was unlawful[.] . . But the principle that officers may not use force on a subdued suspect does not clearly establish that officers must repeatedly reevaluate their use of force throughout an encounter lasting a few seconds to avoid applying extra units of force immediately after a suspect submits. Likewise, the other broad principle that Brumitt invokes—force must be proportionate to a threat—did not put Smith on notice that four fast punches in response to a suspect’s unprovoked blow to an officer’s face is disproportionate to that blow.”)

Brumitt v. Smith, 102 F.4th 444, 450-51 (7th Cir. 2024) (Pryor, J., concurring) (“I join the opinion of the court. I am compelled to write separately, however, to emphasize why I understand today’s holding to be a narrow one. Sergeant Sam Smith knocked Charles Brumitt unconscious. Sergeant Smith then struck Brumitt in the face several more times. It is blackletter law that ‘police officers cannot continue to use force once a suspect is subdued.’ . . That law is ‘well-established in this circuit.’ . . Our cases also recognize that officers need a reasonable amount of time to realize that a suspect has been subdued before any additional force violates the constitution. . . . In the context of this case, the gap of time between Brumitt going limp and Sergeant Smith’s final strike was insufficient to have put Sergeant Smith on notice that his additional force was unreasonable. For this reason, Sergeant Smith is entitled to qualified immunity. I caution that this case should not be overread, lest we create a safe haven for the use of force.”)

Doe v. Gray, 75 F.4th 710, 717-18 (7th Cir. 2023) (“This court has interpreted Whalen ‘to recognize a constitutional right to the privacy of medical, sexual, financial, and perhaps other categories of highly personal information’ . . In Wolfe, a former electoral candidate sued his opponent alleging he violated the Fourteenth Amendment by publicly disclosing that the candidate was under investigation for possible violations of Illinois law. . . . Though this court in Wolfe acknowledged that it had interpreted Whalen to announce a right of informational privacy, Wolfe did not clearly establish a right to privacy in one’s sexual preference or gender identity in the context presented here. Nor did Denius or Schall address the disclosure of similar information during a criminal or child welfare investigation. . . . We also cannot say that controlling precedent makes evident that such a right is simply a question of time. . . The plaintiffs cite Obergefell v. Hodges . . . and Lawrence v. Texas, . . . but those decisions do not address any right to protect one’s sexual preference or gender identity from disclosure during a criminal or child welfare investigation. We therefore agree with the district court’s cogent reasoning on Doe’s Fourteenth Amendment claim and its grant of summary judgment on this claim to the defendants.”)

Chilcutt v. Santiago, No. 22-2916, 2023 WL 4678583 (7th Cir. July 21, 2023) (not reported) (“The estate contends Tabisz and Santiago violated Chilcutt’s rights under the Fourteenth Amendment when they failed to provide the booking officer with information about the October 7 incident and took no steps to prevent him from harming himself. Santiago even gave Chilcutt the blanket with which he hanged himself. To prevail on the merits, the estate must show that the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. See Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018) (denial of medical care); Kemp v. Fulton County, 27 F.4th 491, 497 (7th Cir. 2022) (failure to protect). A wrinkle here is that, in 2017, objective unreasonableness was not the standard applicable to pretrial detainees’ claims about their conditions of confinement; they were still treated as deliberate indifference claims, which come with a higher burden of proof. . . We have not explicitly addressed how the change in the standard affects the qualified-immunity analysis. In prior cases, we have applied current law (objective unreasonableness) to determine on the merits whether there was a violation of a constitutional right, and, for purposes of qualified immunity, looked to our deliberate indifference cases to determine if the right was clearly established at the time. See, e.g., Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 820–22 (7th Cir. 2019). We need not decide the issue here, though, because either way, the estate must show that the officers knew or had notice that Chilcutt was at risk of suicide.”)

Emad v. Dodge County, 71 F.4th 649, 654-55 (7th Cir. 2023) (“Start by recognizing what an award of qualified immunity is. It is a legal determination that, on particular facts, a party committed either no legal violation at all or at least not one clearly established in the law at the time of the challenged conduct. . . At summary judgment, these determinations—whether we start at prong one or prong two—must be made by taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, here Emad. . . But the legal determination is not possible when facts material to the plaintiff’s claim remain so imprecise. . . We find ourselves in just that situation here. We see unresolved questions of fact—the ones we have highlighted—on points central to resolving Emad’s personal and group prayer claims under the Free Exercise Clause. This means that we cannot resolve qualified immunity on prong one. With so little confidence in knowing what even happened within the Dodge County facility, we are not even sure how we would describe the conduct receiving immunity. The district court, for its part, was willing to confer immunity to the defendants on prong two—concluding Emad failed to show any violation of clearly established law by any defendant while accepting his core version of events. We see that conclusion as a bridge too far given the gravity of Emad’s contentions and the robust legal protection that attends to the right of free exercise and, relatedly, the right to worship free of discrimination based on one’s choice of faith. . . Doubtless the district court was correct in its observation that there are few, if any, cases expressly saying that the Free Exercise Clause prohibits affording certain private and group prayer allowances to Christian but not Muslim detainees and inmates. And doubtless, too, the district court was right to underscore the Supreme Court’s repeated admonition that prong two of a proper qualified immunity inquiry requires identifying the pertinent body of clearly established law at a high level of specificity. But those observations, right though they may be as a general legal matter, do not afford us enough confidence to affirm the awards of qualified immunity on Emad’s personal and group prayer claims under the Free Exercise Clause. If free exercise in jail means anything, it means that jailers, absent some extraordinary justifications, cannot treat inmates differently based on religion. . . Indeed, that neutrality precept is the cornerstone of the protections conferred by the Free Exercise Clause. At bottom, Emad has invoked his rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to be treated like his fellow Christian detainees—to be allowed to pray as they are allowed to pray. We have no trouble concluding that Emad’s claims fall in the heartland of these constitutional protections such that qualified immunity cannot be awarded in the circumstances before us here.”)

Pierner-Lytge v. Hobbs, 60 F.4th 1039, 1044-46 (7th Cir. 2023) (“[W]e pass no judgment on whether the disorderly conduct statute actually justified Pierner-Lytge’s arrest. . . Instead, we decide this case on a narrower ground because even assuming probable cause did not exist, Pierner-Lytge fails to refute the officers’ qualified immunity defense. . . . Under prong two, Pierner-Lytge must demonstrate that it was clearly established in April 2020 that probable cause to arrest her for disorderly conduct did not exist. . . To be clearly established, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Pierner-Lytge need not produce a case directly on point, but the ‘legal principle [must] clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him.’ . . [T]he Supreme Court has ‘stressed that the specificity of the rule is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.’ . . When it comes to warrantless arrests, ‘the rule must obviously resolve whether the circumstances with which [the particular officer] was confronted ... constitute[d] probable cause.’ . . It follows that ‘a body of relevant case law is usually necessary to clearly establish the answer with respect to probable cause.’ . . In this respect, Pierner-Lytge comes up well short. She has not ‘identified a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ . . . Pierner-Lytge openly carried a rifle with an affixed bayonet and a handgun in a crowded public park where she was reportedly watching families. . . The multiple calls police received about her behavior further support the conclusion that a reasonable officer could have believed her conduct was ‘otherwise disorderly.’ . . In sum, while a reasonable officer should have known in April 2020 that simply carrying a firearm or a knife in public does not constitute disorderly conduct, much more is required to show that the legality of Pierner-Lytge’s conduct was ‘beyond debate.’ . . To the extent the officers misjudged whether probable cause existed to arrest Pierner-Lytge, it was a reasonable decision given the state of the Wisconsin disorderly conduct statute at the time. . . .The district court therefore did not err in granting Hobbs and Gladney qualified immunity as to Pierner-Lytge’s Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Bradley v. Village of University Park, Illinois (Bradley II), 59 F.4th 887, 905 n.6 (7th Cir. 2023) (“We have considered whether the disagreement among the federal judges who have considered this case supports the mayor’s defense of qualified immunity. See generally Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999) (“If judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.”); Gates v. Khokhar, 884 F.3d 1290, 1303 (11th Cir. 2018) (same). We have not taken that path here because the premise for the judges’ disagreement on the Parratt issue was that the mayor and the village board undertook a supposedly ‘random and unauthorized’ violation of state law. We are hesitant to hold that a public official may invoke qualified immunity on a federal constitutional claim precisely because she violated state law. We also recognize that the issue of the mayor's qualified immunity may have limited practical importance to the parties, given the village's liability on the claim.")

Stockton v. Milwaukee County, 44 F.4th 605, 620-21 (7th Cir. 2022) ("As discussed above, a reasonable jury could conclude Piasecki-by deliberately causing Madden to fall and hit his head-violated Madden's Eighth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. We also examine whether the violated right was 'clearly established' at the time the challenged conduct occurred. . . . A right is clearly established where it is 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Stockton may demonstrate a right is "clearly established" in three ways. First, by identifying a 'closely analogous case finding the alleged violation unlawful.' . . . Second, by identifying in the relevant caselaw 'such a clear trend ... that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.' . . . These first two avenues are not at issue here. Stockton does not identify, and we cannot find, a closely analogous case or such a clear trend. Stockton relies instead upon the third option, reserved for 'rare cases,' arguing Piasecki's conduct was 'so egregious and unreasonable that no reasonable official could have thought he was acting lawfully.' . . . This is one of those rare cases. Piasecki encountered Madden in clear and debilitating medical distress. Madden was hyperventilating, experiencing difficulty breathing, and complained of severe chest pain. He could not walk, stand, or support himself; was crawling on the floor of his cell dry heaving; could not move about his cell without being physically dragged by the officers; and vomited an orange substance. Madden proved unable to sit in a chair or remain upright when propped against a wall. Piasecki witnessed Madden fall several times, at least once striking his head on the wall of his cell. Piasecki volunteered to act as Madden's physical support, bracing the man on his legs. Then, two witnesses watched Piasecki 'purposefully [take] a step backward' and, according to Litrenta, 'allow[] Madden to fall back and smack the back of his head on the cement' floor 'very hard.' Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Stockton, Piasecki deliberately caused Madden to fall and hit his head. It strains credulity to imagine Piasecki, or any reasonable officer in his position confronted with these particular circumstances, could possibly think he acted lawfully by intentionally causing Madden to hit his head. A reasonable jury could find Piasecki was on notice his conduct amounted to a 'gratuitous infliction of wanton and unnecessary pain' prohibited by the Eighth Amendment. . . . The district court erred in awarding Piasecki summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Holloway v. City of Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 767 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Because Holloway can point to no controlling or persuasive authority that clearly established that it was impermissible for the police to use a photo array only a day or so before the physical lineup, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Doxtator v. O'Brien, 39 F.4th 852, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Even assuming O'Brien had violated a constitutional right belonging to Tubby, the Estate has not put forth any cases convincing us that the right was ‘clearly established.’ We therefore further hold that O’Brien is entitled to qualified immunity shielding him from suit. . . . The Estate offers only two cases purporting to establish that O’Brien violated a ‘clearly established’ right belonging to Tubby. Neither is at all close to being ‘particularized to the facts of [this] case,’ . . . and, therefore, neither satisfies the ‘high bar,’ . . . required to defeat the defendant’s assertion of qualified immunity. First, the Estate points to Garner for its proposition that ‘[a] police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.’. . . But the Supreme Court itself has held that Garner is “cast at a high level of generality” and therefore cannot clearly establish rights for the purposes of qualified immunity, except in the most obvious cases. . . . Then the Estate cites this Circuit’s decision in Becker v. Elfreich, 821 F.3d 920 (7th Cir. 2016), where we held that a reasonable jury could conclude that a police officer used excessive force in executing a search warrant when he deployed a police canine to apprehend an arrestee using the ‘bite and hold’ technique. . . . While the discussion in Becker includes more details than the rule from Garner, those details share very few similarities with the instant case, and Becker therefore cannot have clearly established the right asserted by the Estate. Importantly, the arrestee in Becker never displayed any conduct suggesting to the officers that he was armed. In fact, he ‘did not exhibit any sort of aggressive behavior toward [the arresting officer] or anyone else.’. . . ‘Nor was [the arrestee] actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight.’. . . These dissimilarities with the instant case are more than sufficient for us to conclude that Becker provides no help to the Estate’s attempt to defeat O’Brien’s assertion of qualified immunity. . . . We hold that, given Tubby’s conduct, no reasonable jury could conclude that O’Brien’s use of force violated Tubby’s Fourth Amendment rights. Furthermore, we hold that O’Brien is entitled to qualified immunity because the right he is alleged to have violated was not ‘clearly established’ at the time. For these reasons, we affirm the district court’s entry of summary judgment on the Estate’s § 1983 claim against O’Brien.”)

Elim Romanian Pentecostal Church v. Pritzker, 22 F.4th 701, 703 (7th Cir. 2022) (“[I]f we were to ignore the ‘official capacity’ language that the complaints used to describe Governor Pritzker’s status, the churches still could not obtain damages, because the Governor would be entitled to qualified immunity. Recall that the Governor won on the merits on the first appeal, which makes it impossible to describe as ‘clearly established’ in the spring of 2020 a rule that a capacity limit on religious services during a pandemic violates the Constitution. Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn was not decided until November 25, 2020, six months after the Governor rescinded the order imposing capacity limits on in-person religious events, and Tandon, decided on April 9, 2021, shows that there were (and are) still debatable issues about how public officials may regulate religious gatherings during a pandemic.”)

Gupta v. Melloh, 19 F.4th 990, 1001 (7th Cir. 2021) (“The evaluation of qualified immunity . . . requires the same assessment of the material fact at issue in this case on the substantive claim of excessive force. It ‘requires careful attention to the facts and circumstances’ of the situation in which Officer Melloh found himself, including, the severity of the crime and how much of a risk Gupta posed to himself, the officer, and others, and most importantly for our purposes, it includes an assessment of whether Gupta was actively resisting arrest. . . Our case law has long put police officers on notice that they ‘do not have the right to shove, push, or otherwise assault innocent citizens without any provocation whatsoever,’ . . . and that significant force is unreasonable after a suspect is subdued or has stopped resisting or evading arrest or is, at most, passively resisting arrest. . . But in this case, we have no concessions about the facts of provocation or resistance that would allow us to determine reasonableness as a matter of law.”)

Taylor v. City of Milford, 10 F.4th 800, 807, 810-11 (7th Cir. 2021) (“Viewing all of the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, we find that a reasonable jury could conclude that Garrett violated Steven’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures when Garrett applied deadly force to a non-suspect civilian who was not resisting arrest and did not pose an imminent threat to any officer, bystander, or himself. Garrett used physical force in a manner that restrained Steven’s liberty, effectuating a seizure of Steven. . . Moreover, the nature and quality of the intrusion by Garrett was severe—as told by Serena and Shannon, Garrett aggressively restrained Steven for several minutes using his full body and police tactics intended to inflict pain and induce submission to the officer’s will despite the fact that Steven was not a threat to him. . . And Garrett continued to apply this force, despite Steven’s alleged pleas that he could not breathe and even after he vomited and lost consciousness. Yet the ‘countervailing governmental interest[] at stake’ was slight—Steven did not pose an immediate threat to himself or anyone else, and paramedics who could offer medical treatment for Steven’s suspected hypoglycemia were already on their way. . . Furthermore, Garrett did not carry a first aid kit with him, he did not check or monitor Steven’s vital signs, and he did not permit Steven to drink the orange juice that his niece offered (which was likely the most immediately accessible treatment for hypoglycemia). If we accept, as we must, Plaintiff’s version of the facts, the force Garrett deployed against Steven was not a proportional response to Steven’s mumbling and stumbling around his bedroom. . . . To review, three principles are clear: First, officers do not have a right to assault civilians without provocation. . . Second, officers may not use unnecessary force when a civilian is already subdued or compliant. . . Third, a medical emergency impacts the objective reasonableness of a seizure, but an emergency does not ‘eviscerate’ the civilian’s Fourth Amendment rights. Taking these principles together, it has been clearly established that the method and manner of restraint must fit the circumstances of the particular case. . . Officers can employ only those means of restraint appropriate in a given situation. This is especially so for lethal force. In other words, it was clearly established by 2016 that an officer who forcibly restrained a civilian who was not a suspect of a crime and who did not pose a threat to those around him, resulting in vomiting and loss of consciousness before the officer released the civilian, violated that civilian’s Fourth Amendment rights. We acknowledge that the Plaintiff’s and Defendant’s accounts of the events diverge with respect to the facts surrounding the incident, including whether Steven was a threat to himself or others, whether Garrett’s actions served a medical or law enforcement purpose, and whether the force used was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. Each of these material disputes of fact must be determined by the jury, so that the court can properly assess Garrett’s entitlement to qualified immunity.”)

Taylor v. Ways, 999 F.3d 478, 487-88, 490-92 (7th Cir. 2021) (“The district court found that Taylor presented sufficient evidence that a reasonable jury could find that Ernst, motivated by racial animus, caused Taylor’s firing. Ernst argues he is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established that an official with his investigatory responsibilities, but without decision-making authority, could be held liable on a ‘cat’s paw’ theory for race-motivated firing. Ernst also argues that the district court erred by refusing to consider the non-discriminatory rationale that he provided in defense of his termination recommendation: that the probable cause he had to arrest Taylor immunized him for anything that happened later. We consider these arguments in turn. For his claim against Ernst as an individual, Taylor relies on the cat’s paw theory of liability used so often in employment discrimination cases. . . Taylor’s theory is that Ernst’s racial animus poisoned the investigation against him and that Ways, Whittler, and the Merit Board failed to take sufficient steps of their own to remove the taint of Ernst’s racial animus. In response, Ernst argues, in effect, that as the monkey who used Ways, Whittler, and the Merit Board as his cat’s paw, he is shielded from individual liability under § 1983. We disagree. In 2012 we observed that a cat’s paw theory would support imposing individual liability under § 1983 on subordinate government employees who act with unlawful motives to cause the actual decision-makers to take action against another employee. . . We noted that at least five other circuits had held or said as much. . . So despite Ernst’s non-supervisory role, he is not insulated from individual liability under § 1983 so long as Taylor can prove that Ernst’s discriminatory motive was a factor in bringing about his termination. . . Taylor has presented just such evidence: evidence of Ernst’s racial animus toward Taylor and evidence of Ernst’s significant role in the investigative and disciplinary proceedings that brought about Taylor’s termination. . . . Taylor is not challenging his arrest. He is challenging his termination. Ernst took the lead in an investigation that continued for weeks after Taylor’s arrest, and Ernst’s involvement in the case continued for years, at least through the Merit Board hearing in 2013. If his racial animus toward Taylor led him to conceal or turn a blind eye to exculpatory evidence during that longer investigation, and if his actions caused Taylor’s termination, the Equal Protection Clause reaches such actions. . . . Under the facts asserted by Taylor and relied upon by the district court, Ernst violated clearly established law. . . . In 2011 and 2013, when the events took place, it was clearly established that a government official violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by using his official powers to cause a colleague to be fired on the basis of race. . . Any reasonable official in Ernst’s position would have known that intentional racial discrimination toward another employee was unconstitutional. And what Taylor alleges against Ernst is textbook racial discrimination. The word “n*r,” used by Ernst, a white man, aimed at Taylor on several separate occasions, reflects a uniquely virulent strain of racism, long recognized by the federal courts as capable of having a ‘highly disturbing impact on the listener.’ . The illegality of Ernst’s alleged conduct was obvious long before these events in 2011 and 2013. . . . Ernst, however, argues that the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry requires precedent tied to more particularized facts. He argues that the district court incorrectly denied qualified immunity based on the ‘broad principle that terminating an employee on the basis of his race violates equal protection.’ According to Ernst, in 2011 and 2013, it was not clearly established that a subordinate employee could be held liable for unlawful efforts to cause the termination of another employee. Ernst’s argument asks the wrong question about qualified immunity. The question is not whether rules of individual liability for the conduct were clearly established at the time. The question is whether the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct was clearly established. . . The Supreme Court has repeatedly described the defense of qualified immunity in terms of whether the defendant official's 'actions' or 'conduct' violated clearly established law, not in terms of whether a defendant should have realized he would be held civilly liable for his actions or conduct. . . By 2011, a veritable river of precedents established that public employees may not discriminate against other employees on the basis of race. . . . Based on the district court's analysis of the summary judgment evidence, we must assume here that Ernst acted out of racial animus and that his actions caused Taylor's termination. Any reasonable public employee, and certainly any public employee responsible for investigating other employees for disciplinary purposes, would have known he could not act on the basis of racial animus. Ernst simply has not offered a plausible argument to the effect that a reasonable police officer in 2011 could have thought he could engineer a colleague's termination because of his race without violating the Constitution. In addition, while precedent tied to particularized facts can indicate that a point of law is clearly established, the Supreme Court does not demand a case directly on point. Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 422 (7th Cir. 2018); see also Taylor v. Riojas, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 52, 53–54, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (reiterating that “a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question”), quoting Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). . . . If the cited cases on race discrimination in public employment decisions were not enough, the facts we must assume would qualify this case as that rare, obvious case. Based on the wealth of case law on the unlawfulness of race discrimination in the employment context, Ernst had ‘fair and clear warning’ in 2011 and 2013 that he was violating the Constitution. . . We therefore affirm denial of summary judgment for Ernst.”)

Lopez v. Sheriff of Cook County, 993 F.3d 981, 987-92 (7th Cir. 2021) (“Like the district court, we begin and end with the second step of the analysis: determining whether Officer Raines violated Fernando Lopez’s clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure. For the law to be clearly established, the ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . While an officer may be authorized to use deadly force at one moment, it is not a blank check. When an individual has become ‘subdued and [is] complying with the officer’s orders,’ the officer may no longer use deadly force. . . Yet we must be careful not to allow the benefit of hindsight to cause us to discount the reality that officers must make quick decisions as to how much force, if any, to employ. . . While cases like Garner and Graham are instructive in the excessive force context, they ‘do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.’ . . Determining whether an officer violates clearly established law requires a look at past cases with specificity. . . The Supreme Court has time and again instructed lower courts ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Specificity is critical to making qualified immunity a workable doctrine in the Fourth Amendment context, where it ‘is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’ . But this requirement is not unbending. The prong-two clearly-established-law assessment does not require a case with identical factual circumstances, lest qualified immunity become absolute immunity. . . Still, the right must be so clearly established such that it is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’. . That sounds like a high bar because it is—qualified immunity protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . The district court approached this inquiry the exact right way, looking first to past precedent to ask whether any cases squarely govern the facts at issue. In following suit, we too think it best to consider Officer Raines’s use of force that early morning in two distinct phases: the shooting of Lopez and the use of Lopez as a human shield during the sidewalk standoff. . . . Neither the Supreme Court’s precedent nor our own clearly establishes that Officer Raines’s split-second decision to open fire was unlawful. There were many people on the city street when Lopez, just moments before, opened fire. All Raines knew at the time he fired was that Lopez had just popped off two rounds and that Lopez was now walking in his general direction with gun in hand. A reasonable officer could have concluded that Lopez was an imminent threat both to the officer and the bystanders on the street and outside the Lounge. Lopez insists that Officer Raines should have given him a warning. Whether Raines did so is disputed. At summary judgment and without any clear evidence to the contrary, we must credit Lopez’s contention that Raines did not announce himself as a police officer. A warning is decidedly preferred—but it is not required in every circumstance. . . Given the lack of clearly established law, Officer Raines is entitled to qualified immunity as to the first shot. From here the case gets much harder. Lopez contends that even if the first shot did not transgress established law, Raines’s subsequent shots clearly violated Lopez’s constitutional right not to have lethal force used against him once he was subdued by the initial shot. But that contention too discounts the speed and unpredictability with which events unfolded on the street that morning. As the district court explained, the video shows that Raines first shot Lopez at 3:56:27 a.m. Lopez dropped his gun one second later, but as he turned and started to run, Officer Raines fired for two more seconds, until 3:56:30 a.m. Raines fired all of his shots in the span of three seconds. In retrospect, and with the benefit of the security footage, it is inviting to parse the multiple shots fired into separate individual events. But we must consider them together in light of how quickly—and in precisely what circumstances—everything transpired. Indeed, in this very context of qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has emphasized that a proper analysis must ‘allo[w] for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’. . Lopez cannot point to a case that clearly establishes a reasonable officer cannot use lethal force over the span of three seconds on an individual he had just seen fire his weapon, who has not surrendered, and is still moving to evade capture. Lopez points to precedent that we find either easily distinguishable or standing for principles that do not show that Officer Raines’s conduct violated clearly established law. [discussing and distinguishing cases relied on by Lopez] Our assessment does not change when we consider Officer Raines’s conduct on the sidewalk. Recall that after Raines shot Lopez, Lopez quickly moved around the rear of his car and scampered toward the sidewalk. Security footage shows Lopez dropped his gun but was still fleeing. Raines followed after him, quickly reaching Lopez on the sidewalk near the entrance to the Lounge just a few seconds later (at 3:56:34 a.m.). As Officer Raines followed after Lopez, Mario Orta picked up Lopez’s gun and immediately opened fire on Raines—shooting directly at him but missing. Raines was then forced to deal with two assailants—restraining an injured Lopez and keeping a mobile, gun-toting Orta at bay. Notice what Officer Raines did not do: he never again fired his weapon. He instead used Lopez’s body as a buffer between himself and Orta, rotating his position (and the injured Lopez) to react to Orta’s constant movement. . . . To be sure, Raines aggressively restrained Lopez, at times holding a gun to his head. You certainly (and rightly) will not find this maneuver in a police training manual. But the qualified immunity inquiry is not whether Officer Raines’s action is immune from criticism. The question the Supreme Court instructs courts to consider instead is whether Officer Raines violated clearly established law. In our view, he did not. . . . The combination of these unusual facts compels our conclusion. We cannot say that Officer Raines’s actions on the sidewalk violated law clearly established in 2014—especially when considering the Supreme Court’s admonition to define the violation with specificity. Try as Lopez might, there is no analogous case to put Raines on notice that his conduct was unlawful given the circumstances he faced in those early morning hours. Nor is this a situation where a violation is so egregious that any reasonable officer would know they are violating the Constitution notwithstanding the lack of an analogous decision. . . . The situation was too fast-moving, too unpredictable, and too volatile to reach that conclusion. Raines could have reasonably concluded he was acting lawfully in protecting himself and the public when he subdued Lopez and tried to defuse the situation by using him as a shield to ward off Mario Orta until police arrived at the scene. . . . What makes this case difficult is the distinct impression the video leaves us with after watching it multiples times. By the looks of it, there is a reasonable chance that Fernando Lopez was about to get in his car and leave the scene right when Officer Raines opened fire. That observation invites the conclusion that Raines may not have needed to use lethal force at all. This whole situation may have been avoided had cooler heads prevailed that morning. Hindsight—aided by watching this scene unfold frame by frame on video footage from four distinct angles in the comfort of the courthouse—allows us to ponder how Officer Raines could have best handled the situation. But that is not our inquiry here. We are left to evaluate whether Raines’s conduct violated clearly established law, given the dangerous, delicate, and dynamic circumstances he faced that morning and the state of the law at the time. The benefit of hindsight does not lower the clear and high bar that is the law of qualified immunity. In this case that bar compels us to AFFIRM the grant of qualified immunity.”) Cibulka v. City of Madison, 992 F.3d 633, 639-41 (7th Cir. 2021) (“The Cibulkas admit that they ‘are unable to cite ... a case that clearly applies to the level of force exercised by the defendant officers ... because none exist.’ Admissions of this sort are often fatal to plaintiffs’ attempts to overcome qualified immunity. . . . But the Cibulkas argue that the analysis should not end there for two main reasons. First, they contend that ‘a reasonable officer should not be able to assume his conduct is reasonable ... unless there is case law affirmatively so stating.’ They cite no support for this argument, which is unsurprising because that’s plainly not the law. ‘In this circuit, once a defendant claims qualified immunity, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the right claimed to have been violated was clearly established.’ . . . We will not flip this well-established burden on its head. Second, the Cibulkas employ the expected last-ditch argument against qualified immunity and claim that the officers’ constitutional violations were so obvious that the Cibulkas don't need to cite a closely analogous case. But they misplay this argument, too, because they still need to identify 'some settled authority that would have shown a reasonable officer in [these officers'] position that [their] alleged actions violated the Constitution.' . . . In other words, they must show that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question,' . . . so that 'a reasonable person necessarily would have recognized it as a violation of the law[.]' . . . If anything is obvious about this case, however, it's that the officers' conduct did not obviously violate the Constitution. Let's take a look at the instant replay. First, the officers grabbed Todd when he stood up from the retaining wall and moved toward Johnson Street. Todd disputes that he was going to fall into the street, but a reasonable officer could certainly have thought that Todd was in danger of toppling headlong into traffic and potentially harming himself (or disappointed Purdue fans driving back to Indiana). Erwin testified that he did think Todd was about to fall and grabbed him for that reason. The Cibulkas cite no 'settled authority that would have shown a reasonable officer' that grabbing an inebriated individual for his own safety is a constitutional foul. . . . And it is not the least bit surprising that such cases do not exist. . . . Next, the officers took down and handcuffed Todd after he admittedly began resisting and refused to sit down (and after, we repeat, arguable probable cause to arrest was formed). Again, we fail to see how this routine police activity is an obvious constitutional violation. Indeed, cases involving arguably more forceful conduct indicate otherwise. . . . Finally, the officers huddled with Todd and tried to persuade him to get into a squad car to de-escalate the situation. When those efforts failed, they used incremental levels of force to get him into the car. And when those efforts failed too, they called a timeout and let Todd get out. Once again, the Cibulkas fail to convince us that this is one of those 'rare cases ... where the state official's alleged conduct is so egregious that it is an obvious violation of a constitutional right.' . . . In the end, 'it should go without saying that this is not an "obvious case" where "a body of relevant case law" is not needed.' . . . Maybe the Cibulkas' case would be more persuasive if, say, the officers started gratuitously smashing Todd's ribs. . . . But they stopped well short of such unnecessary roughness. . . . That's enough to decide the Cibulkas' excessive-force claim. We need not take up the parties' offer to consider the 'community caretaker doctrine.' . . . We note only that the pertinent cases from the Supreme Court and this court shed virtually no light on how that doctrine might apply to this case, and Wisconsin cases (which we may consider, . . . have applied it to justify the warrantless seizure of an individual in public[.]. . . If anything, these cases make it even more reasonable for an officer to believe that the conduct here was fair game and violated no clearly established rights. But ultimately, the community caretaker doctrine is beside the point. The only thing that matters is that the Cibulkas cite neither ' "controlling authority" [n]or "a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' that establish the right to be free from the conduct in this case, . . . and the officers' conduct was not 'so egregious that it is an obvious violation of a constitutional right[.]'. . . Qualified immunity is therefore proper with respect to the Cibulkas' excessive-force claim.") Balsewicz v. Pawlyk, 963 F.3d 650, 657-58 (7th Cir. 2020) ("If any reasonable officer in Sergeant Pawlyk's shoes—after discovering that Balsewicz faced a substantial danger of being beaten up by Rivers—would have understood that taking no action to address that danger violated Balsewicz’s right, then the right was clearly established. . . Put another way, if applying the law at that time to the facts ‘would have left objectively reasonable officials in a state of uncertainty,’ then immunity is appropriate. . . It is true that, here, factual uncertainty remains about whether Sergeant Pawlyk knew Balsewicz faced an imminent, rather than a lapsed, danger of serious harm. But that is not the kind of uncertainty that matters. The reason is that we approach the qualified-immunity inquiry by treating as true the evidence-supported facts and inferences favoring Balsewicz. . . The appropriate question, then, is this: Assuming Sergeant Pawlyk was informed that Balsewicz faced an ongoing threat from Rivers, did Sergeant Pawlyk’s inaction violate one of Balsewicz’s clearly established rights? The answer is yes. Farmer v. Brennan made clear that being violently assaulted by a fellow inmate in prison is a serious harm. . . And Farmer also made clear what a prison official must do when he learns that an inmate faces an excessive danger of such a harm: take reasonable measures to abate the danger. . . Cases since Farmer have confirmed that inmates have a right to have officers take reasonable measures to abate a known risk of violent assault by a fellow inmate. . . . Accordingly, at the time Sergeant Pawlyk was informed that Rivers presented an ongoing excessive danger to Balsewicz, a competent officer in Sergeant Pawlyk’s shoes would have known that taking no protective action in response—no additional investigation, no reporting to a supervisor, no measures to keep Rivers away from Balsewicz, etc.—violated Balsewicz’s right to be reasonably protected from a violent beating by another inmate. Given the clear governing rules set out by Farmer, and given their application in cases confirming that inaction in like circumstances violates an inmate’s constitutional right, Sergeant Pawlyk is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Day v. Wooten, 947 F.3d 453, 461, 463 (7th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1449 (2021) (“The district court defined the rights at issue as Day’s right to be free from excessively tight handcuffs and his right to have the officers consider his injury or condition in determining the appropriateness of the handcuff positioning. The court concluded that the officers’ conduct violated those rights. However, there is no Seventh Circuit precedent clearly establishing that the conduct the officers engaged in violated either of those rights. The plaintiffs point to Payne v. Pauley . . . and identify it as the best case to clearly establish the right to be free from excessively tight handcuffs. . . . Payne does not help the plaintiffs because it involves circumstances and conduct drastically different than this case. Day was suspected of shoplifting while armed with a gun, a much more serious offense than the plaintiff in Payne (who had allegedly done nothing wrong). It is also undisputed that Day was not cooperative: he repeatedly changed position despite the officer’s instructions to remain seated upright, and he argued with the officers to let him go. More importantly, Officer Denny and Sergeant Wooten did not violently yank or jerk Day’s arms and shoulders, or any of Day’s person for that matter. Furthermore, the handcuffs in Payne were much tighter than they needed to be to accomplish the purpose of detaining the arrestee, to the point of causing visible physical injury. There is no suggestion that the handcuffs used on Day were any tighter than would have been typically used to restrain an arrestee in similar circumstances. In fact, the coroner noted no visible signs of trauma, and the autopsy report indicated no lacerations or contusions on Day’s wrists. The rule announced in Payne is inapposite. . . . Given the facts as assumed by the district court and the information known to the officers at the time of the arrest, the only right plaintiffs can assert would be the right of an out-of-breath arrestee to not have his hands cuffed behind his back after he complains of difficulty breathing. We find no Seventh Circuit precedent clearly establishing such a right. The cases relied upon by the district court and the plaintiffs present circumstances far different, and therefore cannot clearly establish that the officers' conduct violated Day's rights. One further point must be addressed. The Supreme Court has stated that even in the absence of existing precedent addressing similar circumstances, 'there can be the rare "obvious case," where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear.' . . . This case is certainly not one of those rare obvious cases. As already discussed, the handcuffs were used in a manner that would not have harmed an average arrestee, and there is no evidence the officers were aware the handcuffs were causing Day's breathing trouble. The officers' conduct under the circumstances was not obviously unlawful.")

Harnishfeger v. United States, 943 F.3d 1105, 1120-21 (7th Cir. 2019) ("No prescience is demanded. . . of the public employer who retaliates against protected speech 'where the speech caused no actual disruption of any kind for four months, and where the employer neither articulates a belief that the speech has the potential to be disruptive in the future, nor has evidence to support the reasonableness of such a belief.' . . . Substitute 'three months' for 'four months,' and the observation applies here. First, under clearly established law in September 2016, Conversations was protected. It was speech neither at work nor about work; it was addressed to a general audience; and there was no sign that Harnishfeger deliberately linked its content or message to the Guard's mission, purpose, or image. . . . Though we must take care not to define the right asserted by Harnishfeger at too high a level of generality, . . . there is no real dispute on these points here. Defendants argue that Roe and Craig v. Rich Township High School District 227, 736 F.3d 1110 (7th Cir. 2013), together suggest that sexually explicit speech 'is generally not considered of public concern,' but those cases suggest no such thing. Roe made clear that the plaintiff's sexualized performances would have been protected under NTEU but for his deliberate linkage of them to his police work. . . . And Craig lost at the Pickering balancing step of the analysis, not the threshold step of whether his speech addressed a matter of public concern under Connick. . . . Second, clearly established law in September 2016 held that the public employer's side of the Pickering balance must be supported with evidence of actual disruption, or at least the articulation of a reasonable belief in future disruption plus evidence of its reasonableness at the time. . . . The Pickering analysis here shows no actual disruption; no articulation of a belief in future disruption with respect to Kopczynski's appeal that Conversations does not 'favorably represent' the Guard; and no rational connection between Kopczynski's appeal to the Guard's Domestic Violence Prevention and Response Plan and Conversations or Harnishfeger's VISTA placement. On this record, the explanations provided appear to be so flimsy as to support an inference that they were not objectively reasonable but reflected only disgust with Conversations and its author, whom the Guard, as Kopczynski emphasized, 'likely would not have considered' for VISTA placement had it been aware of her 'previous employment/work experience.' On this record, 'the line between the permitted and the forbidden' was clearly 'marked in advance.' . . . Kopczynski has not shown that she stayed within that line and is entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Frederickson v. Landeros, 943 F.3d 1054, 1061-62, 1064-67 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Landeros’s actions occurred in 2011, and so the first question we must address is whether the right Frederickson is trying to vindicate was clearly established before then. Olech was decided in 2000, well before Landeros acted, and this court had recognized class-of-one claims long before Olech. . . . Importantly, this case does not involve state employment, and so it is unaffected by the Supreme Court’s recognition in Engquist v. Oregon Department of Agriculture, . . . that the class-of-one theory is not cognizable in public employment cases. . . . Bearing in mind the relation between the lack of a rational basis in general, and actions taken solely on the basis of animus in particular, we have consistently stated that a class-of-one plaintiff’s ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’ is clearly established. . . . Let’s assume for the sake of argument, however, as the dissent urges, that Hanes and Hilton and Geinosky were wrong when they held that a claim is stated under Olech if ‘the police decided to withdraw all protection’ from a person ‘out of sheer malice,’ . . . and thus that the ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’ states the constitutional standard too broadly. A quick look at Frederickson’s complaint shows that his claim is far more particularized. He is asserting that, just as in Olech, no rational basis supports the police officer’s action—motivated exclusively by animus and no other discernible rational basis—to block him from complying with an ordinary registration requirement or from filing a complaint with Village authorities. In order to prove this class-of-one claim, Frederickson will eventually have to present evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that in this particular respect he ‘has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.’ . . . Although we have not definitively resolved the question whether it is sufficient for a plaintiff simply to allege differential treatment at the hands of the police with no rational basis, or if a class-of-one claim requires a plaintiff additionally to prove that the police acted for reasons of personal animus, malice, or some other improper personal motivation, . . . whatever uncertainty exists makes no difference to this case in its present posture. We accept (favorably to Landeros) that the only form of class-of-one equal protection right that is clearly established within our circuit involves government actors who single out a citizen for differential treatment with no objective rational basis for that difference and because of ‘a vindictive or harassing purpose.’ . . . In other class-of-one cases, we have recognized that an equal protection violation may have occurred even though no due process violation was present. . . . We thus conclude that Frederickson’s right to register as a sex offender or to file complaints with the local authorities without being blocked by a police officer who acts exclusively out of animus was clearly established at the time of these events. . . . This brings us to the second part of the qualified-immunity analysis: whether the facts Frederickson has asserted describe a violation of the Equal Protection Clause and suffice to defeat summary judgment. We agree with the district court that the answer is yes. Frederickson has introduced evidence that would allow a jury to find both that Landeros had no objective rational basis to prevent his move to Bolingbrook, and that Landeros took affirmative steps to block his move for reasons of personal animus. . . . If Frederickson were complaining only about arrests supported by probable cause, we freely concede that Nieves would require a different result. But his complaint goes well beyond that. Relations between Frederickson and Landeros were combative. Frederickson testified that Landeros threatened to arrest him when he announced his plan to leave Joliet in 2008 and when he attempted to do so again in 2011; there is no hint of probable cause for those actions. Frederickson also stated that Landeros repeatedly refused to correct his status as an independent contractor and the name of his employer on his registration. Landeros, in turn, complained that he thought Frederickson gave him ‘trouble.’ Probable cause has nothing to do with those actions. A jury would not be compelled to find anything nefarious about this history of interactions between a single officer and citizen—even a homeless ex-sex-offender. But our question is only whether a rational jury could make that finding. When combined with the series of events surrounding Frederickson’s attempted move, this history would entitle a jury to conclude that Landeros acted against Frederickson for no conceivable reason other than personal animus. We therefore agree with the district court that Frederickson has presented sufficient evidence to defeat qualified immunity at this stage.”)

Frederickson v. Landeros, 943 F.3d 1054, 1069-70 (7th Cir. 2019) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting) (“According to the majority, everyone has a ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus.’ . . . And on this approach, all of the obstacles I have mentioned vanish. Want to avoid Nieves? Ignore the First Amendment and assert that the retaliatory arrest was a ‘class-of-one equal-protection’ problem. Disagree with Hartman? Same solution. Seeking to sidestep Beley? Class-of-one is your silver bullet. Trouble showing that any of these legal propositions was clearly established in 2011? Just assert that everyone always has had a ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus.’ I don’t see how this magic can work. . . . If it has always been the law that everyone has a ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’, why did the Supreme Court decide Hartman in 2006? Why did Reichle hold in 2012 that qualified immunity blocks recovery on a retaliatory-arrest claim? Why did we bother with Del Marcelle v. Brown County, 680 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc)? Del Marcelle alleged that, as a result of personal animus, local officials failed to protect him from criminals and so violated the Equal Protection Clause on a class-of-one theory. The court en banc rejected that claim, though by an equally divided vote. On the view taken by my colleagues today, Del Marcelle should have prevailed. He did not. A view that lost in 2012 cannot have been clearly established in 2011. I explained in Del Marcelle that a class-of-one equal-protection theory is not an appropriate way to evaluate police officers’ conduct. . . . It is not necessary to repeat that analysis, because the question is whether the right Frederickson asserts was clearly established in 2011 rather than 2012 or today. But it is apt to ask why, if it has always been established that everyone has a ‘right to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’, that supposed right was still at issue in 2012—and why it is not possible to find support for it in the decisions of the Supreme Court. The debate within this court in 2012, and the lack of a good precedent in Frederickson’s favor from the Supreme Court, bring into play the principle that ‘[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’ . . . More than that. My colleagues’ conclusion that the clearly established right is one ‘to police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’ is at far too high a level of generality. The Supreme Court has held a right is ‘clearly established’ only if it has been ‘defined with specificity.’ . . . These decisions, and more, tell us that a high level of generality won’t do. A right has been defined ‘with specificity’ when existing judicial decisions tell the officer what to do, concretely, in a given situation. . . The proposition that everyone is entitled to ‘police protection uncorrupted by personal animus’ does not convey that information. It does not tell Landeros when to transfer a LEADS file (state law does that). It does not tell any officer where a given sex offender must register, or when a sex offender under investigation in one jurisdiction (such as Joliet) is entitled to register in another (such as Bolingbrook). Official action uncorrupted by personal animus is an ideal—something to which all public employees should aspire—but not a rule of conduct governing day-to-day business. It is therefore not adequate as a foundation for damages under § 1983.”)

Stewart v. Parkview Hosp., 940 F.3d 1013, 1016 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Like the district court, we have identified no case law establishing that an officer’s receipt of blood-test results from medical personnel offends the Fourth Amendment. Those cases that do address the question point in the other direction. In 1966 the Supreme Court recognized that the exigent-circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment permitted police officers to order a warrantless blood draw from a conscious driver involved in an accident. . . Earlier this year, the Court reinforced and extended this same point, holding that, despite reductions in the time needed to obtain a warrant, warrantless blood draws from unconscious drivers involved in car accidents do not offend with the Fourth Amendment. . . Against the backdrop of Schmerber and Mitchell, we cannot say ‘beyond any debate’ that the police officers’ actions here were unconstitutional. . . Accepting Stewart’s account that he was unconscious at the time of the blood draw, the officers had no reason to believe the Fourth Amendment barred the police from seeking the results of a blood test that a doctor ordered for medical purposes from a driver after a collision. In these circumstances, Stewart cannot establish that the officers violated a right clearly established under the Fourth Amendment, and qualified immunity applies.”) Weiland v. Loomis, 938 F.3d 917, 919-21 (7th Cir. 2019) (“The ‘state-created danger exception’ to DeShaney does not tell any public employee what to do, or avoid, in any situation. It is a principle, not a rule. And it is a principle of liability, not a doctrine (either a standard or a rule) concerning primary conduct. For that one must look elsewhere, but the district judge did not do so. Nor have the plaintiffs. Citing decisions of this circuit, the district court understood the ‘state-created danger exception’ to DeShaney as equivalent to a constitutional rule prohibiting any act, by any public official, that increases private danger. . . Over and over, the Supreme Court has held that a right is ‘clearly established’ only if it has been ‘defined with specificity.’ [collecting cases] . . . These decisions, and more, tell us that a high level of generality won’t do. The district judge resisted the conclusion that ‘state-created danger’ is too general by observing that Loomis’s proposal—something like a case establishing how guards must prevent being overpowered by prisoners in hospitals during bathroom breaks—would be too particular. . . By insisting on a case identical to the one at hand, public employees could insulate themselves from liability, for every case differs in some respect from its predecessors. We agree with the district judge that a search for identity is not required and would be a fool’s errand. A principle can be clearly established without matching a later case’s facts. The search is for an appropriate level of generality, not the most particular conceivable level. And the level of generality is appropriate when it establishes the rule in a way that tells a public employee what the Constitution requires in the situation that employee faces. . . . It is not possible to say that a constitutional obligation to keep a prisoner under control has been ‘clearly established’ when every appellate court that has addressed the question has held that the proposed obligation does not exist. Because ‘clearly established’ law does not support the § 1983 claim against Loomis, we need not decide whether we agree with these decisions. . . . But it is apt to add that we also have not approved the district court’s view that the complaint states a good constitutional claim. Plaintiffs allege that Loomis was incompetent, but the Due Process Clause generally does not condemn official negligence. . . . Plaintiffs depict themselves as frightened but not otherwise injured, and, even in the law of torts, negligent actors are not liable for conduct that threatens bodily harm but produces only emotional distress. . . . For now, it is enough to say that even if Loomis is civilly and criminally liable as a matter of Illinois law, he is entitled to qualified immunity from a claim based on the federal Constitution, so the district court’s decision is REVERSED.”)

Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 538, 546-49 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Qualified immunity shields a public official from suit for damages unless caselaw clearly puts him on notice that his action is unconstitutional. The judge’s approach to the qualified-immunity question was far too general. The Eighth Amendment requires prison healthcare professionals to exercise medical judgment when making decisions about an inmate’s treatment. And they cannot completely deny the care of a serious medical condition. But cases recognizing those broad principles could not have warned these defendants that treating an inmate’s gender dysphoria with hormone therapy and deferring consideration of sex-reassignment surgery violates the Constitution. Moreover, it’s doubtful that a prisoner can prove a case of deliberate indifference when, as here, prison officials followed accepted medical standards. The defendants are immune from damages liability. . . . The Supreme Court’s message is unmistakable: Frame the constitutional right in terms granular enough to provide fair notice because qualified immunity ‘protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . . Here the judge framed the qualified-immunity question in very broad terms, asking whether it was clearly established that ‘denying effective treatment’ for Campbell’s medical condition violates the Eighth Amendment. That formulation—which is basically a highly conceptualized version of the deliberate-indifference standard—is far too general. On appeal Campbell likewise frames the issue at too high a level of generality, arguing that the defendants violated clearly established law by failing to exercise individualized medical judgment and persisting in an ineffective course of treatment. These broad principles have support in our caselaw, but neither has been applied in a factual context specific enough to provide fair notice to the defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . . When considering deliberate-indifference claims challenging the medical judgment of prison healthcare personnel, qualified-immunity analysis requires us to frame the legal question with reasonable specificity. The proper inquiry is whether then-existing caselaw clearly established a constitutional right to gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy. This framing is specific enough to ensure that the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct ... follow[s] immediately from the conclusion that [the rule] was firmly established.’. . . And in this fact-intensive area of constitutional law, a broader formulation would violate the Supreme Court’s instruction that the specific contours of the right must be ‘sufficiently definite that any reasonable official ... would have understood that he was violating it.’. . Neither Elyea nor Fields provides the required level of specificity. Elyea amounts to a general admonition that officials must exercise medical judgment rather than mechanically apply categorical rules. And Fields doesn’t place ‘beyond debate’ the proposition that medical professionals violate the Eighth Amendment when they provide hormone therapy but decide—after extensive deliberation and consultation with an outside expert—to deny sex-reassignment surgery. . . In both cases prison officials refused to provide any treatment for serious diseases based solely on categorical rules. That simply didn’t occur here. These DOC officials consulted an expert in the field and, facing a gray area of professional opinion, decided to deny the ‘last and ... most considered step’ of gender-dysphoria treatment. No case in the Federal Reporter could have warned these DOC officials that their treatment choice was unconstitutional. When the defendants were making these decisions, only one federal appellate decision had addressed the merits of a deliberate-indifference claim involving sex-reassignment surgery: Kosilek v. Spencer, 774 F.3d 63 (1st Cir. 2014) (en banc). . . There the First Circuit concluded that prison officials who provided hormone therapy and lifestyle accommodations but denied a request for surgery did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . To be sure, the constitutional concern in cases involving no treatment at all is not disease-or injury-specific. But prisons aren’t obligated to provide every requested treatment once medical care begins. In a deliberate-indifference case challenging the medical judgment of prison healthcare professionals who actually diagnose and treat an inmate’s medical condition (as opposed to ignoring it), we necessarily evaluate those discrete treatment decisions. And we defer to those decisions ‘unless no minimally competent professional would have’ made them. . . . Given the fact-specific nature of these claims, the notice aspect of qualified-immunity doctrine is crucial. . . . Qualified-immunity analysis also asks whether ‘the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff[], show that the defendants violated a constitutional right.’. . Because no case clearly establishes that denying treatment beyond hormone therapy is unconstitutional, qualified immunity applies regardless. . . .Because clearly established law did not require Wisconsin prison officials to provide Campbell with gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy, the defendants are immune from damages liability.”)

Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 549-54 (7th Cir. 2019) (Wood, C.J., dissenting) (“The Supreme Court has pounded home the point that when deciding whether qualified immunity applies, lower courts cannot view the law at a ‘high level of generality.’. . Nonetheless, while ‘a case directly on point’ may be sufficient, it is not necessary. . . The majority opinion in the case before us recognizes this distinction, admitting that “ ‘[f]or purposes of qualified immunity, [the Eighth-Amendment] duty’ to treat prisoners’ serious medical conditions ‘need not be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury.’. . The Eighth Amendment applies whether the serious condition is Type I diabetes, paraplegia, congestive heart failure, or a broken leg, even though the treatments for those conditions are quite different. Yet the majority fails to follow this rule. Instead, it states that Campbell must show a clearly established right specific to her condition—gender dysphoria—and to the particular way the medical profession addresses it. . . With respect, that is the wrong question, and so it leads to the wrong answer. I therefore dissent. .

. . Our inquiry should be simple: first, we must determine whether Campbell suffers from a medical need that is clearly established as objectively serious; second, we must determine whether, as a subjective matter, it was clear to the defendants that they were being deliberately indifferent to Campbell's objectively serious medical need. The first half of this inquiry is easy. We recognized in 1997 that '[g]ender dysphoria ... is a serious psychiatric disorder.' . . It has thus been established for more than 20 years that gender dysphoria is a serious medical need; commendably, the defendants in this litigation do not contend that it is not. . . That takes us to the second inquiry: whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent in refusing Campbell's requests for surgery. . . . Importantly, whether a defendant had a deliberately indifferent state of mind is not a legal question; it is a factual one. . . We can thus resolve this case now only if there is no disputed issue of material fact on this point. . . . While no other court of appeals has dealt with a prisoner's claim for SRS in the context of qualified immunity, our sister circuits are largely in accord about whether the denial of SRS can violate the Eighth Amendment: It can. See Rosati v. Igbino, 791 F.3d 1037, 1040 (9th Cir. 2015) (holding that the denial of SRS stated a claim under the Eighth Amendment); De'lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520, 525–26 (4th Cir. 2013) (same). The cases denying a plaintiff's claim for SRS do so not because the denial of SRS can never be deliberate indifference, but because the factual record before them did not contain evidence that, if believed, would show that only SRS would be appropriate for that plaintiff. . . . As the district court recognized, when viewed in the light most favorable to Campbell, the evidence shows that despite being treated with hormones, Campbell's gender dysphoria has not improved. She has continued to threaten self-castration and to experience suicidal ideation. The defendants are aware of Campbell's continued suffering and have nevertheless refused her further treatment. Campbell's experts have opined that no reasonable medical professional would recommend any course of treatment in her case except surgery. The majority opinion swipes this evidence away. Instead it chooses to reach its own conclusion that, despite members of the medical community swearing to the contrary, SRS is not so well-established that Kallas could be deliberately indifferent by refusing to provide it. But that is a conclusion of fact that lies outside our competence. It also rests on the flawed legal basis of an "injury by injury" determination of clearly established law. I respectfully dissent.")

[Compare Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., 935 F.3d 757, 767, 794-97, 803 (9th Cir. 2019) ("The record before us, as construed by the district court, establishes that Edmo has a serious medical need, that the appropriate medical treatment is GCS [gender confirmation surgery], and that prison authorities have not provided that treatment despite full knowledge of Edmo's ongoing and extreme suffering and medical needs. In so holding, we reject the State's portrait of a reasoned disagreement between qualified medical professionals. We also emphasize that the analysis here is individual to Edmo and rests on the record in this case. We do not endeavor to project whether individuals in other cases will meet the threshold to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The district court's order entering injunctive relief for Edmo is affirmed, with minor modifications noted below. . . . Several years ago, the First Circuit, sitting en banc, employed that fact-based approach to evaluate a gender dysphoric prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim seeking GCS. The First Circuit confronted the following record: credited expert testimony disagreed as to whether GCS was medically necessary; the prisoner's active treatment plan, which did not include GCS, had ‘led to a significant stabilization in her mental state’; and a report and testimony from correctional officials detailed significant security concerns that would arise if the prisoner underwent GCS. Kosilek, 774 F.3d at 86–96. ‘After carefully considering the community standard of medical care, the adequacy of the provided treatment, and the valid security concerns articulated by the DOC,’ a 3–2 majority of the en banc court concluded that the plaintiff had not demonstrated GCS was medically necessary treatment for her gender dysphoria. . . . Our approach mirrors the First Circuit’s, but the important factual differences between cases yield different outcomes. Notably, the security concerns in Kosilek, which the First Circuit afforded ‘wide-ranging deference,’ are completely absent here. . . . The State does not so much as allude to them. The medical evidence also differs. In Kosilek, qualified and credited experts disagreed about whether GCS was necessary. . . . As explained above, the district court’s careful factual findings admit of no such disagreement here. Rather, they unequivocally establish that GCS is the safe, effective, and medically necessary treatment for Edmo’s severe gender dysphoria. We recognize, however, that our decision is in tension with Gibson v. Collier. In that case, the Fifth Circuit held, in a split decision, that ‘[a] state does not inflict cruel and unusual punishment by declining to provide [GCS] to a transgender inmate.’ 920 F.3d at 215. It did so on a ‘sparse record’—which included only the WPATH [World Professional Association of Transgender Health] Standards of Care and was notably devoid of ‘witness testimony or evidence from professionals in the field’—compiled by a pro se plaintiff. . . . Despite the sparse record, a 2–1 majority of the Gibson panel concluded that ‘there is no consensus in the medical community about the necessity and efficacy of [GCS] as a treatment for gender dysphoria. ... This on-going medical debate dooms Gibson’s claim.’ . . . We respectfully disagree with the categorical nature of our sister circuit’s holding. Most fundamentally, Gibson relies on an incorrect, or at best outdated, premise: that ‘[t]here is no medical consensus that [GCS] is a necessary or even effective treatment for gender dysphoria.’ . . . As the record here demonstrates and the State does not seriously dispute, the medical consensus is that GCS is effective and medically necessary in appropriate circumstances. . . . Gibson is unpersuasive for several additional reasons. It directly conflicts with decisions of this circuit, the Fourth Circuit, and the Seventh Circuit, all of which have held that denying surgical treatment for gender dysphoria can pose a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim. Rosati, 791 F.3d at 1040 (alleged blanket ban on GCS and denial of GCS to plaintiff with severe symptoms, including repeated self-castration attempts, states an Eighth Amendment claim); Fields v. Smith, 653 F.3d 550, 552–53, 558–59 (7th Cir. 2011) (law banning hormone treatment and GCS, even if medically necessary, violates the Eighth Amendment); De’lonta, 708 F.3d at 525 (alleged denial of an evaluation for GCS states an Eighth Amendment claim). . . . Relatedly, Gibson eschews Eighth Amendment precedent requiring a case-by-case determination of the medical necessity of a particular treatment. . . . The First Circuit did precisely what we do here: assess whether the record before it demonstrated deliberate indifference to the plaintiff’s gender dysphoria. On the record before it, the First Circuit determined that either of two courses of treatment (one included GCS and one did not) were medically acceptable. . . . In summary, Edmo has established that she suffers from a ‘serious medical need,’ . . . and that the treatment provided was ‘medically unacceptable under the circumstances’ and chosen ‘in conscious disregard of an excessive risk’ to her health[.] . . . She established her Eighth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference as to

Defendant-Appellant Dr. Eliason. . . .We hold that where, as here, the record shows that the medically necessary treatment for a prisoner’s gender dysphoria is gender confirmation surgery, and responsible prison officials deny such treatment with full awareness of the prisoner’s suffering, those officials violate the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.”); See also Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., No. 19-35017, 2020 WL 612834, at *1–2, *12-13 (9th Cir. Feb. 10, 2020) (O’Scannlain, J., with whom Callahan, Bea, Ikuta, R. Nelson, Bade, Bress, Bumatay, and Vandyke, J.J., join, respecting the denial of rehearing en banc) (“With its decision today, our court becomes the first federal court of appeals to mandate that a State pay for and provide sex-reassignment surgery to a prisoner under the Eighth Amendment. The three-judge panel’s conclusion—that any alternative course of treatment would be ‘cruel and unusual punishment’—is as unjustified as it is unprecedented. To reach such a conclusion, the court creates a circuit split, substitutes the medical conclusions of federal judges for the clinical judgments of prisoners’ treating physicians, redefines the familiar ‘deliberate indifference’ standard, and, in the end, constitutionally enshrines precise and partisan treatment criteria in what is a new, rapidly changing, and highly controversial area of medical practice. Respectfully, I believe our court’s unprecedented decision deserved reconsideration en banc. . . .Although I am not aware of any other circuits to have directly addressed the questions posed in this case,⁹ for its part, the Seventh Circuit has held that it is at least not ‘clearly established’ that there is a constitutional right to gender-dysphoria treatment beyond hormone therapy. Campbell v. Kallas, 936 F.3d 536, 549 (7th Cir. 2019). Nor is it ‘clearly established’ that a prison medical provider is prohibited from denying sex-reassignment surgery on the basis of the patient’s status as an institutionalized person. . . .With this decision, our circuit sets itself apart.”); Edmo v. Corizon, Inc., No. 19-35017, 2020 WL 612834, at *13-14, *19 (9th Cir. Feb. 10, 2020) (Bumatay, J., with whom Callahan, Ikuta, R. Nelson, Bade, and Vandyke, J.J., join, and with whom Collins, J., joins as to Part II, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“Like the panel and the district court, I hold great sympathy for Adree Edmo’s medical situation. And as with all citizens, her constitutional rights deserve the utmost respect and vigilant protection. . . . Adree Edmo is a transgender woman suffering from gender dysphoria—a serious medical condition. . . .I respect Edmo’s wishes and hope she is afforded the best treatment possible. But whether SRS is the optimal treatment for Edmo’s gender dysphoria is not before us. As judges, our role is not to take sides in matters of conflicting medical care. Rather, our duty is to faithfully interpret the Constitution. That duty commands that we apply the Eighth Amendment, not our sympathies. Here, in disregard of the text and history of the Constitution and precedent, the panel’s decision elevates innovative and evolving medical standards to be the constitutional threshold for prison medical care. In doing so, the panel minimizes the standard for establishing a violation of the Eighth Amendment. After today’s denial of rehearing en banc, the Ninth Circuit stands alone in finding that a difference of medical opinion in this debated area of treatment amounts to ‘cruel and unusual’ punishment under the Constitution. While this posture does not mean we are wrong, it should at least give us pause before embarking on a new constitutional trajectory. This is especially true given the original meaning of the Eighth Amendment. Because the panel’s opinion reads into the Eighth Amendment’s Cruel and Unusual Clause a meaning in conflict with its text, original meaning, and controlling precedent, I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc. . . . By judicially mandating an innovative and evolving standard of care, the panel effectively constitutionalizes a set of guidelines subject to ongoing debate and inaugurates yet another circuit split. And by diluting the requisite state of mind from ‘deliberate indifference to negligence, the panel effectively holds that—contrary to Supreme Court precedent—‘[m]edical malpractice [does] become a constitutional violation merely because the victim is a prisoner.’ . . I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.”)]

Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 820-21 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Plaintiffs here focus on two conditions that they allege violated their clearly established rights: the denial of the minimal amount of water needed for necessary activities of life, and the deprivation of the basic sanitary measure of preventing the build-up of feces, which forced plaintiffs to be surrounded by their own and others’ excrement. Both of these claims describe conditions of confinement that courts have long recognized as potential constitutional violations. It has been clearly established for decades that prisons must provide inmates with ‘the minimal civilized measure of life’s necessities.’ . . We have interpreted this general statement as a requirement that prisons provide inmates with ‘reasonably adequate ventilation, sanitation, bedding, hygienic materials, and utilities.’ . . Wathen argues that despite the generally well-established nature of these rights, the circumstances of this case—a non-total deprivation caused by a three-day planned water shutdown—take us into novel territory. But what is so new about it? All but the most plainly incompetent jail officials would be aware that it is constitutionally unacceptable to fail to provide inmates with enough water for consumption and sanitation over a three-day period. Perhaps an official would be excused for miscalculating the amount of water needed ex ante, so long as he worked to fix the problem once it manifested. But that is not the case before us. According to plaintiffs’ allegations, Wathen provided a limited amount of water, he and his staff were quickly made aware that more water was needed both for consumption and for sanitation, and they failed to provide any additional water. Indeed, plaintiffs allege that Wathen punished them for continued water requests. . . . Drawing reasonable inferences in plaintiffs’ favor, as we must at this stage, problems caused by limited drinking water may have been exacerbated by the lack of water for sanitation and the consequent exposure to feces and insects. The rights that plaintiffs identify—to have enough water for drinking and sanitation, and not to be forced to live surrounded by their own and others’ excrement—are thus clearly established.”)

Leiser v. Kloth, 933 F.3d 696, 702-05 (7th Cir. 2019) (“In deciding a question of qualified immunity, the level of specificity at which the legal question is asked is often decisive, and it is possible to be too general and too specific. . . . The district court determined that Leiser had ‘a clearly established right to be free from intentionally inflicted psychological harm.’ Leiser frames the question differently, as ‘whether Kloth subjected Leiser to calculated harassment unrelated to prison needs.’ Both of these statements are at too high a level of generality. . . .As we see the case, the issue is whether it was clearly established that Kloth was constitutionally required to accommodate Leiser’s specific and unique mental health need based solely on his self-reporting and demands of other inmates, absent instructions from the medical staff. . . . Inmates have long had a clearly established right to be free from intentionally inflicted psychological torment and humiliation unrelated to penological interests. . . .Leiser argues that Kloth had a constitutional obligation to modify her movements around the common area to avoid standing directly behind Leiser after he informed her that this proximity to him exacerbated his self-reported PTSD. However, none of the cases from this circuit he relies upon have facts closely analogous to those here. . . .The cases Leiser cites from other circuits also fail to show this right was clearly established. . . .Because he does not provide an analogous case, we now consider whether Leiser established that Kloth's conduct was so outrageous that no reasonable correctional officer would have believed the conduct was legal. He did not meet this burden. . . .At the time of Kloth's conduct here, it was not clearly established that she was constitutionally required to avoid standing behind Leiser as a result of his self-reporting of a pending (albeit eventual) diagnosis. Such conduct, if intended to provoke a negative response from Leiser, may have been unprofessional and unjustified, but the law did not make clear that it amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Leiser's claim here implies that prison staff have a constitutional obligation to modify the way they do their jobs based solely on an inmate's assertion that their actions elicit extreme psychological responses. We must recognize the risk that such a rule of law, which would apply without orders from prison medical staff, could create a real danger of inmates manipulating correctional officers for purposes unrelated to their mental health. This would be an entirely different case if Leiser had been diagnosed with PTSD and the medical staff had ordered correctional staff to provide an accommodation for Leiser that Kloth ignored. Generally, non-medical staff of jails and prisons must comply with medical directives, which includes mental health accommodations. . . .Kloth is entitled to summary judgment because Leiser did not establish that he had a clearly established constitutional right to an accommodation of a self-reported mental diagnosis without confirmation from medical staff or existence of a treatment plan.”)

Doe v. Purdue University, 928 F.3d 652, 665-66 (7th Cir. 2019) (“For the reasons that we have already explained, John has alleged facts that amount to a constitutional violation. But because the defendants have asserted qualified immunity, John can recover damages from them only if his right to receive procedural due process in the disciplinary proceeding was clearly established. . . .The magistrate judge did not address qualified immunity because he concluded that John had failed to state a due process claim. The defendants raised it below, however, and they press it again here as an alternative ground for affirmance. John insists that it would be premature for us to address the issue because we are reviewing the magistrate judge's dismissal of his claims under Rule 12(b)(6). As he points out, qualified immunity is generally addressed at summary judgment rather than on the pleadings. . . .There is no hard-and-fast rule, however, against resolving qualified immunity on the pleadings. The reason for deferring it to summary judgment is that an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity often ‘depend[s] on the particular facts of a given case,’ . . . and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not require a plaintiff to include much factual detail in a complaint[.] . . . That said, the existence of qualified immunity is not always dependent on factual development—it is sometimes clear on the face of the complaint that the constitutional right invoked was not clearly articulated in the case law. In that circumstance, the existence of qualified immunity is a ‘purely legal question’ that the court can address on a motion to dismiss. . . . That is the situation here. Qualified immunity is a high standard. It protects government officials from liability for civil damages as long as their actions do not violate ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’. . . While the general stigma-plus test is well-settled in our law, . . . we have never applied it specifically in the university setting. Instead, our cases in this area have considered only whether students have a property interest in their public university education—and to this point, no student has successfully shown the requisite interest. Because this is our first case addressing whether university discipline deprives a student of a liberty interest, the relevant legal rule was not ‘clearly established,’ and a reasonable university officer would not have known at the time of John’s proceeding that her actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. We therefore affirm the dismissal of John’s individual-capacity claims against Rollock, Sermersheim, Oliver, and Amberger.”)

Clark v. Reed, No. 18-2120, 2019 WL 2714611 (7th Cir. June 28, 2019) (not reported) (“Even if an oral grievance is protected speech, see Pearson v. Welborn, 471 F.3d 732, 741 (7th Cir. 2006), Clark has not shown that a threat to file a grievance was protected. To the contrary, ‘it seems implausible that a threat to file a grievance would itself constitute a First Amendment-protected grievance.’. . . Though at least one other circuit has since concluded otherwise, see Watson v. Rozum, 834 F.3d 417, 422–23 (3d Cir. 2016), the right was not clearly established in 2014, when Clark made his threat. It was also not clearly established that Clark’s refusal to be an informant, which Clark contends led Johnson to allow the discipline, was protected speech. Truthful speech may be protected, . . . but Clark’s rebuff was different from truthful speech. Rather, he refused to cooperate in an investigation, rejecting Johnson’s request that he say what he has heard from others, partly because he did not want to ‘risk’ the consequences. Yet prisons may punish inmates for declining to participate in investigations through polygraph exams, even when they assert a right against self-incrimination. . . . Thus, Clark’s refusal to cooperate might not be protected. This ambiguity entitles Johnson to qualified immunity.”) Goudy v. Cummings, 922 F.3d 834, 843-44 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Goudy’s allegations (if proven) describe a constitutional violation: the infringement of the due-process right to obtain exculpatory evidence, in this case through the investigators’ concealment of that evidence from the trial prosecutors. Moreover, at the time of these events, this right was clearly established. We see no need to repeat the underlying facts with respect to the video here. We add only that the fortuity that Cummings changed job titles over the period of his retention of the video does not have any effect on our analysis. At the time he allegedly acted to suppress evidence, he was still a police officer, and he was not acting in a prosecutorial capacity when he checked the video back into the evidence room. It was already clearly established as early as 1981 that police could not withhold exculpatory information from prosecutors. . . . Nothing had changed as of 1994 and 1995, when these defendants were involved in Goudy’s case. The same conclusion applies to the Harvell interview notes. Cummings and Napier urge us to frame the qualified immunity issue regarding the notes as follows: ‘whether it was clearly established in 1994 that an initial denial of involvement by a suspect, when that suspect later admits involvement in the crime, is material impeachment evidence such that a police officer can be held monetarily liable for not providing it.’ Even on this narrow view of the issue, materiality is easy to see: flip-flops in accounts about the central events in a case provide rich impeachment evidence, and potentially evidence on the merits. In addition, there are problems with the state's version. It cannot be the case that the qualified-immunity inquiry is so specific that materiality depends on the outcome of a trial. If we were to adopt such an approach, we would shield officers from liability for withholding impeachment evidence whenever materiality was a close call (for example, if the police officer felt the overall case was strong enough). Such a shield would be incompatible with the rule announced and elaborated in the Brady line of cases. Even if we were to formulate the inquiry as the investigators suggest, we would need to add something along the lines of: 'when that suspect is the state's star witness, the other identifying testimony contains serious internal inconsistencies, and there is a dearth of physical evidence tying the accused to the crime.' The state's case here was far from a slam dunk. . . It should have been obvious to Napier and Cummings that evidence impeaching the story told by the state's main cooperating witness, in a case with no physical evidence and inconsistent witness identifications, needed to be disclosed. (Notably, trial prosecutors Puckett and Maras-Roberts acknowledged that they would have had to disclose the notes had they possessed them.) Of course, it is still up to the jury to decide whether Napier and Cummings suppressed these pieces of evidence. But if they did, they cannot use qualified immunity to avoid liability.”)

de Lima Silva v. Department of Corrections, 917 F.3d 546, 565-66 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Defendants argue that not a single case existed as of December 2014, when Champagne decided to terminate plaintiff, that would have alerted her that this scenario was unconstitutional. We disagree. Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence such that a reasonable jury could find that Champagne terminated plaintiff because of his race and national origin. And if a jury draws that inference, it is of course true that Champagne’s actions would violate clearly established law. It is well-established that terminating an employee on the basis of his protected status—including race or national origin—violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Therefore, qualified immunity does not shield Champagne from liability here.”)

Lewis v. City of Chicago, 914 F.3d 472, 477 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Lewis alleges that the officers falsely asserted, both in their police reports and in testimony at the probable-cause hearing, that he admitted residing at the apartment where the gun was found and that they found evidence showing that he lived there. Accepting these allegations as true, as we must at this stage, no reasonable officer could have thought this conduct was constitutionally permissible. It makes no difference that our circuit caselaw situated the constitutional violation in the Due Process Clause rather than the Fourth Amendment”).

Rainsberger v. Benner, 913 F.3d 640, 652-54 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Benner argues that even if he violated Rainsberger’s Fourth Amendment rights, the district court still wrongfully denied him qualified immunity. He concedes—as he must—that it violates clearly established law ‘to use deliberately falsified allegations to demonstrate probable cause.’. . . Even so, Benner says, he is entitled to qualified immunity if the facts of the hypothetical affidavit demonstrate ‘arguable probable cause’—in other words, if a competent officer faced with the facts in the hypothetical affidavit could reasonably if mistakenly believe that those facts were sufficient to establish probable cause. Benner's argument takes some untangling, but its logic is this: (1) only material lies and omissions violate the Fourth Amendment, so the materiality of those lies and omissions must be clearly established; (2) the court evaluates materiality by determining whether a hypothetical affidavit would demonstrate probable cause; (3) if a competent officer reviewing the hypothetical affidavit could reasonably but mistakenly conclude that it established probable cause, then the materiality of the false or omitted information was not 'clearly established.' We have never applied the test that Benner proposes. There is a reason: it doesn't make sense. To begin with, Benner's framing has the proverbial reasonable officer facing a situation different from the one Benner did. Qualified immunity depends on whether it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . . In other words, the court puts a competent officer in the defendant's shoes, facing the same choice that the defendant did. Benner did not face a choice about whether the facts in the hypothetical affidavit established probable cause. He faced a choice about whether to make false or misleading statements in the affidavit. (He has also been faulted for excluding exculpatory evidence, but that presents different issues that we'll get to below.) Thus, the relevant question is what a well-trained officer would have thought about the lawfulness of that action. What Benner is really arguing, then, is that he is entitled to qualified immunity if a well-trained officer could 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude' that it was lawful to include an incriminating lie in an affidavit because the lie wasn't material to the probable cause determination. . . . Of course, a competent officer would not even entertain the question whether it was lawful for him to lie in a probable cause affidavit. The hypothetical officer in the qualified immunity analysis is one who acts in good faith. That is what the standard of 'objective reasonableness' is designed to capture. . . . It would be flatly inconsistent with that justification to imagine a competent officer considering the question whether a lie helpful to demonstrating probable cause is so helpful that he should not tell it. That is neither a reasonable question to ask nor a reasonable mistake to make. . . . To summarize: if an officer knowingly or recklessly includes false information in an affidavit and that information is not material, he will not be liable in a § 1983 action because the plaintiff will not be able to prove a constitutional violation. But if that information is material, the officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. The unlawfulness of using deliberately falsified allegations to establish probable cause could not be clearer. . . . And the plaintiff need not show that the materiality of the lie would have been clear to a competent officer. The qualified immunity analysis uses the perspective of an officer acting in good faith, and an officer acting in good faith would not entertain that question. . . . An officer sued for failing to include materially exculpatory facts in a probable cause affidavit is differently situated. It violates clearly established law to 'intentionally or recklessly withhold material information from a warrant application.' . . . But while a competent officer would not ask whether the Fourth Amendment permits him to tell a particular lie, a competent officer would—indeed, must—consider whether the Fourth Amendment obligates him to disclose particular evidence. Because an officer acting in good faith could make a reasonable mistake about his disclosure obligation, the materiality of omitted facts, unlike the materiality of false statements, is properly part of the qualified-immunity analysis. We have repeatedly held, therefore, that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by omission only if 'it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the omitted fact was material to the probable-cause determination.' . . . Here, Benner has not argued that it would have been unclear to a reasonable officer that any of the information that he omitted was material to the probable cause determination. Thus, we need not address whether he made any reasonable mistakes in that regard.”)

Neely-Bey Tarik-El v. Conley, 912 F.3d 989, 998-1000 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Here, the district court observed that there was no governing law ‘directly establishing that the defendants’ conduct in this case, where state officials enforced a ban from participating in religious activities that was put in place by the religious entity itself, violated Mr. [Neely-Bey’s] rights under the First Amendment.’ . . Mr. Neely-Bey believes, however, that the law ‘provided “fair warning” to the defendants “that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional.”’ . . According to Mr. Neely-Bey, the law was clearly established that a prison official cannot deny a prisoner’s free exercise rights based on the official’s understanding of the tenets of a particular faith. He relies principally on Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450 (7th Cir. 2012), and Vinning-El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2011), for this proposition. . . . Neither Grayson nor Vinning-El speak to the circumstances before us today. In both cases, the individual inmate requested that his religious belief be accommodated even though that belief was arguably personal to him and more demanding than the ones generally followed by adherents of the religion with which he professed to be affiliated. Mr. Neely-Bey presents a very different situation. He does not ask the CIF [Correctional Industrial Facility] to accommodate a personal belief not required of MSTA [Moorish Science Temple of America] adherents. Rather, he asks that the CIF require the MSTA to accept him as a full member even though his belief system as a declared sovereign citizen differs substantially from that of the MSTA and MSTA liturgical practices require that its adherents share their religious beliefs in the course of their worship services. The MSTA consequently believes that admitting Mr. Neely-Bey as a member would challenge its teachings and, possibly, jeopardize its status. This is the crux of the defendants’ position: They maintain that, had they required the MSTA to allow Mr. Neely-Bey to participate as a full member in Friday services, they would have violated MSTA’s associational rights. . . . Here, Chaplain Smith and the enforcement officers were required to balance the religious practices of one adherent against the rights of other inmates to exercise their religious beliefs in accordance with MSTA teaching. Neither Grayson nor Vinning-El offers guidance for correctional officers who find themselves in this dilemma. Indeed, there do not appear to be any cases that instruct prison officials on how they should strike the appropriate balance between these competing interests. . . . As we have explained previously, ‘[p]ublic officials can be held liable for violating clearly established law, but not for choosing sides on a debatable issue.’ . . The district court, therefore, did not err in granting the defendants qualified immunity on Mr. Neely-Bey’s damages claims under the Free Exercise Clause.”)

Sinn v. Lemmon, 911 F.3d 412, 422 (7th Cir. 2018) (“The reason the specificity of an inmate’s complaint matters is because that complaint is often the only information a prison official has of the treatment or conditions the inmate is experiencing. Failure-to-protect claims are predicated on a prison official’s subjective knowledge, though, not just the ability of an inmate to write detailed complaints. . . . Framed this way, it is clearly established that a prison official’s knowledge of prevalent gang violence, a prior attack on an inmate by gang members, and the victim’s fear of a retaliatory attack by other gang members in a new dorm, supported by evidence that related victims from the first attack had already been attacked a second time after being relocated, necessitates that the prison official reasonably respond to abate that risk of harm to the victim. . . Here, it is reasonable to infer that Brush had such knowledge but took no responsive action. It is well-settled, clearly established law that such a failure constitutes deliberate indifference. . . Thus, construing all facts in Sinn’s favor, Brush is not entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse and remand the district court’s grant of summary judgment on Sinn’s deliberate indifference claim as to Brush.”)

Horshaw v. Casper, 910 F.3d 1027, 1030 (7th Cir. 2018) (“The district court held that all defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 132393 at *19, and defendants ask us to accept that conclusion. But the district judge did not find that the law is uncertain. It is not; Farmer clearly establishes the governing rules. The judge found instead that, because the defendants are not liable at all, they also are entitled to immunity. That’s a confusion. Immunity is appropriate when the law, as applied to the facts, would have left objectively reasonable officials in a state of uncertainty. . . The uncertainty in this case is factual. Did Casper or Atchison receive some-thing from Horshaw?; what did the letter to Casper, or the note to Atchison, say?; could the defendants have kept Horshaw safe even if they tried? Atchison himself has told us that, if he had received a note with the contents Horshaw describes, then he knew exactly what he was supposed to do: offer Horshaw protection. The factual disputes may be hard to resolve given the lapse of time and Horshaw’s brain injury, but if he is right on the facts then neither Casper nor Atchison is entitled to immunity. (Uncertainty about the limits of supervisory liability after Iqbal and Vance might have supported an immunity defense, but, to repeat, Atchison has not made such an argument.)”)

Howard v. Koeller, 756 F. App’x 601, ___ (7th Cir. 2018)) (“Qualified immunity does not shield Koeller. Citing Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011), she argues that ‘there are no analogous cases that would give [her] notice ‘beyond debate’ that the First Amendment prohibits [her] from reporting that an inmate provided the name of another inmate within a conduct report.’ But that is not an accurate characterization of what Howard alleges. As the Supreme Court repeatedly has admonished, the right at issue when qualified immunity is invoked must be specifically tailored to the alleged conduct at issue, not defined at a high level of generality. . . Howard alleges that Koeller made deliberate misrepresentations in disciplinary reports with the intent to trigger a punitive response from other inmates. Koeller does not argue that a reasonable prison official would be unaware that this deliberate misconduct violated Howard’s constitutional rights, so qualified immunity does not protect her.”) Lovett v. Herbert, 907 F.3d 986, 991-94 (7th Cir. 2018) (“Although questions of (1) Fourth Amendment liability and (2) qualified immunity both involve an analysis of the ‘reasonableness’ of a defendant’s conduct, the objects of those analyses are different. As we have explained in prior cases, ‘ “the substantive constitutional standard protects [a defendant officer’s] reasonable factual mistakes [whereas] qualified immunity protects [the officer] from liability where [he] reasonably misjudge[d] the legal standard.”. . . This distinction allows us to work around the factual disputes identified by the district court by assuming that the Officers knew Martin was severely intoxicated and that cells without upper bunks were available. Making these assumptions, we can properly exercise jurisdiction to determine whether providing a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk, in a cell where the lower bunk was occupied, violates clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes. . . . Here, the right at issue is a pre-arraignment detainee’s Fourth Amendment right to ‘objectively reasonable’ treatment. We have explained that this right is assessed with reference to the defendant officer’s notice of the detainee’s medical need, the seriousness of the medical need, the scope of the alleged required treatment, and police interests. The Estate argues that the Officers obviously violated this right by giving a severely intoxicated person access to an upper bunk. The Officers argue that only analogous precedent could have put them on notice that their conduct was unreasonable, but that no such precedent exists. Examination of the specific context of the Officers’ conduct in this case shows that it was not ‘egregiously’ or ‘obviously’ unreasonable. Martin’s severe intoxication did not necessarily indicate imminent or ongoing danger, such that giving access to an upper bunk was patently unreasonable. Although severe intoxication impairs a person’s physical and mental abilities, the level of impairment varies by individual, and it is undisputed that Martin was communicating with the Officers and moving around under his own capacity prior to being left in the cell. Further, impairment from intoxication eventually decreases with time. We and the Supreme Court have required a much higher level of obvious risk to deny qualified immunity based on the Fourth Amendment’s general requirement of reasonable conduct with respect to detainees. . . . [Court distinguishes cases relied on by the Estate and concludes that] even drawing all factual inferences in its favor, the Estate has failed to show that the Officers’ conduct violated clearly established law. For that reason, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Muhammad v. Pearson, 900 F.3d 898, 901, 904-07 (7th Cir. 2018) (“Law enforcement officers who discover that a search warrant does not clearly specify the premises to be searched must ordinarily stop and clear up the ambiguity before they conduct or continue the search. . . If they do not, they may lose the legal protection the warrant provides for an invasion of privacy and accompanying restraints on liberty. As we explain below, however, we conclude that summary judgment for the officer was appropriate here. Defendant Pearson testified that he did not know there were two apartments, including an apartment 1B, and he has offered undisputed, reliable, and contemporaneous documents confirming his after-the-fact testimony that the address searched was in fact the correct target of the search authorized by the ambiguous warrant. Summary judgment on the unlawful entry claims was correct. Also, Officer Pearson had arguable probable cause to arrest plaintiff Muhammad for suspected drug trafficking, though Pearson quickly confirmed that Muhammad was not the right suspect and released him within fifteen minutes. Summary judgment based on qualified immunity was also correct on that unlawful arrest claim We approach this illegal entry claim through the lens of qualified immunity and ask whether Officer Pearson’s actions violated clearly established law. More precisely, since the district court granted summary judgment for Pearson, the question is whether the undisputed facts show that Pearson did not violate clearly established law. . . . With th[e] qualified immunity standard in mind, we take a closer look at Fourth Amendment law where search warrants have errors or key ambiguities. We have held that officers executing a search warrant can rely on what they know and see independent of the documents to make sure they search the correct premises, at least where the circumstances show there is no reasonable chance that the officers will search the wrong location, meaning a location other than the one the issuing magistrate authorized. . . . Search first, check later, is not a sound policing strategy. Jones teaches that officers need to read the warrant before executing it, and they should call a judge if there is a discrepancy between the affidavit and the warrant. . . . This case, however, is different from Jones in a critical way. Unlike the officer in Jones, who knew there were two apartments, knew that the warrant was ambiguous, and essentially took his best guess about which one to search, Officer Pearson testified that when he applied for the warrant he did not know there was an apartment 1B in the building. He also testified that the omission of ‘A’ from the warrant was a clerical omission. Pearson used his knowledge of the case, including information from his source, to search the correct apartment, the one for which he had probable cause. So Officer Pearson relies on the line of cases cited above that allow executing officers to rely on what they know to make sure they search the correct locations, despite errors or ambiguities in search warrants. The critical question for this case is whether it was proper to resolve Pearson’s defense in his favor on summary judgment. In civil litigation about searches that turned out to involve mistakes or ambiguities in warrants, there can be plenty of room for material factual disputes about what the executing officers actually knew and did. Parties and courts can reasonably question the credibility of officers’ after-the-fact attempts to explain away their mistakes. Such cases may well present factual issues that require a full trial to resolve. In this case, however, summary judgment was justified. Officer Pearson has offered undisputed evidence, in the form of reliable, contemporaneous documents, confirming that the correct target apartment—the one he intended to search and had probable cause to search—was apartment 1A. The LEADS report (dated the day before the warrant) and the deconfliction submission (dated the same day the warrant was executed) both listed apartment ‘1A’ as the target of the search. Those documents remove reasonable grounds for disputing Pearson’s claim that he used his knowledge to ensure that he searched the intended location. This contemporaneous evidence distinguishes this case from others where we held that officers could not have concluded that a plaintiff’s apartment was the appropriate target of the search warrant. . . . Given the case law that allows an executing officer to use his or her own knowledge to resolve ambiguities, at least where there is no chance that the wrong location might be searched by mistake . . . and the contemporaneous documentation that corroborates Pearson’s testimony, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment. Plaintiffs have not identified a precedent that should have alerted Officer Pearson that he could not proceed to search the apartment that he knew, beyond reasonable dispute, was the intended target.”)

Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414, 420-24 (7th Cir. 2018) (“The plaintiff estate has not cited any cases holding that a paramedic could violate a patient’s Fourth Amendment rights by rendering medical treatment. We have found just two opinions allowing such cases to go forward. . . . Given the undisputed facts here, we doubt that the reasoning of those cases applies. In any event, the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis is dispositive here, so we decline to decide the first. . . .We have appellate jurisdiction to review the legal issue at the second step of qualified immunity analysis: whether the constitutional right that Heishman’s estate asserts was clearly established at the time Cope administered the sedative. . . . [H]ow should courts analyze whether a right is clearly established? The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’. . . Defining the right too broadly ‘may defeat the purpose of qualified immunity.’. . . On the other hand, defining the right too narrowly is equally problematic. That error ‘may defeat the purpose of § 1983.’. . . The Second Circuit has said that the ‘Goldilocks principle’ illustrates the ‘middle course’ between the two extremes—not too broad, not too narrow, but just right. [citing Golodner, 770 F.3d at 206] Can we be more specific? Precedent tied to particularized facts can indicate that law is clearly established, but the Supreme Court does ‘not require a case directly on point.’. . . ‘Of course, there can be the rare “obvious case,” where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’. . . As we view this case, the question for qualified immunity is whether it was clearly established in 2014 that a paramedic ‘seizes’ an arrestee and is subject to Fourth Amendment limits on excessive force by sedating the arrestee—who appears to the paramedic to be suffering from a medical emergency—before taking the arrestee by ambulance to the hospital. It was not. The district court defined the asserted right too broadly. It said that ‘officers cannot use excessive force in effectuating an arrest.’. . . That ‘lofty definition of the right’ is just ‘one floor down from the words of the Fourth Amendment itself (“the right to be free of ‘unreasonable ... seizures’”) and two floors down from the highest level of generality possible (“the right to be free from a constitutional violation”).’. . . The district court’s formulation suggests that it tried to treat this case as an obvious one, evident from broad principles in excessive force cases. But we do not think a paramedic (or his lawyer) reasonably familiar with circuit and Supreme Court precedent would have understood that the Fourth Amendment prohibition of unreasonable searches and seizures applies to treatment in the field during a medical emergency. Fourth Amendment restrictions are almost wholly alien to that situation, where paramedics are subject to a distinct set of professional standards and goals aimed at responding to medical emergencies. . . . The district court’s formulation ‘defines the qualified immunity inquiry at a high level of generality ... and then fails to consider that question in “the specific context of the case.”’. . . Neither the plaintiff estate nor the district court cited any case where a court found that conduct like Cope’s—administering a therapeutic drug in response to a medical emergency—violated the Fourth Amendment. The cases cited by plaintiff and the district court involved excessive force cases brought against police officers. . . . Qualified immunity exists to avoid or at least to reduce the risk of the kind of catch-22 that would result from accepting the estate’s position: treat the arrestee or don’t treat him, but face a lawsuit either way. Suppose we put aside for a moment the human and professional ethics and responsibilities of paramedics and police officers when confronting a person in dire straits. Let’s focus only on legally enforceable duties. If the officers and paramedic had not responded to Heishman’s excited delirium, they could easily have found themselves defending against a deliberate indifference claim for ignoring his obvious and serious medical needs. . . . That dilemma helps to explain why the right the plaintiff estate asserts here was not clearly established under the circumstances. To treat the right as clearly established, the district court boiled away key circumstances of the situation here—especially the fact that Cope was a paramedic confronting a patient suffering from a life-threatening emergency. Those facts take this case out of the realm of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. It was not clearly established that a paramedic effects a ‘seizure’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment and subjects himself to an excessive force claim by sedating an arrestee who is suffering from a medical emergency to take the arrestee to the hospital. Defendant Cope was entitled to summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Mitchell v. Kallas, 895 F.3d 492, 499-501 (7th Cir. 2018) (“Dr. Kallas urges that he is entitled to qualified immunity because no binding decision guarantees inmates the right to a speedier gender dysphoria evaluation or short-term hormone therapy prior to release. That formulation, however, frames the right too narrowly. Dr. Kallas has conceded (consistently with other cases) that Mitchell’s gender dysphoria was a serious medical need. . . The first question is thus whether a prison doctor would have known that it was unconstitutional never to provide a person with the appropriate treatment for her particular case (and for many others)—hormone therapy. . . Prison officials have been on notice for years that leaving serious medical conditions, including gender dysphoria, untreated can amount to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. . . .Because circuit precedent clearly established that a total absence of treatment for the serious medical needs created by gender dysphoria is unconstitutional, Dr. Kallas may not claim qualified immunity for the denial of Mitchell’s request for care. . . .To the extent that Mitchell may be complaining about the length of time it took for the assessment to be completed, as opposed to the lack of treatment, our answer is different. It is true that delays in care for ‘non-life-threatening but painful conditions may constitute deliberate indifference if the delay exacerbated the injury or unnecessarily prolonged an inmate’s pain.’ . . Yet prisons have limited resources, and that fact makes some delay inevitable. For a delay in treatment to qualify as deliberate indifference, we must weigh ‘the seriousness of the condition and the ease of providing treatment.’ . . As we have said, the serious nature of gender dysphoria is not disputed here. But the ease of evaluating the appropriateness of hormone therapy remains to be considered. There is little evidence about the typical length of these evaluations, either in prisons or in the community. The few courts that have considered this question (some after the events in question) have determined that even longer delays in evaluating an inmate’s candidacy for hormone treatment did not amount to deliberate indifference. . . Because Dr. Kallas was not on notice that a 13-month evaluation would violate Mitchell’s Eighth Amendment right, he is entitled to qualified immunity on any possible claim of unreasonable delay. That is not to say that this delay cannot be criticized. Far from it. The lack of any sense of urgency, or even of the need for prompt follow-through, is quite disturbing. But on these facts, no clearly established law would have signaled to Dr. Kallas that this delay amounted to deliberate indifference.”)

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474 (7th Cir. 2018) (“As an IT specialist, Comsys surely knew that it could acquire its own domain name and set up an email server on its own equipment, for the greatest possible security. Instead it chose to use the City’s servers, without any contractual guarantee of privacy. This puts it in a middle ground: it did not consent to the search (expressly or by implication), but neither did it arrange privacy by contract. Clearly established law does not tell us what expectation of privacy a contractor has in such a situation, which means that the appellants are entitled to qualified immunity. ualified immunity protects public employees who do not violate clearly established law. Unless we accept highly general statements—such as ‘do not invade reasonable expectations of privacy without probable cause’—as clearly establishing the law when the existence of a reasonable privacy interest is itself debatable, these appellants prevail. We have been told by the highest authority not to take general principles as clearly establishing how novel situations must be resolved. It follows that Mayor Bosman, Administrator Pacetti, and Manager St. Peter cannot be ordered to pay damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.”)

Comsys, Inc. v. Pacetti, 893 F.3d 468, 474-76 (7th Cir. 2018) (Gilbert, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I join with my colleagues on the Fourth Amendment question. The majority’s holding on the First Amendment issue, however, is problematic. . . .The majority then holds that Pacetti gets qualified immunity for his actions because he did not violate any clearly established rights of the appellees. What the majority is effectively saying is that you do not have a clearly established right to report a crime against you or your privately-held business to the police. That cannot be correct. The First Amendment expressly protects ‘the right of the people ... to petition the government for a redress of grievances.’ U.S. Const. amend. I. This clause has been incorporated against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause. . . .It should be clear that the First Amendment protects your ability to report to the police that you are the victim of a crime. And although the Supreme Court ‘does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established,’ Kisela v. Hughes, — U.S. —, 138 S.Ct. 1148, 1152, 200 L.Ed.2d 449 (2018), there are numerous published opinions at both the district and circuit court levels coming to the same conclusion. . . .There is one final matter: the majority is correct that the Supreme Court continues to move the ball on when law is ‘clearly established’ for a qualified immunity analysis, but the majority takes this principle too far. My colleagues rely chiefly on Trigillo v. Snyder, 547 F.3d 826 (7th Cir. 2008) to indicate that the right to report a crime against you or your personally-held business is not clearly established at the moment. But Trigillo dealt with a public service administrator trying to ensure that the Illinois Department of Corrections was proceeding appropriately, and when the employee became more concerned with what was going on at the Department, she filed a report with the Illinois Attorney General. . . . The employee wrote the report on a department letterhead and signed it as the ‘Chief of Procurement.’. . . So it should not be a surprise that the speech in Trigillo fell within the scope of Garcetti v. Ceballos. . . considering the speaker was undoubtedly speaking as an employee rather than as a citizen in her private capacity. That is far different from our case, where McAuliffe learned that someone was stealing trade secrets from her privately-held business and reported as much to the authorities. And the fact that McAuliffe’s privately-held business had a contract with the city cannot mean that suddenly McAuliffe loses her right to report those computer crimes simply because ‘performance of the contract’ may be at play. Because it is clearly established that McAuliffe had a First Amendment right to report a crime against herself and her privately-held business to law enforcement, and Pacetti retaliated against her for doing so, Pacetti should not be entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. I respectfully dissent as to the majority’s holding on the First Amendment question.”)

Broadfield v. McGrath, 737 F. App'x 773, ___ (7th Cir. 2018) (“[A] defendant who is denied qualified immunity at summary judgment may not immediately appeal whether the evidence was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial. . . And accepting the defendants’ argument would require disrupting the district court’s conclusion that Broadfield’s level of cooperation was sufficiently disputed. Because the court’s ruling on this step of the qualified immunity inquiry turns on factual questions, we lack jurisdiction to review this issue. We do have jurisdiction to decide the second step of the qualified-immunity inquiry: whether Broadfield’s right to be free from the type of excessive force described by the district court was clearly established. The Supreme Court has stressed that this right must be defined with adequate specificity. Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1151 (2018). The question, then, is not whether the law forbids the use of excessive force, but whether the law clearly established as excessive force the pressing of a non-resisting detainee’s neck against the concrete in a manner that prevented him from breathing, carrying him hog-tied to his cell, and severely twisting his wrist in the process. . . In making this determination, we do not require a case be directly on point, but existing precedent must be sufficiently analogous to place the officers on notice that their conduct was unlawful. . . The Supreme Court has held that a pretrial detainee can succeed on an excessive force claim by showing only that the force used against him was objectively unreasonable. . . And our precedent makes clear that the actions of McGrath and Durham were objectively unreasonable if Broadfield was not resisting. . . Thus, we will not disturb the district court’s denial of McGrath and Durham’s qualified-immunity defense.”)

Hurt v. Wise, 880 F.3d 831, 844-47 (7th Cir. 2018) (“Introducing an involuntary confession in a criminal prosecution violates the protection against compelled self-incrimination. . . Vantlin raises two preliminary legal arguments, which if accepted would entitle all three defendants to qualified immunity. First, he argues that Deadra’s confession was never introduced against her in a criminal trial, and so she was never compelled to testify against herself. We have already rejected such a cramped understanding of what it means to ‘use’ a confession against someone in a criminal case. . . It is enough that the statement was used against Deadra in a probable cause affidavit and in a pre-trial hearing. . . False confessions are a real problem, as both the majority and dissenting opinions in Dassey recognized. . . Even though William and Deadra ‘confessed,’ if a trier of fact could conclude that the officers knew that the confessions were false, then the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. . . We acknowledge, as we did in Dassey, that ‘[t]he Supreme Court’s many cases applying the voluntariness test have not distilled the doctrine into a comprehensive set of hard rules.’ . . Nonetheless, when the facts must be taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, and when an interrogation is infected with numerous problems, a full trial may be necessary before a final characterization of the process is possible. This is not the place for an in-depth look at psychological coercion and false confessions, because we are not charged with making the final decision on the admissibility of William’s and Deadra’s statements. We must decide only whether, taking the facts and inferences favorably to the plaintiffs, any reasonable officer would have known that he was applying impermissible pressure. The district court concluded that the answer to this more limited question is yes, and we agree with it.”) [See also Hurt v. Vantlin, No. 314CV00092JMSMPB, 2019 WL 3980759, at *3 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 23, 2019) (“The EPD Defendants also argue that because the law is ‘unsettled’ for a Fourth Amendment wrongful pretrial detention claim, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . The Seventh Circuit affirmed this Court’s denial of qualified immunity related to William and Deadra’s wrongful pretrial detention. . . The Court rejects the argument that the same conduct at issue in their former malicious prosecution claim – which the Seventh Circuit found was not subject to immunity – is magically immune because the claim is now labeled a Fourth Amendment claim. The law proscribing detention in the absence of probable cause, and the inapplicability of qualified immunity for detention in the absence of arguable probable cause, however the claim is labeled, has been settled for years.”)]

Kemp v. Liebel, 877 F.3d 346, 351-52 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Before we can determine if the law was clearly established, ‘the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.’ . The Supreme Court has expressly rejected over-general formulations of clearly established law in the Fourth Amendment context. . . . In recent years, the Court has repeatedly stressed that Graham and Garner ‘lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level.’ . . . Thus, the Court held that ‘Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside “an obvious case.”’ . Here, plaintiffs ask us to define the relevant clearly established law as ‘the right of prisoners not to have their religious practices interfered with and prevented absent a legitimate penological basis.’ This formulation is too broad. In fact, it simply restates the standard for analyzing prisoners’ constitutional claims created by the Court in Turner v. Safley[.] . . . Just as Garner and Graham create a generalized excessive force standard, Turner creates a generalized framework to analyze prisoners’ constitutional claims. Both describe a multi-factor reasonableness test used to determine whether a defendant’s actions violated the Constitution. Thus, like the Garner and Graham standard, the Turner test cannot create clearly established law outside an obvious case. . . Instead, as the district court stated, the proper inquiry is whether there existed a ‘clearly established constitutional right on the part of prisoners to congregate services and study absent appropriate leadership and supervision at the time of an interfacility transfer.’ . Under this framework, it is clear that Liebel is protected by qualified immunity. Plaintiffs cite no case where we held that the Free Exercise Clause provides prisoners the right to group worship when outside volunteers were unavailable to lead or train inmates. Likewise, they cite no case where we held that a prison official violates the Free Exercise Clause by transferring inmates to a facility that does not provide congregate worship and study, or by failing to delay a transfer until the new facility provides congregate worship and study.”)

Smith v. Anderson, 874 F.3d 966, 968 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Qualified immunity bars Smith’s claim. No court has held that the Fourth Amendment compels the release of sex offenders who lack lawful and approved living arrangements. Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 864 (7th Cir. 2017). Thus, when sex offenders lack these arrangements, their continued detention does not violate clearly established rights. In such circumstances, the officers responsible for their detention are entitled to qualified immunity. . . That is the situation here. Indeed, Illinois law requires the Department to ensure that inmates have proper and approved residences before releasing them on parole. . . It also authorizes the Department to hold inmates until it has approved their living arrangements. . . As of his release date, Department had not approved Smith's host site. Thus, Smith's continued detention did not violate a clearly established right.")

Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 460 (7th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 1440 (2018) ("The defendants urge us to narrowly define Perry's right. But, in doing so, they are essentially urging us to conclude that because there is no case with the exact same fact pattern, qualified immunity applies. That is not what the qualified immunity analysis requires us to do. Rather, we find that in September 2010, it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment governed claims by detainees who had yet to receive a judicial probable cause determination. . . In 2007, in Williams, we identified the four factors later articulated in Ortiz, and upon which we have relied to evaluate the merits of Perry's claims. And, if by 2010, it was clearly established that an officer or prison nurse's actions were judged by the objectively reasonable standard of the Fourth Amendment, the failure to take any action in light of a serious medical need would violate that standard. Because Perry has met his burden at summary judgment of establishing that there was a violation of his constitutional rights and that that right was clearly established in 2010, his claims must be submitted to a jury for consideration.")

Orlowski v. Milwaukee Cty., 872 F.3d 417, 422-23 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Defendants' construction of the 'clearly established' law at issue here is narrow to the point of meaninglessness. Defendants assert that there is no clearly established right for 'a convicted prisoner to be awoken and told that he is snoring or breathing irregularly' or 'to receive immediate medical attention simply because he is snoring or breathing inconsistently in his sleep.' This inaccurately construes the Estate's claim. We cannot assume the Defendants' version of the facts that Orlowski was only snoring. The Estate provides evidence that Alexander knew, and told Manns, that Orlowski was breathing irregularly, appeared to have a severe sleeping disorder, and could not be woken up. Any reasonable officer would know that these observations indicated a serious medical condition and the law required them to seek medical attention. But, Alexander and Manns instead ignored Orlowski's condition. Because the facts proffered by the Estate could demonstrate a violation of Orlowski's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights, factual disputes prevent a finding that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.") Houlihan v. City of Chicago, 871 F.3d 540, 546-49 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Given the 'considerable uncertainty [that] exists in the area of patronage law,' it is often difficult to prove that a government official violated a clearly established right by considering politics when making an employment decision. . . The reason for this uncertainty is that determining whether it is permissible to consider politics is a highly fact-specific inquiry—one that requires considering 'a wide range of government positions, which in turn involve an endless variety of job responsibilities and varying degrees of discretion and autonomy.' . . Between the low-level government worker (who typically receives protection from patronage hiring and firing) and the confidential employee (who receives no such protection), there are numerous government positions for which the propriety of patronage-based employment decisions 'has depended largely on the courts' juggling of competing constitutional and political values.’. . For that reason, ‘it is difficult to imagine how any plaintiff ... could have a clearly established right to be free from patronage dismissal unless a nearly identical case had already been decided.’. . Although the Shakman decrees reflect one of the First Amendment’s proscriptions—that is, the general prohibition of patronage-based employment decisions—the decrees are not an edict encapsulating the contours of the constitutional rule; the decrees instead are the result of settlement between the parties to litigation. . . The evidence shows that a reasonable person not only could debate whether the security-specialist position is a confidential one, but in fact could conclude so. And because the position is arguably confidential, a patronage-based employment decision regarding the position—although illegal under Shakman—does not necessarily entail a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at the time of the plaintiffs’ reassignment, Hillard and Thompson did not have notice that it is an obvious constitutional violation to consider politics when appointing security specialists. Hillard and Thompson are thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Archer v. Chisholm, 870 F.3d 603, 620 (7th Cir. 2017) (“In sum, Garcetti might support either side: Archer, because the defendants were not her employer; the defendants, because Archer’s activities were part of her job as a public employee. This uncertainty means that Archer has not shown that her asserted right was ‘clearly established’—a stringent standard that demands that ‘every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’. . . [T]he existence of probable cause and the judicial supervision of the John Doe investigation further counsel in favor of finding that qualified immunity applies. No case we have seen has considered how to treat public employee speech that draws the attention of a John Doe judge or a grand jury for purposes of the First Amendment. . . And we know from Hartman that probable cause (or the lack thereof) is relevant to a claim of retaliatory prosecution. . . There is no clearly established rule of law under which an official pursuing a lawful investigation, based on probable cause, has been found liable under the First Amendment to a target.”)

Green v. Newport, 868 F.3d 629, 634-35 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Green counters that, while Gentry and Packer may not have expressly proscribed Officer Newport’s conduct, these cases provided him ‘fair warning’ that his conduct was unlawful. . . It is not clear on what legal basis Green asserts this argument, but as we have already concluded, Gentry and Packer are too factually dissimilar to control this case. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’. . Green ignores the context of the situation which Officer Newport confronted: the auto store’s recent robbery; the ‘casing’ behavior reportedly carried out by the driver of the Marquis; and the proximity to the store’s closing hour. These facts make this case wholly distinguishable from Gentry and Packer, in which officers lacked any information to warrant suspicion of criminal conduct, and consequently these cases cannot provide Officer Newport ‘fair warning’ that his conduct was unlawful. Accordingly, the district court erred in its determination that Officer Newport’s Terry stop violated clearly established law, and we find that Officer Newport is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 552-53 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Walker argues that the Supreme Court’s decision in Taylor v. Barks shows that Clark’s rights were not clearly established. . . . Taylor is readily distinguishable from this case. First, Clark’s estate is not suing supervisory officials who did not know about Clark’s risk. The estate contends that Walker and Kuehn actually knew Clark’s risk and disregarded it. Second, in Taylor the Supreme Court reversed the Third Circuit in part because the right at issue was not clearly established in the Third Circuit. Here, the right at issue has long been clearly established in this circuit, as explained above. Finally, Walker argues that the clearly established prohibition on deliberate indifference to prisoners’ and jail inmates’ risk of suicide is too general to be enforceable for purposes of qualified immunity. Walker urges us to consider Clark’s rights at a very high level of specificity: whether a jail inmate had a right ‘to be placed immediately on a special watch in a suicide cell despite no outward signs of suicidal ideation during an initial intake assessment, when the intake officer knew that trained medical personnel would conduct a follow-up assessment and ultimately determine the inmate’s proper observation and housing status.’ This very specific right, Walker argues, ‘has never been clearly established by the Supreme Court.’ Courts may not define clearly established law at too high a level of generality, . . . but there is no such problem here. The Supreme Court has long held that prisoners have an Eighth Amendment right to treatment for their ‘serious medical needs.’ . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, that legal duty need not be litigated and then established disease by disease or injury by injury. Risk of suicide is a serious medical need, of course. . . . Walker should have taken action based on this knowledge, yet he chose to do nothing. Our precedent establishes that ‘particular conduct’ such as this violates clearly established law. . . . To the extent Walker argues that our prior cases are factually distinguishable from this case, our limited jurisdiction precludes considering that argument.”)

Lewis v. McClean, 864 F.3d 556, 565-66 (7th Cir. 2017) (“[W]e reject the defendants’ claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity from Lewis’s suit. Qualified immunity protects government employees from liability for civil damages for actions taken within the scope of their employment unless their conduct violates ‘clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Lewis, we ask whether the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . In establishing whether a constitutional right has been clearly established, it is unnecessary for the particular violation in question to have been previously held unlawful. . . . Instead, we ask whether the ‘contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . It has long been clear that deliberate indifference to an inmate’s serious medical needs violates the Eighth Amendment. As for whether Cichanowicz and McLean’s delay in assisting Lewis ran afoul of that clearly established right, as the discussion above makes clear, when viewed in the light most favorable to Lewis, his factual allegations could demonstrate a constitutional violation. Thus, the defendants are not entitled to immunity from suit.”)

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App’x 966, ____ (7th Cir. 2017) (“Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless their acts violate clearly established law. See, e.g., White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017). Neither the Supreme Court nor any court of appeals has held that prisoners are entitled to place advertisements in an effort to attract support for a proposal to change a prison system's policies. To the contrary, many decisions have held that a prisoner's efforts to speak directly to the public at large or to the press are subject to restrictions by wardens and other officials. . . Karow had every right to contact lawyers who might have been willing to help him and to initiate litigation seeking an injunction requiring the prison system to recognize Asatru. By choosing a different route—one that could have entailed gang code, even if it did not in fact—Karow invited a reaction by the prison system. The district court was right to conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages.”)

Karow v. Fuchs, 695 F. App'x 966, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) (Rovner, J., dissenting) (“Thaddeus Karow placed an ad in a religious newsletter, seeking ‘ideas’ for how to have his religion recognized as ‘legitimate’ in the Wisconsin prison system. Officers viewed the ad as a prohibited call for collective action, placed Karow in segregation, and issued him a conduct report. Even though a hearing committee exonerated Karow of violating prison rules, the officers continued to threaten Karow with punishment if he ran the ad again. The majority, in concluding that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Karow’s claim that the officers violated the First Amendment, misframes the issue by asking whether prisoners have a clear right to advertise. But it is Karow’s message, not its medium, that matters. I view Karow’s speech as a request for legal assistance that, because no reasonable officer would believe it threatened legitimate prison interests, was clearly protected speech. I would therefore deny the officers qualified immunity on Karow’s First Amendment claim.”)

Isby v. Brown, 856 F.3d 508, 529-30 (7th Cir. 2017) (“It is well established that whenever process is constitutionally due, no matter the context, it must be granted in a meaningful manner. . . That said, we must also be cautious about defining the due process violation at issue here ‘at the appropriate level of specificity.’ . . There is no Seventh Circuit or Supreme Court case establishing exactly that periodic reviews of administrative segregation like those at issue here violate due process. ‘However, a case holding that the exact action in question is unlawful is not necessary.’ . . After all, prison officials have been on notice since Hewitt that periodic reviews of administrative segregation are constitutionally required, and it is self-evident that they cannot be a sham. Although some appellate courts that have considered this issue have concluded that qualified immunity applied, see, e.g., Toevs, 685 F.3d at 916 (“we cannot conclude that the state of the law from 2005 to 2009 gave defendants fair warning that the [Quality of Life Level Program] review process [for prisoners in administrative segregation] was not meaningful, or that the lack of reviews at QLLP Levels 4 through 6 was a due-process violation”), in the case at hand, the various factual disputes discussed above preclude summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .As Isby may be able to convince the trier of fact that defendants-appellees have been deliberately giving him meaningless ‘reviews,’ without any intention of ever releasing him from the SCU, qualified immunity may not apply.”)

Gill v. City of Milwaukee, 850 F.3d 335, 341 (7th Cir. 2017) (“The right ‘to be free from coercive interrogation’ is highly generalized. Therefore, it cannot be the basis for defeating a qualified immunity defense, unless there is closely analogous precedent that is ‘particularized’ to the facts of the instant case. . . . Gill has not cited, and we have not identified, any precedent from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that puts the unconstitutionality of the officers’ conduct here ‘beyond debate.’ . . . When no such precedent exists, we look outside our Circuit ‘to determine whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.’ . . . Gill relies exclusively on two cases from the Eighth Circuit that he argues clearly establish the contours of the right violated here. See Livers v. Schenk, 700 F.3d 340 (8th Cir. 2012); Wilson v. Lawrence Cty., 260 F.3d 948 (8th Cir. 2001). In both cases, the court denied officers summary judgment after determining that there were questions of fact as to whether the interrogation methods in question violated the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights of a mentally disabled suspect. . . . In our view, however, these two cases from another circuit are insufficient to establish a ‘clear trend’ indicating that recognition of this right as clearly established in this Circuit is ‘merely a question of time.’ . . . This is particularly true in light of our recent holding in Cairel, where we rejected a closely similar substantive due process claim based on the interrogation of a suspect with a cognitive disability. . . . There, the officers interrogated the suspect without a lawyer present, despite the fact that they were ‘aware of [the suspect’s] disability and knew that he might not have been fully able to understand what was going on.’ . . . In sum, Gill has failed to demonstrate that his right to be free from the interrogation tactics used here is clearly established. There is no precedent that places the constitutionality of the detectives’ actions ‘beyond debate.’ . . . For that reason, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Gill’s Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment claims.”)

Brown v. Randle, 847 F.3d 861, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2017) (“No matter how the Due Process calculus may come out, Brown insists, he had a right under the Fourth Amendment to release as soon as his prison sentence ended. Yet as of 2009, when he was kept in prison, no court had held that the Fourth Amendment entitles a sex offender to release even though it appears likely that, as soon as he steps outside the prison’s front door, he will be in violation of the terms of release. Indeed, no federal court has so held to this day. Under the circumstances, therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from damages. And so we concluded with respect to Wisconsin’s system of keeping sex offenders in prison until they have a lawful post-prison residence. See Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751 (7th Cir. 2016). In a supplemental brief filed after argument, Brown asks us to put Werner to one side because Illinois and Wisconsin do not use identical systems, and he emphasized the Fourth Amendment while Werner relied principally on the Eighth Amendment. These distinctions are true but beside the point. The core conclusion of Werner is that the federal judiciary has not clearly established that sex offenders who lack a lawful place to live must nonetheless be released from prison. That conclusion does not depend on the particulars of the state systems or the constitutional provision a given plaintiff emphasizes. Brown does not identify any decision of a federal court establishing that sex offenders without approved living arrangements must be released. Instead he states the constitutional rule at a high level of generality (the Fourth Amendment forbids unreasonable seizures) and contends that this suffices. No, it doesn’t. As the Justices reiterated earlier this month:

‘clearly established law’ should not be defined ‘at a high level of generality.’. . . As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be ‘particularized’ to the facts of the case. . . . Otherwise, ‘[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity ... into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.’. . . [citing White v. Pauly] Federal courts have not particularized the sort of right Brown asserts, so the defendants are entitled to immunity from liability in damages.”)

Catledge v. City of Chicago, 666 F. App’x 558, ___ (7th Cir. 2016) (“That probable cause was so lacking in this case—at least if the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Catledge—also forecloses the defendants’ reliance on their defense of qualified immunity. On this question we disagree with the district court. A police officer loses the shield of qualified immunity if the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, demonstrate that the officer’s conduct constituted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches, including being free from searches of one’s vehicle if the police lack probable cause to conclude that it contains evidence of a crime, has been long established. And on this record a jury readily could conclude that Martin and Kappel, who have yet to offer their version of events, knew that they did not have probable cause to believe that Catledge had engaged in stalking or disorderly conduct. Instead a jury could find that the officers searched Catledge’s car knowing full well that he had done nothing more than pretend to be engaged in lawful use of a video camera on a public street. The officers argue that they have qualified immunity because there wasn’t yet a clear interpretation of the Illinois disorderly conduct statute. Again, they base this argument on Reher’s statement that it was unclear what type of ‘other suspicious circumstances’ would push ‘mere videotaping’ over the line into disorderly conduct. . . . But as we just explained, the officers have not identified any suspicious circumstances, so it is irrelevant that ambiguity may exist regarding the kinds of suspicious circumstances that might suggest disorderly conduct. And as we have noted repeatedly, after the Terry investigatory stop, the officers knew that Catledge was not engaged in videotaping at all.”)

Williams v. Hansen, 837 F.3d 809, 810-11 (7th Cir. 2016) (“Williams asserted in his deposition and affidavit that he had ordered the death certificate for use in state post-conviction proceedings rather than to save as a trophy of his crime, and the defendants have presented no contrary evidence to support their assumption that Williams wanted a trophy. And the prison could have avoided this controversy in the first place by holding on to the death certificate except for the short time needed to include it (or indeed just a xerox copy of it) in Williams’s court filing. The remaining defendants argue however that even if Williams has stated a claim for relief, they are insulated from liability because the right that he asserts was not clearly established when they violated it. Ashcroft v. Al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 735 (2011). Wrong. The right of a prison inmate to read the mail he receives, provided that his reading it would not infringe the prison’s legitimate interests, is, as noted above, clearly established.”) Rebirth Christian Academy Daycare, Inc. v. Brizzi, 835 F.3d 742, 746-49 (7th Cir. 2016) (“We. . . begin with the question whether the law clearly established that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. We conclude that the answer is yes. This question is not a close one, as the law on this issue has been clearly established for decades. . . . Thus, any reasonable government official would have understood that Rebirth had a property interest in its registration as a child care ministry. . . . Numerous Supreme Court decisions reinforce our conclusion that, because Rebirth was entitled to retain its registration unless it violated state law, Rebirth's ability to operate a registered child care ministry was a clearly protected property right at the time that the defendants revoked its registration. . . . These decisions thus demonstrate that the question whether Rebirth had a protected property interest in its registration was beyond debate. . . . It has long been clearly established that the 'root requirement' of due process is that a person 'be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest, except for extraordinary situations where some valid governmental interest is at stake that justifies postponing the hearing until after the event.' . . . Rebirth was clearly entitled to a pre-deprivation opportunity to challenge the proposed loss of its registration. We agree with the district judge's assessment—unchallenged by the appellees—'that the interest at stake here, to wit, [Rebirth's] interest in the continued operation of its child care business, is an important one.' . . . Moreover, the appellees have not identified any governmental interest that might have arguably justified their failure to provide Rebirth with an opportunity to be heard before depriving it of this significant property interest. The fact that the Bureau did not revoke the registration until two weeks after it gave Rebirth notice of the revocation further undermines any potential argument that the Bureau was responding to some perceived emergency necessitating that it quickly rescind Rebirth's registration without first giving it a chance to challenge the Bureau's allegations. We therefore conclude that, by revoking Rebirth's registration without first providing the organization with an opportunity to be heard, the appellees violated clearly established law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. The appellees argue that the proper inquiry is not whether Rebirth had a clearly established right to be heard before its registration was revoked but whether it had a clearly established right to an administrative appeal of the type available to license holders. We reject this argument. Contrary to the appellees' assertions, this is not a case about 'what amount of process is due.' Rather, this is a case in which due process clearly required some pre-deprivation opportunity to be heard and the appellees provided no opportunity for a hearing, though nothing prevented them from doing so. . . . [A]lthough the appellees are correct that no statutory provision requires an administrative appeal before the revocation of a registration, this does not mean that Brizzi and Gargano are excused from providing Rebirth with due process. True, the statutory scheme did not require that registered child care ministries receive an administrative appeal of the type afforded to license-holders, but neither did it prohibit the appellees from providing registered child care ministries with some type of pre-deprivation hearing. The issue then is whether Rebirth adequately alleged that the appellees personally decided to withhold from Rebirth the pre-deprivation hearing that they could have provided. We conclude that Rebirth's complaint plausibly alleges that Brizzi and Gargano were personally involved in depriving Rebirth of an opportunity for a pre-deprivation hearing, and thus the complaint satisfies the requirements of notice pleading. . . . In sum, we do not decide the type of pre-deprivation hearing that Rebirth was entitled to or that Rebirth shall now recover damages. We conclude only that Rebirth's complaint alleges that the appellees personally violated clearly established law by depriving Rebirth of a property interest

(its registration) without first providing Rebirth with any opportunity to be heard. Rebirth will, of course, need more than allegations to prevail on these claims; it will need evidence proving that these defendants were personally involved in the constitutional violation. Given the procedural posture of this case, the district court should, if necessary, provide Rebirth with an opportunity for additional discovery so that it may obtain such evidence.”)

Kristofek v. Village of Orland Hills, 832 F.3d 785, 798-99 (7th Cir. 2016) (“We have ‘long recognized that an employer may not retaliate against an employee for expressing his views about matters of public concern.’ . . . However, we typically conduct qualified-immunity inquiries by focusing on the ‘specific context in the case,’ rather than on a ‘broad general proposition.’ . . . Nevertheless, ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in [certain] instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’ . . . As discussed above, Kristofek has adequately demonstrated that Scully terminated him in retaliation for speaking out about potential political corruption involving senior officials within the police department. In addition, it was clearly established at the time of Scully’s actions that the First Amendment prohibited retaliating against a public employee because he had spoken with colleagues and with the FBI about public corruption. [citing cases] . . . So Scully is not entitled to qualified immunity on Kristofek’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Figgs v. Dawson, 829 F.3d 895, 905-06 (7th Cir. 2016) (“Fishel contends that ‘no clearly established constitutional rule established that [she] violated the Eighth Amendment by failing to recalculate Figgs’s sentence in response to his concerns or by referring it to’ the chief record office. This argument is flawed because it does not address the broader deficiencies with Fishel’s chosen course of action, which we have discussed above. The appropriate inquiry here is whether it was clearly established that Fishel’s failure to investigate the substance of Figgs’s complaints violated his constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than his sentence required. . . . At the time Figgs presented his complaints, it was clearly established by decisions in closely analogous cases that the failure to investigate a claim that an inmate is being held longer than the lawful term of his sentence violates the Eighth Amendment if it is the result of indifference. . . . While, to be clearly established, ‘a right must be specific to the relevant factual context of a cited case and not generalized with respect to the Amendment that is the basis of the claim,’ the ‘very action in question’ need not have previously been held unlawful for a public official to have reasonable notice of the illegality of some action. . . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Figgs, the evidence supports his claim that Fishel’s conduct violated his established constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Thus, Fishel is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Becker v. Elfreich, 821 F.3d 920, 926-30 (7th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e are not holding the ‘bite and hold’ technique is per se deadly force. . . . Rather, whether a ‘bite and hold’ technique constitutes deadly force ‘depends on how [the dog] is trained to behave when confronting a suspect.’ . . . [B]ased on the record, we cannot say whether the use of the ‘bite and hold’ constituted deadly force. But the force was clearly force at the higher end of the spectrum, and the government’s intrusion on Becker's rights was thus significant. . . . Reading the facts in the light most favorable to Becker, after his mother told him police were there to arrest him, Becker got dressed and started down the stairs within two minutes with his hands above his head. And just two seconds after he released Axel, Officer Elfreich encountered Becker toward the bottom of the stairs with his hands above his head. At this point, Officer Elfreich should have recognized that Becker was not hiding in the house but was in the process of surrendering. Further, when Officer Elfreich saw Becker on the stairs Becker had his hands in full view over his head and kept his hands there even while being bitten by Axel. Becker did not exhibit any sort of aggressive behavior toward Officer Elfreich or anyone else. . . . Nor was Becker actively resisting arrest or attempting to evade arrest by flight. Accordingly, while the initial release of Axel to find Becker may have been justified because the officers believed Becker was concealing himself in the house, once it became clear that Becker was not concealing himself, but was actually near the bottom of the staircase about 30 seconds after Officer Elfreich purportedly told him to come down, the force used by Officer Elfreich was no longer reasonable. . . . Under the facts as a whole, it was unreasonable for Officer Elfreich to pull Becker down three steps and place a knee in his back while allowing Axel to violently bite his leg. . . . Case law makes clear that officers cannot use significant force on a nonresisting or passively resisting suspect. Further, as we have often said, 'a case directly on point is not required for a right to be clearly established and "officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances."' Thus, the relevant case law did not need to involve a police dog in order to clearly establish the principle that you cannot allow a dog to violently attack such a suspect. . . . When Evansville police attempted to arrest Jamie Becker, Officer Elfreich released his police dog under the belief that Becker was hiding in the house. However, two seconds later, Officer Elfreich discovered Becker had been descending the stairs to surrender with his hands above his head. Nonetheless, Officer Elfreich continued to allow the police dog to bite Becker, while pulling him down three steps and placing his knee on his back and handcuffing him. And Becker suffered serious bodily injury as a result of the dog bite. While it is unclear from the record whether Axel presented a substantial risk of serious risk bodily harm (and thus deadly force), the force was clearly at the more severe end of the force spectrum. A jury could reasonably find such force was excessive. Further, because it was clearly established at the time of Becker's arrest that no more than minimal force was permissible to arrest a non-resisting, or passively resisting, suspect, Officer Elfreich was not entitled to qualified immunity on this record.") Alicea v. Thomas, 815 F.3d 283, 290-92 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Applying the Graham factors to Alicea's account, we do not find that Alicea, standing in broad daylight with his hands up at gunpoint and enclosed by a five-foot pool, posed a sufficient threat to Thomas to justify ordering Leo to attack and hold him. The district court erred in holding it was reasonable to command a dog to attack a suspect who had ceased flight, was effectively trapped, and who immediately complied with police orders. . . . We see even less of a basis to grant summary judgment to Officer Alvarez, taking all facts in a light most favorable to Alicea. At the point at which Alvarez first saw Alicea, Alicea's arm was in the jaws of a seventy-two pound dog. Two other officers were already at the scene. A reasonable officer would not think that punching, kicking, and stomping on Alicea was required to control the situation. It is true that Alicea was screaming, but there is no dispute that he was crying for help. . . . Officer Alvarez came upon Alicea when he was already seriously injured. Alicea was agitated, to be sure, but the source of his agitation was clear: he had just been attacked by a dog, and needed medical attention. Alicea testified at his deposition that he was already face-down, on the ground, when Alvarez began to punch, kick and stomp on him. At this point, however loudly Alicea was screaming, under his version of events, he simply did not present a threat that justified kicking, stomping, and punching him. . . . In sum, Alicea's factual account creates a material dispute as to whether Officer Alvarez used excessive force. Lack of medical documentation of his injuries, while potentially relevant to Alicea's credibility, is immaterial to the threshold question of whether Officer Alvarez's use of force was reasonable when the facts are viewed and reasonable inferences are drawn in Alicea's favor. . . . As explained above, we conclude that the evidence, taken in a light most favorable to Alicea, would permit a reasonable jury to find excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. So we turn to the question of whether Thomas's and Alvarez's actions violated clearly established law. . . . At the time of Alicea's arrest, it was clearly established that an officer may not use excessive force against an individual during an arrest. . . . It was also clearly established that using a significant level of force on a non-resisting or a passively resisting individual constitutes excessive force. . . . Commanding a dog to attack a suspect who is already complying with orders clearly violates the principles set forth in Holmes and Rambo. Punching, stomping and kicking a suspect who is on the ground and seriously injured similarly violates clearly established law. There is a material dispute as to whether Alicea was resisting arrest, both at the moment that Thomas commanded Leo to attack him, and at the moment that Alvarez arrived at the scene of the arrest and removed Alicea from the pool. There is also a material dispute as to the level of force that Alvarez used, described in detail above. . . . It was improper to grant qualified immunity to Thomas and Alvarez prior to a jury determining whether Alicea was, as he contends, fully complying with orders before the defendants used force to arrest him.”)

Gustafson v. Adkins, 803 F.3d 883, 892 (7th Cir. 2015)(“[T]he Supreme Court and this Circuit had clearly established the right of employees to be free from unreasonable employer searches by the time Adkins installed the hidden surveillance equipment in 2007. Adkins also claims that Gustafson failed to satisfy her burden of setting forth ‘existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . However, a broad constitutional test, such as the O'Connor plurality's reasonableness test, is sufficient to clearly establish the law ‘in an obvious case ... even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . . Because this is an obvious case that presents a flagrant Fourth Amendment violation, identification of a body of relevant case law is unnecessary. In sum, we find that O'Connor clearly established the contours of the Fourth Amendment violation Gustafson alleges. Therefore, the district court properly denied Adkins's motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.”) Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 831-33 (7th Cir. 2015) (on remand) (“The defendants next suggest that they should be able to avoid retrial because they are entitled to qualified immunity. Their argument is a nuanced one. In their view, the decision of the Supreme Court, resolving a circuit split in its decision in this case, altered the substantive law of liability. Because there was a division among the circuits on the state of the law at the time that they acted, they contend that they cannot be held liable for their actions. Although the matter of qualified immunity was brought to the attention of the Court, its instructions to us make no mention of our returning to this issue. In any event, we do not believe that this defense is a viable one here. . . . [I]n this case, the scope of the right in issue must be drawn more narrowly than the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from excessive force during his detention; instead, we must examine whether the law clearly established that the use of a Taser on a non-resisting detainee, lying prone and handcuffed behind his back, was constitutionally excessive. Here, the facts surrounding the underlying incident are in sharp dispute. When those facts are construed in the light most favorable to Mr. Kingsley, see Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), a reasonable officer was certainly on notice at the time of the occurrence that Mr. Kingsley's conduct did not justify the sort of force described in his account. According to Mr. Kingsley, he was not resisting the officers in a manner that justified slamming his head into the wall, using a Taser while he was manacled, and leaving him alone after use of that instrument. Our precedent makes clear that when the officers applied the Taser to Mr. Kingsley in May 2010, use of the Taser violated Mr. Kingsley's right to be free from excessive force if he was not resisting. . . . If we were to accept the defendants' argument here, we would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm. Here, before and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same. To accept the defense of qualified immunity here, we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose. As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable in light of the legitimate objectives of the institution. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.") Gevas v. McLaughlin, 798 F.3d 475, 485 (7th Cir. 2015) ("On the record before us, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the defendants were aware that Gevas was in danger of being harmed by Adkins, who was threatening to stab him, and yet did nothing to address that danger other than having previously made him aware that he had the option to refuse housing, be ticketed in response, and have himself transferred into disciplinary segregation. Expecting a prisoner to defy an order in pursuit of his own safety runs counter to the essential nature of incarceration as well as to cases emphasizing the need for order and discipline in the prison environment. . . . A prison official could not logically believe, in view of the duty imposed on him by the Eighth Amendment, Farmer, and other deliberate indifference cases, that requiring a prisoner to violate a prison directive (including his cell assignment) is a reasonable response to a substantial risk of the prisoner's cellmate attacking him. And the defendants may not now find refuge in the doctrine of qualified immunity simply because no case had previously rejected the specific defense that they have creatively fashioned, when the logic (or illogic) of that defense is so at odds with the respective duties that existing case law imposed on prisoner and prison official.”).

Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793, 803-05 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Wessel and Lay contend that they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity. . . Wessel and Lay contend that the intent requirement for a substantive due process claim was unsettled at the time of the restroom incident. They argue that a reasonable official could have believed at the time that the Eighth Amendment’s ‘malicious and sadistic’ excessive-force standard applied to a due process claim such as that asserted by Davis. . . They assert that ‘[t]here was insufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to infer that Wessel and Lay acted with the requisite subjective intent.’. . In making this determination, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis. . . Viewing the evidence in that light, a reasonable jury could have found that Wessel and Lay knew that Davis could not effectively use the restroom while wearing the hand restraints; they refused to remove the hand restraints despite knowing that Davis was old, frail, and not a security risk while in the windowless restroom; and they laughed at Davis as he urinated on himself and then refused to allow him to clean himself. . . Taken together, these findings allowed the jury to conclude that Wessel and Lay refused to remove Davis’s hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and causing psychological pain to Davis, and not for any legitimate security reason. At the time of the incident at issue, it was clearly established that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited the unreasonable use of bodily restraints in a manner that serves to punish a civilly committed individual. . . . The evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated the clearly established law governing substantive due process claims for excessive use of restraints. Even under the Eighth Amendment standard advocated by Wessel and Lay, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Davis demonstrates that Wessel and Lay violated clearly established law by refusing to remove Davis’s hand restraints for the purpose of humiliating and ridiculing Davis.”)

Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532-33, 556-57 (7th Cir. 2015) (“[A]t the time of the original investigation, it was clearly established under Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), and then Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), that bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence would violate a suspect’s due process rights. Brady made clear that the police and prosecution could not suppress exculpatory evidence. A reasonable police officer or prosecutor would not have concluded that he could instead destroy evidence to avoid disclosing it to the defense. . . . [W]hile there is some disagreement among courts about the conditions for obtaining a civil remedy for destruction of exculpatory evidence, those disagreements do not support a qualified immunity defense. It was clearly established in 2006 that the defendants’ alleged conduct of destroying the evidence would violate defendant’s due process rights. That is sufficient to defeat the qualified immunity defense. . . . Defendants argue that reasonable officials would not be aware that they violated a constitutional right in these circumstances—destroying evidence that would or could exculpate a criminal defendant detained in preparation for retrial. This argument is built on a basic misunderstanding about qualified immunity. The issue is not whether issues concerning the availability of a remedy are settled. The qualified immunity defense focuses instead on whether the official defendant's conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . This point is consistent with the way the Supreme Court has repeatedly described the defense of qualified immunity, in terms of whether the defendant official's 'actions' or 'conduct' violated clearly established law, not in terms of whether a defendant should have realized he would be held civilly liable for his actions or conduct. . . . Debate about the need for a trial or conviction goes to the question of injury, which is essential to proving liability but not relevant to qualified immunity. Focusing on the defendants' conduct—destroying a semen stain that had previously tested negative for Armstrong's DNA—it is clear that they had fair warning that this exculpatory evidence had to be preserved. Their alleged actions were objectively unreasonable in defying that command. The fact that their actions were so egregious as to cause dismissal of the charges before a retrial does not protect them from liability for injuries they caused. The district court correctly denied their motion to dismiss on the ground of qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Vill. of Arlington Heights, 782 F.3d 911, 916 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Even though dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds may be inappropriate in many cases, . . . in some cases it is proper; indeed, we have reversed the denial of qualified immunity at the pleading stage where appropriate, see, e.g., Chasensky v. Walker, 740 F.3d 1088, 1095–97 (7th Cir.2014) (holding that the plaintiff failed to establish a clearly established right and the district court erred in denying the defendants’ motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds); Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 633 (7th Cir.2007) (reversing denial of motion to dismiss plaintiff’s access-to-the-courts claim because officials were entitled to qualified immunity). The district court correctly determined that it was not clearly established that calling off another police officer or falsely reporting to dispatch that the scene was clear violates a constitutional right of a victim of private violence. Doe has not shown that it was clearly established that any other conduct or inaction of Del Boccio violated a constitutional right. Even assuming that the complaint alleges that Del Boccio violated Doe’s constitutional right, the law was not clearly established such that he should have known he was violating her rights. Therefore, Del Boccio is entitled to qualified immunity and Count IV against him was properly dismissed.”)

Beaman v. Freesmeyer, 776 F.3d 500, 509-10 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Beaman argues that Brady ‘has been on the books since 1963 and easily qualifies as clearly established law.’. . . The withholding of materially exculpatory evidence violates the Due Process Clause. . . . He contends that the novelty of the factual circumstance cannot excuse the Brady violation where it is well-established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence violate the defendant’s constitutional due process right. While it is true that the idea that police officers must turn over materially exculpatory evidence has been on the books since 1963, it certainly has not been on the books since 1963 that polygraph reports are materially exculpatory evidence. That is because in most states, polygraph reports are inadmissible at trial. . . . And a few months after Beaman’s trial concluded, the Supreme Court decided Wood v. Bartholomew, 516 U.S. 1, 116 S.Ct. 7, 133 L.Ed.2d 1 (1995). In Wood, the Court held that because polygraph results were not admissible at trial, the state’s failure to disclose the fact that a witness failed a polygraph test did not deprive a defendant of ‘material’ evidence under Brady, absent a reasonable likelihood that disclosure of the polygraph test could have had a direct effect on the outcome of the trial. . . . Even if the relevant inquiry was what the Illinois Supreme Court decided, that court’s determination in 2008 that the polygraph test could have affected the trial does not answer the question of whether, in 1995, it was clearly established that the officers needed to turn over inadmissible polygraph reports. . . . Beaman points to no cases pre–1995 where the Illinois Supreme Court, or any Illinois court for that matter, found that inadmissible polygraph tests, or any other type of inadmissible evidence, could constitute Brady material. Without such a case, it cannot be said that it was clearly established in 1995 that inadmissible polygraph reports were Brady material in Illinois. . . . Beaman also argues that it was clearly established in 1995 that evidence inculpatory of another suspect was Brady material. While that is true as a general matter, Beaman frames the question too broadly. In its broadest form, the relevant inquiry is whether inadmissible information inculpatory of another suspect could be Brady material. Again, Beaman points to no pre–1995 case from Illinois or the Supreme Court, and we are unable to find one, establishing that inadmissible evidence inculpatory of another suspect (to frame it broadly) or polygraph tests (to frame it narrowly) is Brady material. During the relevant time period, it was not clearly established that the results of a polygraph test, inadmissible at trial, constituted Brady material. Arguably, it was not until Wood—decided three months after Beaman’s trial concluded—that it became clearly established that inadmissible polygraph tests stood any chance of ever being Brady material. The question of whether and when inadmissible evidence can be Brady material remains an open question in many jurisdictions today. . . . Therefore we find that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to turn over the Murray polygraph report to the prosecution and Beaman’s defense counsel.”)

O’Keefe v. Chisholm, 769 F.3d 936, 942 (7th Cir. 2014) (“Plaintiffs’ claim to constitutional protection for raising funds to engage in issue advocacy coordinated with a politician’s campaign committee has not been established ‘beyond debate.’ To the contrary, there is a lively debate among judges and academic analysts. The Supreme Court regularly decides campaign-finance issues by closely divided votes. No opinion issued by the Supreme Court, or by any court of appeals, establishes (“clearly” or otherwise) that the First Amendment forbids regulation of coordination between campaign committees and issue-advocacy groups—let alone that the First Amendment forbids even an inquiry into that topic. The district court broke new ground. Its views may be vindicated, but until that day public officials enjoy the benefit of qualified immunity from liability in damages. This makes it unnecessary for us to consider whether any defendant also enjoys the benefit of absolute prosecutorial immunity, which depends on the capacities in which they may have acted at different times.”)

Seiser v. City of Chicago, 762 F.3d 647, 658 (7th Cir. 2014) (“At the point that the breathalyzer test was administered to Seiser, a reasonable police official would have believed in light of Carey and like cases that so long as there was probable cause to justify a breathalyzer examination, there was no need to consider seeking a warrant first. By the time Seiser was being processed at the Ninth District, nearly two and one-half hours had transpired since he was seen drinking from the liquor bottle, and an attempt to obtain a warrant, through whatever means, would have portended at least some further delay. Carey suggested that dispensing with a warrant application was a sound course. And as the McNeely decision recognizes, there was a prior division of authority among courts on this very point. . . Conflicting precedents present the very sort of uncertainty as to what the law requires that entitles a public official to qualified immunity.”)

Volkman v. Ryker, 736 F.3d 1084, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2013) (“The qualified immunity analysis . . . traditionally involves a two-part inquiry. The first question is whether the defendants’ conduct violated a constitutional right. . . The second question is whether that particular constitutional right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation. . . We may consider the two questions in either order. . . In this case, we begin by asking whether the right alleged to be violated is ‘clearly established.’ . . The cases Volkman has put forward demonstrate little more than that the First Amendment right against retaliation, writ large, is clearly established. But this is not so easy a case that citing to a general proposition of law is enough to show that any reasonable official would have known that to restrict or punish Volkman’s speech was unconstitutional. . . There are fact-intensive considerations at play, including whether Volkman spoke as a private citizen or in his capacity as a public employee, whether he spoke on a matter of public concern, and whether IDOC had an adequate justification for treating Volkman differently from any other member of the general public. . . The defendants highlighted the weakness of Volkman’s effort to show that his rights were clearly established in their response brief, but he did nothing to buttress his position in his reply. As a result, we need not say at exactly what level of specificity Volkman was required to show that his rights were clearly established on these facts; it is enough to note that what he has done is plainly not enough.”)

Hardaway v. Meyerhoff, 734 F.3d 740, 745 (7th Cir. 2013) (“As Hardaway admits in his appeal, ‘there is ambiguity among various Seventh Circuit cases regarding the proper baseline against which to measure conditions of disciplinary confinement.’ Although the district court would benefit from a bright-line rule on the types of conditions and duration of segregation give rise to a prisoner’s liberty interest, no such guidance has yet to be specifically addressed by this Court. Hence, even if Hardaway’s segregation amounted to the violation of a liberty interest, the Defendants should not be held responsible for incorrectly guessing otherwise due to the ambiguity of the parameters of the law. In sum, the right to avoid disciplinary segregation in a cell with a solid metal door and a confrontational cell mate for 182 days with weekly access to the shower and recreational yard was not a clearly established right in September 2009 when the conduct occurred. Therefore, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hobgood v. Illinois Gaming Bd., 731 F.3d 635, 648 (7th Cir. 2013) (“First, as we have described, the facts make out a violation of Hobgood’s right to be free from retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. Second, it was clearly established at the time of the Gaming Board’s actions that the First Amendment prohibited investigating and then suspending and terminating a public employee because he had helped another employee pursue a lawsuit aimed at uncovering and proving public corruption.”)

Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 628-32 (7th Cir. 2013) (“Currie filed her initial complaint on October 14, 2009, naming as defendants various jail officials, Williamson County, Chhabra and Reynolds, and Health Professionals, Ltd. The initial iterations of her complaint alleged that the defendants acted with ‘deliberate indifference’ to Okoro’s medical needs, suggesting a claim that the defendants violated Okoro’s due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . At the close of discovery, however, in response to the defendants’ motion for summary judgment, Currie argued for the first time that the Fourth Amendment’s ‘objectively unreasonable’ standard should govern. . . . Upon receipt of Currie’s revised complaint alleging ‘objectively unreasonable’ conduct, Chhabra, Reynolds, and Health Professionals filed a motion to dismiss, asserting qualified immunity ‘because the Fourth Amendment has not been applied to licensed medical professional[s] subcontracted to care for state detainees.’ The court denied this motion. Only Chhabra and Reynolds are before us on appeal. . . . The defendants’ real argument is that the Fourth Amendment never governs constitutional claims alleging inadequate provision of medical care to an arrestee by a nurse or doctor, regardless of the defendant’s employment arrangement. Although the Supreme Court has provided relatively little guidance regarding the constitutional rights of arrestees and pretrial detainees, . . . this court’s cases foreclose the defendants’ argument. [discussing cases] The defendants attempt to distinguish Ortiz, Williams, and Sides as cases involving the objectively unreasonable denial of medical care by jailers, not the objectively unreasonable provision of medical care by doctors and nurses. A jailer might violate an arrestee’s Fourth Amendment rights by unreasonably denying the arrestee access to insulin, the defendants urge, but a health care professional who unreasonably withholds insulin does not. This argument lacks support in law or logic. . . . True, the named defendants in our earlier Fourth Amendment medical-care cases were ‘lockup keepers’ (Ortiz and William) and police detectives (Lopez), but from the perspective of the arrestee, it matters not a whit whether it is the jailer or the doctor whose conduct deprives him of life-saving medical care. This is why our Fourth Amendment cases speak broadly of claims involving the ‘provision of medical care,’ . . . not simply the ‘denial of medical care by a jailer’ (as the defendants would have it). . . . The defendants next argue that even if their conduct violated Okoro’s Fourth Amendment rights, qualified immunity is proper because no previous decision ‘applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of health care provided by contracted medical professionals to arrestees being held by the police in jail.’ If there is any lack of clarity in our previous cases, however, it is only with respect to the threshold issue whether the defense of qualified immunity is ever available to private medical care providers like the defendants. . . . The Supreme Court recently considered the question whether ‘an individual hired by the government to do its work is prohibited from seeking [absolute or qualified] immunity, solely because he works for the government on something other than a permanent or full-time basis.’ . . . It held that ‘immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.’ . . . On the other hand, the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there; in so doing, the Court emphasized that the incentives of the private market suffice to protect employees when ‘a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... for profit and potentially in competition with other firms,’ assumes responsibility for managing an institution. . . . In a detailed opinion tracking the Court's analysis in Filarsky, the Sixth Circuit recently held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir.2012) (discussing the historical roots of immunity for similarly situated parties and the history and purpose of § 1983); see also Hasher v. Hayman, 2013 WL 1288205 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2013) (private medical employees failed to establish that they are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense, 'even after Filarsky'). We find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive, though we need not definitively decide the issue today; even if our defendants were entitled to seek qualified immunity as a general matter, we would conclude that the defense is not applicable here. The contours of Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right' throughout the period of Okoro's detention. . . . As we already have explained, nothing in our opinions hints at some special Fourth Amendment exemption for health care professionals . . . It was 'quite clear' in 2004, we said, 'that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing.' . . It was no less clear in December 2008, when Okoro collapsed in his cell, that the same Fourth Amendment standard applies to the wrongdoing alleged here.")

Chrzanowski v. Bianchi, 725 F.3d 734, 742, 743 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Given our rationale in the Fairley line of cases, we have little trouble concluding that reasonable officials in the defendants' shoes would understand that retaliating against Chrzanowski for giving truthful grand jury and trial testimony would violate the First Amendment. . . . Defendants point out that Morales involved testimony in the civil context, whereas this case involves testimony in criminal proceedings, but this is a distinction without a difference: providing eyewitness testimony regarding potential wrongdoing, civil or criminal, was never 'part of what [Chrzanowski] was employed to do.' Chrzanowski's rights were clearly established at all relevant times.")

Humphries v. Milwaukee County, 702 F.3d 1003, 1004, 1007 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Although Humphries maintains that the denial of her application violated her right to due process, we agree with Muniz and his supervisor that qualified immunity protects them from any liability for this decision. They had no involvement whatsoever in the investigation or determination of the 1988 finding of substantiated abuse, and no case law clearly establishes that they violated Humphries's constitutional rights when they relied on that finding to deny her child care provider renewal application. Therefore, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Muniz and his supervisor on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . None of the case law to which Humphries points holds that persons without a role in the abuse determination may not later rely on such a determination without first independently ensuring the determination was made in accordance with due process.")

Betker v. Gomez, 692 F.3d 854, 864 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The question is whether, at the time of the violation in this case, a 'reasonably well-trained police officer would have known that the arrest was illegal.' . . In 1985, we held in Olson that immunity does not extend '[w]here the judicial finding of probable cause is based solely on information the officer knew to be false or would have known was false had he not recklessly disregarded the truth.’ . . In 1992, in Juriss v. McGowan, we stripped an officer of qualified immunity where only his false and misleading statements provided probable cause to arrest a woman for aiding a fugitive. . . We reiterated this point in Knox, 342 F.3d at 658 (‘We have held in previous cases that a warrant request violates the Fourth Amendment if the requesting officer knowingly, intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth, makes false statements in requesting the warrant and the false statements were necessary to the determination that a warrant should issue.’). And this principle has been firmly established in the criminal context since the Supreme Court decided Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978). . . . In the civil context, the plaintiff need only ‘point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct in order to defeat qualified immunity.’ . . We think there are plenty. So Officer Gomez is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.”)

Levin v. Madigan, 692 F.3d 607, 622 (7th Cir. 2012), cert. dismissed as improvidently granted by Madigan v. Levin, 134 S. Ct. 2 (2013) (“Because the ADEA does not preclude Levin’s § 1983 equal protection claim, we now turn to the issue of qualified immunity. . . . At the time of the alleged wrongdoing, it was clearly established that age discrimination in employment violates the Equal Protection Clause. . . Although age is not a suspect classification, states may not discriminate on that basis if such discrimination is not ‘rationally related to a legitimate state interest.’ . . Whether or not the ADEA is the exclusive remedy for plaintiffs suffering age discrimination in employment is irrelevant, and as Judge Chang noted, it is ‘odd to apply qualified immunity in the context where the procedural uncertainty arises from the fact that Congress created a statutory remedy for age discrimination that is substantively *broad*er than the equal protection clause.’ . . Because Levin’s constitutional right was clearly established, the Individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Estate of Miller, ex rel. Bertram v. Tobiasz, 680 F.3d 984, 991 (7th Cir. 2012) (“Having established that plaintiff has alleged facts that, if proven, show the defendants violated a constitutional right, we must evaluate whether they would be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis; that the constitutional right must be clearly established. The defendants urge this Court to apply a very high threshold for this prong. They argue for an examination of this prong in such a specific manner that virtually nothing besides intentionally harmful actions could be ‘clearly established.’ Under defendants’ analysis, for a right to be clearly established there must be precedent holding that a prisoner has a constitutional right specific to the conduct alleged. However, the cases in this circuit have understood the term ‘right’ in a broader sense. For example, in Cavalieri v. Shepard, we stated that the right that Cavalieri was asserting is ‘the right to be free from deliberate indifference to suicide.’ 321 F.3d 616, 623 (7th Cir.2003) (citing Hall v. Ryan, 957 F.2d 402, 406 (7th Cir.1992). Here, plaintiff asserts the same right. We therefore conclude that that right was clearly established in 2009 as it was in 1998.”) Grayson v. Schuler, 666 F.3d 450, 451, 455 (7th Cir. 2012) (“Inmates’ complaints that prison authorities have infringed their religious rights commonly include a claim under the Religious

Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc et seq., which confers greater religious rights on prisoners than the free exercise clause has been interpreted to do. . . The plaintiff doesn't mention the Act, but he is proceeding pro se and in such cases we interpret the free exercise claim to include the statutory claim. . . But the Act can no longer do him any good. Although his complaint is none too clear, he appears to be seeking damages against the defendant in both the latter's official capacity and his personal capacity, and the former claim is barred by the state's sovereign immunity, Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651, 1658–61 (2011); Vinning–El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591, 592 (7th Cir.2011), and the latter claim cannot be based on the Act because the Act does not create a cause of action against state employees in their personal capacity. . . It does authorize injunctive relief, which the plaintiff initially sought along with damages, but he's since been released from prison, so his injunctive claim is moot and he is left with his personal-capacity damages claim under section 1983. . . . Since, however, '[qualified] immunity protects public employees who make reasonable errors in applying even clearly established law,' Vinning–El v. Evans, supra, 657 F.3d at 594, the defendant is entitled to immunity if he committed a reasonable error in failing to apply clearly established law—that is, if he reasonably thought the plaintiff insincere in his religious belief, or a security threat. But there is no suggestion that the defendant ordered the plaintiff's dreadlocks shorn because of a reasonable belief in either of these possibilities. He seems just to have been applying the Rastafarian exception, which could not reasonably be thought constitutional. So neither on substantive nor immunity grounds can the grant of summary judgment be upheld. The judgment is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Surita v. Hyde, 665 F.3d 860, 873, 874 (7th Cir. 2011) (“Here, Hyde’s purpose in silencing Surita is apparent from his words at the city council meeting: he demanded that Surita apologize to Figueroa before he would be allowed to speak. A reasonable person in January 2004 would have known that silencing Surita for that purpose was constitutionally impermissible. Thus, the denial of qualified immunity on this theory is affirmed. . . . Recently, in Greene v. Doruff, 660 F.3d 975 (7th Cir.2011), we addressed the tension in our cases between motivating-factor causation and but-for causation, clarifying that First Amendment cases are governed not by Gross but by Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977). Greene, 660 F.3d at 977. We noted that Spiegla and Fairley are correct to an extent because the burden of proof relating to causation is divided between the parties in First Amendment cases. . . To meet the prima facie burden regarding causation in a First Amendment case, a plaintiff needs to show only that the defendant’s conduct was a motivating factor, i.e., a ‘sufficient factor,’ meaning when something present makes something else bound to happen. . . The defendant can then rebut that showing, but only by establishing that his or her conduct was not a but-for or ‘necessary condition’ of the harm, i.e., that the harm would have occurred anyway. . . Thus, Judge Shadur was not wrong in referencing a burden-shifting test that included a plaintiff’s burden to show a motivating factor. Moreover, at the summary judgment stage the burden-shifting test is used to determine whether a plaintiff makes it to trial. Even as we stated in Fairley, if evidence exists upon which a reasonable jury could find but-for causation, no more is necessary to overcome a defendant’s summary judgment motion. Here, viewing the facts in Surita’s favor, his speech at the Belvidere Mall was protected. Hyde argues that he was not motivated to suppress Surita's point of view but only the threatening manner in which Surita's view was delivered. However, Hyde's comments during the city council meeting indicate that Surita was silenced to induce him to apologize for the Belvidere Mall speech; by Hyde's own words, excluding Surita from speaking was a reaction to what Surita said at the Belvidere Mall. Thus, Hyde's comments at the meeting provide evidence that the Belvidere Mall speech was the cause (whether motivating or but-for) that prevented Surita from expressing his views at the city council meeting. Even before January 2004 an official's act taken in retaliation for the exercise of free speech under the First Amendment was recognized to violate the Constitution. Vukadinovich and Abrams, decided in 2002, made clear that Hyde could not retaliate against someone for protected First Amendment speech, whether acting pursuant to a but-for motive or a substantially motivating one. Hence, a reasonable official in January 2004 would have known he could not retaliate.")

Hernandez ex rel. Hernandez v. Foster, 657 F.3d 463, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2011) ("At the time of Jaymz's removal, our case law did not put a reasonable DCFS investigator, supervisor, or manager on notice that removing Jaymz without a pre-deprivation hearing violated the plaintiffs' clearly established procedural due process rights. Jensen had indicated that the removal was lawful as long as there was probable cause to believe that Jaymz would be subject to the danger of abuse if not removed, and a post-deprivation hearing was held within two business days. We have concluded that a reasonable DCFS worker could have believed there was probable cause to remove Jaymz. . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the due process claim arising from Jaymz's initial removal. But the process due with respect to the allegedly coerced safety plan is another matter. Due process 'requires that government officials not misrepresent the facts in order to obtain the removal of a child from his parents.' . . This conclusion applies equally in the context of obtaining parental consent to a restrictive safety plan. Under Dupuy, the state may not threaten to infringe parental custody rights when the state has no legal right to carry through on the threat. . . If Foster misrepresented the facts and Crystelle's and Joshua's legal rights in order to obtain their consent to the safety plan, their agreement to the safety plan was not voluntary and they were illegally coerced into signing the plan. Hence, they would have been denied due process. . . The plaintiffs have created a triable issue as to whether a reasonable parent in their situation would have felt free to refuse to sign the safety plan. Therefore, they have enough evidence to raise a genuine issue as to whether they were coerced into agreeing to the safety plan.")

Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 538, 539 (7th Cir. 2011) ("In light of our decision to reverse the grant of summary judgment in favor of the seven defendants mentioned above, we must address the defendants' qualified immunity defense. They argue that the uncertainty over whether the 'deliberate indifference' or 'objectively unreasonable' standard governs the medical care claim entitles them to qualified immunity. They argue that until 2007, when we decided Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392 (7th Cir. 2007), and Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820 (7th Cir. 2007), no decision had applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of the provision of medical care to arrestees. While that may be true, we have long held that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing. . . The multifactor test announced in Sides and clarified in Williams was unannounced at the time of Molina's death, yet it was quite clear that the Fourth Amendment applied to her stage of the criminal process. But even if we were to assume that the standard we have applied in this case was not clearly established at the time Molina died, the outcome of this case would be unaffected. To survive summary judgment, Ortiz would then be required to satisfy the more stringent deliberate indifference standard. This, however, is not a case that turns on the difference between the two standards. Ortiz's argument, if credited by a jury, satisfies the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that defendants were subjectively aware that Molina had a serious medical condition that needed care and they failed to respond adequately. . . The defendants do not argue that Molina did not suffer from an objectively serious medical condition. The question is only whether the officers' failure to act was not only negligent, but deliberately indifferent. Yet it is well settled that providing no medical care in the face of a serious health risk constitutes deliberate indifference. . . This is not a case where prison officials provided substandard medical care and we must decide whether they crossed the line from medical malpractice (negligence) to deliberate indifference (recklessness). Ortiz's claim is that each of the defendants knew that Molina suffered from a serious medical condition, yet they failed to take any step in response. At this stage, she has done enough to defeat summary judgment even if the higher standard applied. We therefore conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Ammons v. Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 648 F.3d 1020, 1026-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Courts are given the discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . Here, it is difficult to assess whether the facts alleged by Ammons establish the alleged constitutional violation without setting forth the governing law. Therefore, we first examine the clearly established law with respect to the alleged Fourteenth Amendment violation, and then determine whether the facts before us support such a violation. . . .[A]t the time the events alleged in this case took place, it was clearly established that LaFond and Webster, as state officials, had a duty to exercise professional judgment to provide safe conditions for Ammons and the other patients at CSTC. . . .In light of the clearly established law that hospital officials must provide safe conditions for involuntarily committed patients, we now examine the circumstances under which state hospital officials may be held responsible for failing to do so. . . . Youngberg and Neely serve as pre-existing, clearly established law as to what conduct supports infringement of the Fourteenth Amendment rights of involuntarily committed hospital patients. At the time of the alleged events, then, it was clear that the actions of LaFond and Webster violated the Constitution if they ran afoul of the objective Youngberg professional judgment standard as applied in Neely. . . . Under Neely, a jury could find that a reasonable administrator, exercising professional judgment with respect to providing safe conditions, would have taken Resident A's allegation into account when assigning and supervising staff members in cottages where female patients resided. While LaFond had no cause to discipline Grant, because he had been exonerated of the molestation charge, she certainly had reason, in light of her duties with respect to the safety of her patients, to manage and monitor his duties more carefully. Instead, LaFond allowed Grant to gain unfettered and unmonitored access to the female residents, and to spend time with them on a one-on-one basis. . . . We hold that, under the facts alleged and produced, LaFond's apparent inaction and poor supervision with respect to the safety of Ammons and the other female patients support a finding that she failed to exercise professional judgment, and thereby violated the Fourteenth Amendment." [footnotes omitted])

Florek v. Village of Mundelein, Ill., 649 F.3d 594, 601 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Florek points to no case where a court has held that police acted unreasonably when they summoned emergency medical personnel instead of supplying non-prescription medication to an arrestee, nor has she pointed to other authority that might help her in making the argument. We located no helpful authority on her behalf, and a straightforward application of our precedent militates against her position. Thus, summary judgment on the merits was appropriate as to Hansen, and that means that judgment for the Village was proper as well.")

Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 746, 747 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The underlying problem is the basic idiocy of a permit system that does not allow a permit for a march to be granted if the date of the march can't be fixed in advance, but does allow the police to waive the permit requirement just by not prohibiting the demonstration. . . . The defendants' lawyer at oral argument was unable to come up with a reason for such a rule. As a result not of the rule itself but of the failure to plug the hole in it, the police did not know what the route of the march would be and, reacting ad hoc and perhaps in some panic, resorted to mass arrests without justification. Or so at least a trier of fact could find on the record compiled to date. The district judge ruled that it was not clearly established law on March 20, 2003, that police cannot upon revocation of a permit arrest any demonstrator who does not immediately cease demonstrating and leave the scene. If this is right, then the judge's ruling that the police are protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity from liability in damages to any demonstrator or suspected demonstrator who was arrested is also right. But the premise is wrong. The Supreme Court had held decades earlier that police must give notice of revocation of permission to demonstrate before they can begin arresting demonstrators. . . . No precedent should be necessary, moreover, to establish that the Fourth Amendment does not permit the police to say to a person go ahead and march and then, five minutes later, having revoked the permission for the march without notice to anyone, arrest the person for having marched without police permission. . . . So this is one of those cases in which a defense of immunity would fail even in the absence of a precedent that had established the illegality of the defendants' conduct. . . . The absence of a reported case with similar facts may demonstrate nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.")

Roe v. Elyea, 631 F.3d 843, 859, 861 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Dr. Elyea inaugurated a protocol for hepatitis C treatment that categorically required that all candidates for antiviral therapy—despite their particular genotype—have at least two years left on their sentence. This categorical rule, the plaintiffs submit, deprived them of necessary treatment that would have been effective. This rule was grounded, they further contend, in consideration of administrative convenience rather than medical effectiveness. . . . The evidence permitted, although it did not compel, the jury to conclude that Dr. Elyea's policy prevented treating physicians from exercising any professional judgment as to whether to commence interferon treatment for inmates who could complete the prescribed course of treatment during the remaining period of their incarceration. Mr. Roe's records reflect that on several occasions his physicians identified him as not a candidate for treatment because of the policy. . . Under these circumstances, we believe that the district court properly denied, each time it was presented, Dr. Elyea's invocation of qualified immunity.")

Purvis v. Oest, 614 F.3d 713, 721 (7th Cir. 2010) ("There is no case law of the U.S. Courts of Appeals or Supreme Court of which we are aware that demonstrates that Purvis's constitutional rights would have been violated by reporting her to a body that would perform an independent investigation before effecting a deprivation. . . . It was clearly established that due process was denied by the introduction of a fundamental conflict of interest into the investigative process. But it was not clearly established that such a procedural defect violated the Constitution if whatever conclusion eventuated was subject to confirmation and validation by a subsequent independent investigation.")

T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 590 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Grindle argues that because none of our decisions have explicitly adopted Stoneking, it cannot be considered clearly established for the purpose of qualified immunity. Grindle's argument misses the mark. . . . While district court decisions alone do not clearly establish a right for the purpose of qualified immunity, the number and unanimity of these decisions, combined with our circuit-level precedent, show that a reasonable school principal would have concluded that she could be held liable for turning a blind eye to and affirmatively covering up evidence of child sexual abuse by one of her teachers.").

Catlin v. City of Wheaton, 574 F.3d 361, 369 (7th Cir. 2009) ("If there is a legitimate question as to the existence of the right at issue, then qualified immunity attaches. . . . In the present case, even if the defendants had consulted a casebook prior to formulating their plan, they still would not have had fair notice that they had a constitutional obligation to announce their identity prior to completing [an] arrest [in a public place].")

Narducci v. Moore, 572 F.3d 313, 322, 323 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although there was 'no square holding addressing whether recording an employee's phone calls violates his Fourth Amendment rights,' court holds it was sufficiently clear that government employees enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the workplace to preclude qualified immunity.").

Matrisciano v. Randle, 569 F.3d 723, 730, 731, 735, 736 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Although we ultimately decide this case on account of the failure to meet the 'clearly established' requirement, some examination of the alleged constitutional right that was violated is helpful in understanding whether such a right was clearly established at the relevant time. Matrisciano argues that the defendants retaliated against him, in a manner contrary to the protections guaranteed by the First Amendment, by reassigning him after he testified before the Prisoner Review Board in support of Aleman's release. . . . Matrisciano voluntarily testified before the Board on a day that he took off from work. His job description does not hint at voluntary testimony before the Board. In short, we find no evidence that Matrisciano spoke to the Board pursuant to his official duties, and the defendants do not argue otherwise. . . . In these particular circumstances, the law at the time was not such that reasonable officials would know that transferring Matrisciano after his testimony before the Board was unlawful. . . . This is also not an obvious case. Aleman was an infamous prisoner known to have bribed a government official, and an Assistant Deputy Director in the Department of Corrections voluntarily made his first Prisoner Review Board comments on behalf of that inmate, without any special knowledge of the inmate's daily behavior in custody. None of the cases to which Matrisciano points put the defendants on notice that reassigning him as a result of this testimony violated the Constitution.”).

Carvajal v. Dominguez, 542 F.3d 561, 569, 570 (7th Cir. 2008) (“The district court reached the second step of qualified immunity analysis in concluding that the obligation to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information would have been clear to a reasonable law enforcement officer. Given our conclusion that no Brady violation occurred here, we do not need to evaluate that aspect of the ruling. Nonetheless, a more careful examination of this question should have produced a different result. The question at this step, if reached, would not be whether a law enforcement officer would clearly know that he had to disclose impeaching or exculpatory information. That assumed the result. Rather, the question should have been whether it was clear that a law enforcement officer would have been expected to disclose whether he had seen a photo of a suspect before he went to a potentially dangerous undercover meeting with that individual. As noted, good police practices and common sense would suggest that an officer ought to prepare in that way. We are aware of no case which clearly indicates, or even hints, for that matter, that a law enforcement officer would be expected to disclose that he had undertaken such preparation. It is about the equivalent of strapping on a concealed weapon or reviewing a suspect's prior criminal history before attending such an undercover encounter. Unless clear guidance is given that such a practice must be disclosed as potentially impeaching or exculpatory, the broad protection of qualified immunity should protect a law enforcement officer from liability for failure to mention viewing a suspect's photo before meeting with him.”).

Lee v. Young, 533 F.3d 505, 512 (7th Cir. 2008) (“While we agree with the district court's overall disposition of the case, we pause to note that we explicitly do not affirm its rulings regarding qualified immunity The district court concluded, in error, that no factually similar cases were on point, and so the contours of the right at issue were not clearly defined. In Alvarado v. Litscher, 267 F.3d 648, 653 (7th Cir.1999), we explicitly held that ‘[g]iven the decision in Helling, the right of a prisoner to not be subjected to a serious risk of his future health resulting from ETS was clearly established in 1998-99.’ Since this right was clearly established in 1998-1999, it was also clearly established during the relevant period of time here, 2001-2002. Nevertheless, the district court did not have to rule on the issue of qualified immunity, and neither do we, since the first prong of the test (i.e., defendants violated plaintiff's constitutional rights) has not been met, as detailed above.”).

Michael C. v. Gresbach, 526 F.3d 1008, 1017, 1018 (7th Cir. 2008) (“Considering the facts above in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, we find that a reasonable child welfare worker would have known that conducting a search of a child’s body under his clothes, on private property, without consent or the presence of any other exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment, is in direct violation of the child’s constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches. Gresbach argues that Heck is distinguishable from this case, because Heck did not address the issue of scope of consent in the context of child abuse investigations. However, a general constitutional rule already identified may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful. . . . At the time Gresbach conducted the searches at Good Hope in 2004, there was a clearly established doctrine as to what actions a Bureau caseworker must take when conducting a child abuse investigation at a private school. Today we reiterate Heck’s definitive holding, along the lines of the Fourth Amendment principles outlined above, that it is a violation of a child’s constitutional rights to conduct a search of a child at a private school without a warrant or probable cause, consent, or exigent circumstances.”).

Koger v. Bryan, 523 F.3d 789, 802, 803 (7th Cir. 2008) (“RLUIPA was enacted on September 22, 2000. . . Koger filed his requests for a non-meat diet in May 2001, December 2001, and April 2002. His internal grievance was filed in January 2002. Because of the dearth of cases dealing with RLUIPA during this period, Koger must show that RLUIPA itself, or principles established in other contexts and applicable to RLUIPA, established the contours of his rights so that a reasonable official could have easily discerned them. There are numerous reasons leading us to conclude that the rights protected by RLUIPA, and violated by the prison officials as set forth above, were clearly established during the period the prison officials denied Koger’s dietary requests. First, RLUIPA did not announce a right having broad application across many segments of society. Rather, it prohibited substantially burdening religious exercise in only two contexts: by land use regulation, 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc, or while a person is imprisoned. 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1. Moreover, RLUIPA did not announce a new standard, but shored up protections Congress had been attempting to provide since 1993 by means of the RFRA, and which had seen frequent litigation in the prison context. . . . Aside from the fact that RLUIPA employs a standard already contained in the RFRA, it is noteworthy that the components of its analysis have been used in constitutional litigation for some time. For example, the difficult burden laid on a defendant who must show that its conduct was the ‘least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest’ has been established for decades. . . . Similarly, the prohibition against substantially burdening sincerely held religious beliefs is well-established in Free Exercise Clause cases. . . . RLUIPA has a broader scope of protection than ‘central religious beliefs or practices,’ but Congress cleared up any resulting ambiguity by expressly setting forth what is included within that broader protective scope—‘any exercise of religion, whether or not compelled by, or central to, a system of religious belief.’. . . While the case will undoubtedly arise where a plaintiff asserts a right only questionably covered by RLUIPA, Koger asserted the right to religious accommodation for a religious practice demonstrably associated with, though not compelled by, his religion. The prison officials violated this clearly established right because they required exactly what RLUIPA provides they cannot—a religious practice compelled by OTO. Likewise, in requiring clergy verification, the prison officials employed a clergy-as-arbiter-of-orthodoxy standard that had long been rejected. . . Finally, we note that the only other circuit court to have considered this issue held that ‘[a]lthough the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time [of the defendant’s conduct], its core protections were not.’ [citing Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174 (4th Cir. 2006)] Accordingly, Koger’s right not to be subjected to a religiously required test or a clergy verification requirement was clearly established when the prison officials employed both. Those rights being clearly established at the relevant time, we conclude that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 632, 633 (7th Cir. 2007) (“We have found no case that is directly analogous to the alleged misconduct of the police here. (This is essentially good news: we sincerely hope that this type of behavior is rare.) We therefore must decide whether the alleged actions were ‘so egregious’ that no reasonable person could have believed that they were permissible. This is the approach that the Supreme Court took in its decisions in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 265 (1997), and Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 740 (2002), both of which focused on whether a reasonable person would know that the challenged behavior violated a constitutional right and held that there need not be case law on point so long as the official had ‘fair warning’ that her conduct was impermissible. . . In urging this court not to dispense with the need to find a closely analogous case, the ISP Officials rely on Denius v. Dunlap, 209 F.3d 944, 951 (7th Cir.2000), which held that ‘[i]n some rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious, the plaintiff may not be required to present the court with any analogous cases.’ Id. at 951. But Denius’s use of the word ‘rare’ did not mean that the second route should normally be closed. To the contrary, Denius noted that ‘widespread compliance with a clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated.’ . . We are persuaded that the ISP Officials, and indeed all of the police officers involved in this case, had ample notice that the knowing suppression of exculpatory material that was in the files at the time of the trial violated the defendant’s constitutional rights. If, as we held in Newsome, the duty to disclose was clearly established as of 1979 and 1980, then it remained clearly established at Steidl’s initial trial in 1987 and throughout his post-trial proceedings. Supervisors in the Illinois State Police cannot have thought that they were permitted deliberately to obstruct the access to this evidence of the post-conviction court and the Governor’s Office, which has its own role to play in the state’s criminal justice system. By the time these officials acted, Kyles v. Whitley was also on the books, eliminating any doubt about the joint responsibility of the police and prosecutors to assure the fair administration of the criminal justice system. Much of our discussion of the scope of the right Steidl is asserting applies with equal force to the question whether that right was clearly established, as we have taken care to rely on cases and doctrines that were in place before these officials acted. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly denied the ISP Officials’ motion for dismissal based on qualified immunity.”).

Boyd v. Owen, 481 F.3d 520, 523, 524 (7th Cir. 2007) (“The district court appears to have conflated the two prongs of the qualified immunity test. The court held that Boyd possessed a protected liberty interest in his employment as a police officer. The court then recognized that our decision in Dupuy could not clearly establish any due process violation because it was issued after the events at issue in the case. The court nevertheless held that Foott and Owen violated Boyd's clearly established constitutional right to due process because 'DCFS' own rules and regulations imposed a duty to identify other possible explanations for the abuse,' and Owen and Foott failed to do so. . . The district court properly held that our Dupuy decision could not demonstrate a clearly established right because it did not exist when these events occurred, but its alternative reasoning is erroneous. The Supreme Court has made clear the requirement of due process is not defined by state rules and regulations, but is an independent determination. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in determining that the failure to comply with DCFS regulations demonstrated a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.").

Borello v. Allison, 446 F.3d 742, 749, 750 (7th Cir. 2006) ("Because Defendant has not shown that his constitutional rights were violated, we need not move to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the attack. We note, however, that the district court improperly simplified this second step, finding that '[i]t is untenable to say that prison officials don't know what actions in this area are illegal.' This analysis relieved Plaintiff of his burden of proof. . . . The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . It is insufficient for a plaintiff simply to point to a recognized constitutional right and claim that the right has been violated. A plaintiff is required to show that a violation of that right has been found in factually similar cases, or that the violation was so clear that an official would realize he or she was violating an inmate's constitutional rights even in the absence of an on-point case. . . Although it is well established that a plaintiff can bring an Eighth Amendment claim based on a prison official's deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, there is still a question whether the facts of this case are sufficient to establish deliberate indifference. The purpose of the second step of the qualified immunity analysis is to ensure that prison officials will not be held personally liable for their official conduct when they were not aware that their conduct violated any of an inmate's constitutional rights. Plaintiff has not attempted to compare this case to any factually similar ones, or argue that the violation was so obvious that Defendants should have been on notice that their actions constituted deliberate indifference.").

Miller v. Jones, 444 F.3d 929, 939 (7th Cir. 2006) ("To leap from the simple observation that the boundaries of what constitutes public concern require some searching, to the argument that after San Diego 'no reasonable law enforcement official' may be expected to determine what is appropriate behavior in this realm, is a step too far. Nothing in San Diego reformed the core of our jurisprudence on the matter. Nor did San Diego strike down Delgado, where we held that employee speech on a matter of public concern was protected under the First Amendment, and therefore protected against retaliatory transfers, when it grew out of some discretionary act. . . For examples of similar factual scenarios, Chief Jones may have turned to our holding in Campbell v. Touse, where we held that a police officer's speech criticizing the management of a community-oriented policing program was a matter of public concern. . . Additionally, Jones may have turned to Knapp v. Whitaker, wherein we held a public school teacher had spoken on a matter of public concern when protesting an inequitable reimbursement scheme for expenses incurred in coaching students. . . The core of the public concern in Knapp was the misuse of funds intended for the school's athletic program; a secondary mission of the school system, to be sure. . . Finally, should former Chief of Police Jones have needed personal notice that the retaliatory transfer of public employees for speech protected by the First Amendment is subject to suit under § 1983, he need only look to our holding in Octavio Delgado v. Police Chief Arthur Jones and Deputy Chief Monica Ray, 282 F.3d 511, Mar. 8, 2002, decided against the appellant himself in the same month during which the merger was first proposed.”).

Wernsing v. Thompson, 423 F.3d 732, 747, 748 (7th Cir. 2005) (“We are satisfied that Thompson is entitled to qualified immunity, though not for the precise reasons he advances. Simply put, Thompson must prevail in the present suit since it was not clearly established, at the time the pre-clearance directive was first issued (December 5, 2000), that such a directive constituted an unlawful prior restraint on speech. Of course the case law on prior restraints is replete with decisions invalidating zoning ordinances, licensing schemes, permit regulations and other official acts that limit expressive activity. Additionally, our recent decision in Crue v. Aiken, where we held a similar pre-clearance directive to constitute an unlawful prior restraint on speech, casts serious doubt upon the legality of Thompson’s directive. . . However, while the constitutional limits of restraints applicable to the general public are well-settled, and while the Supreme Court has struck down formal statutory bans of certain speech activity by government employees, . . . the prerogatives of a government supervisor in managing the communications of his own staff are far less clear. We emphasize that our analysis of qualified immunity here is focused specifically and exclusively on this kind of relatively informal supervisory directive aimed at close subordinates. . . In December 2000 case law touching on this kind of internal pre-clearance directive was decidedly scant and, to the extent that it existed at all, actually suggested that such directives are permissible.”).

Nanda v. Moss, 412 F.3d 836, 844, 845 (7th Cir. 2005) (“We find that a reasonable dean or university administrator was on notice as of 1998 that it would be a violation of federal law to ratify a recommendation to terminate a female professor without investigation into several allegations of gender and ethnic discrimination surrounding the recommendation, and then to falsely report that the recommendation was made with the approval of faculty and an advisory committee.”).

Kiddy-Brown v. Blagojevich, 408 F.3d 346, 356 (7th Cir. 2005) (“The State defendants contend that it was not clearly established at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown’s employment was terminated that dismissing the warden at a state prison would violate the Constitution. They submit that ‘there are no closely analogous cases ... involving the position at issue—Warden of a state correctional institution.’ . . However, the law of qualified immunity does not require a plaintiff to produce a case that is ‘directly on point’ in order to show that a right is clearly established. . . . As we noted earlier, because this case is before us on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, we are obliged—as was the district court—to view the facts alleged in Ms. Kiddy-Brown’s complaint in the light most favorable to her. . . According to Ms. Kiddy-Brown, she had no ‘discretionary policymaking powers’ and ‘no meaningful input into government decision making on issues where there was room for principled disagreement on goals.’. . . Accepting these allegations as true, Ms. Kiddy-Brown was among the employees who have a right not to be subjected to patronage dismissal. We think the law was sufficiently clear at the time Ms. Kiddy-Brown was dismissed that a reasonable official would have understood that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for a position such as the one described in Ms. Kiddy-Brown’s complaint.”).

Lunini v. Grayeb, 395 F.3d 761, 769 (7th Cir. 2005) (“We acknowledge that ‘liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point,’ . . . yet nonetheless ‘[t]he contours of the right [at issue] must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . However suggestive our dicta in Hilton, we are instructed to conduct the ‘clearly established’ inquiry from the defendant-official’s perspective, and in this light, a claim in a factually dissimilar case which ultimately fails to survive a qualified immunity defense cannot be said to sufficiently define ‘the contours of the [purported] right’ to any significant degree. Indeed the precise contours of class of one equal protection rights continue to elude some of this circuit’s most capable judges. . . . Certainly Lunini is unhappy with defendant police officers’ response to the incident at the High Street residence. However, on this record it appears highly doubtful that any alleged police misjudgments (if misjudgments there were) took on constitutional proportions. While we take pains to affirm the baseline principle that police support and protection must be afforded to all citizens on a non-discriminatory basis, we decline to take the unprecedented step of implying a general constitutional police duty to arrest certain individuals during a response to an isolated domestic incident. Such a ruling would threaten to turn every police house call into a potential federal constitutional lawsuit.”).

Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 484 (7th Cir. 2005) (“Because dental care is a basic human need and the constitutional test requires us to look at ‘the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society,’ . . . Farnham was or should have been ‘on notice’ and had ‘fair warning’ that it would be unconstitutional for him to deny oral hygiene products to pretrial detainees under his watch for long periods of time. [citing Hope] We hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to Farnham based on the alleged denial of toothpaste to Duke and Jerry Board for three-and-a-half weeks and approximately 113 days respectively.”).

Baird v. Bd. of Educ. for Warren Community Unit School Dist. No. 205, 389 F.3d 685, 696, 697 (7th Cir. 2004) (“The Board contends that its individual members are absolutely immune from liability since various discrete actions in firing Baird—namely the determination of rules and procedures, participation in the pre-termination hearing and individual decisions to terminate Baird—were legislative acts. The issues raised by this appeal are, however, a totality involving the termination of an employee, which is an administrative act. The evidence does not establish that the Board members are entitled to legislative immunity. Nor do Board members appear to be entitled to qualified immunity, which protects public officials who exercise discretionary or policymaking functions from liability in damages. . . . We have already found that the Board violated Baird's due process rights by according him a hearing whose procedures were severely deficient. Thus, we proceed directly to the question whether Baird's rights were clearly established. We conclude that they are. . . . Determining the reasonableness of a 'mistake' does not necessitate comparison to a precedent that squares in every detail with the present case. . . . As earlier discussed, numerous cases from Perry v. Sindermann to Loudermill to Lujan—a case the defendants rely on to justify their conduct—have defined the contours of what process is due to a public employee who is to be terminated. Given the quality and volume of this precedent, we cannot determine on this record that the Board's conduct was a reasonable mistake, thereby establishing the defense of qualified immunity.”).

Manning v. Miller, 355 F.3d 1028, 1034 (7th Cir. 2004) (“Buchan and Miller also argue that Brady should not be extended to cover the actions of police or investigators, but rather, only prosecutors. This assertion, while eloquently argued, is flatly contradicted by existing case law. In Kyles v. Whitley, the Supreme Court found that the Brady duty of turning over exculpatory evidence includes not only the prosecutor, but the investigating officers as well. 514 U.S. 419, 438 (1995). . . . Manning is able to meet the second prong of the qualified immunity test: his constitutional due process right was ‘clearly established’ at the time he asserts it was violated. Buchan and Miller assert that this behavior was not clearly prohibited at the time of its occurrence because no decision had dealt with a Brady claim that matched the facts in Manning’s Brady claim. Following this logic, all Brady violations would receive qualified immunity because the facts of every case are unique. Instead, we hold that it is enough that, prior to the actions that gave rise to this case, it was well established that investigators who withhold exculpatory evidence from defendants violate the defendant’s constitutional due process right. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Smith v. Fairman, 769 F.2d 386, 391 (7th Cir.1985). It is immaterial whether Manning complains that Agents Buchan and Miller withheld exculpatory information regarding fabricated testimony or fingerprint analysis.”)

Dunn v. City of Elgin, 347 F.3d 641, 650, 651 (7th Cir. 2003) (“Although it was objectively unreasonable for the police officers to believe they had authority to seize a child pursuant to an out-of-state order, we cannot say that the unconstitutionality of this action was clearly established when Katia was seized. It may have been clearly established that such conduct violated Illinois law and the standard operating procedures for the City of Elgin Police Department, but Plaintiffs must also show that the conduct was so severe that ‘a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue.’ . . . This requires either that the plaintiff point to closely analogous cases, . . . or prove that the right is ‘so clear... that no one thought it worthwhile to litigate the issue.’ . . . In both cases the plaintiff must do more than merely prove that a general right, such as the right to be free from unreasonable seizures, was clearly established. . . . Plaintiffs have not met this burden. Plaintiffs have pointed to no cases where the enforcement of an out-of-state custody order in violation of a state statute was found to be a constitutional violation. . . . Considering the circuit split that existed regarding whether an officer may act reasonably when acting beyond his or her jurisdiction, . . . we also cannot say that the absence of cases on point is due to the obviousness of the constitutional violation.”).

McCann v. Mangialardi, 337 F.3d 782, 787, 788 (7th Cir. 2003) (“In Brady v. Maryland . . . the Supreme Court held that during trial the government is constitutionally obligated to disclose evidence favorable to the defense when the evidence is material to either the guilt or punishment of the defendant. . . The Court has yet to address, however, whether the Due Process Clause requires such disclosures outside the context of a trial. . . . [W]e have a question not directly addressed by [United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002)]: whether a criminal defendant’s guilty plea can ever be ‘voluntary’ when the government possesses evidence that would exonerate the defendant of any criminal wrongdoing but fails to disclose such evidence during plea negotiations or before the entry of the plea. . . . Ruiz indicates a significant distinction between impeachment information and exculpatory evidence of actual innocence. Given this distinction, it is highly likely that the Supreme Court would find a violation of the Due Process Clause if prosecutors or other relevant government actors have knowledge of a criminal defendant’s factual innocence but fail to disclose such information to a defendant before he enters into a guilty plea. We need not resolve this question, however, because even if such disclosures of factual innocence are constitutionally required, McCann has not presented any evidence that Mangialardi knew about the drugs being planted in McCann’s car prior to the entry of his guilty plea.”).

Molina ex rel Molina v. Cooper, 325 F.3d 963, 972 (7th Cir. 2003) (“As for the Molinas’ alternative argument that the police failed to wait a reasonable amount of time after announcing their presence to forcibly enter the house, we are similarly unconvinced. Police officers’ compliance with the ‘knock and announce’ requirement is determined on a case- by-case basis. . . . Although the duration is disputed, the officers claim that five seconds passed after their third and final knock, and that a total of twelve to fifteen seconds passed between their first knock and forcible entry. . . Under the circumstances, we find that this was a reasonable interval. Even if it was not, the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs have not cited any cases which clearly establish that an interval of this length was unconstitutional at the time that they conducted the search.”).

Cavalieri v. Shepard, 321 F.3d 616, 623, 624 (7th Cir. 2003) (“Of course, the law did not require Shepard to sit by the telephone all day, communicating with the CCCF about transferred prisoners. The question is what he was supposed to do in the face of the knowledge of a life-threatening situation that he actually had. He made several telephone calls to the CCCF, but he passed by the opportunity to mention that he had been informed that Steven was a suicide risk, and that the jail itself had recognized this only a month earlier. If Shepard had known that a detainee had an illness that required life-saving medication, he would also have had a duty to inform the CCCF, or any other entity that next held custody over the detainee. . . . We conclude that the law as it existed at the time of Steven’s suicide attempt provided Shepard with fair notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. The rule that officials, including police officers, will be ‘liable under section 1983 for a pre- trial detainee’s suicide if they were deliberately indifferent to a substantial suicide risk,’ . . . was clearly established prior to 1998. The fact that several state agencies were working together on his case, and that Steven happened to attempt suicide in the county's facility rather than at the police station, does not change this analysis.”)

Sonnleitner v. York, 304 F.3d 704, 716 (7th Cir. 2002) (“Under the first prong of this inquiry, we agree with Sonnleitner that the Institute may have violated his procedural due process rights by failing to accord him a predisciplinary hearing on the unenumerated (i.e., the more serious) charges contained in the Bellaire report. However, under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, Sonnleitner has failed to establish that this right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although Sonnleitner need not offer up a federal decision which precisely mirrors the facts of this case, at a minimum he must point to a closely analogous case decided prior to the challenged conduct. . . . Sonnleitner contends that the Supreme Court’s decision in Loudermill clearly established his right to more exhaustive pre-disciplinary proceedings. However, as discussed earlier, Loudermill involved the termination of two public employees without any pre-termination proceedings, and is therefore factually distinguishable from this case.”).

Driebel v. City of Milwaukee, 298 F.3d 622, 637, 652 (7th Cir. 2002) (“[I]n light of the Saucier decision, we must determine whether, and at what point, actions initiated by the Department against its on-duty police officers during a criminal investigation should be classified as unreasonable seizures in violation of the officers’ Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [W]e have been unable to discover any case law that would justify a reasonable belief that an officer suspected of criminal misconduct may be seized during a criminal investigation and detained for questioning based on the reasonable suspicion standard.”).

Morrell v. Mock, 270 F.3d 1090, 1100 (7th Cir. 2001) (“Morrell contends that it was clearly established that due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard before state actors may interfere with a mother’s liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of the defendants’ conduct. . . . The appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants’ position that enforcing the New Mexico court’s order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in Illinois was unconstitutional. . . . Morrell has not identified, and we have been unable to find, any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre-deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state’s custody order.”).

Siebert v. Severino, 256 F.3d 648, 654, 655 (7th Cir. 2001) (“A violation may be clearly established if the violation is so obvious that a reasonable state actor would know that what they are doing violates the Constitution, or if a closely analogous case establishes that the conduct is unconstitutional. . . . This case seems to fit within the ‘obvious’ scenario—a reasonable state actor would know that he cannot enter a fenced-in, closed structure located within 60 feet of a person’s house without a warrant or some exception to the warrant requirement. But even if not reasonably obvious to Severino, a closely analogous case indicates that his conduct was unconstitutional: his search took place in 1996, and less than three years earlier the Fourth Circuit held that citizens enjoy an expectation of privacy in their barn.[citing Fourth Circuit case] Therefore, Severino is not protected by qualified immunity.”).

Campbell v. Peters, 256 F.3d 695, 700, 701 (7th Cir. 2001) (“Campbell contends that he has shown that it was clearly established that incarcerating a prisoner beyond the termination of his sentence without penological justification violates the Eighth Amendment as cruel and unusual punishment. At a general level, this proposition may be true. . . . But we do not deal with generalities. Instead, we must determine whether it was clearly established that the defendants, in revoking the good conduct credits and computing a new release date after the recommitment, were violating Campbell’s constitutional rights by requiring him to serve more time than state law and his sentence required. As Campbell points out, it is not necessary for him to point to a case saying that the revocation, under the identical circumstances, was unlawful. Instead, as the Supreme Court put it in Katz, the law is ‘clearly established’ if ‘various courts have agreed that certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand...’. . . . At the time of the revocation of Campbell’s credits, it was not apparent that this kind of state law mistake rose to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation.”).

Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (7th Cir. 2001) (“Since no one could believe that a single 90-day denial of yard privileges would be a cruel and unusual punishment for a serious violation of prison disciplinary rules, the dispositive issue in this case is whether the stacking of such sanctions to the point of depriving a prisoner of an entire year of yard access is cruel and unusual punishment; and as there was no case law when the defendant acted indicating that it is and no tenable argument then or now that stacking so clearly violated the Eighth Amendment that an official in the defendant’s position would have had to know that it did, even without any guidance from case law, it is obvious that the immunity defense should have been sustained.”)

Brokaw v. Mercer County, 235 F.3d 1000, 1022, 1023 (7th Cir. 2000) (“The defendants argue that it was not clearly established in June 1983 that their actions violated C.A.’s constitutional rights, noting that C.A. failed to cite to closely analogous cases clearly establishing his constitutional rights. However, a plaintiff need not always identify a closely analogous case; rather, he can establish a clearly established constitutional right by showing that the violation was so obvious that a reasonable person would have known of the unconstitutionality of the conduct at issue. Thus, binding precedent is not necessary to clearly establish a right. . . . As alleged, this case fits that principle to a T. The defendants’ alleged conduct in this case is so severe that a reasonable person would have understood that he was violating C.A.’s constitutional rights. Specifically, a reasonable person would have known that it was unconstitutional to use the government’s power to cause, or conspire to cause, the unjustified removal of a six-year-old child from his parents in order to destroy the family, based simply on the family’s religious beliefs. . . . In closing our discussion of qualified immunity, we note that several circuit courts have concluded that because the balance between a child’s liberty interest in familial relations and a state’s interest in protecting the child is nebulous at best, social workers and other state actors who cause a child's removal are entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged constitutional violation will rarely—if ever—be clearly established.[citing cases]. While we agree that that is generally the case, . . .as noted above, some governmental actions are so clearly beyond the pale that a reasonable person should have known of their unconstitutionality even without a closely analogous case.”).

Elwell v. Dobucki, 224 F.3d 638, 641 (7th Cir. 2000) (“A snapshot of the law in 1992 . . . shows that there was no clearly established prohibition against taking race into account in a hiring decision within a prison or police department context.”).

Perry v. Sheahan, 222 F.3d 309, 317 (7th Cir. 2000) (“In summary, it was clearly established law at the time of the seizure that even seizures pursuant to an eviction are not immune to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. Here, the defendants seized the weapons even though they knew that the eviction had been stayed by order of the court and thus that the seizure was not pursuant to any court order. It was also clearly established that warrantless seizures of personal effects from a home are presumably unreasonable. No exception to that rule or other circumstances apparent in this motion to dismiss would render objectively reasonable their belief that this seizure was constitutional. Therefore, there is no basis for qualified immunity, and the decision of the district court in Perry I must be reversed on this issue.”).

Coady v. Steil, 187 F.3d 727, 734 (7th Cir. 1999) (“[W]e reject the defendant's argument that because this court has not previously had a case with identical facts to this one, the violation of the plaintiff's right to be free from harassment in his exercise of protected political speech could not have been clearly established. . . . Indeed, because Connick-Pickering balancing always involves factspecific balancing, if plaintiffs had to point to a case on all fours with their own, defendants would nearly always be entitled to qualified immunity. However, we have rejected that argument. . . . We believe it was clear on March 18, 1995, that in this circuit, a government official could not harass a subordinate employee because of that individual's activities in support of political candidates, when the subordinate employee's actions were protected by the First Amendment and not in contravention of any state law, municipal ordinance or departmental policy.”).

Markham v. White, 172 F.3d 486, 492 (7th Cir. 1999) (“[I]t was well established by 1993 that the U.S. Constitution does not tolerate sex discrimination in an educational setting. Contrary to the defendants' argument, the fact that neither this court nor any other has ever dealt with a situation involving a short training seminar conducted for narcotics officers is of no moment. Under the doctrine of qualified immunity, 'liability is not predicated upon the existence of a prior case that is directly on point.' . . In light of the law at the time, a reasonable government official in the defendants' shoes would have understood that the prohibition against sexual harassment extended to their training seminars.”).

Kerr v. Puckett, 138 F.3d 321, 323-24 (7th Cir. 1998) (“We must determine whether the generalities of the Constitution have been made concrete, so that officeholders can understand the limits on their conduct. No court has ever held that ‘brainwashing’ of prisoners as part of substance-abuse-control programs violates the eighth amendment.... Prison officials needn’t predict the outcome of cases yet to be brought. And the lack of precedent is not because these programs are so plainly unconstitutional that no one has ever needed to litigate the point before.”).

Khuans v. School District 110, 123 F.3d 1010, 1018-19 (7th Cir. 1997) (“Khuans alleges termination of an independent contractor relationship. And back in mid-1994, whether the analysis regarding First Amendment rights of public employees to free speech extended to independent contractors was an unsettled matter. Not until June 28, 1996, did the Supreme Court address whether and to what extent the First Amendment restricts the freedom of federal, state, or local governments to terminate a relationship with an independent contractor because of the contractor’s speech.... [A]t the time Khuans lost her job, whether independent contractors could be terminated for their exercise of free speech in the workplace was unaddressed, undecided and unsettled in this circuit.”).

Flenner v. Sheahan, 107 F.3d 459, 465 (7th Cir. 1997) (“We do not take exception with the district court’s observation that considerable uncertainty exists in the area of patronage law. This is an observation that. . . we have made often ourselves. . . . The district court’s error lies in its conclusion that the uncertainty in applying the Branti standard precludes liability for the dismissal of those employees who do in fact occupy an extremely ‘low rung on the bureaucratic ladder.’ [cite omitted] . . . In making the determination whether the law was sufficiently clear in 1993 that correctional officers were not subject to patronage dismissal, the district court should look to analogous case law. . . . To prevail, appellants need not point to a case holding unconstitutional the dismissal of Cook County correctional officers for patronage reasons. . . . Appellants must, however, establish that, given the inherent powers of their positions and in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness of Sheriff Sheahan’s actions was apparent.”).

Vickery v. Jones, 100 F.3d 1334, 1340 (7th Cir. 1996) (“We simply do not agree with the plaintiff’s assertion that the constitutional status of patronage hiring of temporary positions was clearly established at the time of the activities challenged in this case. For the reasons stated above, the plaintiff has not provided a ‘closely analogous’ case that covers both the Rutan holding and its application to temporary employment positions like the temporary highway maintainer positions, nor has he shown that using information regarding an applicant’s political affiliation was so obviously unconstitutional that the State Defendants should have known that they were violating the law. Therefore, the district court correctly concluded that the State Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Hernandez v. O’Malley, 98 F.3d 293, 297 (7th Cir. 1996) (“A regimen of case-by-case balancing makes it hard to dismiss complaints and simultaneously makes it hard to show that the right in question was ‘clearly established.’ Drawing a stable line in Elrod cases has been difficult; even slight differences in the nature and context of the job can lead to opposite outcomes Contextual balancing tests should be worked out prospectively, rather than at the expense of public officials who guess wrong about future legal developments.”).

Erwin v. Daley, 92 F.3d 521, 528 (7th Cir. 1996) (“Whatever else one might say about the state of the law in 1990 on affirmative action programs, the standard of review to which they are subject, and the nature of the justifications that will support them, it is clear that as of the time the City officials implemented their promotion program it was not ‘clearly established’ . . . that the use of standardization techniques and out of rank order promotions in police departments was illegal. . . it may not be illegal at all.”).

Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518, 525-27 (7th Cir. 1995) (“Neither in 1992 nor today was (is) the law clearly established that a prison cannot without violating the constitutional rights of its HIV-positive inmates reveal their condition to other inmates and to guards in order to enable those other inmates and those guards to protect themselves from infection. . . . [D]istrict court decisions cannot clearly establish a constitutional right. . . . They are evidence of the state of the law. Taken together with other evidence, they might show that the law had been clearly established. . . . And, although we cannot find any cases on the point, we are confident that an unpublished decision cannot elevate the decision that it affirms to the status of circuit precedent. . . . If the only reason that the defendants denied haircuts and yard privileges to Anderson was that he was HIV- positive, and there is no conceivable justification for these as AIDS-fighting measures, then the absence of a case involving this specific form of arbitrary treatment would not confer immunity on the defendants. A constitutional violation that is so patent that no violator has even attempted to obtain an appellate ruling on it can be regarded as clearly established even in the absence of precedent.”).

Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286, 1298 (7th Cir. 1995) (“Certainly it was clear by 1991 that a child had a right not to be placed with an abusive caretaker. K.H., a 1990 decision, settled that issue in this circuit. However, Camp has cited no decision to us recognizing a constitutional right to adequate supervision and guidance. There are hints in the cases that caseworkers must not place children with caretakers who will abuse or neglect them. E.g., K.H. . . . Neglect certainly could be construed to include not only the failure to provide a child with the necessities, but the degree of supervision, instruction, and involvement necessary to steer the child clear of dangerous activities. Yet, no case cited to us does so. Thus, at best a public official would have had to predict that cases such as K.H. would be construed expansively in order to anticipate our holding today. Certainly an official could be charged with knowledge that it was impermissible to misrepresent facts to a court. . . but he could not have predicted civil liability under the due process clause for the placement decision itself.”).

Burns v. Reed, 44 F.3d 524, 528 (7th Cir. 1995) (“Plaintiff. . . would need to cite more specific precedent than the basic line of coercion cases to persuade this Court that the United States Constitution clearly proscribed hypnosis of a suspect at the time of her interrogation.”).

Dahm v. Flynn, 60 F.3d 253, 258 (7th Cir. 1994) (“Because it was not clearly established at the relevant time that qualitative reductions in job responsibilities, without discharge, transfer, demotion, or salary loss, could constitute an adverse employment action, [Defendant] is immune from civil damages . . .”).

Eberhardt v. O’Malley, 17 F.3d 1023, 1028 (7th Cir. 1994) (“If the complaint is taken at face value, ... the defendants punished the plaintiff for writing a novel, without having any legitimate reason for such punishment. This is such an elementary violation of the First Amendment that the absence of a reported case with similar facts demonstrates nothing more than widespread compliance with well-recognized constitutional principles.”).

Donovan v. City of Milwaukee, 17 F.3d 944, 952 (7th Cir. 1994) (“Garner is not the most apt analogy to this case because the facts of Garner are not sufficiently particularized to put potential defendants on notice that striking a fleeing vehicle with their police cruisers constitutes an unreasonable seizure.”).

Henderson v. DeRobertis, 940 F.2d 1055, 1058-59 (7th Cir. 1991) (“...until a particular constitutional right has been stated so that reasonably competent officers would agree on its application to a given set of facts, it has not been clearly established”; court should look to whatever decisional law is available to decide whether right clearly established), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 1578 (1992).

K.H. ex rel Murphy v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846, 851 (7th Cir. 1990) (“There has never been a section 1983 case accusing welfare officials of selling foster children into slavery; it does not follow that if such a case arose, the officials would be immune...because no previous case had found liability in those circumstances.”)

Abrego v. Guevara, No. 23-CV-1740, 2024 WL 3566679, at *11-12 (N.D. Ill. July 29, 2024) (“Whitlock doesn’t get Abrego very far. The question at hand is whether the ‘wrongfulness’ of a prosecutor’s conduct in failing to intervene was clearly established in 1999. . . . Whitlock came down in 2012. If anything, Whitlock shows that the law was not ‘clearly established’ back in 1999. For that reason, district courts widely hold that the law was not clearly established in 1999 that prosecutors acting as investigators had a duty to intervene in another officer’s wrongdoing. . . . In sum, Abrego has not carried his burden to show that Turano’s conduct violated clearly established law in 1999. So Turano is entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to intervene claim.”)

West v. Kind, No. 17-CV-482-PP, 2024 WL 2959658, at *4 (E.D. Wis. June 12, 2024) (“Regarding the plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment claim, in 2016 incarcerated individuals in the Seventh Circuit did not have a Fourth Amendment privacy interest against visual inspections of their bodies. See King v. McCarty, 781 F.3d 889, 900 (7th Cir. 2015). The opinion in King holds that claims brought by incarcerated individuals for visual searches fail to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. . . . The plaintiff cannot meet his burden of showing that at the time of his search in 2016, it was clearly established that Buhle's observation of the plaintiff's strip search violated the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. The law changed in 2020 with Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769 (7th Cir. 2020) ("[The Fourth Amendment protects a right to bodily privacy for convicted prisoners, albeit in a significantly limited way, including during visual inspections.]). But Henry post-dates the plaintiff's strip search, so it is not relevant to the court's qualified immunity analysis. The defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim for damages.")

Dees v. Davis, No. 1:22-CV-163-HAB, 2024 WL 983651, at *4-5 (N.D. Ind. Mar. 6, 2024) ("Fourth Amendment cases call for particular specificity, as it is 'sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine...will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.' . . . Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Plaintiff must identify a case that put Defendants on notice that their specific conduct was unlawful. . . . None of the cases offered by Dees meet the standard of specificity required to demonstrate a clearly established right. . . . But not all is lost for Dees. Even if the Court assumes that Dees has engaged in an exhaustive search of Seventh Circuit case law and has come up empty, 'the court may broaden its survey to include all relevant case law in order to determine whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that the court can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.' . . . The Court finds such a trend here. The Court starts with Hildebrand. There, the Seventh Circuit noted that 'other circuits have found an officer's use of pepper spray reasonable when the individual sprayed was either resisting arrest or refusing reasonable police requests.' . . . The Court of Appeals then cited cases from the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits, all standing for that proposition. . . . Collectively, those cases stand for a three-decade trend in circuit court case law limiting the use of pepper spray to suspects who were resisting arrest or refusing reasonable police requests. . . . When the Court applies this 'general consensus' to the facts taken in a light most favorable to Dees, it's not a close call. As Dees tells it, he was doing nothing more than standing on a public sidewalk when he was pepper sprayed by Davis. He was not actively or passively resisting. He had not disregarded an order from the officers. He was not under arrest. He was not threatening Davis or the other officers. On these facts, the Court finds a violation of a clearly established right. Davis is not entitled to summary judgment. The Court concedes that Davis tells a different story. But Dees' story is the one the Court must accept at this point. Summary judgment on the excessive force claim must be denied.")

Dees v. Davis, No. 1:22-CV-163-HAB, 2024 WL 983651, at *6-7 (N.D. Ind. Mar. 6, 2024) ("In false-arrest cases, qualified immunity provides officers with an extra layer of protection, because even if a jury can find lack of probable cause on a given set of facts, the question still is whether a reasonable officer would have mistakenly believed that the arrest lacked probable cause. . . . If an officer had even 'arguable probable cause' to arrest the plaintiff, then qualified immunity applies. . . . While Dees disagrees with the version of events in the probable cause affidavit, he submits no evidence that the version is an 'intentional or reckless misrepresentation.' Without such a showing, he cannot show the violation of a clearly established right. Rommel's signature on Brooks affidavit is a different matter. The probable cause affidavit is a lie. Rommel did not witness the things in the affidavit, nor did he know about them. Rommel, then, likely did violate Franks when he swore he saw things and knew things he undisputedly did not. That said, the Court cannot find that the right Dees seeks to vindicate was clearly established under the facts presented. First, Plaintiff has failed to cite to any caselaw that could establish such a right. . . . And the Court’s independent research will not save Dees this time. The Court cannot locate any case, from any jurisdiction, that imposes civil liability on an officer who signs an affidavit prepared by someone else under similar facts. The Court’s research instead reveals the opposite.”)

Czosnyka v. Gardiner, No. 21-CV-3240, 2023 WL 6213715, at *5–7 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 25, 2023) (“[A]t the time of the events in question, there was an evolving consensus among the Circuit Courts of Appeals that public officials may not permissibly block their constituents from their social media accounts or censor their comments. It is true, as Gardiner notes, that the Ninth Circuit, addressing this precise question of whether public officials who had admittedly violated the First Amendment by censoring constituents on their social media accounts, found that in 2017, such a right was not clearly established. Garnier v. O’Connor-Ratcliff, 41 F.4th 1158, 1184 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. granted, 143 S. Ct. 1779, 215 L. Ed. 2d 669 (2023). The court found that given the ‘novelty’ of the constitutional analysis applied, it [could not] say that reasonable officials in the [defendants’] position were on notice that blocking the [plaintiffs] from individual government officials’ social media pages could violate the First Amendment.’ . . . However, much changed from 2017 to 2021, when Plaintiffs filed this suit. In the intervening time, Circuits and another district court within this Circuit all found that conduct comparable to Gardiner’s was impermissible under the First Amendment. Knight First Amend. Inst. at Colum. Univ. v. Trump, 928 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2019); Davison v. Randall, 912 F.3d 666 (4th Cir. 2019); Robinson v. Hunt Cty., 921 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2019); One Wis. Now v. Kremer, 354 F. Supp. 3d 940 (W.D. Wis. 2019).³ [fn.3: During the period in question, the Second, Fourth, and Fifth Circuits each considered whether public officials who block users or delete comments from their official social media accounts violate the First Amendment and ruled in the affirmative. Two others, the Eighth and Ninth Circuits, have since joined them. The Sixth Circuit, the only circuit court thus far to rule negatively, issued its decision after this suit was filed, so that decision is not relevant to the ‘clearly established’ analysis. Lindke v. Freed, 37 F.4th 1199 (6th Cir. 2022).] Plaintiff argues that the Court should ignore the Second Circuit’s decision in Knight v. Trump because the opinion was later mooted and vacated by the Supreme Court after President Trump left office. This is unpersuasive; as the opinion was in effect at the time Gardiner continued to violate plaintiffs’ First Amendment rights, it can contribute to a finding that those rights were clearly established. At the time Gardiner was involved in the conduct at issue, the clear, evolving trend in circuit case law was that his constituents had a First Amendment right to view and engage with his official Facebook Page. Just as important as the state of caselaw from 2021 is Alderman Gardiner’s actual, contemporaneous knowledge that his conduct was violating the First Amendment. At its heart, the doctrine of qualified immunity protects public officials who act in good faith. The immunity is ‘defeated if an official “knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of the [plaintiff].”’. . . The record makes it clear that Gardiner is not deserving of good faith protection. As noted above, in 2019 the Chicago Board of Ethics

published an CBE Opinion addressing, among other topics, ‘the use of social media accounts by City of Chicago elected officials.’ . . . It concluded that: ‘comments posted to [official accounts] are protected by the First Amendment and cannot be deleted, and those commenting cannot be blocked from accessing the account.’ . . . Per the testimony of a Gardiner’s former staffer, it is also clear that he received a copy of the CBE Opinion and was aware of its contents. . . . Gardiner’s own former staffer affirmed in her deposition that she ‘had the impression that he wasn’t going to follow [the CBE Opinion]’ and that his content moderation was often based on personal and political animus directed at his constituents. . . . This CBE Opinion informed Gardiner in clear terms that his conduct violated the First Amendment. It is true that failure to follow training ‘does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.’ . . . However, the CBE Opinion is more pertinent than mere training – it is legal advice from the City’s own ethics counsel that the precise conduct Gardiner engaged in was unconstitutional. Given the robust and evolving consensus in the caselaw and the specific guidance from the Chicago Board of Ethics that Gardiner’s conduct was violating plaintiffs’ rights, it is clear that a reasonable Alderman in his position knew or should have known that deleting comments and blocking users on his official Alderman Facebook Page ran afoul of the First Amendment. This Court thus holds that Gardiner is not entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiffs’ claim for damages and accordingly denies Defendant’s motion for summary judgment.” [The court noted that “[i]f the Supreme Court’s decision ultimately departs from the reasoning set forth by the Second, Fourth, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits, and endorsed here, then Defendant may request leave to file a motion for reconsideration.” Czosnyka v. Gardiner, No. 21-CV-3240, 2023 WL 6213715, at *3 n.2 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 25, 2023)]

Housley v. Plasse, No. 222CV00020JRSMKK, 2023 WL 5319766, at *4–5 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 16, 2023) (“It is clearly established that prison officials may not ‘be deliberately indifferent to the exposure of inmates to a serious, communicable disease’ under the Eighth Amendment[.] . . . Although COVID-19 was a new virus, the duty to protect inmates from needless exposure to a serious illness ‘need not be litigated and then established disease by disease [.]’ . . . But the issue is whether the defendants were on notice that their particular conduct—failing to provide masks, testing, adequate cleaning supplies, and adequate treatment of COVID-19 symptoms—violated Mr. Whitlock’s Eighth Amendment rights. The plaintiff has cited no case that suggests as much, and the Court can find none. Instead, many courts have granted qualified immunity to jail and prison administrators given the evolving nature of the virus and the related recommendations for keeping incarcerated individuals safe. [collecting cases] Qualified immunity is especially appropriate because the defendants are correctional professionals, not health professionals. The undisputed evidence is that the Sheriff relied on the Vigo County Health Department to provide the Jail with recommended COVID-19 protective measures. . . . Courts have ‘long recognized that correctional institutions typically engage in the division of labor between medical professionals and other security and administrative staff,’ and therefore it was reasonable for the defendants to defer to the health department for guidance on handling COVID-19 within the jail. . . . Accordingly, summary judgment is granted as to claims against the defendants in their individual capacities.”)

Wilson v. Estate of Burge, 666 F.Supp.3d 785, ____ (N.D. Ill. 2023) (“Hyman maintains that, while a police officer may be held liable for failing to intervene to prevent other law enforcement officers from infringing the constitutional rights of citizens, the Seventh Circuit has not held such an obligation for prosecutors. . . In short, Hyman insists that it was not clearly established in 1982 that he had a duty to intervene or refuse to take Wilson’s statement, and therefore qualified immunity applies. . . Wilson counters that in 2012, the Seventh Circuit decided that, when acting in an investigatory capacity, prosecutors are subject to the same rules as those governing police officers and can therefore violate a citizen’s due process rights ‘just as easily as a police officer[.]’. . As discussed in more detail below, the Court agrees with Wilson that prosecutors can be held liable for failure to intervene post-Whitlock. . . However, as Hyman points out in Reply, Wilson fails to respond directly to his argument that there was not a clearly established duty for prosecutors to intervene before 2012, and so he has waived any response. . . And Wilson’s allegations about Hyman’s failure to intervene relate only to conduct that occurred in 1982. Other courts in this District have recently addressed this issue. In Serrano, the court held that prosecutors who were involved in coercing witness testimony during a 1993 investigation were entitled to qualified immunity from a failure to intervene claim. . . The court found no authority that shows a clearly established duty in 1993 for prosecutors, even acting in an investigatory function, to intervene when their fellow prosecutors committed constitutional wrongs. . . The Court finds the reasoning in Serrano persuasive and finds that Hyman is thus entitled to qualified immunity for Wilson’s failure to intervene claims.”)

Phillips v. Hulett, No. 12-3087, 2022 WL 14461192, at *3-4 (C.D. Ill. Oct. 25, 2022) (“The Defendants allege that, in contrast to the scenario in Kingsley, Defendants could not have known that Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights were implicated by the visual strip searches because no such right existed until the Seventh Circuit decided Henry in 2020. . . Accordingly, the Defendants claim that Kingsley cannot be applied, and Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the Fourth Amendment right at issue was not established at the time of Defendants’ conduct. . . Next, in order to preserve the argument for further review, the Defendants claim that to the extent the Seventh Circuit’s decision in Kingsley precludes affording Defendants the defense of qualified immunity, Kingsley was wrongly decided. . . The Court concludes that, because the Defendants’ qualified immunity defense is not included in the proposed pretrial order [d/e 224] or final pretrial order [d/e 231], the qualified immunity defense is waived based on Defendants’ failure to preserve.”)

Wynn v. City of Indianapolis, No. 1:20-CV-1638-JMS-MJD, 2022 WL 1120490, at *13 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 14, 2022) (“Based on the foregoing caselaw, it was clearly established as of May 6, 2020 that a police officer can generally use a taser against an actively resisting suspect, but not against a nonresisting or passively resisting suspect. However, Ms. Wynn has not pointed to a case—and the Court’s own research has not located one—that clearly establishes that Mr. Reed fleeing on foot constitutes passive rather than active resistance. In fact, the cases cited above suggest that attempting to evade arrest by flight, and specifically by running, may justify the use of force. . . Although, as Ms. Wynn points out, IMPD’s Use of Force Policy prohibits the use of a taser against a suspect who is merely fleeing and requires that an officer should warn a suspect before tasing him if feasible, a violation of IMPD policy does not establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that Ms. Wynn has failed to meet her burden of demonstrating that it was clearly established as of May 6, 2020 that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by deploying a taser against a suspect under the circumstances in which Officer Mercer deployed his taser against Mr. Reed. Officer Mercer is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Wynn's excessive force claim related to the use of the ECD.") Gonzalez v. Scaletta, No. 17-CV-7080, 2021 WL 4192065, at *19 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 15, 2021) ("Justice Kavanaugh's concurring opinion in Caniglia demonstrates the necessity of giving officers some leeway when responding to emergency situations to protect the community. Justice Kavanaugh provided '[a] few (non-exhaustive) examples [that] illustrate' some 'heartland emergency-aid situations.' . . One of his examples refers to a person who may be suicidal:

Suppose that a woman calls a healthcare hotline or 911 and says that she is contemplating suicide, that she has firearms in her home, and that she might as well die. The operator alerts the police, and two officers respond by driving to the woman's home. They knock on the door but do not receive a response. May the officers enter the home? *Of course....*The Fourth Amendment does not require officers to stand idly outside as the suicide takes place.

Caniglia, 141 S. Ct. at 1604 (Kavanaugh, J., concurring) (emphasis added).

Officers do not have to wait for catastrophe. They can try to prevent it. 'The officers do not need to show that the harm has already occurred or is mere moments away, because knowing that will be difficult if not impossible in cases involving, for example, a person who is currently suicidal....If someone is at risk of serious harm and it is reasonable for officers to intervene now, that is enough for the officers to enter.' . . '[W]hen police are acting in a swiftly developing situation...a court must not indulge in unrealistic second-guessing.' . . This Court cannot second guess the officers' decision to enter the home to ensure Cardenas's safety. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on the warrantless entry claim. The Court grants the officers' motion for summary judgment on the illegal entry claim (Count I).") Renee v. Neal, No. 3:18-CV-592-RLM-MGG, 2020 WL 5230605, at *5–6 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 2, 2020) ("Little case law, either within the Seventh Circuit or outside it, address[es] the First Amendment rights of transgender inmates to wear makeup or female clothing. The few courts to have considered the issue have held that transgender inmates don't have a First Amendment right to wear makeup or women's clothing. . . Some circuits, including ours, have analyzed this type of claim under the Eighth Amendment, but have held that denying transgender inmates makeup and similar items did not violate the Constitution. . . At least one court has recognized the 'serious security concerns' posed by requests like Ms. Renee's, namely, 'that an inmate dressed and groomed as a female would inevitably become a target for abuse in an all-male prison.' . . Because there is no case law that would have put defendants on notice that Ms. Renee had a clearly established First Amendment right to wear makeup and purchase female hygiene items, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. The court doesn't intend to minimize the comfort such items might bring to one with gender dysphoria who identifies as female. But the defendants are correct that what Ms. Renee presents is not a clearly established federal constitutional right.”)

Obrieht v. Splinter, No. 18-CV-877-SLC, 2019 WL 1779226, at *6 (W.D. Wis. Apr. 23, 2019) (“As discussed at length above, the law is far from settled about whether drivers have a First Amendment right to flash their headlights to convey a warning to oncoming vehicles. Neither the Supreme Court nor any federal court of appeals has addressed the issue. Accordingly, defendant Splinter is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Obrieht’s First Amendment retaliation claim against him and defendants Lind, Teasdale, Zeeh, Larson, and Ross are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Obrieht’s individual capacity claims that they created or approved the policy and practice of stopping and citing drivers the on-and-off flashing of headlights violates his right to free speech under the First Amendment.”)

Terry v. County of Milwaukee, No. 17-CV-1112-JPS, 2019 WL 181329, at *9-10 (E.D. Wis. It is well-established in this circuit that arrestees awaiting their probable cause hearings have a right to medical care that is protected under the Fourth Amendment’s ‘objectively unreasonable’ standard. Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 629–30 (7th Cir. 2013); Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 2011). In Ortiz, the Seventh Circuit denied qualified immunity despite uncertainty over whether the ‘deliberately indifferent’ or objectively unreasonable’ standard governed medical care claims for arrestees because it was clear that the Fourth Amendment protected arrestees at the time of the plaintiff’s death. Id. at 538. The Court of Appeals further held that qualified immunity was inappropriate because defendants’ conduct would not have been entitled to qualified immunity under the deliberate indifference standard anyway. . . . Thus, Miranda does not change the qualified immunity standard. The defendants may argue that they believed they were held to the deliberate indifference standard and did not realize that they would be subject to the objectively unreasonable standard of care. This is, in effect, an argument that defendants were unaware that they had to act a modicum more humanely towards Terry. Such a miserable contention is not persuasive. . . . Although mistakes of fact may sometimes give rise to qualified immunity, . . . it was well established at the time that the Fourteenth Amendment protected pretrial detainees. [citing Wolfish] Moreover, Terry’s arguments, ‘if credited by a jury, satisf[y] the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that the defendants were subjectively aware that she had a serious medical condition...and failed to respond.’ . . . Therefore, even if the Court applied the old standard, qualified immunity would not be appropriate. As discussed below, Wenzel and Bevenue knew, without a doubt, that detainees had a constitutional right to medical care, and they also knew that they were not allowed to ignore serious medical risks. That was true under the deliberate indifference standard, and it remains true under the new standard.”) Wordlow on behalf of M.M. v. Chicago Bd. of Educ., No. 16-CV-8040, 2018 WL 6171792, at *3-4, *8–11 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 26, 2018) (“At the time of Yarbrough’s hire, the Board knew that this was his first job working with students in a school setting; prior to working at Fernwood,

Yarbrough was a bouncer at the Red Diamond Strip Club. . . During the 2015-16 school year, M.M. was a six-year-old, first grade student at Fernwood. . . At that time, she weighed 67 pounds and was three-feet, six inches tall. . . . Based upon the record, this Court finds that under the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness standard, Yarbrough’s handcuffing constituted excessive force as a matter of law. The undisputed facts demonstrate that at the time Yarbrough decided to handcuff M.M. without parental consent and bring a compliant 6-year old child to his security desk: (1) Yarbrough was a 46-year-old adult male . . . (2) M.M. weighed 67 pounds and was three-feet, six inches tall. . . (3) M.M. had taken candy from a teacher. . . (4) Yarbrough saw vomit on M.M. and knew she had thrown up on herself. . . and (5) M.M. has since been diagnosed with PTSD due to the incident[.]Moreover, Yarbrough admits that at the time he handcuffed and brought M.M. to his security desk, he was aware that a police officer ‘would not handcuff nor arrest a 6-year-old girl for stealing candy and that someone is in ‘custody’ when they are in handcuffs. . . Nonetheless, he handcuffed M.M. to create ‘kind of an isolated time out’ and as a ‘teaching moment.’. . . Yarbrough handcuffed a six-year-old student who committed no crime, posed no threat, and did not resist in any way. Thus, this Court finds as a matter of law that Yarbrough’s handcuffing constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . In March 2016, the law was clearly established that, at a minimum, seizures in response to school-related incidents had to be reasonable in light of the circumstances, and not excessively intrusive. . . . Plaintiff admittedly cannot identify an on-point Supreme Court or Seventh Circuit case addressing the Fourth Amendment implications of handcuffing a compliant, 6-year old special-needs child (without parental consent) for allegedly stealing a piece of candy, where such student presented no risk of flight or harm to herself or others. Given the facts, however, Plaintiff need not identify a specific case. . . . Given the undisputed portions of the record, however, there is no hazy border in this case, and no reasonable officer would ever need a judge to tell them in advance that the conduct at issue here was unreasonable. . . In the alternative, this Court also turns to ‘all relevant case law to determine “whether there was such a clear trend in the case law that [it] can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.”’. . The three circuit courts that have addressed the issue of handcuffing students under the Fourth Amendment remain split on whether school security personnel warrant qualified immunity. [Court discusses Sonora (9th Cir.) and Bostic (11th Cir.) (both denying qualified immunity in student handcuffing cases) and Dolgos (4th Cir.) (granting qualified immunity)] Yarbrough, of course, argues in light of the Fourth Circuit’s ruling that M.M.’s ‘right not to be handcuffed under the circumstances of the case was not clearly established at [the] time of her seizure.’. . Plaintiff, on the other hand, argues, consistent with the Ninth and Eleventh Circuit’s conclusions, that such an incident constitutes an ‘obvious violation,’ and also maintains that the Seventh Circuit’s decision in Wallace put Yarbrough on notice that his behavior violated the Fourth Amendment. Specifically, she argues that ‘20 years before Yarbrough’s actions in this case, the Seventh Circuit applied T.L.O. to schoolhouse seizures, holding that “in the context of a public school, a teacher or administrator who seizes a student does so in violation of the Fourth Amendment only when the restriction of liberty is unreasonable under the circumstances then existing and apparent.”’. . Despite the Fourth Circuit’s holding in Dolgos, a clear trend exists that recognition of the particular right here by a controlling precedent is ‘merely a question of time.’. . Consistent with the precedent of both the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits, handcuffing a compliant six-year-old for taking candy—when she posed no risk whatsoever to Yarbrough, herself, or her classmates—constituted an obvious violation of M.M.’s Fourth Amendment rights. The Seventh Circuit’s decision in Wallace, more than 20 years before Yarbrough handcuffed M.M., put Yarbrough on notice that seizures in response to school-related incidents must be reasonable and non-excessive. . . The Fourth Circuit in Dolgos, in contrast, relied only upon Graham in determining that the law was not clearly established. . . And Yarbrough’s decision to seize M.M. was obviously unreasonable and excessive; as discussed above, M.M. did not constitute any sort of security threat at the time Yarbrough handcuffed her. Moreover, she is both younger and smaller than the plaintiffs in Sonora, Bostic, and Dolgos. In short, every reasonable officer would have known that handcuffing a compliant six-year-old for purely punitive purposes is unreasonable and excessive under the facts of this case. . . Therefore, because Yarbrough had fair warning that handcuffing M.M. to teach her a lesson was an obvious violation of her Fourth Amendment rights, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Rivera v. Guevara, 319 F.Supp.3d 1004, 1053-54 (N.D. Ill. 2018) (“The facts of Jones are very similar to those here, and the Jones decision more than suffices to show that by 1988 it was clearly established that due process would not tolerate a police officer fabricating evidence. . . .As for the Brady claims, the Seventh Circuit held in Newsome v. McCabe that it was ‘clearly established in 1979 and 1980 that police could not withhold from prosecutors exculpatory information about fingerprints and the conduct of a lineup.’. . Jones again furnishes the salient example. . . The officer defendants again cite Gauger v. Hendle, 349 F.3d 354, 360 (7th Cir. 2003), for the proposition that it was not established, much less clearly, that they had to turn over anything if the person who ultimately stood trial was present at the lineup. . . But Newsome involved a lineup in which the wrongfully convicted person stood (so he knew about it), and the officers nevertheless had no qualified immunity for Brady claims that they did not tell the prosecutors or the defense that they encouraged witnesses to pick the § 1983 plaintiff from the lineup. . . Newsome, therefore, clearly established that the Brady disclosure requirement expounded in Jones has full force when the person who later stands trial is in the lineup (which is usually the case since introducing evidence identifying someone else as the perpetrator of a crime is a poor strategy for winning a conviction). . . Given the genuine fact issues, the court cannot say that Rivera is complaining of the nondisclosure of ‘little...tidbit[s]’ of evidence whose value to the defense would not have been apparent to the officer defendants. . . As discussed extensively earlier, the jury could find that whole swaths of evidence that would have corroborated the existence of the first lineup were suppressed and that cumulatively the withheld evidence was an impeachment goldmine. Based on the foregoing analysis, the court concludes that a jury viewing the summary judgment record most favorably to Rivera could find that his clearly established rights were violated.”)

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2018 WL 1519160, at *15 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 28, 2018) (“Mokstad and Cartrette assert that they are shielded, in their individual capacities, from Chatman’s due process claim by qualified immunity. As noted, in the context of a Brady claim, the qualified immunity issue is not whether the officer knew he had to disclose exculpatory information; rather, the question is whether it was clearly established that the information the plaintiff claims the police failed to disclose was exculpatory or impeaching. . . For the reasons discussed above, Chatman has satisfied his burden of showing, at least at this stage of the litigation, that Mokstad and Cartrette should not be afforded qualified immunity. As explained above, it was clearly established that the sleeping deputy evidence was exculpatory or impeaching, and a reasonable jury could view the record and conclude that the evidence was otherwise unavailable. In addition, whether Mokstad and Cartrette knowingly suppressed the evidence depends on disputed issues of fact.”) Myvett v. Chicago Police Detective Edward Heerdt, 232 F.Supp.3d 1005, 1024 (N.D. Ill. 2017) (“Whitlock and its progeny stand for the proposition that if a police officer fabricates information that is used ‘in some way’ to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty, then that officer has violated the very laws he has sworn to protect. . . The Seventh Circuit made no suggestion in Whitlock, or any other case, that fabrication claims should somehow turn on the admissibility of the concocted information. Instead, what Whitlock illustrates is that so long as the fabricated statements are used to deprive a plaintiff of his liberty in some way, then the defendant officers have violated his clearly established constitutional rights. Here, as discussed supra, that is exactly what happened (or so the jury could reasonably conclude).

Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 680-83 (N.D. Ill. 2016) (“Reviewing Plaintiff’s well-pleaded allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor—as the Court is required to do at this procedural posture—Plaintiff bases his Brady violation on more than just Defendant Officers’ failure to disclose their unlawful interrogation tactics in relation to his coerced confession. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Officers suppressed the implements of their torture, including the plastic bag, the rubber nightstick, and Plaintiff’s bloody clothes. . . More importantly, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD’s systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. . . With the Seventh Circuit’s Gauger and/or Sornberger decisions in mind, courts in this district have concluded that similar allegations state a Brady claim based on events that transpired outside of the interrogation room. [collecting cases] The decision in Saunders-El does not change this reasoning as it relates to Plaintiff’s allegations of Defendants suppressing the implements of their torture, destroying evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructing investigations into the CPD’s systemic torture, and discrediting findings of systemic torture. In sum, at this stage of the proceedings, Plaintiff’s allegations are distinguishable from the facts in Saunders-El because Plaintiff is not merely basing his Brady claim on Defendants ‘keeping quiet about their wrongdoing.’. . . [T]he individual Defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from liability as to Plaintiff’s Brady claim. . . . Defendants argue that their ‘failure to disclose the alleged torture evidence did not in 1984 and does not today violate any clearly established constitutional right.’. . In making this argument, Defendants characterize Plaintiff’s Brady claim as follows: ‘Plaintiff has essentially alleged that Brady requires police officers to disclose their misconduct, including criminal misconduct, to criminal defendants.’. First, Defendants mischaracterize Plaintiff’s Brady claim, which includes allegations that Defendants suppressed and destroyed evidence of systemic torture and abuse in Area 2, obstructed investigations into the CPD's systemic torture, and discredited findings of systemic torture. Second, Defendants fail to explain how it was not clearly established in 1983-84 that destroying and suppressing exculpatory evidence was unconstitutional. In fact, since Brady and Killian v. United States, 368 U.S. 231, 82 S.Ct. 302, 7 L.Ed.2d 256 (1961), 'bad-faith destruction or loss of exculpatory evidence violate[s] a suspect's due process rights.' Armstrong v. Daily, 786 F.3d 529, 532 (7th Cir. 2015); see also Tillman, 813 F. Supp. 2d at 966 n.12. Moreover, viewing Plaintiff's allegations and all reasonable inferences in his favor, his allegations show that Defendants' conduct was 'so egregious that no reasonable person could have believed that it would not violate established rights.' The Court therefore denies Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Brady claim.")

Alton v. City of Naperville, No. 16 CV 6640, 2016 WL 6877678, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 22, 2016) ("Naperville argues that this Court should find that qualified immunity shields the officers from liability. Qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability stemming from discretionary functions so long as their conduct did not violate a clearly established statutory or constitutional right that a reasonable person would have known. . . Naperville asserts that: The correct inquiry is whether it was clearly established that police engagement of a canine constitutes excessive force when the engagement of the canine arises when a suspect in a serious crime has recklessly utilized every available means to evade capture, including fleeing in a vehicle until the vehicle becomes inoperable, followed by fleeing on foot across a major interstate highway, and secreting himself underneath garbage within a small, confined and enclosed dumpster space, all during the dark of night, and before police were able to determine whether the suspect was armed. . . . If constitutional rights needed to be so narrowly defined to be 'clearly established,' then police officers would enjoy qualified immunity in nearly every instance. . . . This Court must take the allegations in the Complaint as true for purposes of ruling on the motion to dismiss, including that Alton was not resisting and was complying with Officer Lippencott's order to get out of the dumpster. Further, there are no allegations in the Complaint suggesting Officer Lippencott had reason to suspect that Alton was armed. Under Alton's version of the facts, he was at most passively resisting. Accordingly, at this stage, the Court finds the allegations in the Complaint do not establish the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2016 WL 4734361, at *2-4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 12, 2016) ("The OPS Defendants argue, that even if they had a duty to disclose exculpatory material, such an extension of Brady was not clearly established at the time of Chatman's criminal proceedings. . . . Initially, only the members of the prosecution bore the obligation to disclose material, exculpatory evidence to defense counsel. . . Subsequently, Brady was extended so that the prosecutor's duty to disclose reached evidence in the hands of police officers, even if the information was not known to the prosecutor. . . Although the rule was articulated in terms of a duty by the prosecutor to learn of information held by the police, it has also been understood to establish an independent duty on the part of police officers to disclose such information. See Steidl v. Fermon, 494 F.3d 623, 630-33 (7th Cir. 2007) (holding that the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory information—which is enforceable under § 1983—has been clearly established since Kyles). That said, neither the Seventh Circuit nor the Supreme Court has addressed whether governmental agencies that are in charge of investigating the police officers themselves—as opposed to the criminal defendant—are also subject to the duty to disclose under Brady. . . . ‘Exactly who constitutes a member of the prosecution team is determined using a “case-by-case analysis of the extent of interaction and cooperation between” a potential member of the team and the prosecutor.’ . . . In this case, the second amended complaint is bereft of any allegations that the OPS Defendants actively investigated the case against Chatman, acted under the Assistant State’s Attorney’s supervision, or were involved in crafting trial strategy. In short, there is no indication in the second amended complaint that the OPS Defendants were part of the prosecution team against Chatman. The inquiry that was sparked by the anonymous memo focused on uncovering misconduct by Officer Kato rather than investigating the allegations of rape against Chatman. . . . Because the OPS Defendants were not part of the prosecution team behind Chatman’s arrest and conviction (at least, as they are portrayed in the second amended complaint), there was no clearly established law in this circuit tasking them with a duty to disclose the anonymous memo to the defense. . . . Chatman relies heavily on the fact that OPS was formally part of the Chicago Police Department. As a result, argues Chatman, the OPS Defendants’ duty to disclose under Brady is coextensive with that of the police—which has been clearly established since Kyles. . . . But Chatman’s reliance upon the organizational relationship between the OPS and the Chicago Police Department ignores the functional inquiry utilized in cases like Morris that asks whether the individual in question participated in the investigation and prosecution of the underlying crime. . . . In fact, OPS has since been replaced by the Independent Police Review Authority, which is an entity separate from the Chicago Police Department. . . . To rely entirely on CPD’s internal organizational structure to determine the bounds of Brady, as Chatman urges here, would invite the type of formalistic departmental compartmentalization denounced in Morris. . . . With no Supreme Court or Seventh Circuit cases on point, Chatman turns to out-of-circuit cases to argue that the OPS Defendants clearly had a duty to disclose. The cases he relies on, however, all turn on the prosecutor’s duty to search for information held by other government agencies as opposed to the agencies’ independent duty to disclose. . . . For these reasons, the Court holds that the duty at issue in this case (assuming that one exists) was not clearly established at the relevant time period. The Court takes no position as to the appropriateness of imposing a duty to disclose on the OPS Defendants under these circumstances, particularly given that they plainly were aware of the ongoing criminal proceedings against Chatman. What is clear, however, is that such a duty was not clearly established at the time the proceedings were taking place.”)

Sanders v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 13 C 0221, 2016 WL 2866097, at *10 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2016) (“Because the Court has determined that Sanders has set forth sufficient evidence raising a genuine issue of material fact for trial that Defendant Officers violated his due process rights by employing unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures, the Court addresses whether this due process right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations in December 1993 and January 1994. . . . In support of their argument, Defendant Officers maintain that because there is no set of universally adopted police identification procedures, they are shielded by qualified immunity. In other words, Defendant Officers argue that at the time of the identification procedures at issue, there were no established guidelines for them to follow. Defendant Officers, however, admit that it is ‘well established that an officer should not do anything overtly or intentionally to cause the witness to identify a suspect in a photo array or line-up.’. . Defendants’ argument about established police procedures misses the mark because whether there were generally accepted police practices for conducting identification procedures does not speak to whether it was clearly established in December 1993 and January 1994 that police officers violated a criminal defendant’s due process rights by conducting impermissibly suggestive identification procedures. Indeed, it has been clearly established since at least 1977 that a criminal defendant has a due process right not to be subjected to unduly suggestive identifications that taint his criminal trial. . . As such, Defendant Officers’ qualified immunity argument fails.”)

Spaulding v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 8777, 2016 WL 2733232, at *10-13 (N.D. Ill. May 11, 2016) (“The parties agree that Plaintiffs’ work for IAD is not protected by the First Amendment. . . They disagree, however, over whether Plaintiffs’ reports to the FBI about Watts’s illegal activity, and their pre-IAD work for the FBI, are constitutionally protected. . . .Under these precedents [discussed in case], all of which were issued before the retaliatory conduct alleged in this case, Plaintiffs’ speech to the FBI—from their initial report to Smith in late 2007 until the August 17, 2008 meeting where the CPD formally assigned them to Operation Brass Tax—is protected by the First Amendment. Prompted by Watson’s dismissal of Echeverria’s debriefing of the suspect who reported Watts’s activity, Plaintiffs reported Watts’s misconduct to an outside law enforcement agency, on their own initiative, while off-duty and on their own time. These were not ‘the tasks [Plaintiffs were] paid to perform,’. . . and police corruption is, as Defendants concede, . . . a matter of public concern. It follows that Plaintiffs’ speech to the FBI before August 17, 2008—when, with their assignment to Detached Services, their reports to the FBI became part of their official CPD duties—is constitutionally protected. . . .As discussed above, the record would allow a reasonable jury to find a First Amendment violation, so Plaintiffs have met their ‘burden of establishing that [their] rights were violated’ under the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . For the second element, Plaintiffs submit that ever since the Supreme Court issued Garcetti in 2006, it ‘has been clearly established law . . . that the First Amendment protects a public employee who complains about public corruption in a forum outside of his or her official job duties.’. . As noted above, the Seventh Circuit has applied the Garcetti standard in a variety of contexts. [collecting cases] All of these cases were issued before August 17, 2010, the first alleged act of retaliation in this case. And because the Seventh Circuit—in Chaklos, Chrzanowski, and Houskins—has consistently interpreted Garcetti to hold that the speech of an employee who reports misconduct outside official or established channels is constitutionally protected, reasonable police officers in the defendant officers’ position would have known that Plaintiffs’ speech to FBI was protected and that any retaliation against them for that speech would violate the First Amendment.”)

Herrera v. Pohl, No. 15 C 2983, 2015 WL 7731867, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 1, 2015)(“It was ultimately discovered that Herrera could be charged with an unrelated crime, but that is of no effect when the question is whether he was unlawfully held for the month preceding the issuance of a warrant in that other case. The wheels that ultimately resulted in the indictment's dismissal were set in motion too late because Houpt and Knudsen failed in their duty to consider evidence at their ready disposal that at a glance would have resolved whether they had the wrong man. . . .Houpt and Knudsen raise the defense of qualified immunity, a defense that should be decided at as early a stage as is consistent with the liberal notice pleading requirements of Rule 8Houpt and Knudsen cannot . . . take refuge by simply pointing to the absence of clearly analogous caselaw. Law enforcement personnel do not get a free pass for shocking and egregious abuses of power simply because those abuses mark an innovation in the catalogue of shocking and egregious abuses of power. And their conduct as alleged by Herrera (and as necessarily credited at this threshold stage) does fit under the well-established rubric of Hankins, BeVier and Armstrong, which possess the appropriate specificity to have put a reasonable officer on notice that he had a duty to act.”)

Vaughn v. City of Chicago, 14 C 47, 2014 WL 3865838, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2014) (“At the motion to dismiss stage, Defendants are not entitled to the inference that their actions left Vaughn no worse off than when he returned to the scene with a stick in hand. . . It is plausible that Vaughn was safer with a stick in his hand than he was after Defendants ordered him to drop it. In simple terms, Defendants made Vaughn an easier target for would-be assailants in the rival group than he otherwise would have been. This marginal increase in risk is sufficient to state a plausible state-created danger claim. . . . [A]n individual has clearly established rights not be stranded (Paine) or trapped (Monfils) in dangerous situations that state actors either created or made more perilous. . . Plaintiff’s claim falls within this clearly established line of cases. Defendants stranded Vaughn in a dangerous situation by ordering him to drop the object he intended to use for self-protection and simply watching while he was bludgeoned to death. The same police actions placed Vaughn in a trap of sorts by making him an easy target for the man who killed him. In short, Defendants are not entitled to dismissal on qualified immunity grounds because Plaintiff’s claim is based on clearly established due process rights.”)

T.V. ex rel. B.V. v. Smith-Green Community School Corp., 2011 WL 3501698, at *17 (N.D. Ind. 2011) (“Principal Couch has qualified immunity from damages because, on the current state of the developing law in this context, particularly involving student speech originating off-campus and by use of the internet, Couch’s actions could reasonably have been thought to be consistent with the rights they are alleged to have violated.”)

Husband v. Turner, No. 07-CV-391-bbc, 2008 WL 2002737, at *4, *5 (W.D. Wis. May 6, 2008) (“Defendants contend that plaintiff’s right to a Miranda warning under the circumstances of the in-school interrogation was not so clear that reasonable officers would have known that failure to give a Miranda warning would violate plaintiff’s Fifth Amendment rights. Defendants are correct. No precedent addresses the custodial nature of school interrogations by police officers. Moreover, although no case on point is necessary where the constitutional violation is obvious, . . . this is not such an obvious case. In the circumstances of plaintiff’s interrogation, it was not so evident that a Miranda warning was required that defendants should have reasonably known that a lack of such a warning would violate plaintiff's constitutional rights. Accordingly, when defendants interrogated plaintiff on April 12, 2002, his right to a Miranda warning was not clearly established. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give such a warning. Moreover, although defendants do not raise this argument, it was not even clear in 2002 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a violation of a constitutional right and not simply a ground for excluding evidence obtained from a suspect before the warning was given. At the time, no opinion from the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that a failure to give a Miranda warning violated a person's constitutional rights. . . . Indeed, courts in other circuits had explained that a failure to give a Miranda warning was not a constitutional violation.[citing cases] Some courts have suggested that the Supreme Court repudiated this rationale in 2000 in Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), in which the Court stated that Miranda announced a 'constitutional rule.' . . . However, Dickerson did not hold that a violation of Miranda is a violation of the Fifth Amendment. . . . The Court declined the invitation to 'go farther than Miranda' and refused to say that 'Miranda warnings are required by the Constitution.' . . . In the absence of clear Supreme Court authority, a failure to give a Miranda warning was not clearly established as a constitutional violation until Sornberger, 434 F.3d 1006, was decided in 2006. Sornberger held that if a suspect's statement were used against him in a 'criminal case,' a Miranda violation was actionable under § 1983 (and therefore a constitutional violation). . . . Because it was not clearly established until 2006 that a failure to give a Miranda warning was a constitutional violation, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to give plaintiff a Miranda warning on April 12, 2002.'").

West v. Frank, No. 04-C-173-C, 2005 WL 701703, at 5-7 (W.D. Wis. Mar. 25, 2005)(not reported) ("Defendants do not try to defend the constitutionality of the decisions to deny plaintiff the downloaded internet materials sent to him under the old version of DOC 309 IMP 1. They do not argue that any penological interest was furthered by denying plaintiff the materials sent to him by his family and they do not try to show any reasonable relation between their actions and any penological interest. Instead, they argue that plaintiff's right to receive internet materials was not clearly established at the time the original version of DOC 309 IMP I was in effect. Because the policy burdens plaintiff's First Amendment right to receive mail and because there is no record evidence of any legitimate penological interest served by the restriction, I must conclude that the policy violated plaintiff's First Amendment rights. . . . Plaintiff frames the right at issue in this case as an inmate's 'right to information,' which was recognized in Turner. Although that case did not establish or recognize this right explicitly, it did acknowledge implicitly that prison inmates have protected interests in sending and receiving mail. . . . It is reasonable to infer that these interests grow out of an underlying interest inmates have in receiving and sending information. Thus, plaintiff's contention is not an incorrect statement of the law. For the purpose of the 'clearly established' inquiry, however, the right identified by plaintiff is too broad because it fails to incorporate the specific factual context of this case. . . . The fact that an inmate's right to information was clearly established at the time defendants' denied plaintiff's mail would not put defendants on notice that the reason why plaintiff's mail was denied in this case was constitutionally suspect. The proper formulation of the right at issue in this case is an inmate's right to receive and possess materials downloaded from the internet. To date, neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has held that a prison policy prohibiting inmates from receiving internet materials violates the First Amendment. . . . The lack of controlling authority in plaintiff's favor does not foreclose the possibility of finding a right clearly established if there is 'such a clear trend in the case law that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by controlling precedent was merely a matter of time.' From August 2003 to February 2004, the time during which defendants denied delivery of plaintiff's mail, Clement [v. California Dept. of Corrections, 364 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir.2004)] was the only case fairly on point. One case does not constitute a clear trend in the law. Given the sometimes extensive curtailment of constitutional rights in the prison setting, the limitation imposed by the earlier version of DOC 309 IMP 1 was not so obviously unconstitutional that reasonable persons in defendants' shoes would have known they were violating plaintiff's First Amendment rights by refusing delivery of his mail."").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Grooms v. Privette, 127 F.4th 730, 734-35 (8th Cir. 2025) ("Grooms has not cited any authority that undermines our doubts about whether inducing the contempt prosecution was an adverse employment action. Since she has the burden to show that clearly established law forbade the inducement, . . . we are left to conclude that Bell and Privette enjoy qualified immunity. We note, as well, that our own research has revealed no authority clearly establishing that inducing the contempt prosecution was an adverse employment action. The Supreme Court recognized in Hartman v. Moore that inducing a criminal prosecution against a private citizen in retaliation for her speech may violate the First Amendment even if it does not result in a conviction or sentence. . . And the Court understandably did not suggest that a private citizen needs to show any effect on the terms or conditions of her employment to make out a claim. The Court has not, however, held that elected officials enjoy similar protection against prosecutions initiated because of their political affiliation. At most, it has suggested in dictum that Hartman extends to elected officials. . . Since we have historically distinguished between First Amendment claims brought by public officials, who must prove an adverse employment action, . . and ones brought by private citizens, who need not, . . we cannot say it was clear that this dictum created an exception to our usual approach. We are aware that the Sixth Circuit has held that filing a lawsuit against a public official may be an adverse action. See Benison v. Ross, 765 F.3d 649, 660 (6th Cir. 2014). Still, assuming its reasoning reached a prosecution of an elected official like Grooms, the sort of 'robust consensus' of persuasive authority that might clearly settle the law remains lacking.")

Harmon v. Preferred Family Healthcare, Inc., 125 F.4th 874, 884-85 (8th Cir. 2025) ("To be sure, DeShaney represents a constitutionally significant general principle, but its high level of generality is insufficient for it to clearly establish a right in this case. Significantly, the officials in DeShaney were not held to have violated any constitutional right. DeShaney did not clearly establish that the Government Defendants violated N.J.'s rights because it is not sufficiently analogous to put a reasonable officer on notice that their actions violated N.J.'s substantive due process rights. Harmon also relies on Youngberg v. Romeo . . . to show that it is clearly established that a state has the duty to protect people who are institutionalized or wholly dependent on the state. . . Youngberg is also cited for the proposition that the Fourteenth Amendment creates a right to safe conditions when the state confines someone. . . Again, these are accepted general constitutional principles. They are, however, insufficiently like the instant facts to meet the clearly established standard set forth by the Supreme Court. . . . Because Harmon failed to show that the alleged substantive due process violations were clearly established, the Government Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the § 1983 claims.”)

Mayfield v. Missouri House of Representatives, 122 F.4th 1046, 1056-57 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Defendants assert that the district court erred by ‘defin[ing] the relevant right at an impermissibly broad level.’ But the Supreme Court has held that ‘[i]t is clearly established that a State may not discharge an employee on a basis that infringes that employee’s constitutionally protected interest in freedom of speech.’ . . A public employee’s First Amendment right to speak on a matter of public concern was clearly established in August 2020. In response, Defendants argue that for a right to be clearly established, a plaintiff must cite cases where the speech was on the same topic (here, public health and safety), and the speech must have been made by a particular kind of employee (nonpartisan), within a particular type of government body (deliberative), and to a particular colleague (partisan leadership). But we do not require such ‘a case directly on point.’ . . Defendants had fair notice that terminating Mayfield for criticizing the decisions of public officials violated the First Amendment. . . Because Mayfield had a First Amendment right to speak on a matter of public concern as a public employee, and that right was clearly established in August 2020, we affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity.”)

Cartia v. Beeman, 122 F.4th 1036, 1043 (8th Cir. 2024) (“A suspect’s ‘right[] to be free from excessive force [is] violated if officers choke, kick, or punch [him] when [he is] restrained, not fighting, and not resisting.’ Tatum v. Robinson, 858 F.3d 544, 552 (8th Cir. 2017); see Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 907 (8th Cir. 2011) (explaining that an officer acted unreasonably by “kick[ing] [the arrestee] several times on both sides of his body, although he was restrained on the ground and offering no resistance”). With Tatum on the books nearly a year earlier, Officers Beeman and Gugliano would have ‘known for certain that the[ir] conduct was unlawful’ and that, once they crossed the line identified in that case, they would no longer be ‘immune from liability’ no matter how many expletives came their way.”)

Poemoceah v. Morton County, North Dakota, 117 F.4th 1049, 1055 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Viewing the factual allegations as a whole and drawing all inferences in his favor, Poemoceah plausibly alleges a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against Swenson. And Poemoceah’s right to be free from excessive force was clearly established in 2017. See Mitchell, 28 F.4th at 898 (collecting cases; explaining we have applied the Graham factors and ‘held time and again that, if a person is not suspected of a serious crime, is not threatening anyone, and is neither fleeing nor resisting arrest, then it is unreasonable for an officer to use more than de minimis force against him’; and concluding this particularized right was clearly established in, and before, 2016).”)

Dunn v. Does 1-22, 116 F.4th 737, 748, 751-52 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Police cannot enjoy the protections of qualified immunity ‘ “by alleging that “the unlawful acts of a small group” justify the arrest of the mass.’ . . . Shades of this blanket probable cause argument color the officers’ individual challenges. . . . When the plaintiffs were arrested, the law was clear: a malicious prosecution claim was only cognizable under § 1983 if the ‘alleged wrongful conduct ... also infringe[d] “some provision of the Constitution or federal law.”’ . . . The Des Moines defendants took a more categorical approach below. They argued that malicious prosecution claims ‘do not exist’ under federal law. That was wrong. Before the Des Moines defendants moved for summary judgment, the Supreme Court held that malicious prosecution is actionable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Conceding that malicious prosecution is a viable § 1983 claim, the defendants argued below that the plaintiffs had not shown ‘actual malice’ under Iowa law. . . . On appeal, the defendants do not engage with the court’s analysis of federal and Iowa law, and we will not make their arguments for them. . . . Instead, they argue for the first time that it was not clearly established that a standalone malicious prosecution claim is cognizable under § 1983. . . . But ‘[i]t is old and well-settled law that issues not raised in the trial court cannot be considered by this court as a basis for reversal.’ . . . Because that is what the Des Moines defendants ask here, we decline to address the appropriate standard for malice under the Fourth Amendment, the other substantive arguments, and whether the claim was clearly established.”)

Dunn v. Does 1-22, 116 F.4th 737, 753 (8th Cir. 2024) (“The seizure of the plaintiffs’ phones exceeded ‘the narrow authority ... to detain briefly’ private property on reasonable suspicion alone. . . . Officer Youngblut’s inability to advance more than threadbare claims of ‘specific and articulable facts,’ . . . only underscores the violation. Unless he had arguable probable cause to seize the phones, he violated the plaintiffs’ clearly established right to be free from unreasonable seizures of their property and is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Officer Youngblut argues that he has it because there was probable cause to arrest each plaintiff. As we have just discussed, the officers lacked even arguable probable cause to arrest Patton, Johnson, Young, and Lewis, so we affirm the denial of qualified immunity to Officer Youngblut and the grant of summary judgment to the plaintiffs on their phone seizure claims.”)

Dunn v. Does 1-22, 116 F.4th 737, 754-55 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Unlike Officer Lawler and Petefish, the district court did not find that factual disputes about Deputy Smith’s involvement in Timberlake’s arrest precluded granting qualified immunity. Rather, the court denied qualified immunity because it could not tell whether he arrived on scene late enough to be ‘entitled to assume’ that the other officers had made ‘an appropriate probable cause inquiry’ before he took custody of Timberlake. The issue boils down to whether it was clearly established that Deputy Smith had an independent duty to ensure the arrest was lawful before taking post-arrest custody of Timberlake. Timberlake has not pointed to any controlling authority or robust consensus of persuasive authority that “‘squarely governs” the facts here’ and puts the constitutional question ‘beyond debate.’ . . . And we do not think the cases in this area would have put Deputy Smith on notice that his post-arrest conduct was unlawful. . . Based on this lack of authority, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to Deputy Smith.”)

Smith v. Rozeboom, 108 F.4th 1064, 1071 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Smith argues that Maas and Malone retaliated against her for recording the encounter. She specifies that Maas grabbed her arm while she was recording; when she broke away from Maas and continued recording, Malone restrained and handcuffed her. Smith relies on our reference in Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2020), to a ‘clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.’ . . In this case, however, the video evidence shows that Smith was close to the scene and interfering with the officers. As she recorded, Smith inserted herself between Storrs and the officers after the police advised Storrs that he was being detained. Smith cites no authority that she enjoyed a constitutional right to record a police encounter while interfering with an effort of the officers to carry out their duties. She thus cannot show that the officers violated a clearly established right when they arrested her for obstructing a peace officer.”)

Irish v. McNamara, 108 F.4th 715, 719, 721 (8th Cir. 2024) (“We have already recognized that even after Brower and Brendlin, the law is not clearly established in this area. As of 2007, it was not clearly established that an officer “could effect a seizure under the Fourth Amendment without subjectively intending to do so.” . . . Officer Irish says things have changed since Gardner, pointing to Torres v. Madrid, which held that police seized a suspect ‘for the instant th[eir] bullets struck her,’ even though she temporarily eluded arrest afterward. . . . Torres observed that ‘the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain,’ . . . a snippet of the opinion that Officer Irish says leaves ‘no confusion’ that an officer’s subjective intent is irrelevant to whether a seizure occurred. Setting aside the myriad ways Torres is factually distinguishable, we cannot ignore that in the very same sentence Officer Irish quotes, the Court said that it ‘rarely probe[s] the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.’ . . . Rarely, not never. This qualified language is consistent with the Court’s repeated observation that officers’ subjective intent ‘is relevant to an assessment of the Fourth Amendment implications of police conduct’ insofar as ‘that intent has been conveyed to the person confronted.’ . . . Like Brendlin, Torres focused on ‘objective intent,’ but it didn’t disavow the Court’s prior statements or end any ‘debate’ on subjective intent’s role in whether a seizure occurred. . . . In the end, this is a ‘narrow and specialized Fourth Amendment problem,’ . . . where we must ask ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established[.]’ . . . We are not dealing with the use of a K9 against either a suspect or even a traditional bystander, but rather against a fellow officer who was also involved in the chase. . . . All told, we cannot say that it was ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official [in Deputy McNamara’s shoes] would understand’ that he acted unlawfully—or even within the scope of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Contrary to Officer Irish’s warning, our decision today does not mean that one police officer could never seize another. . . . We hold only that it was not clearly established as of March 2022 that an officer in Minnesota could seize a fellow officer with a K9 without subjectively intending to do so. . . . Because Officer Irish has not plausibly pleaded any facts suggesting that Deputy McNamara subjectively intended to seize him, Deputy McNamara is ‘entitled to qualified immunity on the face of the complaint.’”)

Wolk v. City of Brooklyn Center, 107 F.4th 854, 859 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Wolk alleged that the Supervisory Defendants directed law enforcement’s response to the protests and authorized the indiscriminate use of tear gas, flashbang grenades, pepper spray, and rubber bullets to disperse the crowds, which ultimately resulted in Wolk’s injuries. However, this Court concluded last year—more than two years after the incident giving rise to the claims in this case—that it was not clearly established that the use of force with the intent to disperse or repel a crowd constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. See Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1256-57 (8th Cir. 2023) (distinguishing force used by officers with intent to apprehend with force used by officers with intent to disperse or repel). Wolk has not shown it was clearly established as of April 2021 that officers effect a seizure when they use force to disperse protestors. And while Wolk’s complaint generally alleges that some protestors were thrown to the ground for arrest, which tends to show an intent to apprehend rather than disperse, Wolk does not allege that these actions caused Wolk’s injuries. The Supervisory Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Wolk’s Fourth Amendment excessive force and failure to intervene claims, and we reverse the district court’s denial of their motion to dismiss on this basis.”)

Wolk v. City of Brooklyn Center, 107 F.4th 854, 860 (8th Cir., 2024) (“Wolk alleged that prior to curfew and without warning, law enforcement ordered Wolk and other protestors outside Brooklyn Center Police headquarters to back up, and then pepper sprayed them through the chain link fence before Wolk had the chance to comply. Wolk also alleged that an officer shot Wolk in the knee with a rubber bullet through the chain link fence while Wolk was attempting to move away. More facts are necessary to determine whether law enforcement singled Wolk out due to retaliatory animus or was simply acting according to an understanding of its responsibilities. . . We affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity on Wolk’s First Amendment retaliation claims against all Supervisory Defendants except Gannon.”)

Marks v. Bauer, 107 F.4th 840, 842, 849-51 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Ethan Marks, who was 19 years old at the time, sustained a ruptured eyeball, a fractured eye socket, and a traumatic brain injury when Minneapolis Police Officer Benjamin Bauer shot him with a chemical-filled projectile from approximately five to ten feet away. Marks sued Officer Bauer under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court . . . denied Officer Bauer’s motion for summary judgment on Marks’ excessive force claim, finding that genuine issues of material fact precluded a grant of qualified immunity. This interlocutory appeal followed. We affirm. . . . Officer Bauer contends deploying a projectile against an ‘assaultive protestor’ is insufficient force to constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, Marks must show both that a seizure occurred and the seizure was unreasonable. . . While we have noted that ‘[prior] decisions did not place officers on notice that the existence of a seizure depends on the type of force applied for the purpose of dispersing a crowd,’ . . . Officer Bauer was not dispersing a crowd the moment he aimed and shot Marks. The video footage shows that, before Marks was shot, Officer Bauer's general deployment of projectiles allowed officers to form a perimeter and evacuate the stabbing victim. It also shows the officers were able to form a second perimeter around another injured individual. By this time, most of the crowd had retreated and only a couple dozen individuals remained around the second individual who needed medical attention. . . .The projectile aimed and purposefully deployed at Marks by Officer Bauer stopped Marks and achieved the result Officer Bauer intended. The record demonstrates that Officer Bauer applied force to restrain and stop Marks. That Marks was not arrested does not change the analysis. . . . Under the facts and circumstances of this case, Marks was seized when Officer Bauer shot him with a projectile. . . .Regardless of Officer Bauer's intent, the evidence in the record supports a conclusion that Officer Bauer used force capable of causing serious or fatal injury to Marks, who at the time he was shot with the chemical projectile was unarmed, had been pushed several feet away from Officer Pobuda, and was stumbling backwards. Nonetheless, whether Officer Bauer used deadly or non-deadly force need not be conclusively resolved at this stage because viewing the record in the light most favorable to Marks and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, while also viewing the facts from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, Officer Bauer has failed to show his use of force was objectively reasonable as a matter of law. Officer Bauer asserts shooting Marks was objectively reasonable because a reasonable officer would have suspected Marks had committed 'multiple serious and violent crimes,' he posed an immediate threat to Officer Pobuda's safety, and the incident was a tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving situation. Officer Bauer's assertions overstate the evidence in the record at the moment he decided to pull the trigger and shoot Marks in the face. . . . Although a jury might agree with Officer Bauer's assessment of the situation and find his use of force was objectively reasonable, the evidence when viewed in the light most favorable to Marks demonstrates a violation of Marks' constitutional right to be free from excessive force when, under these circumstances, Officer Bauer shot Marks in the face at close range with a chemical projectile. . . .To the extent that Officer Bauer used deadly force when he shot Marks, it was clearly established in May 2020 that the use of deadly force on a non-threatening suspect was objectively unreasonable. The outcome would be the same even if Officer Bauer used less than deadly force by purportedly aiming for Marks' torso. . . .Given the compliant nature of the crowd at the moment of the shooting, which distinguishes this case from the ones cited by Officer Bauer, viewing the record in the light most favorable to Marks, Officer Bauer shot Marks at close range with a weapon that he knew could amount to deadly force. It would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Officer Bauer's position that this high degree of force was disproportionate to the threat before him. . . . On this record, a reasonable jury could conclude that Marks was shot when he neither posed a threat to the officers or the public, nor was he fleeing or ignoring an officer's commands. On the other hand, a jury might agree with Officer Bauer's assessment of the situation and find his use of force was objectively reasonable. Marks has made a compelling showing that Officer Bauer used more than de minimis force when he shot him in the face at close range with a chemical projectile that he knew could cause serious injury or death while Marks was no longer resisting but instead falling backwards to the ground. He used a high level of force despite being given fair notice that at the time of this incident it was objectively unreasonable to use more than de minimis force to seize a non-threatening misdemeanor who was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or ignoring officer commands. . . On this record where disputed issues of material fact exist such that the issues of law cannot be decided without findings on the central fact issues, Officer Bauer is not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Marks v. Bauer, 107 F.4th 840, 851-52, 854 (8th Cir. 2024) (Stras, J., dissenting) (“No Minnesotan can forget the violence in the wake of George Floyd’s death. At the epicenter was Minneapolis’s Third Precinct police station, which rioters burned to the ground. This case is about the chaos that came before. . . . Although this case is tragic, context matters. And here, given the chaos and violence quickly enveloping the officers, there is no way to conclude that Officer Bauer’s actions clearly violated Marks’s rights. . . . Think of the split-second decision he faced: give a six-foot-tall, 200-pound man who had just attacked a fellow officer a second chance or neutralize him with a chemical round. With the benefit of hindsight, we now know that Officer Bauer may have made the wrong choice, but no one can identify a single case involving ‘similar circumstances’ that would have provided ‘fair notice’ that his actions ‘violated [a] Fourth Amendment’ right. . . . Not one. . . . Officer Bauer, by contrast, confronted a violent situation that only grew more precarious by the second. Along with his fellow SWAT team members, he faced a frenzied crowd and had to deal with multiple injured bystanders, one stabbed and another hit with a baseball bat. During the chaos, Officer Bauer made a ‘split-second judgment[]’ to use his less-lethal launcher rather than giving an angry six-foot-tall man another chance to attack a fellow officer). . . . Despite the difficult choice he faced, the court allows this lawsuit to proceed. Today’s message is unmistakable: ‘even in the absence of a clearly controlling legal rule, think twice before acting, regardless of whether your own life [or another’s] is at stake, because a court may step in later and second-guess your decision.’ . . . I respectfully dissent.”)

Sessler v. City of Davenport, Iowa, 102 F.4th 876, 879, 883-84 (8th Cir. 2024) (“This case presents many challenging and close questions. As such, we agree that qualified immunity applies to the claims against the officers. It was not clear at the time of the events in this case whether the fenced-off City streets and sidewalks remained a ‘traditional public forum’ or whether they served as a less-protected ‘limited public forum.’ Further, no reasonable trier of fact could conclude from the summary judgment record that the officers’ actions were anything but content neutral or that such actions were unreasonable or otherwise restricted or diminished Mr. Sessler’s access to his intended audience. In short, the officers in the present case acted within a gray area and transgressed no bright lines clearly established by existing caselaw. . . . [W]e conclude it is unnecessary to resolve the parties’ dispute as to whether the streets retained their character as a traditional public forum during the festival. Reasonable jurists may debate the similarities and differences between the facts presented in Powell, similar cases, and the present case. But qualified immunity for the police officers as against the present claims for damages does not turn on the debates of reasonable jurists. In this gray area, qualified immunity applies to shield the officers from suit. It suffices to hold that (1) the officers’ actions satisfied the reasonableness standard for content-neutral restrictions in a limited public forum, and (2) no firmly established authority demonstrates the fenced-off area was a traditional public forum during Street Fest.”)

Sessler v. City of Davenport, Iowa, 102 F.4th 876, 885, 892-93 (8th Cir. 2024) (Smith, J., concurring) (“I concur in the well-reasoned opinion of the court. I write separately to emphasize that, even assuming the officers violated Sessler’s constitutional rights, those rights were not clearly established under existing precedent. . . .The officers had received complaints about Sessler’s disruptive conduct and the contents of his speech. Would a reasonable officer at the time have been on notice that removing Sessler from Street Fest would violate his constitutional rights? Lacking precedent from this circuit, and considering the conclusions reached by our sister circuits based on discrete facts in Parks, Bible Believers, and Startzell, I conclude that a reasonable officer would not have been on notice that he was violating Sessler’s constitutional rights. The inconsistency of their actions with his constitutional rights was not beyond debate.”)

Sessler v. City of Davenport, Iowa, 102 F.4th 876, 893-94 (8th Cir. 2024) (Erickson, J., dissenting) (“The majority holds that ‘no reasonable trier of fact could conclude from the summary judgment record that the officers’ actions were anything but content neutral.’ Because I believe a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that the decision was not content neutral, I respectfully dissent. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Sessler and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, as we must at this stage in the litigation, there is at least a fact question as to whether he was removed because of the content of his message or because of secondary effects like volume. . . . The concurrence asserts that even if we assume a constitutional violation occurred, the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity because Sessler’s rights were not clearly established. But the right to be free from content-based restrictions on speech due to listener reactions is clearly established, . . . and the only reasons Officer Behning gave Sessler for his ultimate exclusion from Street Fest were listener reactions.”)

Fisherman v. Launderville, 100 F.4th 978, 981 (8th Cir. 2024) (“The law has been settled for at least three decades that repeatedly striking a fully restrained inmate violates the Eighth Amendment. As early as 1994, we expressed ‘confiden[ce] that prison officials reasonably should have understood ... that they were violating a prisoner’s Eighth Amendment rights if they beat him while he was bound hand and foot in a padded cell, even though the prisoner may have sustained no serious injury.’”)

Davitt v. Spindler-Krage, 96 F.4th 1068, 1072 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Davitt needs to present law that shows it was clearly established in late spring 2020 that someone in his situation was a tenant. Moreover, Davitt must show that Canan and Spindler-Krage were not objectively reasonable in advising that, under the specific circumstances, he was a hotel guest. None of the cases Davitt relies on present facts that would have put Canan and Spindler-Krage on notice that he had clearly established rights as a tenant. Davitt presents no case law or statutory authority that is remotely clear as to whether a person in his situation qualified as a tenant. Likewise, in conducting their legal research, Canan and Spindler-Krage encountered a dearth of precedent. The two attorneys’ advice relied on the lack of clearly established law. Accordingly, Canan and Spindler-Krage were objectively reasonable in determining that Davitt was a trespassing hotel guest without the property and due process interests of a tenant.”)

Noon v. City of Platte Woods, Missouri, 94 F.4th 759, 766-67 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Although Smedley and Kerns offer evidence evincing some interoffice disharmony, it is not enough to overcome the Officers’ First Amendment interest. Here, the Complaint Packet alleges, among many other things, financial mismanagement, workplace misconduct, and serious investigative failures. The public would certainly be interested in these issues. Moreover, there is no evidence that the Officers were unable to perform their job duties after submitting the Complaint Packet, and this is not an ‘extreme situation[],’ where ‘the employee unduly breached confidentiality or disrupted intimate working relationships.’ . . . These circumstances negate any interests weighing in favor of Smedley and Kerns. Thus, we conclude the Pickering factors weigh in favor of the Officers. . . . We conclude Smedley and Kerns had fair notice their alleged adverse actions were unlawful. . . . We have held ‘no right is more clearly established than freedom of speech [and] ... speech alleging illegal misconduct by public officials occupies the “highest rung of First Amendment hierarchy.”’ . . . Further, in Sexton, we held it ‘clearly established that the disclosure of potential illegal conduct of public officials was a matter of public concern.’ . . . And in Lindsey, we held speech by a city employee was protected by the First Amendment because it ‘amounts to straightforward criticism of the Council’s sunshine law compliance.’ . . . Thus, Smedley and Kerns cannot reasonably say they did not understand terminating the Officers for engaging in protected speech violated the Officers’ First Amendment rights. After all, ‘a reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.’ . . . The Officers’ First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for protected speech was clearly established.”)

Estate of Nash v. Folsom, 92 F.4th 746, 758-60 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Our cases show that omitting truthful evidence from a probable cause affidavit violated a clearly established constitutional right in 2008, placing the constitutional question beyond debate. . . . The Nashes’ case is stronger than that presented in Jacobs. Like Jacobs, the omitted facts should have alerted the officers that they lacked probable cause for Nash’s warrant. Given the quantity and gravity of information omitted from the affidavit, a reasonable officer would have understood that omitting this truthful information violated Nash’s constitutional right. Thus, like Jacobs, the magistrate examining the affidavit would not have granted a warrant if aware of the investigation’s full scope. In Jacobs, we found the warrant deficient because one clearly critical fact was omitted; here, the officers omitted five. The defendants argue that our decision in Hartman v. Bowles shows that their behavior did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . We disagree. In Hartman, a detective submitted a warrant application to arrest two white men that he believed were involved in the shooting of a fire captain. . . . But the warrant application omitted a fact unbeknownst to the detective—the fire captain described his assailant as a black male. . . . We held that the detective was entitled to qualified immunity because—although his probable cause affidavit omitted critical information—he did not know that the information existed. . . . For Hartman to apply, the officers must not have known the information from the 1982 investigation when they submitted the probable cause affidavit. But the officers did know about the 1982 investigation, making Hartman distinguishable. The district court did not err in denying qualified immunity for Count I. . . . Count II alleges that the defendants fabricated evidence in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. ‘It was clearly established by 2006 that the Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee of due process is violated by the manufacture of false evidence in order to falsely formulate a pretense of probable cause.’. . Count III alleges that the defendants’ failure to investigate violated the Fourteenth Amendment. We have previously held that in the absence of exigent circumstances, an officer who intentionally or recklessly fails to sufficiently investigate an incident before arresting a suspect is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Count V alleges a Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment right of access to courts claim. In 2005, we recognized that ‘[t]he right of access to the courts is well-established.’. . Count VII alleges a claim under the First and Fourteenth Amendments for government interference with familial and marital relationships. However, ‘[n]either the Supreme Court nor this court has clearly held wrongful prosecution and incarceration of a family member violates a right to familial association.’. . Based on controlling precedent, Counts II, III, and V allege clearly established constitutional rights as of 2008. But Count VII does not allege a constitutional right that was clearly established in 2008. Consequently, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity on Count VII.”)

Stewart v. Precythe, 91 F.4th 944, 950-53 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Considering only the plausible allegations and taking them as true—that Precythe ‘promulgated and acquiesced [in] a policy ... of ... handcuffing and shackling prisoners confined in administrative segregation units to a steel bench in a sitting hog tied position for hours’—Precythe is entitled to qualified immunity under either an excessive-force or conditions-of-confinement claim because Stewart has failed to allege that Precythe committed a constitutional violation. Although Stewart makes several allegations about the treatment he received from various correctional officers—ranging from ignoring his requests for help to taunting Stewart upon realizing he was injured—his complaint alleges that Precythe’s only personal involvement was the authorization and promulgation of the policy at issue. Because Precythe ‘is only liable for [her] ... own misconduct,’. . . our review is limited to her conduct in relation to acquiescing to and promulgating the alleged restraint policy. . . .Considering the foregoing precedent, Stewart’s allegations against Precythe fall short of demonstrating a constitutional violation. Without additional facts, Stewart’s allegation that Precythe promulgated a policy of handcuffing and shackling a prisoner to a bench for a period of hours, coupled with his allegation that on two occasions he was restrained for over two hours, do not, on their own, violate the Eighth Amendment. Indeed, the allegations against Precythe regarding the restraint policy represent the kind of punishment necessary ‘to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security,’ and there are no allegations that Precythe’s conduct in adopting and promulgating the policy is ‘repugnant to the conscience of mankind.’. . . Notably, the alleged duration of the restraint here is significantly shorter than the durations in Key and Gutzmer, and there are no allegations against Precythe that suggest the restraint policy directed the same kind of conduct that this Court found precluded qualified immunity in Walker. Stewart’s allegations against the other defendants, including that he was taunted and denied medical care, food, water, or restroom breaks, are untethered from his allegations regarding the policy that Precythe allegedly promulgated. The policy, as defined by Stewart, coupled with Precythe’s conduct in acquiescing to or promulgating it, does not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . .Finding no allegation of a constitutional violation in the complaint, we need not consider whether the right was clearly established to conclude that Precythe is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . However, even assuming that Stewart plausibly alleged a constitutional violation, we note that there is no ‘controlling authority ... [or] “robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ establishing that the conduct violated the Constitution. . . . As described above, our Circuit’s case law has never held that the use of restraint benches is per se unconstitutional, and it has found restraint policies involving longer durations than the one at issue here to pass constitutional muster. In light of the foregoing, we cannot say there is any controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority that would satisfy the clearly established prong. We therefore conclude that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to Precythe.”)

Stewart v. Precythe, 91 F.4th 944, 954-55 (8th Cir. 2024) (Kelly, J., dissenting) (“There is nothing in the First Amended Complaint to indicate that Stewart provoked the response of the correctional officers or that he engaged in conduct that threatened their ability to maintain or restore discipline. Rather, as alleged, MDOC’s use of force—which included placement on the restraint bench—was triggered when Stewart or his assigned cellmate expressed concerns about their cell assignments. It is clearly established law that the use of force where none is warranted, in a prison setting, violates the Eighth Amendment. . . . In this case, nothing in the First Amended Complaint suggested that ‘prison security and order’ were in any way ‘placed in jeopardy,’ so there was no need for the use of any force at all, let alone the use of the restraint bench. . . . Taking all facts alleged in the First Amended Complaint as true, and drawing all inferences in his favor, as we must, Stewart has made out a claim against Precythe in her individual capacity based on her promulgation of a policy authorizing the use of force where none is required. I respectfully dissent.”)

Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1255-57 (8th Cir. 2023) (“To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, the claimant must demonstrate that a seizure occurred and that the seizure was unreasonable. . . . The threshold question here is whether the protestors were seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The protestors maintain that the officers effected a seizure when they used force against them with an intent to disperse the crowd. The municipalities argue, however, that when an officer’s use of force is designed to disperse a crowd, there is no seizure. Even assuming that the plaintiffs could proceed against unnamed police officers, . . . the protestors have not shown that it was clearly established as of November 2016 that a use of force designed to disperse a crowd constituted a seizure. The protestors maintain that the officers used force to restrain their ‘freedom of movement’ because the force ‘knocked most of the Appellants and many of the other assembled persons off their feet or otherwise restricted their freedom of movement by stopping them in their tracks.’ They rely primarily on Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989 (2021), which held that police seized a suspect for the instant that police bullets struck her, even though the suspect temporarily eluded arrest thereafter. . . . Torres was decided after the encounter at issue here, so it does not constitute clearly established law for purposes of this case. In any event, Torres involved force used to apprehend a suspect . . . and did not address whether force used only to compel departure from an area constitutes a seizure. This court has recognized that the law is not clearly established in this area. As of 2014, it was not clearly established that the use of tear gas by police to disperse news reporters from the site of public unrest and protests was a seizure. Quraishi v. St. Charles County, 986 F.3d 831, 839-40 (8th Cir. 2021). As of 2018, it was not clearly established that a push used to repel a subject seeking to enter a government facility was a seizure. Martinez v. Sasse, 37 F.4th 506, 510 (8th Cir. 2022). The protestors here suggest a legally significant difference between the use of tear gas or pepper spray, which disperses through the air, and the deployment of munitions such as rubber bullets or bean bags. Our decisions, however, have recognized a potential distinction between force used with intent to apprehend and force used with intent to disperse or repel. Those decisions did not place officers on notice that the existence of a seizure depends on the type of force applied for the purpose of dispersing a crowd. The protestors invoke Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888 (8th Cir. 2022), where a protestor alleged that he was injured by lead-filled bean bags during another protest at the Backwater Bridge. This court concluded that the protestor's claim alleging excessive force survived a motion to dismiss. But the protestor in that case 'was arrested,' so the court had no occasion to consider whether a use of force to disperse rather than to apprehend constituted a seizure. . . Other cited authorities are similarly inapposite because the officer used force to apprehend a suspect. . . The protestors rely on a decision from the Ninth Circuit about the use of 'pepperballs' to disperse students from an unruly party. Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 877 (9th Cir. 2012). Although the use of force was designed to disperse the students, the court concluded that the student was seized because the 'application of force was a knowing and wilful act that terminated Nelson's freedom of movement.' . . While Nelson may lend support to the protestors' theory, it does not demonstrate clearly established law as of November 2016 that the officers' use of force to disperse the protestors was a seizure. One decision from another court of appeals falls short of a 'robust consensus of authority' clearly establishing that the use of force to disperse is a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. Indeed, after Nelson was decided, this court in Quraishi and Martinez concluded that the law was not clearly established on the relevant point. . . . We conclude that the protestors have not established that the individual officers violated a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment, because it was not clearly established as of November 2016 that use of force to disperse the crowd was a seizure. The protestors do not develop an argument that the actions of the officers clearly 'shocked the conscience,' see County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 846-47 (1998), or otherwise violated a clearly established right of the protestors under the Due Process Clause. The district court properly dismissed the claims against the officers under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.") Nieters v. Holtan, 83 F.4th 1099, 1107-08 (8th Cir. 2023) ("Even if we concluded Officer Holtan made a reasonable mistake about probable cause when he first tackled Nieters to the ground, Nieters immediately informed Officer Holtan that he was a journalist and he provided press credentials. Yet Officer Holtan still arrested Nieters because he did not want to be perceived as giving a journalist special treatment. Once Officer Holtan was aware Nieters was a member of the press, and had no reason to believe Nieters had been within hearing distance of the orders to disperse, it certainly was not an 'objectively reasonable' mistake to believe probable cause existed for the arrest. 'The continuation of even a lawful arrest violates the Fourth Amendment when the police discover additional facts dissipating their earlier probable cause.' . . This is particularly true when there is a ‘clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.’ Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1090 (8th Cir. 2020). Because material factual disputes preclude awarding qualified immunity, we reverse the district court’s grant of summary judgment on Nieters’s unlawful seizure claim.”)

Nieters v. Holtan, 83 F.3d 1099, 1110-13 (8th Cir. 2023) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In my view, the district court correctly granted Officer Holtan’s motion for summary judgment on Nieters’s unlawful-arrest claim. Thus, I respectfully dissent from Part II-A of the court’s opinion. . . . Demonstrating the reasonableness of Officer Holtan’s decision and further proving that he was not plainly incompetent when making it, ‘neither the panel majority nor [Nieters] have identified a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ . . . Nor do they assert that this is the ‘obvious case where a body of relevant case law is not needed.’ . . . In fact, no controlling decision prior to the court’s opinion here had prohibited an arrest for failure to disperse under Iowa law under the ‘particular circumstances’ before Officer Holtan. . . . Instead, the court masks its incomplete analysis by doing what the Supreme Court has repeatedly told us not to do: define the putative clearly established right at a high level of generality. . . . For these reasons, I conclude that Nieters failed to show a clearly established right to be free from arrest for failure to disperse. I therefore would affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity and summary judgment to Officer Holtan on Nieters’s unlawful-arrest claim.”)

Cheeks v. Belmar, 80 F.4th 872, 875 & n.5, 876-79 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Cheeks asserts Officers Maloy and Jakob breached their duty to stop and attempt to render aid in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.⁵ [fn.5: While there are cases analyzing police pursuits under substantive due process, neither party briefed a substantive due process claim.] While the crash itself was not captured on video, Cheeks presented testimony from Lorenzo Johnson who said he witnessed the officers’ car bump the side of Neil’s car, which caused Neil’s car to go into a spin. The district court relied partly on this testimony of contact between vehicles to conclude ‘[a] reasonable juror could find, based on circumstantial evidence ... that [the officers] had actual knowledge of Neil’s serious medical need and disregarded it.’ We do not have jurisdiction to second-guess this determination. . . . Officers Maloy and Jakob suggest we do have jurisdiction to disturb the conclusion because the video recording ‘blatantly contradicts’ the eyewitness testimony. . . . [T]his exception is not applicable here. The video did not record the accident itself, instead capturing a few moments of the pursuit just prior to the crash. Because the crash itself occurs off screen, Cheeks’s contention that Officers Maloy and Jakob performed a PIT maneuver is not so ‘blatantly contradicted by the record ... that no reasonable jury could believe it[.]’. . . . Nonetheless, the officers argue—again for the first time on appeal—that even assuming such contact between the two vehicles, this does not constitute custody as the term is defined in Gladden. We disagree. When the state limits an individual’s ‘freedom to act on his own behalf,’ . . . by intentionally conducting a maneuver that causes a vehicle to spin out and collide with a tree, the duty arises ‘to provide medical care to persons ... who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.’ . . . Case law in the context of Fourth Amendment claims supports our conclusion. [discussing Hodari D., Brower, Scott. . . So, in the Fourth Amendment context, a seizure arises if a police officer intentionally causes a crash to end a police chase whereas no seizure occurs if there is simply an accidental crash. The officers have offered no reason the same would not be true under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .As discussed above, it is clearly established that a custodial relationship is formed when law enforcement officers limit an individual's 'freedom to act on his own behalf.' This is a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law' that can be applied 'with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' today. . . . If law enforcement officers intentionally force a suspect to crash his car to facilitate the end of a pursuit, the suspect no longer has the liberty 'to care for himself.' . . . When the state limits an individual's 'freedom to act on his own behalf,' . . . by purposely causing a car accident, a clearly established duty arises 'to provide medical care to persons ... who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.' . . . The state of the law gave the officers fair warning that failing to render aid or call for medical assistance for an accident they caused was unconstitutional. Cheeks does not argue that the officers simply delayed calling for medical assistance. Instead, she argues the officers never called for medical assistance—thus denying medical aid altogether. In such cases, where no medical aid was provided, there is no need to provide evidence demonstrating the detrimental effect of the lack of aid. . . . Because the officers failed to render any aid, rather than simply delaying in providing it, our precedent does not require Cheeks to demonstrate the detrimental effect of the lack of aid. Thus, we agree with the district court that, viewed in the light most favorable to Cheeks, she has shown a clearly established constitutional violation.”)

Cheeks v. Belmar, 80 F.4th 872, 879-80 (8th Cir. 2023) (Stras, J., dissenting) (“Not every tort is a constitutional violation. . . . As the court recognizes, the Constitution only creates a duty to aid once officers ‘take[] a person into ... custody and hold[] him there against his will.’ . . . But I could not locate a single case, much less a ‘robust consensus’ of them, that extends it to someone they have seized by force but have not taken into custody. . . . We can debate whether we should extend it to cover this situation, but no officer would be ‘on notice’ that the Constitution does. . . . Qualified immunity applies in just these circumstances. . . . The court, on the other hand, thinks it is ‘obvious’ that Neil was in custody. . . . In its view, ‘rendering [Neil] unable to care for himself’ was enough. . . . The problem with relying on ‘general’ rules is that they often fail to ‘answer the specific and particularized question[s]’ that arise in other situations. . . . Here, the question is whether something short of custody creates a duty to aid. Gladden, the case that allegedly established the duty, never answered that question. It involved an alcoholic who voluntarily accepted a ride from officers and died of hypothermia several hours later. . . . We held that, on those facts, there was no Fourth Amendment seizure, much less the “something more” required for custody. . . . Gladden simply could not have answered the ‘specific and particularized question’ presented in this case. . . . No seizure meant no holding on whether it created a duty to aid. . . . As the Supreme Court has often reminded us, defeating qualified immunity requires a constitutional rule that was ‘clearly established,’ not just ‘suggested by ... precedent.’”)

[See also Lehre v. Artfitch, No. 2:22-CV-105, 2023 WL 5663072, at *4–5 (W.D. Mich. Sept. 1, 2023) (“Even if Plaintiff could establish a genuine issue of material fact on the question of custody, Plaintiff had not met his burden to show that the law was clearly established that, on these or similar facts, a passenger is considered ‘in custody’ for the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment such that an officer would have notice of a duty to provide medical care. The Court adopts the portion of the Report and Recommendation dismissing Plaintiff’s Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference to medical needs. Plaintiff has not demonstrated the existence of clearly established law concerning the custody requirement for this claim. . . .Plaintiff has not established that the officers placed Troy in a more dangerous situation than they found him. Literally, the officers kept Troy exactly where they found him. They did not abandon Troy on the side of a highway; Artfitch stayed with Troy until his family arrived. Troy and his brother were not on the way to the hospital such that the traffic stop prevented Troy from getting to the hospital for medical attention. In addition, Plaintiff’s theory for the state-created danger claim confuses and conflates the deliberate indifference cases and the state-created danger cases. The state-created danger line of cases imposes a constitutional duty on officers upon the termination of a custodial relationship. . . In these situations, plaintiffs seek to hold government agents liable for injuries that occur when the individual is no longer in custody. Plaintiff’s state-created danger claim fails for one of two reasons. If the Court accepts Plaintiff’s allegations, the officers never abandoned Troy and he always remained in their custody. Alternatively, as the Court found above, Troy was never in the officers’ custody for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. Plaintiff has not identified any clearly-established law that would support this unique state-created danger claim where the danger arose because the officers kept Troy in their custody. The Court adopts the portion of the Report and Recommendation dismissing Plaintiff’s Fourteenth Amendment claim for state-created danger. Plaintiff has not demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact that Defendants’ actions placed Troy in greater danger than they found him. And, Plaintiff has not demonstrated that the clearly established law concerning state-created danger extends to a situation where the danger arises during the interaction between the officers and the individual.”)

Dean v. Bearden, 79 F.4th 986, 989-91 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Dean’s position is that Precythe’s failure to ‘take any action’ after learning about the sexual-assault allegations was deliberately indifferent. . . In her view, Precythe should have dealt with the situation personally, not simply relied on ‘staff to tell [her] if there was something [she] needed to know.’ Even if we assume that Precythe should have done more, neither ‘controlling authority nor ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ required it. . . As director, she has wide-ranging responsibilities. Someone in her position would not have known that dealing with sexual-assault allegations by having staff investigate and respond to them was deliberately indifferent under the circumstances. . . .In short, even accepting every finding, Precythe could ‘not have known for certain’ that leaving the investigation to the investigators violated Dean’s constitutional rights. . . . In the absence of anything more definitive, Dean tries to frame her Eighth Amendment argument at a higher level of generality. In her view, it is enough ‘that a prison official could be held liable under § 1983 for exhibiting deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that a [prisoner] would be sexually assaulted by a guard.’ . . The problem, of course, is that ‘clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.’ . . Dean’s ‘broad right’ to protection from sexual assault, in other words, ‘does not answer’ the ‘specific and particularized’ question of whether Precythe violated the Eighth Amendment by waiting for her staff to complete their investigation. . . Her failure to answer that specific question is why Precythe is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Glover v. Paul, 78 F.4th 1019, 1022-23 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Because Kingsley ‘only deleted the subjective prong of the Fourteenth Amendment analysis,’ . . . earlier authorities concluding that a particular use of force violated the Eighth Amendment (and was therefore objectively unreasonable) were sufficient to put an official on notice that the same use of force against a detainee would violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Paul argues that he did not violate Glover’s clearly established right under the Fourteenth Amendment. He maintains that no constitutional violation occurred because ‘manual contact with a detainee’s genitals may be necessary as part of a search.’ And he says that there is no evidence that the strip search or his actions during the search were performed for an improper purpose. In determining whether Paul is entitled to qualified immunity, we must accept facts that the district court assumed were supported by sufficient evidence. . . In the order denying qualified immunity, the district court stated that squeezing a detainee’s penis hard is not a ‘proper part of a search,’ and that the ‘action does not seem inadvertent nor does Paul assert it was.’ The court explained that a ‘jury could find that squeezing a prisoner’s penis hard during a strip search is not penologically necessary.’ We infer from these statements that the court assumed that a jury could find that Paul intentionally squeezed Glover’s penis hard in a manner that was not related to a legitimate penological purpose. As a general proposition, it is clearly established that ‘the sexual assault of an inmate by a guard violates the inmate’s constitutional rights.’ . . A reasonable official would have understood that the conduct alleged in Glover’s verified complaint constituted an unreasonable use of force that violated a detainee’s right under the Fourteenth Amendment. Persuasive authorities from other circuits bolster our conclusion. [discussing cases] In light of these persuasive authorities, and the relevant decisions from this court, we conclude that no reasonable corrections officer could have believed that the actions alleged by Glover are consistent with the Due Process Clause and the prohibition on unreasonable uses of force.”)

Brandy v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 75 F.4th 908, 914 (8th Cir. 2023) (“According to the Supreme Court, ‘the law is settled that as a general matter the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... for speaking out.’ Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 256 (2006). We have similarly confirmed that this right is clearly established in Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith, 925 F.3d 979, 985 (8th Cir. 2019) and Baribeau v. City of Minneapolis, 596 F.3d 465, 481 (8th Cir. 2010). This ‘general constitutional rule’ would apply with ‘obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’ . . Because an officer in Officer Olsten’s position would have been on notice that he could not use his pepper spray as a means to retaliate against a citizen for his or her protected expression, we agree with the district court that

Adams v. City of Cedar Rapids, 74 F.4th 935, 939-40 (8th Cir. 2023) (“The district court ruled that Kuha v. City of Minnetonka, 365 F.3d 590 (8th Cir. 2003) and Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc) clearly established that Officer Trimble was required to provide an adequate warning when searching with his police dog trained to bite and hold. . . . Assuming the facts most favorably to A.H., he did not hear the other officers’ warnings and did not have the opportunity to surrender. Officer Trimble had fair notice from this court’s precedent that the failure to give a warning and an opportunity to surrender violated clearly established law. He is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Adams v. City of Cedar Rapids, 74 F.4th 935, 941 (8th Cir. 2023) (Grasz, J., dissenting) (“It is clearly established in this circuit that when police utilize a canine trained to bite and hold, a suspect must be given a warning and opportunity to surrender. . . . However, it is not clearly established that a police officer using a canine must personally deliver the warning or that the officer must be able to verify the warning was in fact heard by the suspect. We have never before held that it is constitutionally unreasonable for an officer to rely on canine warnings given by others that would reasonably be heard by suspects. Neither Kuha, nor any other precedent placed Officer Trimble on notice of the formulation of Fourth Amendment law utilized by the court today. . . . In finding a dispute of material fact, the court relies on its conclusion that ‘a reasonable jury could believe [A.H.’s] story’ about not hearing the warning. . . . But that is not the right question. Instead, the court should be asking whether it was objectively reasonable for Officer Trimble to believe the suspect would have heard the warnings provided. In sum, I do not believe case law supports the position that Officer Trimble was required to give additional warnings when multiple amplified warnings were already given in the search area, or that it was constitutionally unreasonable to rely on the objective sufficiency of those previous warnings. As such, the evidence does not show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, and qualified immunity is appropriate here. I respectfully dissent.”)

Ching as Trustee for Jordan v. City of Minneapolis, 73 F.4th 617, 621-22 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Our review of the videos of the incident establishes that Walsh never paused during the shooting that lasted less than two seconds, and he continued shooting for only approximately one second after Jordan fell to the ground, dropping the knife. Given the swift and continuous progression of the incident and Walsh’s limited time to observe and process the circumstances, a jury could not find Walsh had sufficient time to reassess the threat Jordan presented before he stopped firing. . . . While mere seconds can be sufficient time for an officer to reassess a threat, . . . this Court’s precedent at the time of the shooting did not provide Walsh with notice that a single second in a less than two-second encounter was sufficient time for him to reassess the threat Jordan presented. Ching has not presented, and we are not aware of, any case in which a court has bifurcated a shooting when an entire continuous shooting lasted less than two seconds, and the alleged excessive force occurred only one second after the threat was arguably dissipated. . . . Because, after Jordan posed a threat to Walsh, it was not clearly established that Walsh’s continuous shooting, which lasted less than two seconds, violated a constitutional right, Walsh is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Rinne v. Camden County, 65 F.4th 378, 384-85 (8th Cir. 2023) (“It was clearly established at the time of the Commission’s action that a government official may not retaliate against a citizen for the exercise of his First Amendment rights. . . Hasty argues, however, that the law was not clearly established that a single voting member of a multi-member governing body could be liable for casting a vote in favor of a retaliatory action. In this case, he argues that his particular vote was not a but-for cause of the ban imposed against Rinne. . . . Our precedent establishes that a single member of a governing board can be liable for voting in favor of an unconstitutional government action. . . In Strickland, this court concluded that high school students who were suspended after a unanimous vote of a three-member school board could bring claims under § 1983 ‘against the individual members of the board and the administrators of the school system who participated in the decision.’ . . According to Strickland, each school board member was subject to liability, even though the vote was unanimous such that no single vote was a but-for cause for the students’ suspension. . . Hasty’s amenability to suit follows a fortiori from Strickland. Like the school board members in Strickland, Hasty is a member of a governmental body who voted to take an allegedly unlawful action. And the case for Hasty’s liability is even stronger: Hasty cast a deciding vote in favor of the ban against Rinne, so his vote was a but-for cause of the allegedly unconstitutional action. . . Accordingly, Hasty is not entitled to qualified immunity based on his status as a voting member of the Commission that imposed the ban.”)

Presson v. Reed, 65 F.4th 357, 370 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Here, the ‘facts in the present case ... align with [the] facts in [Dadd],’ Rusness, . . . and gave Reed and Lane ‘fair warning’ that misadministering prescriptions or failing to provide Presson with his prescribed medication violated Presson’s constitutional rights[.] . . Dadd involved the failure to provide prescribed medication to the pretrial detainee despite the defendants’ knowledge that the pretrial detainee was prescribed a pain reliever following his dental surgery and the pretrial detainee’s repeated complaints of pain to the defendants. The same is true here. Reed and Lane failed to administer or misadministered the medication to Presson despite knowing a doctor prescribed them and despite Presson’s repeated requests for his medication. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Presson, his ‘right to adequate treatment was clearly established, and the district court properly denied the defendants qualified immunity.’”) Molina v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 59 F.4th 334, 338-40, 343-44 (8th Cir. 2023), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, 65 F.4th 994 (8th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub nom Molina v. Book, 144 S. Ct. 1000 (2024) (“Molina and Vogel claim that the First Amendment covers what they did, which was observe and record police conduct during the St. Louis protest. Even if we were to assume they are correct, observing and recording police-citizen interactions was not a clearly established First Amendment right in 2015. . . . None of the plaintiffs’ cases clearly establish otherwise. . . . It is true, as the plaintiffs note, that some of the language in Chestnut was broad.

Relying on a few out-of-circuit cases invoking the First Amendment, for example, we stated that there is a ‘clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.’. . . But we did so based only on ‘the facts that existed when [the bystander] was seized’—a clear reference to the Fourth Amendment issue we were deciding. . . . The point is that neither of these Fourth Amendment cases can clearly establish a First Amendment right to observe police officers. . . . Nor did a clearly established First Amendment right to record them exist in 2015. See Frasier v. Evans, 992 F.3d 1003, 1019–20 (10th Cir. 2021) (holding that a “purported First Amendment right to record [police officers] was not clearly established in August 2014”); Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 362 (3d Cir. 2017) (“[W]e cannot say that the state of the law at the time of our cases (2012 and 2013) gave fair warning so that every reasonable officer knew that, absent some sort of expressive intent, recording public police activity was constitutionally protected.”); Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 687 (5th Cir. 2017) (explaining that “there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police” in 2015). . . . Having considered multiple possibilities, we conclude that none of them work. Qualified immunity prevents Molina and Vogel from recovering on their First Amendment retaliation claims. . . . Groce’s First Amendment retaliation claim, on the other hand, fares better. Recall that he followed the BEAR on a bicycle and then yelled, ‘[g]et the fuck out of my park.’ His ‘[c]riticism of [the] officers, even with profanity, is protected speech.’. . . And at least one case clearly established the right to be free from retaliation in those circumstances. See Peterson v. Kopp, 754 F.3d 594, 602 (8th Cir. 2014) (stating that “criticizing a police officer and asking for his badge number is protected speech”) . . . To counter what appears to be a clearly established constitutional right, the officers claim this case is different. In their view, Groce acted in an aggressive and threatening manner, which then gave them arguable probable cause to act. Even assuming that the presence of arguable probable cause is an absolute defense to a First Amendment retaliation claim—a question we need not decide today—their position depends on reinterpreting the facts in a ‘light most favorable to’ them, not Groce. . . . Under the ‘plaintiff-friendly version of the facts,’ by contrast, there was no probable cause, arguable or otherwise, to take any action against Groce. . . . The officers cannot identify any crime that he allegedly committed. Yet they launched a tear-gas canister at him a few minutes after video footage ‘depict[ed] a calm scene,’ even though they had no evidence ‘that [he] was armed or otherwise presented any threat to the [officers] inside their armored vehicle.’ We have no jurisdiction to reinterpret these facts, which support the denial of qualified immunity.”) Molina v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 59 F.4th 334, 345-48 (8th Cir. 2023) (Benton, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, 65 F.4th 994 (8th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub nom Molina v. Book, 144 S. Ct. 1000 (2024) (“The panel opinion here holds that observing and recording police-citizen interactions was not a clearly established First Amendment right on August 19, 2015. This conclusion violates this circuit’s ‘cardinal rule ... that one panel is bound by the decision of a prior panel.’. . . Two cases bind this court: Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2020), and Walker v. City of Pine Bluff, 414 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2005). Both cases found a clearly established First Amendment right to observe police officers that existed before the events precipitating this case. . . . Walker, the earlier case, held that observing police officers could not be outlawed. . . This court denied qualified immunity to an officer who arrested an individual for ‘silently watching the [police] encounter from across the street with his arms folded in a disapproving manner.’. . The Walker case analyzed the legal effect of only this silent observation. . . This court held that the officer lacked probable cause because it was ‘clearly established’ that a peaceful onlooker could not be arrested ‘for obstruction of governmental operations or for any other purported crime.’. . The state, said this court, did not just happen to permit officer-watching, it had to permit it. This court detailed the nature and origin of Walker’s clearly established substantive right in Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085. This court there reaffirmed the constitutional origin of the ‘clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.’. . And it confirmed that the First Amendment gives rise to this right by citing seven First Amendment cases, including two from this circuit. . . . Chestnut’s recognition of a clearly established First Amendment right to observe police interactions was a holding, not dicta. This court said so:

Other legal authorities fully support our holding that the right here was clearly established. Every circuit court to have considered the question has held that a person has the right to record police activity in public. [citation omitted]. Four circuits had so decided by the time of the events in question here. [citations omitted]. This robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority suggests that, if the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording.

Chestnut, 947 F.3d at 1090 . . . The panel opinion here attributes that clearly established right to the Fourth, rather than First, Amendment. In doing do, it underappreciates the interplay between First and Fourth Amendment rights in this circuit’s precedent. . . . Chestnut and Walker found it clearly established that peacefully observing a police officer did not furnish reasonable suspicion (or probable cause) of criminal activity and therefore did not justify a Fourth Amendment seizure. The panel opinion today presumes that peaceful police-observation fits the first category of legal conduct insufficient for a search or seizure—conduct that just happens to be legal. But this circuit’s precedent clearly establishes that peaceful police-observation must be legal—it is constitutionally protected First Amendment activity. . . Chestnut and Walker were indeed Fourth Amendment cases. But the Fourth Amendment makes it unreasonable to arrest or detain someone for conduct that, because the constitution protects it, could never be criminal. Chestnut and Walker, in reaching their Fourth Amendment holdings, clearly established that the First Amendment protects peaceful police-observation in this circuit. This panel is ‘powerless’ to overturn those holdings. . . Because Molina and Vogel were engaged in protected First Amendment activity, their First Amendment claims should be allowed to proceed. I dissent from Part II of the panel opinion here, but fully concur in Part III.”)

Feb. 14, 2025) (“The City argues that the Eighth Circuit foreclosed the possibility of municipal liability against it by holding that there was no violation of Plaintiffs Molina and Vogel’s First Amendment rights. By contrast, Plaintiffs argue that the Eighth Circuit’s decision merely held that their First Amendment right to observe and record police-citizen interactions was not clearly established at the time of the incident at issue in this case, and therefore, the City may still be liable for tacitly authorizing an unconstitutional custom. The Court finds Plaintiffs’ argument more persuasive. The Eighth Circuit did not address the constitutional merit of Plaintiffs’ argument that the individual officers in the BEAR retaliated against them for observing and recording police-citizen interactions. Instead, the Eighth Circuit only found that this theory could not overcome qualified immunity because any right to observe and record police was not clearly established in 2015. As such, the Eighth Circuit did not actually reach the issue the City claims is preclusive. . . . Without deciding the issue, the Eighth Circuit held only that ‘observing and recording police-citizen interactions was not a clearly established First Amendment right in 2015,’ and therefore the individual officers were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The City nevertheless argues that the Eighth Circuit ‘plainly held’ that there was no underlying First Amendment violation because the Defendant officers were not motivated by retaliatory animus. . . . However, the City reads the Eighth Circuit’s decision too broadly. The Eighth Circuit only applied its analysis on retaliatory animus to Plaintiffs’ alternate ‘peaceful assembly’ theory in Part C of the decision and not to any of Plaintiffs’ additional theories, including the right to observe and record theory separately and singularly addressed in Part B of the decision. The Eighth Circuit’s finding that there was no underlying constitutional violation on Plaintiffs’ alternate ‘peaceful assembly’ theory does not imply, let alone explicitly determine, that the Eighth Circuit also held that there was no underlying violation of Plaintiffs’ constitutional right to observe and record the police. This Court previously held, and continues to hold, that chasing after and deploying tear gas at legal observers and peaceful protestors who complied with a dispersal order and retreated to a sidewalk far away from an earlier assembly violates the First Amendment The Eighth Circuit did not overturn or disturb this holding. Because the Court finds that Plaintiffs have presented facts which, viewed in the light most favorable to them, demonstrate that they were deprived of their First Amendment rights, Plaintiffs’ Monell claims survive despite the individual officers’ qualified immunity from suit.”); Sahr v. City of Des Moines, Iowa, 666 F.Supp.3d 861, ___ (S.D. Iowa 2023) (“There is no question that the right to protest and express displeasure with the police was clearly established. But given Buck’s affirmative defense the question here is whether a reasonable officer should have known that the right to record police officers in these circumstances was a clearly established right under the First Amendment. . . . In this instance, after oral argument on Defendants’ Motion, the Eighth Circuit determined two on-point Fourth Amendment cases decided before May 2020—Chestnut and Walker—never established that a person has a First Amendment right to record or observe officers in the performance of their public duties. Molina v. City of St. Louis, 59 F.4th 334, 338 (8th Cir. 2023) (“[N]either of these Fourth Amendment cases can clearly establish a First Amendment right to observe police officers.”). The Eighth Circuit’s position is contrary to ‘the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits[, which] have all concluded in published opinions that the First Amendment protects a right to film the police performing their duties in public.’. . . Irizarry adds the Tenth Circuit to the list, bringing the total number of federal circuits that have recognized the right to observe or record police officers to seven. . . . Despite the majority of circuits holding otherwise, this Court is bound by Eighth Circuit precedent. Thus, Buck would have lacked notice that he was violating Plaintiff’s First Amendment right in the specific circumstances he faced, even assuming a reasonable juror could find Plaintiff never joined or remained with an unlawful assembly or riot. . . . Indeed, the Eighth Circuit never concluded that a person has such a right. . . . Therefore, Plaintiff cannot establish the clearly established prong to defeat qualified immunity. Following the rule of constitutional avoidance, the Court need not address the merits of Plaintiff's First Amendment retaliation claim, though the absence of probable cause is 'weighty evidence that the officer's animus caused the arrest.' . . . Because the lack of clearly established law resolves Plaintiff's federal free-speech claim on qualified immunity grounds, it fails as a matter of law.")

City of St. Louis, Missouri*, 65 F.4th 994, 994-96 (8th Cir. 2023) (Colloton, J., with whom Benton, J., joins, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("Imagine the following local ordinance: It shall be unlawful for any person to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering. A violation of this section shall be punishable as a misdemeanor. According to the rationale of the panel majority in this case, a reasonable public official in August 2015 could have believed that this hypothetical ordinance is consistent with the First Amendment. And the panel majority volunteered further that the supposed absence of a decision recognizing a First Amendment right to observe police conduct at a distance and without interfering 'makes good sense.' Molina v. City of St. Louis, 59 F.4th 334, 340 n.2 (8th Cir. 2023). Rehearing is warranted to consider whether intentional police retaliation against citizens identifying themselves as legal observers during a public protest violated a clearly established right of the legal observers. As the panel dissent pointed out, this court already concluded that police officers were on notice of a clearly established right under the First Amendment to observe police conduct as of February 2015—before the incident in this case. Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1090-91 (8th Cir. 2020); see Chestnut v. Wallace, No. 4:16-cv-1721, 2018 WL 5831260, at *1 (E.D. Mo. Nov. 7, 2018). Applying Walker v. City of Pine Bluff, 414 F.3d 989 (8th Cir. 2005), the court in Chestnut held that a police officer's seizure of a citizen was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment precisely because the citizen was exercising a clearly established right under the First Amendment:

Taking the facts in Chestnut's favor, we think Walker establishes that Wallace violated Chestnut's clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering. ... We think we have correctly characterized the principle acted on in Walker, and thus the right in question, and we conclude that Chestnut has carried his burden to show that Walker clearly establishes such a right.

Other legal authorities fully support our holding that the right here was clearly established. Every circuit court to have considered the question has held that a person has the right to record police activity in public. See, e.g., Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355–56 (3d Cir. 2017). Four circuits had so decided by the time of the events in question here. See ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 595 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82–83 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). This robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority suggests that, if the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording. ... Surely if officers cannot seize someone who criticizes or curses at them while they perform official duties, they cannot seize someone for

Chestnut's conclusion about a clearly established First Amendment right to observe police activity as of February 2015 was part and parcel of the court's analysis as to why a police officer could not reasonably seize the citizen in that case. A subsequent panel is not free to disregard that aspect of Chestnut even if the panel majority thinks it would make 'good sense' for a court to say that the First Amendment allows a city to outlaw the observation of police activity. . . . Rehearing also would allow consideration of the panel opinion's conclusion that attending a protest while wearing a bright-colored hat emblazoned with 'National Lawyers Guild Legal Observer' rather than 'Protestor' is not clearly protected expression. The panel majority deemed this a 'close call' only after mistakenly requiring that the legal observers communicate a 'particularized message' during the protest. The Supreme Court has explained that 'a narrow, succinctly articulable message is not a condition of constitutional protection, which if confined to expressions conveying a "particularized message" would never reach the unquestionably shielded painting of Jackson Pollock, music of Arnold Schönberg, or Jabberwocky verse of Lewis Carroll.' Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557, 569, 115 S.Ct. 2338, 132 L.Ed.2d 487 (1995). As the Court's examples show, this rule is not limited to expression in parades: our circuit law already said as much before the panel opinion in this case purported to narrow it. . . . The conflicts between the panel opinion and circuit precedent are particularly regrettable because the issues under discussion were not even raised by the police officers in this case. The officers did not argue in the district court or in their opening brief on appeal that the legal observers engaged in no protected First Amendment activity, so that issue was waived. . . . Nor did they assert the panel majority's theory of qualified immunity on the civil rights claim that requires no First Amendment activity. . . . The officers argued on appeal only (1) that they had arguable probable cause to deploy tear gas canisters against the legal observers, (2) that the district court failed to analyze the conduct of each officer individually, and (3) that it was reasonable for the officers to believe that they could attempt to disperse a disorderly and assaultive crowd. The panel raised new issues in an order for supplemental briefing, and then reversed the district court's order on that basis in a divided decision. That is not how the system should work: 'The premise of our adversarial system is that appellate courts do not sit as self-directed boards of legal inquiry and research, but essentially as arbiters of legal questions presented and argued by the parties before them.' . . . I would grant the petition for rehearing.")

Leonard v. St. Charles County Police Department, 59 F.4th 355, 360, 362-63 (8th Cir. 2023) ("Given the fast-moving and volatile situation he faced, the use of non-lethal force was reasonable under the circumstances. Another officer had warned Leonard about the possible use of pepper spray, but it made no difference. . . . In that 'split-second,' Officer Harris faced a difficult choice: do nothing and risk Leonard's escape or use non-lethal force to subdue him. . . . Given Leonard's 'size[] and strength,' which made wrestling him to the ground impractical and dangerous, he chose the latter option. . . . In those ways, this case is distinguishable from Tatum v. Robinson, 858 F.3d 544 (8th Cir. 2017), which involved a 'non-resisting, non-fleeing' shoplifting suspect who was pepper sprayed inside a department store. . . In this case, by contrast, Leonard had failed to follow directions, slipped away from two officers, and was on his way to escaping. The fact that the use of pepper spray was unreasonable in Tatum . . . tells us nothing about whether its use here crossed a constitutional line. The two situations are ‘just too different.’ Laney v. City of St. Louis, 56 F.4th 1153, 1158 (8th Cir. 2023) (citation omitted). . . .When it comes to Leonard’s deliberate-indifference claim against Nurse Martin, we have to turn back the clock. According to him, her early failure to administer his prescription medications started the entire chain of events that eventually led to the loss of the eye. Although it is a close call whether her lack of action shows a deliberate indifference to a serious medical need, we ultimately conclude that the constitutional violation, if any, was not clearly established at the time. . . There is no dispute that Leonard did not receive a single dose of prescription medication, including for his mental illness, until after he had damaged his eye. And Nurse Martin did not have the jail pharmacy dispense an available alternative. Instead, she dealt with his psychosis by placing him in the Suicide Prevention Unit, where he was ‘close[ly] observ[ed].’ The question here is whether these decisions rise to the level of ‘punishment[.]’. . At first glance, it might seem that they do. We have said that, ‘[w]hen an official denies a person . . . medication that has been prescribed, constitutional liability may follow.’. . But liability is not automatic. The word ‘may’ leaves room for consideration of the specific facts and circumstances of the case, including any precautionary measures Nurse Martin did take. Here, once Leonard began showing suicidal tendencies, she placed him in the Suicide Prevention Unit, which had procedures in place to prevent inmates from harming themselves. It did not stop him from inflicting irreversible damage on his eye, as it turns out, but we only know that with the benefit of hindsight. . . . Considered at the proper ‘level of generality,’ Dadd does not clearly establish that Nurse Martin’s ‘particular conduct’ was criminally reckless. . . She placed him in a setting specifically designed to prevent self-harm. Even though her efforts were ultimately unsuccessful, it does not follow that Dadd would have placed her on ‘fair notice’ that her failure to take further action violated clearly established law.”)

Dreith v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 55 F.4th 1145, 1149 (8th Cir. 2022) (“In claiming that he had arguable probable cause to pepper-spray Dreith because she grabbed an officer’s bike or failed to comply with police orders, Boyher ‘challenges the district court’s conclusions regarding evidence sufficiency and the genuineness of factual dispute—conclusions that we have no jurisdiction to review.’. . Dreith testified that the protest was nonviolent, that she was complying with the law, that the protestors were not grabbing officers’ bicycles, and that she did not hear any orders or warnings before Boyher pepper-sprayed her. Assuming then, as the district court did, that Dreith was ‘moving to rejoin peaceful protestors when Defendant Boyher assaulted her without warning and without cause,’ . . . she neither physically engaged with officers nor failed to comply with police orders. Boyher has identified no law that Dreith was arguably violating, if we assume that she was merely participating in a peaceful protest and had come within a couple feet of an officer. . . Boyher contends that at the time he pepper-sprayed Dreith, it was ‘not clearly established that a use of force that does not violate the Fourth Amendment violates the First Amendment.’. . Boyher forfeited this argument by failing to raise it in the district court. In any event, the argument does not undermine the district court’s conclusion that Dreith’s right to be free from a retaliatory use of force was clearly established at the time of the incident.”)

Elder v. Gillespie, 54 F.4th 1055, 1064-65 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Here, the consolidated complaint alleges that, as a matter of policy, practice, or procedure, ADHS automatically terminates or reduces the services of Medicaid beneficiaries. These beneficiaries are subject to adverse agency actions regardless of the timing of any appeal request, which the consolidated complaint maintains is a violation of their Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. Further, the consolidated complaint alleges that, as a matter of policy, practice, or procedure, ADHS provides insufficient notice of the reasons for the reduction in services. This limited notice hampers beneficiaries’ ability to counter ADHS’s reasons. The consolidated complaint alleges that the notice that Dearmore received failed to inform her of what steps she should take to continue receiving the 143 hours of care per month that she received before the reduction. We conclude that beneficiaries have a clearly established right to be provided adequate notice of reduction, loss, or termination of benefits. No fundamental difference exists between this case and Jacobs: in both cases, beneficiaries suffered a loss of benefits under ARChoices. Dearmore has sufficiently pleaded that ADHS violated her right to notice.”)

Furlow v. Belmar, 52 F.4th 393, 404 (8th Cir. 2022) (“We turn our inquiry to the clearly established prong of the analysis. A right is ‘clearly established’ when it is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . The old west-style ‘wanted’ posters and reward notices may have once permitted warrantless arrests of suspects pursuant to notices like Wanted, . . . but that practice lost its vitality in the twentieth century. Since at least the 1970s, case law has established that a warrantless arrest prompted by a notice from one officer to another is unconstitutional unless: (1) the arresting officer is able to make an independent finding of probable cause. . . or (2) the arresting officer has been working closely with the officer who made the initial and valid probable cause determination (encompassing both hot pursuit/fleeing suspect cases and collective knowledge doctrine cases)[.] . . Despite those clear statements of law regarding warrantless arrests and notices of arrest, we are not free to ignore United States v. Briley, 726 F.2d 1301 (8th Cir. 1984). There, the St. Paul Police Department apparently had a department policy of issuing ‘probable cause pickups’ (i.e., warrantless arrest notices) for suspects. . . An officer issued such a notice for Briley. . . The pickup notice was not supported by a warrant even though there was ample time to get a warrant and no exigent circumstances were present. . . All officers received the notice when they arrived for duty and two other officers later—who were not involved in issuing the pickup notice or part of a related investigation—arrested Briley. . . The Eighth Circuit upheld the arrest, concluding probable cause to arrest existed ‘based on the collective knowledge of all the officers involved.’. . While many of the facts underlying Briley’s arrest are unknown from the opinion, the facts as recited in Briley align closely with the circumstances here, leaving some doubt about whether the actions of Officers Partin and Walsh and Detective Clements violated clearly established law. . . Given this doubt, we find Officers Partin and Walsh are entitled to qualified immunity under the clearly established prong. Detective Clements’ situation is different. It is arguable that Detective Clements had probable cause to believe Torres committed a crime when she first issued the Wanted, but Torres' case later evolved. By the time Torres was seized pursuant to the Wanted, Detective Clements should have known that probable cause had evaporated. While the Wanted was pending, Detective Clements did not make herself aware of the investigation's development. Although Detective Clements attempted to call Torres and his counsel prior to issuing the Wanted, she admitted that she never spoke to Torres about the allegations, she never interacted with a DSS employee after initiating the investigation, and she never attempted to visit Torres' home to discuss the case or execute the Wanted during the three-and-a-half months that the investigation was open. Viewing the facts in a light most favorable to Torres, as we must at this stage of the proceedings, . . . if Detective Clements had engaged in even 'minimal further investigation,' then she would have been aware that probable cause (or even arguable probable cause) had dissipated, leaving no continuing justification for the Wanted[.] . . . Detective Clements is not entitled to qualified immunity under these circumstances. Furlow and Torres also argue that Officers Partin and Walsh and Detective Clements are subject to liability for ordering their detentions. We focus our analysis on Furlow's detention as a result of Officer Walsh's Wanted because Officer Partin's Wanted did not result in any detention. We do not need to go into Torres' detention because his seizure was unlawful in the first instance. [citing Manuel v. City of Joliet] . . . Officer Walsh is entitled to qualified immunity because there was at least arguable probable cause to believe Furlow domestically assaulted Latoya and he was detained shortly after the alleged incident. . . . Officer Walsh noted that Latoya was fearful and anxious and that she described the alleged assault in detail. Meanwhile, Furlow reportedly fled from the scene and said he did not want to be incarcerated.”)

Clinton v. Garrett, 49 F.4th 1132, 1143(8th Cir. 2022) (“The officers argue that there is no clearly established right to drive with a nervous passenger through a high crime neighborhood with a temporary tag that is unable to be read by officers following the vehicle. We have already dismissed this argument to the extent that it relies upon Clinton's nervous passenger and the area where he was driving. These facts, in isolation, do not support a conclusion that Clinton's vehicle was connected to unlawful activity in general, much less to the specific kind of unlawful activity for which the officers pulled him over—a possible temporary tag violation. Nor can a driver rightly be held responsible for ambient conditions that render a tag illegible. . . . The authority is clear: officers must have particularized facts that give rise to reasonable suspicion in order for a stop to be constitutionally valid. . . . The officers cannot point to any positive indicator for their suspicion that Clinton's tag was falsified. . . . By the clearly established law, this court ‘cannot sanction stops justified only by the generalized and ever-present possibility that interrogation and inspection may reveal that any given motorist has committed some crime.’ . . . For these reasons, the officers' stop of Clinton's vehicle constituted a violation of his clearly established rights. Hence, the district court did not err in concluding that they were not entitled to qualified immunity. And since the stop constituted a violation of Clinton's Fourth Amendment rights, the court did not err in granting summary judgment to Clinton.”)

McDaniel v. Neal, 44 F.4th 1085, 1090-92 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Because the district court denied Neal qualified immunity, we can infer it concluded that, accepting McDaniel’s description of the facts, a reasonable jury could conclude that Neal’s use of force was excessive. At this stage, we view the facts in the light most favorable to McDaniel. McDaniel did attempt to flee, but both Smith and Neal had grabbed him by the time he reached the closed door. They knew McDaniel was unarmed, and the offense they were there to arrest him for was nonviolent. [shoplifting at Walmart] At the time Neal performed the takedown, he had already wrapped his arms around McDaniel and pulled him back to the bench, so McDaniel was no longer able to flee. Despite these circumstances, Neal proceeded to throw McDaniel to the ground with enough force to fracture his collarbone and skull and cause a brain injury. . . . McDaniel acknowledges that his case is factually similar to Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc). . . . The takedown knocked Kelsay briefly unconscious and broke her collarbone. . . . The district court denied the officer’s motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and the en banc court reversed, holding that the officer did not violate a clearly established right on May 29, 2014. . . . McDaniel does not point to a case between May 29, 2014, and August 13, 2017, that clearly established that Neal’s use of force was excessive. . . . [N]either we nor McDaniel can identify a case or body of case law that clearly established as of August 13, 2017, that Neal’s use of force was excessive, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to McDaniel. Given the Supreme Court’s strict instructions on this point, we are compelled to conclude that Neal is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Aberdeen School District, 42 F.4th 883, 890-94 (8th Cir. 2022) (“A school seizure requires that a ‘limitation on the student’s freedom of movement must significantly exceed that inherent in everyday, compulsory attendance.’ . . . We believe secluding A.A. in the little room and B.B. in the calm-down corner constituted seizures. In Couture, the Tenth Circuit noted that a child ‘was certainly subject to greater restrictions than are most students’ because he had been ‘at times physically carried into’ a small ‘timeout room, where teachers shut and barricaded the door,’ while his ‘requests for release from the room were consistently denied.’ . . . Likewise here, Weisenburger and her aides picked up and carried A.A. into the little room, held the door shut, and forbade her from leaving until she completed tasks unrelated to any disciplinary violation. Staff also shuttered B.B. in the calm-down corner with physical barriers and prevented him from leaving. We emphasize that an ordinary school timeout is not a Fourth Amendment seizure. To reiterate, the restriction on liberty ‘must significantly exceed’ what a child usually confronts in a public educational setting. . . . The combination presented here—dragging students, confining them in locked or barricaded areas, and barring them from leaving on pain of further physical intervention—exceeds that demanding threshold. Weisenburger curtailed A.A. and B.B.’s movement severely enough to implicate the Constitution. Grabbing B.B. to push him into the swimming pool and pinning C.C. down to strip his clothes off also rose to the level of seizures. . . . It is often repeated that qualified immunity protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . By its terms, the ‘substantial departure’ standard ensures that only plainly incompetent professionals who forsake accepted judgment, practices, or standards will face liability for the unconstitutional seizure of a disabled student. ‘[A] general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though “the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.”. . . Because Weisenburger substantially departed from accepted principles when restraining and secluding the students, she violated clearly established federal rights. . . . [V]iewing the facts in the light most favorable to the students, we find four violations of clearly established Fourth Amendment rights: (1) secluding A.A. in the little room before February 4, 2016; (2) secluding B.B. in the calm-down corner using dividers; (3) grabbing B.B.’s arms to push him into the swimming pool; and (4) pinning C.C. down to strip his clothes off. Weisenburger is not entitled to qualified immunity for those violations but is for all other unreasonable seizure allegations. . . . The takeaway is that student unreasonable seizure claims must rise or fall under the Fourth Amendment, while school excessive force claims warrant separate review under the Due Process Clause. In consequence, the students’ restraint and seclusion allegations cannot move forward as substantive due process claims. The remaining generalized assertions of physical and verbal abuse fail to meet the high bar required for a substantive due process violation. Plaintiffs ‘must show that “the behavior of the [government official was] so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.”’. . . The physical abuse allegations never specifically identify A.A., B.B., or C.C. as the victims. . . In any event, briefly grabbing a student’s chin or arm is not ‘so inspired by malice or sadism rather than a merely careless or unwise excess of zeal that it amount[s] to brutal and inhumane abuse of official power.’. . . Also, ‘[v]erbal abuse is normally not a constitutional violation’. . . . Nothing in the record convinces us otherwise here. The district court erred in denying qualified immunity for Weisenburger on the students’ substantive due process claims.”)

Street v. Leyshock, 41 F.4th 987, 990 (8th Cir. 2022) (“[T]he officers assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiffs’ conspiracy claims, because the unsettled nature of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine means that they did not violate a clearly established right. The intracorporate conspiracy doctrine provides that ‘a local government entity cannot conspire with itself through its agents acting within the scope of their employment.’. . . The Supreme Court in Ziglar v. Abbasi. . . held that officials who allegedly conspired to interfere with civil rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3) were entitled to qualified immunity, because the unresolved scope of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine meant that reasonable officers ‘would not have known with any certainty that the alleged agreements were forbidden by law.’. . . In Faulk, this court explained that neither the Supreme Court nor this court had ‘definitively addressed the issue whether the doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims,’ and observed that two other circuits had held that the doctrine does apply. . . Accordingly, the officers who allegedly conceived or executed the ‘kettling plan’ were entitled to qualified immunity on the conspiracy claim. . . The same result obtains here.”)

Hartman v. Bowles, 39 F.4th 544, 545-47 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Does a detective violate a clearly established constitutional right by omitting information from a warrant application that he does not actually know, even if the reason is his own reckless investigation? The answer is no, which means he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .[T]he question is whether his failure to know that fact—allegedly due to a reckless investigation—can give rise to a clearly established Franks violation. . . The cases say no. . . For that reason, ‘[w]hat the officer-affiant should have known does not matter.’. . For their part, the Hartmans cannot identify a single case that holds otherwise. . . Of those they cite, many are not Franks cases at all. . . Others were not even on the books when Detective Bowles acted. . . The bottom line is that, given there are no cases supporting the Hartmans’ position, Detective Bowles was not on ‘fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.’”)

Torres v. City of St. Louis, 39 F.4th 494, 507 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Moving to appellees’ § 1983 conspiracy claims, we recently noted that ‘we have never definitively addressed the issue whether the [intracorporate conspiracy] doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims.’. . In Faulk, we concluded that our opinions recognizing § 1983 conspiracy claims against police officers from the same department who conspired to violate clearly established rights do not address the applicability of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine and, thus, ‘do not clearly establish that reasonable officers “would ... have known with any certainty” that planning, designing, monitoring, or executing “the illegal kettling plan” would expose them to damage liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim.’. . Similarly, here, given the uncertain applicability of the doctrine, these precedents do not clearly establish that reasonable officers would have known that agreeing and planning to violate Hammett’s and Dennis’s constitutional rights and then taking steps to cover up their use of excessive force would expose them to liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim. Thus, because it is not clearly established that the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine does not apply to § 1983 conspiracy claims, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to the defendant officers on Counts 2 and 6.”)

J.T.H. v. Missouri Dep’t of Soc. Servs. Children’s Div., 39 F.4th 489, 493 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Here, the complaint falls short of establishing that Cook violated a clearly established right. . . Even assuming that the facts in the complaint are true and drawing all reasonable inferences in the parents’ favor, ‘existing precedent’ does not ‘place[] ... the constitutional question beyond debate.’. . After all, we have never recognized a retaliatory-investigation claim of this kind. Nor have other courts around the country, which have either rejected the possibility outright or concluded, like we do today, that the law is still in flux. . . It is safe to say, in other words, that the law is anything but clear. It makes no difference that, ‘as a general matter, the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... on the basis of ... constitutionally protected speech.’. . The Supreme Court has instructed us ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’. . So even if there is a general right to be free of retaliation, the law is not clearly established enough to cover the ‘specific context of the case’: retaliatory investigation. . Cook is entitled to qualified immunity for both investigative acts.”)

Northland Baptist Church of St. Paul, Minnesota v. Walz, 37 F.4th 1365, 1374-75 (8th Cir. 2022) (“We agree with the district court that Governor Walz is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because appellants have not shown that Governor Walz’s response to COVID-19—specifically, closing and then restricting the capacity of businesses deemed non-critical—was a taking under clearly established law. . . . Ultimately, we find that, in 2020, the law was not clearly established such that Governor Walz would have understood that his issuance of the challenged EOs violated appellants’ constitutional right to just compensation for a government taking. We therefore affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity and dismiss appellants’ takings claim.”)

Hovick v. Patterson, 37 F.4th 511, 516-19 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Our qualified-immunity inquiry ‘involv[es] two questions—whether the official’s conduct violated a constitutional or statutory right, and whether that right was clearly established.’ . . . ‘We may take up either question first, and in this case we opt to consider whether any right violated here was clearly established, a matter that [the Hovicks] bear[] the burden to show.’ . . . Winegar . . . is distinguishable from the present case and would not have alerted a reasonable DHS official that his or her conduct was unlawful in the present case. . . . First, the public school teacher in Winegar was a government employee. . . . By contrast, Mrs. Hovick is not a government employee. And, even if her employer, Boys Town, qualifies as an independent contractor of the government entitled to due process protections, it is not clear under our precedents that Mrs. Hovick—an employee of an independent contractor—is also entitled to such protections. . . . Second, as the district court noted, in Winegar, ‘[t]he investigation had concluded and a final decision made against [the teacher]. Pre-deprivation procedures were not the focus of the analysis.’ . . . Instead, we focused on the postdeprivation procedures, explaining that ‘at some point’ the teacher would be ‘entitled . . . to a full-blown hearing.’ . . . By contrast, the focus of this case is on predeprivation procedures; specifically, whether the offer of an interview as a predeprivation procedure is sufficient to satisfy procedural due process prior to an interim finding of founded child abuse. . . . The Hovicks rely on persuasive authority from the Seventh Circuit, the Ninth Circuit, a federal district court, and several state courts. . . . But the Hovicks cite these cases for ‘general proposition[s]’ of law, not for their factual similarity to the present case. . . . ‘Finally, this is not the rare case where a general constitutional rule applies with “obvious clarity.”’ . . . In summary, the Hovicks have not proven that the law was clearly established such that the defendants should ‘reasonably have been expected to know that the interim finding of founded child abuse pending the interviews of the Hovicks violated Mrs. Hovick’s right to due process.’ . . . We therefore affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment to the defendants on the basis of qualified immunity.”)

Martinez v. Sasse, 37 F.4th 506, 509-10 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Although the claim here alleges use of excessive force, the parties dispute the threshold question whether Sasse seized Martinez at all within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Martinez argues that Sasse effected a seizure when she pushed Martinez to the ground before locking the doors to the ICE facility. Sasse maintains, however, that when an officer’s use of force is designed only to repel a person from entering a facility, there is no seizure. On that view, Martinez may have a tort claim against Sasse for assault or battery if the officer used unjustified force, but Sasse did not violate the Fourth Amendment. As of June 2018, the Supreme Court had explained that a seizure occurs ‘when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen.’

. Sasse maintains that her alleged push of Martinez did not ‘restrain’ the lawyer, but served instead to ‘repel’ her from entering the federal facility. . . . Martinez responds that a seizure occurs where an officer restrains a person even briefly. She relies on Torres v. Madrid, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021), which held that police seized a suspect for the instant that police bullets struck her, even though the suspect temporarily eluded capture thereafter. . . . Torres, however, was decided after the encounter at issue here, so cannot be clearly established law for purposes of this case. In any event, Torres involved force used to apprehend a suspect, and did not address whether force used only to repel constitutes a seizure. . . . As with the force used to repel Martinez in this case, the force in Quraishi was not employed to apprehend a subject. If there is a constitutional distinction between force used for repulsion that momentarily restricts forward movement and force used for dispersion that impels retreat, the distinction is not so readily apparent that every reasonable officer would have understood it. For these reasons, we conclude that Martinez has not adequately pleaded that Sasse violated a clearly established right, because it was not clearly established as of June 2018 that Sasse’s alleged push was a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.”)

Davis v. Dawson, 33 F.4th 993, 999 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Officers of the Des Moines Police Department, in particular, were on notice that they could not detain someone for questioning against their will, even in a homicide investigation, absent probable cause. This court determined in Seymour that officers from that department violated a father’s rights when they detained him without probable cause while investigating his young son’s sudden hospitalization and death. . . . The officers cite a district court case with similar facts to support that the law is not clearly defined. See Magnan v. Doe, 2012 WL 5247325, at *5 (D. Minn. 2012). In that case, the officers detained family members of an attempted-homicide victim at the crime scene despite their protestations that they needed to go to the hospital to be with him. . . . The district court, however, found that based on the circumstances the officers formed a reasonable suspicion that the family members ‘were somehow involved with the homicides.’ . . . Here, by contrast, the officers denied having any such reasonable suspicion that the family was involved in the homicide. Further, the district court in Magnan denied qualified immunity as to the duration and conditions of detention once the scene was secure because it was not clear that detention in the squad cars was the ‘least intrusive means available.’ . . . There is also a robust consensus that seizing witnesses to a crime in similar circumstances is a clearly established constitutional violation. [collecting cases]”)

Doe v. Chapman, 30 F.4th 766, 772, 774-75 (8th Cir., 2022), cert. granted, judgment vacated and case remanded with instructions to dismiss as moot, No. 22-312 (U.S. Mar. 20, 2023) (“Public officials are protected by qualified immunity unless the facts show a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . . Doe claims that Chapman violated her clearly established constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without notifying her parents. Chapman counters that (1) the Supreme Court has not recognized a constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without pre-hearing parental notification; (2) there is a circuit split on the issue; and (3) this court’s decision in Planned Parenthood Ass’n of Kansas City, Missouri, Inc. v. Ashcroft is not controlling because (a) it is factually distinguishable, (b) a single holding of this court does not make a right clearly established, and (c) clerks of Missouri courts are not bound by Eighth Circuit precedent. . . . Relying on parental notice cases like Akron (and Miller and Camblos), Chapman argues she could not have deprived Doe of a clearly established right because Supreme Court precedent is inconclusive, and circuit courts are split. But § 188.028 is not a ‘mere notice statute’; it requires parental consent—or a court order bypassing parental consent—exactly like the statute in Bellotti (and Ashcroft). Bellotti is clear: parental consent statutes are unconstitutional unless they provide the pregnant minor an opportunity to seek a court order without notifying her parents. . . . By requiring notice to Doe’s parents before her bypass hearing, Chapman implemented the prior version of § 188.028 this court found unconstitutional under Bellotti. . . . Because Doe’s constitutional right to apply for a judicial bypass without notifying her parents is clearly established by Supreme Court precedent, this court need not address Chapman’s other arguments about qualified immunity.”) Faulk v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 30 F.4th 739, 749-50 (8th Cir. 2022) (“As Faulk notes, we have never definitively addressed the issue whether the [intracorporate conspiracy] doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims. . . . Other circuits have addressed the issue. Two have expressly held that the doctrine applies to § 1983 conspiracy claims, but its application in a particular case is subject to recognized exceptions. . . . In surveying the decisions from other circuits, what stands out is the fact-intensive nature of their inquiries. None holds the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine always applies, or never applies. Some hold it generally applies but is subject to exceptions. Others hold it does not apply in certain circumstances. This array is consistent with the doctrine’s history we have briefly summarized. On one side of the current ledger as defined by Faulk is Justice Breyer’s opinion as a circuit judge in Stathos, a decision cited in Justice White’s dissent to illustrate the circuit conflict later addressed in Ziglar. . . . It is reasonable to assume that the Court’s statement in Ziglar that ‘different considerations [might] apply to a conspiracy respecting equal protection guarantees,’ . . . reflected consideration of the Stathos opinion. Justice Breyer, the author of Stathos, dissented in Ziglar but only addressed the main issue in that case -- whether to extend Bivens to the various claims at issue. Logically, this silence suggests at least tacit agreement with the majority that issues regarding whether and how to apply the doctrine to civil rights cases defy categorical pronouncements. Approaching the issue from this perspective, it is significant that the FAC’s conspiracy allegations are entirely focused on ‘the illegal kettling plan.’ If the plan itself was an unconstitutional municipal policy, then the City and all defendants ‘personally involved in that unconstitutional policy-making’ are subject to § 1983 liability; Count V adds nothing to Faulk’s § 1983 claims against those defendants. . . . Likewise, Faulk does not need Count V to hold liable under § 1983 SLMPD officers who, while executing the kettling plan, participated in the constitutional violations Faulk alleges, even if the plan itself was not an unconstitutional policy. Under these particular circumstances, all that Count V adds is the risk of liability for an officer whose only role in the illegal kettling plan was to follow his employer’s orders to block egress. This claim is inconsistent with well-established § 1983 principles of individual liability. . . . In these circumstances, we conclude that the issue on appeal regarding Count V is analogous to Ziglar, where the Court granted qualified immunity because the uncertain applicability of the intracorporate conspiracy doctrine meant that § 1985(3) liability was not clearly established. . . .

Our opinions in Small and Lenderman did not address this issue and have not been endorsed by the Supreme Court. Therefore, they do not clearly establish that reasonable officers ‘would ... have known with any certainty’ that planning, designing, monitoring, or executing ‘the illegal kettling plan’ would expose them to damage liability for a § 1983 conspiracy claim.”)

Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 898-99 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Here, the complaint did not suggest that Mitchell was suspected of anything more than trespassing and obstructing a government function, both nonviolent misdemeanors. . . Nor did the complaint suggest that Mitchell threatened anyone or fled or resisted arrest; on the contrary, it alleged that he simply stood with his hands above his head. It is ‘clearly established’ that the use of more than de minimis force in circumstances like these violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Nonetheless, according to the complaint, the officers shot Mitchell with shotgun-propelled, lead-filled bean bags that shattered his eye socket. Our cases clearly establish that gentler treatment than this constitutes more than de minimis force. . . True, the complaint did not allege that the officers were aiming at Mitchell’s face. But it did allege that the officers were aiming at Mitchell. And the severity of Mitchell’s injuries confirms what any ‘reasonable officer in [the defendants’] position’ would have known: to fire a shotgun loaded with a lead-filled bean bag at a person, regardless of whether one is aiming at the person’s face, is to use more than de minimis force against the person. . . Therefore, assuming the nonconclusory allegations in the complaint are true, the officers who shot Mitchell violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Furthermore, because it was clearly established that the alleged conduct violated Mitchell’s Fourth Amendment rights, we must assume at this stage in the litigation that the officers who allegedly shot Mitchell are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . The district court erred in dismissing Mitchell’s Fourth Amendment claim against the officers who allegedly shot him. . . . Mitchell’s allegations that he was ‘peacefully protesting’—neither committing a serious crime nor threatening anyone’s safety nor fleeing or resisting arrest—when the officers shot him with lead-filled bean bags capable of shattering his eye socket are sufficient to state a claim for excessive force. Unless and until discovery tells a different story, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Williams v. City of Burlington, Iowa, 27 F.4th 1346, 1352 (8th Cir. 2022) (“ ‘Since 1985, it has been established by the Supreme Court that the use of deadly force against a fleeing suspect who does not pose a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others is not permitted.’ . . The right established in Garner is sufficiently clear. . . . Chiprez emphasizes his (alleged) belief that Jones was still armed. He does not claim that he was ignorant of the constitutional prohibition against the use of deadly force against an unarmed, non-dangerous suspect. The officers had no reason except the gun to believe Jones was dangerous; the traffic stop was initiated for a noise ordinance. If, construing the evidence most favorably to the estate, Chiprez knew Jones was unarmed, then shooting him violated a clearly established constitutional right.”)

Irvin v. Richardson, 20 F.4th 1199, 1204-05, 1207 (8th Cir. 2021) (“When the issue is whether a § 1983 defendant police officer violated a clearly established Fourth Amendment right, if we determine that the officer lacked reasonable suspicion and thus conducted an unlawful Terry stop, he ‘may nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity if [he] had arguable reasonable suspicion - that is, if a reasonable officer in the same position could have believed [he] had reasonable suspicion.’ . . . Here, Officers Richardson and Jupin actively investigated the disturbance after detaining Irvin and Bates, delayed by their refusal to cooperate. When backup arrived, Richardson interviewed a cooperative third individual and searched the area for a weapon. Jupin contacted a witness, who said that Irvin and Bates were not involved in the reported disturbance. Jupin promptly removed the handcuffs and told Irvin and Bates they were free to go, ending their detention. The entire encounter lasted approximately 13 minutes. We agree with the district court that Irvin and Bates ‘were detained no longer than was necessary for the officers to pursue their investigation’ and therefore the lawful Terry stop ‘did not evolve into an arrest.’ The circumstances here are readily distinguishable from the handcuffing and extended detention in our recent, divided panel opinion in Haynes v. Minnehan, No. 20-1777 (8th Cir. Sep. 21, 2021). For these reasons, we affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity dismissing these Fourth Amendment claims.”)

Irvin v. Richardson, 20 F.4th 1199, 1210-12 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“That Irvin and Bates may have matched the race and gender of the suspect and that they were in the same general location identified by the caller are not enough to raise a reasonable suspicion that either of them was the person who displayed a firearm. . . . Viewing the facts in Irvin and Bates’s favor, a reasonable jury could find that the officers lacked reasonable suspicion to stop and detain them. . . . Applying the same standard, the Terry stop in this case—even if it was lawful initially—evolved into an arrest requiring probable cause. . . . Because I would find that the officers lacked reasonable and articulable suspicion to detain Bates and Irvin, I would also conclude that they failed to meet the more demanding standard of probable cause required for an arrest. . . . With the contours of these rights sufficiently clear . . . and viewing all of the facts in the light most favorable to Bates and Irvin, I believe that Officers Richardson and Jupin are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.”)

LeMay v. Mays, 18 F.4th 283, 288 (8th Cir. 2021) (“In both instances, the complaint sets forth that Mays shot both Ciroc and Rocko when they presented no imminent danger and were not acting aggressively. This establishes a viable claim that Mays unreasonably seized the dogs in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . It is clearly established that an officer cannot shoot a dog in the absence of an objectively legitimate and imminent threat to him or others.”)

Haynes v. Minnehan, 14 F.4th 830, 837-38 (8th Cir. 2021) (“[T]he way that the officers conducted the seizure ‘was not “reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.”’ . . . Consequently, the initially lawful Terry stop ultimately violated Haynes’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Because the officers violated the Constitution, Haynes satisfied the first qualified-immunity prong. . . . For the second qualified-immunity prong, we ask if case law would have fairly notified every reasonable officer in Minnehan and Steinkamp’s shoes that their conduct would violate the Constitution. . . . We conclude that it does. More than six years before Steinkamp handcuffed Haynes, we said that it was ‘well established that if suspects are cooperative and officers have no objective concerns for safety, the officers may not use intrusive tactics such as handcuffing absent any extraordinary circumstances.’. . We concluded that ‘the prior case law provided fair warning to [an officer] at the time of the incident’ that a reasonable officer in her place ‘could not have believed it was lawful to handcuff and frisk a suspect absent any concern for safety.’. . And even earlier, we rejected an argument that reasonable suspicion justified handcuffing a suspect after a frisk confirmed that the suspect lacked a weapon or contraband. . . The dissent suggests this case is controlled by our recent decision in Pollreis v. Marzolf, 2021 WL 3610875 (8th Cir. Aug. 16, 2021). But we believe Pollreis differs from this case in a number of important ways. There, on a dark and rainy night, a police officer set up a perimeter around a car crash to apprehend fleeing suspects of gang-related activity, one of whom was believed to be carrying a gun. . . The officer encountered two individuals who matched a vague description of the fleeing suspects. . . The officer held them for several minutes until backup arrived and then handcuffed and frisked them before letting them go. . . In stark contrast to the situation in Pollreis, no dispatcher warned that Haynes was likely armed. There was not a solitary officer left with multiple suspects in the dark. Haynes, unlike the suspects in Pollreis, had been thoroughly searched and cleared for weapons, contraband, and evidence of drug dealing. Yet, he remained handcuffed. In sum, the reasonable concern of danger to the officer present in Pollreis was lacking here. Because Minnehan and Steinkamp had fair notice that they could not handcuff Haynes without an objective safety concern, we conclude that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity. By extension, that conclusion also upends the district court’s Monell holding, which it fused to its qualified-immunity analysis.”)

Haynes v. Minnehan, 14 F.4th 830, 838-43 (8th Cir. 2021) (Shepherd, J., dissenting) (“[T]he majority properly concludes that Officer Steinkamp constitutionally placed Haynes in handcuffs, noting that ‘we have repeatedly equated a person’s suspected drug-deal involvement with a reasonable belief that the same person may be armed and dangerous.’. . However, the majority denies qualified immunity to the officers because the handcuffs were not removed at the conclusion of Officer Steinkamp’s patdown and search of Haynes’s person, and Haynes remained handcuffed for an additional approximately four minutes and forty-five seconds. I disagree because it was not clearly established that the officers could not constitutionally keep Haynes handcuffed post-frisk and until his identity and his criminal status could be determined. For this reason, I respectfully dissent. . . . I doubt that Haynes has shown the violation of a constitutional right by virtue of the failure of the officers to remove the handcuffs from Haynes’s wrists for four minutes and forty-five seconds after the conclusion of the patdown and search. However, even if he has, it was not clearly established on July 26, 2018, that Haynes’s Fourth Amendment rights would be violated under these circumstances. . . . In some circumstances, a frisk during a Terry stop will no doubt dispel an officer’s suspicion that the suspect is armed and dangerous and that he or she may flee. However, the facts here are not so straightforward. Haynes was suspected of drug activity, which we deem a dangerous crime. . . While the check of a driver’s name is a routine ‘mission’ of traffic stops, Haynes was unable to produce his driver’s license or any other form of government-issued identification upon the officers’ request, a misdemeanor offense under Iowa law, . . . and this delayed the officers’ confirmation of Haynes’s identity and his lack of outstanding wants or warrants to the end of the traffic stop. While the search of Haynes’s person did not reveal a weapon or contraband, it did reveal a wad of cash in Haynes’s pocket. Further, Haynes stood next to the open door of his vehicle, which had not been searched. And ultimately, the entire stop took approximately 11 minutes. . . It is incongruous that, after finding qualified immunity appropriate in Pollreis, the Court now denies qualified immunity to Officers Steinkamp and Minnehan. In Pollreis, an officer responded to a dispatch call describing suspects who had fled from the scene of a car crash, one of which was likely armed. . . The officer stopped two young boys—12 and 14 years old—and held them facedown at gunpoint despite their mother’s and stepfather’s identification of them; the boys’ cooperation; and the frisk of the boys and the search of their backpack, neither of which revealed weapons or drugs. . . In total, the officer kept the boys handcuffed for approximately 2 minutes and the stop lasted a total of approximately 7 minutes. . . I can see no meaningful distinction between the facts in Pollreis and the facts here. Like the officer in Pollreis, Officers Steinkamp and Minnehan kept Haynes handcuffed only long enough to satisfy ‘the stop’s specific purpose: to identify [Haynes].’. . The Pollreis Court noted the boys’ close proximity to a reported crime scene and appearance, which matched that of the suspects. . . Factually, Haynes’s story is almost identical: he was stopped near the scene of an alleged hand-to-hand drug transaction and matched the suspect’s description given by dispatch. True, there was not ‘low visibility’ during Haynes’s stop, and Haynes did not make a ‘hand-to-waist’ movement as one of the boys did. . . However, the objective of both stops was the same: verify the identity of the handcuffed suspect(s). In Pollreis, the Court held that 7 minutes was not too long to achieve that objective while here, the majority holds that 11 minutes is too long to achieve the same objective. Given the approximate 4-minute difference in the two stops’ lengths, I cannot square the Court’s two outcomes. Contrary to the majority’s suggestion, it is not my position that handcuffing should be ‘a routine part of a Terry stop.’. . Indeed, handcuffing is inappropriate where there is no indication the suspect is dangerous. However, this is not a situation in which there was an ‘absence of reasons to believe the subject [was] dangerous.’. . My conclusion is limited to the scenario currently before this Court: the officers were responding to a suspected hand-to-hand drug transaction in a high crime area—a scenario that this Court has repeatedly characterized as inherently dangerous and often associated with weapons—and therefore, until the officers could satisfy the ‘stop’s specific purpose’ and identify Haynes, they were ‘justified in taking the amount of time needed to accomplish [that] purpose.’. . I would grant the officers qualified immunity as, under prong two of the qualified immunity inquiry, it was not clearly established that Haynes should have been released from handcuffs at the conclusion of the patdown and search of his person. For these reasons, I would affirm the district court.”) Graham v. Barnette, 5 F.4th 872, 880-83 (8th Cir. 2021) (on remand from Supreme Court) (“We previously affirmed the district court’s judgment. . . Graham then petitioned for a writ of certiorari, arguing (as relevant here) that the doctrine we relied on to find that the officers’ warrantless entry was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment—the so-called community-caretaking or community-caretaker exception—did not apply to the home. . . While Graham’s petition was pending, the Supreme Court decided Caniglia, where it explained that this ‘exception’ is not actually a ‘standalone doctrine that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home.’. .

Subsequently, it granted Graham’s certiorari petition, vacated our prior judgment in Graham’s appeal, and remanded the matter to us for further consideration in light of Caniglia. . . . We have reconsidered this appeal in light of Caniglia, and we once again affirm the district court’s judgment. . . . Graham first argues that the officers violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable search by entering her home. Pre-Caniglia, the officers responded that their warrantless entry into her home was reasonable under the community-caretaking exception but that, even if it was not, they were entitled to qualified immunity as to this claim because it was not clearly established that their actions were unreasonable in the circumstances. . . . Due to the ‘dearth of community caretaking cases,’ the district court bypassed the first prong of the analysis, . . . concluding instead that the law was not clearly established that the officers violated Graham’s Fourth Amendment rights by entering her home without a warrant pursuant to the community-caretaking exception. Previously, we opted to affirm under the first prong, . . . concluding that the officers’ warrantless entry was sufficiently justified and thus reasonable under the community-caretaking exception[.] . . . But Caniglia rendered our prior rationale untenable insofar as it explained that ‘community caretaking’ was not a ‘standalone doctrine’ that could justify warrantless entry into the home. . . . Accordingly, we now affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . On May 25, 2017, it was well established in this circuit that the community-caretaking exception was a standalone doctrine that alone could justify warrantless entry into a home. . . . And, in the circumstances present here, the officers’ warrantless entry did not violate Graham’s Fourth Amendment rights under our then-extant community-caretaking jurisprudence. . . . We need not and do not unpack today Caniglia’s full ramifications for our community-caretaking jurisprudence. . . . Rather, we decide only that the officers’ warrantless entry was reasonable under ‘the legal rules that were clearly established’ in this circuit on May 25, 2017. . . . While Caniglia made clear that ‘community caretaking’ was not its own Fourth Amendment exception that alone could justify warrantless entry into the home, ‘Caniglia did not address’ what ‘rights were clearly established’ under ‘pre-existing circuit law.’ Luer v. Cnty. of St. Louis, --- F.4th ---, 2021 WL 2285499, at *1 (8th Cir. June 3, 2021). Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity to the officers with respect to Graham’s Fourth Amendment warrantless-entry claim.”) Intervarsity Christian Fellowship/USA v. University of Iowa, 5 F.4th 855, 865-67 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The University and individual defendants say that the law is not clearly established when there is a direct conflict between civil rights laws and First Amendment protections in the University setting. InterVarsity, on the other hand, argues that its right to be free from viewpoint discrimination when speaking in a university’s limited public forum was clearly established at the time of the violation. In denying the individual defendants qualified immunity below, the district court treated its preliminary injunction in the BLinC case as precedent. The court explained that the order applied the appropriate First Amendment cases and put the individual defendants on notice that their actions were unconstitutional. . . . While we share the district court’s frustration with the University’s conduct, we do not consider the BLinC preliminary injunction as precedent that clearly established the individual defendants’ conduct was unconstitutional. ‘A decision of a federal district court judge is not binding precedent in either a different judicial district, the same judicial district, or even upon the same judge in a different case.’ Camreta v. Greene, 563 U.S. 692, 730 n.7 (2011) (citation omitted). ‘Many Courts of Appeals therefore decline to consider district court precedent when determining if constitutional rights are clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity.’ Id. While the Eighth Circuit ‘subscribes to a broad view of what constitutes clearly established law,’ and we often look to ‘state courts, other circuits and district courts,’ for what is clearly established, K.W.P. v. Kan. City Pub. Schs., 931 F.3d 813, 828 (8th Cir. 2019) (citation omitted), we will not rely on a district court’s preliminary injunction as clearly established law in this case. But when the district court denied the individual defendants qualified immunity, it did not have the benefit of our decision in BLinC II. We found that the law was clearly established that universities may not engage in viewpoint discrimination against RSOs based on a nondiscrimination policy. . . In reaching that conclusion, we relied on Supreme Court precedent, our own case law, and other circuit decisions. The Supreme Court has clearly stated that universities may not single out groups because of their viewpoint. . . Our own precedent clearly establishes that this is a violation of the First Amendment. . . Out-of-circuit decisions also define the selective application of a nondiscrimination policy against religious groups as a violation of the First Amendment. . . Relying on those precedents, we held that the University’s choice to deregister BLinC while permitting other student organizations to base membership and leadership on specific traits or affirmations of beliefs was viewpoint discrimination and a violation of the First Amendment that was clearly established. . . The University and individual defendants in that case took action against BLinC well before InterVarsity was ever on their radar. If the law was clearly established when the University discriminated against BLinC, it was clearly established when they did the same thing to InterVarsity. We acknowledge that the intersection of the First Amendment and anti-discrimination principles can present challenging questions. . . . But as Justice Thomas asked in Hoggard v. Rhodes, ‘why should university officers, who have time to make calculated choices about enacting or enforcing unconstitutional policies, receive the same protection as a police officer who makes a split-second decision to use force in a dangerous setting?’ — S.Ct. —, *1 (2021) (Thomas, J., statement regarding denial of certiorari). What the University did here was clearly unconstitutional. It targeted religious groups for differential treatment under the Human Rights Policy—while carving out exemptions and ignoring other violative groups with missions they presumably supported. The University and individual defendants turned a blind eye to decades of First Amendment jurisprudence or they proceeded full speed ahead knowing they were violating the law. Either way, qualified immunity provides no safe haven.”)

McReynolds v. Schmidli, 4 F.4th 648, 655 (8th Cir. 2021) (“Applying the requisite amount of specificity, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have had fair warning that, in June 2012, he could not violently takedown a person who was not threatening anyone, not actively resisting arrest, and not attempting to flee. The district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Schmidli.”)

Gerling v. City of Hermann, Missouri, 2 F.4th 737, 743-44 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The existence of probable cause. . . guarantees Waite qualified immunity only for an arrest in a public place. There is a genuine dispute of material fact about whether Waite entered Gerling’s home without a warrant to effect the arrest. Gerling says that he might have taken a step onto the porch during his initial conversation with Waite to gesture at the street, but immediately moved back into the house before Waite arrested him. The video recording of the incident does not contradict Gerling’s account: we agree with the district court that it is ‘dark and difficult to make out’ where the parties are standing. If Gerling’s testimony is accepted, then any reasonable officer should have known that he could not enter Gerling’s home to make an arrest without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement that is not present here. . . . On these assumed facts, it was clearly established at the time of the incident that Waite could not reach into Gerling’s home to arrest him. . . . We therefore affirm the district court’s denial of summary judgment on Gerling’s unlawful arrest claim. . . . [W]here a suspect ignores instructions and walks away, officers may be justified in using force to effect an arrest. . . . Because the inquiry is fact-intensive, officers are entitled to qualified immunity ‘unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’. . . Gerling relies on a line of cases involving non-resisting suspected misdemeanants, but he admits that he pulled away from Waite, did not comply with directions to raise his hands, and walked into an area of the home that was unfamiliar to Waite. . . . An officer reasonably could have believed Gerling was resisting arrest. Under those circumstances, Waite’s use of force did not violate a clearly established right. It was not clearly established in November 2012 that officers were forbidden to use force, including a taser, to arrest a suspect who resisted, ignored instructions, and walked away from the officer. . . . We note, however, that any damages that Gerling suffered because of his arrest are subsumed within his unlawful arrest claim. Although we analyze unlawful arrest and excessive force claims separately, ‘the damages recoverable on an unlawful arrest claim “include damages suffered because of the use of force in effecting the arrest.”’. . . Therefore, even without a freestanding claim for use of excessive force, Gerling may recover any damages that he suffered from Waite’s use of a taser if Gerling succeeds on his claim alleging unlawful arrest based on an unjustified entry into the home.”)

Luer v. County of St. Louis, Missouri, 2 F.4th 1063 (8th Cir. 2021) (“Appellees move to recall and stay the mandate in light of Caniglia v. Strom, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021), which held that there is no ‘freestanding community-caretaking exception’ to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment. In this case, we held that the appellant police officers were entitled to qualified immunity in certain respects because the officers did not violate rights of the appellees that were clearly established as of July 2016—long before Caniglia was decided. Appellees’ motion recognizes that this court had issued ‘prior opinions extending the community-caretaking exception to the home,’ and argues that this court’s precedent aligns with the decision of the First Circuit that was disapproved in Caniglia. The police officers were acting in light of pre-existing circuit law, and this appeal required us to determine what rights were clearly established as of July 2016. Because Caniglia did not address that issue, the motion is denied.”)

Banks v. Hawkins, 999 F.3d 521, 529-31 (8th Cir. 2021) (“Applying the appropriate level of specificity here, we conclude that a reasonable officer had fair warning in February 2017 that he may not use deadly force against a suspect who did not present an imminent threat of death or serious injury, even if the officer felt attacked earlier and even if he believed the suspect had previously posed a threat. This proposition finds support in at least two cases involving similar, albeit not identical, circumstances. . . . We must presume that, at the moment Hawkins shot Banks, there was no longer a threat to Vanessa Banks’s safety—assuming there ever was—and Johnny Banks was not charging Hawkins or otherwise moving towards him. As in Ellison, ‘[i]f [Hawkins] shot [Banks] while he was simply standing in his [home] and holding no [weapon], then there were not reasonable grounds to believe that [Banks] posed a serious threat of death or serious physical injury to the officers or others.’ . . . Similarly, the officers in Nance were also responding to a ‘dangerous situation’ when one of them shot the suspect. . . . We nevertheless affirmed the denial of qualified immunity because, even though the suspect had a gun in his pants and may have raised his hands while trying to get to the ground, he was not holding the gun or acting in a threatening manner and the officers failed to provide a warning before shooting. . . . In other words, the officers had no ‘reason to fear for their safety at the time of the shooting.’ . . . This means that Hawkins had fair warning in February 2017 that fear of imminent harm cannot justify shooting a suspect absent a reasonable basis to believe the suspect would act violently in that moment. As in Nance, the fact that Hawkins ‘knew [he] might encounter a dangerous situation’ did ‘not permit the use of deadly force,’ even if Banks raised his hand when he opened the front door. . . . ‘[O]n the facts we are bound to assume,’ . . . Ellison and Nance ‘clearly prohibit[ed]’ Hawkins’s conduct[.] . . . This is further supported by a ‘body of relevant case law.’ [collecting cases] At bottom, while the fact that Hawkins suffered a blow to the head from a source he knew was not Banks may amount to a ‘novel factual circumstance[]’, . . . it does not blur the contours of the constitutional right at issue. Even assuming he thought he was ‘under attack,’ the record indicates that Hawkins nevertheless understood he was not under attack by Banks. . . . Because a reasonable officer in the same circumstances as Hawkins would have known that it was unlawful to shoot an unarmed and nonaggressive man who posed no imminent threat to the officer or to anyone else, we conclude—at this stage of the proceedings—that Hawkins’s use of deadly force violated clearly established law.

Banks v. Hawkins, 999 F.3d 521, 531-34 (8th Cir. 2021) (Stras, J., dissenting) (“The question for us is whether Officer Hawkins is entitled to qualified immunity. Whether his actions that night were objectively reasonable is a close call, and I tend to agree with the court that it is likely one for a jury to decide. . . . But qualified immunity applies precisely when an officer is forced to make a hard choice. . . . The court says that Officer Hawkins should have known that he could ‘not use deadly force against a suspect who did not present an imminent threat of death or serious injury, even if [he] felt attacked earlier and even if he believed the suspect had previously posed a threat.’ . . . Not only is this formulation so broad that it lacks clarity, it also risks sweeping too broadly. The proof is in the pudding: there are cases that both fall within the court’s supposed clearly established rule and do not involve the violation of a constitutional right. If you are wondering how both can be true, they cannot be. [discussing cases] Today’s decision does more than just expose Officer Hawkins to liability. It stands as a warning to other officers who may need to make split-second decisions to protect their own safety. The message could not be clearer: even in the absence of a clearly controlling legal rule, think twice before acting, regardless of whether your own life is at stake, because a court may step in later and second-guess your decision. . . . We can reasonably disagree about whether qualified immunity should exist, see Baxter v. Bracey, — U.S. —, 140 S. Ct. 1862, 1864–65, 207 L.Ed.2d 1069 (2020) (Thomas, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari), but there is no question that circumstances like these are why it does, see Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464, 482 (5th Cir. 2019) (Clement, J., dissenting in part). I respectfully dissent.”)

Masters v. City of Independence, Missouri, 998 F.3d 827, 836-38 (8th Cir. 2021) (“In sum, Masters ‘was an unarmed suspected misdemeanor, who [was] not resist[ing] arrest, did not threaten [Runnels], did not attempt to run from him, and did not behave aggressively towards him.’ . . . A reasonable officer would not have continued to tase Masters under these circumstances. . . . Runnels nevertheless argues that this was a ‘tense and rapidly evolving’ encounter. In his view, it was reasonable to continue discharging the Taser, even while Masters was compliant, until Masters was fully subdued. It is true that the reasonableness of an officer’s use of force must take into account that ‘police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’ . . . ‘Even so, a reasonable officer is not permitted to ignore changing circumstances.’ . . . The undisputed evidence shows that Masters stopped resisting arrest soon after Runnels initially discharged his Taser. A reasonable officer would have taken into account those changed circumstances to determine whether continued or additional use of the Taser was warranted. Runnels did not do so, and the record supports Masters’s claim that Runnels used excessive force when prolonging the use of the Taser. Second, we consider whether the right to be free from an excessive, prolonged use of a Taser was clearly established as of September 14, 2014, when the traffic stop occurred. . . . In September 2014, it was clearly established that prolonging the use of a Taser against a suspect who was complying with a police officer’s commands constituted an excessive use of force. . . . Runnels also asserts there is ‘no bright line’ on how long an officer may tase a suspect. But there is: An officer may not continue to tase a person who is no longer resisting, threatening, or fleeing. That is so whether the tasing comes in the form of multiple, separate deployments or, as in this case, a single, continuous deployment that lasts for an extended period of time. By September 2014, ‘when the tasing[] of [Masters] occurred, there was sufficient case law to establish that a misdemeanor suspect in [Masters’s] position at the time of the [prolonged] tasing—non-threatening, non-fleeing, non-resisting—had a clearly established right to be free from excessive force,’ . . . and that prolonged tasing of such a suspect was excessive. The district court did not err in denying Runnels’s motion for judgment as a matter of law on Masters’s prolonged Taser claim.”)

Masters v. City of Independence, Missouri, 998 F.3d 827, 842 (8th Cir. 2021) (Colloton, J., concurring) (“In my view, Jackson v. Stair, 944 F.3d 704 (8th Cir. 2019), was wrongly decided and should not be extended. . . . Unlike Jackson, where a reasonable officer could have believed that the offender's 'momentary post-tasered position on the ground' did not 'justify considering it as a clearly punctuated interim of compliance' that made further use of a taser unreasonable, . . . Masters was compliant for the last fifteen seconds of the disputed tasing and lying face-down on the pavement for most of that time. No reasonable officer could have believed that Masters was resisting during that period, or that continued application of a taser was reasonable under the circumstances, so the district court properly denied qualified immunity.")

T.S.H. v. Green, 996 F.3d 915, 919-21 (8th Cir. 2021) ("A school official need not have probable cause to search a student in a school; '[r]ather, the legality of a search of a student should depend simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search.' . . . A student search is reasonable if it is 'justified at its inception, and 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.' . . . The law is not settled on whether the same reasonableness inquiry applies to student seizures, . . . but there is no clearly established law to the contrary. At least one circuit has concluded that the reasonableness standard from T.L.O. applies to student seizures. Gray ex rel. Alexander v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1304 (11th Cir. 2006). This court and the Ninth Circuit have reserved judgment on whether to apply T.L.O. or the objective reasonableness standard from Graham v. Connor[.] . . . Given the state of the law, a reasonable officer could have proceeded on the understanding that a student seizure is permissible if it is reasonable under the standard of T.L.O. Although the alleged seizure in this case did not occur at the high school and was initiated by law enforcement, reasonable officers could have believed that probable cause was not required. We have applied the reasonableness standard to searches of high school students outside of 'traditional school grounds,' because the 'nature of administrators' ... responsibilities for the students entrusted to their care, not school boundary lines, renders the Fourth Amendment standard in the public-school context less onerous.' . . . T.L.O. left open whether the reasonableness test should apply to actions 'conducted by school officials in conjunction with or at the behest of law enforcement agencies,' . . . but our decision in Shade applied the reasonableness standard where both school officials and law enforcement officers were involved. . . . Given that Green and Williams were employed by the University Police, it is also noteworthy that searches conducted by school police or school liaison officers have been evaluated under a reasonableness standard. . . . We recently rejected an argument that clearly established law required 'probable cause' before a school resource officer could summon a high school student to the school office for interrogation about an alleged sexual assault. . . . In light of these decisions, the students had no clearly established right to be free from a seizure instigated by Green and Williams if it passed muster under a standard of reasonableness. Under the facts alleged here, we further conclude that a reasonable officer could have believed that the seizure was reasonable. When the principles of T.L.O. are applied to this context, a seizure is 'justified at its inception' if there are reasonable grounds to believe that 'the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school.' . . . A seizure is reasonable in scope if it is 'reasonably related to the objectives' of the investigation and not excessive in light of the student's characteristics and the nature of the alleged infraction. . . . There were sufficient grounds on these facts to place the officers' action at least within the gray area for which qualified immunity is available. On justification for the seizure, the students allege that the officers described the cheerleading coach's allegation as a ‘possible Title IX incident.’ Title IX is a federal statute that prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex in ‘any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.’ . . . But the students contend that because the cheerleading coach was neither a student nor an employee of the University, there was thus no reasonable justification under Title IX for the seizure. They argue that the officers were attempting instead to ‘prove the commission of a crime,’ such as invasion of privacy under Missouri law. See Mo. Rev. Stat. § 565.252.1(1). We think a reasonable officer could have believed that either basis justified an investigatory seizure. Under then-applicable Title IX guidance, a school with knowledge of ‘student-on-student harassment that creates a hostile environment’ was required ‘to take immediate action to eliminate the harassment, prevent its recurrence, and address its effects.’ . . . The same guidance said that ‘Title IX also protects third parties from sexual harassment ... in a school’s education programs and activities,’ and included the example of ‘a visitor in a school’s on-campus residence hall.’ . . . Based on the report of the cheerleading coach who was housed in the University’s dormitory, the officers reasonably could have believed that they were authorized to investigate the incident to comply with the prevailing Title IX guidance. So too with a possible violation of Missouri law. A person commits the offense of invasion of privacy if he photographs another person, without her consent, while she is in a state of full or partial nudity and is in a place where one would have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Mo. Rev. Stat. § 565.252.1(1). Reasonable officers could have believed that the cheerleading coach’s report gave reasonable grounds to suspect that questioning the students would turn up evidence about invading the privacy of the cheerleading coach. Finally, the seizure must have been reasonable in scope. The students claim that they were ‘not free to leave for a period of hours.’ Other courts, however, have found student seizures of similar durations to be reasonable. [giving examples] In light of this authority, we conclude that the students had no clearly established right to be free from a seizure that extended for a period of hours. In sum, it was reasonable for Officers Green and Williams to believe that a seizure of high school students by a high school coach acting at the behest of the officers was permissible if reasonable. It was also reasonable for the officers to believe that the seizure was justified under that standard. The officers thus did not violate the students’ clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment, so they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

T.S.H. v. Green, 996 F.3d 915, 922-25 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Because I believe T.S.H. and H.R.J. have stated a plausible claim for violation of their Fourth Amendment rights, I respectfully dissent. . . . Assuming the standard articulated in New Jersey v. T.L.O. . . . applies to a seizure of high school students carried out by their football coach at the behest of law enforcement and away from traditional school grounds, . . . I disagree with the court’s conclusion that the seizure at issue here was reasonable. Under the T.L.O. standard, we must evaluate both whether the seizure was ‘justified at its inception’ and whether it ‘was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified [it] in the first place.’ . . . Here, the students adequately allege that they never consented to the seizure. And because the Amended Complaint suggests the officers made no effort to coordinate with the university’s Title IX officer or to comply with Title IX regulations, there is no basis to conclude that they reasonably believed they had authority under Title IX to independently initiate an investigation and to seize and interrogate high school students. . . . [E]ven if the seizure was justified at its inception, it was not ‘reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.’. . . Considering the absence of a security threat and the lack of any apparent disruption to the camps or to the students’ learning environment, it was unreasonable for the officers to believe that the hours-long detention and interrogation of T.S.H. and H.R.J. were warranted.”)

Perry v. Adams, 993 F.3d 584, 587-88 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The question of qualified immunity as against the current § 1983 claim, therefore, does not ask simply whether Adams’s alleged actions or failures to act might have violated an internal policy at the St. Louis City Justice Center or whether as a matter of state law such actions might have constituted negligence. . . . Similarly, it does not ask whether Adams possessed knowledge that Brison was at ‘some risk’ yet failed to act. Rather it asks whether on the facts presented, Adams knew of a substantial risk of serious harm yet failed to act. Framed at the level of specificity that the Supreme Court mandates for our analysis, we understand the specific question we must answer to be as follows: ‘Does a transferring officer violate a pretrial detainee’s Fourteenth Amendment rights by failing to inform a receiving entity that the detainee is on a close-observation status if a mental health professional has determined that the detainee is not suicidal and if the applicable close-observation status is, in and of itself, indicative of the absence of a suicide risk?’ Framed in this way, and even assuming that Adams had knowledge that Brison was on Close Observation, we find no clearly established right. Brison was analyzed by a mental health professional and was on a watch status indicating he was not suicidal. Therefore, this is not a case like Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1122 (8th Cir. 1988), where a jailer with knowledge of a detainee’s serious medical condition failed to contact medical professionals or advise incoming jailers as to the detainee’s risk. Here, short of a suicide risk which a mental health professional found to be absent, the plaintiffs do not identify what risk of ‘serious harm’ Brison faced and what actual knowledge Adams possessed regarding any such risk. Of course, detention officers have a general duty to guard reasonably against known risks of suicide. . . . As such, transferring officers generally should strive to convey important information likely to aid in the protection of inmates’ health and welfare. But, clearly established and specific constitutional requirements defined under this general rule do not support the proposition that an officer is required to second-guess a mental health professional’s judgment as to the substantiality of a suicide risk.”)

Business Leaders In Christ v. Univ. of Iowa, 991 F.3d 969, 980, 985-88 (8th Cir. 2021) (“To prove that the law was clearly established at the time that the individual defendants violated BLinC’s constitutional rights of free speech, expressive association, and free exercise, BLinC must ‘point to existing circuit precedent that involves sufficiently similar facts to squarely govern [the individual defendants’] conduct in the specific circumstances at issue, or, in the absence of binding precedent, to present a robust consensus of persuasive authority constituting settled law.’. . . We first address whether BLinC’s free-speech and expressive-association claims are undergirded by clearly established law. . . . An important task in determining whether the law was clearly established at the time the individual defendants acted is to avoid defining the law at a ‘high level of generality.’. . . In the present case, the appropriate inquiry is ‘whether [BLinC’s] right not to be subject to viewpoint discrimination when speaking in a university’s limited public forum was clearly established.’. . . This inquiry takes into account the undisputed facts of the present case: the University’s creation of a limited public forum for student speech and subsequent viewpoint discrimination against BLinC, a student organization, within that forum. First, ‘it was clearly established at the time of these events’ that the University’s recognition of RSOs constituted a limited public forum. . . . Second, ‘it was clearly established that a university may not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in a limited public forum.’. . . Martinez, Rosenberger, Widmar, Healy, and Gerlich all place ‘beyond debate,’. . . that BLinC had a ‘right not to be subjected to viewpoint discrimination while speaking in [the] [U]niversity’s limited public forum.’. . . Nonetheless, the individual defendants argue that there is no clearly established law ‘definitively decid[ing] the issue of the uneven enforcement of a nondiscrimination policy against registered student organizations on a university campus.’. . . But Walker and Reed both recognized the legal principle that a nondiscrimination policy neutral on its face violates a student group’s rights to free speech and expressive association if not applied in a viewpoint-neutral manner. . . . In summary, we are satisfied that Supreme Court precedent, existing Eighth Circuit precedent, and ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,’ ‘squarely govern[ed] [the individual defendants’] conduct in the specific circumstances at issue.’. . . As a result, we hold that the district court erroneously granted the individual defendants’ motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity on BLinC’s free-speech and expressive-association claims. . . . BLinC also maintains that its free-exercise rights were clearly established. Three Supreme Court cases concerning student speech in a university’s limited public forum are instructive in determining whether it was clearly established that the individual defendants’ selective enforcement of its nondiscrimination policy against BLinC violated BLinC’s free-exercise rights. See Martinez, 561 U.S. at 697 n.27, 130 S.Ct. 2971; Rosenberger, 515 U.S. at 841–42, 115 S.Ct. 2510; Widmar, 454 U.S. at 273 n.13, 102 S.Ct. 269. . . . None of these cases make clear that BLinC would have a free-exercise claim—as opposed to a free-speech claim—against the University defendants for selectively enforcing its nondiscrimination policy against BLinC in a limited public forum. In fact, Widmar expressly declined to ‘inquire into the extent, if any, to which free exercise interests are infringed by the challenged University regulation.’. . . BLinC cites several other cases in support of its argument that the law clearly established that the individual defendants’ conduct violated BLinC’s free-exercise rights, but none of them involve student speech in a limited public forum. . . . We may not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality,’. . . and to apply the general principles derived from those cases to the present case would contravene the Supreme Court’s directive. Because the law was not clearly established at the time that the individual defendants’ conduct violated BLinC’s free-exercise rights, we hold that the district court did not err in granting qualified immunity to them on BLinC’s free-exercise claim.”)

Business Leaders In Christ v. Univ. of Iowa, 991 F.3d 969, 988-90 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kobes, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Administrators at the University of Iowa discriminated against religious student groups. The University and individual defendants do not appeal that finding. I join the well-written majority opinion in denying qualified immunity on BLinC’s free speech and association claims, but I write separately because I think the law is clearly established on its free exercise claim, too. . . .The purpose of qualified immunity is to shield good-faith actors who make mistaken judgments about unresolved issues of law, and it protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . But we do not need the benefit of hindsight to know that the individual defendants’ choices were prohibited by the Constitution. They had more than ‘fair warning’ that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . . In fact, they knew it was. . . . The law is clear: state organizations may not target religious groups for differential treatment or withhold an otherwise available benefit solely because they are religious. That is what happened here. The individual defendants may pick their poison: they are either plainly incompetent or they knowingly violated the Constitution. Either way, they should not get qualified immunity.”) Luer v. Clinton, 987 F.3d 1160, 1168-70 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The officers found no one in the attached garage but observed that the door from the garage into the kitchen of the home was ajar. They knocked, announced police, entered the kitchen with guns drawn, and made ‘loud verbal commands’ that anyone in the house ‘make themselves known.’ Up to this point, we conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity under the community caretaker exception because an open door into a home late at night, when no one had responded to their repeated knocking at the outside doors, arguably warranted a limited protective entry. However, even if their intrusions to this point were justified, we must assess whether they sufficiently tailored their subsequent activity to this limited purpose. . . . No one responded to the officers’ repeated announcing at the kitchen door threshold. From there, they saw a light emanating from an open door to the basement. They descended to the basement, found no signs of disturbance, returned to the main level, and continued searching the entire home until encountering Luer outside his bedroom. We conclude the community caretaker exception cannot justify this severe, warrantless intrusion into a home. In searching two yards, underneath a deck, behind an air conditioning vent, and in the Luer-Steinebach attached garage, Officer Clinton observed no sign of the intoxicated fare-skipper. The officers had no information the suspect was armed or otherwise dangerous. They got no response from inside the Luer-Steinebach home and saw no signs of criminal activity. The cab driver reported that a petty thief had run, not that a burglar was on the prowl in a residential neighborhood. Reasonable police officers acting as community caretakers should have left the home. Whether the community caretaker exception extends to entries into the home is not a resolved Fourth Amendment question, as the recent grant of certiorari in the First Circuit’s Caniglia decision demonstrates. The First Circuit recognized that the need to limit the extent of this exception ‘is especially pronounced in cases involving warrantless entries into the home.... [P]olice officers must have “solid, noninvestigatory reasons” for engaging in community caretaking activities.’ . . . The other ‘exigent circumstance’ exceptions to the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement do not apply in these circumstances. The officers were not in ‘hot pursuit’ of the intoxicated fare-skipper, and they had no information suggesting that he was armed and dangerous. The officers argue that, because of the open doors, they had a ‘reasonable belief that the occupants of the [home] may be under a threat to their safety.’ Of course, there may be a threat to safety in almost any situation. However, it is clearly established that ‘[s]omething more than a speculative hunch is needed for police to conduct a protective sweep.’. . . Nor did the officers have information suggesting that anyone in the home was in need of emergency assistance. Had they confronted a person dressed as the cab driver described the fare-skipper in a place where the officers were entitled to be, they may well have had reasonable suspicion to stop and question the person and perhaps take him a short distance to see if the cab driver would identify him as the fare-skipper. But they were not entitled to enter and conduct an extensive search of the Luer-Steinebach home for this purpose without a warrant or consent. . . . Here, as in Selberg, Officers Clinton and Selz encountered no signs of disturbance outside the Luer-Steinebach home or in their attached garage. Nothing suggesting imminent danger to persons or property was visible from the kitchen door threshold. Although Selberg did not use the phrase ‘community caretaking,’ the opinion in substance addressed whether an interest in community caretaking -- that is, protection of persons or property -- justified the entry, . . . and the case is nearly on point factually. Considering Selberg together with the Supreme Court’s frequent cautions that exigent circumstances rarely justify a warrantless home intrusion, we conclude that it was clearly established by controlling Fourth Amendment precedents that the officers’ full blown search of the entire Luer-Steinebach domicile without a warrant was objectively unreasonable.”)

Luer v. Clinton, 987 F.3d 1160, 1170 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kobes, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority wrestles with the outer limits of community caretaking. Those are hard questions—but they are questions we need not answer. Community caretaking was not raised in the district court and was only discussed here in a reply brief. It was waived. . . . Even if the exception was properly raised, no facts support a reasonable belief that the officers needed to enter Luer and Steinebach’s property to protect community safety. The cab driver told Officers Clinton and Selz that the fare skipper walked away from Luer and Steinebach’s home, and the officers ‘had no information the suspect was armed or otherwise dangerous.’. . . The cab driver reported only ‘that a petty thief had run, not that a burglar was on the prowl in a residential neighborhood.’. . . On these undisputed facts, I do not think this is one of the ‘certain limited situations’ where community caretaking justifies ‘a noninvestigatory search[.]’ . . . Officers Clinton and Selz raised only two exigent circumstances—hot pursuit and emergency aid. The majority correctly rejects both arguments, and I would affirm on those grounds. To the extent the majority’s opinion grants immunity to the officers, I respectfully dissent.”)

MacKintrush v. Pulaski County Sheriff’s Dep’t, 987 F.3d 767, 770-71 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The right of a passive arrestee to be free from excessive use of body slams (or similar techniques) was clearly established when Hodge took MacKintrush to the floor. Force may be appropriate if a suspect presents a possible threat to police. . . . ‘There is no requirement that the plaintiff must find a case where the very action in question has previously been held unlawful so long as existing precedent has placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . It is ‘unreasonable for an officer to body-slam a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanor who pulled her arm away from the officer to extinguish a cigarette, where no reasonable officer would have viewed the act as noncompliance.’. . . Ambiguous gestures that officers claim are noncompliant (such as reaching to extinguish a cigarette) do not justify body slamming an otherwise compliant, nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanor. . . . Crediting MacKintrush’s account and the video of the incident, he was not actively resisting Hodge. Hodge tried to physically steer MacKintrush while he was walking through booking. MacKintrush shrugged off his touch. Hodge immediately body-slammed MacKintrush to the floor, knocking him out. Assuming that MacKintrush was a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanor who pulled his arm away from the officer, Karels put Hodge on notice that his body slam was excessive force.”)

Kuessner v. Wooten, 987 F.3d 752, 756-58 (8th Cir. 2021) (“[D]isparate cases did not give Wooten fair warning that arresting Kuessner based on bloodshot eyes, a drinking admission, and her refusal to take a breath test was unconstitutional. . . . These cases provided no fair warning to Wooten that his conduct was unconstitutional. They did not clearly establish that he lacked arguable probable cause to believe Kuessner had been driving based on the available facts—arriving alone, at the remote station, early in the morning, keys in hand, to pick up Wood. The district court properly granted summary judgment to Wooten.”)

Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 838-39 (8th Cir. 2021) (“Anderson insists that the law was not clearly established at the time of his alleged misconduct. ‘A citizen’s right to exercise First Amendment freedoms without facing retaliation from government officials is clearly established.’ . . . True, the Eighth Circuit has not considered a case ‘directly on point’ with the present facts—where reporters are arrested while peacefully filming a protest. . . . An exact match, however, is not required if the constitutional issue is ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Reporting is a First Amendment activity. . . . Based on this robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority, it is clearly established that using an arrest (that lacks arguable probable cause) to interfere with First Amendment activity is a constitutional violation. . . . A reasonable officer would have understood that deploying a tear-gas canister at law-abiding reporters is impermissible. . . . This court affirms the denial of qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim.”)

[But see De Mian v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 86 F.4th 1179, 1182-83 (8th Cir. 2023) (“This case is indistinguishable from Aldridge, where we affirmed summary judgment against the plaintiffs because ‘there [was] no evidence in the record that [the plaintiffs] had any interaction with Officer Olsten, that Officer Olsten was aware of their presence, or that [they] did anything to differentiate themselves from the other protestors in the crowd.’ . . . And it is distinct from the cases in which we affirmed the denial of qualified immunity where the officers plausibly directed their retaliatory conduct directly at the plaintiffs for their First Amendment activities. See Green v. City of St. Louis, 52 F.4th 734, 737 (8th Cir. 2022) (officers “fired tear gas in [Green’s] direction” as she was leaving a protest and walking to her car); Welch v. Dempsey, 51 F.4th 809, 811 (8th Cir. 2022) (officer “approached Welch ... and sprayed her in the face”); Brandy, 75 F.4th at 913–16 (officer had a verbal altercation with Brandy before he “deployed his pepper spray, hitting Brandy, who was directly in front of him”). Nothing in the record shows that Officer Olsten directed his actions toward De Mian. De Mian argues that she is a well-known reporter and is readily identifiable because she is in a wheelchair. But this fact, without more, is insufficient for a jury to infer that Officer Olsten knew or recognized her. She also speculates that Officer Olsten may have been retaliating against her for filming. But ‘there is no evidence Officer Olsten observed her filming or deployed pepper spray in retaliation for her doing so.’ . . . Finally, she argues that she was yelling and screaming, so a reasonable jury could find that Officer Olsten heard her. But the plaintiffs in Aldridge were also yelling and screaming, and nothing in the record indicates that Officer Olsten heard anyone other than Brandy. To the contrary, in a video recorded close to Officer Olsten and Brandy, De Mian's shouts cannot be heard. There is no evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that De Mian's actions motivated Officer Olsten to spray in her direction. So the lack of a causal connection is 'so free from doubt as to justify taking [this question] from the jury.'"); Aldridge v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 75 F.4th 895, 899-901 (8th Cir. 2023) ("There is no evidence in the record of Officer Olsten indicating animus toward Aldridge or singling him out. From the video it is evident that Officer Olsten did make a 'wide arc' while deploying the pepper spray, but this fact supports Officer Olsten's argument that no individual was targeted for his or her speech. Rather, this fact creates an 'obvious alternative explanation' for the use of force, that Officer Olsten was utilizing the pepper spray as a crowd control mechanism rather than retaliating against a particular protestor. . . Franks and Brown argue that whether Officer Olsten's motivation was retaliatory in nature is a question of fact for the jury. They contend the district court in each case erred by essentially requiring them to 'provide specific proof of [Officer Olsten's] improper motive,' which Quraishi forbids. . . To begin, Quraishi was an interlocutory appeal, which means we had no jurisdiction to review the district court's determination about what factual issues were genuine and we were limited to legal questions. . . While the Quraishi panel did not require 'specific proof' of the officer's improper motive, it did confirm that the plaintiffs' First Amendment activity must 'motivate' the officer's conduct. . . We emphasized that there were other protestors in the immediate vicinity, but only the reporters filming the scene were tear-gassed. . . Because the officer 'singled out' the reporters, his motive was not 'so free from doubt as to justify taking it from the jury.' . . The case at hand is distinguishable. In Quraishi, there was evidence the officers singled out the reporters by intentionally pepper spraying only them while avoiding all other protestors in the area. . . Here, by contrast, the appellants admit that 'every other non-police officer in the vicinity[] was actively involved in a protest' and that Officer Olsten 'mov[ed] his arm side to side and indiscriminately spray[ed] numerous protestors.' One cannot simultaneously single out the appellants and 'indiscriminately' spray the crowd. And there is no evidence in the record that either Franks or Brown had any interaction with Officer Olsten, that Officer Olsten was aware of their presence, or that either did anything to differentiate themselves from the other protestors in the crowd. While Franks argues she was filming the protest, there is no evidence Officer Olsten observed her filming or deployed pepper spray in retaliation for her doing so. Regardless of whether Officer Olsten's action was appropriate or reasonable⁴ under the circumstances, the lack of evidence causally connecting Officer Olsten's adverse action of using pepper spray to the appellants' protected expression is fatal to the retaliation claims. The district court's grants of summary judgment in favor of Officer Olsten are affirmed."")] Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 840 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Neither the district court nor the reporters cite authority that gave 'fair warning' to Anderson that deploying one canister of tear-gas was a seizure. . . The district court relied on inapposite law. True, use of pepper spray to arrest an unarmed, compliant suspect can be excessive force. . . Peterson is distinguishable, because it focused on the officer's behavior after the individual was already seized. This court did not consider whether the use of chemical agents alone is a seizure. . . Here, the issue is whether deploying tear gas is a seizure. The reporters cite Supreme Court cases to argue they were restrained because they could not stay in their chosen location. . . But these cases did not give fair warning. Brendlin held that, during traffic stops, passengers are seized. . . Brower held that setting up a roadblock that stops a fleeing suspect is a seizure. . . Brendlin and Brower are inapposite because both involve police action that terminated or restricted freedom of movement. . . Here, the reporters' freedom to move was not terminated or restricted. See Johnson, 926 F.3d at 506 (no seizure where plaintiff was not "ordered to stop and remain in place" and "was able to leave the scene"). They were dispersed. The reporters cite no 'precedent,' 'controlling authority' or 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to show it was clearly established that tear-gassing was a seizure. . . When Anderson deployed the tear-gas, it was not clearly established that his acts were a seizure. The district court should have granted qualified immunity to Anderson on the Fourth Amendment claim.")

Robbins v. City of Des Moines, 984 F.3d 673, 678-79 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Robbins asserts the defendant officers reasonably should have known that the First Amendment protected his recording activity, verbal challenge of the police, and refusal to leave a public place. Assuming Robbins had a constitutionally protected right to record as he was doing in this case, that right is not absolute. . . Here, law enforcement officers observed Robbins recording both vehicles near the police station and officers and civilian employees entering and leaving the police station. The officers also possessed other significant information: they were aware of recent criminal activity involving cars parked in the area, and they were aware of a previous filming and stalking incident that escalated into the murder of two officers. Armed with this knowledge, Officer Youngblut approached Robbins and asked him what he was doing. Robbins was non-responsive, evasive, and confrontational. Officer Youngblut reasonably found Robbins's behavior suspicious. Robbins' behavior that went beyond any constitutionally protected recording activity when combined with the officers' knowledge about vehicles being stolen and vandalized in the area and the previous filming that led to officers being murdered could cause an objectively reasonable person in the officers' position to suspect Robbins was up to more than simply recording the police. Under these circumstances, we can neither say that the officers' conduct was objectively unreasonable under clearly established law, nor in violation of the First Amendment. Robbins's remaining arguments are too generalized to show a violation of a clearly established right. . . While the First Amendment 'protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers,' . . . Robbins cannot rely on broad general allegations to show a deprivation of a clearly established right[.] . . The defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the Count I claims.")

Garcia v. City of New Hope, 984 F.3d 655, 672-73 (8th Cir. 2021) (Shepherd, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join the majority's opinion in all respects except its conclusion that Officer Baker is not entitled to qualified immunity on Garcia's First Amendment retaliation claim. Because I conclude that Garcia has not shown a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, I would affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity on this claim. . . . [E]ven if Garcia has shown the violation of a constitutional right, it was not clearly established on February 1, 2016, that driving through a school zone during school hours and in the presence of a crossing guard, leaning his entire head and arm out the window of his vehicle to raise his middle finger, all following a confrontation about Garcia's rate of speed in the same location earlier that day, was protected by the First Amendment. The majority relies on cases are factually distinct[.] . . . Although we held in Thurairajah that shouting 'fk you!' at an officer was protected speech, the Court's recognition of the clearly established right to be free from First Amendment retaliation was stated at a high level of generality and did not involve the same kind of conduct here, where Garcia demonstrated escalating aggressive and offensive behavior. . . . Cohen similarly lacked any evidence of escalating behavior; the individual in that case engaged only in the passive action of wearing a jacket bearing the words 'Fk the Draft.' . . . And although the Sixth Circuit held in Cruise-Gulyas that a reasonable officer would know raising a middle finger is protected speech, this case is of no precedential value to our Court, post-dates the incident here, and involves a single interaction between the individual and the officer, not two in one day, like Garcia. . . . Finally, none of the cases include a scenario where the offensive speech or conduct was offered in a school zone during the school day. These cases simply do not describe the facts confronting Officer Baker. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . The dispositive inquiry for this court 'is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,"' taking into account 'the specific context of the case, not [considering the determination] as a broad general proposition.' . . . When viewed with the proper level of specificity, accounting for the specific circumstances of this incident, I cannot conclude that it was clearly established that Garcia's conduct was protected by the First Amendment. . . . Given the facts of this case, I believe Garcia has failed to show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, I conclude Officer Baker is entitled to qualified immunity on Garcia's First Amendment claim.")

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 608-09 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Bell, it was clearly established at the time of Bell's warrantless arrest that no reasonable officer in the position of Officers Munyan and Neukirch could have believed that probable cause existed to arrest Bell based on the plainly exculpatory evidence available to them. Bell wore different shorts and socks than the suspect wore at the scene. His height varied by five inches from Munyan's real-time description of the suspect. Bell did not exhibit signs of exertion that would be expected of a suspect who ran a mile in seven minutes on a warm afternoon. Given the glaring differences, there was not arguable probable cause to believe that Bell was the fleeing suspect. Bell's right to be free from an arrest and detention under the circumstances was clearly established. It is an obvious case of insufficient probable cause. The officers assert that they acted reasonably because they reviewed the video recording of the suspect multiple times before confirming that Bell should be arrested. There is a factual dispute over how thoroughly they reviewed the video. Given Officer Munyan's averment that he could not tell whether the suspect's shorts included a broad white stripe on the side, a reasonable jury could conclude that Officer Munyan did not reasonably consider the video. But even assuming that the officers collectively watched the video eight times as they claim, it should have been obvious to any reasonable officer that Bell's shorts and socks were different from the suspect's shorts and socks at the scene. Qualified immunity requires more than subjective good faith; it requires objectively reasonable official conduct. . . . Simply scanning a video does not make conduct objectively reasonable if an officer ignores or overlooks plainly exculpatory evidence. . . . Qualified immunity does not protect the 'plainly incompetent[.]'. . . . An officer who repeatedly watched the video and failed to take note of the substantial discrepancies between Bell and the suspect demonstrates less diligence than what is expected of competent police officers about to limit someone's liberty by arrest. The officers fall back on their claim that it was reasonable to think that Bell shed an outer layer of shorts and socks, so they reasonably could have believed that there was probable cause on that assumption. The record includes only a general undisputed fact allegation that the officers had prior experience with suspects shedding an outer layer of clothing in undefined circumstances. As we have said, unless there is evidence that the officers had training or experience about suspects discarding layered clothing in a situation reasonably comparable to this one, the inference that Bell dispensed with a second pair of shorts and socks is implausible. Without more, it was not objectively reasonable to believe that Bell may have attempted to change his appearance by discarding solid dark-colored shorts in favor of underlying black-and-white shorts, and by removing long gray socks to reveal short black socks, while retaining his single white t-shirt and walking along the side of a road towards a parked patrol car during the supposed getaway. Even the initial detaining officer found little suspicious about Bell's appearance or demeanor. . . . The breadth of the officers' position illustrates the obviousness of its shortcoming. They contend that it was reasonable to believe that Munyan's height estimate of 5'10" could be off by five inches. They argue that it was reasonable to believe that a fleeing suspect found a mile away after only seven minutes would breathe normally and sweat little on an 86-degree sunny afternoon. They maintain that it was reasonable to mistake one pair of shoes for another. And they assert that it was reasonable to believe that the suspect could be found wearing any combination of t-shirt, shorts, and socks, because suspects are known to change their appearance by discarding layered clothing during foot pursuits. On that view, a reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest any black male aged approximately 17–18, with a dreadlock hair style. . . . and slender build, who was found within a one-mile radius of the original scene, if the young man's height ranged from 5'5" to 6'3" and he was wearing a white t-shirt, shorts, and socks of any color or design. We cannot accept that such an implication represented an objectively reasonable interpretation of the law at the time of Bell's arrest.")

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 610-11 & n.3 (8th Cir. 2020) (Colloton, J., concurring) ("The dissent. . . would affirm the judgment without addressing whether a reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest. (And by declining to address the first order question whether the officers had probable cause to arrest, the dissent's approach would allow officers qualified immunity to do the same thing again in the future.) On this view, because there is no decision of the Supreme Court or this court holding that an officer 'acting under similar circumstances' violated the Fourth Amendment, the officers have qualified immunity, without an inquiry into whether their actions were objectively legally reasonable. The dissent declines to address whether the existing constitutional rules were sufficient to give fair and clear warning on these facts, because Bell’s appellate briefs did not invoke the language of Wesby that this is ‘an obvious case where a body of relevant case law is not needed.’. That is not how qualified immunity analysis should work. When an arrestee argues on a given set of facts that no reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest, the argument brings up for our consideration whether the officer’s seizure was objectively legally reasonable. That question includes whether the existing constitutional rules apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question. Sometimes a plaintiff can prevail by arguing from general constitutional standards that a right is clearly established on a given set of facts. . . . Bell argued that ‘fourteen obvious evidentiary reasons should have negated probable cause,’ asserted that the right in question was clearly established, maintained that it was not objectively reasonable on these facts for officers to conclude that there was probable cause, and employed a rhetorical question—‘If all this was objectively reasonable, what would be unreasonable?’—to say, in effect, ‘it’s obvious.’ We should not parse Supreme Court opinions as though they were statutes, . . . nor should we read them as though they implemented a code-pleading regime for qualified immunity cases. We cannot avoid the issue of objective legal reasonableness in this case by requiring the arrestee to use certain magic words in his appellate briefs. I join the opinion of the court and concur in the conclusion that ‘this is an obvious case of insufficient probable cause.’. . . Given the obvious distinctions between the video-recorded suspect and the arrestee, and the implausibility of Officer Munyan’s post-hoc assertion that the fleeing juvenile may have sought to disguise himself by disposing of layered shorts and socks while retaining his white t-shirt, any reasonable officer should have known that he lacked probable cause to arrest and detain Bell.³ [fn. 3: In recent decisions, the Supreme Court has added the modifier ‘rare’ when discussing the ‘obvious case’ in which the unlawfulness of an officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear to deny qualified immunity without existing precedent that addresses similar circumstances. One hopes that obvious constitutional violations are rare, but it is not evident why rarity would be part of the legal standard; frequency seems to be an empirical question that depends on the conduct of police officers. But accepting that it should be a rare Fourth Amendment case in which qualified immunity is denied without a prior decision involving similar circumstances, this one fits the bill: for me, it is likely the first case in seventeen years to meet the standard.]”)

Bell v. Neukirch, 979 F.3d 594, 611-14 (8th Cir. 2020) (Stras, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Tyree Bell spent three weeks in custody due to a case of mistaken identity. The district court held that the arresting officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Because there is no clearly established law to support Bell’s claims against them, I would affirm across the board. . . . This case is hardly the model of good police work, but the question for us is whether Munyan and his partner were on ‘notice’ that their conduct violated ‘clearly established law.’. . . The bottom line is that neither Bell nor the court ‘have identified a single precedent ... finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ [citing Wesby] For this reason, I agree with the district court that Officer Munyan and his partner are entitled to qualified immunity.”) herself or others. But Goffin claims (and Officer Ashcraft disputes) that he was patted down by another officer just before he fled. The pat down removed nothing from Goffin and was later shown to have been unusually ineffective; the officer failed to discover that Goffin was carrying a loaded magazine and extra bullets. We conclude that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to qualified immunity on these facts because it was not clearly established at the time of the shooting that a pat down that removes nothing from a suspect eliminates an officer's probable cause that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm. . . . The case turns on whether the pat down changes our analysis. . . . Goffin argues that the pat down creates an issue of material fact because, if it occurred, then Officer Ashcraft must have known he was unarmed, or at least that there is an issue of material fact as to whether she knew he was unarmed. But whether probable cause exists is a legal question, not a factual one. . . . He must therefore provide a case clearly establishing that a pat down that recovered nothing. . . . eliminated Officer Ashcraft's objectively reasonable belief that he was armed and dangerous. Goffin fails to point to such a case. He relies on Tennessee v. Garner, but that case stands for a general proposition and cannot clearly establish the rule in most cases. . . . We . . . conclude that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to summary judgment because it is not clearly established that after observing a pat down that removes nothing from a suspect who an officer reasonably believed to be armed and dangerous, an officer cannot use lethal force against that suspect when he flees and moves as though he is reaching for a weapon. Nor do we think this is the 'rare obvious case' in which 'the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.' . . . The district court is affirmed.") Goffin v. Ashcraft, 977 F.3d 687, 692-94 (8th Cir. 2020) (Smith, C.J., concurring) ("I concur in the court's determination that the unlawfulness of Officer Ashcraft's conduct was not clearly established. I write separately to express my view that Officer Ashcraft did, however, violate Goffin's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . . In my view, probable cause to believe that Goffin was armed dissipated upon completion of this full body pat-down search that revealed no weapons. Some cases analyzing probable cause in the context of investigatory stops have so held. . . . The dissipation of probable cause to believe Goffin possessed a firearm should have reduced the officers' reasonable concern that Goffin posed an imminent threat to them or to bystanders. Thus, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Goffin, Officer Ashcraft violated Goffin's constitutional right to be free from excessive force by shooting him after witnessing a full body pat-down search that revealed no weapons. Nonetheless, I agree with the court's determination that Officer Ashcraft is entitled to qualified immunity because Goffin has not identified 'a case clearly establishing that a pat down that recovered nothing eliminated Officer Ashcraft's objectively reasonable belief that he was armed and dangerous.' . . . In this case, the officer who shot Goffin was not the officer who conducted the pat-down search. A pat down is not an invasive search and oversights can occur. The possibility of an oversight by the pat-down officer means an observing officer may still need to exercise independent judgment as to a potential threat. Here, circumstances abruptly changed and a compliant arrestee bolted from custody with unknown motives and capabilities. Pat-down searches are conducted precisely to diminish the officers' concern that an arrestee is armed, but those searches are not foolproof. The absence of authority clearly establishing that Officer Ashcraft's actions, on these facts, was constitutionally prohibited supports the district court's grant of qualified immunity under existing precedent.”)

Goffin v. Ashcraft, 977 F.3d 687, 694-97 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., dissenting) (“Officer Ashcraft never saw Goffin with a weapon, and she watched a fellow officer conduct a pat down that revealed no weapons. Yet Ashcraft shot Goffin in the back, in ‘a split-second,’ after he took ‘no more than two steps.’ Because I believe that the relevant law is clearly established—a question for the court to decide—and that a reasonable jury could find that Ashcraft’s use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, I respectfully dissent. . . . [T]he law is clearly established even if no prior case contained the exact factual circumstance here: a pat down before the suspect fled. The Supreme Court has long rejected the notion that ‘an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’. . . Officials can be on notice that their conduct violates established law ‘even in novel factual circumstances.’. . . The court relies on the precise scenario of a suspect fleeing after a pat down that revealed no weapons to conclude that Ashcraft violated no clearly established law. But the pat down is a novel fact that does not render inapplicable the clearly established law that officers ‘may not use deadly force unless the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.’. . . And here, although the novel factual circumstance of a pat down may impact whether a reasonable jury finds Ashcraft’s actions objectively reasonable, it does not render inapplicable the clearly established law that she cannot use deadly force unless a suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to her or others. I would reverse the grant of qualified immunity.”)

Thurmond v. Andrews, 972 F.3d 1007, 1012-13 (8th Cir. 2020) (“While prisoners certainly have an Eighth Amendment right to sanitary prison conditions including ‘reasonably adequate sanitation, personal hygiene, and laundry privileges, particularly over a lengthy course of time,’ the articulation of this broad right does not answer whether the presence of non-toxic environmental allergens are necessarily violative of this right. . . . A more specific and particularized inquiry is necessary in order to assess clearly established law in the context of an assertion of qualified immunity. . . . The only thing clearly established in this case is that the definition of the asserted constitutional right embraced by the district court — a right to sanitary prison conditions — was impermissibly broad. . . . And the finding that such a right was clearly established based on this general definition was therefore in error. Because the right at issue has not been properly defined and there are genuine disputes of material fact at play, it is not possible for us to determine whether the individual officers committed a constitutional violation in the Faulkner County Detention Center due to the presence of Cladosporium. To do so would require us to delve into genuinely disputed facts beyond our jurisdiction. This is not to say that there can never be a case in which the presence of mold or another environmental allergen may give rise to unsanitary prison conditions that violate inmates’ Eighth Amendment rights. Nor does it mean that truly dangerous environmental conditions could not reach such a high level where the violation was obvious. . . . But that is not the case here. Despite our limited ability to address whether a constitutional violation has occurred, we can still reach the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. A grant of qualified immunity is inappropriate, absent an obvious violation, if the right was not clearly established. Here there is no controlling case and no robust consensus of persuasive authority able to place the question beyond debate. Neither our research nor the parties' briefing uncovered any controlling Eighth Circuit cases addressing prison conditions and issues related to mold or other allergens more broadly. Instead, tangential and sparse references to mold or allergens in our precedent arise specifically in the adequate medical care context, and not the conditions of confinement context. . . . As such, a reasonable officer could glean little to no guidance from Eighth Circuit precedent about how to address the presence of a common mold in the jail, especially at the levels alleged. Likewise, there is a dearth of persuasive authority from outside the Eighth Circuit. . . . In short, we have not identified either 'controlling authority' or a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' clearly establishing a right to be free from Cladosporium, mold, or other allergens in the prison context at the levels alleged here. The right in question, even if properly defined, was not clearly established.")

Kohorst v. Smith, 968 F.3d 871, 878-79 (8th Cir. 2020) ("While Officer Smith's takedowns and repeated tasings of Kohorst 'likely reside[] on the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force, we cannot conclude that only a plainly incompetent officer would have believed the force used ...was constitutionally reasonable.' . . . Officer Smith's actions, while a close call, did not violate a clearly established right and the district court did not err in granting qualified immunity. . . . Unlike Blazek, Kohorst was uncooperative, arguably resisting, and posed a potential threat as he had already attempted to escape his handcuffs. While we view the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, no reasonable jury could review the video and conclude that Sergeant Stoler's action was gratuitous or unnecessarily violent—especially where Kohorst has no recollection of the event to testify to. Kohorst has also offered no evidence to refute Sergeant Stoler's explanation that he intended to place Kohorst in a way that reduced injury risk. . . . Sergeant Stoler's movement of Kohorst, an at least passively resisting suspect, was not gratuitous or unnecessarily violent. Even if we were to find that Sergeant Stoler's actions violated a constitutional right, it was not clearly established at the time that such force could not be used against a resisting, non-compliant suspect. The district court did not err in granting qualified immunity.") Kohorst v. Smith, 968 F.3d 871, 879-83 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I do not agree that Officer Smith is entitled to qualified immunity on Kohorst's excessive-force claim stemming from his initial takedown. First, there is a genuine dispute over whether Smith knew Kohorst was a suspect in a fight when he threw Kohorst to the ground face-first. . . . On summary judgment, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, and it is not appropriate for this court to remove the task of assessing witness credibility from the hands of the jury. . . . Therefore, Kohorst must be treated as a nonviolent misdemeanor, at most, when evaluating whether Smith used excessive force. . . . Second, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Kohorst, he did not fail to comply with commands to sit on the front of the squad car and take his hands out of his pockets. . . . Here, as in Rohrbough, the police officer initiated the physical confrontation. While Kohorst held his wallet behind his back, Smith forcefully grabbed Kohorst's right arm. Smith yelled 'Don't fight with me,' as he pushed Kohorst against the squad car and then used an arm-bar maneuver to force Kohorst face-first to the ground. All of this happened within a span of 17 seconds. A reasonable jury could conclude that Kohorst's putting his arm behind his back was no more than 'de minimis or inconsequential' resistance. . . Indeed, if Rohrbough's pushing an officer did not justify Officer Hall's use of force, then Kohorst's moving his arm away did not justify Smith's taking Kohorst to the ground. Because a jury could reasonably conclude that Smith violated Kohorst's clearly established right to be free from excessive force during the initial takedown, Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . I also do not agree that Sergeant Stoler is entitled to qualified immunity on Kohorst's separate excessive-force claim against him. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Kohorst, Stoler's use of force was gratuitous and excessive under the circumstances. It is clearly established 'that when a person is subdued and restrained with handcuffs, a "gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence" is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment.' . . A reasonable jury could conclude that Stoler violated this clearly established right. Before Stoler pulled Kohorst out of the car and threw him onto the hard pavement, Kohorst was subdued, handcuffed, and seated. He was talking somewhat incoherently but calmly to the multiple officers who surrounded him. No reasonable officer would perceive Kohorst as a threat to officer safety. Indeed, one officer can be heard chuckling at Kohorst's awkward position. And although Kohorst twisted his hands while Stoler attempted to remove the handcuffs, this resistance was 'de minimis or inconsequential.' . . The officers reasonably may have used some degree of force to reapply Kohorst's handcuffs, and we have said that 'officers are not required to treat detainees as gently as possible.' . . But Kohorst has offered evidence to show that Stoler's actions were 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary' under the circumstances. . . With multiple officers surrounding a subdued Kohorst, '[t]here were other means, short of the force employed,' to reapply Kohorst's handcuffs. . . As a result, Stoler is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . I respectfully dissent as to these two claims. I otherwise concur.")

Ivey v. Audrain County, Missouri, 968 F.3d 845, 849 (8th Cir. 2020) ("We have the discretion to decide either question first. . . and we think this case can be resolved on the second question, namely, whether the officers violated clearly established law. To prevail, Ivey's father has the burden to show that legal authorities establish beyond debate that a constitutional violation has occurred, so that, in responding to Ivey, the officers were plainly incompetent or knowingly violated the law. . . The Supreme Court has cautioned courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. . . We have recognized this principle in cases involving deliberate indifference to a pretrial detainee's objectively serious medical needs. . . The district court here defined the right at issue quite broadly when it said that 'it is unlawful to delay medical treatment for a detainee exhibiting obvious signs of medical distress.' Assuming the court's statement is true as a general matter, its application to the situation that the officers faced here is unclear because they encountered a detainee who declined medical assistance, and Ivey's father has not shown that the law clearly establishes what officers must do in that situation.")

Ivey v. Audrain County, Missouri, 968 F.3d 845, 851-53 (8th Cir. 2020) (Grasz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The court today concludes the defendant jail employees are entitled to qualified immunity because it believes Ivey's father failed to establish a violation of clearly established law related to his son's death while in custody. But even applying our rigorous 'clearly-established' jurisprudence, I believe Ivey's claims should survive summary judgment. Here's why. 'Summary judgment is appropriate only if "the movant shows that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law."' . . . 'In making that determination, a court must view the evidence "in the light most favorable to the opposing party."' . . . Such an approach is required 'even when ... a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the [qualified immunity] standard.' . . . The Supreme Court has highlighted 'the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant' when deciding whether the law was clearly established. . . . Under such an approach, my view of this case differs from the court in a few key ways — ways that impact whether the inaction of the jail officials violated clearly established law. . . . Viewed in a light most favorable to Ivey, the facts demonstrate jail employees ignored medical instructions regarding Ivey's needed asthma medication, failed to report Ivey's first observed seizure to health officials, and either defied medical instruction and jail policy requiring Ivey's observation or observed a second seizure and then failed to respond for nearly an hour. I believe a reasonable jail employee in July of 2016 would know such conduct was constitutionally deficient.")

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1053-55 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("Often, controlling precedent establishes that an alleged constitutional right exists, but its parameters are 'inapplicable or too remote,' or their application to the facts is unclear. . . . In other cases, the right's parameters are unclear because there is no controlling case, and courts in other jurisdictions may be 'sharply divided' on the issue. . . . Here, by contrast, a Supreme Court decision raises the threshold question whether the right Defendants are alleged to have violated even exists. In Whalen v. Roe, the Supreme Court stated that its prior cases 'sometimes characterized as protecting "privacy" have in fact involved ... the individual interest in avoiding disclosure of personal matters.' . . . The Court then upheld a New York statute requiring the State Department of Health to collect records identifying persons who acquired certain prescription drugs, concluding that 'this record does not establish an invasion of any right or liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.' . . . Despite the Court's inconclusive acknowledgment of a constitutional right it held not violated, a majority of the courts of appeals interpreted Whalen and Nixon as recognizing a constitutional right to the privacy of medical, sexual, financial, and other categories of highly personal information, grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment right to substantive due process. . . . More than thirty years after Whalen and Nixon, the Supreme Court returned to the issue in NASA v. Nelson, 562 U.S. 134, 131 S.Ct. 746, 178 L.Ed.2d 667 (2011). It again rejected a constitutional privacy challenge, this time to mandatory background checks for contractors at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory. . . . The Court declined to provide a 'definitive answer' to whether there is a constitutional right to informational privacy, because the government as petitioner had not presented the issue for decision and it was not briefed and argued. . . . Although Nelson left the issue unresolved, it confirmed that our court and other circuits erred in reading inconclusive statements in Whalen and Nixon as Supreme Court recognition of a substantive due process right to informational privacy. In this case, at oral argument before our en banc court, Defendants urged us to hold that the alleged right does not exist. But they did not raise this issue in the district court, before the panel, or in their petition for rehearing en banc. Nor did Plaintiffs address the issue prior to responding at oral argument. In similar circumstances, seven Supreme Court Justices declined to decide this constitutional issue in Nelson, observing that, ‘Particularly in cases like this one, where we have only the scarce and open-ended guideposts of substantive due process to show us the way, the Court has repeatedly recognized the benefits of proceeding with caution.’. . . The Court in Nelson opted to ‘assume, without deciding, that the Constitution protects a privacy right of the sort mentioned in Whalen and Nixon.’. . . However, even if the right is assumed to exist, in reviewing the denial of qualified immunity, Nelson raises an essential question: whether a right the Supreme Court has only assumed may exist, and this court has never held to be violated, can be a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The disclosures in this case occurred years after the decision in Nelson, and we have not revisited the issue. The resulting legal uncertainty surely means the alleged constitutional right to informational privacy is not ‘beyond debate’ in the Eighth Circuit. . . . Under Reichle, therefore, the uncertain status of the right to informational privacy means that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. If a right does not clearly exist, it cannot be clearly established.”)

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1055-56 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Colloton, J., concurring) (“I join the opinion of the court and submit these observations in response to the separate opinions that follow. Both opinions take the view that court decisions rejecting a plaintiff’s claim of constitutional right can clearly establish a constitutional right for the benefit of a future plaintiff. The court properly declines to adopt that reasoning. . . . If there is no decision that a constitutional right exists, then the right is not clearly established, and officials do not have fair notice about it. In the context of qualified immunity, therefore, ‘clearly established law comes from holdings, not dicta,’. . . with the likely exception of decisions that declare a constitutional violation in a concrete case before granting qualified immunity. . . . [I]n discerning a clearly established substantive due process right to informational privacy, the panel decision in this case mistakenly attributed the force of binding law to dicta in Peffer, Eagle, and Cooksey. . . Whether some other disclosure of information that amounted to a ‘shocking degradation’ or ‘egregious humiliation’ would have implicated the concept of substantive due process was unnecessary to the decision or result in those cases. It was sufficient for this court in Peffer, Eagle, and Cooksey to assume without deciding that a disclosure of matters more personal would violate the Constitution, just as it was sufficient for the Supreme Court to do so in Whalen . . . and. . . Nelson[.]. . . Such an assumption does not clearly establish a constitutional right. . . Decisions of four other circuits denying qualified immunity in this context relied on precedent of that circuit deciding in an actual case that a constitutional right to informational privacy existed and was sufficiently pleaded or proved.”)

Dillard v. O'Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1057-59 (8th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Grasz, J., with whom Smith, C.J., joins, concurring in part and concurring in the result) (“The constitutional right to informational privacy in the Eighth Circuit is dead. . . Some believe it never lived. In any event, in this age of digital information, where the government may possess massive amounts of personal data, the protection of twenty-two million people from wrongful disclosure of intimately private information by government officials now lies squarely in the hands of the state legislatures in Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota. . . Perhaps that is where it belonged from the start, given that the federal constitution is silent on the matter and the United States Supreme Court has yet to conclude that a constitutional right to informational privacy exists. . . . While the demise of informational privacy as a constitutional right in this circuit may be appropriate, we should at least recognize this was not an academic exercise to the plaintiffs. The court has concluded that the Arkansas public officials here, who are alleged to have callously revealed intimate and humiliating personal information of young sexual assault victims to a tabloid under highly suspicious circumstances, are exempt from liability because of qualified immunity. . . The court does so, in part, based on the proposition that a constitutional right not definitively recognized by the Supreme Court cannot be ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . While this reasoning may have facial appeal, it is simply not true that a right established in circuit precedent cannot be ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity even in the absence of definitive Supreme Court precedent. Indeed, many other circuit courts would likely be quite surprised by this holding. . . Regardless, today’s decision means future litigants have no recourse in this circuit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for informational privacy violations. I remain of the view that the panel below was bound to follow this court’s opinions in Cooksey v. Boyer, 289 F.3d 513, 515–16 (8th Cir. 2002), Eagle v. Morgan, 88 F.3d 620, 625 (8th Cir. 1996), and Alexander v. Pfeffer, 993 F.2d 1348, 1350 (8th Cir. 1993), in which we recognized and narrowly defined the right to informational privacy. . . However, I agree with the en banc court that the foundation of those cases is gone. And today’s decision has effectively negated them. . . With no right to informational privacy recognized in this circuit, the appellants cannot, as a matter of law, prevail against the assertion of qualified immunity. They must instead look to state law for relief.”) Dillard v. O’Kelley, 961 F.3d 1048, 1059-62 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In 2006, Plaintiffs provided private and intimate details regarding their childhood sexual abuse to government officials under a promise of confidentiality. More than eight years later, government officials broke that promise and disclosed this sensitive information to a tabloid without Plaintiffs’ consent. Because I believe this violated Plaintiffs’ clearly established right to privacy, I respectfully dissent. The issue in this appeal is whether a reasonable government official in the Eighth Circuit would have understood that disclosing to a tabloid private information regarding childhood sexual abuse would violate the constitutional right to privacy. . . . Following other circuits, we have held that to violate an individual’s constitutional right of privacy ‘the information disclosed must be either a shocking degradation or an egregious humiliation of her to further some specific state interest, or a flagrant breach of a pledge of confidentiality which was instrumental in obtaining the personal information.’. . . Until this case, we had not been presented with a factual scenario that satisfied this exacting standard. . . But in my view, we had provided fair notice to government officials in the Eighth Circuit that the public disclosure of ‘highly personal matters representing the most intimate aspects of human affairs,’ that is ‘either a shocking degradation or an egregious humiliation . . . , or a flagrant breach of a pledge of confidentiality,’ violates the constitutional right to privacy. . . . The question then becomes whether our precedent was undermined, such that the rule in this circuit would not have been clear to a reasonable official, by the Supreme Court's decision in Nelson. In that case, the Court 'assume[d], without deciding, that the Constitution protects a privacy right of the sort mentioned in Whalen and Nixon.' . . . And it explained that, contrary to the interpretation adopted by most circuits, this was 'the same approach ... the Court took more than three decades ago in Whalen and Nixon.' . . . In the court's view, 'Nelson raises an essential question: whether a right the Supreme Court has only assumed may exist, and this court has never held to be violated, can be a clearly established constitutional right.' . . . Relying on Reichle v. Howards, the court answers this question in the negative, reasoning that 'the uncertain status of the right to informational privacy means that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.' . . . I disagree. In Reichle, the Supreme Court decided that it was not clearly established in the Tenth Circuit that a retaliatory arrest could violate the First Amendment even if the arrest was supported by probable cause. . . . The Court reasoned that, although there was Tenth Circuit caselaw to this effect, a reasonable officer could have believed that caselaw had been abrogated by the Court's subsequent decision in Hartman v. Moore, . . . which reached the opposite conclusion regarding retaliatory prosecutions. . . . The Court explained that most circuits had treated retaliatory arrest and prosecution claims similarly before Hartman, that it had granted certiorari in Hartman to resolve a circuit split pertaining to both retaliatory arrests and prosecutions, that much of the rationale in Hartman applied to both retaliatory arrests and prosecutions, and that several circuits had decided that Hartman's no-probable-cause requirement extended to retaliatory arrests. . . . I do not agree that Nelson's effect on our right-to-privacy caselaw is similar to Hartman's effect on the Tenth Circuit's retaliatory-arrest caselaw. Unlike Hartman, which was intended to resolve a circuit split and abrogate contrary circuit authority, Nelson purported to leave the state of the law intact. . . . The Court expressly acknowledged that, after Whalen and Nixon, different circuits had adopted different interpretations of when the disclosure of private information by government officials would violate the right to privacy, and the Court declined to decide which circuit's caselaw was correct. . . . Nelson did clarify that our prior caselaw was not required by Whalen and Nixon. A reasonable government official could have wondered whether, in light of that clarification, we would revisit our past decisions and change our right-to-privacy jurisprudence. But because we had not done so when the government officials made the disclosures at issue here, they could not have reasonably concluded that the law in the Eighth Circuit had been changed. And we have not been presented with an opportunity to revisit our pre-Nelson caselaw in this appeal. . . . For these reasons, I believe the panel's opinion was correct, and I would reinstate it. To the extent the court does otherwise, I respectfully dissent.") Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1090-92 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Taking the facts in Chestnut's favor, we think Walker establishes that Wallace violated Chestnut's clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering. The dissent says our definition of the right is defined too abstractly, at too high a level of generality. We respectfully disagree. We think we have correctly characterized the principle acted on in Walker, and thus the right in question, and we conclude that Chestnut has carried his burden to show that Walker clearly establishes such a right. Wallace tries to distinguish Walker on several grounds, but we find none of them persuasive. He maintains that Walker involved an arrest, whereas Chestnut was only

detained. But the same facts that led us to conclude that it was clearly unlawful to arrest Walker lead us to conclude it was likewise clearly unlawful for Wallace to detain Chestnut; in both cases, no reasonable officer could conclude that a citizen's passive observation of a police-citizen interaction from a distance was criminal. We think it is legally irrelevant that Chestnut did not undergo similar post-seizure experiences as Walker, such as being placed in a hot police car, taken to the police station, or charged with a crime: This case is about the facts that existed when Chestnut was seized. Nor do we place any weight on the fact that Walker provided identification when Chestnut did not, for the reasons already stated. In short, we think Walker puts this constitutional question beyond debate, . . . and we can't see how applying Walker means that we are requiring police officers 'to parse fine distinctions between statutory and constitutional law in split-second decisions,' as the dissent maintains. Respectfully, it is the distinctions that Wallace invites us to draw between our case and Walker that are too fine and irrelevant. . . . Other legal authorities fully support our holding that the right here was clearly established. Every circuit court to have considered the question has held that a person has the right to record police activity in public. See, e.g., Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355–56 (3d Cir. 2017). Four circuits had so decided by the time of the events in question here. See ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 595 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82–83 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). This robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority suggests that, if the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording. Our circuit in particular has been quite forthright in upholding the right of citizens to engage with officers while they perform their duties. . . . The dissent explicitly agrees with our characterization of these cases, but it argues 'that factual distinctions matter greatly in delimiting the right.' We agree. But it supports its argument with a case, Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017), that is distinguishable. In that case, a man recorded the exterior of a police station. The facts do not indicate that he recorded any police-citizen interactions or any other public police activity. The case therefore presents a much different question from ours, though we point out that that court, like every other circuit court that has considered the question, held that there was a constitutional right to record police activity. . . . We observe in closing that the fact-finder at trial may determine that Chestnut was indeed lurking in the woods, or at least otherwise disagree with Chestnut's telling of the night's events, in which case Wallace's detaining, handcuffing, and frisking Chestnut may have been justified. But at this stage, we must view the facts in Chestnut's favor. And though we agree with the dissent that 'qualified immunity is important to society as a whole,' so is the people's ability to monitor police activities to ensure that their duties are carried out responsibly.") Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085, 1095-96, 1099 (8th Cir. 2020) (Gruender, J., dissenting) ("The court does not explain why the distinctions between this case and Walker fail to sufficiently distinguish it. Instead, it says it is unconvinced by Wallace's attempt to do so. . . . Yet Wallace does not bear the burden to show that these cases are too distinct to provide obvious guidance; Chestnut has the burden to prove they are sufficiently similar. . . . We cannot—and should not—shift that burden. In light of the dissimilarities in these cases, I do not believe that Walker put 'beyond debate’ what the law required in the circumstances Wallace faced. . . In an effort to support its finding that Wallace violated clearly established law, the court turns away from Walker to an argument Chestnut does not advance: that a consensus of cases from other circuits establishing that the Constitution protects those who video record police activity as long as they do not interfere with police duties also includes the right to merely observe police conduct. . . I agree with the court’s characterization of those cases. But—again—the fact that a certain right exists does not mean it is without limits, nor does it necessarily indicate that it is obvious how the right applies to a certain set of facts. Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678 (5th Cir. 2017), a recent Fifth Circuit case considering the right to record the police, illustrates that factual distinctions matter greatly in delimiting the right. There, officers observed an individual videotaping the Fort Worth Police Station from a sidewalk across the street from the station. . . Officers approached, questioned, and detained the on-looker, eventually handcuffing him and placing him in the back of a patrol car. . . The court found that, because of the unusual nature of where and what he was recording, ‘[a]n objectively reasonable person in [the officers’] position could have suspected that Turner was casing the station for an attack, stalking an officer, or otherwise preparing for criminal activity, and thus could have found Turner’s filming of the “routine activities” of the station sufficiently suspicious to warrant questioning and a brief detention.’ . . Likewise, under the circumstances presented here, a reasonable officer could believe it would not violate clearly established law to conduct an investigative stop. . . . In recent years, the Supreme Court has issued several decisions reversing denials of qualified immunity by the courts of appeals. The Court found those reversals ‘necessary both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.’ . . We should hew closely to the wisdom of this instruction and to the counsel of our own precedent which emphasizes that officers in the line of duty are not ‘participating in a law school seminar.’ . . It is thus worth emphasizing again that police officers are not—and should not be—expected to parse fine distinctions between statutory and constitutional law in split-second decisions. . . Because there is no authority that would have given Officer Wallace notice that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to conduct an investigative stop in the manner he did under the circumstances presented in this case, I respectfully dissent.”)

[See also Keup v. Sarpy County, No. 8:21-CV-312, 2022 WL 195822, at *4–5 (D. Neb. Jan. 21, 2022) (“ Unlike many other circuits, the Eighth Circuit has not expressly held that the First Amendment protects the photographing and recording of police activities in public. But it has provided the Court significant guidance on this issue in a recent decision, Chestnut v. Wallace, 947 F.3d 1085 (8th Cir. 2020). In Chestnut, the plaintiff brought an action against a police officer, alleging that the officer violated the Fourth Amendment when he stopped, frisked, and handcuffed him without reasonable suspicion or probable cause. . . According to the plaintiff, he had been watching another police officer perform traffic stops at a distance without interfering. . . That police officer radioed the defendant police officer for assistance. . . The defendant police officer approached the plaintiff, and, after the plaintiff refused to provide his full social security number, frisked him for weapons and handcuffed him. . . After the district court denied the officer’s qualified immunity defense, the officer appealed. . . With one judge dissenting, the Eighth

Circuit held that the defendant police officer ‘violated [the plaintiff’s] clearly established right to watch police-citizen interactions at a distance and without interfering.’. . The majority cited with approval the other circuits that had ‘held that a person has the right to record police activity in public.’. . Thus, the Chestnut court wrote, ‘If the constitution protects one who records police activity, then surely it protects one who merely observes it—a necessary prerequisite to recording.’. . The majority noted that the Eighth Circuit ‘in particular has been quite forthright in upholding the right of citizens to engage with officers while they perform their duties.’. . And, the Chestnut court observed, the majority’s holding protected ‘the people’s ability to monitor police activities to ensure that their duties are carried out responsibly.’. .

Although Chestnut was a Fourth Amendment case, its pronouncement of a constitutionally protected right to observe and record police activity leads the Court to find Keup was engaged in a protected activity when he was hit with a pepper ball. A strong consensus has developed amongst the circuits that this conduct fits within the First Amendment’s protections. Indeed, no circuit to consider the issue has held that the right to record police activity does not exist under the First Amendment. . . . The weight of authority from the other federal circuits and the statements in Chestnut proclaiming a constitutional right to record and observe police activity in public lead this Court to conclude that the ability to watch and assist in taking photographs of a protest is activity protected by the First Amendment. When Keup was observing the protest and assisting his partner in photographing the event, he was engaged in activity protected by the First Amendment. . . Therefore, Keup’s First Amendment claim survives Defendants’ Motions to Dismiss.”)]

Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 410-11 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Whether the officers subjectively thought there was probable cause to arrest for trespass is irrelevant. . . We examine only the objective question whether the circumstances known to the officers established a fair probability that Johnson committed an offense. Johnson’s refusal to leave after agents of the club revoked his license to remain established arguable probable cause to believe that he trespassed. Arguable probable cause that he had committed an offense inside the club continued to exist fifteen minutes later when the officers arrested Johnson. Whether the officers exercised poor judgment in electing to arrest Johnson after the original dispute was resolved is not pertinent to the objective probable-cause analysis under the Fourth Amendment. The officers also claim qualified immunity on Johnson’s claim under the Due Process Clause. Johnson asserts that the officers deprived him of liberty without due process of law by falsifying a report of his arrest. Any deprivation of Johnson’s liberty before his criminal trial, however, is governed by the Fourth Amendment and its prohibition on unreasonable seizures. Manuel v. City of Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911, 917 (2017). (On this issue, Manuel abrogated Moran v. Clarke, 296 F.3d 638, 646-47 (8th Cir. 2002) (en banc).) Any post-trial claim based on the alleged false report requires a showing that the report was used to deprive Johnson of liberty in some way. See Winslow v. Smith, 696 F.3d 716, 735 (8th Cir. 2012). The jury acquitted Johnson, and he suffered no deprivation of liberty after the trial. Accordingly, there is insufficient evidence to support a finding that the officers violated Johnson’s rights under the Due Process Clause. For these reasons, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claims alleging false arrest under the Fourth Amendment, retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment, and deprivation of liberty in violation of the Due Process Clause.")

Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 411-12 (8th Cir. 2019) ("There are genuine disputes of material fact about whether McCarver's use of the taser violated Johnson's clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. It is undisputed that more than fifteen minutes after Johnson exited the club, the officers went outside and saw that Johnson was sitting on a planter while filming them with his cell phone. McCarver approached Johnson and knocked Johnson's phone to the ground. Johnson stood up, bent over, picked up his phone, and sat back down on the planter. The parties disagree about what happened next. Johnson testified that '[o]nce [he] sat down,' McCarver tased him in the back. The officers contend that Johnson stood up again before McCarver fired his taser: LaLuzerne testified that Johnson stepped onto the planter and 'lunged back down at' him; McCarver asserts that Johnson 'stepped onto the bench' surrounding the planter, and pushed LaLuzerne away from him. The officers argue that we should disregard Johnson's account because it is 'blatantly contradicted' by video footage from a security camera. . . The district court saw no blatant contradiction and concluded that 'the video is more supportive of Johnson's version of the incident.' Having reviewed the evidence ourselves, we deem it inconclusive. In reviewing the denial of a motion for summary judgment, therefore, we accept Johnson's version that he was seated peacefully on the planter when McCarver tased him. At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that it was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment to apply a taser to a 'nonviolent, suspected misdemeanor who was not fleeing or resisting arrest, [and] who posed little to no threat to anyone's safety.' . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, McCarver violated this clearly established right when he applied the taser to Johnson. The district court correctly determined that there are genuine issues of material fact that preclude summary judgment on this claim.")

Johnson v. McCarver, 942 F.3d 405, 412-15 (8th Cir. 2019) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's deprivation-of-liberty claim because he suffered no post-trial deprivation of liberty. I also agree the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claim for excessive force arising from the tasing. I disagree, however, that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's remaining Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and excessive force, as well as his First Amendment retaliation claim. . . The court concludes that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claims for false arrest under the Fourth Amendment and retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment because the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Johnson for trespass. I disagree. . . . A reasonable officer would understand that Johnson was no different than any other person waiting in the lobby for the valet to bring around their car. While Webster told Johnson he would have to leave because the owner would not allow his boots, Johnson explained the owner had previously allowed his boots. Hearing this explanation, Webster walked away. When McCarver approached Johnson and told him to leave, Johnson said he was in fact leaving, but was just waiting for the valet like the rest of the patrons—a claim of right to be inside the lobby. . . McCarver then pushed Johnson as he was backing up toward the exit. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, he was not refusing to leave the premises, and his right to remain in the lobby had not been revoked. Rather, he was lawfully inside awaiting the valet. As such, the elements of trespass were not satisfied, and the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's false arrest claim. . . . Because I believe the officers lacked even arguable probable cause to arrest Johnson, I also believe his First Amendment retaliation claim remains viable. Johnson alleges the officers arrested him in retaliation for recording them with his cell phone outside the club. To succeed on a claim for retaliatory arrest, Johnson must show (1) he engaged in a protected activity; (2) the government official took adverse action against him that would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing the activity; (3) the adverse action was motivated at least in part by the exercise of the protected activity; and (4) lack of probable cause or arguable probable cause for the arrest. . . . The officers do not dispute the facts underlying this claim, but instead argue they are entitled to qualified immunity because Johnson's right to record and photograph the officers was not clearly established. While this Court has not decided this precise question, I would join every circuit that has done so and hold that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers in public. See Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 360 (3d Cir. 2017); Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 690 (5th Cir. 2017); ACLU of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583, 595 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 82 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332, 1333 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436, 439 (9th Cir. 1995). Moreover, absent binding authority from this Court, a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' can itself 'clearly establish' the federal right Johnson alleges. . . . By the time the officers arrested Johnson, all four circuit courts that had considered the question decided that filming the police in public is a First Amendment right. . . . This 'robust consensus,' together with our general pronouncement that a citizen's 'right to exercise First Amendment freedoms without facing retaliation from government officials is clearly established,' . . . was more than sufficient to put McCarver and LaLuzerne on notice that they were violating Johnson's clearly established right[.] . . . Consequently, I would hold that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for this claim. . . . Finally, the court concludes the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson's claim of excessive force for using pepper spray and pushing him inside the club, because such force 'was not unreasonable under the circumstances.' I disagree. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Johnson, the three Graham factors provide no justification for pushing and pepper-spraying him and, as a result, the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . . The officers also argue that the right at issue was not clearly established. But by the time they acted on October 5, 2014, we had held in Peterson v. Kopp that it was objectively unreasonable for the police to use pepper spray on a non-fleeing, nonviolent suspect who 'took a few steps backward, put his hands up, and said "[y]ou can't handle me like that"' immediately before being pepper-sprayed. . . . Because these facts are sufficiently similar to this case, McCarver and LaLuzerne had 'fair warning' that their actions were unconstitutional.")

Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1178-79 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) ("In evaluating an officer's claim to qualified immunity, '[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.' . . . Neither Langford nor Johnson-El shows that the 'particular conduct' alleged in Hamner's pleadings runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment. A reasonable prison official, aware of the alleged gaps in Hamner's treatment, could have understood the Eighth Amendment to allow administrators an opportunity to fix problems that arise in a prison's health care system by responding to grievances and taking corrective actions. . . . Hamner alleges that the defendants knew that he was 'seriously mentally ill' and that his confinement 'risked irreparable emotional damage or a death by suicide.' He argues that since In re Medley, 134 U.S. 160, 168, 10 S.Ct. 384, 33 L.Ed. 835 (1890), courts have recognized the damaging effects of solitary confinement. He contends that 'it is now beyond serious dispute' that administrative segregation poses serious risks, which are particularly pronounced for prisoners with mental illness. He points to our decision in Simmons v. Cook, 154 F.3d 805 (8th Cir. 1998), as establishing that solitary confinement, together with a prisoner's physical limitations, can deprive him 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.' . . . To defeat qualified immunity, however, 'the clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case' and not 'defined at a high level of generality.' . . . None of the prior decisions involved a mentally ill prisoner in administrative segregation, and they do not demonstrate that the prison officials here violated a clearly established right. Indeed, although Orr did not involve a conditions of confinement claim, this court rejected a claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by holding a mentally ill prisoner in administrative segregation for nine months while providing treatment. . . . Hamner maintains that various studies on solitary confinement and decisions of other circuits placed the defendants on notice that subjecting a prisoner with Hamner's mental illnesses to prolonged administrative segregation violates the Eighth Amendment. Although 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' may suffice to put a 'constitutional question beyond debate,' . . . Hamner fails to demonstrate such authority existed as of October 2015. . . . Scholarly literature about negative effects of segregation may influence prison administrators and future court decisions, but it likewise does not establish that the constitutional question raised by Hamner was beyond debate in 2015. Hamner's allegations identify a combination of circumstances that was not present in previous cases. We do not gainsay that lengthy administrative segregation of an inmate with serious medical illness and no access to television or regular reading material requires different analysis than solitary confinement of prisoners with no history of psychiatric difficulties and milder restrictions. That Hamner presents a debatable argument for distinguishing prior decisions and breaking new legal ground, however, does not suffice to allege that the officials violated a clearly established right.")

Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1179-80 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) ("Hamner argues that his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated when prison officials placed him in administrative segregation for 203 days without affording him proper procedural avenues for challenging his classification. Prisoners have a liberty interest in freedom from conditions of confinement that impose 'atypical and significant hardship' relative to 'ordinary incidents of prison life.' . . . The duration and degree of restrictions bear on whether a change in conditions imposes such a hardship. . . . Hamner contends that the conditions of his confinement in administrative segregation departed materially enough from his experience in general population to trigger a liberty interest. He also claims that prison officials afforded him inadequate process by failing to articulate a clear justification for his placement in administrative segregation and to afford meaningful periodic review of his classification thereafter. Hamner identifies no circuit precedent holding that an inadequate justification for administrative segregation or shortcomings in review of a prisoner's placement violate the Due Process Clause. Instead, he attempts to derive a set of legal rules from cases in which we have held that prisoners did not allege a sufficient liberty interest. . . . None of the cited cases, however, clearly establishes the 'violative nature of [the] particular conduct' in question here. . . . Our precedents have said that 'a demotion to segregation, even without cause, is not itself an atypical and significant hardship,' . . . and held that nine months in administrative segregation did not deprive a mentally ill prisoner of a liberty interest. . . . While it is possible in this fact-specific area that a combination of circumstances involving solitary confinement could curtail a liberty interest, e.g., Incumaa v. Stirling, 791 F.3d 517, 531-32 (4th Cir. 2015); Williams v. Norris, 277 F. App'x 647, 648-49 (8th Cir. 2008) (per curiam), it is not beyond debate that the defendant officials did so by segregating a prisoner with Hamner's particular medical condition for 203 days under the conditions alleged. Where Hamner's only remaining claim is for damages, we conclude that the officials are entitled to qualified immunity.") Hamner v. Burls, 937 F.3d 1171, 1180-81 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 611 (2020) (Erickson, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority's analysis, but write separately to express my concerns about Hamner's placement in administrative segregation and our reluctance to meaningfully address the significant hardship imposed on inmates placed in isolation, particularly those with pre-existing mental health issues. In light of the detrimental and devastating effects that placement in administrative segregation has on the human psyche, I am troubled in this case by both the prison administrators' lack of process and their failure to comply with their own policies. While I agree that there is currently no precedent in our court establishing a due process violation for failing to provide adequate procedural protections in the context of administrative segregation, I believe that the Constitution requires, at a minimum, an opportunity for meaningful review when prison administrators impose restrictions on an inmate as significant and as potentially injurious as placement in administrative segregation. I also believe that the time has come to revisit our precedent that ignores the known negative effects of segregation and isolation. Hamner alleged that the Arkansas Department of Corrections violated its own policies and the Due Process Clause by failing to provide an adequate justification for administrative segregation and by allowing a review process that essentially provided no meaningful review. Hamner was denied a probable cause hearing required by prison policy to take place within 72 hours of placement in administrative segregation. When the hearing actually occurred, Hamner was neither given advance notice of it nor an opportunity to appear. By the time Hamner was allowed to appear, more than a dozen days had passed. Hamner further alleged that prison policy provides for review hearings every seven days for the first two months. Documentation of the first seven-day review hearing in the record is dated May 13, 2015, when Hamner had been in administrative segregation for six weeks. It is uncontroverted that the check-the-box form completed by prison officials following the hearing gave no reason for Hamner's initial assessment or continued placement in administrative segregation. In fact, the forms completed following the review hearings contained no rationale for the initial placement or justification for continued placement in administrative segregation until August 12, 2015 (more than four months after Hamner was originally placed in administrative segregation) and then the form only contained the handwritten words ‘security concerns.’ Hamner disputes that he ever expressed a security concern. No findings were made that evidenced the nature of the alleged security concern. Hamner was inexplicably confined in administrative segregation for nearly five months without any explanation. During the almost seven months he was held in administrative segregation, he was given no meaningful opportunity to challenge his placement in isolation. As noted by the majority, we have consistently said that placement in administrative segregation, even without cause, is not itself an atypical and significant hardship. Given the developing science of mental health and what is now known – that is, the profound detrimental and devastating impact solitary confinement has on an inmate’s psyche, particularly an inmate with pre-existing mental illnesses – we can only reach the conclusion that this type of isolation is, as a matter of law, not an atypical and significant hardship if we ignore reality. The majority acknowledges that ‘[s]cholarly literature about negative effects of segregation may influence prison administrators and future court decisions.’ I suggest the time has come to consider that literature and reverse the precedent that stands for the proposition that isolation is not a significant hardship with constitutional implications. If we also factor in the prison administrators’ failure to provide any explanation for Hamner’s placement in administrative segregation for nearly five months and the hollow review process afforded him, I believe Hamner has shown a sufficient hardship to trigger a liberty interest. But, because I reluctantly conclude that our precedent precludes a finding of the existence of a clearly established constitutional right giving sufficient notice to prison administrators, I concur.”)

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1138 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Robinson claims a male officer was watching while Officer Hawkins conducted the strip search, and Officer Hawkins acknowledges that ‘a male should not be present for a female search.’ Robinson claims the search was ‘conducted in [an] unsanitary parking lot,’ and Officer Hawkins has also acknowledged that the parking lot was not sanitary. . . Finally, Robinson claims Officer Hawkins cursed and yelled at her. The other officer at the scene was not of the same sex as Robinson. An oily tractor-trailer in an open-air parking lot is not hygienic. And Robinson’s claim that Officer Hawkins called her a ‘bitch’ and a ‘f*cking dope fiend,’ is ‘evidence of insulting, intimidating or humiliating comments or jokes.’. As of October 19, 2012, the law spoke directly and clearly to the issues raised with respect to Officer Hawkins’s search. Therefore, we conclude that the law was sufficiently clear to inform Officer Hawkins her search of Robinson was unlawful both in scope and manner. The district court did not err in denying Officer Hawkins qualified immunity on Robinson’s unreasonable search claim.”)

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1138-41 (8th Cir. 2019) (Smith, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I concur in Part II.A of the panel opinion, and in Part II.B.2, which affirms the district court’s denial of qualified immunity as to Robinson’s unreasonable search claim. I write separately to express why I would also affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity on Robinson’s excessive force claim based on Robinson’s allegation that Officer Hawkins twice slammed her against the trailer while performing the strip search. . . . The majority holds that ‘it is not clearly established that the amount of force [Officer] Hawkins used against Robinson is excessive.’ I dissent from that portion of the panel opinion. Existing precedent put Officer Hawkins on notice that her use of force in the context of a strip search was unlawful. . . . Though a suspect’s degree of injury may be relevant to assessing the degree of force used, the force itself, and the reasonableness of that force in light of the circumstances, is the critical inquiry. . . . It is the degree of force in light of the circumstances, not the degree of injury, that determines lawfulness or unlawfulness of a particular use of force. . . . Significantly, Crumley involved a plaintiff who resisted the arresting officer. . . . Here, by contrast, it is undisputed that Robinson did not resist Officer Hawkins at any point during their encounter and that she was already handcuffed when Officer Hawkins twice shoved her against the trailer. On this record, I also would not characterize Officer Hawkins’s forceful pushing of Robinson against the trailer as a de minimis use of force. . . . Robinson’s allegation that Officer Hawkins used excessive force in slamming her against the trailer to effect a search is distinct from her claim that Officer Hawkins used excessive force in applying her handcuffs or otherwise effecting her seizure. Officer Hawkins’s tightening of Robinson’s handcuffs may be characterized as de minimis. But, her alleged slamming of Robinson against the trailer should not be. Robinson had already submitted when Officer Hawkins allegedly shoved her against the trailer. The shoving did not further Officer Hawkins’s legitimate purpose of arresting Robinson or effecting a lawful search. I would permit the excessive force claim to proceed as well as the unreasonable search claim.”)

Robinson v. Hawkins, 937 F.3d 1128, 1141-44 (8th Cir. 2019) (Colloton, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Officer Hawkins unquestionably had probable cause to search appellee Robinson’s person for contraband at the time of her arrest. Indeed, Robinson admitted before the search that she had concealed drugs inside the front of her waistband before the arrest. Yet without identifying any decision of the Supreme Court or this court holding unreasonable the scope and manner of a search of a suspect’s person for contraband, the court holds that Hawkins violated a clearly established right of Robinson’s under the Fourth Amendment. Proper application of the doctrine of qualified immunity calls for a contrary conclusion, so I would reverse the district court’s order on Robinson’s unreasonable search claim. . . . The first significant problem with the court’s qualified-immunity analysis is that it relies on dicta rather than holdings of the Supreme Court or this court. Clearly established law must be derived from holdings, not from dicta. . . . To support its ruling that Hawkins’s conduct violated a clearly established right, the court relies almost entirely on a decision of this court holding that a search did not violate clearly established rights. See Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1008 (8th Cir. 2007). The court cites dicta from Richmond as the source of ‘clearly established law.’ Yet Richmond could not place the Fourth Amendment issue beyond debate, because the decision did not even hold that the search in that case was unconstitutional. . . . The second major difficulty is that the dicta from Richmond—even assuming that they could clearly establish a constitutional right—do not address the particular circumstances of this case. In considering a defense of qualified immunity, the law must not be examined at a high level of generality. . . . The discussion from Richmond does not address facts comparable to those presented here. The decision could not place the constitutionality of Hawkins’s search ‘beyond debate,’ such that only a ‘plainly incompetent’ officer or a knowing lawbreaker could have conducted the search. . . . The only witness to Hawkins’s search of Robinson was a male police officer. Under Robinson’s version of the facts, he was present at a distance of twenty feet. The relevant precedents gave no fair warning that this court would hold the manner of searching unconstitutional based on the male officer’s observations. . . . Hawkins’s alleged name-calling and use of profanity was not sexually suggestive or particular to the intimate search. Hawkins did not misuse a baton or threaten physical abuse of Robinson’s private areas. Hawkins did not have fair warning that she was forbidden to proceed with a search after allegedly uttering the quoted expletives. While the cited language may offend the sensibilities of a reviewing judge in chambers, the court cites no authority holding that use of foul language during the rough-and-tumble of street interaction between officer and suspect renders a subsequent search unreasonable. . . . Rulings declaring the violation of a ‘clearly established right’ require careful attention, because ‘qualified immunity is important to “society as a whole,” and because as “an immunity from suit,” qualified immunity “is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.”’. . . For the reasons discussed, the district court’s decision denying qualified immunity to Hawkins on Robinson’s unreasonable search claim should be reversed. Any disputed facts are not material to the legal conclusion. I concur in Parts II.A and II.B.1 of the opinion of the court and would reverse the district court’s order on all three points raised.”) Rudley v. Little Rock Police Dep’t, 935 F.3d 651, 653-55 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Turning first to the claims against Bryant, Rudley alleges that Bryant’s repeated tasing violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of unreasonable force. In rejecting Bryant and Oldham’s qualified immunity defense, the district court reasoned that Rudley and M.D.B. were unarmed, made no attempt to flee the scene, and did not appear to pose a ‘real threat’ to the safety of the officers. The court then identified several disputes of material fact, among them whether Rudley assaulted Bryant and whether her actions after the first tasing justified the subsequent tasings. Upon our de novo review, we conclude that neither Rudley nor the district court has identified controlling authority establishing a right to be free from any of the three tasings applied against Rudley. . . . Rudley relies almost exclusively on Shekleton v. Eichenberger, 677 F.3d 361, 366 (8th Cir. 2012), in which the plaintiff complied with the arresting officer’s orders and did not behave aggressively or direct obscenities at the officer. The plaintiff in that case told the officer that he was physically unable to comply with the order to place his arms behind his back and, although the two men fell to the ground while the officer attempted to effectuate the arrest, at no time did the plaintiff resist arrest or attempt to flee. Our en banc court recently distinguished Shekleton in Kelsay v. Ernst, No. 17-2181, slip op. at *3 (8th Cir. Aug. 13, 2019) (en banc). . . . The situation here, involving aggressive behavior and a ‘chaotic and combative’ scene, . . . is unlike Shekleton and more akin to the situation in Kelsay. Prior to their altercation, Bryant believed Rudley to have thrown a book at the principal, just as Ernst had been told that Kelsay had interfered with an arrest before his arrival. Rudley then physically inserted herself between M.D.B. and Bryant, directed an expletive at Bryant, and stepped toward him, ignoring his command to stop. Following the first tasing and continuing through the second, Rudley further contravened Bryant’s prior command by walking toward M.D.B. and Moore. Like Kelsay, Rudley may have seemingly posed little physical danger to the officers, shod as she was in high-heeled shoes. Based on Rudley's behavior and the information known to Bryant at the time, however, 'a reasonable officer in [Bryant]'s position could have believed that it was important to control the situation and to prevent a confrontation ... that could escalate.' . Rudley's was not the case of an individual 'who did not resist arrest, did not threaten the officer, did not attempt to run from him, and did not behave aggressively towards him.' . Nor was Rudley like the seat-belt-restrained passenger cowering in her automobile, as was the case in Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 499 (8th Cir. 2009). Rather, as in Kelsay, the scene was a tumultuous one involving seemingly aggressive and noncompliant behavior, circumstances which we have previously held rendered officers' uses of tasers reasonable. . . 'In light of these authorities, we cannot conclude that [Rudley] has identified "a robust consensus of cases" that placed the excessive force question "beyond debate" at the time of [the] alleged violation.' . Finally, we conclude that Officer Oldham did not violate a clearly established right by handcuffing M.D.B.'s wrists behind his back. Although the precise timing of the handcuffing is not established by the video, Oldham arrived in the midst of a highly combative situation. While Bryant was engaged with Rudley, M.D.B. can be seen on the video physically wrestling with Moore. Oldham could have reasonably believed that M.D.B. presented a threat to him and his fellow officers, and he applied only a minimal degree of force. Rudley and M.D.B. cite no case holding that the use of a similar degree of force was unreasonable in circumstances similar to those here. The district court's order is reversed, and the case is remanded for the entry of summary judgment in favor of the officers.")

Murphy v. Engelhart, 933 F.3d 1027, 1029-30 (8th Cir. 2019) ("In these circumstances, accepting the facts of the takedown as Murphy describes them, we cannot conclude that Engelhart violated a 'clearly established' constitutional right when he threw or shoved Murphy to the ground. At the time of Murphy's injury, it was clearly established that an officer could not 'throw to the ground a nonviolent, suspected misdemeanor who was not threatening anyone, was not actively resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee.' . . But in Carpenter v. Gage, we held that it was reasonable for a law enforcement officer to tase an uncooperative suspect who 'refused to offer his hands when ordered to do so' and physically resisted arrest. . . In Blazek v. City of Iowa City, when a belligerent occupant refused to 'stay seated as directed' while officers completed a search, the officers grabbed his arm, twisted it upward behind his back, threw him to the ground, jumped on his back, and handcuffed him. . . Though we held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity for a subsequent injury, we also held: 'It is clear ... that if the officers had lifted the belligerent Blazek off his feet, thrown him to the ground, and jumped on his back to handcuff him, without causing the alleged [subsequent] injury ... then the officers would have acted reasonably or at least be entitled to qualified immunity.' . . In Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, which involved an incident before Murphy's injury, we held it was constitutional for a police officer to use a 'spin takedown' on a man who ignored twice-repeated instructions 'to put his hands behind his back.' . . This year, the Supreme Court vacated denial of qualified immunity to an officer who executed a takedown of a man who disobeyed the officer's command not to close an apartment door and then tried to 'brush past' the officer. City of Escondido v. Emmons, — U.S. —, 139 S. Ct. 500, 502-04, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019). In light of these authorities, we cannot conclude that Murphy has identified ‘a robust consensus of cases’ that placed the excessive force question ‘beyond debate’ at the time of Engelhart’s alleged violation. . . Accordingly, Engelhart’s takedown did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.”)

Dollar Loan Ctr. of S. Dakota, LLC v. Afdahl, 933 F.3d 1019, 1024-26 (8th Cir. 2019) (“DLC’s alleged constitutional claim is that Afdahl deprived it of a procedural due process right when Afdahl revoked DLC’s money lending licenses on September 13, 2017, before holding a pre-deprivation hearing. In a qualified immunity analysis, ‘a right is “clearly established” if the “contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.” . . . We disagree with the district court’s conclusion that procedural due process requires more than what the Division did and DLC’s right to a pre-deprivation hearing was clearly established by Freeman. The process and procedure employed by the Division is distinguishable from that utilized by the officials in Freeman such that a reasonable official in Afdahl’s position would not be on notice that he was violating a clearly established right when he issued the combined cease and desist and revocation order in this case. . . While a trial-like hearing was not conducted, due process has been described by the United States Supreme Court as a ‘flexible’ concept. . . In this case, there is no evidence that adverse administrative action against DLC’s property interest was based on an erroneous factual basis. It was Afdahl’s responsibility to make a legal interpretation regarding the lawfulness of DLC’s new loan product. He did so only after an intense investigation allowing DLC’s regional manager and counsel to participate in both onsite examinations and to respond to follow-up questions. Under these circumstances where DLC was on notice that the Division was investigating the lawfulness of its new loan product, DLC was afforded an opportunity to provide additional information addressing the Division’s concerns, and the revocation order had no more of an effect on DLC’s business than the simultaneously issued cease and desist order, we conclude that DLC has not shown a procedural due process violation. More importantly, qualified immunity is intended to give ‘government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments, and [to] protect[] all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . Even if Afdahl should have done something more before taking adverse action against DLC’s money lending licenses, he made a reasonable mistake in the exercise of his official duties. This is the type of mistake that the qualified immunity rule was intended to protect. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the complaint, we find DLC has failed to show a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established. Afdahl is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975, 980-82 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2760 (2020) (“It was not clearly established in May 2014 that a deputy was forbidden to use a takedown maneuver to arrest a suspect who ignored the deputy’s instruction to ‘get back here’ and continued to walk away from the officer. None of the decisions cited by the district court or Kelsay involved a suspect who ignored an officer’s command and walked away, so they could not clearly establish the unreasonableness of using force under the particular circumstances here. . . . Decisions concerning the use of force against suspects who were compliant or engaged in passive resistance are insufficient to constitute clearly established law that governs an officer’s use of force against a suspect who ignores a command and walks away. The Supreme Court recently vacated the denial of qualified immunity for an officer who executed a takedown of a man who posed no apparent danger but disobeyed the officer's command not to close an apartment door and then 'tried to brush past' the officer. City of Escondido v. Emmons, — U.S. —, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04, 202 L.Ed.2d 455 (2019) (per curiam). On remand, the Ninth Circuit concluded that precedent involving force employed in response to passive resistance was not sufficiently on point to constitute clearly established law that governed the takedown at the apartment door. . . This court's precedent likewise did not clearly establish that Ernst was forbidden to perform a takedown when Kelsay walked away. . . . Although the principal dissent suggests that there is a factual dispute about whether Kelsay complied with Ernst's command by momentarily stopping and turning around, the relevant question is not whether Kelsay complied as a factual matter. The issue is whether a reasonable officer could have believed that Kelsay was not compliant. Whether the officer's conclusion was reasonable, or whether he was 'reasonably unreasonable' for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . are questions of law, not fact. They are matters for resolution by the court, not by a jury. And Ernst's conclusion that Kelsay failed to comply was objectively reasonable. A reasonable police officer could expect Kelsay to understand his command to 'get back here' as an order to stop and remain, not as a directive merely to touch base before walking away again. . . . The constitutionality of Ernst's takedown was not beyond debate, and he is thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975, 982, 985-87 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Smith, C.J., with whom Kelly, Erickson, and Grasz, JJ., join, dissenting), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2760 (2020) ("Our case law was sufficiently clear at the time Deputy Ernst forcefully arrested Kelsay to have put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of force against a non-threatening misdemeanor who was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands violates that individual's right to be free from excessive force. . . . Brown, Shannon, Montoya, and Shekleton comprise our 'body of relevant case law,' . . . that made it sufficiently clear at the time of the incident to warn a reasonable officer that the use of force against a non-threatening misdemeanor who was not fleeing, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands violates that individual's right to be free from excessive force. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Kelsay—which we are required to do at this stage of the litigation—she satisfies all of these criteria. . . . In summary, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Kelsay, a reasonable officer would have known based on our body of precedent that a full-body takedown of a small, nonviolent misdemeanor who was not attempting to flee, resisting arrest, or ignoring other commands was excessive under the circumstances.")

N.S. v. Kansas City Bd. of Police Commissioners, 933 F.3d 967, 970 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 2422 (2023) ("Here, the district court fell short in its threshold duty to make 'a thorough determination of [Thompson's] claim of qualified immunity.' . . In its summary-judgment order, the court did little more than summarize the parties' allegations and decide that the combination of a 'general ... right to be free from excessive force' and the presence of 'genuine issues of material fact[]' precluded summary judgment. . . Yet the Supreme Court has warned courts not to 'define clearly established law at [such] a high level of generality.' . . Although there need not be

‘a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,’ or else ‘officers are entitled to qualified immunity.’ . . . ‘[O]utside [of] an obvious case,’ the Court has explained, it is not enough ‘to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness.’ . . . The district court did no more than that here, so the case needs to go back for a second look. . . . On remand, the court should begin by specifically identifying the plaintiff-friendly version of the disputed facts, rather than, as it did before, simply reciting the parties’ general allegations. . . . It must then evaluate whether Thompson, in light of all of the information available to him at the moment, violated clearly established law when he shot Stokes.”)

Mogard v. City of Milbank, 932 F.3d 1184, 1189-90 (8th Cir. 2019) (“[W]hen Mogard complained to the chief and assistant chief about the features of his patrol car, he was acting ‘pursuant to’ his job duties, regardless of whether his job required him to report on the condition of the patrol cars. . . . Even if Mogard may have transformed unprotected speech pursuant to job duties into protected speech by speaking to community leaders, defendants could reasonably conclude that Mogard was speaking solely as an aggrieved police officer. . . . Van Vooren and Kettwig are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that Mogard’s speech was constitutionally protected.”)

Sandknop v. Missouri Dep’t of Correction, 932 F.3d 739, 742 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Sandknop has not directed us to any case holding that an official violates a defendant’s constitutional rights by making an erroneous statement of law to a state court. . . . If the state court erred in its legal determinations because it improvidently relied on a misreading of the law, the defendant’s recourse was to appeal or seek a writ of mandamus. Sandknop’s complaint does not contain sufficient allegations to overcome qualified immunity with regard to any statement the probation officer made to the state court before the court issued the order requiring Sandknop to be detained further. Nor does it provide any other reason that either the warden or the probation officer violated a clearly established constitutional right.”)

K.W.P. v. Kansas City Public Schools, 931 F.3d 813, 822, 826-29 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Our sister circuits are divided on whether to apply T.L.O.’s reasonableness standard or the objective reasonableness standard set forth in Graham v. Connor, . . . to law enforcement seizures of students. [citing cases] Some courts have opted to apply both the Graham and T.L.O. standards in analyzing a claim of unreasonable seizure and excessive force. . . . In the present case, K.W.P. [a seven-year-old elementary school student] avers that we need not resolve whether the Graham or T.L.O. standard applies because ‘the result in this case would be the same under either standard.’ . . . We agree but reach a different conclusion as to the result. We hold that, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard, and construing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.’s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force. First, as to the initial handcuffing, unlike the calm, compliant children in Gray, E.W., and C.B. who did not engage in further disruptive behavior and posed no risks to anyone's safety, K.W.P.'s own admissions indicate that he attempted to flee from Officer Craddock upon his removal from the classroom and that his escape efforts posed a safety risk to himself. K.W.P. does not challenge as unlawful Officer Craddock's initial removal of him from the classroom for being disruptive. Once removed from the classroom, K.W.P. resisted Officer Craddock's directive for K.W.P. to accompany Officer Craddock to the office. . . . In applying the objective reasonableness standard to the undisputed facts, a reasonable officer could have concluded that K.W.P.'s admitted conduct constituted 'an act of violent resistance.' . . . Second, K.W.P. challenges as unlawful the 15 minutes that he was seated in the front office and handcuffed. Once again, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard, neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.'s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force in the extended handcuffing. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., K.W.P. had stopped resisting by the time that he reached the front office, sat in a chair pursuant to Officer Craddock's commands, and did not attempt to leave. Nevertheless, the case remains distinguishable from other cases in which courts have found extended handcuffing violative of the Fourth Amendment. Here, K.W.P. remained handcuffed in the front office for only 15 minutes; by comparison, the student in C.B. remained handcuffed for 25 to 30 minutes, . . . and the student in Hoskins remained handcuffed for 45 minutes[.] . . . Our conclusion that no constitutional violation occurred also rests on K.W.P.'s behavior justifying the initial handcuffing. Unlike the students in Gray, E.W., and C.B. who were compliant with the school resource officer from the outset of their encounter, K.W.P. had actively resisted Officer Craddock just prior to arriving to the front office. A reasonable officer could conclude that, based on K.W.P.'s recent resistance, keeping him in handcuffs for 15 minutes until a parent arrived was a reasonable course of action and was necessary to prevent K.W.P. from trying to leave and posing harm to himself. . . . Accordingly, we hold that, applying either the Graham or T.L.O. standard and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to K.W.P., neither Officer Craddock nor Principal Wallace violated K.W.P.'s right to be free from unreasonable seizure and excessive force and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . Alternatively, ' "even if the reasonableness of [Officer Craddock's and Principal Wallace's] actions was questionable," [K.W.P.] cannot "show that a reasonable [official] would have been on notice that [their] conduct violated a clearly established right." ' . . . 'Our circuit subscribes to a broad view of what constitutes clearly established law; in the absence of binding precedent, a court should look to all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits and district courts.' . . . Here, K.W.P. relies on C.B. and Gray to show that it was clearly established in April 2014 'that a police officer's conduct in handcuffing a child constituted an obvious violation of the child's constitutional rights.' . . . We reject the notion that these cases gave notice to Officer Craddock and Principal Wallace that their conduct violated K.W.P.'s constitutional rights. First, while the Eleventh Circuit decided Gray in 2006, the Ninth Circuit decided C.B. in October 2014—after the incident here occurred in April 2014. Therefore, C.B. could not have given Officer Craddock or Principal Wallace notice of their alleged unconstitutional conduct. . . . Second, C.B. and Gray are distinguishable from the present case. In Gray, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that '[e]very reasonable officer would have known that handcuffing a compliant nine-year-old child for purely punitive purposes is unreasonable.' . . . In C.B., the Ninth Circuit similarly concluded that '[i]t is beyond dispute that handcuffing a small, calm child who is surrounded by numerous adults, who complies with all of the officers' instructions, and who is, by an officer's own account, unlikely to flee, was completely unnecessary and excessively intrusive.' . . As explained supra, by K.W.P.'s own admission, he was not compliant; instead, he actively resisted Officer Craddock and attempted to get away from his grasp. This active resistance precipitated the handcuffing of K.W.P. and it was not for purely punitive reasons.")

Lewis v. City of St. Louis, 932 F.3d 646, 649 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The district court and Lewis characterize the clearly established right at issue as the right of a person not to be detained after charges against him have been dismissed. As a matter of abstract legal principle, this statement is unexceptionable. But as the Supreme Court and our court have cautioned on several occasions, 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality but must instead 'be particularized to the facts of the case.' . . So the relevant question is whether the law clearly establishes that Gardner, or someone in her office, must go beyond the filing of a nolle prosequi to ensure the release of those against whom no charges are pending. Lewis bears the burden of showing that the law is clearly established. . . . Lewis alleges in his complaint that Gardner has 'a responsibility to communicate the dismissal of criminal charges to' the state court, the city's sheriff's office, and 'to those with direct custody over people incarcerated by the City of St. Louis.' But, of course, we need not accept legal conclusions couched as factual allegations as true. . . . Instead, Lewis must show that clearly established law imposed this duty on Gardner. He hasn't. Lewis has not offered a single authority purporting to place this responsibility with Gardner or her subordinates, as opposed to, say, the state court itself; it could just as well be that the state court clerk is responsible for giving notice of the dismissal to those who have custody of Lewis. We can hardly conclude, therefore, that Gardner violated Lewis's constitutional rights.")

Dillard v. City of Springdale, 930 F.3d 935, 942-45 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The appellees allege City and County law enforcement obtained information about Josh's abuse from the appellees and their family, promising them confidentiality. They allege the officials then released those law enforcement reports to the public. They allege they were minors at the time of the molestation and at the time the reports were created. They allege the reports contained graphic details of their incestuous sexual abuse. And, they allege the reports were insufficiently redacted, de facto revealing their names to the public. Finally, they allege the officials released the reports in an effort to promote the appearance of transparency. Therefore, the appellees have pleaded sufficient facts to meet Peffer's 'exacting standard.' . . The information released by the officials involved 'highly personal matters representing the most intimate aspect of human affair,' . . and the appellees had a legitimate expectation of privacy in that information. Not only did police promise the appellees that the information would remain private, but Arkansas law also supported this expectation of privacy. . . In sum, the information was inherently private and is therefore entitled to constitutional protection. The appellees have stated a plausible claim for the violation of their constitutional right to confidentiality. . . . The question now before us, then, is whether our law was 'clearly established in a particularized sense,' that the officials' alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Namely, we must decide whether the law provided fair notice to the appellants that releasing details of minors' sexual abuse to a tabloid in a format predictably enabling the victims' identification was not only unadvisable, but also unlawful. We conclude that it did. Inexact boundaries are boundaries nonetheless. The particular facts alleged here are not near the periphery of the right to privacy but at its center. Certainly, allegations of incestuous sexual abuse implicate 'the most intimate aspects of human affairs' and are 'inherently private.' . . The content and circumstances of these disclosures do not just meet the standard of 'shockingly degrading or egregiously humiliating,' they illustrate them. . . And releasing insufficiently redacted reports detailing minors' sexual abuse to a tabloid, notwithstanding promises that these reports would remain private, is 'a flagrant breach of a pledge of confidentiality.' . . Despite not having had an informational privacy case with these same facts, our case law 'appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question,' . . and the appellants' arguments to the contrary are unavailing. This is a case in which '[general] standards ... clearly establish[ed] the answer.' . . Where, as here, we are not reviewing split-second, life-or-death decisions characteristic of excessive force cases, the range of reasonable judgments naturally narrows by virtue of the officials' increased opportunity for reasoned reflection. . . . We hold that the right of minor victims of sexual abuse not to have their identities and the details of their abuse revealed to the public was clearly established.")

Partridge v. City of Benton, Arkansas, 929 F.3d 562, 565-67 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Keagan was not suspected of a crime. He was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee. He was, however, armed, suicidal, and under the influence of cough syrup and possibly marijuana. Whether a reasonable officer could conclude he posed an immediate threat depends on the circumstances at the time of the shooting. Taking the facts in the complaint as true, 'Keagan simply began to move the gun away from his head,' 'was shot as he began to move the gun away from his head, per Ellison's orders to "drop the gun,'" and 'never pointed the gun at the officers.' On these facts, no reasonable officer could conclude that a compliant individual posed an immediate threat. . . . Keagan's right to be free from excessive force under these circumstances was clearly established in October 2016. Taking the facts in the complaint as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Keagan's favor, Ellison shot a non-resisting, non-fleeing minor as he moved his gun in compliance with commands to drop his gun. Under these circumstances, no reasonable officer could conclude Keagan posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm. The law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that' shooting an individual in these circumstances is unlawful.") Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith, Arkansas, 925 F.3d 979, 983-85 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The disorderly conduct statute reads: 'A person commits the offense of disorderly conduct if, with the purpose to cause public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm or recklessly creating a risk of public inconvenience, annoyance, or alarm, he or she makes unreasonable or excessive noise.' Ark. Code Ann. § 5-71-207(a)(2). Under the statute, the verbal content of Thurairajah's yell is irrelevant. . . The statute does not penalize offensive speech, only unreasonable or excessive noise. . . Arkansas courts have not previously concluded that a two-word yell could violate the disorderly conduct statute's unreasonable or excessive noise provision. To be sure, shouting can form the basis of disorderly conduct. Those cases where shouting was part of a scenario that resulted in a finding of disorderly conduct, however, involved extended loud shouting and disruptive behavior or amplified sound. As the district court noted, context matters in analyzing the facts. In no case, has a two-word unamplified outburst constituted disorderly conduct. . . . Thurairajah's conduct may have been offensive, but it was not an unreasonable or excessive noise. Trooper Cross lacked even arguable probable cause for an arrest and thus violated Thurairajah's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. . . . Thurairajah's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation was clearly established at the time of his arrest. '[T]he law is settled that as a general matter the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... for speaking out.' . . . With limited exceptions not relevant here, even profanity is protected speech. . . . Criticism of law enforcement officers, even with profanity, is protected speech. . . . Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err by denying qualified immunity to Trooper Cross for the First Amendment claim.")

Rochell v. City of Springfield Police Dept., 768 F. App'x 588, ____ (8th Cir. 2019) ("We conclude that the facts the district court found sufficiently supported at summary judgment gave rise to a Fourth Amendment violation because a police officer uses excessive force by pointing his service weapon at the head of a suspect who has dropped his weapon, has submitted to arrest, and no longer poses an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others. . . . We further conclude that this right was clearly established in February 2016, when the incident underlying Rochell's claims occurred.")

Rochell v. City of Springfield Police Dept., 768 F. App'x 588, ____ (8th Cir. 2019) (Colloton, J., concurring) (not reported) ("In qualified immunity cases like this one, the plaintiff must establish that defendant's alleged conduct violated a clearly established right, and 'the clearly established right must be defined with specificity.' City of Escondido v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503 (2019). 'Use of excessive force is an area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case, and thus police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.' . . . On plaintiff Rochell's excessive force claim against defendant Ross, the district court acknowledged that there was no case in this circuit with the fact pattern alleged here, but nonetheless denied qualified immunity. Ross understandably objects on appeal that the district court failed to conduct its analysis at the proper level of specificity. After the briefs were filed in this case, however, a panel of this court decided Wilson v. Lamp, 901 F.3d 981 (8th Cir. 2018). Wilson held not only that pointing a firearm at a compliant suspect was unreasonable, but that the unreasonableness of that conduct was clearly established as of September 2014—more than a year before the incident in this case. The Wilson decision is debatable. Despite the Supreme Court's admonition to ask whether 'existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue,' Wilson relied on cases involving the use of physical force or violence against compliant subjects to conclude that the unreasonableness of pointing a gun was clearly established. . . . But given Wilson's definition of what was clearly established law in 2014, I agree that the district court's order denying qualified immunity on the excessive force claim must be affirmed. Under the alleged facts, after all, Ross did not merely point a gun at a compliant Rochell; the claim is that he pressed his firearm behind Rochell's ear and said, 'I'll blow your

fg brains out if you ever approach me like that again.’ If it violated clearly established law for a defendant in Wilson simply to keep his gun pointed at a compliant subject, then it follows a fortiori that Ross’s alleged action did too.”)

Morgan v. Robinson, 920 F.3d 521, 523-27 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (“A panel of this court found that Morgan’s termination ‘violated a right secured by the First Amendment.’ . . . This court need not decide the issue because Robinson did not violate a ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional right[] of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Nord was decided in June 2014. Robinson fired Morgan one month earlier. Thus, he did not have the benefit of the Nord decision to support his belief that he was not violating a clearly established right. Still, Nord supports Robinson. A clearly established right must be one that is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . The facts here are similar to Nord. That decision held the law not clearly established in November 2010. Neither Morgan nor this court finds any intervening law that clearly established the law before his termination. . . . Thus, Nord shows the constitutional question was not ‘beyond debate’ in May 2014. . . . At the time of Morgan’s termination, the law was not ‘sufficiently clear’ so that Robinson would have known that terminating him violated his First Amendment rights. . . . Robinson is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Morgan v. Robinson, 920 F.3d 521, 527-29, 533-355 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Shepherd, J., with whom Kelly, J. and Erickson, J., join, dissenting) (“The majority’s holding that Sheriff Robinson is entitled to qualified immunity rests on the impermissible factual finding that Robinson terminated Deputy Morgan because of the potentially damaging and disruptive consequences of Morgan’s campaign speech. When viewed through the proper lens of a summary judgment appeal, the record does not support the majority’s holding. Rather, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Deputy Morgan, as we must, Sheriff Robinson terminated Morgan’s employment solely because of his personal objections to the content of Morgan’s campaign speech without the reasonable belief that the statements would have a disruptive effect on the operation of the Sheriff’s Department. I would therefore affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to Robinson and I respectfully dissent. . . . Failing to remain faithful to these limits on our review of the facts and instead summarily and improperly weighing the evidence and finding critical facts in the light most favorable to Sheriff Robinson, the majority concludes that Sheriff Robinson terminated Morgan because he could have reasonably believed that Morgan’s statements during the 2014 campaign for Sheriff of Washington County would be potentially damaging to and disruptive of the discipline and harmony of the Sheriff’s Department. Such a conclusion can only be reached by accepting the Sheriff’s post-hoc litigation position and improperly viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Sheriff. . . . [B]ecause a rational jury could find that Morgan was terminated solely because Robinson was personally offended by Morgan’s campaign speech, the Pickering balance falls sharply and overwhelmingly in favor of Morgan’s right to comment on matters of public concern. Thus the statements are afforded First Amendment protection and I believe Morgan has sufficiently shown a violation of a protected constitutional right in the form of his termination for engaging in campaign speech. Thus, I easily conclude that Deputy Morgan satisfies the first part of the qualified immunity analysis. I also disagree with the majority's analysis and would conclude that it is clearly established that Sheriff Robinson could not terminate Deputy Morgan for exercising his First Amendment rights during the campaign. The majority, despite our directive to view the evidence in the light most favorable to Morgan, frames this inquiry as asking whether Sheriff Robinson could terminate Deputy Morgan for Morgan's campaign statements when Robinson believed the statements were potentially damaging and disruptive. The evidence, particularly when viewed with the applicable summary judgment standard, does not support the majority's formulation of the question as including Sheriff Robinson's belief that Morgan's statements would cause potential disruption. I believe this incorrect framing of the question leads to the majority's erroneous conclusion that the right was not clearly established; I address what I believe the proper inquiry to be: 'Could [Robinson] reasonably have believed, at the time he fired [Morgan], that a government employer could fire an employee on account of' the employee exercising his First Amendment right to free speech during a run for political office where that speech had no disruptive impact on office functioning? . . . In my view, the answer to this question is an unequivocal 'no.' . . . In my view, it is clearly established that a public employee cannot be terminated for making protected statements during a campaign for public office where that speech has no demonstrated impact on the efficiency of office operations. . . . The Supreme Court has repeatedly expressed the importance of protecting First Amendment activity, especially in the context of elections. The majority's conclusion, which relies on a factually distinguishable case, sidesteps this precedent. I would conclude that it is clearly established that Sheriff Robinson could not terminate Deputy Morgan for speech made during a political campaign that related to the department operations and caused no disruption or other negative impact on the department.'")

Calgaro v. St. Louis County, 919 F.3d 1054, 1059 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Calgaro . . . sued Johnson individually for damages on the ground that he violated her constitutional rights by denying access to educational records and excluding her from educational decisions. But it remains 'open to question whether and to what extent the fundamental liberty interest in the custody, care, and management of one's children mandates parental access to school records.' . . . Nor is it clearly established that parents have a constitutional right to manage all details of their children's education or to obtain consultation with school officials on everyday matters. . . . Because existing precedent does not clearly establish the rights that Calgaro asserts, Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity.'")

Hanson as Trustee for Layton v. Best, 915 F.3d 543, 548 (8th Cir. 2019) ("With respect to her excessive force claim, Hanson alleges the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by keeping Layton restrained in a prone position for an excessive length of time, causing his death. We first examine the clearly-established prong because it is dispositive. . . . Because the plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating that the law confirming her constitutional right was clearly established, . . . Hanson must identify 'controlling authority' from the Supreme Court or our prior case law or 'a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' that places the constitutional question 'beyond debate.' . . . In this case, she can do neither. This court has not deemed prone restraint unconstitutional in and of itself the few times we have addressed the issue. . . . In Henderson v.

Munn, we denied qualified immunity when, in addition to using prone restraint, a police officer pepper-sprayed an injured suspect. . . Under these cases, there is no clearly established right against the use of prone restraints for a suspect that has been resisting. The decisions of our sister circuits are similarly factually distinct. Mindful of the Supreme Court’s repeated admonition against defining clearly established law ‘at a high level of generality,’ . . . we find that the fact-intensive qualified immunity analyses in comparable appellate cases have yet to produce a sufficiently particularized ‘robust consensus,’ . . . about prolonged prone restraint. . . Therefore, the right at issue is not clearly established, and the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hanson’s excessive force claim.”)

Karels v. Storz, 906 F.3d 740, 746-47 (8th Cir. 2018) (“Blazek and Wertish do not establish that the slightest resistance justifies any subsequent use of force by an officer, as Storz seems to argue. They instead establish that an officer may use ‘somewhat more force’ on a ‘passively resistant’ suspect. The evidence here would support a finding that Karels was not ‘passively resistant.’ A jury could find that she did not have time to comply with Storz’s command to put her hands behind her back before he used significant force against her. A jury could also consider Norlin’s use-of-force review form, on which he did not check the box marked ‘passive resistance’ in describing Karels’s actions. Whether a reasonable officer would have interpreted Karels as being resistant—either passively or actively—is a disputed question of fact that a jury must decide. As set forth above, a jury could find that Karels did not resist at all and that a reasonable officer would have known that she was not resisting. . . Viewing the facts in the appropriate light, several cases establish that every reasonable officer would have understood that he could not forcefully take down Karels—a nonviolent, nonthreatening misdemeanor who was not actively resisting arrest or attempting to flee—in the allegedly violent and uncontrolled manner that Storz did . . . To the extent Storz argues that these cases present different facts and circumstances, ‘there is no requirement that [the plaintiff] must find a case where “the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,” . . . so long as “existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]”’”)

Wilson v. Lamp, 901 F.3d 981, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2018) (“The officers’ drawing and pointing of weapons as they approached the truck, which they reasonably believed was being driven by David, was not excessive. But Levi and M.W. say that the officers kept their weapons drawn and pointed at them throughout the incident even after they realized the driver was Levi, not David, the passenger was M.W., a child, and the officers had patted Levi down. . . On the facts here, the continuous drawing and pointing of weapons constitutes excessive-force. . . Finally, the officers argue that the law is not clearly established, claiming that this court has not recognized excessive force under similar facts. To the contrary, an officer’s ‘use of force against a suspect who was not threatening and not resisting’ is unreasonable. [collecting cases] The district court correctly concluded that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.”)

Ross v. City of Jackson, Missouri, 897 F.3d 916, 922-23 (8th Cir. 2018) (“Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Ross, the officers saw the comment, discovered where Ross worked, and then went to his job site with the sole intent of placing him under arrest. Ross tried to explain what was meant by his comment and provide the officers with more context about the post, but the officers did not give him that opportunity until after he was booked at the police station. . . And, after interviewing Ross, officers indicated that they did not think the charges would stick, i.e., they did not believe he had truly made a ‘terrorist threat.’ Ross was nonetheless charged and held in custody for several days until he was able to post bail. In sum, it is beyond debate that—had the officers engaged in minimal further investigation—the only reasonable conclusion was that Ross had not violated § 574.115.1(3). . . We reverse the district court’s grant of summary judgment to the officers based on qualified immunity and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Neal v. Ficcadenti, 895 F.3d 576, 582 (8th Cir. 2018) (“Neal has provided adequate evidence that he neither posed a threat to anyone’s safety nor resisted arrest at the time that Officer Ficcadenti executed the arm-bar takedown. We are satisfied that these facts, construed in a light most favorable to Neal, establish a violation of a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable and excessive force. . . We turn now to the question of whether or not the constitutional right that Officer Ficcadenti allegedly violated was clearly established as of June 6, 2012. We have said many times that ‘[t]he right to be free from excessive force in the context of an arrest is clearly established under the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.’ . . The ‘salient question’ is whether the state of the law at the time the force was exerted gave Officer Ficcadenti ‘fair warning’ that his alleged treatment of Neal was unconstitutional. . . In June 2012, the state of the law would have given a reasonable officer fair warning that using physical force against a suspect who was not resisting or threatening anyone was unlawful. . . After construing the facts in a light most favorable to Neal, i.e. that he was fully compliant at the time that Officer Ficcadenti applied the arm-bar takedown maneuver on him, that conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right on June 6, 2012. The district court correctly concluded that this is one of those relatively rare cases in which a question of fact is presented for the ultimate finder of fact and qualified immunity does not apply.”)

Dean v. Searcey, 893 F.3d 504, 518-19 (8th Cir. 2018) (“In both White and Winslow, we examined the deputies’ actions and found that a jury could believe that they ‘conducted a conscience-shocking reckless investigation ... that was used to box’ Appellees in. . . And we held—relying on Supreme Court precedent and this Court’s holding in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir. 2001)—that the prohibitions against their actions were clearly established in 1989. The deputies argue that it was improper to rely on ‘general statements of the law’ in reaching the latter conclusion. But, Pauly explicitly reaffirmed that ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning’ so long as ‘the unlawfulness ... [is] apparent.’ . . There is no doubt that the conduct we described above and in prior opinions is (and was) unlawful. . . Indeed, ‘if any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from ... framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.’ . The jury was warranted in concluding that this is exactly what happened through the reckless investigation here. The prohibition on using official power to frame individuals is deeply embedded in the historical roots of due process. . . . The Supreme Court—long before 1989—recognized this as well. . . .To put it simply, this is not a case like many Fourth Amendment cases, where the ‘specificity of the rule is especially important’ because ‘officers will often find it difficult to know how’ the Constitution applies in ‘the precise situation encountered.’ . . . Instead, this is an ‘“obvious case,”’ where the ‘unlawfulness of the [deputies]’ conduct is sufficiently clear.’ . . . The evidence supports the conclusion that the deputies ‘knowingly violate[d],’ . . . the due process rights of the Appellees by applying ‘systematic pressure’ to implicate the Appellees and by ‘purposefully ignor[ing]’ exonerating evidence. . . . The illegality of this was well-established long before 1989. Thus, our prior determination holds: qualified immunity does not shield the deputies.”)

Cravener v. Shuster, 885 F.3d 1135, 1140-41 (8th Cir. 2018) (“Cravener argues his case is unique because he was not engaged in criminal activity, and thus the force greatly exceeded the need. True, Cravener’s lack of criminal activity is an important consideration in the qualified immunity analysis. However, officers may seize a person ‘in order to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.’ . . . Here, the deputies were called to the house to ensure Cravener’s safety. This court has found no excessive force where the subject was not currently engaged in criminal activity or resisting arrest. . . .Cravener also argues the deputies faced no imminent harm because Cravener was unarmed and was passively, not actively, resisting. Even if Cravener were passively resisting, this argument fails. Unarmed, passively resisting subjects can pose a threat necessitating the use of taser force. . . .Deputy Calvin also is entitled to qualified immunity based on the second inquiry because ‘even if the reasonableness of [his] actions was questionable,’ Cravener cannot ‘show that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the officers’ conduct violated a clearly established right.’ . . . Because of the significant similarities between this case and De Boise—with no intervening Eighth Circuit case between 2008 and 2013—De Boise controls here. ‘[N]o reasonable officer, observing [Cravener’s] behavior, would have understood the actions taken to be so disproportionate and unnecessary as to amount to a violation of [Cravener’s] rights.’ . . .The district court erred in denying qualified immunity.”)

Estate of Walker v. Wallace, 881 F.3d 1056, 1060-62 (8th Cir. 2018) (“The district court denied Wallace qualified immunity because, if the jury believed the plaintiffs’ version of the facts, then the evidence ‘could show that the consent was not voluntary.’ True, but that is not the correct inquiry. The correct inquiry is whether, even if we construe the facts in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, a reasonable official in Wallace’s position would have known that he was violating the constitution when he searched the plaintiffs’ house after receiving signed consent to do so in the particular circumstances. We believe that Wallace, at worst, made a bad guess in a gray area of the law—but the law gave him the breathing room to make such a guess. First, determining whether consent is voluntary requires a highly particular look at all the relevant circumstances. . . .Since questions of consent necessarily turn on the particular facts of a case, it may be hard to show that prior decisions should have put Wallace on notice that his search under the circumstances was unconstitutional or that every reasonable official in his position would have understood that he was violating a constitutional right. . . We do not mean that officials are always entitled to qualified immunity when dealing with questions of consent; it is easy to imagine facts that would alert a reasonable person that consent was not voluntarily given. We mean only to emphasize that officials should be given some leeway when acting in legally murky environments. We believe that both the plaintiffs and the district court defined the right in question here too generally. The plaintiffs focus on the presumptive unreasonableness of searching a house (whether for evidence of a crime or for building code violations) without a warrant. The district court began its analysis with the observation that a government official's warrantless entry into a house does not violate the Fourth Amendment when one voluntarily consents to the entry, only to note then that consent may not have been voluntarily given here. But 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality' and must be particularized to the facts of the case so that the unlawfulness of an official's actions are apparent. . . Context is critical in determining qualified immunity in Fourth Amendment cases. . . The first principles that the district court and the plaintiffs emphasized can only go so far. Nowhere do they identify any case applying these first principles in a context sufficiently similar to the situation in which Wallace found himself when he searched the plaintiffs' house. Though the plaintiffs need not provide a case directly on point, some existing precedent must place the question beyond debate, or the conduct must be so obviously unconstitutional that no precedent is needed. . . The plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden on this point. . . . A single case, which is not even a binding precedent in the district in which it was decided, seems hardly enough to count as one that establishes a clear legal principle. One swallow does not a summer make. For these reasons, the plaintiffs have not carried their burden to show that the unconstitutional nature of Wallace's conduct was clearly established. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings.")

Lyons v. Vaught, 875 F.3d 1168, 1173-76 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Throughout this litigation, Lyons has conceded and the district court has acknowledged, correctly in our view, that his speech during the student appeal process was unprotected employee grievance. . . However, in denying defendants qualified immunity, the district court concluded that the meeting with Chancellor Morton was not 'part of [Lyons's] job duties,' that 'academic improprieties involving interscholastic athletes is an issue of public concern,' that Eighth Circuit cases prior to Garcetti 'clearly established that a public employee had a First Amendment right to speak on matters of a public concern so long as that speech was not part of the employee's job duties,' and that Garcetti did not change that law. We disagree. . . .Determining whether an employee's speech was pursuant to his official duties is a practical inquiry. . . . Here the central focus is whether it was clearly established that Lyons's speech at the meeting with Chancellor Morton was as a citizen, not a part-time lecturer. . . .Under Garcetti, 'a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.' . . Did Lyons transform what began as unprotected speech pursuant to his duties as a lecturer into protected speech by virtue of speaking more broadly about the issue to both the UMKC Chancellor and 'community leaders'? Perhaps. But Vaught and Bassa could reasonably conclude that Lyons spoke solely as an aggrieved lecturer in asking Chancellor Morton to investigate grading policies for student athletes. In these circumstances, Lyons has failed to show, using the particularized inquiry required, that his right to make this speech in these circumstances was clearly established. . . . Garcetti left open the question whether its holding would apply to ‘speech related to scholarship or teaching.’ . . . In our view, this case does not involve speech related to scholarship or teaching. . . . But in any event, the law is no more clearly established even if Garcetti is persuasive but not controlling precedent.”)

Hansen v. Black, 872 F.3d 554, 559-60 (8th Cir. 2017) (“Even assuming a constitutional violation, Trooper Black is entitled to qualified immunity because his conduct did not violate a clearly established Fourth Amendment right. To avoid qualified immunity, Hansen must show that existing precedent placed Trooper Black’s conduct ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Hansen has not cited, and we have not found, any case concluding that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment when he shot and killed an unrestrained, unsupervised dog creating a serious risk to public safety and avoiding numerous attempts to control him without force.”)

Hoyland v. McMenemy, 869 F.3d 644, 653-55 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2017) (“We hold that, under Minnesota law, it was not objectively reasonable for these officers to believe they had probable cause to arrest Hoyland for obstruction. This case is far removed from the examples of ‘obstruction’ described above. Here, Hoyland stood in his own lighted doorway, on his own property, some 30-40 feet from the officers and his wife. The officers almost immediately saw that he held a camera and not any kind of weapon in his hands. No more than twenty seconds elapsed from Hoyland’s first words spoken from his doorway to McMenemy’s shout of ‘you are under arrest.’ . . . However reasonable the command for Hoyland to go back inside may have been, his refusal to do so did not constitute obstruction. As Minnesota law makes abundantly clear, obstruction must be either physical obstruction or verbal conduct, such as fighting words, that has the effect of physically obstructing officers in the performance of their duties. Nowhere in Minnesota law does mere physical presence at a distance constitute obstruction. So arresting Hoyland for obstruction due to his continued presence in his doorway was unreasonable under state law. Even when we consider his verbal conduct, no reasonable officer could construe his shouting as ‘physically obstructing or interfering’ in the officers’ performance of their duties. . . . The officers are therefore denied qualified immunity for Hoyland’s Fourth Amendment claim. . . . As to whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that probable cause existed to seize Hoyland as he stood in his doorway, the dissent contends that the fact that the state prosecutor resisted dismissal of the charge of obstructing legal process against Hoyland ‘is as significant as the decision of the state judge to dismiss the charge.’ No authority is provided for this proposition and, indeed, it is the lack of neutrality and detachment that disqualifies prosecutors, who have a ‘responsibility to law enforcement,’ from a role in the ultimate probable cause determination.”)

Hoyland v. McMenemy, 869 F.3d 644, 658-61 (8th Cir. 2017) (Colloton, J., dissenting) (“Notably absent from the majority opinion is any mention of the Supreme Court’s several recent decisions reversing denials of qualified immunity by the courts of appeals. The Court explained that these opinions were necessary ‘both because qualified immunity is important to society as a whole, and because as an immunity from suit, qualified immunity is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.’ . . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on both claims if they had ‘arguable probable cause’ to make an arrest. The Fourth Amendment requires probable cause to arrest, but if police make an objectively reasonable mistake about the existence of probable cause, then they have ‘arguable probable cause’ and are immune from suit. . . . A First Amendment retaliation claim fails if the police had arguable probable cause to arrest. . . . Viewing the situation more broadly, Hoyland’s repeated argumentative refusals to comply with police commands at an active arrest scene also gave police at least arguable probable cause to believe that he violated § 609.50. Although the Minnesota Supreme Court wrote in response to a vagueness challenge that the statute is directed at ‘physically obstructing or interfering’ with an officer, . . . the few decisions applying the statute show that it encompasses violations that do not involve physical contact between an offender and a police officer. . . . We must address qualified immunity ‘in light of the specific context of the case,’ . . . yet there is no Minnesota court decision applying the statute to alleged obstruction by a third party at an active arrest scene. What constitutes obstruction of an officer may well be different at an active arrest scene than in the reception area at police headquarters. Hoyland refused seven times to comply with commands of police officers. It was reasonable to believe that his conduct substantially hindered the officers who were attempting to control the scene, by creating a new security concern and by preventing the officers from focusing their attention on the two suspects who were apprehended at Hoyland’s residence after fleeing. Hoyland’s persistence in refusing to comply supported an objectively reasonable belief in probable cause that he intentionally resisted or interfered. It was not beyond debate that the statute encompassed the interruptions and refusals directed at the desk officer in Occhino, and the loud and repetitive interruptions of the officers issuing citations in Hanson, but did not proscribe Hoyland’s interruptions and distraction of police officers at an active arrest scene.”)

Div. of Employment Sec. v. Bd. of Police Commissioners, 864 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir. 2017) (“Although Supreme Court precedent ‘do[es] not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . ‘Our prior cases have clearly established that use of [a] taser on a nonfleeing, nonviolent suspected misdemeanor [is] unreasonable.’ . . . Where a suspect is neither fleeing nor resisting arrest and does not pose a threat to the safety of the officers, it is ‘unreasonable for [an officer] to use more than de minimis force against’ the suspect. . . . In light of Gurley’s compliance with the officers’ demands, it was therefore beyond debate at the time of the events in question that the officers could not reasonably use more than de minimis force against Gurley.”)

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 708-09 (8th Cir. 2017) (“We conclude that it was clearly established at the time that ISU’s [Iowa State University’s] trademark licensing program was a limited public forum. Defendants argue that they did not violate clearly established law because at the time of this dispute the contours of the government speech doctrine were not clearly established. It was clearly established, however, that the government speech doctrine does not insulate a state actor from First Amendment scrutiny when the state has created a limited public forum for speech. . . . Like the university in Rosenberger, ISU was not engaging in government speech in this case because it had created a limited public forum to facilitate speech by private persons. . . Moreover, ISU's trademark licensing program was capable of accommodating a large number of student groups without defeating its essential function. . . Because ISU's trademark licensing program facilitated the speech of private persons and was capable of accommodating a large number of speakers, ISU's administration of that program was not government speech under clearly established law. The next question is whether at that time it was clearly established that a university may not discriminate on the basis of viewpoint in a limited public forum. It has long been recognized that if a university creates a limited public forum, it may not engage in viewpoint discrimination within that forum. . . . Given this history, plaintiffs' right not to be subjected to viewpoint discrimination while speaking in a university's limited public forum was thus clearly established at the times in question. Because defendants violated plaintiffs' clearly established First Amendment rights, the district court did not err by denying qualified immunity to defendants and granting plaintiffs summary judgment on their First Amendment claims.")

Gerlich v. Leath, 861 F.3d 697, 717 (8th Cir. 2017) (Loken, J., dissenting) ("Repeatedly, the Supreme Court has cautioned that 'clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017) (quotations omitted). Rather, 'clearly established law must be particularized to the facts of the case.' . . In a public school or university setting, 'educators are rarely denied immunity from liability arising out of First-Amendment disputes. The rare exceptions involve scenarios in which a factually analogous precedent clearly established the disputed conduct as unconstitutional.' . . The court cites no case in which school officials administering a trademark licensing program violated, or were even accused of violating, the First Amendment by denying proposed uses of the school's registered trademark. This case presents two uncertain First Amendment issues that warrant qualified immunity: (1) whether a trademark licensing program that allows student groups to associate their messages with the university's symbol or logo is a form of government speech or a limited public forum; and (2) if the program is a limited public forum, whether administrators' decisions to restrict the licensing of designs associating the university with unsafe or illegal activities such as drug use constitute unlawful viewpoint discrimination or permissible content regulation.")

Perry v. Woodruff County Sheriff Dep't, 858 F.3d 1141, 1146 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Wolfe raises a two-fold challenge to our conclusion about the clearly established nature of the Fourth Amendment violation. She first claims that under White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017), it was not clearly established that she was prohibited from relying on Clark's judgments about the need to use force against Perry. Next, she asserts that Perry's claim founders on Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2011), because Perry only alleged de minimis injuries and under Pennycook, such injuries could not serve as the basis for excessive-force claims until 2011. Both her arguments are unavailing. In White, the Supreme Court held that '[c]learly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action ... from assuming that proper procedures ... have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers.' . . White is inapplicable to our case because it addresses a wholly different set of facts. As noted above, Wolfe was on the scene at the time of the incident and testified that she viewed the entire interaction between Perry and Clark. As a result, Smith governs this case, and Perry's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force was clearly established. Wolfe responds that even if she used excessive force against Perry, he suffered only de minimis injuries as a result of her conduct. In Pennycook, decided in 2011, we held for the first time 'that a citizen may prove an unreasonable seizure based on an excessive use of force without necessarily showing more than de minimis injury.' . . While it is true that a de minimis injury could not serve as the basis for an excessive-force claim in August 2009, the record indicates that Perry suffered more than de minimis injuries such that Pennycook does not apply.")

Williams v. Tucker, 857 F.3d 765, 770-71 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Tucker argues that even if he violated Jenkins' First Amendment right to support an electoral candidate, the contours of that right were not clearly established at the time of any such violation. Tucker frames the right at issue as the right to remain a full time court employee, but the issue is properly characterized as whether Tucker impermissibly retaliated against Jenkins by causing her to become a part time employee. It is clearly established 'that a government employer cannot take adverse employment actions against its employees for exercising their First Amendment rights' by participating in electoral activities. . . This right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.")

De La Rosa v. White, 852 F.3d 740, 745-47 (8th Cir. 2017) ("[I]n this case, the Fourth Amendment issue is whether an officer had reasonable suspicion justifying a warrantless investigative detention, rather than probable cause to arrest or search. Thus, Trooper White is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed that he had a reasonable suspicion; in other words, if he had arguable reasonable suspicion. . . In this case, we find no controlling Eighth Circuit authority placing the question beyond debate, nor a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' More recent Eighth Circuit decisions have distinguished Jones and Beck, the cases on which the district court primarily relied, in finding no Fourth Amendment violations, let alone violations of clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . Rather than 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' favoring the district court's resolution of this difficult issue, our prior cases have found reasonable suspicion upholding the extension of traffic stops by officers relying on similar facts[.] [discussing cases] To be sure, on the merits, the existence of reasonable suspicion was a close question, because the facts on which Trooper White relied, taken together, did not raise as strong a suspicion of interstate drug trafficking as in prior cases such as Riley and Lebrun. But White relied on facts presenting substantial similarities with prior cases in which reasonable suspicion of drug trafficking was found and extension of a traffic stop was upheld. In recent years, the Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed decisions denying qualified immunity where lower courts 'misunderstood the "clearly established" analysis.' White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017). To avoid qualified immunity, De La Rosa must show a 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' Here, there is no consensus to be found in the prior decisions that have resolved a fact-intensive Fourth Amendment issue under a governing standard that requires judges to 'allow[] officers to draw on their own experience and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person.’ . . Trooper White is therefore entitled to qualified immunity from De La Rosa’s damage claims.”)

Ehlers v. City of Rapid City, 846 F.3d 1002, 1012 (8th Cir. 2017) (“The law did not clearly establish in December 2010 that the use of an arm bar in this context constitutes excessive force. Indeed, the only instance in which we have considered the merits of the use of an arm bar occurred after 2010 and concerned an arm bar as a takedown maneuver, not as a method of handcuffing a suspect. See Hicks v. Norwood, 640 F.3d 839, 842 (8th Cir. 2011). More broadly, we have held that officers may use force to handcuff a suspect who is resisting, even if that force causes pain. See, e.g., Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924 (8th Cir. 2014) (analyzing the state of the law in 2009). The only cases Ehlers provides to support a finding of clearly established law concern the use of force against an individual who is not resisting. . . As discussed above, the officers reasonably interpreted Ehlers’s behavior as resistance. The officers also reasonably considered Ehlers’s free hand a potential threat. . . As a result, Ehlers’s cases are inapposite. A reasonable officer would not have understood the action in question to constitute excessive force. . . Thus, the law was not clearly established, and Rybak is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jenkins v. Univ. of Minnesota, 838 F.3d 938, 947 (8th Cir. 2016) (“Swem does not dispute that the right to be free of sexual harassment in the workplace is clearly established, but asks us to take a very narrow view of the contours of that right here. He insists that a reasonable public official would not have known that his comments, ‘void of any physical conduct,’ could amount to sexual harassment. We find this argument unavailing. Our case law clearly establishes that physical contact is not required to make out a hostile-work-environment claim. . . We find that the right Swem violated was clearly established. Swem then argues that a reasonable official in his position would not have known the conduct was unlawful because he did not receive any sexual harassment training from UM and lacked specific knowledge of UM’s sexual harassment policy. ‘A reasonably competent public official should know the law governing his conduct.’ . . A person such as Swem, who has had prior experience working with and supervising students, should be aware that sexual harassment violates a student’s clearly established rights, even in the absence of specific training. . . Because we find that Jenkins has satisfied both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis, we agree with the district court that Swem was not entitled to qualified immunity or summary judgment on that basis.”)

Gilmore v. City of Minneapolis, 837 F.3d 827, 834 (8th Cir. 2016) (“Because the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment, the arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Gilmore’s constitutional claim.”)

Stewart v. Wagner, 836 F.3d 978, 982-86 (8th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e note that, while a prosecutor’s duty to disclose is absolute, to recover damages from other law enforcement officials for a Brady violation, a § 1983 plaintiff must prove the requisite mens rea. In denying investigators Wagner and Choate summary judgment on this claim, the district court adopted the amorphous ‘bad faith’ mens rea standard set forth in White v. McKinley, 519 F.3d 806, 814 (8th Cir. 2008), rather than the more precise standard adopted in our earlier, and therefore controlling, opinion in Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2004) – ‘Brady ensures that the defendant will obtain relief from a conviction tainted by the State’s nondisclosure of materially favorable evidence, regardless of fault, but the recovery of § 1983 damages requires proof that a law enforcement officer other than the prosecutor intended to deprive the defendant of a fair trial.’ (Emphasis added.) The district court must apply this controlling standard when the issue again arises on remand, whether before, during, or after trial. . . . [A] § 1983 plaintiff’s claim that he was arrested or prosecuted without probable cause, even if labeled a claim of malicious prosecution, ‘must be judged’ under the Fourth Amendment, not substantive due process. . . . We recognized in Moran that additional considerations in a particular case may trigger substantive due process protection, like the impact of ‘falsely-created evidence and other defamatory actions’ on a public employee plaintiff’s career, and the equal protection interest in not being investigated or punished on account of race, that were present in that case. . . . But here, Stewart was not a public employee, race was not an issue, and the alleged fabricated evidence was only used in a probable cause statement. Thus, the general rule in Oliver applies, and the district court committed an error of law in not judging the actions of Selby and Wagner under the Fourth Amendment. . . . We note that the preliminary hearing at which Kimberling testified was nearly two months after charges were filed based on Wagner’s probable cause statement. Stewart did not gain pretrial release or dismissal of the charges at that hearing, which strongly suggests that the presence of arguable probable cause was overwhelming. On this record, we conclude it was error to deny Prosecutor Selby qualified immunity on this claim because Stewart failed to present sufficient evidence that Wagner and Selby violated ‘clearly established [Fourth Amendment] rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . If this were an appeal from the denial of a motion to suppress or exclude the testimony of Parker and Pollard, or from the denial of a properly preserved federal habeas claim, we might well agree there is sufficient evidence of a Sixth Amendment violation under Kuhlmann to warrant a full trial of this claim. But this is the appeal from the denial of qualified immunity from a § 1983 claim. Neither the district court nor Stewart cited, and we have not found, a reported federal decision discussing the elements of a § 1983 Sixth Amendment claim based on use of a jailhouse informant’s testimony at trial, and the proper application of qualified immunity principles to such a claim. The absence of such precedent is not dispositive but is clearly relevant. . . . The judgment of Wagner and Selby on this issue may have been wrong, but Kuhlmann and the earlier cases it applied create a very indistinct line between aggressive use of jailhouse informants that does and does not violate the Sixth Amendment rights of a defendant who has just been charged and invokes his right to counsel. And there were no § 1983 precedents giving these defendants ‘fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires,’ . . . and therefore no ‘existing precedent [that] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.]’ . . . In such circumstances, suppression, not § 1983 damage liability, is the appropriate remedy.”) Carter v. Huterson, 831 F.3d 1104, 1107-09 (8th Cir. 2016) (“In appealing the dismissal of his Fourth Amendment claim, Carter first contends that because he was a civilly committed individual rather than a pre-trial detainee or a prisoner, the defendants could not collect a blood sample to produce his DNA profile without first demonstrating individualized suspicion of criminal wrongdoing and acquiring a search warrant. However, we do not reach the question of whether the alleged warrantless collection of Carter’s blood sample violated the Fourth Amendment because the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. Here, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to their alleged taking of Carter’s blood sample because Carter has failed to demonstrate that, at the time of the events in question, civilly committed sexually violent predators maintained a clearly established right to be free from the warrantless drawing of a blood sample to produce a DNA profile. . . . First, we previously have held that civilly committed individuals ‘retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees.’ Beaulieu v. Ludeman, 690 F.3d 1017, 1028 (8th Cir. 2012). Shortly after our decision in Beaulieu, the Supreme Court held in Maryland v. King that the Fourth Amendment does not require authorities to obtain a warrant before conducting a mouth swab to obtain the DNA profile of a pretrial detainee. 569 U.S. —, 133 S. Ct. 1958 (2013). Relying on these two cases, therefore, the defendants reasonably could have concluded that the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit the warrantless collection of a civilly committed person’s DNA profile. Indeed, the defendants have shown that several of the same government interests identified in King reasonably could justify the DNA identification of a civilly committed sexually violent predator, including determining ‘the [individual]’s future dangerousness’ and the extent he might be ‘inclined to flee’ from confinement. . . . Second, courts generally have recognized the collection of a blood sample as a minimally intrusive mechanism for obtaining information from individuals in state custody. . . . Given the state of the law at the time of the alleged events and his status as a civilly committed sexually violent predator, Carter did not have a ‘clearly established’ right to be free from the warrantless collection of his blood sample for the purpose of obtaining his DNA profile. . . . As a result, the district court did not err when it found that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim.”)

Ingrassia v. Schafer, 825 F.3d 891, 899 (8th Cir. 2016) (“Defendants contend that, even if questions of material fact remain whether Ingrassia was denied adequate nutrition, the right to adequate nutrition was not clearly established, warranting qualified immunity. Defendants argue that appellate courts have not clearly defined adequate nutrition in the civil commitment context. At the time of the alleged violations, however, it was clearly established that a prisoner may properly allege a constitutional violation by demonstrating significant weight loss or other adverse physical effects from lack of nutrition. . . . While there are contested issues of fact about Ingrassia’s weight loss and caloric intake, his evidence established a significant weight loss tied to nutrition. Because the law was settled, the district court properly denied summary judgment to Englehart, Blake and Weinkein.”)

Dadd v. Anoka Cty., 827 F.3d 749, 757 (8th Cir. 2016) (“Dadd arrived at the jail with instructions from his doctor in the form of a Vicodin prescription, and the deputies and the jail nurse ignored his complaints of pain and requests for treatment. When Dadd was prescribed additional medication by a jail doctor, he did not receive it. Moreover, the defendants had fair warning about the unconstitutionality of a failure to provide pain medication for serious dental conditions in particular. . . . Dadd’s right to adequate treatment was clearly established, and the district court properly denied the defendants qualified immunity.”) Barton v. Taber, 820 F.3d 958, 968-70 (8th Cir. 2016) (Colloton, J. dissenting) (“It was clearly established in September 2011, at least under the law of the Eighth Circuit, that a law enforcement officer must not act with deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of an arrestee. . . . But this is a broad general proposition. The issue here is whether the facts alleged, in the specific context of this case, show that only a plainly incompetent state trooper, or a trooper who knowingly violates the law, would have turned Barton over to the custody of the detention center without seeking medical attention. In other words, it must be clearly established that the complaint’s allegations are sufficient to show that Barton suffered from an objectively serious medical need, and that Owens exhibited deliberate indifference (i.e., criminal recklessness) to that need by failing to seek medical attention. The complaint and relevant precedents do not support a denial of qualified immunity. . . . Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and a reasonable state trooper with no medical training could have believed that his slurred speech, difficulty walking, inability to answer questions, and even temporary non-responsiveness were the results of intoxication that did not require immediate medical attention. On the facts alleged, it would not have been obvious to a layperson that Barton’s symptoms exceeded those of acute intoxication. There is no allegation that Owens had any knowledge that Barton suffered from the heart condition that eventually caused his death. And there is no assertion that Owens knew how to distinguish symptoms of intoxication from those of an impending coronary. The district court thought Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 748 (8th Cir.2013), clearly established that Owens’s conduct violated Barton’s constitutional rights, but this conclusion was error. Assuming that controlling circuit precedent is a dispositive source of clearly established law, cf. Carroll v. Carman, — U.S. —, —, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), Thompson was decided in 2013, two years after Barton’s death in 2011, so it could not provide clearly established law for this incident. . . . The court relies instead on McRaven v. Sanders, 577 F.3d 974 (8th Cir.2009), but the decision there on dissimilar facts did not put Owens on notice of a clearly established constitutional right in this case. The officers in McRaven knew that an arrestee had consumed a ‘cocktail of potent drugs’ under circumstances that “strongly suggested” they were not taken in prescribed dosages, yet they failed to seek medical attention when the arrestee exhibited extreme symptoms of drug intoxication. Unlike Owens, who was unaware of Barton’s heart condition, the officers in McRaven had specific reason to believe that the offender suffered from a serious medical need—a drug overdose—that distinguished him from an arrestee who had consumed excessive amounts of alcohol. . . . More instructive is a decision that unfortunately was not cited by either party. In Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082 (10th Cir.2009), officers arrested a man named Ginn for public intoxication. The arresting officer reported that Ginn ‘was unable to stand.’ A witness testified that officers ‘picked up’ Ginn and ‘dragged’ him to a patrol car. The officer transporting Ginn to the detention center thought Ginn had ‘passed out, like most of your drunks do’ during a ride to the facility. At the detention center, Ginn could not walk in a straight line, and officers helped to support his weight. Ginn was placed in a cell. Three hours later, he died from a heart attack due to coronary artery disease. Ginn's estate sued the arresting officers, alleging that they knew that Ginn had consumed a large quantity of alcohol, could not walk without help, may have been unconscious for a short time, and was talking as if he were hallucinating. The plaintiff also sued two custodial officers, asserting that they knew Ginn was drunk, was too incoherent to be booked into jail, and had difficulty walking. The court affirmed a grant of summary judgment for the officers because there was insufficient evidence to show deliberate indifference to the detainee's serious medical needs:

[T]he sufficiently serious objective harm that Ginn faced was heart attack and death, and not acute intoxication.... The officers subjectively knew that Ginn was intoxicated, but there is no evidence to show that anyone would have known that Ginn would face an imminent heart attack or death, much less that the individual county defendants subjectively knew that Ginn was at risk of heart attack or death.

Id. at 1090.

So too here. Owens knew that Barton was a drunk driver, and Barton exhibited symptoms that a reasonable trooper could associate with acute intoxication. Owens had no reason to know that Barton suffered from an undiagnosed heart condition that would cause his death. Barton may have had an objectively serious medical need for treatment of his heart, but it was not a need to which Owens was deliberately indifferent under clearly established law on the facts alleged. I would therefore reverse the district court's order denying the motion to dismiss.")

Mountain Pure, LLC v. Roberts, 814 F.3d 928, 935 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The employees finally assert that Roberts and Spradlin acted unreasonably in detaining them incommunicado by denying them access to telephones. Again they rely on Ganwich, in which the Ninth Circuit also concluded that qualified immunity did not apply because the officers there had denied employees telephone access during their detentions. . . . The Ganwich court reasoned that based on the Supreme Court's decisions in Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 103 S.Ct. 1319, 75 L.Ed.2d 229 (1983) and Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 20 L.Ed.2d 889 (1968), a reasonable official would have known that incommunicado detention 'was significantly more intrusive than was necessary for them to complete the search' of the employees' offices. . . . We disagree. To conclude that official conduct violates clearly established rights, we must find some 'factual correspondence with precedent,' which requires a 'fact-intensive inquiry [that] must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . Neither Royer nor Terry involved factually similar circumstances to those in question here, and those cases do not support the conclusion that the agents violated the employees' clearly established rights. . . . We thus conclude that the district court did not err in concluding that qualified immunity barred their unlawful detention claims.")

Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Bailey first argues that we should analyze his § 1983 claim against Feltmann for denial of medical care under the objective reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim alleging excessive use of force, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), but this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. One recent decision, Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F.3d 644, 650 (8th Cir.2012), applied due process analysis to the claim of an arrestee, but the plaintiff there did not invoke the Fourth Amendment, and the issue was not joined. Earlier cases seem to imply—also without discussion of the Fourth Amendment—that the Due Process Clause may govern, e.g., Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equip. Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999), and there is a conflict in authority elsewhere about how to evaluate this type of claim. Compare Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011) (applying Fourth Amendment), with Barrie v. Grand Cty., 119 F.3d 862, 865–69 (10th Cir.1997) (applying Due Process Clause). For present purposes, it is enough to acknowledge that a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established in March 2012. Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit had announced such a right, and there is no uniform body of authority that might allow us to conclude that the right was clearly established. Nor was it clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). Feltmann is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Bailey’s claim that Feltmann acted unreasonably, and the district court properly dismissed that portion of the complaint. We think it prudent to avoid addressing the proper constitutional standard unnecessarily. See Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2031 (2011). Bailey argues in the alternative that Feltmann’s decision to proceed to the jail rather than to a hospital exhibited deliberate indifference to his need for medical attention in violation of his clearly established constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause. Regardless of whether an ‘unreasonable’ decision to forego treatment would violate the Constitution, this court deemed it clearly established by 2008 that a pretrial detainee (or an arrestee, see Spencer, 183 F.3d at 905 n. 3) has a right to be free from deliberately indifferent denials of emergency medical care. See Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 (8th Cir.2013). Bailey’s claim fails, however, because he has not produced sufficient evidence to support a finding that Feltmann violated that right.”)

Wright v. United States, 813 F.3d 689, 696-99 (8th Cir. 2015) (“Recently, in Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, we determined that it was not clearly established in July 2009 that the use of a Taser resulting in only de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Despite a Taser’s ‘unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, “we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury.”’. . . In April 2009, when the events at issue in this case transpired, the state of the law was no different. . . . Therefore, the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright’s excessive force claim. The district court, despite the Marshals’ failure to argue the clearly established issue, cited to our decision in Shekleton v. Eichenberger in support of the court’s conclusion that the tasing of Wright was excessive force in violation of clearly established law at the time. . . . The facts in Shekleton are distinguishable from those in this case in that a Grand Jury had indicted Vinol Wilson for several felonies. . . . He was considered armed and dangerous. In contrast, the suspect in Shekleton was arrested for public intoxication, a misdemeanor. . . . Thus, our holding in Shekleton does not change our finding that the state of the law in April 2009 was such that a reasonable officer would not have had fair warning that using a single Taser shock against a suspected felon would have violated clearly established Constitutional rights. Accordingly, we hold that the Marshals are entitled to qualified immunity on Wright’s excessive force claim because it was not clearly established in April 2009 that the use of a Taser against a suspected armed and dangerous felon violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Wright was held for up to twenty minutes after the Marshals realized that he was not Vinol Wilson. Under the totality of circumstances, we conclude the delay in releasing Wright was reasonable. . . . The Fourth Amendment does not demand perfection from law enforcement officers; it only requires that their conduct be reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. The twenty-minute detention was not an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment, and therefore the Marshals are entitled to summary judgment on Wright’s claim for unreasonable seizure.”)

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 990-91 (8th Cir. 2015) (“The issue in this case is whether McCallum, having justification to use some force to cause Hollingsworth to change into an orange jumpsuit, violated her clearly established rights by deploying the Taser rather than employing other means such as physical restraint and forcible removal of clothing. . . . As we have explained in other decisions, it was an open question at the time of this incident in July 2009 whether a plaintiff must demonstrate greater than de minimis injury to establish an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The district court, citing a concession by Hollingsworth, concluded that her injuries were de minimis, and she does not dispute that point on appeal. Therefore, Hollingsworth can prevail only if it was clearly established in July 2009 that use of a Taser that caused de minimis injury violated the Fourth Amendment. Hollingsworth’s claim founders on our decision in LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155 (8th Cir.2013). LaCross held that it was not clearly established in 2006 that an officer’s use of a Taser that resulted in no lasting physical injuries or injuries requiring medical care nonetheless could be unreasonable because Tasers caused ‘excruciating pain without lasting physical effects.’ . . . This court held that despite the Taser’s unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, ‘we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury.’ . . . We thus concluded it was not clearly established that an officer’s use of a Taser, resulting in only de minimis injury, was an unconstitutional use of force. . . . The law was not materially different in July 2009, so McCallum is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 992-96 (8th Cir. 2015) (Kelly, J., concurring) (“I concur in the decision to affirm the judgment of the district court. I write separately for three reasons. First, to state clearly that, in my belief, Officer McCallum acted unreasonably in tasing Hollingsworth. Second, to highlight my concern that Hollingsworth did not, in fact, concede to the district court that she sustained merely de minimis injuries. And third, to explain that while I believe that at the time this event occurred in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanor, I recognize that I am constrained by this court’s decision in LaCross, and thus I concur. . . . The majority allows that ‘the actions of one or more officers might have been unreasonable’ and does not elaborate further—instead reaching its decision on the second prong of the qualified immunity test. In my view Officer McCallum’s actions were unreasonable. . . . As the court notes, the district court summarily concluded that Hollingsworth’s injuries were de minimis by citing to a ‘concession’ made by Hollingsworth on this point. . . . Acknowledging that Eighth Circuit precedent may construe her injuries as de minimis does not constitute a concession that Hollingsworth agreed her injuries were de minimis, particularly when she goes on to argue for a change in the law. . . .It appears from her briefing, however, that Hollingsworth has abandoned any argument that her injuries were above and beyond the injuries alleged in LaCross, and thus I agree with the court that she is limited by our ruling in that case. . . .Finally, I write to express my belief that at the time of Hollingsworth's tasing in July 2009, it was clearly established that it was unlawful to use a Taser on an unarmed, secured, and nonthreatening misdemeanor. Were I not constrained by precedent, I would decline to extend qualified immunity to Officer McCallum Each of these cases stands for the proposition that a reasonable officer would have known that the use of a Taser in circumstances similar to the one at present was clearly established as unlawful: Brown concerned events that took place in 2005, and Shekleton and DeBoise concerned separate events that took place in 2008. . . .These holdings, then, must be reconciled with Chambers, which holds that prior to 2012, arrestees did not have a clearly established right to be free from unreasonable force that resulted in merely de minimis injuries. Rather than ignoring these cases, I read Brown and Shekleton as support for the view that a Taser, when effectively used, typically results in more than de minimis injuries. . . .While I find this court's decision in LaCross to be at odds with much of our precedent outlined here, I recognize that its factual similarity to the case at hand, combined with the plaintiff's failure to plead specialized injury, forecloses the conclusion that Hollingsworth suffered greater than de minimis injuries. Thus, I concur in the decision of the court.”)

Robinson v. Payton, 791 F.3d 824, 829-30 (8th Cir. 2015) (“We find that a reasonable official, standing in Trooper Condley’s shoes, would not understand that what he is doing—restraining a hysterical individual on the scene and deciding not to leave the hysterical individual and intervene—violates clearly established law. Trooper Condley neither was plainly incompetent nor did he knowingly violate the law. His decision to stay with Eva and not to intervene did not transgress a bright line. If he left Eva, she could have and likely would have joined the altercation, possibly harming herself or others. . . . Because we do not find it would be clear to a reasonable officer, standing in the shoes of Trooper Condley, that his conduct was unlawful in the present case, Trooper Condley is entitled to qualified immunity. The district court’s denial of qualified immunity is reversed.”)

Robinson v. Payton, 791 F.3d 824, 831 (8th Cir. 2015) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (“Trooper Condley was present when Stevens first threatened to tase Matthew, then aimed the taser, and pulled its trigger. Condley did not say or do anything to deescalate the situation. He simply stood by and watched the deputies repeatedly tase the young man. . . . Nor did he intervene after Matthew’s mother was returned to the patrol car. There is no question that the law is ‘clearly established that an officer who fails to intervene to prevent the unconstitutional use of excessive force by another officer may be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment.’. . . Also well established is that ‘one who is given the badge of authority of a police officer may not ignore the duty imposed by his office and fail to stop other officers who summarily punish a third person in his presence or otherwise within his knowledge.’. . . Important issues of disputed fact remain on this record as to whether Corporal Condley failed a clearly established duty by not intervening while officers Stevens and Payton fired multiple taser shocks into Matthew’s body. The experienced trial judge’s denial of qualified immunity should be affirmed.”)

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 970-73 (8th Cir. 2015) (“The Supreme Court never has resolved whether convicted inmates retain a Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches while in custody. The Court in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979), assumed the point for the sake of analysis. . . In Hudson v. Palmer . . . the Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not apply to a search of a prison cell, reasoning that ‘[a] right of privacy in traditional Fourth Amendment terms is fundamentally incompatible with the close and continual surveillance of inmates and their cells required to ensure institutional security and internal order.’. . The Seventh Circuit, in the wake of Hudson, ruled that inmates retain no right under the Fourth Amendment against visual inspections by prison guards. Johnson v. Phelan, 69 F.3d 144, 146–47 (7th Cir.1995). This court, however, has said that ‘prison inmates are entitled to Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches of their bodies,’ Levine v. Roebuck, 550 F.3d 684, 687 (8th Cir.2008), and allowed a Fourth Amendment claim challenging strip searches to proceed in Seltzer–Bey v. Delo, 66 F.3d 961, 963 (8th Cir.1995). The Arkansas Supreme Court, as best we can tell, has never addressed the question. The Supreme Court recently has reserved judgment twice on the question whether decisions of a federal court of appeals are a source of clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity analysis. See Carroll v. Carman, — U.S. —, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). Following the approach of the Court in those cases, we assume for the sake of analysis that our decisions clearly establish that a convicted inmate has rights under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches of his body. . . Here, Story alleges that officers conducted a visual body-cavity inspection when Story returned to the Williams facility from outside the institution. Given what the Supreme Court and this court have said about the strong institutional interests in maintaining security, and about the reasonableness of visual body-cavity inspections when detainees enter a facility, Story’s allegation of a body-cavity search by itself does not state a claim for the violation of a clearly established right. Story argues, however, that the manner in which this particular search was conducted violated the Fourth Amendment. He highlights an allegation that a female correctional officer was working in the master control room at the time of the search, and that she viewed the search on a video screen. He cites this court’s statement—in a case about a strip search of an arrestee in a motel room—that ‘strip searches should be conducted by officials of the same sex as the individual to be searched.’ Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1008 (8th Cir.2007). The search in this case, consistent with Richmond’s general admonition, was conducted by male correctional officers. Story does not allege that the male officers knew that female officers would observe the video feed from the master control unit. In any event, the male officers did not violate Story’s clearly established rights by conducting the inspection in a location where a female officer also may have viewed the search from the master control room through a video feed from a security camera. This court in Timm v. Gunter, 917 F.2d 1093 (8th Cir.1990), held that prison administrators did not violate the Fourth Amendment rights of inmates by allowing intermittent visual surveillance of male inmates by female guards while the inmates used showers and bathrooms or slept without clothing in their cells. Our opinion cited the ‘rational connection between sex-neutral visual surveillance of inmates and the goal of prison security,’ and observed that staffing adjustments (akin to removing female officers from the master control room during searches in this case) would interfere with equal employment opportunities for women and require significant expenditures by the prison. . . We also have held that the use of cameras to monitor activities from a control booth is reasonable, even when body-cavity searches are involved. . . In light of these precedents, it was not beyond debate that a reasonable correctional officer was forbidden to proceed with a visual body-cavity search in an area monitored by security cameras while a female officer was assigned to the master control unit. . . . We cannot say, however, that Foote’s single alleged use of the term ‘monkey,’ even with its potential racial overtones, is sufficient to allege the violation of a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment. Story cites no supporting case with analogous facts, and recent decisions rejecting Fourth Amendment claims based on verbal abuse alone militate against a conclusion that the alleged.”)

Story v. Foote, 782 F.3d 968, 974-76 (8th Cir. 2015) (Bye, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority sua sponte raises qualified immunity, ‘an affirmative defense that must be pleaded by a defendant official.’ . . In the instant matter, the district court did not discuss qualified immunity and the correctional officers do not raise qualified immunity on appeal. The majority does not cite, and I have been unable to find, any cases where the Eighth Circuit sua sponte raised the affirmative defense of qualified immunity after the district court dismissed without mention of qualified immunity and the defendants failed to brief a qualified immunity defense on appeal. . . . It appears the majority’s sua sponte qualified immunity ruling in this case is unique. Unlike before the district court, where the correctional officers had not been served or had an opportunity to respond, on appeal the correctional officers had the opportunity to brief any affirmative defenses they wished to raise. The correctional officers chose not to raise a qualified immunity defense. . . . Even if a qualified immunity defense were properly before this court, I would not find defendants entitled to qualified immunity at this time. . . . A correctional officer’s power to strip search an inmate may be broad, but it is not unfettered. . . . Second, a reasonable correctional officer would have known an overly-intrusive and unnecessary strip search was unconstitutional at the time Story was strip searched. It was clearly established law that unreasonable strip searches violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Perhaps after the completion of discovery and briefing by the parties, it will be appropriate to find the correctional officers entitled to qualified immunity against Story’s claims; however, the time for such a finding is not now.”)

Rodgers v. Knight, 781 F.3d 932, 939-42 (8th Cir. 2015) (“It was not clearly established that the officers, having developed probable cause for a concealed firearms offense, were required to investigate Greg’s claim about a Florida permit; our precedent suggests the opposite. . . . Although Greg reportedly informed different police officers about the Florida permit during a previous encounter in January 2011, there was no evidence that the arresting officers in August 2011 knew that information. Nor was it clearly established that probable cause was defeated by the ‘dwelling unit’ exception for carrying concealed weapons in Missouri. No court had construed the meaning of ‘dwelling unit or ... premises over which the actor has possession, authority or control,’ . . . and there was Missouri authority suggesting that ‘a tenant does not have control of the common areas and thus does not possess them.’. . Officers reasonably could have believed that Greg was forbidden to carry a concealed weapon without a permit in common outdoor areas of the apartment complex. Therefore, officers are entitled to qualified immunity for recommending the firearms charge to county prosecutors. . . . As of 2011, an officer was entitled to qualified immunity against this type of retaliation claim if an arrest or prosecution was supported by probable cause. . . The qualified immunity extends further to an action based on at least ‘arguable’ probable cause. . . For reasons discussed in connection with Greg’s Fourth Amendment claims, a reasonable officer in 2011 could have believed that there was probable cause to charge Greg with unlawful use of a firearm based on carrying a concealed weapon or unlawful possession of a firearm as a fugitive from justice. Therefore, the district court was correct to dismiss the First Amendment claims against the officers.”)

Parker v. Chard, 777 F.3d 977, 981-82 (8th Cir. 2015) (“Based on White and J.L., it was not clearly established that Chard and Illetschko—having corroborated the running asserted in the eyewitness tip, and knowing shoplifting recently occurred—could not reasonably suspect Parker of shoplifting. ‘[W]hether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not beyond debate.’. . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Reeves v. King, 774 F.3d 430, 433 (8th Cir. 2014) (“We conclude a reasonable correctional officer in Lieutenant King’s position would have known, based on Irving and Norman, labeling Reeves a snitch for reporting on a prison nurse who was bringing contraband into the prison would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm. Accordingly, the district court properly denied qualified immunity to Lieutenant King.”)

Williams v. City of Alexander, Ark., 772 F.3d 1307, 1313 (8th Cir. 2014) (“Because a reasonable official would understand that including false information in and omitting relevant information from an affidavit in an effort to punish someone for supporting one’s political opponent would constitute a violation of clearly established constitutional rights, Walters is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Bates v. Hadden, 576 F. App’x 636, 639 (8th Cir. 2014) (“In a pair of 2001 decisions, we observed that malicious prosecution is not a constitutional injury. . . Kurtz and Technical Ordnance raise a high hurdle for Bates’s § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Our precedents dictate that Officer Hadden is entitled to qualified immunity as to Bates’s malicious prosecution claim. No ‘reasonable officials acting in [Officer Hadden’s] position would ... have understood they were violating’” Bates’s constitutional right against malicious prosecution because no such constitutional right had been clearly established.”)

Meehan v. Thompson, 763 F.3d 936, 941, 946, 947 (8th Cir. 2014) (“We conclude that, at the time of Meehan’s arrest, the law was not clearly established that a police officer could not constitutionally arrest an individual whom he reasonably believed to be moderately intoxicated and who would otherwise be left alone on a public roadway at night. Thompson asserts that his arrest of Meehan was a valid exercise of his role as a ‘community caretaker.’. . We have recognized that it may be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment for a police officer, acting in his capacity as community caretaker, to seize an apparently intoxicated individual ‘to ensure the safety of the public and/or the individual, regardless of any suspected criminal activity.’. . Such an arrest is reasonable ‘if the “governmental interest in the police officer’s exercise of [his] community caretaking function,” ... outweighs “the individual’s interest in being free from arbitrary government interference.”’. . As we made clear in Winters, the primary governmental interest underlying the arrest of an intoxicated individual who is not suspected of criminal activity is a concern for safety. . . Meehan asserts that this interest does not justify her arrest because, under clearly established law, her apparent intoxication was too mild to support a reasonable inference that she was a danger to herself or others. We disagree. As we explain below, Thompson reasonably believed that Meehan was at least moderately intoxicated, and the law at the time of Meehan’s arrest was not so clear that a reasonable officer would have known that he lacked probable cause to arrest a moderately intoxicated individual in lieu of leaving her alone on a public roadway at night. . . . Meehan also argued to the district court, and the district court concluded, that Thompson used excessive force in frisking Meehan. Meehan does not dispute that Thompson’s frisk caused only de minimis injury. This fact is fatal to Meehan’s excessive force claim because, at the time of her arrest, it was not clearly established that conduct by a police officer that caused only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We recognized for the first time in Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011), that police conduct that causes only de minimis injury could constitute excessive force. We noted, however, that it had previously ‘remain [ed] an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury.’. . Chambers was handed down on June 6, 2011, more than a month after Meehan was arrested. Meehan thus cannot avail herself of the legal principle articulated in Chambers. Meehan argues, however, that the law was clearly established even before Chambers that de minimis injury could give rise to an excessive force claim. Meehan notes that Chambers was the result of an en banc rehearing granted in part because of the petitioner’s assertion that the original panel’s holding—that de minimis injury could not support an excessive force claim—conflicted with a 2010 Supreme Court case, Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010). Wilkins, however, dealt with a prisoner’s right to be free from excessive force under the Eighth Amendment and did not clearly establish that de minimis injury could support an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment. Chambers’s holding was not based on Wilkins but on an exhaustive study of case law, a study that no reasonable police officer should have been expected to conduct. . . Meehan does not point to any other specific case enunciating the principle that de minimis injury can give rise to an excessive force claim, nor can we find one. . . Because the law was not clear before Chambers that police conduct could constitute excessive force even if it caused only de minimis injury, Meehan’s excessive force claim must fail.”)

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 917, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) (“In September 2009, a reasonable officer had a solid basis to believe that strip searching an arrestee was constitutional if there was reasonable suspicion that the detainee possessed contraband. . . The county’s policy provided for strip searches based on reasonable suspicion. Jacobson was arrested for driving while impaired. He admitted that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana, so there was also probable cause to believe that he recently had committed a controlled substance offense. Officers found no drugs in a traditional pat-down search of Jacobson's person while he was clothed. The question confronting the officers under county policy, therefore, was whether they had reasonable suspicion that Jacobson may have concealed contraband in a private area that could be viewed only through a strip search. Two circuits had held by 2009 that an arrest based on evidence that a person was under the influence of drugs did not provide reasonable suspicion for a strip search. . . . In 2009, this court had never addressed the constitutionality of a strip search premised on an arrestee's recent use of drugs, and a close reading of our precedent left open the possibility that drug-related offenses or conduct might give rise to reasonable suspicion.") Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 924-26 (8th Cir. 2014) ("In our view, the narrower scope of qualified immunity urged by the partial dissenting opinion would impose an unreasonable burden on the police officers and cannot be squared with the more robust version of the doctrine espoused recently by the Supreme Court. Blazek must show that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates' a constitutional right, . . . and that the constitutional question was 'beyond debate.' . . . We must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2023 (2014) . . . It is clear in light of Wertish that if the officers had lifted the belligerent Blazek off his feet, thrown him to the ground, and jumped on his back to handcuff him, without causing the alleged injury to his ankle or shoulder, then the officers would have acted reasonably or at least be entitled to qualified immunity. But the partial dissent would hold that if Blazek instead had one foot planted on the floor, and the torque of the throw to the ground caused his ankle to twist and fracture, then the officers are subject to suit and liability for damages. Similarly, an awkward landing that caused a separated shoulder would trigger liability, but a smoother alighting that resulted in ordinary bruising would not. And if the throw had caused merely a sprained ankle with no fracture, then who knows? Immunity from suit and liability for damages would depend on whether a reviewing judge later decides that use of the forceful throw allowed in Wertish caused an unacceptable degree of injury. Qualified immunity is designed to free police officers from the risk of suit and liability based on such fine distinctions. One can debate the Fourth Amendment ruling in Wertish, . . . but taking the decision as a given, it is unrealistic to expect a police officer, in the heat of the moment, to discern whether a particular ankle injury would result from a takedown or to plan a careful landing for the detainee's shoulder. The same goes for the force applied to Blazek's arms during the handcuffing. A reasonable officer reading the annals of the federal courts in 2009 would know that the technique like that applied here—where an officer 'grabbed plaintiff's arm, twisted it around plaintiff's back, jerking it up high to the shoulder'—was 'a relatively common and ordinarily accepted non-excessive way to detain an arrestee.' . . . Yet the partial dissent would hold that if the detainee complains of no pain during the incident, but discovers later that otherwise permissible 'twisting' of his arm upward and behind his back caused a tear in his rotator cuff, then the officers have violated a clearly established right and are subject to suit and liability for damages. It was not ‘beyond debate’ in 2009 that the constitutionality of the officers’ actions here depended on whether their use of a ‘common and ordinarily accepted’ handcuffing method caused injury to the detainee’s shoulder area. The officers’ jerking of Blazek from the floor to his bed, however, presents a discrete use of force for consideration under the Fourth Amendment. At that point in the encounter, Blazek was handcuffed and under control. In his telling, Blazek was not resisting and posed no threat to the officers. He was not suspected of any serious offense; he was detained only because he was present at Feldhacker’s residence and would not stay seated and identify himself when questioned. Nonetheless, the officers allegedly ‘jerked’ him up by the arms with sufficient force to cause serious injury to his shoulder area. It was clearly established in 2009 that when a person is subdued and restrained with handcuffs, a ‘gratuitous and completely unnecessary act of violence’ is unreasonable and violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Pepper spray administered in the face of a subdued arrestee . . . and handcuffs applied so tightly—despite repeated complaints of pain—that they broke the wrist of a compliant arrestee, . . . were known to violate the Fourth Amendment. There is no prior case involving Blazek’s precise factual scenario, but he need not show that the ‘very action in question has previously been held unlawful’ to overcome qualified immunity, as long as the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . Reasonable officers surely could bring Blazek up from the floor in some manner after he was handcuffed, and officers are not required to treat detainees as gently as possible. . . But Blazek’s allegation is that the officers did more than lift him up roughly. If Blazek can prove at trial that he was subdued and compliant, but that the officers grabbed him by the arms and gratuitously ‘jerked’ him from the floor onto the bed, using enough violent force to cause significant injury, then we agree with the district court that a reasonable jury could find a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And the law was sufficiently developed to show that such a violation—allegedly involving unnecessary violence against a handcuffed and compliant detainee—would contravene clearly established law as of 2009.”) Blazek v. City of Iowa City, 761 F.3d 920, 926-31 (8th Cir. 2014) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I concur in the court’s opinion insofar as it affirms the denial of qualified immunity to Officers Santiago and Roth for their act of jerking Blazek from the floor and dismisses the appeal of Blazek’s state-law claims. However, I respectfully dissent from the court’s decision to grant qualified immunity to the officers for their use of force to handcuff Blazek, which a reasonable jury could conclude caused a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. . . .Considering the totality of the circumstances—including Officer Santiago’s lack of suspicion that Blazek had committed a crime, the fact that Blazek was wearing a bath towel, the degree of Blazek’s passive resistance, and the extent of his injuries—a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers’ applications of force during the entire sequence of events—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . This brings me to the legal issue on which the court and I disagree: whether the constitutional right implicated by Blazek’s handcuffing was clearly established at the time of the incident. This determination requires discerning whether ‘[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . A plaintiff need not show that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,’ . . . but he must establish that the unlawfulness was apparent in light of preexisting law. . . . This circuit applies a ‘flexible standard’ in conducting this inquiry, ‘requiring some, but not precise factual correspondence with precedent, and demanding that officials apply general, well-developed legal principles.’ . . . Judged by this standard, Officers Santiago and Roth violated a clearly established constitutional right. Kukla, a then-existing precedent in this circuit, and the analogous decisions of our sister circuits demonstrate as much. By distinguishing Kukla on its facts, . . . the court mandates too much factual correspondence between past cases and the present scenario. Kukla is far more analogous to this case than the court allows. . . . That the constitutional right at issue was clearly established is further supported by the then-existing views of our sister circuits. The First, Second, and Sixth Circuits have reached similar conclusions to that in Kukla, and the First Circuit even cited Kukla in doing so. . . . Notwithstanding Kukla and other analogous decisions, the court artificially separates an unbroken sequence of events that involved multiple applications of force—grabbing, twisting, throwing, jumping on, holding, and jerking—to grant qualified immunity for all but one of these uses of force. The court takes this step even though we cannot determine which use (or uses) of force caused Blazek to suffer a separated shoulder, a torn rotator cuff, and a fractured ankle. The court justifies its unusual bifurcation of this incident by concluding that of the applications of force at issue here, a reasonable officer would have understood that only one of them—the jerking—violates the Constitution. Because precedent clearly establishes that a reasonable officer would not draw this distinction, I respectfully dissent.”)

Hemminghaus v. Missouri, 756 F.3d 1100, 1114 & n.12 (8th Cir. 2014) (“‘At least five circuits have concluded that, because Pickering’s constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered “clearly established” for purposes of ... qualified immunity.’ Bartlett v. Fisher, 972 F.2d 911, 916 (8th Cir.1992). . . . This is not to say Pickering balancing never allows for clearly established law in the qualified immunity analysis.”)

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 739, 743 (8th Cir. 2014) (“We begin with the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry. In this limited context, Wild concedes that Nord was terminated in violation of his First Amendment rights under the first prong of the investigation. Assuming, without holding, that this is true, we conclude that step one of the qualified immunity analysis has been sufficiently established for purposes of further inquiry. Despite this concession, Wild contends that given the circumstances of this dispute, qualified immunity nonetheless protects him because his act of terminating Nord did not violate a ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional right[] of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Based upon the foregoing analysis, we conclude that use of the Pickering/Connick balancing test is clearly called for in this dispute. And, based upon the use of such test, we conclude (1) that at least some of Nord’s campaign speech does not merit First Amendment protection; (2) that even if Nord’s speech was fully protected by the Constitution, Wild could have reasonably believed that the speech would be at least potentially damaging to and disruptive of the discipline and harmony of and among co-workers in the sheriff’s office and detrimental to the close working relationships and personal loyalties necessary for an effective and trusted local policing operation . . . and, the above-mentioned adverse employer-employee circumstance did not need to become manifest in order to be acted upon promptly by Wild. . . (3) that applying the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry, and considering North Dakota law and well-established state and federal jurisprudence, and especially the advice given by the Walsh County attorney and its human resources consultant, Sheriff Wild could have logically and rationally believed that his decision to terminate Nord was well within the breathing room accorded him as a public official in making a reasonable, even if mistaken, judgment under the circumstances. . . and thus (4) that Wild, as a matter of law, is entitled to qualified immunity to shield him from any liability claimed to have arisen through violation of the First Amendment as asserted by Nord.”)

Nord v. Walsh County, 757 F.3d 734, 747-50 (8th Cir. 2014) (Shepherd, J., dissenting) (“Because the Pickering/Connick test informs the first step of the qualified immunity analysis and the majority has already acknowledged that the first step has been met, in my opinion, the majority erred in stating that ‘we must determine whether or not Nord’s particular speech was protected by the First Amendment,’ ante at 5, and, thus, was mistaken in its conclusion that, under the Pickering/Connick balancing test, Nord’s rights were not clearly established. Consistent with a proper qualified immunity framework, I would hold that Nord’s First Amendment rights were clearly established and the qualified immunity defense fails. . . . Even if we were to consider Nord’s positional status and apply the Elrod/Branti test instead, I find unpersuasive the majority’s reliance on a Fourth Circuit case in determining that Nord holds a position of confidence. This court has acknowledged that although ‘other circuits have determined that deputy sheriffs held policymaking positions and could be transferred for political reasons, ... these cases are not controlling here because they turned on state law provisions in different jurisdictions.’. . . We have to look to the applicable state laws and the actual duties assigned to deputy sheriffs in Walsh County, North Dakota to determine whether political affiliation is essential to Nord’s effective performance of his position as deputy sheriff. . . . Here, Nord’s duties included the routine tasks of general police work, prevention and detection of crime, protection of life and property, and the performance of duties as assigned. Nothing in the Walsh County Deputy Sheriff’s job description empowers the deputy with any discretionary function nor can it be said, based on this job description, that the deputy sheriff ‘performs virtually all the duties attendant to the actual duties of the sheriff himself.’”. . . Viewing the deputy sheriff and sheriff’s relationship in the abstract is insufficient to establish the type of relationship necessary under Elrod/Branti. . . . Nord was fired in violation of his First Amendment rights which were clearly established under the law. He did not hold a confidential or policymaking position, nor is political affiliation essential to the performance of his duties. Accordingly, the Appellants have failed to satisfy the elements of the qualified immunity defense.”)

Edwards v. Byrd, 750 F.3d 728, 731 (8th Cir. 2014) (“The facts that the district court found to be supported by the record for the purpose of summary judgment would support a claim of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . The district court found for the purpose of summary judgment that, immediately before the guards entered Pod B, the plaintiffs were lying submissively, face-down, in the pod. The guards could see this through the window in the pod door. . . . The plaintiffs did not resist or otherwise act aggressively. Nevertheless, the guards employed a flash-bang grenade in close quarters, kicked the compliant detainees, and shot them with bean-bag guns. These facts, if proved, could show that the guards did not apply this force in order to restore order or discipline but rather for the sole—and impermissible—purpose of inflicting unjustified harm on the detainees. At the time of the incident, it was clearly established that such conduct would violate the Eighth Amendment's proscription of cruel and unusual punishment.”)

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307, 325, 326 (8th Cir. 2014) (“Long before the actions of supervisors in this case, the Supreme Court had recognized employee rights to be free from racial harassment and retaliation in Jones, 541 U.S. at 383, and CBOCS, 553 U.S. at 451. In light of this preexisting law it was readily apparent that a ‘continuous racially invidious climate’ in a penitentiary, Snell, 782 F.2d at 1099, and undertaking ‘systematic[]’ retaliation following complaints, Kim, 123 F.3d at 1052, would violate clearly established rights. . . .The black officers presented evidence here that the Nebraska penitentiary’s own administrative regulation 112.07 recognized that inflammatory racial comments and jokes violate employee rights. Any reasonable supervisor would have recognized that racial slurs and remarks like those used here would illegally affect the working environment. . . .As in the prison in Snell, there is also evidence that conduct by the supervisors at the Nebraska penitentiary caused black guards to question whether white officers would come to their aid if they were in danger. . . .The evidence in this case is nearly identical to that shown to violate the law in Allen, including black officers being monitored more closely than white employees and told not to congregate in the yard, receiving baseless citations, and being denied career advancement opportunities. . . .We conclude that existing precedent put the supervisors on notice that such actions would violate constitutional rights. A reasonable prison supervisor would have understood that permitting and participating in racially derisive remarks and assigning inferior work assignments would violate the black officers’ rights under §§ 1981 and 1983. Based on the record evidence, Sergeant Miles has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the black officers’ harassment claims, nor have Lieutenants Stoner and Haney shown they are entitled to qualified immunity on the retaliation claims of Officer Ellis.”)

Spencer v. Jackson County Mo., 738 F.3d 907, 913 (8th Cir. 2013) (“The right of an inmate to file a lawsuit is well established, . . . as is an inmate’s First Amendment right to access the prison grievance process Since Spencer has raised genuine issues of material fact as to whether defendants violated his First Amendment rights, the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to the defendants was premature and must be reversed.”)

Burton v. Arkansas Secretary of State, 737 F.3d 1219, 1236, 1237 (8th Cir. 2013) (“We have not yet addressed whether a plaintiff may bring a retaliation claim for complaining of discrimination ‘under the guise of equal protection’ pursuant to § 1983. . . . We conclude that the district court ‘erred in denying [Chief Hedden] qualified immunity on [Burton’s] equal protection claim for retaliation [under § 1983].’ . . . ‘The right to be free from retaliation is clearly established as a first amendment right and as a statutory right under Title VII; but no clearly established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation.’ . . . We have only recognized that ‘§

1983 provides a vehicle for redressing claims of retaliation on the basis of the First Amendment.’ . ‘Because no established right exists under the equal protection clause to be free from retaliation, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity on [Burton’s] equal-protection retaliation claim.’”)

Scott v. Baldwin, 720 F.3d 1034, 1037 (8th Cir. 2013) (“The plaintiffs cite no authority that clearly required Baldwin to recalculate their release dates within a certain time. Under the circumstances, the law did not fairly warn him that the amount of time spent recalculating thousands of release dates, including the plaintiffs’, recklessly disregarded their constitutional right to release. . . Because Baldwin’s conduct was not clearly ‘unlawful in the situation he confronted,’ he is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 972-74 (8th Cir. 2013) (“The qualified immunity defense is available for ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. See Gorman v. Bartch, 152 F.3d 907, 914 (8th Cir.1998); Lue v. Moore, 43 F.3d 1203, 1205 (8th Cir.1994). Therefore, the officers were entitled to summary judgment unless Roberts produced evidence showing the officers violated a clearly established right under these statutes. . . . Taking all disputed facts in Roberts’s favor, nothing in the law clearly established the ADA and Rehabilitation Act applied to the undisputed circumstances of this case. No reasonable officer could have known the ADA and Rehabilitation Act imposed a duty on the officers to accommodate Roberts’s disability while the officers were attempting to secure Roberts and take him into custody for his own safety and the safety of the officers and Roberts’s family. . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Roberts’s ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims. . . . [On Fourth Amendment claim] The district court found a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether Roberts posed an objectively reasonable threat of violence during the entire encounter. Some evidence intimates Officer Martinec fired his weapon at Roberts several times, paused, and fired several more times, possibly shooting Roberts in the back. We are bound by the district court’s evidence-supported factual findings for purposes of Officer Martinec’s appeal.”)

S.L. ex rel. Lenderman v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept. Bd. of Police Com’rs, 725 F.3d 843, 853, 854 (8th Cir. 2013) (“We conclude that conspiring to prevent a plaintiff from bringing a viable § 1983 action by covering up a false arrest . . . may amount to a violation of a clearly established right. . . . A reasonable officer would be aware that it is impermissible to assist in falsifying an arrest report or hinder an investigation into the underlying misconduct. Nor is this a circumstance in which officers unwittingly accepted a falsified arrest report or disclosed details of an investigation. Rather, Isshawn–O’Quinn instructed Lorthridge to fabricate portions of the report, resulting in her inserting a false witness, false place of arrest, and false incident summary. He then approved the modified report without question or comment. Drawing ‘reasonable inferences in [S.L.’s] favor,’ . . . the record similarly supports that Harris disclosed confidential information to Arnold in order to assist her in concealing facts sought by investigators. We conclude that the material facts identified by the district court and the record viewed in the light most favorable to S.L. would support a conclusion that Harris and Isshawn–O’Quinn conspired with Arnold and Lorthridge to prevent S.L. from filing a § 1983 action following her false arrest, which amounted to participation in a § 1983 conspiracy. The record at this stage is sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that Harris and Isshawn–O’Quinn violated S.L.’s clearly established constitutional rights, and the district court accordingly did not err in denying qualified immunity to them.”)

Hess v. Ables, 714 F.3d 1048, 1052, 1053 (8th Cir. 2013) (“There are two primary obstacles to Leshner’s capacity to serve as clearly established law for the purposes of this qualified immunity analysis. First, Leshner’s holding establishes that a municipal employer cannot attempt to compel one of its employees to relinquish his Fourth Amendment rights. But as Hess concedes, it was a state trooper, not her employer the City, who requested the ostensibly unreasonable search. Second, there was no coercion under threat of termination; neither Lawson nor Ables ever threatened Hess in an attempt to convince her to voluntarily undergo an unconstitutional search. Although Lawson directed Hess to leave work and go to Trooper Chastain’s office, Hess does not allege that Lawson told her to go to the police station and submit to a drug test or that Lawson warned her she would be fired if she refused such a test. Instead, it was only after Hess had refused the test that Lawson conferred with Ables and terminated Hess’s employment. Hess argues that these differences are too minute to matter, but ‘the right allegedly violated must be defined at the appropriate level of specificity.’ . . . While ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,’ prior cases must give officers ‘fair warning that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional.’ . . . Leshner simply does not provide fair warning. In light of existing law on February 23, 2010, it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in the position of Lawson or Ables that it was unconstitutional to fire someone after she refused a state trooper’s request to take a drug test for law enforcement purposes. Accordingly, we agree with the district court’s conclusion. Even assuming the termination violated Hess’s Fourth Amendment rights, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that such an action was unconstitutional, and therefore the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1212-14 (8th Cir. 2013) (“Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Atkinson, we decide the unlawfulness of Sanders’ charging Atkinson ‘would be clear to a reasonable officer’ in Sanders’ situation. . . . On August 31, 2007, Sanders had ‘fair warning’ that charging at a non-resisting individual without first identifying himself as a police officer was unconstitutional in the context of an arrest. . . . We doubt a reasonable officer in Sanders’ position would have needed to ‘consult[] a casebook,’ . . . to recognize the unreasonableness of using enough force to cause three broken ribs, a punctured lung, and repeated pneumothorax against a man who was objectively using peaceful means to prevent a fight. . . . Even if the conduct which cast Sanders in the role of ‘irate’ stranger was itself reasonable, a reasonable officer finding himself in that role would have sought to pacify—not escalate—the tense situation. A reasonable officer would recognize that his own conduct—shoving a father who was trying to extract his son from a fight and announcing ‘I’m the motherf[—] er who says who does what around here’—directly contributed to the tense situation. But had Sanders perused the United States Reports on August 31, 2007, he would have discovered the Supreme Court’s 1989 decision in Graham, showing his extreme use of force against Atkinson was unconstitutional. . . . The ‘linchpin’ of our decision is not that Sanders should have known the Fourth Amendment required him ‘to identify himself as an officer before using force to carry out an arrest in public.’ . . . We deny Sanders qualified immunity because as in Gainor, Lambert, Kukla, and Samuelson, there is a genuine dispute of material fact whether any of the three Graham factors reasonably justified slamming Atkinson into the side of a truck with enough force to break three ribs and puncture a lung. Our emphasis on Sanders’ failure to identify himself flows directly from Graham’s third factor: it is convincing evidence that Atkinson was neither ‘actively resisting arrest [n]or attempting to evade arrest by flight.’ . . . Had Sanders clearly identified himself and Atkinson still intervened or refused to return the cell phone, Sanders might reasonably expect Atkinson would ‘actively resist[] arrest,’ . . . But if Atkinson’s account is accepted, then Sanders could not reasonably expect active resistance to an unidentified officer. It is not for us, at the summary judgment stage, to construe the evidence in Sanders’ favor.”)

Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1219, 1220 (8th Cir. 2013) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The doctrine of qualified immunity requires an exercise of judicial restraint that sometimes can be discomfiting. Even when a court believes that a defendant violated the constitutional rights of a plaintiff, the court is required to dismiss the plaintiff’s claim if the unconstitutionality of the defendant’s conduct was not clearly established. Perhaps this is an appropriate case in which to announce a rule that a police officer must identify himself before using more than de minimis force to complete an arrest, if it is reasonable to believe that self-identification would obviate the need to use force. . . . But the rule announced by the court today was not clearly established in 2007, and the putative unlawfulness of Sanders’s action was not apparent under pre-existing law. . . . I would affirm the judgment.”)

Stickley v. Byrd, 703 F.3d 421, 423, 424 (8th Cir. 2013) (“Stickley broadly asserts that the denial of adequate toilet paper violated his constitutional rights. We must, however, review the totality of the circumstances at issue. . . . Although Stickley exhausted his supply before receiving an additional roll the following week, he was not always without toilet paper. When he did run out of toilet paper, he was able to clean himself by taking a shower. The Seventh Circuit has concluded that a prisoner’s deprivation of toilet paper for five days, though ‘merit[ing] some management criticism,’ did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . This holding is consistent with our precedent. . . . We conclude that, given the amount of toilet paper afforded him, the limited time in which he went without toilet paper, and his ability to attend to his hygiene needs at those times, Stickley’s constitutional rights were not violated by the denial of additional toilet paper. . . . Whether the denial of a request for additional toilet paper or similar hygiene items might in some circumstances constitute a constitutional violation is a question we need not resolve today. We hold only that, in the circumstances presented in this case, the Defendants’ refusal to grant Stickley’s request for additional toilet paper did not violate any clearly established right. Accordingly, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Sutton v. Bailey, 702 F.3d 444, 449 (8th Cir. 2012) (“[T]he issue here is qualified immunity from Sutton’s claims of inadequate pre-termination process. Appellants were aware of the University’s grievance procedures, but they were not responsible for their adequacy. Appellants provided Sutton the essential elements of the pre-termination hearing Loudermill and our cases applying Loudermill required. It was reasonable for them to assume that Sutton, if he wished to contest the termination, would file a grievance and that the grievance procedures would comport with the minimum post-termination procedures that the Due Process Clause mandates. . . . Whether the University’s post-termination process was so inadequate that due process required more than an informal pre-termination hearing is an uncertain issue that turns on ‘a balancing of the competing interests at stake’ in a particular case. . . . Because the constitutional adequacy of post-termination procedures therefore cannot be assessed in a vacuum, the possible inadequacy of the post-termination procedures Sutton failed to invoke cannot, as a matter of law, be a proper basis for denying qualified immunity from individual-capacity damage claims based entirely on the alleged inadequacy of the pre-termination process the decision-makers provided.”)

Winslow v. Smith, 696 F.3d 716, 738, 739 (8th Cir. 2012) (“Defendants do not dispute that the right to be free from the use of false evidence to secure a conviction was clearly established in 1989, nor could they. . . . Instead, the parties dispute whether reasonable officers in 1989 should have known that recklessly investigating a crime violated clearly established law. We have previously addressed this issue in Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946 (8th Cir.2001). In Wilson, the plaintiff brought a section 1983 civil rights action against law enforcement officials for their conduct in a murder investigation which led to his wrongful conviction. We affirmed the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to the defendants, recognizing that ‘the liberty interest involved ... is the interest in obtaining fair criminal proceedings.’ Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. In Wilson, we noted such a right had previously been recognized in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87, 83 S.Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963), where suppression of exculpatory evidence violated due process, and Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. at 269, 79 S.Ct. 1173, where use of false evidence at trial violated due process. Wilson, 260 F.3d at 956 n. 8. As a result, ‘[l]aw enforcement officers, like prosecutors, have a responsibility to criminal defendants to conduct their investigations and prosecutions fairly.’ Id. at 957. Here, the district court held that the right to be free from a reckless investigation was not clearly established in 1989. In reaching this result, the district court interpreted Wilson as not deciding whether a right to be free from reckless investigatory police work was clearly established in 1986 because the appellants ‘[did] not challenge the district court conclusion that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.’ The district court is correct that in Wilson the appellants conceded that ‘intentional acts of failing to investigate other leads would violate due process.’ Wilson, 260 F.3d at 955. However, the appellants still argued that ‘allegations or evidence of recklessness [were] insufficient to state a claim.’ Id. We rejected their argument and held that the plaintiff’s claim based on a reckless investigation in 1986 was actionable. Id. at 957. Pursuant to Wilson, then, a due process right against a reckless investigation was clearly established in 1986. As a result, Plaintiffs’ right to be free from a reckless investigation was clearly established three years later in 1989.”)

Williams v. Herron, 687 F.3d 971, 978 (8th Cir. 2012) (“Herron attempts to distinguish his case on appeal by arguing that we must limit our clearly established right analysis to cases involving section 1983 and qualified immunity; he further asserts that the type of claim brought by Williams has never given rise to section 1983 liability. We have previously held that section 1983 sexual-harassment claims are treated the same as sexual-harassment claims under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. See Moore v. Forrest City Sch. Dist., 524 F.3d 879, 883 (8th Cir.2008); Weger v. City of Ladue, 500 F.3d 710, 717 n. 4 (8th Cir.2007); Tuggle v. Mangan, 348 F.3d 714, 720 (8th Cir.2003); see also Wright, 417 F.3d at 884–85 (listing cases). It should be no surprise that we apply the same treatment here, making Title VII sexual-harassment cases relevant to our determination. As explained above, a qualified-immunity analysis does not augment a plaintiff’s burden to show her hostile-work-environment claim. Thus, because our claim analysis is the same regardless of whether qualified immunity is implicated, we may rely on cases not involving qualified immunity when determining whether a violation is clearly established.”)

Burke v. Sullivan, 677 F.3d 367, 372 (8th Cir. 2012) (“Because the instant matter concerns a claim of qualified immunity, not a motion to suppress evidence, we need not reach the issue of whether the officers violated the dictates of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Based on the several facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for them to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke’s home was lawful under either the emergency aid exception or the community caretaker exception. Jay had become highly intoxicated. Jay refused to leave the neighbor’s party. Jay would not cooperate with Burke when she tried to take him home and was verbally abusive to Burke. Jay forcefully pushed Burke against a wall. Jay was involved in a physical altercation with one of the party guests, seriously biting him. Jay kicked and broke a table. Jay was known to use illegal drugs and may have been under the influence of illegal drugs. Jay went into Burke’s house across the street immediately before the officers’ arrival. There was no response when the officers attempted to contact Burke by knocking on her door, shouting, shining a flashlight inside, and telephoning the residence. Burke, who had been thrown against a wall by Jay, was now in the home alone with a violent suspect. When viewed collectively, these facts could lead a reasonable police officer to conclude there was either a threat of violence or an emergency requiring attention. . . . Contrary to Burke’s assertion, Smith v. Kansas City, Mo. Police Department, 586 F.3d 576 (8th Cir.2009) does not dictate a different result. In Smith, we determined a police officer was not entitled to qualified immunity when the officer entered the home of an unarmed domestic violence suspect without a warrant. . . . In reaching our decision, we gave significant weight to the fact the officer had no information any victim or potential victim was inside the home. . . . In Burke’s case, the officers had specific information a potential victim, Burke, was inside the home with Jay, the violent suspect, whose erratic behavior generated the domestic disturbance call. Jay had already been involved in violent encounters with Burke and LaRose. Given these facts, it was reasonable for the officers to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke’s home was lawful. . . . In addition, our court did not decide Smith until November 2009, over four months after the officers entered Burke’s home. As such, Smith was not part of the established law when the officers entered Burke’s home.”)

Wagner v. Jones, 664 F.3d 259, 273-75 (8th Cir. 2011) (“The Supreme Court decided Rutan in 1990. Dean Jones does not contend that either the full-time or adjunct LAWR positions were policymaking or confidential positions and acknowledges that Wagner had a First Amendment right not to have her hiring decision based on her political beliefs and associations. Thus, Wagner has met her burden to prove that, at the time the hiring decisions were made, the law was clearly established that an employee seeking employment with the state cannot be denied a job based on her political associations or beliefs unless the position is a policymaking or confidential position. Because Wagner has shown that the First Amendment generally prohibits a state from basing its hiring decision on political beliefs or associations, the question now is ‘whether a reasonable [dean] could have believed [not hiring Wagner] to be lawful, in light of clearly established law and the information [that the dean] possessed.’ . . . Dean Jones had several indications that Wagner’s political beliefs and associations may have played a role in the faculty’s hiring decisions. Only one law school faculty member out of 50 is a registered Republican. As dean, Dean Jones generally should have been aware of her faculty’s point of view and its political tendencies. Associate Dean Andersen contacted Dean Jones before Wagner interviewed for the full-time position and relayed Wagner’s concerns about whether her politics would make it difficult for her to be hired. Dean Jones apparently did nothing to ensure that the faculty did not impermissibly consider Wagner’s politics in making its recommendation as to whom she should hire even though Dean Jones was present for the faculty discussion on January 25, 2007. After the faculty voted not to recommend Wagner for the full-time position, Associate Dean Carlson sent an e-mail to Dean Jones questioning whether Wagner’s politics played a role in the faculty’s vote and if Wagner’s politics would play a role in voting on whether she could teach the summer LAWR program or serve as an adjunct. Dean Jones apparently completed no further investigation other than speaking to Associate Dean Carlson. More importantly, Dean Jones took no steps to ensure that the faculty did not take Wagner’s political associations and beliefs into consideration when the faculty voted on whether to recommend her for an adjunct LAWR position. Dean Jones supported Wagner’s serving as an adjunct instructor because she asked Janis to follow up with Wagner to determine whether she was interested in the adjunct position. But Dean Jones refused to hire Wagner and instead relied on the faculty’s recommendations. Dean Jones did not provide Wagner with any explanation as to why she chose not to hire her for any of the adjunct positions. Dean Jones argues that the University has a standard policy for hiring law school faculty. The Committee receives the applications, screens the candidates, conducts the initial interviews, and then chooses candidates for a full-day interview. The faculty attends the job talk portion of the candidate’s full-day interview and votes on whether to recommend hiring candidates to the dean. Dean Jones argues that as the dean, she has to hire the person whom the faculty recommends and that this has been the practice for the last 50 years. The district court found ‘that Jones acted in strict conformity with longstanding hiring policy’ and ‘deans routinely and consistently exercised no independent personal judgment in making hiring decisions but acted entirely on the advice and recommendations of a Faculty Appointments Committee.’ Wagner, however, presented evidence that at least one other dean in the past 50 years chose not to hire the person whom the faculty recommended. In her deposition, Dean Jones also conceded that she was free to refuse to hire the person recommended by the faculty and would do so in unusual circumstances Whether Dean

Jones had the ability to hire Wagner absent the faculty's vote is a genuine issue of material fact that the jury, not the court, should decide. Furthermore, Dean Jones was notified that the 'process' may not have been working properly and the faculty may have violated the First Amendment, but she still made her hiring decision based solely on the faculty's suggestions. By her own admission, Dean Jones had the ability to hire someone whom the faculty had not recommended but chose not to do so. Dean Jones's conduct confirmed the faculty's recommendations, which a jury ultimately could conclude violated the First Amendment. Consequently, Dean Jones has not shown that a reasonable university dean in her position would have believed that failing to hire Wagner was lawful in light of clearly established law.")

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 402 (8th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e conclude that it was clearly established that a school official may not treat a student differently from her similarly situated peers when such conduct exceeds the scope of professionally acceptable choices and stems from an improper personal motivation. This holding is consistent with decisions from other courts that have denied qualified immunity to a school official accused of discriminating against a student in the absence of a rational basis to do so. . . Our holding is narrow. Looking no further than the face of the complaint and accepting as true all allegations therein, we conclude that the allegations regarding Wright's treatment of J.S.J. state an equal protection violation, and we are satisfied that a reasonable teacher in Wright's position would recognize as much. Accordingly, Wright is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceeding.")

Doe v. Flaherty, 623 F.3d 577, 585 (8th Cir. 2010) ("It was clearly established at the time of the incident in this case that a supervisory school official with actual notice of ongoing sexual abuse against a student was required to take action to investigate and stop the abuse. The plaintiffs do not appear to argue that the notice standard under § 1983 is less stringent than actual knowledge, but to the extent that the issue is raised, no less stringent notice standard was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit as of October 2006.")

Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 461, 462 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, it is plain that if Byus knew all the relevant facts about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs, the unlawfulness of failing to ensure that they received adequate treatment would have been apparent. The more difficult question centers on how much Byus actually knew about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs and the allegedly inadequate treatment they received. As we have said, we may take as given the facts that the district court assumed. . . But the only relevant fact identified in the magistrate judge's proposed findings and recommendations is that Byus sent letters to Langford and Hardin in which he acknowledged receiving letters from them. . . . The district court likely inferred that the letters from Langford and Hardin contained at least some description of their medical needs—Langford's stomach and back pain and Hardin's Charcot foot—and the perceived inadequacy of the treatment they had received to that point. . . . Considering these facts together, and drawing all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the plaintiffs, we are convinced that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established as of the time of the relevant conduct, such that a reasonable supervisory official would have known that his actions were unlawful. That is to say, a reasonable official standing in Byus's shoes would have understood that ignoring Langford's and Hardin's complaints about receiving deficient medical care contravened clearly established principles of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.")

Morris v. Zefferi, 601 F.3d 805, 812 (8th Cir. 2010) ("We believe our decision in this case is controlled by the reasoning of Nelson. The district court did not err in finding the unconstitutionality of Zefferi's alleged conduct should have been obvious to Zefferi based both on common sense and prior general case law. . . . Transporting a pretrial detainee in a small, unsanitary dog cage for ninety minutes, with no compelling urgency and other alternatives available, under the above precedent, sufficiently shows the possible infringement of a clearly established constitutional right to be free from improper punishment.")

Williams v. Jackson, 600 F.3d 1007, 1014 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Here, for purposes of our review, the allegations in the case involve the malicious and retaliatory exposure of inmates to an apparently intended harm without a penological purpose. . . . We do not believe that qualified immunity in this context hinges on the question of whether prior cases referenced the particular, technological manner in which force was applied. Similarly, we do not believe qualified immunity applies simply because the precise degree of harm likely to result was uncertain. As already discussed, the material inquiry is not the degree of harm, but rather, the degree of force applied and the reason for applying that force. . . . [R]easonable officers are on sufficient notice that they may not purposefully expose prisoners to potentially harmful radiation in the complete absence of a penological purpose. Importantly, the record here taken in a light most favorable to Williams shows just such a complete absence of a penological purpose in removing the shield and in failing to deactivate the light immediately upon removal of the shield. Given the reasonable inference that the officers acted maliciously in an effort to cause harm, and the allegations that an injury did result, the correction-officer defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity at this time. Similarly, in this case, the same rationale supports the denial of qualified immunity as to the related claim of deliberate indifference.").

Heartland Academy Community Church v. Waddle, 595 F.3d 798, 807-09 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In response to Heartland's jurisdictional challenge, the Officials try to couch their fact-intensive 'I didn't do it!' defenses in the language of a purely legal argument. The Officials characterize the issue before us as whether the evidence Heartland adduced is sufficient to survive scrutiny under Fed.R.Civ.P. 56. The Officials stress they do not dispute Heartland's evidence, but only challenge its sufficiency to establish violations of clearly established constitutional rights. We decline to elevate the form of the Officials' argument over its substance. . . . The evidence Heartland presented to the district court—if believed—is so outrageous we are presented with a case in which the civil rights defendants acted in a 'plainly incompetent' manner or in 'a knowing violation of a clearly established precedent.' . . . We express no view as to the ultimate truth. But under the version of the facts we must accept as true for purposes of this interlocutory appeal, the Officials knowingly worked with one another to effect the mass removal of HCA students without court orders, with court orders based upon lies, or court orders devoid of probable cause. The Officials deprived Heartland of notice and an opportunity to be heard, and then tried to cover up the Officials' wrongdoing— with false, misleading, and incomplete statements. All of Heartland's relevant constitutional rights were clearly established on October 30, 2001. The state of the law on October 30, 2001, gave the Officials fair warning that effecting or at least conspiring to effect the mass removal of HCA students with bogus ex parte orders potentially would violate Heartland's Fourteenth Amendment rights to family integrity, Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable seizures, First and Fourteenth Amendment rights to free association, and Fourteenth Amendment rights to procedural due process. The Supreme Court has long recognized the constitutional rights the Officials allegedly infringed.”).

Rush v. Perryman, 579 F.3d 908, 914 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Rush’s right to a post-termination name-clearing hearing was clearly established. The district court did not err in denying the Board members’ summary judgment motion on qualified immunity grounds.”).

Bonner v. Outlaw, 552 F.3d 673, 679, 680 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Outlaw’s conduct violated Bonner’s clearly established rights because the law gave Outlaw ‘fair warning’ his conduct was unconstitutional. Over thirty years ago, the Supreme Court in Procunier declared that inmates have a due process right to notice whenever correspondence addressed to them is rejected. . . Outlaw argues he did not have fair notice Procunier applies to packages because Procunier only discussed letters, and he reasonably relied on 28 C.F.R. ‘ 540.13 to support his interpretation of Procunier. We believe, however, such an interpretation of Procunier strains credulity. The reasoning of Procunier clearly applies to all forms of correspondence, even if the decision only discussed letters. There is no valid reason for distinguishing between letters and packages: the inmate’s liberty interest is the same and there is no additional administrative burden involved.”).

Cross v. Mokwa, 547 F.3d 890, 896, 897 (8th Cir. 2008) (“These six plaintiffs allege that the police officers’ actions at 3309 Illinois violated their First Amendment right to protest because the Building Code Violation Enforcement Plan was devised and executed as a prior restraint on protester activities. The district court denied the police officers qualified immunity on these claims, concluding that reasonable police officers should have known that ‘selective and disproportionate use of police power to prevent the occurrence of a protest’ would violate clearly established First Amendment rights, and that plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence that ‘a person of ordinary firmness would be deterred by this State action.’ We disagree. . . . Neither the court nor plaintiffs on appeal cite any authority for the proposition that a policeman’s decision to enforce a traffic law or a provision of the housing code, for example, is unconstitutional if it can be shown that he has enforced that law in a ‘selective’ manner, not to retaliate for the violator’s prior First Amendment protected activity, but to ‘chill’ future First Amendment activity that the violator may be contemplating. We have found no federal appellate case granting or upholding First Amendment relief on this ground. . . . At a minimum, it was not clearly established in 2003 that a police officer could be liable on a ‘prior restraint’ theory for making arrests that were supported by probable cause and then conducting a reasonable search and seizure of a condemned building. For these reasons, the district court's denial of qualified immunity from these First Amendment claims is reversed.”).

Stufflebeam v. Harris, 521 F.3d 884, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2008) (“[T]he primary question, one not addressed by the district court or carefully analyzed by the parties on appeal, is whether Arkansas law permits a police officer to arrest a person for refusing to identify himself when he is not suspected of other criminal activity and his identification is not needed to protect officer safety or to resolve whatever reasonable suspicions prompted the officer to initiate an on-going traffic stop or Terry . . . stop. . . . We conclude it does not. . . . Here, Harris acted contrary to the plain meaning of Rule 2.2(b) and the law of Arkansas as clearly established in Meadows by prolonging the detention and then arresting Stufflebeam, a passenger not suspected of criminal activity, because he adamantly refused to comply with an unlawful demand that he identify himself. . . . On this record, Officer Harris is not entitled to dismissal of Stufflebeam’s claim, either on the merits or based on qualified immunity.”).

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 450 (8th Cir. 2008) (“An officer who acts so far beyond the bounds of his official duties that ‘the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable’ can have fair warning even if there is no factually similar case. . . . It was clearly established by Burton that a guard is not permitted to threaten an inmate with death by means readily at hand. It should have likewise been clear that a guard may not threaten an inmate with death by means of arming, bribing, and inciting other inmates to accomplish that which the guard may not do directly. No reasonable prison guard would have believed that no constitutional right would be violated by such conduct, and thus the district court correctly denied qualified immunity to Brigrance.”).

Brown v. Fortner, 518 F.3d 552, 561 (8th Cir. 2008) (“We conclude that Fortner had ‘fair warning’ that driving recklessly while transporting a shackled inmate who had been denied the use of a seatbelt and ignoring requests to slow down violated the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. There is no question that it was clearly established that subjecting inmates to unreasonable and substantial risk of harm constituted a constitutional violation. . . . While there are not any published cases from our circuit directly addressing deliberate indifference in the context of prisoner transportation, Morgan is on point. . . . The facts in Morgan that were sufficient to support a conclusion that an officer transporting an individual was deliberately indifferent are sufficiently similar to the conduct alleged of Fortner to make it clear to a reasonable officer that the conduct was unconstitutional. Moreover, even discounting Morgan’s significance because it was unpublished, “‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’” . . . Other cases addressing deliberate indifference to the safety of prisoners provided notice that the conduct engaged in by Fortner was unconstitutional, making the right clearly established.”).

Duckworth v. St. Louis Metropolitan Police Dept., 2007 WL 2050857, at *5 (8th Cir. July 19, 2007) (“In the specific context of this case, the superiors were confronted with the situation where no female officers were working the night watch in District One. Captain Filla thought that Special Order 90-S-7 granted her authority to reassign Plaintiffs, as long as she had a ‘sufficient justification.’ . . . Reasonable police administrators could believe that assigning female officers to the night watch was lawful.”).

Lindsey v. City of Orrick, Missouri, 491 F.3d 892, 902 (8th Cir. 2007) (“Although neither the Supreme Court nor this court has considered a completely analogous case—one involving an employee’s dismissal after speech alleging violations of open meetings law that is not our inquiry. In Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), the Supreme Court changed the clearly established law inquiry from a hunt for prior cases with precisely the same facts to asking whether the official had fair notice her conduct was unconstitutional.”).

Richmond v. City of Brooklyn Center, 490 F.3d 1002, 1007, 1009 (8th Cir. 2007) (“The defendants do not dispute on appeal the jury’s finding that Officer Bruce conducted the strip search in an unreasonable manner in violation of Richmond’s Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, we proceed directly to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether the asserted constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, the officers had reasonable suspicion that Richmond was concealing evidence on his person and were in a position to conduct a private, hygienic and non-abusive strip search on the spot, rather than risk Richmond disposing of the evidence during the course of his transportation to the police station. . . . No clearly established legal standards would have put a reasonable officer on notice that, in these particular circumstances, it was objectively unreasonable to lower the handcuffed arrestee’s pants and boxer shorts to accomplish the strip search, rather than to risk loss of evidence by waiting until the arrestee was in an environment where handcuffs were not required.”).

Clemmons v. Armontrout, 477 F.3d 962, 966 (8th Cir. 2007) (“We hold that, under the first prong of Saucier, Investigator Brooks did not violate Clemmons’s constitutional rights, as Clemmons adduced no evidence that Brooks acted intentionally, recklessly, or in bad faith when he failed to disclose the IOC to the prosecutor and failed to investigate Clark’s statement that Bagby murdered Johnson. While Clemmons argues that he demonstrated recklessness by providing evidence that Investigator Brooks received the IOC, failed to interview Clark, failed to interview other eyewitnesses, and failed to include the IOC to the prosecutor, he has offered no explanation for why these actions constitute recklessness as opposed to mere negligence. . . . As a matter of law, we conclude that the undisputed facts establish that Investigator Brooks’s actions were not intentional or reckless. Mere negligence on Brooks’s part by failing to disclose the IOC or investigating another lead is insufficient to deny him qualified immunity.”).

Kahle v. Leonard, 477 F.3d 544, 554 (8th Cir. 2007) (“Without question, then, Kahle’s constitutional right to be protected from being sexually assaulted by a guard was clearly established on December 14, 2002, as was the fact that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of such an assault could be held liable under § 1983. . . . Because a reasonable juror who accepted Kahle’s version of the events could conclude that Malone violated Kahle’s clearly-established constitutional rights by demonstrating deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that she would be seriously harmed by Leonard, the district court's denial of Malone's summary-judgment motion is AFFIRMED.").

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070, 1078 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Major Young was in charge of all inmate crews involved in the Sinai clean-up. As previously discussed, Major Young knew the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm. Despite this known risk, Major Young told the inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of an obviously unstable and live power line. . . . It is well-established in this circuit that 'knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is ... dangerous to his or her life or health' is a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ambrose, we therefore conclude Major Young's conduct was not 'objectively legally reasonable,' . . . and the district court properly denied Major Young qualified immunity.") Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, Minnesota, 429 F.3d 1168, 1174 (8th Cir. 2005) ("In this case, as in Kuha, the officer accompanied the dog, rather than allowing the dog to run loose. Keeping the dog on the lead gave the officer more control over the dog, but it also exposed the officer to greater risk. In both cases, the officer was running with the dog, at night, searching for a person who had fled and whose whereabouts were unknown. Szabla argues that this case is distinguishable from Kuha because Baker used a dog to track a person who may have fled because he was injured or ill, not because he wanted to evade the police. This distinction is indeed relevant to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness of Baker's use of the track command, but it does not demonstrate that any reasonable officer would have known on August 17, 2000, that a prior warning was constitutionally required in these circumstances. Baker is therefore entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.").

Wright v. Rolette County, 417 F.3d 879, 887-89 (8th Cir. 2005) (Bye, J., concurring) ("I concur with the majority as to the facts as alleged by Ms. Wright, if proven true, could support a claim for sexual harassment, but not a claim for constructive discharge. I write separately in regards to section III.D.2 of the opinion, which discusses the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. The majority declares '[t]he right to be free of gender discrimination is clearly established.' This hasty resolution of the clearly established prong ignores the Supreme Court's pronouncements in Anderson v. Creighton. . .and Saucier v. Katz. . . . Although we do not require a precise factual analog to precedent, in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness of specific conduct must be apparent to a reasonably competent official. . . . The importance of this particularized inquiry cannot be discounted because it is the teeth of the qualified immunity defense. Without these teeth, the defense lacks the bite essential in promoting the compelling public policy objectives underlying it. . . . Our case law clearly establishes sexual innuendo or discriminatory conduct is pervasive or abusive when it is both frequent and severe. . . . That is not to say our case law is a model of clarity in the absence of frequent and severe discriminatory conduct. In fact, the line between merely offensive conduct and actionable sexual harassment is blurred where the harassment, though severe, occurs relatively infrequently, or where the complained of conduct, though frequent, is relatively innocuous. But the conduct at issue here is neither infrequent nor innocuous. Thus, if Ms. Wright's allegations turn out to be true, Sheriff Sims's conduct falls within the realm of frequent and severe sexual innuendo and outside the protection of the qualified immunity defense." [footnotes omitted]).

Davis v. Hall, 375 F.3d 703, 719 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Based on Slone and the law of other circuits . . . we have no difficulty concluding that Davis alleged the deprivation of a clearly established right and that a reasonable government actor would know that failing to respond to Davis's requests to be released in keeping with the court order that he possessed was unlawful.").

Burton v. Richmond, 370 F.3d 723, 730 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Assuming arguendo that plaintiffs have shown a constitutional violation, defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity if the alleged right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the complained-of conduct in 1985. . . We believe the constitutional right of children under DFS supervision, yet not within DFS custody, to be free from abuse in a court-ordered placement was not clearly established in 1985. Courts have split on whether children in the mid-1980s had a clearly established right to reasonable safety while placed in foster care after having been taken into state custody. [citing cases] Given the wide divergence of views on whether the right to protection from abuse was clearly established for children in state custody placed in foster care, we refuse to find that a right to protection while under state supervision, yet not in state custody, was clearly established in 1985. The District Court erred when it ruled that in 1985 plaintiffs had a clearly established constitutional right to be protected from abuse at the hands of a private individual while under state supervision yet not in state custody.").

Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 978 (8th Cir. 2004) ("After substantial discovery, the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, concluding they are entitled to qualified immunity from these claims. The court reasoned that no case has extended liability under Brady to crime laboratory technicians and therefore Villasana failed to show 'that defendants had a clearly established obligation under Brady to disclose exculpatory or potentially exculpatory evidence to the prosecution or to the plaintiff.' Reviewing de novo the question whether the asserted federal right was clearly established, we agree.").

Kuha v. City of Minnetonka, 365 F.3d 590, 601, 602 (8th Cir. 2004) (amending and superceding original panel opinion on reh'g)("Kuha has alleged facts sufficient to survive summary judgment on his Fourth Amendment claim, which is based on the officers' failure to give a verbal warning prior to using a police dog to seize him. The second step of the qualified immunity inquiry will still shield the officers from suit, however, if their conduct was objectively legally reasonable in light of the information they possessed at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Kuha's right to a verbal warning in this case was not clearly established at the time of the seizure. Officers Anderson and Warosh were not on notice that it arguably was constitutionally impermissible to use a police dog against Kuha without a verbal warning under the circumstances of this case. . . . There are no cases from this circuit that mandate such a warning and a review of other circuits offers little guidance on the issue. In most of the published K-9 bite cases, the fighting issue is whether the initial decision to release the dog was objectively reasonable under the circumstances. . . . In those few cases turning on a failure to warn, significant factual differences weigh against charging Officers Anderson and Warosh with notice sufficient to warrant denial of qualified immunity. . . . An officer could conclude, as Officer Anderson testified in this case, that in situations where the location of the suspect is less evident, a warning would place the officers at undue risk from a hiding suspect. We cannot say that ‘no reasonably competent officer’ would have concluded otherwise. . . . Accordingly, Officers Anderson and Warosh are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions in this case.”).

Lawyer v. City of Council Bluffs, 361 F.3d 1099, 1108 (8th Cir. 2004) (“Even if an Iowa court were to conclude later that conduct such as Timothy’s does not violate the statute, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. Police officers are not expected to parse code language as though they were participating in a law school seminar, and a reasonable officer certainly could believe that Timothy’s earnest efforts to induce Michael’s defiance of a lawful command ‘obstructed’ the officer’s duties. Given the lack of detailed judicial guidance on the interplay among the statutory terms ‘obstruct,’ ‘resist,’ and ‘verbal harassment,’ we conclude that the arrest of Timothy did not violate clearly established law.”).

Moran v. Clarke, 359 F.3d 1058, 1061 (8th Cir. 2004) (“Appellants, especially as law enforcement officials, knew or should reasonably have known that the specific conduct outlined by Moran was unlawful. No reasonable official would believe it was permissible to hatch a plan to scapegoat an innocent officer for acts of police brutality against a developmentally disabled citizen. On April 14, 1997, and every day thereafter, such actions were clearly beyond the scope of Appellants’ discretionary authority. . . . Appellants arguments based on Albright are unavailing. They argue that because the Supreme Court held in Albright that a substantive due process claim would not lie in a malicious prosecution claim, . . . they could not have been on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution. We disagree. As we explained in Moran I, Appellants’ purported actions went well beyond the realm of malicious prosecution. . . . ‘Instead of simply allowing a weakly supported prosecution to proceed,’ Moran asserts that Appellants engaged in a ‘purposeful police conspiracy to manufacture ... false evidence.’”).

Hawkins v. Holloway, 316 F.3d 777, 788 (8th Cir. 2003) (“Although the sheriff faults the district court for failing to cite to any case that is factually similar, it was not necessary for the court to do so because Sheriff Holloway’s alleged conduct was so far beyond the bounds of the performance of his official duties that the rationale underlying qualified immunity is inapplicable. . . . No reasonable official in the sheriff’s shoes could have thought it within his duties to threaten his employees with deadly force.”).

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 904, 905 (8th Cir. 2002) (“Although we conclude that the facts establish a constitutional violation, we believe the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that their actions did not violate clearly established law. . . . [T]he relevant authority indicates that prisoners are entitled to very narrow zones of privacy, and circumstances may warrant the most invasive of intrusions into bodily privacy. In light of this authority, we cannot say as a matter of law that it was clearly established in 1996 that a highly intoxicated, loud and violent prisoner could not constitutionally be restrained naked outside the view of all but a small number of guards. Thus, the district court should have ruled that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on Hill's Fourth Amendment claim.”).

Treats v. Morgan, 308 F.3d 868, 875 (8th Cir. 2002) (“At the time Treats was sprayed, the law was clearly established that correctional officers do not have a blank check to use force whenever a prisoner is being difficult. . . . Prison regulations governing the conduct of correctional officers are also relevant in determining whether an inmate's right was clearly established. Hope, ___ U.S. at ___, 122 S.Ct. at 2517. The ADC regulations authorize use of pepper spray only when an inmate is threatening physical harm, refuses to produce an item, or refuses to relocate, . . . and the regulations prohibit its use without warning, . . . or as punishment. . . . The ADC promulgated these rules to regulate the conduct of correctional officers, and Treats has presented evidence that appellants violated each of them.”).

Meloy v. Bachmeier, 302 F.3d 845, 849 (8th Cir. 2002) (“We conclude Bachmeier's adherence to Dr. O'Neill's order that the prison need not provide Meloy a CPAP was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in place at the time of her adherence. Bachmeier had some medical training as a nurse, but she was functioning in an administrative role. Bachmeier was not responsible for examining Meloy or treating him herself. Although Meloy personally told Bachmeier about his condition and his need for a CPAP, Bachmeier relied on the opinion of prison doctors, who had more medical training, about the necessary treatment for Meloy's OSA. Bachmeier followed Dr. O'Neill's order that a CPAP was unnecessary, and followed the cardiologist's order that the prison should provide one. As for Bachmeier's liability in her role as a supervisor, we cannot say the law was clearly established that Bachmeier's failure to override Dr. O'Neill's treatment order constituted deliberate indifference to any Eighth Amendment violation by him. The law does not clearly require an administrator with less medical training to second-guess or disregard a treating physician's treatment decision. Because the law was not clearly established that Bachmeier was deliberately indifferent to Meloy's serious medical needs, Bachmeier is entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Omni Behavioral Health v. Miller, 285 F.3d 646, 653, 654 (8th Cir. 2002) (“While there appears to be no reported case dealing with the precise situation before us, to find a right clearly established, ‘it is not necessary that the Supreme Court has directly addressed the issue, nor does the precise action or omission in question need to have been held unlawful.’ However, there must be the ‘requisite degree of factual correspondence’ between the case at issue and previous cases. . . . The only cases that appear to be factually similar to this case involve lawsuits by parents claiming that their liberty interest in the care and custody of their children was violated by child abuse investigations. [citing cases] In each of these cases, the court held the state actor that was investigating child abuse was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The need to continually subject the assertion of this abstract substantive due process right to a balancing test which weighs the interest of the parent against the interests of the child and the state makes the qualified immunity defense difficult to overcome. Moreover, the requirement that the right be clearly established at the time of the alleged violation is particularly formidable. . . Applying the above analysis here, it is clear that the right to occupational liberty, to the extent that it exists at all in this context, does not include a right to be free from child abuse investigations.”).

Foulk v. Charrier, 262 F.3d 687, 702 (8th Cir. 2001) (“By June of 1994, the law was well established that a malicious and sadistic use of force by a prison official against a prisoner, done with the intent to injure and causing actual injury, is enough to establish a violation of the Eighth Amendment’s cruel and unusual punishment clause.”).

Gorman v. Barch, 152 F.3d 907, 915-16 (8th Cir. 1998) (“At the time of Gorman’s arrest in May of 1992, Title II of the ADA had only been in effect for some four months. Despite the clear language of the statute, there was uncertainty about the extent of its coverage. There were no cases addressing its possible application to government agencies like police departments or to the transportation of arrestees. Although there were some cases applying the Rehabilitation Act to prisons, there were none dealing with facts similar to those alleged by Gorman. . . In the intervening years until the Supreme Court decided Yeskey, courts divided on the applicability of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act to state prisons. . . . Under the circumstances, it cannot be said that reasonable police officials in May of 1992 would have known that the actions alleged against the individual defendants in respect to the transportation of a disabled arrestee were subject to, and in violation of, Title II of the ADA or ‘ 504 of the Rehabilitation Act.’”).

Greer v. Shoop, 141 F.3d 824, 828 (8th Cir. 1998) (“We are of the view that the state-created danger theory was an emerging rule of law in this circuit in 1991. Therefore, we assume without deciding, based on the facts accepted for purposes of summary judgment, that Greer has sufficiently alleged a violation of Mora Greer’s constitutional rights pursuant to the state-created danger theory. However, we are not convinced that the law was so clearly established in 1991 that a reasonable official under these factual circumstances would have known that his or her actions were violative of Mora Greer’s constitutional rights. Although a precise factual correspondence with precedents has never been required for a constitutional right to be clearly established, Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1121 (8th Cir.1988), when the distinguishing facts are such that they change the nature of the claim presented, they are relevant to that determination. In this case, the privacy issues that surround a person’s medical condition, specifically when that person is HIV-positive or has AIDS, complicate the application of the state-created danger theory. See Iowa Code Ann. ‘ 141.23 (West, WESTLAW through 1991) (prohibiting non-consensual disclosure of a person’s HIV-positive status). Because of those privacy concerns, we cannot say that in 1991, a reasonable official would have known that failing to inform Mora Greer of Stevens’ HIV-positive status violated her due process rights. It is just as likely that a reasonable official would have thought that disclosing Stevens’ HIV-positive status violated Stevens’ right of privacy. Therefore, we hold that the contours of the state-created danger theory, as applied to the unique facts of this case, were not defined clearly enough in 1991 to remove the defendants' qualified immunity protection.”).

Burnham v. Ianni, 119 F.3d 668, 675, 677 (8th Cir. 1997) (en banc) (“Because this case involves Ianni’s suppression of plaintiffs’ protected speech, plaintiffs have (at least for purposes of summary adjudication) sufficiently established a violation of a constitutional right Here, of course, we have long established, binding precedent totally supportive of plaintiffs’ claims. The Supreme Court and this court have both clearly and directly spoken on the subject on numerous occasions and in years long prior to the 1992 censorship by Ianni. Accordingly, Chancellor Ianni’s “not clearly established” claim must be rejected.”).

Veneklase v. City of Fargo, 78 F.3d 1264, 1269 (8th Cir. 1996) (Veneklase I) (“[U]pon a careful reading of Frisby[v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)], we do not find that its holding defined the outer parameters of ‘focused’ residential picketing. We hold that plaintiffs did not have a clearly established right on October 10, 1991, to picket in a route encompassing the Bovard residence and the two to three homes on either side of it. We further hold that the arrest of plaintiffs by the defendant officers was objectively reasonable in light of the legal rules in existence at the time the action occurred.”).

Bills v. Dahm, 32 F.3d 333, 335 (8th Cir. 1994) (“To determine whether [plaintiff’s] constitutional right to equal protection was violated ... we cannot begin with the generalized inquiry into whether the right to equal protection is clearly established. Instead, we must ask ‘a more particularized’ question ... namely, whether under the circumstances of this case he had a clearly established right. In other words, we must determine whether he had a clearly established right to be offered the same opportunities [privilege of overnight child visitation] afforded prisoners confined within the Nebraska Center for Women.”).

Sellers v. Baer, 28 F.3d 895, 900 (8th Cir. 1994) (“As was the case in Anderson, the plaintiffs here have stated the constitutional right allegedly violated at too high a level of generality. It is particularly important for a complaint alleging a violation of substantive due process to state with particularity the precise nature of the alleged violation. [cite omitted] The issue in this case for purposes of qualified immunity is whether reasonable officers in the position of [defendant officers] would have understood they were violating [decendent’s] constitutional rights when they removed him from the fairgrounds, where he had been making a great nuisance of himself, and set him free in a parking lot, near a police station and behind a federal building, away from his companions, without funds, and in an intoxicated state, rather than retain custody and charge him with disorderly conduct.”).

Grantham v. Trickey, 21 F.3d 289, 293 (8th Cir. 1994) (“Our cases recently have reached different conclusions on the question of when an individual’s right to free speech in public employment is ‘clearly established’ for the purposes of qualified immunity. We have held that ‘when Pickering’s fact-intensive balancing test is at issue, the asserted First Amendment right “can rarely be

Hollamon v. County of Wright, No. 22-CV-2246 (KMM/LIB), 2024 WL 3653092, at *16-19 (D. Minn. Aug. 5, 2024) (“[T]he Court finds that it was not clearly established as of July 29, 2021, that Sergeant Miller’s use of the pepperball launcher constituted a seizure for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. Consequently, Sergeant Miller is entitled to qualified immunity and Mr. Hollamon’s excessive force claim fails as a matter of law. . . . Eighth Circuit precedent has not illuminated how lower courts ought to resolve a tension in the case law. On the one hand, force used without an intent to restrain (perhaps regardless of the level of force employed) does not constitute a seizure. And on the other hand, caselaw indicates that when an officer uses ‘deadly force,’ a seizure has unquestionably occurred for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. So how does one resolve whether there has been a seizure if the force used could be characterized as ‘substantially likely to cause death or serious bodily injury,’ but the facts demonstrate no objective manifestation of an intent to restrain? For its part, even though Torres involved officers firing live ammunition at a fleeing suspect, the Supreme Court’s decision offers no real guidance for how lower courts should synthesize its objective ‘intent to restrain’ rule, . . . with the Supreme Court’s prior decisions indicating that ‘apprehension by the use of deadly force is a seizure subject to the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment[.]’. . . The answer may be that when an officer fires live ammunition at a suspect, there is necessarily an objective manifestation of an intent to apprehend because such an extreme use of force cannot suggest an intent to disperse to any reasonable person. Indeed, Garner involved an officer’s use of a traditional firearm, as did the Eighth Circuit case cited by Mr. Hollamon—Cole ex rel. Richards v. Hutchins, 959 F.3d 1127, 1132 (8th Cir. 2020). This is not to suggest that shooting live ammunition from a firearm is the only way that officers can employ deadly force. Indeed, very recently, the Eighth Circuit, observed that under some circumstances, the use of ‘less-lethal force’ can be considered deadly force. . . . For less-lethal munitions in particular, the law is simply far from settled on when their use might constitute deadly force and, therefore, necessarily constitute a seizure for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. Notwithstanding this doctrinal lack of clarity, or perhaps due to it, the Court concludes that as of July 29, 2021, a reasonable officer in Sergeant Miller’s shoes would certainly not have known that it was unlawful to use a pepperball launcher to disperse trespassing protestors, nor that using it in the manner he did constituted a seizure through the use of deadly force. Mr. Hollamon has not directed the Court to any authority that clearly establishes an officer’s use of a pepperball launcher for the purpose of dispersing a crowd constitutes a seizure vis-à-vis deadly force, even when pepperballs hit someone in the head. . . . Notably, Dundon held that it was not clearly established in November 2016, that the use of force to disperse, rather than to restrain, constituted a seizure. . . . As the record before the district court in Dundon makes clear, that case involved the use of less-lethal munitions (such as rubber bullets and lead-filled beanbags), resulting in protestors’ sustaining serious bodily injury. . . . [T]he Court finds that Sergeant Miller is entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Hollamon’s excessive-force claim and grants Defendants’ motion for summary judgment with respect to Plaintiff’s First Cause of Action.²⁶ [fn. 26: Mr. Hollamon raises an interesting and important issue regarding the historical underpinnings of the law of qualified immunity and argues that the Court should deny such immunity to Sergeant Miller. . . . Specifically, he points to recent scholarship indicating that the foundation of the Supreme Court’s recognition of qualified immunity rests upon a scrivener’s error that occurred when the law passed by Congress and signed by President Ulysses S. Grant was eventually codified as § 1983. . . . (citing Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Cal. L. Rev. 201, 235 (2023)) . . . According to Plaintiff, the phrase omitted from the bill that was actually signed into law provides the clear congressional intent that common-law immunities do not apply to § 1983 actions. . . . Though this argument sets forth a coherent and compelling rationale for why the Supreme Court and the federal appellate courts might rethink the doctrine of qualified immunity, Mr. Hollamon essentially suggests that this Court should find the doctrine inapplicable despite binding precedent to the contrary. This Court lacks the power to overrule the Eighth Circuit or the Supreme Court.]”)

Wells for next of kin of Locke v. Hanneman, No. 23-CV-273 (ECT/DLM), 2024 WL 3326070, at *4–5 (D. Minn. July 8, 2024) (“Well before February 2, 2022, it was clearly established that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment when he uses deadly force on an armed individual who is moving his gun in compliance with officers’ commands. . . . Applying these rules here shows that Officer Hanneman is not entitled to qualified immunity at the Rule 12(c) stage. According to the Amended Complaint, Amir possessed a handgun, but ‘never raised the handgun in a threatening manner in the direction of any officer or other person.’ . . . And, the Amended Complaint alleges, after Officer Hanneman ordered Amir to show his hands, Amir lowered the firearm’s barrel and muzzle further toward the ground and began raising his left hand. . . . These allegations plausibly show that Amir did not point the firearm at officers or use the weapon in a menacing way and that Amir was attempting to comply with officers’ commands. As explained above, in the form they have been presented on this motion, the body-worn-camera videos do not contradict these allegations. Under Cole and Partridge, among other Eighth Circuit cases, the Amended Complaint’s uncontradicted allegations plausibly show the violation of a clearly established right.. . . Here, as noted, the Amended Complaint allows the plausible inference that Officer Hanneman either saw or should have seen that Amir was not using the handgun in a threatening manner and was attempting to comply with officers’ commands. . . . Discovery may ultimately reveal that ‘[i]t was not practical in that moment for [Officer Hanneman] to discern whether [Amir] was carrying the gun in an unusual manner’ . . . At this stage, “[t]aking the facts in the complaint as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in [Plaintiffs’] favor, [the officer] shot a non-resisting, non-fleeing [individual] as he moved his gun in compliance with [officer’s] commands”)

Cole v. Lockman, No. 21-CV-1282 (PJS/DLM), 2024 WL 328976, at *9 (D. Minn. Jan. 29, 2024) (“Defendants claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that Eck’s and Lockman’s use of pepper spray under the circumstances amounted to either a seizure or an unreasonable use of force. The Court disagrees. As to the seizure: Almost 30 years ago, the Eighth Circuit held that law-enforcement officers seize a person for Fourth Amendment purposes when they surround him and deploy pepper spray against him. . . . Unsurprisingly, then, defendants do not often argue that plaintiffs who have been pepper sprayed have not been seized, and courts typically assume that seizures have occurred and focus instead on the reasonableness of those seizures.”)

Keup v. Sarpy County, No. 8:21-CV-312, 2023 WL 8829298, at *15–16 (D. Neb. Dec. 21, 2023) (“[C]ontrary to Keup’s assertion in his brief that he ‘was observing and assisting in documenting a protest and police activity and otherwise peaceably assembling,’ . . . Keup himself testified that he was merely observing rather than protesting, documenting, or participating in any assembly. Although the Eighth Circuit has stated, ‘It is not beyond the realm of possibility that a First Amendment right to observe police exists,’ . . . Keup does not refer the Court to any Eighth Circuit or Supreme Court precedent that ‘clearly established’ this right in May 2020. Keup contends, ‘Numerous circuit courts have concluded that recording the actions of police officers performing their official duties is encompassed within an individual’s freedom of speech[.]’ . . . Assuming arguendo that the right to record officers is clearly established in three other circuits, Keup’s argument still fails for two reasons. First, Keup was not recording officers; rather, as discussed above, he was merely observing the protest. Second, while ‘in the absence of binding precedent, a court should look to all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits and district courts,’ the Court does not believe that a precedent adopted in only three circuits sets out a standard ‘sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . Thus, Deputy Palmer is entitled to qualified immunity on Keup’s First Amendment retaliation claim. The Court does not need to determine ‘whether the facts shown by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional or statutory right.’ . . . Rather, it is sufficient to hold that Keup’s alleged conduct (observing police) was not ‘clearly established’ as protected by the First Amendment ‘at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct.’ . . . Accordingly, because Keup has failed to adduce sufficient evidence to ‘persuade a jury[.]’ . . . that Deputy Palmer violated any of Keup’s clearly established rights, summary judgment on Keup’s First Amendment retaliation claim against Deputy Palmer is appropriate.”)

Keup v. Sarpy County, No. 8:21-CV-312, 2023 WL 8829298, at *16-19 (D. Neb. Dec. 21, 2023) (“Because the Court holds that neither of Deputy Palmer’s actions—firing a pepper ball at Keup and using force when transporting him to get medical attention—constitute ‘seizures’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, there is no need to consider the ‘reasonableness’ of those actions. . . . Regarding Keup’s first Fourth Amendment theory—that use of the pepper ball constituted a seizure—the Court holds that Palmer is entitled to qualified immunity because it was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged misconduct that ‘a use of force to disperse rather than to apprehend constituted a seizure.’ . . . The reasoning in Dundon applies equally to this case because there is no genuine dispute that Deputy Palmer was trying to disperse rather than arrest Keup. . . . All of this undisputed evidence indicates that the Sarpy County SWAT Team in general and Deputy Palmer in particular were trying to clear an area in Omaha by dispersing (not arresting) individuals within the area. This belies Keup’s contention that ‘[w]hen Palmer shot Keup at least twice with PepperBalls, he seized Keup’ within the clearly established definition of ‘seizure’ at the time, which as discussed above included use of force to arrest but not to disperse. Deputy Palmer clearly intended to disperse Keup when he fired pepper balls at him. The notion that Deputy Palmer was trying to arrest rather than disperse Keup, who all parties agree ‘did not commit a crime,’ . . . is farfetched: right before encountering Keup, Deputy Palmer had been actively engaged in the dispersal of several crowds which undisputedly included ‘violent protestors,’ . . . without attempting to arrest any of them. Deputy Palmer also had no cause to arrest Keup, given that all parties agree that ‘Keup did not commit a crime.’ Indeed, Keup was never placed under arrest. . . However, Deputy Palmer did have cause to disperse Keup, who was present near the protest at the ‘intersection of 72nd and Dodge,’ which undisputedly ‘was closed to the public by law enforcement,’ . . . and ‘had been declared an unlawful assembly by law enforcement.’ . . Thus, the evidence forecloses the possibility that Deputy Palmer deployed pepper balls at Keup in order to apprehend him. Therefore, Keup has failed to adduce sufficient evidence to ‘persuade a jury[]’ . . . that Deputy Palmer used force to apprehend rather than disperse Keup. Accordingly, the Fourth Amendment rights claimed by Keup as they pertain to Deputy Palmer’s use of pepper balls were not ‘clearly established at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct.’”)

Humphrey v. Payton, No. 4:21-CV-00194-LPR, 2022 WL 17821616, at *2-3 (E.D. Ark. Dec. 20, 2022) (“[T]he Fourth Amendment’s objective reasonableness rule is not the only challenge facing Mr. Humphrey. His task is made even more difficult because Trooper Payton invokes a defense known as qualified immunity. Qualified immunity provides government officials like Trooper Payton an additional layer of protection against lawsuits like this one. Essentially, even if Trooper Payton did violate the Constitution, the doctrine of qualified immunity can prevent Mr. Humphrey from successfully suing Trooper Payton. That may seem unfair or illogical. But the Supreme Court has recognized that, because human beings (police officers) enforce our laws, human errors (constitutional violations) are bound to occur; and those tasked with enforcing our laws need latitude to make on-the-spot decisions without fear of enormous civil liability for making a reasonable mistake. . . The historical, structural, and other legal justifications for the qualified-immunity doctrine need not be repeated here. . . The long and short of the precedent is that a police officer can be successfully sued only if the applicable law is so clearly established that the police officer is either utterly incompetent or must have known that his or her conduct violated the law. . . An officer who makes a reasonable mistake of fact or law will not be subject to a lawsuit—even if that reasonable mistake led to a violation of someone’s constitutional rights. . . The Court discusses the facts of this case and the merits of Mr. Humphrey’s claims in great detail below. But here’s the bottom line. Binding Fourth Amendment and qualified-immunity precedents set the bar so low for police officers that Trooper Payton is entitled—by the skin of his teeth—to summary judgment on the claims concerning the propriety of the initial stop and the extension of the stop to bring a drug dog. Mr. Humphrey’s handcuffing claim, however, is a different story. Trooper Payton must stand trial on that claim because (1) he forfeited any summary-judgment argument on the issue, and (2) it was clear to everyone—including Trooper Payton at the time—that the Constitution required Mr. Humphrey to be uncuffed as soon as possible after the search of his U-Haul was finished.”)

A.S. v. Lincoln County R-III School District, No. 4:19 CV 91 CDP, 2019 WL 6875560 (E.D. Mo. Dec. 17, 2019) (“The law is clearly established that students have First Amendment rights both on and off the school campus. But the law is not so clearly established regarding the degree of foreseeability or disruption to the school environment that must be shown under Tinker in order for school officials to limit a student’s off-campus speech. . . Courts continue to face this difficult issue in protecting First Amendment values while being sensitive to a school administrator’s need for a secure school environment. . . Given the uncertainty in this area of the law, I cannot conclude that any reasonable school administrator would have understood that she was violating a student’s right to free speech by imposing punishment in the circumstances of this case. . . Lillard is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on A.S.’s First Amendment claim.”)

Hyman v. Kirksey, No. 3:18-CV-230-DPM, 2019 WL 2323864, at *2 (E.D. Ark. May 30, 2019) (“The Court assumes, for purposes of the motion to dismiss, that Chief Kirksey suppressed the Hymans’ speech. But the governing law wasn’t clear enough when he did so for him to face a lawsuit for his actions. The Supreme Court hasn’t yet spoken on this First Amendment issue. Two U.S. Courts of Appeals have. Davison, 912 F.3d at 666; Robinson v. Hunt County, Texas, 921 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2019). And only one District Court in the Eighth Circuit has addressed this type of claim. Campbell held that a state representative’s Twitter account wasn’t government speech. 367 F. Supp. 3d at 990-92. All these cases, though, were decided in 2019. Chief Kirksey deleted the Hymans’ posts in April 2018. A handful of other District Courts have also wrestled with these First Amendment issues. E.g., McKercher v. Morrison, 2019 WL 1098935, at *4 (S.D. Cal. 8 Mar. 2019); One Wisconsin Now v. Kremer, 354 F. Supp. 3d 940 (W.D. Wis. 2019); Knight First Amendment Institute at Columbia University v. Trump, 302 F. Supp. 3d 541 (S.D.N.Y. 2018), appeal docketed, No. 18-1691 (2d Cir. 5 June 2018). The law is still percolating. The Court therefore cannot hold that the Hymans’ right to be heard on the Department’s Facebook page was clearly established in the spring of 2018. No binding precedent notified Chief Kirksey that selectively deleting citizens’ posts from the interactive part of a Facebook page that invited public commentary clearly violated the First Amendment. The Hymans’ federal and echoing state law claims against him fail as matter of law.”)

Ivey v. Williams, No. CV 12-30 (DWF/TNL), 2019 WL 669805, at *4 (D. Minn. Feb. 19, 2019) (“Defendants argue further that the Kingsley analysis is not appropriate in the context of qualified immunity because the decision was released in 2015, while Defendants’ alleged actions took place in 2011. . . They cite Hall v. Ramsey County to contend that the relevant question for excessive force in the context of qualified immunity is whether the plaintiff can demonstrate ‘both that the official’s conduct was conscience shocking, and that the official violated one or more fundamental rights that are deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.’. . . The Court is unpersuaded. The Eighth Circuit applied the objective reasonableness standard to both qualified immunity and excessive force claims long before the Kingsley decision was released. See e.g., Wilson v. Spain, 20 F.3d 713, 716 (8th Cir. 2000) (asserting that “[t]he linchpin of qualified immunity is the objective reasonableness of the officer’s actions; objective reasonableness is also applied in analyzing the merits of Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims); Nelson v. County of Wright, 162 F.3d 986, 989-990, 990 n.5 (8th Cir. 1998) (observing that the standard for determining qualified immunity is identical to the standard for deciding if the use of force was excessive and that both involve considerations of objective reasonableness). . . The Court finds that whether or not the Magistrate Judge relied on Kingsley, the objective reasonableness standard applies; because reasonable officers in Defendants' position would have likely understood that their conduct was violating Plaintiff's clearly established right to be free from excessive force, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even if the 'shocks the conscience' standard applied, the result is the same. The Supreme Court has observed, the measure of what is conscience shocking is no calibrated yard stick,' but it does 'point the way.' . . . Kingsley held that excessiveness is measured objectively and then identified various considerations to inform whether the governmental action was rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. . . Therefore, 'Kingsley teaches that purposeful, knowing or (perhaps) reckless action that uses an objectively unreasonable degree of force is conscience shocking.' . . Here, a reasonable factfinder could conclude under both an objective reasonableness' or 'shocks the conscience' standard that Defendants' alleged actions were unnecessary and excessive, considering Plaintiff was already subdued and restrained when Defendants entered his room.'")

Parada v. Anoka County, No. CV 18-795 (JRT/TNL), 2018 WL 3621210, at *5-6, *8 (D. Minn. July 30, 2018) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Eighth Circuit has expressly decided whether the Fourth Amendment 'permits a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor when the alleged offense did not occur in the presence of the arresting officer.' . . Although the Eighth Circuit has not decided the issue, it has held that, '[b]ecause the law regarding warrantless misdemeanor arrests for offenses committed outside the presence of the arresting officer is not clearly established under the Fourth Amendment,' arresting officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . Because the law was not clear at the time of the arrest, the Court concludes that Oman is entitled to qualified immunity for any argument based on his lack of presence during Parada's commission of the crime. . . . The Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that unreasonably prolonging a traffic stop and subsequently arresting someone under these circumstances violates the Fourth Amendment. Caballes and Rodriguez clearly establish that a seizure cannot extend beyond the time necessary to issue a traffic ticket. . . And while Parada cannot use Rule 6.01 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation, the Rule is evidence that Oman should know that a full custodial arrest is not necessary – and indeed not even allowed in Minnesota – to issue a citation for driving without a license. The Court concludes that Oman has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Parada's Fourth Amendment claim stemming from the initial arrest. The Court notes that this is the only Fourth Amendment theory that Parada can assert against Oman in his individual capacity. . . . Having established that Parada states a sufficient claim that her Fourth Amendment rights were violated, the Court must decide whether it was clearly established at the time of the arrest that law enforcement cannot detain an alien on suspicion of removability without probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. It is clearly established that a warrantless arrest must be supported by probable cause of criminal activity, that unlawful presence is not a crime, and that an immigrant's possible removability is insufficient to give rise to probable cause. . . It is also clearly established that an ICE Detainer alone cannot support local law enforcement's continued detention of an alien. . . Oman cannot establish at this stage that he is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ferguson v. Short, No. 2:14-CV-04062-NKL, 2017 WL 194282, at *4 (W.D. Mo. Jan. 17, 2017) (“Clearly, Defendants were on notice that it would be a constitutional violation to knowingly use fabricated evidence or unreliable evidence to convict a criminal defendant. But Defendants contend that they also had to know that falsifying evidence through one defendant to use against another defendant was unconstitutional. Qualified immunity, however, is intended to protect officers who do not know that they are doing something wrong. It is not intended to protect them if they knowingly do something wrong. Furthermore, to prove his fabrication claim, Ferguson must show that Defendants could foresee that their actions would injure Ferguson. It would be illogical to place that burden on Ferguson and then excuse the Defendants’ actions because they didn’t know the Court would find them responsible for their unconstitutional conduct under recognized common law standards.”)

Ellington v. Piercy, No. 2:14-CV-04316-NKL, 2016 WL 2745868, at *6-7 (W.D. Mo. May 11, 2016) (“Having considered the precedent behind Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment allegations, the Court finds it ‘beyond debate’ that the erratic operation of a police vehicle—whether a car or a boat—can constitute an objectively unreasonable seizure. Eighth Circuit precedent has established that the manner in which an officer operates his vehicle may cause a Fourth Amendment violation. . . While the Eighth Circuit has not discussed Fourth Amendment seizures in the context of a water transport, Plaintiffs allege that Piercy drove at speeds exceeding 40 miles per hour across a crowded lake in a non-emergency situation. Such driving would bring Piercy’s actions in line with those found unreasonable in Chambers: in both cases, a restrained suspect was subject to erratic driving, causing him physical injury. . . . The novel factual elements of Brandon’s case—that he was being transported in a patrol boat across water and died by drowning—do not affect these underlying legal principles. The United States Supreme Court has ‘expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be “fundamentally similar.”’. . Instead, because the central question of this inquiry is ‘whether the state of the law at the time gave the officials fair warning their conduct was unlawful,’ the ‘contours of a right’ may be sufficiently clear even if the factual situations are different. . . Although Piercy argues there is no clearly-established constitutional right where someone is ‘improperly and incorrectly secured during transport over water after his arrest,’ . . . Piercy does not show how the legal principles differ when a suspect is transported in a boat, as compared to cases where the suspect is transported in a car. The Court cannot say as a matter of law that ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified.’. Consequently, Piercy had fair warning that his conduct was unlawful and cannot shield himself from Plaintiffs’ Section 1983 claim alleging Fourth Amendment violations.”)

Thomas v. Barze, 57 F. Supp. 3d 1040, 1068, 1071-75 (D. Minn. 2014) (“The Court concludes that here, where the idea and execution of the interview was entirely directed by the law enforcement officer rather than the school official, traditional Fourth Amendment principles, rather than the relaxed standards of TLO, apply. The Court will proceed to analyze the evidence in support of Thomas' unreasonable seizure and false arrest claims under traditional Fourth Amendment standards. However, to the extent that, for qualified immunity purposes, it was not clearly established in January 2012 that TLO would not apply in such circumstances in the Eighth Circuit, the Court also concludes that, even under TLO's relaxed standard, summary judgment for Barze and Mills would not be appropriate. . . . Having determined that a reasonable jury could conclude that Barze and Mills violated Thomas' rights under the Fourth Amendment, the Court must also consider whether those rights were clearly established in order to assess Barze's and Mills' claims that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The officers should have known that a private meeting in an inner office which involved a pat-down at some point was excessively intrusive if the purpose of the meeting was to mentor Thomas or merely encourage him to not incite any potential fights. Even Matlock acknowledges that the 'mentoring' meeting turned wrong quickly, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the escalation was due to the officers', rather than Thomas', conduct. If that were the case, a reasonable officer should have known that such a seizure, which involved Thomas being placed into a choke hold, would not have been appropriate in scope given the initial fight-prevention rationale for the meeting. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment for Barze and Mills on Thomas' claims for excessive force and false arrest is not appropriate and that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . With regard to whether it was clearly established that not intervening would violate Thomas' constitutional rights, the Court concludes that any determination on whether intervention was warranted or necessary is contingent upon the jury's determination as to what was happening between Thomas and Barze, which is not yet determined. Given that Defendants have not moved for summary judgment on the excessive force claim against Barze, the Court takes the facts surrounding the physical altercation in a light most favorable to Thomas and concludes that a reasonable officer should have known to intervene and stop another officer from putting a student in a neck restraint or choke hold where such restraint was unprovoked. The Court therefore concludes that summary judgment on Thomas' excessive force claim against Mills is not warranted at this time and that Mills is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Robinson v. City of Minneapolis, 957 F.Supp.2d 1094, 1099 & n.3 (D. Minn. 2013) ("If Defendants caused Robinson only de minimis injuries, they are entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether their use of force was justified ab initio. . . . Robinson argues that endorsing such a result will give police officers 'free license to rough up any suspect, regardless of the need to use force. That is hardly "reasonable" and thus contrary to the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against "unreasonable" seizures.' . . . But 'roughing up' a suspect suggests causing far more than de minimis injury. And in any event, Robinson's concern is illusory. Chambers made clear, for conduct occurring after that case was decided, that the focus is on the force used and not its end result. . . . Hence, officers cannot 'rough up' suspects with impunity going forward. A de minimis injury defense will shield officers from liability only for arrests occurring before June 6, 2011, the date Chambers was decided.")

R.S. ex rel. S.S. v. Minnewaska Area School Dist. No. 2149, 894 F.Supp.2d 1128, 1139, 1140 (D. Minn. 2012) (“The movement of student speech to the internet poses some new challenges, but that transition has not abrogated the clearly established general principles which have governed schools for decades. . . . The law on out-of-school statements by students can thus be summarized as follows: Such statements are protected under the First Amendment and not punishable by school authorities unless they are true threats or are reasonably calculated to reach the school environment and are so egregious as to pose a serious safety risk or other substantial disruption in that environment. R.S.’s Facebook wall postings were not true threats or threats of any kind. While her statements may have been reasonably calculated to reach a school audience, that possible fact is not sufficient to justify her punishment. The school defendants must also show that the statements posed a substantial disruptive effect. . . . [T]he general rule that schools may not regulate merely inappropriate out-of-school speech (as opposed to truly threatening or substantially disruptive speech) has been well-established for decades.”)

Shepard v. Wapello County, 303 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1016 (S.D. Iowa 2003) (“At the time Sheriff Kirkendall discharged Shepard the applicable law was very well developed and gave one in Kirkendall’s position ‘fair warning’ that discharging Shepard because he reported Craven’s alleged misconduct and complained to a County Supervisor that the Sheriff’s budget was inadequate would violate Shepard’s rights under the First Amendment.”).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Bird v. Dzurenda, No. 23-2664, 2025 WL 796114, at *3 (9th Cir. Mar. 13, 2025) (“[B]ecause neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit has ever held that retaliation for complaints against other prisoners violates the First Amendment right to petition for redress of grievances, it is not clearly established law. Officers Paryga and Atherton are thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

D’Braunstein v. California Highway Patrol, No. 22-55237, 2025 WL 779690, at *4, *6-8 (9th Cir. Mar. 12, 2025) (“We hold that construing the facts in the light most favorable to D’Braunstein, a reasonable jury could find that Officer Durazo violated D’Braunstein’s constitutional rights by failing to summon him prompt medical care, considering the serious nature of the collision and his evident symptoms of distress. We further hold that a jury could find that Durazo’s apparent belief that D’Braunstein was not in need of medical attention was based on an unreasonable mistake of fact or judgment. If that is true, Durazo’s failure to summon prompt medical care was a violation of clearly established law, disentitling her to qualified immunity. . . . In this case, it is clearly established that officers must seek to provide an injured detainee or arrestee with objectively reasonable medical care in the face of medical necessity creating a substantial and obvious risk of serious harm, including by summoning medical assistance. . . . Officers may not act with objective deliberate indifference to such a medical need. Any reasonable officer would appreciate this well-established obligation. Durazo nevertheless claims she is entitled to qualified immunity for two main reasons. First, Durazo maintains that the cases in this area only establish the need to provide objectively reasonable medical care when it is the officer’s conduct during the arrest that causes the injury warranting immediate medical attention. . . . [W]e reject this argument. Our law has never limited the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment duties to provide prompt and necessary medical care to those situations in which the medical necessity was occasioned by the officer's own use of force. Instead, we have made clear that this duty exists even if the detainee's injury arose from some other cause. This is not an open legal question. . . . This brings us to Durazo's second argument, which is that there is no case law that would have put Durazo on notice, in the specific circumstances she confronted, of the duty to summon prompt medical care. This argument is misplaced. In the context of a § 1983 claim about the failure to summon timely medical attention, case law cannot tell us whether a certain set of facts suggests a legitimate medical emergency. That is not a question of decisional law, but one of factual perception and on-the-ground judgment. . . . This does not mean qualified immunity is never available to those who make these kinds of determinations in error. We readily agree that '[t]he protection of qualified immunity applies regardless of whether the government official's error is "a mistake of law, a mistake of fact, or a mistake based on mixed questions of law and fact."'. . . But if the law is otherwise clearly established, an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity for a mistake of fact or judgment that is itself unreasonable. . . . To the extent Officer Durazo is arguing that she reasonably believed D'Braunstein did not require medical attention, we have already explained that a jury could find her perception of the facts not only wrong, but objectively unreasonable. . . . It is true that our prior cases may not have involved car accidents or stroke victims. But that degree of specificity is not required. As we recently explained in a case affirming the denial of qualified immunity for failure to furnish adequate medical care, '[i]t is not necessary to have a case involving a heart attack, a case involving appendicitis, or a case involving bowel obstruction for a § 1983 claim based on one of those conditions to survive qualified immunity.' . . . And as we discussed above, whether a certain situation (here, a serious car crash) coupled with certain symptoms (here, physical and mental disorientation and distress) created a medical emergency is a question of factual impression, not one answered by case law. . . . Our fine dissenting colleague therefore misperceives this case. The issue is not, as the dissent writes, whether Durazo properly 'distinguish[ed] between symptoms' of a stroke or drug use, but whether she properly distinguished between whether the situation called for prompt medical attention or not. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to D'Braunstein, a reasonable jury could find that following a major car accident, D'Braunstein—in Durazo's own words—was suffering from a 'serious condition,' which presented a substantial risk of serious harm. We do not 'demand' that officers make 'difficult medical decisions,' as the dissent claims. This case instead involves an officer's basic failure to summon any prompt medical care for someone who had emerged from a major vehicle accident and was exhibiting obvious signs of physical distress and disorientation. Nothing in our decision today imposes any greater obligation—an obligation that the law already clearly imposed if the jury finds the facts in D'Braunstein's favor.") D'Braunstein v. California Highway Patrol, No. 22-55237, 2025 WL 779690, at *9-10 (9th Cir. Mar. 12, 2025) (Lee, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that a jury could find a constitutional violation, construing the facts in D'Braunstein's favor at summary judgment. But I depart from the majority in its 'clearly established' prong analysis of qualified immunity. . .

.Ultimately, the majority opinion relies on the general principle that a law enforcement officer must provide reasonable medical care. True enough. But for qualified immunity, the Supreme Court ‘has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’. . The facts here are tragic, but I believe qualified immunity applies because there was no clearly established law requiring Officer Durazo to call for emergency medical help when there were no obvious and clear signs of an urgent medical necessity. I thus respectfully dissent.”)

Johnson v. Myers, 129 F.4th 1189, 1193-96 (9th Cir. 2025) (“[W]hether appellate jurisdiction exists ‘ultimately turns on the nature of the defendant’s argument on appeal.’. . For us to have jurisdiction over an interlocutory appeal, we must ‘assume[] the version of the material facts asserted by the nonmoving party to be correct.’. . Appellants point to evidence in the record, including body camera footage and dispatch audio recordings, contending that we need not resolve any disputed questions of fact in order to decide whether summary judgment is warranted. ‘We are confined to the question of whether the defendant would be entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, assuming all factual disputes are resolved, and all reasonable inferences are drawn, in plaintiff’s favor.’. . We hold that, so confined, we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal. . . . Officers Beecroft and Muoio had encountered Smith when they responded to the call by Nolan less than four weeks earlier. Muoio recounted that during this encounter, Smith had come out of the apartment, and that Beecroft had had a peaceful conversation with him, ‘buil[d]ing an awesome rapport.’ This time, however, Officer Beecroft made no attempt to establish a rapport with Smith. Instead, as soon as Beecroft kicked down the door, all of the officers immediately shouted overlapping commands. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellees, Smith stopped after taking a few steps forward and began to comply with the command to put his hands up. None of the officers deployed their tasers. None of the officers warned Smith that they were about to use deadly force. Myers began shooting a little less than six seconds after Beecroft kicked down the door. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellees, we conclude that a reasonable juror could conclude that Smith did not pose such ‘an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others’ that the use of deadly force was justified. . . .To determine whether the law is clearly established in excessive force cases, we need to compare the specific facts of the case before us with the specific facts of previously decided cases. We seldom get excessive force cases in which the facts are identical, or nearly identical, to those in previously decided cases. The best we can do is to compare the facts of our case to facts that are sufficiently similar to allow a meaningful comparison. . . .While the facts in this case are not identical to the facts in Glenn, they provide a meaningful comparison that should have put a reasonable officer on notice that it is unreasonable to use deadly force solely because Smith was holding a knife in his right hand and raised that hand across his chest. . . . In summary, Officers Myers and Beecroft shot Smith slightly less than six seconds after Beecroft kicked down the door to his apartment. In the few seconds between kicking down the door and shooting Smith, the officers shouted a number of overlapping commands. The officers made no attempt to talk to Smith or otherwise de-escalate the situation. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellees, Smith had stopped after taking a few steps forward, and was raising his right hand, holding a pocketknife, in compliance with the officers’ command to raise his hands. Nothing in the record suggests that Smith ever pointed the knife at the officers or made any aggressive moves toward them. Finally, the officers never warned Smith that they would use deadly force before shooting him ten times, killing him in the hallway of his apartment. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellees, it was clearly established law that a fatal shooting under these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. At trial, a reasonable jury could perhaps conclude that Officers Myers and Beecroft were justified in using deadly force. But a reasonable jury could equally well conclude that they acted unconstitutionally in using deadly force without warning less than six seconds after kicking down the apartment door, when Smith was standing still in his own hallway and raising his right hand in compliance with the officers' command to raise his hands.”)

Singh v. City of Phoenix, 124 F.4th 746, 750-55 (9th Cir. 2024) (“The facts in this case are closely akin to those in Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864 (9th Cir. 2011), which sufficed to put Smith-Petersen on notice. [court discusses Glen and finds facts in this case are similar to the facts in Glenn in all material respects) . . . [T]he present case is easily distinguished from two other recent opinions from this court. In Napouk v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, No. 23-15726, — F.4th —, 2024 WL 5051193 (9th Cir. Dec. 10, 2024), the decedent held a large object that appeared to the officers to be a machete, . . . whereas here the object was a small pocketknife. In Napouk, the decedent moved the object around and pointed it in various directions. . . By contrast, here, Plaintiff held the pocketknife only to his own throat. There, the decedent continually advanced on the officers. . . and began to move more quickly toward them while telling them to ‘get out of here[.]’. . In this case, Plaintiff said nothing aggressive, never moved quickly, and had stopped at the time he was shot. Cuevas v. City of Tulare, 107 F.4th 894 (9th Cir. 2024), differs from this case even more markedly. In Cuevas, police attempted a traffic stop involving three suspects. . . The suspects led police on a high-speed felony chase, involving an exchange of gunfire. . . Here, Plaintiff was alone, was on foot, had no firearm, and did not attempt to flee. . . Because we hold that Glenn put Smith-Petersen on notice that her use of deadly force plausibly violated Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force, we need not and do not reach Plaintiff’s alternative argument that this this case falls within the ‘obvious case’ exception described in Brosseau v. Haugen[.]”) Puente v. City of Phoenix, 123 F.4th 1035, 1057-59 (9th Cir. 2024) (“To the extent that these Plaintiffs’ individual excessive-force claims overlap with the class’s claims, our earlier analysis governs as well, and those claims fail at the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. However, each of these three Plaintiffs’ situations differs from the class claims in that each of them individually experienced a direct physical impact from a munition fired by a PPD officer. Our earlier analysis finding no ‘seizure’ with respect to the class claims therefore does not carry over to these Plaintiffs’ individual claims based on such physical impacts. However, we need not resolve whether these individual Plaintiffs experienced a temporary ‘seizure’ when they were directly impacted by physical objects that were potentially momentarily disabling. . . Even assuming that they were, we conclude that, based on the undisputed facts, the Defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they acted reasonably under the circumstances or violated no clearly established law. . . .Examining the totality of the circumstances, we conclude
