establishing such an exigency. . . .In short, Brunner did precisely what the Supreme Court has forbade: ‘[T]he Due Process Clause does not permit a State [or one of its officers] to infringe on the fundamental right of parents to make child rearing decisions simply because a state judge [or officer] believes a better decision could be made.’. . . Prong two is thus met. . . .Next, clearly established law. The Supreme Court has not decided many cases on parents’ rights to procedural due process. And I see none finding a violation on materially similar facts. So the McMurrays must show that this is an obvious case to pass prong two. They do. First, as explained above, there’s no evidence of necessity or exigency compelling Brunner to make a split-second reaction. . . .No officer could reasonably have believed that JM was at risk of serious injury any time in the near future. And obviously, neither Brunner himself nor any member of the public faced any danger whatsoever. Second, the facts here are particularly egregious. Weaver performed an illegal search in front of her supervisor (Brunner). And instead of settling for one constitutional violation (the search), Brunner went on to commit two more (unlawfully seizing JM and violating the McMurrays’ due-process rights). And after taking custody of JM, Brunner prevented JM from talking to her father and the Vallejos for a significant amount of time. All while JM was crying and confused. Then CPS told Brunner that his safety concerns were baseless. And still, inexplicably, Brunner persisted and pushed for criminal charges against Mrs. McMurry. Like CPS, a jury of Mrs. McMurry’s peers squarely rejected Brunner’s charges. But the damage was already done: Mrs. McMurry was already fired, was already prevented from teaching again, and had already spent 19 hours in jail. Finally, the constitutional question is beyond debate. The Supreme Court has clearly held that for property, the Due Process Clause requires predeprivation process unless there is an exigency. The Court has also clearly held that a parent’s liberty interest is far greater than any ordinary property interest. There was no exigency beyond the one Brunner created on his own. So it’s beyond debate that the Due Process Clause required some predeprivation process here, and the McMurrays got none. . . . Finally, JM’s Fourth Amendment claim. The Fourth Amendment protects ‘[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.’. . . Under clearly established law, Brunner violated JM’s Fourth Amendment rights. On appeal, all agree that Brunner seized JM the moment she opened the door. That’s when Brunner ordered JM to put on warmer clothes, Brunner declared that he was going to take her elsewhere for questioning, and JM began complying with Brunner’s order. And all agree that unless there were exigent circumstances, that seizure was unreasonable. There’s no evidence of exigent circumstances to justify Brunner’s seizure of JM. . . . The law is also clearly established under the obvious-case exception. There’s no evidence of exigency, the facts are particularly egregious, and the law is beyond debate. . . .For these reasons, I concur in the judgment rejecting Brunner’s qualified-immunity defense.”)

Nerio v. Evans, 974 F.3d 571, 575 & n.2 (5th Cir. 2020) (“We cannot find a case that would’ve given Evans ‘fair notice’ that his conduct might be unconstitutional. . . . Therefore, Appellant Nerio has not shown that the violative nature of Evans’s particular conduct was clearly established at the time of the arrest. . . . Although we know the Supreme Court’s decisions can clearly establish the law, the Supreme Court has never held that our decisions can do the same. See Wesby, 138 S.

Ct. at 591 n.8 (“We have not yet decided what precedents—other than our own—qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity.”).”)

Marks v. Hudson, 933 F.3d 481, 486 (5th Cir. 2019) (“Because nonprecedential opinions do not establish any binding law for the circuit, Light-Age, Inc. v. Ashcroft-Smith, 922 F.3d 320, 322 n.1 (5th Cir. 2019), they cannot be the source of clearly established law for qualified immunity analysis. Certainly, though, to the extent any of those opinions are restating what was clearly established in precedents they cite or elsewhere, the unpublished opinions can properly guide us to such authority.”)

Delaughter v. Woodall, 909 F.3d 130, 138-40 (5th Cir. 2018) (“Here, Dr. Nipper determined in 2011 that Delaughter requires hip replacement and reconstructive surgery. No party points to evidence that any medical professional has disagreed with Dr. Nipper. Thus, Delaughter’s claim arises from the fact he has yet to receive a prescribed course of treatment; it does not arise from his subjective opinion of the sufficiency of his medical treatment that is either contradicted or unsupported by medical professionals. Second, it is not clear that Dr. Nipper’s cancellation of Delaughter’s surgery and UMMC’s failure to accept Delaughter as a patient were medical-judgment decisions. Indeed, Delaughter claims these decisions were made because MDOC refuses to pay for his surgery. If so, the delay could under certain circumstances ‘evinced a wanton disregard for [a] serious medical need[].’ . . . Factual disputes about the reason for the delay prevent us from determining whether Hatten violated Delaughter’s constitutional rights. . . . Having established that summary judgment on the first prong was incorrect, we turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Delaughter bears the burden of pointing out the clearly established law and raising a fact issue as to its violation. . . . Clearly established law is determined by ‘controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’ . . . This means ‘the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right,’ although it is not necessary for controlling precedent to have held that the official’s exact act was unlawful. . . . The central concern is whether the official has fair warning that his conduct violates a constitutional right. . . . Delaughter claims it is clearly established that an unjustified delay in obtaining necessary reconstructive surgery for a prisoner violates the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoner. In support, Delaughter points to three of our unpublished cases in which we concluded that an unjustified delay in surgery could constitute deliberate indifference. . . . As we have noted, it is clearly established that delaying medical care can constitute an Eighth Amendment violation if the prison official ‘knows that [the] inmate[] face[s] a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it,’ and the delay results in substantial harm. . . . This precedent, combined with the cases cited above, which specifically address delays of surgical procedures, constitutes a combination of precedential authority and a robust consensus of unpublished authority, and convinces us that Hatten had fair warning that an unjustified delay in surgery is unconstitutional. See Cooper, 844 F.3d at 525 n.8 (noting that although an unpublished case may not create clearly established law, it may be used to illustrate clearly established law). Therefore, if the fact issues under prong one were resolved in Delaughter's favor, Hatten's conduct would violate clearly established law and he would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, we reverse the district court's ruling and remand the claims against Hatten for further proceedings.")

Vincent v. City of Sulphur, 805 F.3d 543, 548-51 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The cited cases, however, do not reflect clearly established law in this circuit under these facts. . . Although the Supreme Court decisions amply support the proposition that there is a general right to go to or remain on public property for lawful purposes, none comes near the level of specificity needed to put 'beyond debate' the related but distinct proposition that a person under investigation for threatening deadly violence against city officials has a right to notice and a hearing before being banned from entering city buildings. . . None of the Supreme Court cases mirrors the facts or the district court's legal reasoning—in fact, none of them addresses an Eldridge-type procedural-due-process claim at all. The cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits and the Texas intermediate court come somewhat closer—they at least address procedural-due-process claims in the context of the right to enter or remain on government property. But two out-of-circuit cases and a state-court intermediate appellate decision hardly constitute persuasive authority adequate to qualify as clearly established law sufficient to defeat qualified immunity in this circuit. A review of the decisions on which the district court relied demonstrates their insufficiency for a 'clearly established' finding. . . . The district court also relied on three out-of-jurisdiction lower-court decisions to support its conclusion that the procedural-due-process right was clearly established. Unlike the Supreme Court cases cited above, those three cases—two from our sister circuits and one from an intermediate Texas state court—do deal specifically with procedural due process in the context of the right to go about lawfully in public areas. And Kennedy, . . . even goes so far as to find that a procedural-due-process right in this context is clearly established. But those decisions, taken together, cannot support a finding of a clearly established right here. First, two cases from other circuits and one from a state intermediate court do not, generally speaking, constitute persuasive authority defining the asserted right at the high degree of particularity that is necessary for a rule to be clearly established despite a lack of controlling authority. In any event, those three cases address matters that are sufficiently legally or factually distinguishable as to make a finding of clearly established law improper. . . . In summary, as we have explained, the alleged constitutional right was not clearly established, so the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. We need not reach the question whether the officers in fact committed a procedural-due-process violation. We therefore REVERSE the order denying summary judgment and REMAND for further proceedings as needed.")

Breen v. Texas A & M University, 485 F.3d 325, 339, 340 (5th Cir. 2007) ("Applying the principles of McClendon to this case, we conclude that the state-created danger theory was not clearly established law in this circuit, with respect to the specific facts here or otherwise, by November 18, 1999, and, accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs' section 1983 claims. . . . In light of this court's historical reticence towards adopting the state-created danger theory. . . neither this court's discussions of the theory nor our sister circuits' adoption of it convinces us that a reasonable official in any of the defendants' shoes would have had fair notice on or before November 18, 1999 that his conduct with respect to the danger created by the Texas A & M bonfire stack could violate the students' constitutional rights. Because this court's pre-November 1999 decisions evince substantial uncertainty as to the existence of even the general right that the plaintiffs claim has been violated, those decisions cannot be said to have given defendants fair warning that any of their actions or omissions with respect to the 1999 Texas A & M bonfire construction could violate the affected students' constitutional rights. Moreover, similar to the situation in McClendon, any consensus of the other federal circuits in adopting various formulations of the state-created danger theory is insufficient for this court to find that the theory was clearly established in this circuit as applied to these cases. Although a majority of federal circuits had approved of the state-created danger theory in a general sense by November 18, 1999, there was not a consensus among those courts as to the contours of the underlying substantive due process right, . . . and the plaintiffs have not pointed to (and this court has not found) any pre-collapse cases in which an appellate court applied the state-created danger theory on facts even remotely analogous to the facts of these cases. Accordingly, we find that the adoption of the state-created danger theory in other circuits before November 1999 was insufficient to give the University officials fair notice that their conduct violated the students' constitutional rights.”).

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 329-31 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)(“[L]anguage in Wilson clearly suggests that, in the absence of directly controlling authority, a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ might, under some circumstances, be sufficient to compel the conclusion that no reasonable officer could have believed that his or her actions were lawful. . . . Because the Supreme Court’s method of analysis in Wilson is inconsistent with the rule predicated in Shipp, Shipp’s statement that ‘we are confined to precedent from our circuit or the Supreme Court’ in analyzing whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, see 234 F.3d at 915, is overruled. . . . As we have recognized on numerous subsequent occasions, our decision in Salas did not address the viability of the state-created danger theory or define the contours of an individual’s right to be free from state-created dangers. . . . Salas simply held that, even under the most expansive articulations of the state-created danger doctrine sanctioned by other courts at that time, the plaintiffs had not stated a cognizable claim. This discussion in Salas would not have provided a reasonable officer with ‘fair warning’ that creating or increasing a danger to a known victim with deliberate indifference towards that victim violates the victim’s substantive due process rights. Furthermore, our Salas decision was certainly insufficient to provide a reasonable officer with ‘fair warning’ that Detective Carney’s particular actions in loaning Loftin a gun would violate McClendon’s substantive due process rights. Turning to the law of our sister circuits, we note that six circuits had sanctioned some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, at the time of Detective Carney’s allegedly unlawful actions. . . . Moreover, as McClendon correctly points out, no circuit had explicitly rejected the state-created danger theory in July of 1993. While both of these factors are relevant to our determination whether there was a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ sufficient to provide Detective Carney with ‘fair warning’ that his acts were unlawful, the mere fact that a large number of courts had recognized the existence of a right to be free from state-created danger in some circumstances as of July, 1993 is insufficient to clearly establish the unlawfulness of Detective Carney’s actions. The Supreme Court has recognized on numerous occasions that the operation of the ‘clearly established’ standard depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant legal rule is defined.”).

Doe v. State of Louisiana, 2 F.3d 1412, 1416 n.8 (5th Cir. 1993) (“In examining preexisting law, [a]s a general proposition, we will not rigidly define the applicable body of law in determining whether relevant legal rules were clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. [citations omitted]. Relying solely on Fifth Circuit and Supreme Court cases, for example, would be excessively formalistic, but they will loom largest in our inquiries. In determining what the relevant law is, then, a court must necessarily exercise some discretion in determining the relevance of particular law under the facts and circumstances of each case, looking at such factors as the overall weight of authority, and the status of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions, as well as the jurisdiction of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions.” [quoting Melear v. Spears, 862 F.2d 1177, 1184 n. 8 (5th Cir.1989)]).

Strickland v. City of Crenshaw, Miss., 114 F. Supp. 3d 400, 417-18 (N.D. Miss. 2015) (“[T]he court concludes that plaintiffs have presented insufficient authority to ‘clearly establish’ the parameters of any permissible ‘pointing of weapons’ at occupants of a home during the execution of a search warrant, so as to overcome the qualified immunity defense raised by each individual defendant in this case. As quoted above, plaintiffs cite a single decision from a different circuit, Holland v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1192–93 (10th Cir.2001) on this issue, but this is plainly insufficient to clearly establish the law in this regard. . . . Plaintiffs’ reliance upon a single decision from another circuit is particularly lacking in light of the fact that the Supreme Court has stated that, to overcome a qualified immunity defense, the defendant must have violated ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . While it may be rather fictional to assume that officers would even be aware of Fifth Circuit authority on this issue, plaintiffs have a particularly poor argument on this point in relying on a single decision from another circuit. Some indication of the quantum of authority which might suffice in this regard can be gleaned from recent U.S. Supreme Court precedent, where the Court has suggested that either a decision from that Court or a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals’ would be necessary to ‘clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges’ in qualified immunity cases. . . . Clearly, a single decision from one circuit court does not constitute a ‘robust consensus’ among the federal circuits, and plaintiffs have therefore failed to ‘clearly establish’ the parameters of the legal duty which they claim was violated in this case. Even assuming that there are other federal circuits which reached a similar result as the Tenth Circuit in Holland, it is clear that, in the qualified immunity context, plaintiffs have the burden of finding and citing that authority, and they have failed to do so. It appears likely to this court that any ‘robust consensus’ of federal appellate authority which might arise on this issue would need to take account of a number of difficult factors to ensure that the rights of plaintiffs and police officers are appropriately balanced. Courts would likely have to grapple, for example, with the seeming ease with which fact issues in this regard could be manufactured, if it were sufficient for a plaintiff to allege that a gun was pointed at him or a family member and that an emotional injury resulted. Indeed, it is difficult to discern how fact issues in this regard could ever be found lacking in such a legal context, if a plaintiff simply offered his own self-serving testimony in this regard. In the court's view, courts seeking to establish standards in this context would also likely need to consider the issue of whether an officer in question had reason to have drawn his weapon at all. In cases where an officer had such a reason (as when executing a search warrant of a suspected drug dealer's house), then it should seemingly be much more difficult for plaintiffs to establish that his actions in 'pointing' his weapon in a particular direction were objectively unreasonable than if he had no good reason to have pulled his weapon at all. That brings this court to a final weakness in plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments. As discussed previously, the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Creighton emphasized that a central part of the qualified immunity analysis involves determining whether a reasonable officer in the position of the defendant could have believed that his actions were lawful. . . This necessarily requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the specific circumstances which the officer encountered would have led a reasonable officer to understand that his actions were unlawful, in light of clearly established authority of which a reasonable officer would have known. In their arguments quoted above, plaintiffs do not offer either sufficient factual context or legal arguments to allow this court to make a determination in this regard, with regard to Linzy or any of the other defendants. Indeed, plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments as a whole are quite brief and conclusory and do not reflect the facts that 1) they have the burden of proving that qualified immunity is inapplicable and 2) they are seeking to impose the expense and stress of trial upon officers whom the law does not lightly consider to be either 'plainly incompetent' or willful constitutional violators. In light of the foregoing, the court finds plaintiffs' proof and arguments insufficient to overcome a qualified immunity defense, and defendants' motion to dismiss the excessive force claims asserted against them will therefore be granted.")

Davis v. Southerland, No. Civ.A. G-01-720, 2004 WL 1230278, at *6 (S.D. Tex. May 21, 2004) ("The Circuit has not merely declined to recognize the state-created danger theory of substantive due process; it has scrupulously avoided it for more than ten years. The Fifth Circuit's reluctance to adopt the state-created danger theory is therefore not a mere neutral factor to be considered against the general consensus among other circuits, but a caution that the Fifth Circuit might not join that consensus. [footnote omitted] This Court therefore most respectfully concludes that the state-created danger theory of substantive due process was not clearly established at the time of Defendants' Bonfire-related activities. Because Plaintiffs' theory had not been adopted as a viable avenue to a substantive due process claim, a reasonable school official would not have been aware that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause provided a constitutional right to be free from state-created danger, much less than an injury caused by a school administrator's failure to exercise control over an activity such as Bonfire would violate that right. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Whyde v. Sigsworth, No. 22-3581, 2024 WL 4719649 (6th Cir. Nov. 8, 2024) (not reported) ("Whyde tries to overcome qualified immunity by relying on Browner v. Scott County, which lowered the standard for deliberate-indifference claims by pretrial detainees like Whyde. . . Before Browner, a detainee had to show that an official ‘kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.’ . . . But after Browner, a detainee need only show that an official acted with ‘something akin to reckless disregard’—a lower standard that doesn’t require actual knowledge of a serious risk of harm. . . . Whyde can’t benefit from Browner. Our court decided that case in September 2021—more than four years after Whyde’s stay in the Erie County Jail. And to overcome qualified immunity, Whyde must show that officials violated law that was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. Lawler, 93 F.4th at 926. Browner didn’t control in 2017; the Supreme Court’s decision in Farmer did. . . . And under the Farmer standard, the officials here aren’t liable unless Whyde can show they ‘kn[ew] of and disregard[ed]’ an ‘excessive risk’ to his health. . . . The officials (a) must have known facts from which they could infer that Whyde was at a substantial risk of serious harm, and (b) must have actually drawn that inference for themselves. . . . The dissent suggests that we should conduct the qualified immunity analysis under the Browner standard because that’s how the parties briefed the case. . . . But regardless of what the parties think the law is, ‘courts have an independent obligation to get the law right.’ . . . That means we must apply the correct governing law, even if the parties urge otherwise. And the correct law is clear: the qualified immunity analysis turns on precedent that applied at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . . Here, Whyde can’t overcome the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity.”)

Brown v. Giles, 95 F.4th 436, 439 & n.1 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Nonbinding opinions are never enough to clearly establish a point of law. . . . ¹ [fn. 1: While the Supreme Court has indicated that some acts are obviously unconstitutional even without precedent—such as torturing someone for a minor traffic violation—not even the dissent argues that’s true here. . . . Instead, the dissent points out that a ‘robust consensus’ of persuasive authority may clearly establish law. . . . Although the Supreme Court has suggested that category might exist in theory, the Court has never found it to exist in fact. . . . In fact, the Court hasn’t even held that binding circuit precedent could clearly establish a right. . . . Police officers protect the public in uncertain, dangerous, and rapidly evolving situations—not in the cold crucible of the courtroom. Asking Officer Giles to divine ‘clearly established’ law from the smattering of cases the dissent cites would demand more than the Supreme Court requires.]”) Cremeans v. Taczak, No. 22-3730, 2023 WL 5206437, at *4-5 & n.3 (6th Cir. Aug. 14, 2023) (not reported) (“Under binding circuit precedent, we may look to decisions of the United States Supreme Court, our Court of Appeals, and the Ohio Supreme Court to determine whether a right is clearly established.³ [fn.3: We recognize that the Supreme Court has merely assumed that non-Supreme Court caselaw can constitute clearly established law. . . . But defendants do not challenge plaintiffs’ reliance on Ohio caselaw on this ground, so we need not revisit our binding precedent today.] The right at issue here was clearly established by the Ohio Supreme Court in 1990. . . . Baumholtz clearly establishes that a five-and-a-half-month delay in initiating forfeiture proceedings with no credible justification is unlawful, even without the exercise of diligence or suffering of prejudice. When compared to this case (a nineteen-month delay, no credible justification, and a finding that plaintiffs diligently attempted to get their property back), the district court properly concluded that defendants should have known that their conduct violated plaintiffs' clearly established rights.")

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *5 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (not reported) ("As set forth in Guy, a reasonable officer would have been on notice in February 2019 that using a chemical agent on a subdued, partially incapacitated detainee who did not comply with officer's orders would amount to constitutionally excessive force. Defendants argue that because Guy is an unpublished case, it cannot be binding authority that puts officers on notice of a clearly established right. However, we agree with the district court that 'binding authority' is not required to overcome qualified immunity. 'Clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity 'means there must either be "controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority."'. . In addition, 'an action's unlawfulness can be "clearly established" from direct holdings, from specific examples describing certain conduct as prohibited, or from the general reasoning that a court employs."')

Young v. Kent County Sheriff's Department, No. 21-1222, 2022 WL 94990, at *8 (6th Cir. Jan. 10, 2022) (Murphy, J., dissenting) (not reported) [N]o case of ours clearly established that their split-second decision to deploy pepper spray and a taser on an inmate who had caused a disturbance in a jail was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . My colleagues cite only one jail-specific case holding that an officer used excessive force: Guy v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville & Davidson County, 687 F. App'x 471 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Guy does not rebut Jourden's and Clark's qualified-immunity defense. To begin with, I question whether we can rely on this unpublished decision at all to show that the law clearly prohibited the deputies' conduct. Other circuit courts have noted that '[u]npublished cases ... do not serve as binding precedent and cannot be relied upon to define clearly established law.' . . That is because another panel of our court could simply refuse to follow Guy at a later date in a published decision. . . How can Guy 'clearly establish' anything for officers if it does not clearly establish anything for us?")

Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 674, 679-83 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Eighth Amendment claims predicated on dangerous prison working conditions are reviewed under the same deliberate-indifference standard as other conditions-of-confinement challenges. Applying the standard here, we conclude that the evidence, when viewed in the light most favorable to Rhodes, makes out a violation of the Eighth Amendment by both Jones and McPherson. . . . The instability of the heavy laundry carts and lack of any safety device to prevent tipping posed a serious danger to the laundry porters standing below, who are expected to control the carts with nothing but their hands. The testimony of the witnesses to Rhodes's accident—including Jones and McPherson themselves—acknowledging that handling the laundry carts was dangerous confirms that Rhodes's work as a laundry porter entailed an objectively substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Here, the inquiry should focus on whether, at the time of Rhodes's incident, it was clearly established that the Eighth Amendment's conditions-of-confinement protections applied to prison work conditions, such that a reasonable prison official would know that they would violate a prison worker's constitutional rights by knowingly or recklessly disregarding a known excessive risk to the prison worker's health and safety in that environment. This approach is neither too general (as it would be if the right were defined as ‘the right to be free of cruel and unusual punishments’ or ‘the right against prison officials’ deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm’) nor overly specific (as it would be if the right were defined as ‘the right not to have a prison official recklessly fling a 400-pound laundry cart onto a prison laundry porter’). . . . With the right defined, there remains the question of whether it was clearly established as of October 15, 2015. . . . Although the Supreme Court has broadly pronounced that the Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to ‘take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates,’ . . . it has not specifically applied the Eighth Amendment’s deliberate-indifference standard to a claim predicated on unsafe working conditions. Thus, Rhodes relies on lower-court precedent to demonstrate that Jones and McPherson violated her clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. Rhodes immediately finds strong support for her position in our sibling circuits, concentrating on precedent from the Eighth and Ninth Circuits that holds that a prison official’s deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of significant harm to prison workers constitutes a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . The Eighth and Ninth Circuits are far from alone in their holdings. . . . [A]t least five federal courts of appeals have all held that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment where they disregard a known risk to the prison worker’s health and safety in the course of their work, thereby displaying deliberate indifference. These decisions came well before Rhodes was injured on October 15, 2015, and Jones and McPherson have pointed to absolutely no authority suggesting that these cases are inconsistent with Supreme Court or other circuit-court precedent. . . . In cases like this one, where an array of our sibling circuits have acted in concert on an issue, we have not hesitated to hold that out-of-circuit precedent has clearly established a constitutional right. . . . Indeed, our own cases foreshadowed this circuit’s agreement with the Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuit’s lockstep approach to Eighth Amendment claims predicated on unsafe prison-working conditions. Consistent with the Supreme Court’s broad declarations that the Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to ‘take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates,’ . . . we have applied the Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference standard to a wide assortment of conditions-of-confinement claims[.] . . . And although we have not yet applied the standard to a case involving unsafe prison-working conditions in a published decision, we have in unpublished opinions. . . . Together with our cases, the on-point precedent from the Second, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits, clearly established Rhodes’s asserted Eighth Amendment right prior to October 15, 2015. Although none of those cases precisely dealt with factual scenarios where a prison official flung a 300–400-pound laundry cart at an unprepared prison worker, the out-of-circuit cases uniformly held liable prison officials exhibiting deliberate indifference to a known risk in an assortment of prison workplaces. This was sufficient to put a reasonable prison official on notice that their recklessly disregarding a known risk to a prison worker’s safety would not just be irresponsible, but would violate that person’s right to be free from ‘unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain’ under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of Jones and McPherson on Rhodes’s Eighth Amendment claims.”) Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 689-95 (6th Cir. 2021) (Thapar, J., dissenting) (“The majority ignores the fact that Rhodes was not compelled to work as a laundry porter. By doing so, the majority strains the deliberate-indifference standard beyond its logical limits. But that’s just the first misstep. The majority next falters by denying qualified immunity for Jones and McPherson. It is not clearly established law that a workplace injury can amount to an unconstitutional punishment just because it happened in prison. Thus, qualified immunity should shield Jones and McPherson. As state officials, prison guards are immune from an inmate’s claim for money damages unless their conduct violated ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’. . . A right is clearly established if it is ‘clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . . To defeat the immunity bar, a plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court case or a published opinion from our circuit that recognizes a rights violation on similar facts. Unpublished orders are not enough since they carry only persuasive authority. . . The only exception is when a rights violation is so obvious that any reasonable official would understand what the law forbids without the benefit of a court case. . . .The majority concedes that no cases from our circuit clearly establish the rights violation alleged here. . . That alone should weigh heavily in our analysis. . . Yet the majority plows on, relying on a handful of cases from other circuits. But even these cases miss the mark. Each of them, like Estelle and Farmer, involves a prison guard who ordered an inmate into a dangerous situation. That compulsion is missing here. And that should be enough to end the matter. . . . In short, nothing in the record supports the conclusion that Rhodes was compelled to work in a dangerous environment. Even on the day of the accident, the record shows that the guards didn’t order Rhodes to unload a single laundry bin. While all acknowledge that the laundry detail was dangerous, Rhodes volunteered for the position just like an ordinary worker. And she could and did recover just like any worker. Simply put, absent any evidence that Rhodes was forced into a dangerous circumstance because she was a prisoner, the guards’ conduct does not constitute punishment. . . .Though neither original meaning nor current precedent consider Rhodes’s injury punishment, Rhodes could still seek damages just like any other Michigan employee. She did, and she recovered for her injury. But by the majority’s lights, the Eighth Amendment transforms prisons into a place where employees get rights above and beyond those of ordinary workers. That was not the meaning of the Eighth Amendment at the Founding. And it is not the meaning today. . . In the last forty years, the Supreme Court has given the Eighth Amendment an expansive reading that goes beyond what its text and history can sustain. But even those decisions appear restrained compared to the majority’s innovation. By holding that a reckless workplace injury becomes a constitutional violation when (and only when) it takes place within a prison, the majority accelerates our doctrine’s departure from the Punishments Clause’s original meaning. I respectfully dissent.”) Ashford v. Raby, 951 F.3d 798, 801, 803-04 (6th Cir. 2020) (“[E]ven if Raby’s use of force was unreasonable, Ashford still can’t recover unless its unreasonableness was ‘clearly established at the time.’. . That’s a tough standard. How tough? Well, Ashford must show that ‘then-existing precedent’ put the illegality of Raby’s conduct ‘beyond debate.’. . The law must have been so clear that every reasonable officer in Raby’s shoes would have recognized that the force used was excessive—and not just in the abstract but in the precise situation Raby was facing. . . That means that Ashford must point to precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation in similar circumstances or (failing that) show that this is ‘the rare “obvious case”’ in which no precedent is needed. . . So can Ashford show that Raby violated his clearly established rights? He cannot. . . . At the very least, Raby’s choice to deploy the dog was not ‘plainly incompetent’ and did not violate clearly established law. . . Ashford can point to no binding authority holding that deploying a police dog in similar circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Indeed, most of this circuit’s excessive-force precedents involving police dogs find no violation at all. . . . Ashford cites only two out-of-circuit cases to show that Raby should have known his use of force was unreasonably prolonged. . . But as a threshold matter, our sister circuits’ precedents are usually irrelevant to the ‘clearly established’ inquiry. The only exception is for ‘extraordinary’ cases where out-of-circuit decisions ‘both point unmistakably to’ a holding and are ‘so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt’ regarding that holding. . . . This general rule against out-of-circuit authority makes perfect sense. Why? Because at its heart, the ‘clearly established’ requirement comes down to fair notice. . . Reasonable officers in this circuit will pay attention to this court’s caselaw. After all, that’s the law that governs their actions. But we can’t expect officers to keep track of persuasive authority from every one of our sister circuits. . . They spend their time trying to protect the public, not reading casebooks. . . . In the end, nothing about Raby’s use of Ruger to seize Ashford violated clearly established law. Thus, Raby is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Brown v. Battle Creek Police Dep’t., 844 F.3d 556, 566-67, 572 (6th Cir. 2016) (“Based on the precedent set forth by a large number of this Court’s sister circuits, we hold that as a matter of first impression there is a constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment to not have one’s dog unreasonably seized. . . .As to Defendants’ argument that it was not clearly established in 2013 that the seizure of a dog was a Fourth Amendment event, we hold that Defendants had reasonable notice that unreasonably shooting Plaintiffs’ dogs would constitute the ‘seizure’ of an ‘effect’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Every circuit that has considered this issue has concluded that the unreasonable killing of a dog constitutes an unconstitutional ‘seizure’ of personal property under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Supreme Court and this Circuit have yet to decide this issue. Nevertheless, given the fact that every sister circuit that has confronted this issue has concluded that an individual has a property right in their dog, and that a district court within this Circuit has concluded the same, we hold that this right was clearly established in 2013 when the conduct in this action occurred. Therefore, we must next determine whether the seizures of the two dogs in the instant case were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .[T]he standard we set out today is that a police officer’s use of deadly force against a dog while executing a warrant to search a home for illegal drug activity is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when, given the totality of the circumstances and viewed from the perspective of an objectively reasonable officer, the dog poses an imminent threat to the officer’s safety. . . .Similar to Altman, the officers here confronted two large pit bulls for the first time in an unsupervised environment where they were unleashed and in an enclosed space with the officers. Given Jones’ criminal history, gang affiliations, the types of drugs he was suspected of distributing, the fact that the officers had no time to plan for the dogs, in addition to the officers’ un rebutted testimony that the dogs either lunged or were barking aggressively at the officers, the nature and size of the dogs, the fact that the dogs were unleashed and loose in a small residence, all culminate into a finding that the officers acted reasonably when they shot and killed the two dogs. Viewing the facts and all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we find that a jury would conclude that Officer Klein, Officer Young, and Officer Case acted reasonably in shooting and killing Plaintiffs' dogs. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate.”)

Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ____ & n.9 (6th Cir. 2016) (“A single district court opinion is not enough to pronounce a right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. While a district court opinion may be persuasive in showing there is a clearly established right—perhaps by exposing a trend in non-precedential case law—it is not controlling on its own. . . . The same is true in other circuits. [collecting cases]; but see Tarabochia v. Adkins, 766 F.3d 1115, 1125 (9th Cir. 2014) (“[i]n the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, we look to whatever decisional law is available including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts”) (internal quotations removed). . . . Further, even were we to consider O'Donnel, the proposition for which plaintiffs cite the case was extinguished by this circuit's directly contrary holding in Andrews. It cannot be said O'Donnel placed a constitutional question ‘beyond debate’ when later, in Andrews, this circuit found the very same question did not have a clear answer. In short, decisions from this court stand for the proposition that, between 2008 and 2011, it was not clearly established in any district of this circuit that the Fourth Amendment applied to social workers conducting a search of a home relating to the wellbeing of children. . . . This uncertainty in whether the Fourth Amendment applies to investigations related to child wellbeing contributes to a finding that defendants were not on clear notice whether their conduct violated the law.”)

Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ____ (6th Cir. 2016) (White, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not published) (“I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the law was not clearly established as to whether social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirements. The majority correctly identifies Andrews as the controlling precedent on this issue. There, this court reaffirmed that to determine whether there was a clearly established right, ‘a district court looks to binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself.’ Andrews v. Hickman Cty., Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 862 n.7 (6th Cir. 2012). ‘[W]e look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.’ . . . As the majority notes, the Western District of Michigan, where this case originated, held in 2004 that ‘the Fourth Amendment applies to [social workers], as it does to all other officers and agents of the state[.] ... There is ... no social worker exception to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Since O'Donnel predated the challenged searches, it is sufficient to create a clearly established constitutional right in this context. This is especially true considering many other circuits had already decided that social workers are not exempt from the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases] This large body of circuit authority, coupled with at least one case from the Western District of Michigan, clearly established at the time of the searches that social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's strictures. Because the second search violated Hall's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity as to that search and remand for further proceedings.”)

Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App'x 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2014) (“Collectively, Andrews and Kovacic indicate that before this court decided Andrews in 2012, a social worker entering a home without a warrant did not violate clearly established law, but a social worker removing a child without a warrant did. Brent does not allege that his children were removed in violation of the Fourth Amendment; he instead challenges the warrantless entry into his home. Andrews therefore controls this case, meaning that the social workers are entitled to qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claim. Brent does not challenge this interpretation of Andrews, but instead argues that Andrews was wrongly decided. He relies on decisions of district courts within this circuit and the decisions of other circuits to establish that there has never been a social-worker exemption to the Fourth Amendment. Brent's argument is without merit. First, Andrews belies Brent's argument by holding that there was no clearly established law regarding a social worker exemption in 2008, when the events in Andrews took place. And Brent cites no case that would indicate a change in this circuit's law between 2008 and 2010, when the events of this case took place. Second, and relatedly, '[w]hen determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.' Andrews, 700 F.3d at 853. Brent's reliance on district court cases within this circuit and on the law of other circuits is therefore unavailing. Because our circuit in Andrews held that there was no clearly established law regarding the Fourth Amendment's applicability to social workers in 2008, that determination controls this case. We therefore reverse the judgment of the district court and grant the social workers qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claims.”)

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 527 n.5 (6th Cir. 2003) (“Although courts engaging in qualified immunity analyses often consider only case law when determining whether the right at issue was clearly established, the Supreme Court in Hope also considered a Department of Justice report and an Alabama Department of Corrections regulation in deciding whether the officials were on notice that their conduct violated the plaintiff's rights. . . . In this case, therefore, while not dispositive, it is appropriate to consider the ODRC's policy, on which Brigano apparently relied, that ‘all preparatory obligations, such as securing a marriage license, are the sole responsibility of the couple to wed,’ in determining whether he knowingly violated plaintiffs' rights.”).

Heggen v. Lee, 284 F.3d 675, 687 (6th Cir. 2002) (“Defendant's reliance on Cope is misplaced. This Court in Cope expressly stated that the parties had pointed to no law from the Sixth Circuit or the United States Supreme Court that would have put the county clerk on notice that her actions were unconstitutional. Defendant is foreclosed from arguing the same in the instant case because of Hall. The record shows that the actual duties of deputies in Hopkins County are essentially the same type of nonpolicymaking duties performed by the plaintiff in Hall. It is undisputed that Defendant informed Plaintiffs that they would not be rehired in late December 1998, more than a year after Hall was decided in October 1997. We believe that the right of these Plaintiffs to be free from patronage dismissals was ‘sufficiently clear,’ such that after Hall, a reasonable official would have understood that taking such an action against them for political reasons was unconstitutional.”).

Risbridger v. Connelly, 275 F.3d 565, 569, 572 (6th Cir. 2002) (“A right is clearly established if there is binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point. . . . Given the Supreme Court’s express reservation of the question of whether a Fourth Amendment right to refuse to provide identification during a valid Terry stop renders invalid an arrest that is based on probable cause to believe the individual has violated a presumptively valid state or local law, as well as the lack of clear precedent from our circuit, we join the Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits and find that the contours of such a right were not sufficiently clear that the unlawfulness of plaintiff’s arrest must have been apparent at the time.”).

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) (“The First and Fifth Circuits have indicated in dicta without discussion that they would apply Loudermill to demotions. . . Two published opinions of district courts from other circuits have balanced the competing interests and found that a tenured public employee is entitled to a Loudermill hearing before being demoted. . . Therefore, the only authorities that clearly recognize a right to predemotion notice and hearing are the two district court opinions. . . These decisions are not ‘so clearly foreshadowed by’ Loudermill or opinions in this circuit ‘as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that’ not giving a tenured employee notice and hearing before a demotion would violate the employee’s due process rights.”).

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991) (look first to decisions of Supreme Court, then to decisions of this court and other courts within circuit, and finally to decisions of other circuits).

Ohio Civil Service Employees Association v. Seiter, 858 F.2d 1171, 1177 (6th Cir.1988) (“[I]n the ordinary instance, to find a clearly established constitutional right, a district court must find binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself. In an extraordinary case, it may be possible for the decisions of other courts to clearly establish a principle of law. For the decisions of other courts to provide such ‘clearly established law,’ these decisions must both point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and be so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct. . . would be found wanting.”).

Stewart v. City of Memphis, No. 2:16-CV-02574-SHM, 2019 WL 332812, at *10–12 (W.D. Tenn. Jan. 25, 2019), aff’d, 788 F. App’x 341 (6th Cir. 2019) (“The Court has a duty to conduct its own review of relevant precedent to determine whether an asserted right was clearly established. See Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516 (1994); DiLuzio v. Village of Yorkville, 796 F.3d 604, 608 (6th Cir. 2015). Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights is not to the contrary. 858 F.3d 988, 993 (6th Cir. 2017). Plaintiff in Arrington-Bey sued officers who had arrested her mentally ill son for taking him to jail instead of a hospital. . . The court found that, under the facts confronting the officers, there was no clearly established right for someone like plaintiff's son to be taken to a hospital. . . The court noted that it could have ruled against plaintiff solely because she had failed to cite a case that clearly established the asserted right. . . However, the court came to its decision only after conducting an independent review of the law. . . Any language suggesting that a court can rely only on the cases a plaintiff cites would be dicta. To the extent Schilling argues for a broader application of Arrington-Bey, an application that would require Plaintiffs to cite a specific case under all circumstances, his argument is inconsistent with Elder v. Holloway. There, the Supreme Court rejected the principle that a court must decide whether a constitutional right was clearly established by relying solely on cases plaintiffs cite. . . In Elder, the court reviewed a rule the Ninth Circuit had adopted in qualified immunity cases: the appellate court must disregard relevant legal authority not presented to, or considered by, the district court. . . Rejecting that rule, the Elder Court held that, 'review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.' . . Elder instructs a circuit court deciding whether a constitutional right was clearly established to 'use its "full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents."' . . Elder rejected the notion that a circuit court can rest solely on cases plaintiffs cite to it or cases cited to or considered by the district court. That rule applies in the first instance in the district court. Whether a right was clearly established is a question of law. . . Like all questions of law, a district court's analysis is not limited to the precise contours of a plaintiff's legal argument. District courts, like circuit courts, have a duty to undertake their own review of 'all relevant precedents.' . . Plaintiffs do indeed have the burden of establishing that Schilling is not entitled to qualified immunity. Meeting that burden does not require Plaintiffs to cite a specific case showing that Stewart's constitutional right was clearly established. . . . Bouggess is factually similar to this case, although the facts are not identical. In Bouggess, a suspect physically struggled with an officer, broke free, ran about ten feet, and was shot three times in the back. . . The suspect did not bite the officer, twist his genitals, or do anything similarly combative. . . In Carden, 699 F. App'x at 498, a unanimous panel held that Bouggess clearly established that a constitutional violation occurred under facts substantially identical to, and in a number of ways more serious than, the facts in this case. An officer volunteered to assist a man stopped on the side of the road tending to a flat tire. . . The man declined. . . The officer ran the license plate and saw that it did not match the vehicle registration. . . When the officer approached again, the man punched twice at the officer and ran. . . The officer tackled the man and a struggle ensued. . . During the struggle, the two exchanged punches and the man repeatedly grabbed for the officer's gun. . . The officer used his taser, but it did not subdue the man. . . The officer eventually became entangled in the taser wires and suffered shocks. . . The man then got on top of the officer. . . The man did not reach for the officer's gun from that position. . . The man let go of the officer, stood up, turned away from the officer, and started to flee. . . The man 'made it about one step' before the officer shot him in the back. . . The man died of his wounds. . . The court held that the officer's actions violated the man's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force because 'the law at the time of the encounter clearly established that deadly force would be excessive if used against an unarmed, fleeing felon who the officer lacked probable cause to believe posed a threat of serious physical harm.’. . The court in Carden held that the man did not pose a serious threat of harm to the officer when the officer shot him. A fortiori, Stewart did not pose a serious threat of harm to Schilling when Schilling shot him. The man in Carden was significantly more violent than the Court must assume Stewart was. The difference of shot location —back versus front and side —is not material. Physical distance is the more relevant factor in determining whether someone is a greater or lesser threat. The physical distances in this case and Carden were virtually the same. Carden’s reading of Bouggess and application of Bouggess to the Carden facts establish that Stewart’s constitutional right to be free of excessive force was clearly established. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Schilling violated Stewart’s clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. He is not entitled to qualified immunity. Schilling’s Motion for Summary Judgment is DENIED.”)

XXL of Ohio, Inc. Commerce v. City of Broadview Heights, No. 1:01CV2514, 2003 WL 23219809, at *44 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 24, 2003) (not reported) (“In the instant case, qualified immunity cannot protect the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights from liability. On January 21, 2000 the Federal District Court for the Northern District of Ohio issued its decision in North Olmsted. XXL offers evidence to support, and defendants do not deny, that attorneys for Broadview Heights drew defendants’ attention to the decision in North Olmsted and warned that the decision indicated that Broadview Heights’ sign code was problematic. The city began issuing citations to XXL for violations of the sign ordinance on August 20, 2000. Any reasonable official in the position of the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights would have known in light of North Olmsted that enforcement of Broadview Heights’ sign ordinance against XXL violated XXL’s clearly established rights under the First Amendment.”).

Coy v. Bd. of Education of the North Canton City Schools, 205 F. Supp.2d 791, 805, 806 (N.D. Ohio 2002) (“The defendants say that because neither the Sixth Circuit nor courts within the Sixth Circuit have addressed the issue of student websites and the First Amendment, the constitutional right at issue was not clearly established. . . . The Court disagrees. As discussed above, Tinker applies to this case. The Sixth Circuit has discussed and applied Tinker on numerous occasions. . . . And while the Sixth Circuit has not directly dealt with the issue of a student website and the First Amendment, other courts have. . . . Once it is determined that the right is clearly established, the Court must determine whether the plaintiffs have alleged facts supported by sufficient evidence to indicate Stanley’s and Shoup’s actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right. . . . As discussed above, there are material issues of genuine fact as to the motivation behind Stanley’s and Shoup’s decision to discipline Jon Coy. Therefore, the Court holds that Defendants Stanley and Shoup are not entitled to qualified immunity.”).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551-52 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Clark’s right to be free from deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide while he was in custody was clearly established at the time of his death in 2012. . . .Walker responds to this substantial body of case law in several ways. First, he argues that it is ‘doubtful’ whether circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of qualified immunity. He cites two Supreme Court cases, but both cases leave this question unanswered. See Taylor v. Barkes, 579 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015); City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015). Other Supreme Court cases indicate circuit precedent is adequate for these purposes. See, e.g., Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999) (“Petitioners have not brought to our attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they seek to rely.”). In addition, we have exercised this authority for decades, including in this specific context of prison and jail suicides. See Hall, 957 F.2d at 404–05; see also Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 (7th Cir. 2016). We see no reason to depart from these precedents.”)

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 & n.28 (7th Cir. 2016) (“In conducting the clearly established inquiry, our first task is to consider controlling Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit precedent. . . . Our earlier discussion makes evident that the precedent of the Supreme Court and of our court certainly did not provide adequate guidance to permit the defendants to understand their responsibilities in the face of the tangle of overlapping laws and regulations that Wisconsin had created. . . . We therefore must ‘cast a wider net’ and look to whether ‘all relevant case law’ demonstrates “such a clear trend ... that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.’ . . . In this respect, Mr. Werner identifies a line of Wisconsin state court decisions. . . . We are not alone in looking to trends in the decisional law of other jurisdictions once we are satisfied that controlling precedent in our own circuit does not clearly establish a particular legal right. [collecting cases]”) Sutterfield v. City of Milwaukee, 751 F.3d 542, 551, 573-79 (7th Cir. 2014) (“It will no doubt be frustrating to Sutterfield and to the reader that we do not reach firm conclusions as to the merits of all of the claims she has asserted and instead, like the district court, resolve the case in part based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. We recognize the significant role that resolving the merits of each claim plays in the development of precedent and clarifying the boundaries of constitutional rights. . . . But given the importance of the interests at stake, the lack of clarity in the case law, and the shallowness of the briefing as to the alternatives available to the police on the facts presented here, we believe that the tentative nature of some of our analysis is appropriate. . . .Sutterfield contends that because Wisconsin precedent would not bind this court on the merits of her claims, and because in particular we, in contrast to the Wisconsin courts, have refused to extend the community caretaking doctrine to anything but automobile searches, the Wisconsin cases are irrelevant in terms of whether the defendants have qualified immunity. Not so. Although it is true that in this court, the Wisconsin cases have persuasive value only on the merits of Sutterfield’s federal claims, they remain relevant as to what the defendants might have thought the law, including the federal constitution, permitted them to do in executing the emergency statement of detention. Federal courts do not possess exclusive authority to decide Fourth Amendment issues; state courts resolve such issues every day. . . . In the absence of a controlling decision by the United States Supreme Court, the Wisconsin cases are thus as relevant as our own precedents in evaluating what a Milwaukee police officer might have thought the law permitted in responding to a report that the occupant of a private dwelling was in danger of harming herself. . . . Although our decision in Pichany refused to extend the community caretaking exception recognized by the Supreme Court in Cady beyond the automobile context, Wisconsin courts have given the exception a much broader reach. They have relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify warrantless entries into the home when the police have reason to believe that the occupant may be injured or otherwise in danger of harm. . . . Based on these decisions, the officers who forcibly entered Sutterfield's home could have believed that their entry was justified by the community caretaking doctrine as understood and applied by the Wisconsin courts. . . . The decision to forcibly open and search the locked compact disc case discovered in the course of the protective sweep presents a closer question in terms of the officers' qualified immunity, just as it does on the merits of Sutterfield's Fourth Amendment claim. No Wisconsin case that has been cited to us or that we have found has relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify any search of the premises more intrusive than the sort of limited, protective sweep envisioned by Buie—that is, a search of places within the home that another person might be found. . . . The gun, having been secured within a locked, opaque case, obviously was not in plain view, in contrast to the drugs found in both Horngren and Pinkard. Opening the case was a substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep, and constituted a more substantial intrusion on Sutterfield's privacy interests in her personal effects. . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home, the search of the locked compact disc case, and the temporary seizure of the gun found inside of the case. The police were faced with a difficult situation in which they had reason to believe, based on her physician's report, that Sutterfield might pose a danger to herself, they were implementing an emergency detention of her person for evaluation pursuant to section 51.15, and they were logically attempting to find the firearm they had reason to believe Sutterfield possessed and to secure that firearm while Sutterfield was undergoing a mental health evaluation. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to which legal framework best applies to the warrantless actions of the police in these circumstances, the police could have believed that Wisconsin precedents, if not the federal cases, authorized them to take these actions in order to protect Sutterfield's wellbeing as well as the well-being of anyone else, including her son, who might have access to her home in her absence. . . . Based on the Supreme Court's decision in Brigham City and this court's decision in Fitzgerald, we conclude that the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home was justified. Under the circumstances confronting the defendant police officers, they had an objectively reasonable basis for believing that Sutterfield posed an imminent danger of harm to herself; the circumstances thus constituted an emergency which dispensed with the need for a warrant under the exigent circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Alternatively, even if the entry into Sutterfield's home was inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment, a reasonable person would not have known that the entry violated Sutterfield's clearly established rights; the officers would therefore be entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful entry claim. Similarly, although we have assumed arguendo that both the search of the compact disc case in Sutterfield's home and the seizure of the (lawfully-possessed) gun found inside of that case were contrary to the Fourth Amendment, we conclude that the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful search and seizure claims.”)

Burgess v. Lowery, 201 F.3d 942, 944-46 (7th Cir. 2000) (“Even if our court had decided that strip searches of prison visitors were unconstitutional in the absence of reasonable suspicion, there might be enough doubt about the soundness of the decision, whether in light of decisions by other circuits before or after our decision or of intimations in Supreme Court decisions not squarely on point that our view might be erroneous, to justify the state in believing that the plaintiff’s right was not yet ‘clearly established’ within the meaning of the cases on immunity. . . The Fifth Circuit has held the contrary, Brady v. Fort Bend County, 58 F.3d 173, 175 (5th Cir.1995); Boddie v. City of Columbus, 989 F.2d 745, 748 (5th Cir.1993), but with all respect we cannot believe that its view is correct. Suppose the only relevant case the Fifth Circuit had decided was very old, and every other circuit since had rejected the position taken in the Fifth Circuit’s decision. It would be odd in such circumstances to suppose that right clearly established even in the Fifth Circuit, given that courts can and not infrequently do overrule decisions that seem clearly out of step with the rest of the legal universe. Equally, however, the absence of a decision by the Supreme Court or this court cannot be conclusive on the issue whether a right is clearly established in this circuit. There might be no decision in either court simply because the existence of the right was so clear, as a matter of the wording of a constitutional or statutory provision or decisions in other circuits or in the state courts, that no one thought it worth while to litigate the issue. . . To rule that until the Supreme Court has spoken, no right of litigants in this circuit can be deemed established before we have decided the issue would discourage anyone from being the first to bring a damages suit in this court; he would be certain to be unable to obtain any damages. . . . The test, formulated with particular application to this case, ought to be whether a reasonable official in the position of these defendants, considering all relevant sources of guidance to the law, might have thought it reasonably possible that this court or eventually the U.S. Supreme Court would hold that strip searches of prison visitors are proper even without reasonable suspicion.”).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Lane v. Nading, 927 F.3d 1018, 1022-24 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Even assuming that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by failing to knock and announce their presence before entering Lane’s dwelling, it was not clearly established in January 2015 that failing to knock and announce before entering the dwelling of a parolee was unlawful. That is because neither the Arkansas Supreme Court, this Court, nor the U.S. Supreme Court had spoken on the specific issue of whether the knock-and-announce requirement applies to parolees. Moreover, there existed no ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ addressing the issue at the time the officers entered Lane’s dwelling. Lane essentially argues that a robust consensus of persuasive authority had established by January 2015 that the knock-and-announce requirement applies to parolees. To support his argument, he cites the Seventh Circuit’s Green v. Butler decision, . . . a pair of district-court decisions, . . . and an intermediate appellate-court decision out of California. . . We disagree. It is true that the cases Lane cites generally hold that an officer must knock and announce his presence before entering a parolee’s dwelling. However, we do not consider a consensus based on the decision of a single circuit and a handful of lower courts to be ‘robust.’ [collecting cases] While we recognize that Samson does not address the issue of whether the knock-and-announce rule applies to parolees, it certainly stands for the proposition that parolees may be treated differently than non-parolees for some Fourth Amendment purposes. Given that proposition and the fact that the Supreme Court decided Samson after the Seventh Circuit decided Green, we hold it would not have been clear to every reasonable officer in the defendant officers’ positions that failing to knock and announce his presence before entering and searching Lane’s hotel room violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because the law was not clear, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) (“To overcome qualified immunity, a plaintiff typically must identify either ‘cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident’ or ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999). Neither criterion is satisfied here. . . . In our view, two decisions from other circuits did not place the issue beyond debate, and a reasonable correctional officer in Minnesota could have believed—like the district court in this very case—that Jacobson’s admission that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana gave reasonable suspicion to believe that he could be secreting contraband in private areas of his body. McCormick and Voltaire are thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Galarnyk v. Fraser, 687 F.3d 1070, 1076 (8th Cir. 2012) (“In McCabe, we held the ‘[l]ack of probable cause is a necessary element of’ a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. . . . In Reichle v. Howards. . . the Supreme Court determined ‘two federal law enforcement agents [were] immune from suit for allegedly arresting a suspect in retaliation for his political speech, when the agents had probable cause to arrest the suspect for committing a federal crime.’ The Supreme Court concluded ‘that, at the time of [the defendant’s] arrest [in 2006], it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment.’. . . The Supreme Court declined to decide ‘whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest,’. . . leaving our conclusion in McCabe intact. Accordingly, the district court did not err in holding the presence of probable cause to arrest Galarnyk for trespass defeated Galarnyk’s First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.”)

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 451 (8th Cir. 2008) (“It is true that we have on occasion afforded the protection of qualified immunity in situations in which a split of authority exists on the constitutional question at issue. . . . Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the lack of a decision squarely on point within our circuit, we conclude that, given the clear weight of authority in the circuits that have ruled on the question, Brigance was on fair notice that to falsely label an inmate a snitch is to unreasonably subject that inmate to the threat of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of his fellow inmates. After all, who better knows the opprobrium and consequent effect thereof that attaches to the label of snitch than those who work daily within the inmate population. Thus, we hold that a reasonable prison guard in Brigance's position would have known that to label Irving a snitch would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm.”).

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 910 (8th Cir. 2002) (Hansen, J. , dissenting) (“In examining our own case law, as well as that of the Supreme Court and other circuits, I conclude that at the time of Ms. Hill’s arrest and detention, the officers had ‘fair warning’ that their treatment of Ms. Hill was unconstitutional.”).

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep’t., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) (“When making the determination of whether the law was ‘clearly established’ at the time the alleged violation occurred, we are obligated to include the decisions of the district courts. . . A thorough review of these decisions show that the overwhelming majority of cases reaching the issue concluded that an employee’s at-will status did not preclude the maintenance of an action under ‘ 1981. . . . This leads us to the question whether one Supreme Court case, which strongly implies that Turner’s position is the correct one, plus two courts of appeals cases and fifteen district court opinions that expressly state that Turner’s position is the correct one, is enough to show the law in question was ‘clearly established.’ We hold that it does. Determining whether the law is ‘clearly established’ is not a precise science. The determination is, however, a balancing of all available precedential decisional law on point, with the greatest effect given to decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Next, we look within our own circuit, and where there is no law on point we then canvass the other courts of appeals, the district courts, and state courts, [footnote omitted] giving each decision on point its requisite weight. In our view, the fact that two circuit cases and fifteen district court cases directly support a proposition and the Supreme Court implicitly supports that same position is sufficient to demonstrate that the law was ‘clearly established’ as of September 23, 1999.”).

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep’t., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) (Bye, J., dissenting) (“The court deduces ‘clearly established’ law from a Supreme Court decision overruled by Congress, four evenly-divided circuit court decisions, and fifteen district court decisions against four. The court’s approach (and its nose count) conflict with earlier cases in our circuit, and I can only wonder what the government and municipal lawyers practicing in our circuit will take from this case.”).

Vaughn v. Ruoff, 253 F.3d 1124, 1129, 1130 (8th Cir. 2001) (“We subscribe to a broad view of the concept of clearly established law, and we look to all available decisional law, including decisions from other courts, federal and state, when there is no binding precedent in this circuit. . . Even in the complete absence of any decisions involving similar facts, a right can be clearly established if a reasonable public official would have known her conduct was unconstitutional. . . . We have not found any cases with facts similar to those in this case. This does not, however, carry the day for Ruoff. Numerous pre-1994 cases show that minimum procedures regularly precede state compelled sterilizations, and some clearly establish that pre-sterilization procedures are constitutionally required. [citing cases from other jurisdictions]. . . Furthermore, any reasonable social worker—indeed, any reasonable person, social worker or not—would have known that a sterilization is compelled, not voluntary, if it is consented to under the coercive threat of losing one’s children, and hence unconstitutional.”).

Buckley v. Rogerson, 133 F.3d 1125, 1129-31 (8th Cir. 1998) (“[Defendant] bears the burden of proving that this right [a constitutional right to specific medical approval of segregation and restraint for prison mental patients] was not clearly established. As we have noted in previous cases, this court has taken a ‘broad view’ of what constitutes clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity.” Court relies on federal district court decisions from Missouri, Michigan and New York to find right clearly established.).

Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir. 1989) (taking into consideration identity of a court, its geographical proximity, dissemination of information within the pertinent profession and frequency of similar litigation when determining whether reasonable official would be aware of the law).

Konop v. Northwestern School District, 26 F. Supp.2d 1189, 1194-96, 1201 (D.S.D. 1998) (“The defendants assert, and correctly so, that there is apparently no case decided by the United States Supreme Court, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, by any District Court in the Eighth Circuit, or by the South Dakota Supreme Court involving strip searches in a school setting. They then argue that the law in the Eighth Circuit therefore cannot be ‘clearly established.’ Defendants rely on Jenkins By Hall v. Talladega City Board of Education . . . in arguing that the law can be clearly established in the District of South Dakota only by decisions from the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, U.S. District Courts in the District of South Dakota, or the South Dakota Supreme Court. The Court rejects this contention, relying on Eighth Circuit precedent. [citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989)] Taking the argument of defendants to its logical conclusion would tell us that there must be factual identity between a prior case and the case under consideration. This would result in ‘absolute immunity’, not ‘qualified immunity.’ In other words, any school official would receive one ‘bite of the apple’, regardless of the nature of the conduct. . . . The implication of Lanier is that to possibly establish civil rights liability (i.e. to ‘get past’ the qualified immunity defense and to allow the jury as the finder of the facts to decide the facts), there must be ‘fair warning’ of the constitutional right or rights and there is no requirement that this warning be found in prior Supreme Court precedent or factually similar precedent elsewhere. Lanier also stands for the proposition that general principles of law can provide fair warning. . . . Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches in the school setting was clearly established at the time of the searches. . . T.L.O. established in 1985 that a search in the school setting must be justified and reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which are claimed to have justified the search. . . . T.L.O. has been applied time and time again and certain rules are clear: (1) a strip search is not justified absent individualized suspicion unless there is a legitimate safety concern

(e.g. weapons); (2) school officials must be investigating allegations of violations of the law or school rules and only individual accusations justify a strip search; and (3) strip searches must be designed to be minimally intrusive, taking into account the item for which the search is conducted. The reasonableness standard set forth in T.L.O. was clearly established and should have been applied by defendants. It was in fact applied time after time by various Circuit and District Courts to factual scenarios having some similarity to the present case.”).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Calonge v. City of San Jose, 104 F.4th 39, 47-50 (9th Cir. 2024) (“Officer Carboni contends that Ms. Calonge forfeited any argument that the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis was satisfied because she failed to ‘fully develop’ her argument before the district court by citing analogous cases. We must reject that forfeiture argument because of Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510 (1994). In Elder, our court had disregarded authority relevant to the clearly established prong of qualified immunity because the authority had not been cited to the district court. . . The Supreme Court reversed, holding that ‘appellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.’ . . The Court instructed that a court of appeals ‘engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should ... use its “full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.”’ . . In Elder, the plaintiff had argued in the district court that the law was clearly established but did not cite analogous cases. Here, Ms. Calonge likewise argued in the district court that the law was clearly established but did not cite analogous cases. On appeal, Ms. Calonge continues to argue that the law was clearly established, and she now cites analogous cases. Under Elder, we must consider those cases and any other relevant law. Applying our ‘full knowledge’ of the relevant law, and properly construing the facts in the light most favorable to Ms. Calonge, we concluded above that a reasonable jury could find that Officer Carboni violated the Fourth Amendment. The precedents on which we have relied put the Fourth Amendment question ‘beyond debate.’ . . When a man is walking down the street carrying a gun in his waistband, posing no immediate threat, police officers may not shout conflicting commands at him and then kill him. That rule was clearly established when Officer Carboni pulled the trigger: Every precedent that we cited in our analysis of the violation prong of qualified immunity was decided well before October 31, 2019, when the shooting here occurred, and those cases directly controlled our analysis without elaboration. We have held over and over that a suspect’s possession of a gun does not itself justify deadly force. [discussing cases] We have also previously recognized that a person cannot be considered non-compliant when he fails to obey conflicting commands. . . . We have also previously held that continuing to walk as Calonge did is not fleeing. . . . In his brief on appeal, Officer Carboni did not seriously dispute that, once the facts are construed in Ms. Calonge’s favor, his conduct violated clearly established constitutional principles. Officer Carboni instead attempted to distinguish the controlling cases by improperly construing disputed facts in his favor and then arguing that Calonge posed an immediate threat, for example by asserting that Calonge ‘brandished the weapon and pointed it at bystanders.’ . . . Construing the facts in Ms. Calonge’s favor, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Officer Carboni's position that shooting Calonge was unlawful. Officer Carboni is thus not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 64-67 (9th Cir. 2022) ("To determine if a right was clearly established, '[t]he relevant inquiry is whether, at the time of the officers' action, the state of the law gave the officers fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional.' . . . Accordingly, we look to the state of the law that concerned conduct at the time of the challenged police action. At the outset, Detective Tucker argues that the law was not clearly established at the time of his conduct in 2013 because the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves did not clarify the appropriate standard for First Amendment retaliation claims until 2019. But a right can also be clearly established by this circuit's precedent. . . . Contrary to Detective Tucker's characterization of Plaintiffs' claims, Plaintiffs did not merely 'describe the "clearly established" right in general terms like "retaliatory law enforcement action."' . . . Rather, Plaintiffs defined the right as 'the right to be free from retaliatory law enforcement action even when probable cause existed for that action.' . . . In so doing, Plaintiffs defined the right as we did in Skoog and Ford. . . . Thus, at the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in July 2013, binding Ninth Circuit precedent gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to arrest Plaintiffs in retaliation for their First Amendment activity, notwithstanding the existence of probable cause. . . . Detective Tucker argues that our decision in Acosta, 718 F.3d at 806, created uncertainty as to the state of the law. But Detective Tucker misunderstands Acosta. There, police arrested Acosta in January 2006 for violating a municipal ordinance prohibiting disorderly conduct at city council meetings. . . . We correctly concluded that 'at the time of the Council meeting,' there was no clearly established right to be free from a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause. . . . Since Acosta only addressed the state of the law in January 2006, it has no effect on the state of the law in July 2013, the time of Detective Tucker's conduct. Neither Skoog nor Ford had any place in the Acosta inquiry. In contrast, by the time of Detective Tucker's conduct in 2013, Skoog had clearly established the right. That the decision in Acosta was issued in 2013 is therefore irrelevant because the decisive inquiry is the state of the law at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . Finally, Detective Tucker argues that the facts of then-existing case law are distinguishable from the facts of this case. But '[a] right can be clearly established despite a lack of factually analogous preexisting case law, and officers can be on notice that their conduct is unlawful even in novel factual circumstances.' . . . By the time of Detective Tucker's conduct, Ninth Circuit precedent had long provided notice to officers that 'an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action.' . . . Detective Tucker's belief that his conduct was not unlawful because he thoroughly investigated and made the decision to arrest after lesser alternatives failed does not vitiate such notice. A reasonable officer in Detective Tucker's position had fair notice that the First Amendment prohibited arresting Plaintiffs for the content of their speech, notwithstanding probable cause. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Detective Tucker.")

DePaul Industries v. Miller, 14 F.4th 1021, 1029 (9th Cir. 2021) ("We have explained that '[w]e have been somewhat hesitant to rely on district court decisions' as clearly establishing law for purposes of qualified immunity. . . This case validates our hesitancy to rely on district court decisions for the qualified immunity analysis. In sum, DePaul has not provided any precedent addressing Oregon’s QRF [“qualified nonprofit agency for individuals with disabilities”] statute or anything closely related. While a case need not be ‘directly on point’ to put ‘the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,’ . . . all of the cases relied on by DePaul and the district court are too far from ‘on point. There is simply no precedent ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.’ . . We hesitate to opine further about the meaning of Oregon’s QRF statute without additional guidance from Oregon courts. But we need not do so to resolve Miller’s appeal. As Miller observes, ‘until the district court’s orders in this case, no court had ever interpreted Oregon’s QRF statute to create a protected property interest.’ Given the dearth of law on this issue, we conclude that the property right asserted by DePaul was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.”)

Gordon v. County of Orange (Gordon II), 6 F.4th 961, 969 (9th Cir. 2021) (“The plaintiff ‘bears the burden of showing that the rights allegedly violated were clearly established.’ . . However, because resolving whether the asserted federal right was clearly established presents a pure question of law, we draw on our ‘full knowledge’ of relevant precedent rather than restricting our review to cases identified by the plaintiff. . . Ultimately, ‘the prior precedent must be “controlling”—from the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a “consensus” of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction.”)

Hines v. Youseff, 914 F.3d 1218, 1229-30 (9th Cir. 2019) (“The inmates’ alleged constitutional right would be ‘clearly established’ if ‘controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ had previously held that it is cruel and unusual punishment to expose prisoners to a heightened risk of Valley Fever. . . But no such precedent exists. The inmates argue that several of our memorandum dispositions clearly establish their right to not face an unreasonable risk of Valley Fever. But memorandum dispositions do not establish law. . .They are, at best, persuasive authority. And more importantly, none of the cited memorandum dispositions held that inmates have an Eighth Amendment right to not be exposed to a heightened risk of Valley Fever. . .The inmates also point us to unpublished district court decisions about Valley Fever exposure. We have previously said that unpublished district court decisions ‘may inform our qualified immunity analysis.’ . . But we have also noted that ‘it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.’ . . And at most, the cited district court opinions show that the law was developing—not that it was already clearly established. . .We therefore conclude that when the officials acted, existing Valley Fever cases did not clearly establish that they were violating the Eighth Amendment.”)

Moonin v. Tice, 868 F.3d 853, 868, 870, 872 , 875 (9th Cir. 2017) (“We first look to binding precedent to determine whether a right is clearly established. . . ‘In the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, “we look to whatever decisional law is available,”’ including relevant decisions of other circuits, state courts, and district courts. . . As an initial matter, it was clear in 2011 that some of the speech impacted by Tice’s edict was protected by the First Amendment. As early as Pickering, it was clear that employees’ opinions about the proper way to administer government agencies, when conveyed in that employee’s capacity as a private citizen, constituted protected speech. . . Controlling precedent also made clear in 2011 that it was generally unconstitutional to punish a police officer for speaking out about malfeasance or mismanagement in the department. . . Tice was therefore clearly on notice that a policy precluding all sorts of speech by officers, to whomever communicated, about the K9 program was subject to limits imposed by the First Amendment. Moreover, it was abundantly clear in 2011 that ex ante restrictions on employee speech are more constitutionally problematic than after-the-fact decisions to punish a particular employee for his speech. . . Without more, the marriage of these two precepts in large part resolves this case. Tice’s policy was written so broadly as to promise punishment for some speech that, as of 2011, clearly received constitutional protection. In light of the Supreme Court’s emphasis on identifying clearly established law “‘particularized” to the facts of the case,’ . . however, we consider in detail cases addressing analogous employer prior restraints on speech. These cases demonstrate that the First Amendment right Tice violated was clearly established at the time he sent his email. . . . Controlling case law addressing flat prohibitions on employee speech is, and was in 2011, limited. But Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent emphatically signaled that a policy prohibiting public discussion of matters of public concern by employees of a particular government program, without a countervailing showing of substantial workplace disruption, was much too broad to be constitutional. . . . Because there is limited controlling precedent on point, we turn to persuasive authority. . . We conclude that persuasive cases addressing more closely analogous regulations would have made reasonable government officials quite aware, had they any doubt, that Tice’s edict ran afoul of the First Amendment. . . .In short, a ‘robust consensus’ of prior cases made clear at the time Tice issued his edict that an employer ordinarily. . . may not prohibit its employees from all public discussion relating to a particular department or government program. . . Tice’s policy did just that, making punishable any direct communication ‘regarding the [NHP] K9 program or interdiction program,’ with no attempt to tailor the speech restrictions to NHP’s legitimate interests. Accordingly, we hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Government employers have significant and legitimate interests in managing the speech of their employees, particularly where the employees’ speech pertains to their work. And policies explaining how sensitive information ordinarily should be handled benefit both employers and employees. We make clear today, however, that a public employer generally may not subject all employee speech regarding a particular government program—whether fact or opinion, and whether liable to disrupt the workplace or not—to a blanket ban. A government employer’s policies imposing prior restraints on their employees’ speech as citizens on matters of public concern must bear a ‘close and rational relationship’ to the employer’s legitimate interests, and the broad policy Tice announced did not meet this standard. This conclusion was compelled by prior case law at the time Tice sent his missive. We therefore hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity[.]”)

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1005 n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) (“The dissent suggests that our cases, such as Rogers, Mabe, and Wallis, cannot furnish clearly established law because other circuits disagree with them. . . . However, this court regularly finds a principle to be clearly established based solely on its own decisions. See Kirkpatrick, 2015 WL 4154039, at *9–*10 (finding an infant’s right not to be seized from his mother’s custody at the hospital clearly established based on Rogers); Rogers, 487 F.3d at 1297 (finding the law governing removal of children from the home without judicial authorization clearly established based on Mabe, Wallis, and Ram v. Rubin, 118 F.3d 1306 (9th Cir.1997)). We must continue to rely on our own cases to determine whether the law is clearly established until this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court tells us that we may not.”)

Carrillo v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210, 1221 n.13 (9th Cir. 2015) (“In recent cases, the Supreme Court has assumed for the sake of argument without explicitly holding that ‘controlling Court of Appeals’ authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law.’ Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012); see also Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014). None of these cases has overruled Hope or called its exclusive reliance on circuit precedent into question.”)

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 701, 702 (9th Cir. 2005) (“In determining whether PLN’s rights in this case were clearly established, and whether a reasonable person would have known his or her actions violated these rights, we may look at unpublished decisions and the law of other circuits, in addition to Ninth Circuit precedent.”).

Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773, 781-83 (9th Cir. 2004) (“The Supreme Court has provided little guidance as to where courts should look to determine whether a particular right was clearly established at the time of the injury. . . . In the Ninth Circuit, we begin our inquiry by looking to binding precedent. . . . If the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or this Circuit, our inquiry should come to an end. On the other hand, when ‘there are relatively few cases on point, and none of them are binding,’ we may inquire whether the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court, at the time the out-of-circuit opinions were rendered, would have reached the same results. . . . Thus, in the absence of binding precedent, we “look to whatever decisional law is available to ascertain whether the law is clearly established” for qualified immunity purposes, “including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts.”. . . In October 1997, neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit had provided any guidance as to when the use of flash-bangs constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. Thus, we must ask whether, despite the absence of binding precedent, there was sufficient non-binding authority to place the officers on notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances would be excessive. By October 1997, two circuit courts and one state court had addressed the use of flash-bangs within the context of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Taken together, Baker, Garner, and Myers, in October 1997, failed to provide the officers in this case with the requisite level of guidance to put them on notice that using the flash-bang in these circumstances violated Boyd’s Fourth Amendment rights. In fact, Baker, Garner, and Myers all hold that the use of flash-bang devices was reasonable under their respective facts. . . . In sum, we conclude that without any guidance from this Circuit and an absence of non-binding authority that otherwise clearly establishes the right, the officers here were not put on sufficient notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances was unconstitutional.”).

Bahrampour v. Lampert, 356 F.3d 969, 977 (9th Cir. 2004) (“When Mr. Bahrampour’s subscription to the Green Lantern comic book was rejected in January 2000, there was no appellate decision that held that restrictions on the receipt of bulk mail were unconstitutional. One federal district court decision from a different district had held that a similar regulation was unconstitutional. Two unpublished decisions from the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, however, had held that the ODC bulk mail regulations at issue were constitutional. Thirteen months after ODC rejected the Green Lantern comic book, we held that prohibiting inmates’ receipt of non-profit bulk mail was unconstitutional, noting that ‘[t]he speech at issue is core protected speech, not commercial speech or speech whose content is objectionable on security or other grounds.’ We also held in Prison Legal News that ‘[b]ecause the contours of [the constitutional right at issue] were not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right, the law in this case was not clearly established.’ . . . Reasonable prison officials would have no basis for assuming that regulations prohibiting bulk mail were unconstitutional in the face of two district court decisions from the district in which the prison is located which had concluded that the precise regulations at issue were not unconstitutional. The fact that there was a conflict in the views of district court judges on the issue demonstrates that the constitutionality of the regulations was not clearly established until this court held, eighteen months later, that prohibiting the receipt of commercial bulk mail is unconstitutional. The district court did not err in its determination that the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity because prison inmates had no clearly established right to receive commercial bulk mail at the time of the rejection of the Green Lantern comic book subscription.” [internal citations omitted])

Rivero v. City and County of San Francisco, 316 F.3d 857, 864, 865 (9th Cir. 2002) (“We now hold that it was clearly established in 1993 that state employees could not cause the termination of a two-year for-profit government contract in retaliation for the contracting party’s exercise of his First Amendment rights to speak out on a matter of public concern. Although we had not specifically held prior to 1993 that such a contract was a ‘valuable governmental benefit’ for purposes of First Amendment retaliation law, a reasonable person would have known from Pickering, Perry and Hyland I that this was the law in this circuit. . . . [T]he fact that there was a circuit split does not mean that the law was not clear in this circuit prior to the Court’s decision in Umbehr. It was clear, and the Supreme Court’s decision in Umbehr merely confirmed what was already the law in this circuit. The issue is not what the law was or might have been in other circuits in 1993. It is, rather, what the ‘controlling authority in [the defendants’] jurisdiction[was] at the time of the incident.’”).

Sorreles v. McKee, 290 F.3d 965, 970, 971 (9th Cir. 2002) (“The existence of binding precedent holding unconstitutional a prison policy requiring inmates to pay for publications received would easily dispose of prong two. The law would be clearly established and defendants’ qualified immunity defense would fail. However, neither the district court, nor the parties, nor our own research has unearthed Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court caselaw on point predating our 1999 decision in Crofton v. Roe. We next look to the decisions of our sister Circuits, district courts, and state courts. . . . However, either Washington’s policy was unique among state prisons, or no other state’s prisoners had seen fit to challenge similar policies, as there appear to be no published decisions on point prior to 1999 in any jurisdiction, at any level, concerning the constitutionality of a prison regulation requiring inmates to pay for publications they receive. Still this does not end our inquiry. In deciding the second prong of qualified immunity, ‘[i]t is not necessary that the alleged acts have been previously held unconstitutional, as long as the unlawfulness [of defendants’ actions] was apparent in light of preexisting law’ In other words, while there may be no published cases holding similar policies constitutional, this may be due more to the obviousness of the illegality than the novelty of the legal issue. . . . Considering the complete lack of published decisions on point and the fact that defendants reasonably could have believed that the ‘no gift publication’ policy was constitutional, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established until we decided Crofton v. Roe in 1999. Sorrels also urges us to consider two unpublished district court decisions in determining whether the law was clearly established We have held that unpublished decisions of district courts may inform our qualified immunity analysis. See Prison Legal News v. Cook, 238 F.3d 1145, 1152 (9th Cir.2001) (relying on unpublished district court cases). The district court rulings in Ocanaz and Spalding do not change our conclusion that the law was not clearly established. At most, they show that the law was in the process of becoming established. This is not surprising, as it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.”).

Carey v. Nevada Gaming Control Board, 279 F.3d 873, 881, 882 & n.8 (9th Cir. 2002) (“As discussed above, there are two Ninth Circuit cases directly on point, Lawson and Martinelli, which unambiguously hold that compelling an individual to identify himself during a Terry stop violates the Fourth Amendment. Those cases invalidated state statutes that authorized arrests based on the detained individual’s refusal to identify himself. In addition, Lawson and Martinelli are in accord with Supreme Court pronouncements on this issue. . . . Based on the foregoing, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Spendlove’s position would have known that Carey had a clearly established Fourth Amendment right not to identify himself, and that the Nevada statutes at issue, like the statutes in Lawson and Martinelli, were unconstitutional to the extent they allowed Carey to be arrested for exercising his rights. . . . We note that some federal courts in other circuits have concluded there is no clearly established right to refuse to identify oneself during an investigative stop. [citing cases] These courts relied on the fact that the Supreme Court has twice declined to decide whether a person can be compelled to identify himself during a lawful investigatory stop. If we had only the Supreme Court’s precedents to guide us, we might also conclude that the right was not clearly established. However, unlike our sister circuits, we have the benefit of two precedents on point in our own circuit, in addition to Supreme Court dicta that supports these precedents. We think this is sufficient to clearly establish the right in our circuit.”). [But see Hiibel

P.B. v. Koch, 96 F.3d 1298, 1304 (9th Cir. 1996) (“In light of the Supreme Court’s holding that students are protected from unjustified intrusions on personal security and out-of-circuit cases holding that arbitrary corporal punishment is unconstitutional, no reasonable principal could think it constitutional to intentionally punch, slap, grab, and slam students into lockers.”).

Romero v. Kitsap County, 931 F.2d 624 (9th Cir. 1991) (in absence of binding precedent, court should look at all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Jordan v. Jenkins, 73 F.4th 1162, 1169 n. 3 (10th Cir. 2023) (“The Deputies also argue that Mr. Jordan forfeited reliance on Hill because he cited it for the first time on appeal. This is factually incorrect because Mr. Jordan did cite Hill below when opposing the Deputies’ motion for summary judgment. . . . Even if he had not, though, we would not need to ignore Hill because ‘[a] court engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should [] use its “full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.”’”)

Martinez v. Jenneiahn, No. 22-1219, 2023 WL 4482404, at *6–7 (10th Cir. July 12, 2023) (not reported) (“[T]wo cases from one other circuit are insufficient to clearly establish the law. See Irizarry, 38 F.4th at 1294-95 (finding clearly established law where six other circuits had agreed on the issue and a previous Tenth Circuit opinion had ‘indicated [] without reservation’ the same agreement); Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1294 (10th Cir. 2020) (law clearly established by cases in six other circuits); Robbins v. Wilkie, 433 F.3d 755, 770 (10th Cir. 2006) rev’d and remanded on other grounds, 551 U.S. 537 (2007) (law clearly established by cases in five other circuits); Anaya v. Crossroads Managed Care Sys., Inc., 195 F.3d 584, 595 (10th Cir. 1999) (law clearly established by cases in six other circuits). . . . Because Mr. Martinez has not shown that the Officers’ actions violated the clearly established law of this circuit or that ‘the alleged right is clearly established from case law in other circuits,’ we affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity and summary judgment on Mr. Martinez’s excessive force claim.”)

Frey v. Town of Jackson, Wyoming, 41 F.4th 1223, 1235 (10th Cir. 2022) (“Plaintiff must show that clearly established First Amendment law prohibits the force applied against him under the circumstances. In other words, Plaintiff must show that it was clearly established at the time of the incident that the force Karnes used would ‘chill a person of ordinary firmness’ from engaging in protected speech. In his attempt to do so, Plaintiff cited in his opening brief only one case about retaliatory use of force—Youngblood v. Qualls, 308 F. Supp. 3d 1184 (D. Kan. 2018). A single case from a district court does not show the ‘weight of authority’ required to clearly establish law.”)

McWilliams v. Dinapoli, 40 F.4th 1118, 1128 (10th Cir. 2022) (“We’ve held that a right is clearly established when a reasonable officer would have recognized the unconstitutionality of the conduct based on existing precedent. . . Despite our holdings, Mr. DiNapoli argues that only Supreme Court opinions can clearly establish a right, citing Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, — U.S. —, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam). Rivas-Villegas assumed without deciding that circuit precedent can clearly establish law. . . This assumption conforms to our precedents, which state that our own case law can clearly establish a constitutional right. . . So when the Supreme Court made a similar assumption in District of Columbia v. Wesby, . . . we rejected the argument that Mr. DiNapoli makes here. See Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1292 (10th Cir. 2020) (noting that our precedents, other circuits’ decisions, and dicta from Supreme Court opinions all showed that circuit precedent can clearly establish rights). We thus consider whether our precedent or Supreme Court caselaw clearly established the constitutional right.”)

Irizarry v. Yehia, 38 F.4th 1282, 1294-96 (10th Cir. 2022) (“In May 2019, when the incident occurred, Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established right to film the traffic stop based on the persuasive weight of authority from six other circuits and our decision in Western Watersheds. Officer Yehia’s obvious interference with that right, motivated by Mr. Irizarry’s protected conduct, was a violation of clearly established law. . . . Although neither the Supreme Court nor the Tenth Circuit has recognized a First Amendment right to record the police performing their duties in public, we hold that the right was clearly established here based on the persuasive authority from six other circuits, which places the constitutional question ‘beyond debate.’. . Our opinion in Western Watersheds also supports this conclusion. As we said in Ullery, ‘In the absence of binding precedent specifically adjudicating the right at issue, the right may still be clearly established based on a “consensus of cases of persuasive authority” from other jurisdictions.’. . And the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. . . As discussed, the First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have all concluded in published opinions that the First Amendment protects a right to film the police performing their duties in public. Four of those opinions—Fordyce, Glik, Fields, and Turner—involved facts materially similar to those here: the plaintiffs, like Mr. Irizarry, were attempting to film the police performing their official duties but were dissuaded from doing so either because they were arrested, detained, or physically deterred. . . Alvarez involved a pre-enforcement challenge to a statute that made it a felony to film police officers in public. All six decisions held there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public, which clearly establishes the law in this circuit. Moreover, in Western Watersheds, we indicated, without reservation, that filming the police performing their duties in public is protected under the First Amendment. 869 F.3d at 1196 (“An individual who photographs animals or takes notes about habitat conditions is creating speech in the same manner as an individual who records a police encounter.”). Although this statement, on its own, may be insufficient to satisfy prong two of qualified immunity, it supports the conclusion that a reasonable officer would have known there was a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. Finally, Mr. Irizarry’s right to film the police falls squarely within the First Amendment’s core purposes to protect free and robust discussion of public affairs, hold government officials accountable, and check abuse of power. . . We have no doubt that Mr. Irizarry had a clearly established First Amendment right to film the traffic stop in May 2019. . . . Officer Yehia argues that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public cannot be clearly established unless a previous Tenth Circuit case has already recognized the right. But we have repeatedly stated that ‘the weight of authority from other courts can clearly establish a right.’ . . And we have held that decisions from other circuits clearly established the law when at least six circuits had recognized the right at issue. . . Officer Yehia also argues that Frasier v. Evans, shows that the right to film police officers performing their duties in public was not clearly established as of May 2019. We disagree. In Frasier, the plaintiff filmed police officers arresting a suspect in 2014. . . After the arrest, officers allegedly intimidated the plaintiff and threatened to arrest him if he did not hand the video over to them. . . The plaintiff brought a § 1983 First Amendment claim against the officers, alleging that they retaliated against him for filming the suspect’s arrest. . . We held the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because, when the incident occurred on August 14, 2014, the law was not clearly established that the First Amendment protected a right to record police officers performing their official duties in public. . . We rejected the plaintiff’s argument that ‘general First Amendment principles protecting the creation of speech and the gathering of news [] provide[d] clearly established law.’ . . And we were not persuaded by the plaintiff’s alternative argument that the weight of authority from other circuits clearly established the law. . . Although we assumed that, as of August 2014, four decisions—Alvarez, Glik, Smith, and Fordyce—recognized a right to film police performing their duties in public, we said those cases did not clearly establish the law in our circuit because our sibling circuits had ‘disagreed regarding whether this purported First Amendment right to record was clearly established around August 2014.’ . . Frasier does not undercut our clearly-established-law analysis for two reasons. First, the legal landscape has changed since August 2014 when the incident in Frasier occurred. Between August 2014 and May 2019, the Third and Fifth Circuits joined the four other circuits in concluding there is a First Amendment right to film the police performing their duties in public. . . And, as noted above, we have held that the weight of authority from other circuits may clearly establish the law when at least six other circuits have recognized the right at issue. See, e.g., Ullery, 949 F.3d at 1294. Second, when analyzing whether the weight of authority from other circuits clearly establishes the law in this circuit, we have said the relevant inquiry is whether there is consensus regarding the existence of the constitutional right at issue. . . Courts determine whether a constitutional right exists and whether it has been violated from holdings made at the first step of qualified immunity. . . As of May 2019, six circuits had determined that the First Amendment guarantees a right to film the police performing their duties in public. No other circuit has concluded otherwise. The substantial weight of this authority, along with our decision in Western Watersheds, would have put a reasonable officer in Officer Yehia’s position on notice that Mr. Irizarry had a right to film the police conducting the traffic stop.”)

George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1258 n.4 (10th Cir. 2022) (“The Supreme Court has left open whether only its precedent may clearly establish law. See D.C. v. Wesby, — U.S. —, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8, 199 L.Ed.2d 453 (2018) (“We have not yet decided what precedents—other than our own—qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity.”); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, — U.S. —, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam) (“Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of § 1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case.”). Yet ‘we do not think only Supreme Court precedents are relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established.’ Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1292 (10th Cir. 2020).”)

Swanson v. Griffin, No. 21-2034, 2022 WL 570079, at *1-4 & n.2 (10th Cir. Feb. 25, 2022) (not reported) (“Mr. Swanson commenced an action alleging Mr. Griffin’s Facebook profile was a public forum and Mr. Griffin had engaged in viewpoint discrimination, in violation of the First Amendment. Mr. Griffin filed a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss raising a qualified immunity defense. The district court denied the motion, relying on out-of-circuit authority to conclude the law clearly established that (1) social media platforms are entitled to the same First Amendment protection as other public speech platforms and (2) a government official censoring speech violates the speaker’s First Amendment rights. We reverse. The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed lower courts not to define rights at a high level of generality when considering a qualified immunity defense. Furthermore, two of the three out-of-circuit cases relied on by Mr. Swanson are off-point, and a single out-of-circuit case is not capable of clearly establishing a proposition of law. . . . To demonstrate that the law is clearly established under the ‘weight of authority’ approach, a plaintiff must identify more than ‘a handful of decisions from courts in other circuits that lend support to his claim.’. . . While ‘the Supreme Court has “repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,”’ it has also explained that ‘ “officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.”’. . . But more recent Supreme Court case law remarks that ‘the clearly established law must be ‘particularized’ to the facts of the case.’. . . And plaintiffs may not identify their claim through ‘extremely abstract rights’ because this would ‘convert the rule of qualified immunity into a rule of virtually unqualified liability.’. . . Ultimately, we must assess whether ‘existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . We conclude Mr. Swanson did not carry his burden on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis. While Mr. Swanson has identified some generally applicable rules of law, Mr. Swanson has not identified a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case addressing a set of facts sufficiently similar to those surrounding Mr. Griffin’s Facebook profile. Furthermore, although Mr. Swanson attempts to rely on out-of-circuit authority to demonstrate that the right he asserts is clearly established under the weight of authority approach, only one of the three out-of-circuit decisions is potentially on-point. But a plaintiff’s identification of a single out-of-circuit case is not sufficient to satisfy the weight of authority approach. . . . Mr. Swanson, critically, has not identified law clearly establishing when an individual government official’s social media profile becomes a public forum. The Supreme Court has not addressed this question. . . . Nor has Mr. Swanson identified any decision by this court addressing this question. Rather, Mr. Swanson relies upon three out-of-circuit cases: (1) Davison v. Randall, 912 F.3d 666 (4th Cir. 2019); (2) Robinson v. Hunt Cnty., 921 F.3d 440 (5th Cir. 2019); and (3) Knight First Amendment Institute at Columbia University v. Trump, 928 F.3d 226 (2d Cir. 2019). We discuss each in turn. [court distinguishes Davison and Robinson] Finally, Mr. Swanson relies upon the Second Circuit’s decision in Knight First Amendment Institute. We need not analyze whether this decision is on-point with the facts alleged in Mr. Swanson’s complaint. This is because a single out-of-circuit case does not satisfy the weight of authority approach for demonstrating the law is clearly established. . . Accordingly, even assuming the Second Circuit decision is on-point, Mr. Swanson has not carried his burden on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis.² [fn.2: Even if we had concluded Davison shared a sufficient nexus of facts with the allegations in Mr. Swanson’s complaint, two out-of-circuit decisions—Davison and the Second Circuit’s decision in Knight First Amendment Institute—would not amount to a sufficient body of out-of-circuit case law to satisfy the weight of authority approach.”)

Crane v. Utah Department of Corrections, 15 F.4th 1296, 1305-07 (10th Cir. 2021) (“Ms. Crane contends that ‘placing the seriously mentally ill in solitary confinement can constitute deliberate indifference.’ . . . That is, she argues there is a clearly established constitutional right of all seriously mentally ill inmates not to be placed in solitary confinement. In support, Ms. Crane cites four district court cases from outside this circuit. Even if they were controlling, these cases do not carry the weight she places upon them. . . . These cases share a common theme. They stand for the proposition that isolating mentally ill inmates in conditions that seriously and predictably exacerbate their mental illness is cruel and unusual when the official has subjective knowledge of both the mental illness and the impact of isolation. Although these trial court decisions may portend future legal developments, they do not constitute clearly established law capable of overcoming qualified immunity here. District court cases lack the precedential weight necessary to clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes. . . . And Ms. Crane cites no on-point decisions from this circuit or the Supreme Court, nor decisions from any other circuit court, that hold punitive isolation of mentally ill inmates violates the Eighth Amendment in the absence of knowledge that a specific inmate is suicidal. Thus, the CUCF Defendants’ general use of punitive isolation to discipline prisoners who happen to be mentally ill does not violate clearly established law. . . . Ms. Crane . . . argues that ‘housing seriously mentally ill prisoners at risk of suicide in cells that facilitated hanging constituted deliberate indifference.’ . . . However, she does not support this claim with any precedent from the Supreme Court or this circuit—which is ordinarily required to demonstrate a right is clearly established. . . . And even the out-of-circuit cases she cites do not stand for the proposition asserted. Specifically, the cited cases do not clearly establish that confining suicidal inmates in cells that facilitate hanging is unconstitutional per se. Rather, these cases stand for a more limited proposition that does not expand the right recognized by this circuit’s deliberate indifference jurisprudence. Namely, as we explained in Cox v. Glanz, prison officials are deliberately indifferent if they fail to take reasonable steps to protect a pre-trial detainee or an inmate from suicide when they have subjective knowledge that person is a substantial suicide risk.”)

Crane v. Utah Department of Corrections, 15 F.4th 1296, 1317, 1320-21 (10th Cir. 2021) (Bacharach, J., concurring) (“We stated in Cox v. Glanz that our precedents had long held that prison officials incur liability for deliberate indifference if they know ‘that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide’ and disregard that risk. . . The majority does not consider this theory because Ms. Crane did not cite Cox in her opening brief. . . This omission bears significance to the majority, which states that ‘the plaintiff bears the burden of citing to us what he thinks constitutes clearly established law.’. . But the plaintiff bears the burden only to present an argument for a clearly established right. Ms. Crane did that. . . . Even the defendants acknowledge Ms. Crane’s reliance on cases providing liability under the Eighth Amendment for a prison suicide when the official knows and disregards ‘a substantial and significant risk that the defendant may imminently seek to commit suicide.’. . Regardless of whether Ms. Crane cited Cox for this argument, we must consider the applicable case law. [citing Elder v. Holloway] So I would consider Ms. Crane’s theory of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of suicide. . . . In my view, we should consider all of the pertinent case law, including our recognition of a sliding scale and Cox. But reasonable prison officials might regard long stints of solitary confinement as constitutional even for a mentally ill prisoner. Given the lack of a judicial consensus in 2014, how could a prison official have regarded a possible constitutional violation as obvious? And in my view, Ms. Crane failed to allege that any of the individual defendants recognized a substantial suicide risk. So she did not state a claim that would trigger liability under Cox.”)

Williams v. Hansen, 5 F.4th 1129, 1133 (10th Cir. 2021) (“Our review is not limited to the opinions cited by Mr. Williams. In determining whether a right is clearly established, we are conducting de novo review of a legal issue, which requires consideration of all relevant case law. Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 516, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994); see also Cortez v. McCauley, 478 F.3d 1108, 1122 n.19 (10th Cir. 2007) (en banc) (“While it is true that Plaintiffs should cite to what constitutes clearly established law, we are not restricted to the cases cited by them.”).”)

Estate of Smart by Smart v. City of Wichita, 951 F.3d 1161, 1183 n.2 (10th Cir. 2020) (Bacharach, J., dissenting) (“Mr. Smart did not present this case law when arguing the clearly established prong in district court. But ‘appellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.’ Elder v. Holloway, 510 U.S. 510, 512, 114 S.Ct. 1019, 127 L.Ed.2d 344 (1994). So we must consider these opinions.”)

Ullery v. Bradley, 949 F.3d 1282, 1290-94, 1298-1301 (10th Cir. 2020) (“Because the sexual misconduct alleged here is unquestionably ‘repugnant to the conscience of mankind[.]’. . it is unsurprising Defendant has elected not to challenge the district court’s conclusion regarding the existence of a constitutional violation. To be sure, Defendant’s alleged actions—(1) approaching Plaintiff from behind and forcibly pressing his genitals into her buttocks while lasciviously moaning ‘mmmmmm’ in her ear; (2) purposefully and knowingly using physical force against Plaintiff by touching her breasts; and (3) forcibly grabbing and fondling Plaintiff’s crotch without her consent—are each sufficiently serious to satisfy the Eighth Amendment’s objective component and without any penological justification. Given the factual circumstances of this case, any one of these three alleged uses of force, even when viewed in isolation, deeply offends contemporary standards of decency and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment. . . . Despite the intolerable conduct at issue, Defendant is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff has carried her burden of showing the law was clearly established. For the reasons discussed below, we conclude Plaintiff has, for all relevant purposes, satisfied this burden. . . . Specifically, the clearly established weight of persuasive authority in our sister circuits as of August 11, 2015, would have put any reasonable corrections officer in Defendant's position on notice his alleged conduct would violate the Eighth Amendment. Because Plaintiff's asserted right to be free from sexual abuse was clearly established at the relevant time, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Relying on a footnote in Wesby, Defendant argues only the Supreme Court can clearly establish law in the particular circumstances of a case. . . . While Wesby may have suggested this is an open question, we do not think only Supreme Court precedents are relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established. [referencing Wilson v. Layne] In recent years, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that 'qualified immunity is lost when plaintiffs point either to "cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident" or to "a consensus of cases of persuasive authority."' . . . Following the Supreme Court's lead, nearly all of our sister circuits, like us, consider both binding circuit precedent and decisions from other circuits in determining whether the law is clearly established. [collecting cases] . . . Defendant's argument therefore conflicts with Supreme Court authority, our precedents, and the decisions of our sister circuits. Limiting the source of clearly established law to only Supreme Court precedents also is unwarranted and impractical given the current state of the doctrine. Such a restriction would transform qualified immunity into an absolute bar to constitutional claims in most cases—thereby skewing the intended balance of holding public officials accountable while allowing them to perform their duties reasonably without fear of personal liability and harassing litigation. . . . Accordingly, Defendant's position is untenable. . . . Neither the district court nor Plaintiff have identified any case from the Supreme Court or this court squarely addressing whether Defendant's alleged conduct violates the Eighth Amendment. Our clearly-established-law inquiry, however, does not end here. Despite the lack of on-point, binding authority addressing the issue, we must now consider whether the right was clearly established based on either a consensus of persuasive authority or general constitutional principles. . . . In the absence of binding precedent specifically adjudicating the right at issue, the right may still be clearly established based on a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions. . . . Plaintiff argues the clearly established weight of out-of-circuit authorities would have put any reasonable corrections officer in Defendant's position on notice his conduct violated the Constitution. Accordingly, we now proceed to examine the relevant decisions of our sister circuits addressing the right of inmates under the Eighth Amendment to be free from sexual abuse. . . . The consensus of persuasive authority from our sister circuits since August 11, 2015, places the constitutional question in this case 'beyond debate.' . . . The Second, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits have all held—in published decisions involving materially analogous facts—sexual abuse of the nature alleged here violates the Eighth Amendment. Even more, the Third and Sixth Circuits have recognized an inmate's right to be free from sexual abuse under the Eighth Amendment was clearly established at the time of Defendant's unlawful conduct. . . . Given the persuasive authority in the Second, Third, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Circuits, we are compelled to conclude Plaintiff's right to be free from sexual abuse was clearly established under the Eighth Amendment. Following Crawford I, no ‘reasonable [corrections] officer, looking at the entire legal landscape at the time of the [alleged sexual misconduct], could have interpreted the law as permitting’ Defendant’s actions. . . . If Defendant did not ‘knowingly violate the law’ when he sexually abused Plaintiff, which we doubt is the case here, then he is ‘plainly incompetent.’. . . Either way, qualified immunity affords Defendant no shelter for the alleged constitutional violations he committed after August 11, 2015. . . . In sum, persuasive out-of-circuit authority addressing the constitutional right in question was not divided or otherwise unclear following the Second Circuit’s decision in Crawford I. Defendant violated clearly established Eighth Amendment law by: (1) approaching Plaintiff from behind and forcibly pressing his genitals into her buttocks while lasciviously moaning ‘mmmmmm’ in her ear; (2) purposefully and knowingly using physical force against Plaintiff by touching her breasts; and (3) forcibly grabbing and fondling Plaintiff’s crotch without her consent. Moreover, based on the consensus of persuasive authority addressing the right in question, any one of these three uses of force on its own—regardless of whether Plaintiff’s allegations are viewed in isolation or as a pattern of pervasive sexual abuse—violated clearly established law. Defendant does not point to a single decision from this circuit or a published opinion from one of our sister circuits—and we have found none—shedding doubt on our conclusion today. Rather, the unanimity among our sister circuits since Crawford I demonstrates the constitutional question here is ‘beyond debate.’. . . As for any sexual misconduct which occurred before August 11, 2015, we cannot agree with Plaintiff that Defendant’s alleged actions so obviously violated the Eighth Amendment there is no need for case law clearly establishing the point. Before the Second Circuit’s decision in Crawford I, it was not beyond debate Defendant’s alleged conduct satisfied the Eighth Amendment’s objective component. . . . Contrary to Plaintiff’s argument, the allegations in Boddie are quite similar to the allegations here. A reasonable officer could therefore have believed based on Boddie, which was widely followed until recent years, that the sexual abuse at issue—even if it might subject Defendant to criminal or tort liability—did not violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . We recognize our parsing of the relevant case law and time period may appear unduly formalistic considering the despicable nature of Defendant’s alleged misconduct. But this is the task required of us under the qualified-immunity precedents we are obligated to follow. And while Plaintiff asks us to reject the current qualified-immunity framework as unconstitutional, her competent counsel is well-aware it is not this appellate court’s place to issue such edicts. We, of course, decline to do so here. Nevertheless, after August 11, 2015, any reasonable corrections officer would have known Defendant’s alleged conduct violated the Eighth Amendment based upon the consensus of persuasive circuit authority addressing the right in question. . . . As we explained above, any constitutional violations Defendant committed before April 10, 2016, fall outside the applicable statute of limitations. Because all actionable constitutional violations in this case—that is, those occurring within the two-year limitation period—would necessarily have occurred after August 11, 2015, the law was clearly established for all relevant purposes here. Accordingly, Defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

that the plaintiff's proffered proposition is clearly established law or to show that the proposition is unsettled. We have held that '[a]n unpublished opinion ... provides little support for the notion that the law is clearly established on [a] point.' . . But an unpublished opinion can be quite relevant in showing that the law was not clearly established. If we make the collegial, and quite legitimate, assumption that panels of this court render reasonable decisions, we would be hard pressed to say that a proposition of law was clearly established at a time when an unpublished opinion by a panel of this court said the opposite. To do so we would have to say that the panel's decision was contrary to clearly established law at the time it was rendered. Our assumption does not require us to credit the unpublished opinion as being correct, only as being debatably correct. And there is perhaps a more important reason to presume that an unpublished decision was not contrary to clearly established law at the time. The purpose of the qualified-immunity test is to limit liability to those public officials who are 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate the law.' . . This purpose would be ill served if liability were imposed on an official for conduct that had been held to be lawful, even in an unpublished opinion, by the federal appellate court with jurisdiction over the conduct, at least in the absence of later contrary authority issued before the official acted. Could we properly say that an official was plainly incompetent for taking guidance from an unpublished appellate opinion? . . . The argument favoring consideration of an unpublished opinion is particularly compelling if the same alleged victim and same defendant conduct are involved.")

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1174-75 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Grissom alleges he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because (1) 20 years in solitary created a substantial risk of serious harm, and (2) the defendants knew of but disregarded that harm. Pointing to various academic literature and government reports (both domestic and international), he appeals to us to recognize '[s]ociety's evolving standards of decency.' . . To overcome the defense of qualified immunity, however, Grissom must point to clearly established law. . . That, he has failed to do. He states, 'A growing number of courts have concluded denying the basic human needs of social interaction and environmental stimulation can violate the Eighth Amendment, especially when the deprivation lasts for years.' . . But the cited courts are four federal district courts, none from this circuit. That does not suffice to clearly establish the law. . . Indeed, the most recent relevant decision by this court is an unpublished opinion rejecting an Eighth Amendment claim brought by a prisoner who had been in solitary confinement for 30 years under conditions not markedly different from those here. See Silverstein v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 559 F. App'x 739, 741 (10th Cir. 2014). . . Grissom, similar to the prisoner in Silverstein, has regularly communicated with other inmates and staff and has been afforded regular exercise (including outdoor recreation) and regular access to reading materials and to medical and mental-health care. We conclude that the Prison Officials are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Sandberg v. Englewood, Colorado, 727 F. App'x 950, 961-62 (10th Cir. 2018) ("There is no case from the Tenth Circuit or the Supreme Court holding that Heller's articulation of a right to keep and bear arms inside the home must necessarily extend to a right to keep and bear arms outside the home. If anything, we have indicated the Second Amendment has some limitations when applied to conduct outside the home. . . In response to the paucity of authority on point from this court or the Supreme Court, Sandberg directs us to Justice Thomas’s dissent from the denial of certiorari in Peruta v. California, 137 S. Ct. 1995 (2017). In Peruta, a litigant asked the Court to address whether a local municipality may place restrictions on firearm possession, such as requiring a particularized reason for a concealed carry permit. The Court declined to hear the case. . . Justice Thomas and Justice Gorsuch dissented, with Justice Thomas writing that he believes ‘[t]he most natural reading of [the Second Amendment] encompasses public carry.’ . . Yet, a dissent from a denial of certiorari is not binding authority that would create clearly established law. Further, the dissent in Peruta was issued more than three years after the events of this case. Therefore, the dissent in Peruta does not clearly establish that as of May 14, 2014, a citizen had an absolute right to openly carry a firearm in public. Without a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point, Sandberg relies upon the Seventh Circuit’s opinion in Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2012). In Moore, two separate plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief against the application of an Illinois statute that prohibited the carrying of a firearm in many public places. . . Relying on its interpretation of Heller and McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010), the Seventh Circuit held that ‘[t]he Supreme Court has decided that the [Second A]mendment confers a right to bear arms for self-defense, which is as important outside the home as inside,’ because the Second Amendment is focused on ‘promot[ing] self-defense.’ . . Of the cases Sandberg cites, Moore is the only circuit court opinion to hold that the Second Amendment guarantees a citizen the right to carry a firearm in public. Other circuits have stated the same principle in dicta, but have not articulated the rule in a holding. [collecting cases] We conclude that Moore does not provide a ‘clearly established weight of authority from other courts.’ . . That one other circuit has issued an opinion which would support Sandberg’s claim does not in itself create a clearly established weight of authority. . . Instead, this court generally looks to whether a ‘majority of courts’ have adopted the rule in question, thereby making it ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer’ would understand the rule and be expected to apply it. . . Thus, when the events at issue in this case occurred it was not clearly established that the Second Amendment guaranteed a citizen the right to openly carry a firearm in public without risk of facing police action. The district court did not err in dismissing Sandberg’s Second Amendment claim.”) Leek v. Miller, 698 F. App’x 922, 928-29 (10th Cir. 2017) (“We address whether the asserted right—a protected property interest in prison accounts triggering procedural due process—was clearly established. In Clark, this circuit held that the atypical-and-significant-hardship evaluation announced in Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472 (1995), applied ‘to protected property interest inquiries.’ . . In doing so, we overruled an earlier case holding that prisoners have a protected property interest in the funds in their prison trust accounts. . . Consequently, the Gillihan holding ‘is no longer good law and, hence, not “clearly established” in this circuit.’ . . After Clark, in several unpublished decisions this circuit found it unnecessary to resolve whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. [collecting decisions] As these cases demonstrate, the law in this circuit is not clearly established whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. Mr. Leek relies on a case from the Third Circuit holding ‘the Department of Corrections’ assessment of [the prisoner’s] institutional account constituted the deprivation of a protected property interest for purposes of procedural due process.’ Burns v. Penn.

Dep't of Corr., 544 F.3d 279, 291 (3d Cir. 2008). ‘Normally, a single recent case from one circuit is not sufficient to make the law clearly established in another circuit.’ Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1397 (10th Cir. 1992) . . . Mr. Leek has not cited any Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit case, or case law from any circuits other than the Third Circuit, to support his constitutional claim. Therefore, we conclude that the district court properly granted summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds.”)

Mayfield v. Bethards, 826 F.3d 1252, 1259 (10th Cir. 2016) (“[E]ven assuming more specificity is needed, the clear weight of authority from other jurisdictions provided Deputy Bethards adequate notice that the conduct here implicated the Mayfields’ Fourth Amendment rights. See Thomas, 765 F.3d at 1194 (stating that a right is clearly established “if the clearly established weight of authority from other courts shows that the right must be as the plaintiff maintains” (internal quotation marks omitted)). Indeed, seven federal circuits had addressed the issue prior to Detective Bethards’s conduct, each holding that killing a pet dog is a Fourth Amendment seizure.”)

Van Deelen v. Johnson, 497 F.3d 1151, 1158, 1159 (10th Cir. 2007) (“We believe Mr. Van Deelen has overcome both qualified immunity hurdles. As we have already indicated, Mr. Van Deelen has alleged facts from which a reasonable jury could (though need not necessarily) conclude that a violation of the First Amendment took place. And the right at issue—to petition the government for the redress of tax grievances—has been with us and clearly established since the Sons of Liberty visited Griffin’s Wharf in Boston. Defendants respond by pointing us again to the line of cases from Kansas district courts . . . arguing that it ‘muddied the water’ sufficiently that a reasonable official would not have known that private citizens have a First Amendment right to petition on private as well as public matters. But every case discussing the public concern test in the Supreme Court has made pellucid that it applies only to public employees. . . The same is true of our own precedent. . . And none of our published opinions concerning the right of petition by private citizens has even hinted at a public concern requirement. . . The same is true of our sister circuits. . . Reliance on district court and unpublished decisions in the face of such uniform governing authority from the Supreme Court, as well as this circuit and every other circuit to have addressed the question, is not sufficient to avoid liability . . . Put simply, and taking as true Mr. Van Deelen’s version of the facts as we must, we hold (unremarkably, we think) that a reasonable government official should have clearly understood at the time of the events at issue that physical and verbal intimidation intended to deter a citizen from pursuing a private tax complaint violates that citizen’s First Amendment right to petition for the redress of grievances.”).

Gonzales v. City of Castle Rock, 366 F.3d 1093, 1117, 1118 (10th Cir. 2004) (en banc) (“In the instant case, we cannot hold that a reasonable officer would have known that a restraining order, coupled with a statute mandating its enforcement, would create a constitutionally protected property interest. No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case has so held. Nor have we found any other circuit court cases addressing this specific question. Somewhat analogous cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits have held that comprehensive state child welfare statutes created liberty interests in personal safety and the freedom from harm which gave rise to procedural due process protections. . . Likewise, two district courts, addressing facts similar to those in the present case, held that protective orders or their supporting statutes created a property interest in enforcement. . . Nevertheless, this precedent is insufficient to clearly establish the law for this circuit. Officers Ahlfinger, Brink and Ruisi are thus entitled to the affirmative defense of qualified immunity.”), rev’d on other grounds, Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 125 S. Ct. 2796 (2005).

Roska v. Peterson, 304 F.3d 982, 998, 1000 (10th Cir. 2002) (“Defendants are quite correct that there is no case directly on point, either in the Supreme Court or in this circuit. As we noted above, however, this is unnecessary. [citing Hope] A requirement of a case that is directly on point would quickly transform the qualified immunity standard into an absolute immunity standard in the vast majority of cases. . . Instead, we recognize that if the authority from other courts is heavily weighted toward plaintiff’s interpretation, or if it is clear that doctrine points toward plaintiff’s interpretation, we will still hold that the law was clearly established. . . . [W]e conclude that it was clearly established in May 1999 that the warrantless, no-knock entry into the Roska home, the warrantless seizure of Rusty, and the removal of Rusty without pre-deprivation procedures violated the Constitution.”).

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1176, 1178, 1179 (10th Cir. 2000) (“A plaintiff need not demonstrate that the specific conduct in this case had previously been held unlawful, so long as the unlawfulness was ‘apparent.’ . . . A plaintiff may satisfy his or her burden by showing that there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion on point, or that his or her proposition is supported by the weight of authority from other courts. . . . while Eastwood, Lankford, and Mangels indicate that under some circumstances, a release of personal information regarding a person by a government officer may violate a constitutionally protected right to privacy, none of the cases discuss the question whether the right to privacy protects a probationer who may be HIV positive from a limited disclosure by his or her probation officer to persons whom the probation officer believed might be affected by their contact with the probationer. The cases, therefore, did not clearly establish such a right in 1993. . . . The plaintiff asserts that no less than seven federal courts outside of the Tenth Circuit have ‘recognized the existence of a constitutionally protected privacy interest in maintaining the confidentiality of an individual’s HIV status.’ None of these cases, however, address the question we must decide. . . . None of the cases identified by the plaintiff involved a limited disclosure by a probation officer to a probationer’s sister and restaurant employer of voluntarily exposed information that the probation officer believed was necessary to protect them from the possibility of an inadvertent exposure to HIV. Though a plaintiff is not required to show that the specific conduct was previously found to have been held unlawful, there must be a substantial correspondence so that the unlawfulness was apparent. . . In the present case, the plaintiff has shown that there is ‘a clearly established right in the abstract’ to privacy from disclosure of personal information by government officials. . . The plaintiff has not shown, however, that the district court cases cited amount to a sufficient weight of authority establishing a clearly established right of privacy in this case. The plaintiff has further failed to demonstrate that the contours of that right were sufficiently clear in late 1993 so that a reasonable probation officer would understand that he or she could not disclose to a probationer's close relative or restaurant employer that the probationer had tested positive to HIV. The plaintiff has failed to demonstrate a substantial correspondence between Keenan's disclosures and conduct that has been held to violate the right to privacy in prior decisions.") .

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1181, 1182, 1186 n.8 (10th Cir. 2000) (Seymour, Chief Judge, dissenting) ("In holding that a probationer's constitutional privacy right to non-disclosure of his confidential medical information by his probation officer was not clearly established in late 1993, the majority extrapolates from the Supreme Court's bare holding in Griffin v. Wisconsin, . . . without addressing the underlying analysis and reasoning used therein, ignores other circuit precedent on point, and requires an inappropriately exacting factual similarity between prior cases and the case at bar. In my judgment, at the time of the events at issue, the law was clear that Mr. Herring enjoyed constitutional privacy protection against involuntary disclosures of personal information because there was no legitimate governmental interest in the disclosure, and Ms. Keenan's disclosure of such information was objectively unreasonable. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. . . . To demonstrate a clearly established right, a plaintiff need not identify a case holding unconstitutional the exact conduct in question. Rather, 'this circuit requires only Asome but not precise factual correspondence.'" . . . While the majority gives lip service to this standard, it then turns Griffin on its head and rejects Mr. Herring's claim because he has not cited a federal court of appeals case with exactly the same type of plaintiff and defendant, and precisely the same type of disclosure. In so doing, the majority relieves government officials of their 'incumbent' duty 'to relate established law to analogous factual settings.'").

Anaya v. Crossroads Managed Care Systems Inc., 195 F.3d 584, 595 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[B]y 1995, when the alleged conduct occurred, six circuits had considered the issue; all of them definitively held that probable cause is required for civil seizures of persons premised on self-protection or protection of the public; the earliest of those decisions dates back to 1971 . . . The weight of authority was strong enough in light of the well-established principles of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, to find the right was 'clearly established.' Furthermore, when considered in terms of whether a reasonable official would know what he is doing violates a right, it seems incredible to suggest that officers, well aware of the restrictions on their ability to deprive persons of liberty without probable cause, would not know that detaining for 'potential' intoxication infringes a constitutional right.").

Guffey v. Wyatt, 18 F.3d 869, 872 (10th Cir. 1994) ("While defendant contends that state decisional law is relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry, the role of state law remains unsettled. . . . [W]e note because state courts seldom examine federal constitutional claims, few federal courts have found state decisional law to be dispositive. . . . Accordingly, in the face of Supreme Court precedent articulating substantive constitutional rights, the defendant's claim these two Oklahoma cases somehow obscured otherwise clearly established law is simply not persuasive.").

Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493, 1498 (10th Cir. 1992) (“In determining whether the law was clearly established, we bear in mind that allegations of constitutional violations that require courts to balance competing interests may make it more difficult to find the law ‘clearly established’ when assessing claims of qualified immunity Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains. Our analysis leads us to conclude that it was not clearly established in 1986 (1) that recklessness could give rise to liability under section 1983 or (2) that a police officer could be liable under section 1983 for an injury caused not by the officer but by a suspect being chased by the officer.”).

Patrick v. Miller, 953 F.2d 1240, 1249 (10th Cir. 1992) (“The law may be found to be clearly established by reference to decisions from other circuits.... We consider the law to be ‘clearly established’ when it is well developed enough to inform the reasonable official that his conduct violates that law.”).

Compare Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 938 (1990) (relied on analogous precedent in Seventh Circuit, White v. Rochford, 592 F.2d 381 (7th Cir. 1979), to find right clearly established) and Hilliard v. City and County of Denver, 930 F.2d 1516 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 656 (1991) (two cases from other circuits did not “clearly establish” that personal security guarantee was viable in noncustodial setting).

Conner v. Rodriguez, 891 F.Supp.2d 1228, 1238, 1239 & n.9 (D.N.M. 2011) (“After evaluating the Henry and Torres cases, the Court acknowledges that the Fourth and Ninth Circuits have concluded that conduct similar to Defendant’s could potentially violate the Fourth Amendment. However, these two circuit decisions do not suffice to clearly establish that Defendant’s conduct violated Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . As an additional, and purely factual matter, the Court notes that the mistake made by Defendant and those of the officers in Purnell and Torres are not entirely equivalent. Tasers and pistols, as the circuit courts observed, have significant shape, feel, and operational differences; Defendant’s two shotguns were the same model of Remington shotguns, and functioned in the exact same way. In the other two cases, neither situation was particularly high-stress or dangerous, while Defendant was involved in a high-speed chase with a felon who had already been shot by police, had assaulted police officers with his vehicle, and was known to be armed and to have a mental imbalance. Thus even if the Fourth and Ninth Circuit cases applied strictly as precedent, Defendant would still likely be owed qualified immunity, because an application of the legal tests used by those two circuits, the facts in this case likely would come out the other way. . . . These two cases do not suffice to show that ‘the clearly established weight of authority from other courts’ agrees with them. . . . Instead, if there is any weight of authority, it appears still to lean in the opposite direction: that unintentional negligent conduct cannot establish a Fourth Amendment claim. The Court finds this result amenable to the purposes of qualified immunity. In light of the public interest of having officials who are free to vigorously carry out their duties without the need to look over their shoulders at the looming specter of personal liability, an official should be shielded from the imposition of personal liability for an honest, yet sloppy and negligent mistake made during the course of a tense and highly stressful police confrontation. . . . Because the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question that unintentionally but negligently discharging a lethal shotgun instead of a less-lethal shotgun violated Plaintiff's rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.") Prison Legal News v. Simmons, No. Civ.A. 02-4054-MLB, Civ.A. 00-3370-MLB, Civ.A. 01-3017-MLB, 2005 WL 3118043, at 7-9 (D. Kan. Nov. 22, 2005) ("[T]he question of whether a right is clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in an interesting one. All the Tenth Circuit cases to address this question in the last decade agree that the law is clearly established when there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point. . . . By contrast, there has been a change in the language used to describe the standard to be applied when neither a Supreme Court case nor a Tenth Circuit case addresses the matter. The original standard was first articulated in Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493 (10th Cir.1992), where the court said, Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.

. . . In the years following Medina, this statement was frequently quoted as the proper standard to apply when determining whether a right was clearly established. . . . Then, in Murrell v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 186 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir.1999), the circuit purported to quote the operative language from Medina; however, there was an apparent misquote, and the language in the standard was changed to read,

In order for the law to be clearly established, 'there must be a Supreme Court or other Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.' [citing Medina]

. . . Read literally, the emphasized language shrinks the scope of the 'clearly established' inquiry from looking at the weight of authority from 'other courts' to looking only at the weight of authority from 'other circuits.' Since Murrell was issued, subsequent opinions from the Tenth Circuit have been inconsistent in the language used. Some opinions use the language from Murrell. . . . Conversely, other Tenth Circuit opinions have continued to use the language from Medina. . . . Analysis of the post-Murrell cases that used the Medina 'other courts' language shows that they not only quoted the broader language, but applied it as well. . . . Taken collectively, the court concludes that the Tenth Circuit never intended Murrell to change the standard for determining when a right is clearly established in the absence of controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit authority. Given that Murrell purported to quote Medina, but inserted an error into the quote, along with the fact that Murrell never discussed changing the Medina standard, the court finds that the misquote was merely a scrivener's error. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that subsequent cases from our circuit occasionally look beyond other circuit courts when evaluating whether a right was clearly established. That conclusion notwithstanding, the fact that this error has not been discussed in a reported case from the Tenth Circuit suggests that the error may not be very significant. In other words, although the circuit may be willing to consider cases from courts beyond the federal appellate courts, the focus should normally be on cases decided by other circuits. Thus, a district court may consider any source of judicial precedent, state or federal, when making the clearly established inquiry in the absence of controlling authority; however, as a practical matter, it will require far fewer circuit court cases to make a right clearly established than it will district court or even state court cases. Moreover, this approach is only sensible in light of the controlling inquiry in all qualified immunity cases—‘whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer [in the defendant’s position] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . . The court finds that it is not reasonable to expect police officers and prison guards to stay abreast of the latest opinions out of federal district courts and state courts outside of their own jurisdiction. While a growing multitude of rulings from these lower courts might ultimately suffice to clearly establish a right not passed upon by the circuit courts, this would be a rarity. Even one or two cases from other circuits should not normally be sufficient to make a right ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes unless the right is so patently obvious that the only reason it has not been recognized by more federal appellate courts is because it has never been litigated.”) Stalley v. Cumbie, 124 F.4th 1273, 1293-98 (11th Cir. 2024) (“The particular facts of each of the cases the dissent cites make them distinguishable from the present one. As a result, they cannot and do not clearly establish for qualified immunity purposes the law that applies to this case with its materially different facts. I will discuss why that is so, explaining how each of those cases is distinguishable from this one, in Part V, below. But first, there is an additional and more general reason that all of the decisions the dissent relies on are of no use in determining whether an action or inaction amounts to deliberate indifference under controlling law. The overriding reason that the decisions are not helpful, much less controlling — much, much less clearly controlling — is that all of those decisions were decided under our old, pre-Wade deliberate indifference regime. All of those decisions used negligence-based measures (‘more than negligence’ or ‘more than gross negligence’) of deliberate indifference. That entire negligence-measure regime was recently scrapped and replaced with a criminal-recklessness-measure regime. . . As a result, all of the pre-Wade decisions, which are the foundation of the dissent’s position in this case, are obsolete, extinct, gone, insofar as establishing that deliberate indifference does exist in a post-Wade conduct case. . . All of the dissent’s old-regime decisions finding that deliberate indifference existed are beside the point because they applied either the more-than-negligence standard or the more-than-gross-negligence standard. None of them applied the more-difficult-to-meet Wade criminal recklessness standard. The entire purpose of going en banc in Wade was to throw into the judicial dumpster the unsatisfactory negligence-based measures of deliberate indifference and the decisions applying those measures, and replace them with the criminal recklessness standard and decisions applying it. . . I do not believe that Wade rendered all of our pre-Wade decisions obsolete. Each of those decisions still holds that under its particular facts the conduct involved was either more or less than negligence or more or less than gross negligence, depending on which of those two pre-Wade standards were applied. Those holdings do still exist. What has changed is that those holdings, which address only the two old, negligence-based standards, are not enough to bind a post-Wade panel to hold that deliberate indifference does exist under those facts. They are not enough to do that because the standard has changed and those pre-Wade decisions did not apply the criminal recklessness standard that Wade requires. They did not even pretend to do so. For all of these reasons, I disagree with the dissent’s attempt to survey the precedential graveyard, resurrect the dead parts of prior precedent, and Frankenstein them into life in ways that our precedential system of law never intended and does not permit. Pre-Wade decisions, applying as they did their greater-than-negligence or greater-than-gross-negligence deliberate indifference standards, cannot be used as precedent that clearly establishes deliberate indifference in the post-Wade era with its more exacting criminal recklessness standard. None of the dissent’s pre-Wade decisions — which is to say all of those that are cited in support of the dissenting position — can be used to establish the existence of deliberate indifference in this post-Wade case. None of them.”)

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Stalley v. Cumbie, 124 F.4th 1273, 1315, 1318-22 (11th Cir. 2024) (Jordan, J., dissenting) (“Even accepting the officers’ argument that more specificity is required, however, it was still clearly established that the officers acted with deliberate indifference here. Though we recognize that there is no case ‘on all fours’ with the facts before us, this is a case in which the principles from relevant precedents were clear enough that the officers had notice. We have warned that delays even of only a ‘few minutes’ in seeking care for life-threatening injuries can constitute deliberate indifference. [citing cases] These prior cases provided Sergeant Smith and Detective Rousseau with a ‘reasonable warning that the conduct at issue violated constitutional rights.’ . . . The district court correctly concluded that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the correctional officers knew Mr. Villegas was in medical distress ‘once he was in the wheelchair or immediately before’ because he had recently vomited, passed out, and exhibited labored breathing. . . . As the district court highlighted, the officers also knew or suspected that he was under the influence of some drug (possibly K2), and knew he had struggled with them for about 20 minutes. . . . The only element of deliberate indifference at issue here, therefore, is whether the officers consciously disregarded the risk in a manner amounting to criminal recklessness. . . . I agree with the majority and the concurrence that under Farmer and Wade the deliberate indifference inquiry in part involves a subjective component. . . . Nobody disputes this. My point is that the summary judgment record, viewed in the light most favorable to Mr. Stalley, allows a jury to find (a) that the correctional officers had subjective knowledge that their inaction—the delay of medical care for over five minutes—would cause Mr. Villegas’ serious medical condition to worsen, and (b) that the officers failed to respond in a reasonable manner. The majority incorrectly adopts the district court’s factual mischaracterization at summary judgment of the officers’ action as a medical decision, rather than a delay of necessary medical care. . . . The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Mr. Stalley, allows a jury to find that (a) the officers knew that Mr. Villegas had a serious medical need at least when he was placed in the wheelchair and was unresponsive (when he was not resisting any more, vomited again, and had labored breathing); (b) the officers knew that Mr. Villegas faced a substantial risk of serious harm as a result of a delay in, and denial of, medical care; (c) the denial of medical care and the over five-minute delay in providing such care to Mr. Villegas worsened his medical condition; and (d) the delay was objectively unreasonable because there was no good reason for preventing the nurses who were onsite from evaluating Mr. Villegas to determine what medical steps needed to be taken after he had stopped resisting and was unresponsive. The officers here failed to take any available ‘reasonable measures[]’. . . to abate the risk of significant harm to Mr. Villegas. . . Under Bozeman . . . and Valderrama . . . a jury could find that the officers acted with deliberate indifference by delaying any medical care or assessment for Mr. Villegas for over five minutes after he was motionless and unresponsive and by preventing the nurses from seeing him. And under those cases, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Gilmore v. Georgia Department of Corrections, 111 F.4th 1118, 1135-36 (11th Cir. 2024), reh’g en banc granted, 119 F.4th 839 (11th Cir. 2024) (“Gilmore suggests another path to ‘clearly established’ law: a ‘robust consensus of ... persuasive authority.’ . . As we’ve pointed out, by 2017, when the search here occurred, seven circuits had required reasonable suspicion for a strip search of a prison visitor. . . That, Gilmore claims, was enough to put Defendants on notice that they were violating her constitutional rights. . . . To be sure, both we and the Supreme Court have suggested that ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ may ‘place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . But in neither Carollo nor Glasscox did we actually consult persuasive authority when reaching our holding. . . At most, then, those statements are dicta, which do not bind us. . . What’s more, we expressly rejected a similar rule over a decade earlier. See Thomas ex rel. Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950, 955 (11th Cir. 2003). In Thomas, the plaintiffs seized on similar language regarding ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ from Wilson v. Layne[.] . . We ‘reaffirmed’ our pre-Wilson position because we did not read ‘Wilson to have held that a consensus of cases of persuasive authority would be able to establish law clearly.’ . . Wesby did not undermine Thomas to the point of abrogation. . . And to the extent that Carollo and Glasscox conflict with Thomas, Thomas controls. . . So we do not look to persuasive authority—even a ‘robust consensus’ of it—to determine whether the law was ‘clearly established’ in this Circuit. And no precedent from the Supreme Court, our Circuit, or the Georgia Supreme Court ‘clearly established’ that reasonable suspicion was required for a strip search of a prison visitor in 2017. For these reasons, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Gilmore v. Georgia Department of Corrections, 111 F.4th 1118, 1136-38 (11th Cir. 2024) (Rosenbaum, J., concurring), reh’g en banc granted, 119 F.4th 839 (11th Cir. 2024) (“‘[W]hen a precedent of the Supreme Court has direct application, we must follow it.’ . . For more than a quarter of a century, the Supreme Court has repeatedly directed that ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ can ‘clearly establish’ a constitutional violation for qualified-immunity purposes. . . Yet we have consistently dodged that directive. It’s time to bring our precedent into the twenty-first century. . . . There is no way to reasonably read Wilson as not acknowledging that ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ can ‘clearly establish’ the law for qualified-immunity purposes. . . Yet we insist on such a reading. Later Supreme Court case law renders our decision to ignore Wilson’s plain language all the more problematic. [discussing Wesby and al-Kidd] . . . Exacerbating this conflict, our case law on this issue is inconsistent. Our later case law has suggested (in dicta) that ‘a robust consensus of ... persuasive authority’ can ‘place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . But of course, as the majority opinion notes, our ‘earliest-case’ rule requires us to follow Thomas rather than Carollo or Glasscox. . . . This conflict provides all the more reason to revisit and clarify our case law. Not only that, but our confusion on this point has caused us to say things that are just downright wrong. For instance, we have transposed the ‘robust consensus’ language onto the ‘controlling authority’ category. See Washington v. Howard, 25 F.4th 891, 903 (11th Cir. 2022). In Washington, we said that the plaintiff could not ‘identify a controlling case or robust consensus of cases ... from the Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the Georgia Supreme Court.’ . . . But the Supreme Court has never required a ‘robust consensus of cases ... from the Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the [relevant state] [s]upreme [c]ourt,’ . . . One case can ‘clearly establish’ law if it is directly on point or applies the relevant broad principle. Yet despite ‘defect[s] in the prior panel[s]’ reasoning or analysis’ on the issue of how the law can be clearly established, we are bound by our prior panel precedent. . . . That said, those defects are glaring. We cannot opt out of Supreme Court precedent. I concur in the majority opinion in full because the prior-precedent rule requires me to do so. But we should rehear the ‘clearly established law’ issue en banc to clarify the role of persuasive authority in that analysis. In doing so, I would conform our precedent to the Supreme Court’s.”)

Gilmore v. Georgia Department of Corrections, 111 F.4th 1118, 1138-41 (11th Cir. 2024) (Newsom, J., concurring), reh’g en banc granted, 119 F.4th 839 (11th Cir. 2024) (“Many have complained that modern qualified-immunity jurisprudence is fundamentally broken for one reason or another. Some say, for instance, that it’s textually and historically unjustifiable, at least in its current form. See, e.g., William Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful?, 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45 (2018). Others contend that it bears no connection to the realities of modern policing. See, e.g., Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity’s Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605 (2021). I’ll leave those major-league debates for another day. For now, I’d simply like to highlight a couple of minor-league oddities generated by existing qualified-immunity doctrine. . . . The first results from the fact that the Supreme Court has bounced around about the order in which reviewing courts should decide qualified-immunity’s merits and ‘clearly established’ prongs. Initially, of course, in Saucier v. Katz, the Supreme Court held that a reviewing court should always resolve the merits of a plaintiff’s constitutional claim first, before determining whether the law underlying that claim was sufficiently clearly established to defeat qualified immunity. . . . Less than a decade later, though, in Pearson v. Callahan, the Court reversed itself and held that the Saucier sequence should no longer be regarded as mandatory’ and that reviewing courts may consider the merits and clearly-established issues in whatever order they wish. . . . Both options entail perversities of a sort. On the one hand, if courts routinely bypass the merits in favor of resolving the qualified-immunity issue on the clearly-established prong, they forgo valuable opportunities to establish law for future cases. . . . On the other hand, if a court concludes that a defendant’s conduct violated the Constitution, but then goes on to hold that the law wasn’t clearly established at the time he acted and that he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, its merits holding is effectively dictum. . . . Today’s decision takes the latter path, tackling the merits before proceeding to the clearly-established inquiry. And given the circumstances, I think that’s the right call: The Fourth Amendment questions that this case presents are important both to prison officials and to would-be prison

visitors, and they are likely to recur; accordingly, it makes sense to go ahead and decide them. Even so, I must admit that it feels strange—even a little jarring—to resolve weighty constitutional questions of first impression in what all must agree is (or in ordinary circumstances would be) dictum. . . . [I]n answering the Fourth Amendment question on the merits, we’ve done exactly what the Supreme Court has authorized us to do. It’s just weird that the qualified-immunity two-step permits—and in some way even encourages—courts to do the very thing that we would otherwise condemn. . . . The second oddity relates to the question whether a reviewing court can consider non-binding authority in determining whether the law at issue was ‘clearly established’ for qualified-immunity purposes. Today’s majority opinion correctly recognizes that existing Eleventh Circuit precedent prevents us from looking beyond this Court’s jurisdictional boundaries in search of clearly established law. . . . In her separate concurring opinion, Judge Rosenbaum makes the case that our rule contravenes the Supreme Court’s own precedent, which, she says, has long recognized that not only ‘controlling authority’ but also ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ can clearly establish the law. . . . I share Judge Rosenbaum’s concern that we may well be out of step with the Supreme Court’s view about the role of non-binding authority in the qualified-immunity calculus. But I’ll confess that I’m not at all sure how a ‘robust consensus’ rule would (or should) operate in the real world. For better or worse, modern qualified-immunity doctrine bottoms on notions of ‘fair notice’ to government officials. . . . Accordingly, in determining whether a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ can clearly establish the law for qualified-immunity purposes, we should presumably ask whether that sort (and exactly what sort) of consensus gives officials the requisite notice. . . . And at the risk of getting all meta, the answer to that question, in turn, may well turn on one’s views on the nature of law itself—evocative, in a way, of the well-worn debates surrounding Swift and Erie. Here’s what I mean: Is ‘the law’—of the sort that either is or isn’t clearly established—necessarily the product of some sovereign lawgiver? Or can it exist of its own force, without the need for a formal, authoritative, binding decree? If it’s the former, then there’s presumably no basis for looking beyond our jurisdictional boundaries in assessing whether ‘the law’ was clearly established. On that view, government officials working within the confines of the Eleventh Circuit are entitled to limit their search for and knowledge of ‘the law’ to this court’s binding decisions—other courts’ decisions may be interesting, they may be informative, but they can’t clearly establish ‘the law.’ But if it’s the latter—if ‘the law’ can exist independently of a binding decree—then the rule that only in-circuit decisions can clearly establish that law for qualified-immunity purposes makes a lot less sense. Inasmuch as real-world ‘fair notice’ is qualified-immunity’s lodestar, I think I lean toward the latter view. Especially in a case like this, in which (1) our own analogous-but-not-binding decisions involving arrestees, students, and border entrants have required that strip searches be supported by reasonable suspicion, . . . and (2) all nine of our sister circuits that have considered the issue have held that the Fourth Amendment requires reasonable suspicion for strip searches of prison visitors, . . . it seems eminently reasonable to conclude that ‘the law’ gave the prison officials at Smith State Prison ‘fair notice’ that their suspicionless strip search of Clarissa Gilmore was unconstitutional. . . . To be candid, though, that’s little more than my own ‘sense’—a vibe. If we changed any (or several) of the inputs, I might well have a different sense. What if, for instance, this Court hadn’t required reasonable suspicion in the arrestee, student, and border-entrant contexts, and we were thus left with only the nine-circuit consensus regarding strip searches of prison visitors? Would I have the same sense about the fairness of imputing notice to the Smith officials? Probably, but I can't be sure. What if the other circuits weren't unanimous—say, that seven had required reasonable suspicion but two hadn't? Six and three? Or what if our sister circuits were unanimous, but only four had decided the issue, rather than nine? Who knows. You can probably see where this is going: It all feels, well, kind of made up. And as I've said before, 'if there is any fixed star in my own constitutional constellation, it's that unelected, unaccountable federal judges shouldn't make stuff up.' Club Madonna Inc. v. City of Miami Beach, 42 F.4th 1231, 1261 (11th Cir. 2022) (Newsom, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citation omitted).* * * I realize, of course, that I'm just identifying problems, not offering solutions—which, I know, can be annoying. By and large, though, we 'inferior court[]' judges. . . have to play the hand the Supreme Court deals us. It may be that the problems I've highlighted—minor-league as they are—indicate that the time is coming (has come?) for that Court to consider a major-league reassessment of its qualified-immunity jurisprudence.”)

Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1265 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Jordan, J., joined by Rosenbaum, Jill Pryor, and Abudu, JJ., concurring) [T]here remains an important practical point. What is one to do with our post-Farmer cases using the 'more than mere negligence'/'more than gross negligence' formulations that we now discard? Despite today's opinion, district courts and attorneys will, out of necessity, continue to turn for guidance to our deliberate indifference cases from the last 30 years. They will not be able to pretend that Eleventh Circuit jurisprudence constituted a vast Eighth Amendment lacuna during that period. For example, they will look to earlier cases to try to figure out whether a right was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. My suggestion, for whatever it might be worth, is that courts and attorneys look carefully at prior Eleventh Circuit cases to see if they are consistent with the subjective component of deliberate indifference set out in Farmer. If they are consistent, then they should continue to be cited as binding precedent. If they are not, then they probably have been abrogated to at least some degree by today's decision.”)

Taig v. City of Vero Beach, No. 22-13123, 2023 WL 3644966, at *4 (11th Cir. May 25, 2023) (not reported) (“Taig identifies no caselaw clearly establishing minimization requirements for covert, silent video surveillance of criminal activity pursuant to a warrant. Instead, he cites to United States v. Mesa-Rincon, 911 F.2d 1433, 1442 (10th Cir. 1990), and the decision of the Fourth District Court of Appeal of Florida upholding the suppression of the spa video. But neither were decided at the time of the relevant conduct by the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court. . . And the state statutes Taig cites do not clearly establish a federal constitutional right. The officers' actions also were not so egregious that every reasonable officer would have known that they violated the Fourth Amendment. . . The officers, working with the Department of Homeland Security, obtained several warrants authorizing the surreptitious video surveillance. Although the warrants did not expressly allow video recording, the warrants did not prohibit it either. The cameras transmitted no audio, which complied with the order. And the officers employed at least some minimization techniques, including reducing the number of hours each day that officers monitored the video feed, restricting access to the video feed with a username and password, monitoring the video feed for only 30 out of 60 available days, and securing the hard drive in the evidence room. Moreover, although the order required the officers to ‘take steps to minimize the invasion of privacy to any parties not engaged in the unlawful acts set forth in the affidavit,’ Taig did not fall within that class of persons.”)

Jackson v. McCurry, 762 F. App’x 919, ____ (11th Cir. 2019) (“Riley held only that the exception to the warrant requirement for searches incident to arrest does not extend to searches of information contained in cellphones, and T.L.O. held that ‘[t]he warrant requirement ... is unsuited to the school environment,’ . . . so there is room for a reasonable school official to conclude that Riley has no application to school searches. And in the light of the permissible disagreement about the implications of Riley for school searches, we cannot say that Oates was ‘plainly incompetent’ or ‘knowingly violate[d] the law.’. . . Jackson also cites a pair of out-of-circuit district-court opinions, see Gallimore v. Henrico Cty. Sch. Bd., 38 F. Supp. 3d 721 (E.D. Va. 2014), Klump v. Nazareth Area Sch. Dist., 425 F. Supp. 2d 622 (E.D. Pa. 2006), and an opinion from one of our sister circuits, G.C. v. Owensboro Pub. Sch., 711 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2013), but these decisions cannot clearly establish that Oates’s conduct was unlawful. As we have repeatedly explained, ‘a district court case cannot clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes.’. . . Nor can a decision from one of our sister circuits do so.”)

Benjamin v. City of Miami, 727 F. App’x 635, 639 (11th Cir. 2018) (“Federal courts may rely on a state court decision to decide whether a plaintiff has demonstrated a violation of his clearly established rights. . . . But for this reliance to be proper, the state court decision must pertain to a violation of federal law. . . . Since Haliburton’s due process holding was expressly confined to state law, it cannot clearly establish a federal due process right.”)

Rachel v. City of Mobile, Ala., 112 F. Supp. 3d 1263, 1281-83 (S.D. Ala. 2015), aff’d sub nom. Rachel v. McCann, 633 F. App’x 784 (11th Cir. 2016) (affirming denial of qualified immunity as to claim that officers repeatedly kicked and beat Rachel while he lay prone and non-resisting on ground) (“The plaintiff asserts that McCann and Jackson ‘provoked a violent situation’ by needlessly approaching a person known to be emotionally disturbed, ‘essentially precipitating the violence instead of heading it off.’. . . The Court need not consider whether such conduct would reflect a constitutional violation, because the plaintiff has failed to show it was clearly established before May 2012 that such conduct would violate Greg’s constitutional rights. The plaintiff does not suggest that the very language of the Fourth Amendment clearly establishes that provoking a confrontation with an emotionally disturbed felon is unconstitutional. Instead, she asks the Court to look to Ninth Circuit precedent indicating that such conduct can be unconstitutional. . . . ‘Our Court looks only to binding precedent—cases from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the state under which the claim arose—to determine whether the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.’. . . The plaintiff also discusses several Eleventh Circuit cases discussing the use of excessive force in effecting an arrest, . . . but none of them speak to the constitutionality of the antecedent act of approaching the suspect or ‘provoking’ a confrontation. . . Finally, the plaintiff repairs to Hope v. Pelzer, . . . which she believes stands for the proposition that ‘fair warning could come from ... non-decisional authority,’ such that, ‘[w]here an officer, by training and by internal policy, is advised as [to] the potential danger of a particular type of excessive force, they are on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law.’ . . . It is true that the Hope Court stated that, ‘in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents’ conduct violated’ the petitioner’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . But the Supreme Court did not say or suggest that a plaintiff can meet her burden of demonstrating the existence of a clearly established constitutional right by relying on ‘non-decisional authority.’ . . . In short, the Hope Court’s discussion of non-decisional authority does not support the proposition that such authority can carry a plaintiff’s burden of showing the violation of a clearly established constitutional right in the absence of any decisional authority doing so. Certainly nothing in Hope can be construed as overriding the Eleventh Circuit rule that constitutional rights can be clearly established only by binding precedent, . . . or by the very words of a statute or constitutional provision. . . Within the past few days, the Supreme Court has plainly torpedoed the plaintiff’s argument. The plaintiff in City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, — U.S. —, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015), supported her Fourth Amendment claim with expert testimony that the defendant law enforcement officers ‘fell short of their training by not using practices designed to minimize the risk of violence when dealing with the mentally ill.’ . The Court canvassed the case law and concluded that ‘the officers’ failure to accommodate [the plaintiff’s] illness [did not] violat[e] clearly established law.’ . The Court then rejected the plaintiff’s reliance on her expert’s opinion: ‘Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.’ . There thus can be no doubt that training and policy cannot substitute for appropriate judicial precedent in the ‘clearly established’ analysis. In summary, McCann and Jackson are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to any claim of excessive force based on provocation.”)

Williams v. Hudson, 602 F. App’x 769, 772-73 (11th Cir. 2015) (“In the light most favorable to Mrs. Williams, the evidence fails to show that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right of Mrs. Williams. In Coffin v. Brandau, we determined that entry into an open garage can constitute a search under the Fourth Amendment under certain circumstances. . . We also determined that, prior to the date Coffin was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . The incident in this case occurred prior to our decision in Coffin. However, clearly established law may differ from state to state. . . Coffin involved an incident in Florida. This case involves an incident in Georgia. Thus, we are bound by our determination in Coffin that this right was not clearly established in 2010 under Eleventh Circuit law or United States Supreme Court law, but we must determine whether this right was clearly established under Georgia Supreme Court law. Mrs. Williams only cites one Georgia Supreme Court case on this issue. See Landers v. State, 250 Ga. 808 (Ga.1983). The question in Landers was whether a warrant for the search of a dwelling allowed for the search of a vehicle on a neighboring lot. . . The case does not address the issue before us, and Mrs. Williams has failed to demonstrate that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right. The district court properly concluded that the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the illegal search claim.”)

Trammell v. Thomason, 335 F. App’x 835, 2009 WL 1706591, at *5-*7 & n.7 (11th Cir June 18, 2009) (“Trammell argues that he is not required to point to ‘materially similar’ case law from this circuit after the Supreme Court’s decision in Hope, 536 U.S. at 739. We cannot agree. Hope states that a plaintiff need not point to a prior case holding that the exact conduct in question was impermissible. It is silent in regard to the issue of whether case law from another circuit alone may be sufficient to put an officer on notice of the impermissibility of his conduct. Accordingly, we remain bound by our circuit law on this issue. . . . While there was case law in July of 2003 from the Fourth Circuit finding a constitutional violation where a police dog similarly trained was released without an adequate warning, . . . we have found no case from our Court, the Supreme Court of the United States, or the Supreme Court of Florida which so holds. . . . We are unpersuaded that Dorough’s conduct lies so far beyond the border of permissive and excessive conduct that every reasonable officer in Dorough’s position would have concluded that his behavior was unlawful. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court’s determination that Dorough is entitled to qualified immunity for his conduct in allegedly releasing Yacco without a warning.”).

Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1251 n.4 (11th Cir. 2003) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“It is true that thus far we look only to our own precedent and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the supreme court of the relevant state in this Circuit to determine whether law is clearly established. . . . Language in a number of fairly recent Supreme Court opinions, however, has signaled a different approach. [citing Hope, Wilson, Lanier, Elder, Anderson] Under ‘current American law,’ the rule in Memphis Light is unmistakable. Sister courts have held that those summarily evicted through condemnation procedures are entitled to contemporaneous notice of their right to appeal.”).

Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980, 989, 990 n.15 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) (“Because we presume that Jailer Cole was aware of Butler’s suicide threats, we must look to see whether Jailer Cole’s acts were deliberately indifferent to this risk. We conclude that—under the facts of this case—Jailer Cole’s allowing one hour and forty minutes to elapse between jail checks was not deliberately indifferent. [The consent decree] required the jailor to check the cells every hour. But [consent decree] did not establish a constitutional right to hourly jail checks, and [decree] was not focused on preventing suicide. . . . Even if Jailer Cole had violated the Constitution, he likely would be entitled to qualified immunity, having violated no clearly established constitutional rights. We are not aware of any of our cases or any case from the United States or Alabama Supreme Courts that would have put Jailer Cole on notice that his acts, given the circumstances, were clearly unconstitutional. [Consent decree] does not do the job; a consent decree like Praytor cannot establish constitutional rights, and obviously it cannot clearly establish constitutional rights. A precedent with materially similar facts is not always required; but for a federal right to be clearly established, the applicable law ‘Amust be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.” . . . Here, if Jailer Cole examined the precedents he could reasonably conclude that his conduct—monitoring via TV cameras (and visiting the cell, at least once, during each hour of the night) an inmate who had been stripped of his belt, shoelaces and so on and confined in a stripped cell—was reasonable and was not nearly deliberately indifferent.”).

Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1348 & n.11 (11th Cir. 2002) (“While the parties do not cite and we have not located Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Georgia Supreme Court decisions regarding pepper spray use in the course of an arrest, other courts have addressed its use. Courts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is excessive force in cases where the crime is a minor infraction, the arrestee surrenders, is secured, and is not acting violently, and there is no threat to the officers or anyone else. . . . Although we cite and examine other circuits’ and district courts’ decisions under the first prong of Saucier, we point out that these decisions are immaterial to whether the law was ‘clearly established’ in this circuit for the second prong of Saucier.”).

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1033 n.10 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) (“When case law is needed to ‘clearly establish’ the law applicable to the pertinent circumstances, we look to decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the pertinent state. . . . We do not understand Wilson v. Layne, . . . to have held that a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ from other courts would be able to establish the law clearly. . . . Each jurisdiction has its own body of law, and splits between jurisdictions on matters of law are not uncommon. We do not expect public officials to sort out the law of every jurisdiction in the country.”)

Gonzalez v. Lee County Housing Authority, 161 F.3d 1290, 1301-03 (11th Cir. 1998) (“Ordinarily, a plaintiff who seeks to overcome a state official’s affirmative defense of qualified immunity must cite case law, in force at the time of the defendant’s actions, that would have made it absolutely clear that the defendant’s conduct violated federal law. There is no case from the U.S. Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the relevant state Supreme Court, that would have established that a person violates section 3617 by firing an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. . . . The absence of such a case is not fatal to Gonzalez’s claim, however, because this case differs from the typical qualified immunity case in which the plaintiff sues a public official pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and asserts the violation of some (often generally worded) constitutional right. Although the assertion of such broadly conceived rights, without the benefit of sufficiently illuminating case law, may fail to overcome the hurdle of qualified immunity, . . . we have acknowledged the possibility that some federal statutory provisions will be sufficiently clear on their own to provide defendants with fair notice of their obligations under the law. . . . Section 3617 provides just such an explicit statement of what the Fair Housing Act demanded of the defendant in this case. Section 3617 renders it unlawful to ‘interfere with any person ... on account of his having aided or encouraged any other person in the exercise or enjoyment of ... any right granted or protected by section 3603, 3604, 3605, or 3606 of this title.’ Section 3604, in turn, bars racial discrimination in the ‘terms, conditions, or privileges of sale or rental of a dwelling, or in the provision of services or facilities in connection therewith....’ 42 U.S.C. § 3604(b). Section 3617, read in conjunction with section 3604, therefore, straightforwardly states the unsurprising (and presumably uncontroversial) proposition that the Fair Housing Act prohibits ‘interfering’ with any person because she ‘aided or encouraged’ another person’s exercise of her right to rent property free from racial discrimination. Any reasonable public official, having read the plain terms of this statute, certainly would have understood that federal law makes it unlawful to terminate an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. To the extent any federal statute, standing alone, can provide a potential defendant with concrete notice, ‘that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about), the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what [she] is doing violates federal law,’ we believe that section 3617 provides such notice in the circumstances of this case. . . . Alternatively, even if a public official credibly could argue that the language of the statute provided insufficient notice, its implementing federal regulation, adopted in 1989, removes all doubt about whether federal law makes it illegal to fire an employee for refusing to discriminate on the basis of race. . . . A public official forfeits qualified immunity by violating the clear command of a federal regulation that, like section 100.400(c)(3), reinforces a statute and thus helps to provide the basis for a cause of action.”).

Hamilton v. Cannon, 80 F.3d 1525, 1532 & n.7 (11th Cir. 1996) (“It would take much creativity and imagination to glean from the factually distinguishable cases upon which the plaintiffs rely a clearly established rule of law that an unsuccessful, negligent, or reckless rescue attempt, or interference with a bystander’s rescue attempt, amounts to a constitutional violation. We decline to exercise such creativity and imagination, because qualified immunity doctrine prohibits it. . . . The case that most strongly lends support to plaintiffs’ position is the Seventh Circuit decision in Ross v. United States. . . . However, even if Ross were indistinguishable, Seventh Circuit decisions can not clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit.”).

Kelly v. Curtis, 21 F.3d 1544, 1551 n.6 (11th Cir. 1994) (“By distinguishing these two out-of-circuit decisions that [plaintiff] has cited, we do not mean to imply that the law can be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes by non-binding precedent. See Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 n. 6 (11th Cir.1994) (“[T]he case law of one other circuit cannot settle the law in this circuit to the point of it being ‘clearly established.’”). Even if out-of-circuit decisions could clearly establish the law in this Circuit, a distinguishable, non-binding case does not clearly establish anything.”).

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 576 (11th Cir. 1994) (“Because Pickering requires a balancing of competing interests on a case-by-case basis, our decisions tilt strongly in favor of immunity by recognizing that only in the rarest of cases will reasonable government officials truly know that the termination or discipline of a public employee violated ‘clearly established’ federal rights.”).

Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1028 (11th Cir. 1993) (“The nonexistence of a decision specifically addressing the alleged right is a significant consideration in determining whether the right is clearly established In addition the existence of Supreme Court cases or cases in this circuit that recognize the alleged right is particularly important in determining whether the law is sufficiently clear to a reasonable official.”).

Courson v. McMillian, 939 F.2d 1479, 1498 n.32 (11th Cir. 1991) (“[C]learly established law in this circuit may include court decisions of the highest state court in the states that comprise this circuit as to those respective states, when the state supreme court has addressed a federal constitutional issue that has not been addressed by the United States Supreme Court or the Eleventh Circuit.”).

B. Defining the Contours of the Right

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Cope v. Cogdill, 142 S. Ct. 2573, 2576 (2022) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (“No reasonable officer would have stood and watched as a detainee strangled himself to death when a simple, safe, and patently obvious response was available and in fact required by jail policy and Laws’ specific training. Laws’ failure to call emergency medical services was an inexplicable and unreasonable decision that, under any standard, clearly constituted deliberate indifference to Monroe’s life-or-death medical needs. Accordingly, Laws was not entitled to qualified immunity. The Fifth Circuit’s conclusion that respondents Cogdill and Brixey were entitled to qualified immunity is equally erroneous. It is undisputed that these respondents were aware of Monroe’s risk of suicide. Brixey and Cogdill knew Monroe had twice attempted suicide by strangulation just the day before, that he had expressed a desire to kill himself when he was admitted to the jail, and that he had attempted suicide on another occasion two weeks earlier. Placing him alone in a cell containing a readily accessible ligature, a 30-inch telephone cord, violated the Constitution in a manner that would have been ‘obvious’ to any reasonable officer. . . That decision violated Cogdill’s training as to the risks of placing suicidal detainees in isolation cells. It also broke with the Texas Commission on Jail Standards’ guidance, which specifically warned of the dangers telephone cords posed to suicidal inmates and advised that telephone cords should be 12 inches or shorter. Respondents Brixey and Cogdill were not entitled to qualified immunity for their deliberate indifference to the risks to which they subjected Monroe. . . This Court cannot and should not correct every error that comes before it. But ‘summary dispositions remain appropriate in truly extraordinary cases involving categories of errors that strike at the heart of our legal system.’ . . This is such a case. It involves a mother seeking some measure of recompense for the tragic and unnecessary death of her son. On the uniquely troubling facts of this case, a jury should decide whether Cogdill and Brixey acted with deliberate indifference for housing Monroe in a cell with an instrument that predictably facilitated his suicide, and whether Laws likewise was deliberately indifferent for watching Monroe strangle himself but failing to contact emergency services promptly. I respectfully dissent from the Court’s refusal to summarily reverse.”)

Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 142 S. Ct. 2571, 2572-73 (2022) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Breyer, J., and Kagan, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (“For the reasons ably set forth by Judge Willett, I would summarily reverse the Fifth Circuit’s grant of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage, a stage at which petitioners’ well-pleaded allegations must be accepted as true. According to those allegations, the officers elected to use force knowing that it would directly cause the very outcome they claim to have sought to avoid. That is, to prevent Olivas from lighting himself on fire and burning down the house, the officers tased Olivas just after they were warned that it would light him on fire. This Court’s precedent establishes that ‘the “reasonableness” of a particular seizure depends not only on when it is made, but also on how it is carried out.’ . . . Using deadly force that does no more than knowingly effectuate the exact danger to be forestalled is clearly unreasonable under this standard. While ‘this Court is not equipped to correct every perceived error coming from the lower federal courts,’ it has deemed intervention appropriate where a Court of Appeals decision reflects a misapprehension of the standard for assessing excessive force claims at the stage of the litigation concerned. [citing Tolan v. Cotton] Factual development may reveal a different story, but, as relevant now, Ramirez and her family have plausibly alleged that the officers they called to prevent their husband and father’s death instead used excessive force that predictably caused his death and the loss of their home. Under this Court’s precedents, that claim is entitled to proceed to discovery to determine whether the family is entitled to some recompense for their unnecessary losses. I respectfully dissent.”)

City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 10-12 (2021) (granting certiorari and reversing) (“We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law. The doctrine of qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability so long as their conduct ‘does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. 223, 231 (2009). As we have explained, qualified immunity protects “‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’” . . . We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. . . . It is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the ‘rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is “clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.”’ . . . Such specificity is ‘especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,’ where it is ‘sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’ . . . The Tenth Circuit contravened those settled principles here. Not one of the decisions relied upon by the Court of Appeals—Estate of Ceballos v. Husk, 919 F. 3d 1204 (CA10 2019), Hastings v. Barnes, 252 Fed. Appx. 197 (CA10 2007), Allen, 119 F. 3d 837, and Sevier v. Lawrence, 60 F. 3d 695 (CA10 1995)—comes close to establishing that the officers’ conduct was unlawful. The Court relied most heavily on Allen. But the facts of Allen are dramatically different from the facts here. The officers in Allen responded to a potential suicide call by sprinting toward a parked car, screaming at the suspect, and attempting to physically wrest

a gun from his hands. . . Officers Girdner and Vick, by contrast, engaged in a conversation with Rollice, followed him into a garage at a distance of 6 to 10 feet, and did not yell until after he picked up a hammer. We cannot conclude that Allen ‘clearly established’ that their conduct was reckless or that their ultimate use of force was unlawful. . . .Neither the panel majority nor the respondent have identified a single precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances. The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) (“Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas’ petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit’s determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 53-54 (2020) (per curiam) (“Petitioner Trent Taylor is an inmate in the custody of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice. Taylor alleges that, for six full days in September 2013, correctional officers confined him in a pair of shockingly unsanitary cells. . . . The first cell was covered, nearly floor to ceiling, in ‘ “massive amounts” of feces’: all over the floor, the ceiling, the window, the walls, and even ‘ “packed inside the water faucet.”’. . . Fearing that his food and water would be contaminated, Taylor did not eat or drink for nearly four days. Correctional officers then moved Taylor to a second, frigidly cold cell, which was equipped with only a clogged drain in the floor to dispose of bodily wastes. Taylor held his bladder for over 24 hours, but he eventually (and involuntarily) relieved himself, causing the drain to overflow and raw sewage to spill across the floor. Because the cell lacked a bunk, and because Taylor was confined without clothing, he was left to sleep naked in sewage. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit properly held that such conditions of confinement violate the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. But, based on its assessment that ‘[t]he law wasn’t clearly established’ that ‘prisoners couldn’t be housed in cells teeming with human waste’ ‘for only six days,’ the court concluded that the prison officials responsible for Taylor’s confinement did not have ‘ “fair warning” that their specific acts were unconstitutional.’. . .The Fifth Circuit erred in granting the officers qualified immunity on this basis. ‘Qualified immunity shields an officer from suit when she makes a decision that, even if constitutionally deficient, reasonably misapprehends the law governing the circumstances she confronted.’. . . But no reasonable correctional officer could have concluded that, under the extreme circumstances of this case, it was constitutionally permissible to house Taylor in such deplorably unsanitary conditions for such an extended period of time. . . . The Fifth Circuit identified no evidence that the conditions of Taylor’s confinement were compelled by necessity or exigency. Nor does the summary-judgment record reveal any reason to suspect that the conditions of Taylor’s confinement could not have been mitigated, either in degree or duration. And although an officer-by-officer analysis will be necessary on remand, the record suggests that at least some officers involved in Taylor’s ordeal were deliberately indifferent to the conditions of his cells. . . . Confronted with the particularly egregious facts of this case, any reasonable officer should have realized that Taylor’s conditions of confinement offended the Constitution. . . . We therefore grant Taylor’s petition for a writ of certiorari, vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.”) [Justice Thomas dissented without comment or opinion]

Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 56 (2020) (Alito, J., concurring in the judgment) (“While I would not grant review on the question the Court addresses, I agree that summary judgment should not have been awarded on the issue of qualified immunity. We must view the summary judgment record in the light most favorable to petitioner, and when petitioner’s verified complaint is read in this way, a reasonable fact-finder could infer not just that the conditions in the cells in question were horrific but that respondents chose to place and keep him in those particular cells, made no effort to have the cells cleaned, and did not explore the possibility of assignment to cells with better conditions. A reasonable corrections officer would have known that this course of conduct was unconstitutional, and the cases on which respondents rely do not show otherwise.”)

[Compare Thomas v. Blackard, 2 F.4th 716, 720-22 (7th Cir. 2021) (“Thomas’s assertions of feces-covered walls, a lack of hot water, hundreds of dead flies in his bed, and a mattress covered in human waste no doubt establish a material dispute on the objective prong of an Eighth Amendment claim. Indeed, these purported cell conditions are not far from the ‘deplorably unsanitary conditions’ decried in Taylor. 141 S. Ct. at 53. But that is not the end of the matter. Unlike in Taylor, Thomas failed to point to evidence that prison officials responded with deliberate indifference to the abysmal cell conditions. . . . To the contrary, the record shows that officials reacted reasonably: Thomas promptly received a new, unsoiled mattress, several cups of disinfecting solvent to clean the walls, and gloves to remove the dead flies from his bunk bed. As for his complaint that his cell lacked hot water, Pontiac officials provided him with three hot showers per week while awaiting repair of the faucet. On this record, no reasonable jury could conclude these officials responded with deliberate indifference to Thomas’s cell conditions. . . . The conditions of confinement Thomas encountered at Pontiac are troubling. But prison officials took steps to address the inadequacies. Because Thomas has not produced evidence of deliberate indifference by Blackard and Punke, we AFFIRM.”)]

City of Escondido, Cal. v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503-04 (2019) (per curiam) (“Under our cases, the clearly established right must be defined with specificity. ‘This Court has repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . That is particularly important in excessive force cases In this case, the Court of Appeals contravened those settled principles. The Court of Appeals should have asked whether clearly established law prohibited the officers from stopping and taking down a man in these circumstances. Instead, the Court of Appeals defined the clearly established right at a high level of generality by saying only that the ‘right to be free of excessive force’ was clearly established. With the right defined at that high level of generality, the Court of Appeals then denied qualified immunity to the officers and remanded the case for trial. . . Under our precedents, the Court of Appeals’ formulation of the clearly established right was far too general. To be sure, the Court of Appeals cited the Gravelet–Blondin case from that Circuit, which described a right to be ‘free from the application of non-trivial force for engaging in mere passive resistance....’. . . Assuming without deciding that a court of appeals decision may constitute clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity, . . . the Ninth Circuit’s Gravelet–Blondin case law involved police force against individuals engaged in passive resistance. The Court of Appeals made no effort to explain how that case law prohibited Officer Craig’s actions in this case. That is a problem under our precedents. . . .The Court of Appeals failed to properly analyze whether clearly established law barred Officer Craig from stopping and taking down Marty Emmons in this manner as Emmons exited the apartment. Therefore, we remand the case for the Court of Appeals to conduct the analysis required by our precedents with respect to whether Officer Craig is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152-54 (2018) (per curiam) (“Here, the Court need not, and does not, decide whether Kisela violated the Fourth Amendment when he used deadly force against Hughes. For even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation occurred—a proposition that is not at all evident—on these facts Kisela was at least entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness. An officer ‘cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right’s contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ [citing Plumhoff] That is a necessary part of the qualified-immunity standard, and it is a part of the standard that the Court of Appeals here failed to implement in a correct way. Kisela says he shot Hughes because, although the officers themselves were in no apparent danger, he believed she was a threat to Chadwick. Kisela had mere seconds to assess the potential danger to Chadwick. He was confronted with a woman who had just been seen hacking a tree with a large kitchen knife and whose behavior was erratic enough to cause a concerned bystander to call 911 and then flag down Kisela and Garcia. Kisela was separated from Hughes and Chadwick by a chain-link fence; Hughes had moved to within a few feet of Chadwick; and she failed to acknowledge at least two commands to drop the knife. Those commands were loud enough that Chadwick, who was standing next to Hughes, heard them. This is far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting Hughes to protect Chadwick would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]ot one of the decisions relied on by the Court of Appeals—Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864 (C.A.9 2011), and Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189 (C.A.9 1997)—supports denying Kisela qualified immunity.” [majority discusses and distinguishes Deorle, Glenn, and Harris])

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1155, 1158-62 (2018) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (“Officer Andrew Kisela shot Amy Hughes while she was speaking with her roommate, Sharon Chadwick, outside of their home. The record, properly construed at this stage, shows that at the time of the shooting: Hughes stood stationary about six feet away from Chadwick, appeared ‘composed and content,’ . . . and held a kitchen knife down at her side with the blade facing away from Chadwick. Hughes was nowhere near the officers, had committed no illegal act, was suspected of no crime, and did not raise the knife in the direction of Chadwick or anyone else. Faced with these facts, the two other responding officers held their fire, and one testified that he ‘wanted to continue trying verbal command[s] and see if that would work.’ . . . But not Kisela. He thought it necessary to use deadly force, and so, without giving a warning that he would open fire, he shot Hughes four times, leaving her seriously injured. If this account of Kisela’s conduct sounds unreasonable, that is because it was. And yet, the Court today insulates that conduct from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity, holding that Kisela violated no ‘clearly established’ law. . . . I disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, as the Court must at summary judgment, a jury could find that Kisela violated Hughes’ clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by needlessly resorting to lethal force. In holding otherwise, the Court misapprehends the facts and misapplies the law, effectively treating qualified immunity as an absolute shield. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . . Rather than defend the reasonableness of Kisela’s conduct, the majority sidesteps the inquiry altogether and focuses instead on the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . To be ‘“clearly established” . . . [t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . That standard is not nearly as onerous as the majority makes it out to be. As even the majority must acknowledge, . . . this Court has long rejected the notion that ‘an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful[.]’ . . . ‘[O]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . At its core, then, the ‘clearly established’ inquiry boils down to whether Kisela had ‘fair notice’ that he acted unconstitutionally. . . . The answer to that question is yes. This Court’s precedents make clear that a police officer may only deploy deadly force against an individual if the officer ‘has probable cause to believe that the [person] poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.’ . . . It is equally well established that any use of lethal force must be justified by some legitimate governmental interest. . . . Consistent with those clearly established principles, and contrary to the majority’s conclusion, Ninth Circuit precedent predating these events further confirms that Kisela’s conduct was clearly unreasonable. . . . Because Kisela plainly lacked any legitimate interest justifying the use of deadly force against a woman who posed no objective threat of harm to officers or others, had committed no crime, and appeared calm and collected during the police encounter, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he majority asserts that Hughes was ‘within striking distance’ of Chadwick, . . . but that stretches the facts and contravenes this Court’s repeated admonition that inferences must be drawn in the exact opposite direction, i.e., in favor of Hughes. [citing Tolan] The facts, properly viewed, show that, when she was shot, Hughes had stopped and stood still about six feet away from Chadwick. Whether Hughes could ‘stri[k]e’ Chadwick from that particular distance, even though the kitchen knife was held down at her side, is an inference that should be drawn by the jury, not this Court. . . . Both Curnow and Harris establish that, where, as here, an individual with a weapon poses no objective and immediate threat to officers or third parties, law enforcement cannot resort to excessive force. . . . If all that were not enough, decisions from several other Circuits illustrate that the Fourth Amendment clearly forbids the use of deadly force against a person who is merely holding a knife but not threatening anyone with it. [collecting cases] In sum, precedent existing at the time of the shooting clearly established the unconstitutionality of Kisela's conduct. The majority's decision, no matter how much it says otherwise, ultimately rests on a faulty premise: that those cases are not identical to this one. But that is not the law, for our cases have never required a factually identical case to satisfy the 'clearly established' standard. . . . It is enough that governing law places 'the constitutionality of the officer's conduct beyond debate.' . . . Because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, it is 'beyond debate' that Kisela's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, he was not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . For the foregoing reasons, it is clear to me that the Court of Appeals got it right. But even if that result were not so clear, I cannot agree with the majority's apparent view that the decision below was so manifestly incorrect as to warrant 'the extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.' . . . The relevant facts are hotly disputed, and the qualified-immunity question here is, at the very best, a close call. Rather than letting this case go to a jury, the Court decides to intervene prematurely, purporting to correct an error that is not at all clear. This unwarranted summary reversal is symptomatic of 'a disturbing trend regarding the use of this Court's resources' in qualified-immunity cases. . . . As I have previously noted, this Court routinely displays an unflinching willingness 'to summarily reverse courts for wrongly denying officers the protection of qualified immunity' but 'rarely intervene[s] where courts wrongly afford officers the benefit of qualified immunity in these same cases.' . . . see also Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful? 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45, 82 (2018) ("[N]early all of the Supreme Court's qualified immunity cases come out the same way—by finding immunity for the officials"); Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity: The Court's Ever Increasing Limitations on the Development and Enforcement of Constitutional Rights and Some Particularly Unfortunate Consequences, 113 Mich. L.Rev. 1219, 1244–1250 (2015). Such a one-sided approach to qualified immunity transforms the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers, gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment. The majority today exacerbates that troubling asymmetry. Its decision is not just wrong on the law; it also sends an alarming signal to law enforcement officers and the public. It tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished. Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589-91 & n.7 (2018) ("Our conclusion that the officers had probable cause to arrest the partygoers is sufficient to resolve this case. But where, as here, the Court of Appeals erred on both the merits of the constitutional claim and the question of qualified immunity, 'we have discretion to correct its errors at each step.' . . . We exercise that discretion here because the D. C. Circuit's analysis, if followed elsewhere, would 'undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote.' . . . We continue to stress that lower courts 'should think hard, and then think hard again,' before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim. . . We addressed the merits of probable cause here, however, because a decision on qualified immunity alone would not have resolved all of the claims in this case. . . . The ‘clearly established’ standard also requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him. The rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is ‘clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ Saucier v. Katz, 533 U. S. 194, 202 (2001). This requires a high ‘degree of specificity.’ [citing Mullenix] We have repeatedly stressed that courts must not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’ [citing Plumhoff] A rule is too general if the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct ‘does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [the rule] was firmly established.’ [citing Anderson] In the context of a warrantless arrest, the rule must obviously resolve “whether ‘the circumstances with which [the particular officer] was confronted . . . constitute[d] probable cause.’” . . . We have stressed that the ‘specificity’ of the rule is ‘especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.’ [citing Mullenix] Probable cause ‘turn[s] on the assessment of probabilities in particular factual contexts’ and cannot be ‘reduced to a neat set of legal rules.’ . . . Given its imprecise nature, officers will often find it difficult to know how the general standard of probable cause applies in ‘the precise situation encountered.’ [citing Ziglar] Thus, we have stressed the need to ‘identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances . . . was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ [citing Pauly] While there does not have to be ‘a case directly on point,’ existing precedent must place the lawfulness of the particular arrest ‘beyond debate.’ [citing al-Kidd] Of course, there can be the rare ‘obvious case,’ where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances. [citing Brosseau] But ‘a body of relevant case law’ is usually necessary to ‘‘clearly establish’ the answer’ with respect to probable cause. . . Under these principles, we readily conclude that the officers here were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The officers found a group of people in a house that the neighbors had identified as vacant, that appeared to be vacant, and that the partygoers were treating as vacant. The group scattered, and some hid, at the sight of law enforcement. Their explanations for being at the house were full of holes. The source of their claimed invitation admitted that she had no right to be in the house, and the owner confirmed that fact. Even assuming the officers lacked actual probable cause to arrest the partygoers, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they ‘reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.’ . . . Tellingly, neither the panel majority nor the partygoers have identified a single precedent--much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases--finding a Fourth Amendment violation ‘under similar circumstances.’ . . . And it should go without saying that this is not an ‘obvious case’ where ‘a body of relevant case law’ is not needed. . . . The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity.”) Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (“With respect to petitioners’ Fifth Amendment claim, the en banc Court of Appeals found it unnecessary to address the Bivens question because it held that Mesa was entitled to qualified immunity. In reaching that conclusion, the en banc Court of Appeals relied on the fact that Hernández was ‘an alien who had no significant voluntary connection to ... the United States.’. . It is undisputed, however, that Hernández’s nationality and the extent of his ties to the United States were unknown to Mesa at the time of the shooting. The en banc Court of Appeals therefore erred in granting qualified immunity based on those facts. . . ‘The doctrine of qualified immunity shields officials from civil liability so long as their conduct “does not violate clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.”’. . The ‘dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . The qualified immunity analysis thus is limited to ‘the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers’ at the time they engaged in the conduct in question. White v. Pauly, 580 U.S. —, —, 137 S.Ct. 548, 550, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant. Mesa and the Government contend that Mesa is entitled to qualified immunity even if Mesa was uncertain about Hernández’s nationality and his ties to the United States at the time of the shooting. The Government also argues that, in any event, petitioners’ claim is cognizable only under the Fourth Amendment, and not under the Fifth Amendment. This Court declines to address these arguments in the first instance. The Court of Appeals may address them, if necessary, on remand.”) Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868-69 (2017) (“To be sure, this Court has not given its approval to [the intracorporate-conspiracy] doctrine in the specific context of § 1985(3). . . There is a division in the courts of appeals, moreover, respecting the validity or correctness of the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine with reference to § 1985 conspiracies. . . Nothing in this opinion should be interpreted as either approving or disapproving the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine’s application in the context of an alleged § 1985(3) violation. The Court might determine, in some later case, that different considerations apply to a conspiracy respecting equal protection guarantees, as distinct from a conspiracy in the antitrust context. Yet the fact that the courts are divided as to whether or not a § 1985(3) conspiracy can arise from official discussions between or among agents of the same entity demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established. When the courts are divided on an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability. See Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618, 119 S.Ct. 1692, 143 L.Ed.2d 818 (1999) (noting that it would be “unfair” to subject officers to damages liability when even “judges ... disagree”); Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 669–670, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012) (same). In addition to the concern that agents of the same legal entity are not distinct enough to conspire with one another, there are other sound reasons to conclude that conversations and agreements between and among federal officials in the same Department should not be the subject of a private cause of action for damages under § 1985(3). . . These considerations suggest that officials employed by the same governmental department do not conspire when they speak to one another and work together in their official capacities. Whether that contention should prevail need not be decided here. It suffices to say that the question is sufficiently open so that the officials in this suit could not be certain that § 1985(3) was applicable to their discussions and actions. Thus, the law respondents seek to invoke cannot be clearly established. It follows that reasonable officers in petitioners’ positions would not have known with any certainty that the alleged agreements were forbidden by law. . . . Petitioners are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3).”)

White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551-53 (2017) (per curiam) (“Officer White did not violate clearly established law on the record described by the Court of Appeals panel. . . . In the last five years, this Court has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases. See, e.g., City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 3 (2015) (slip op., at 10, n.3) (collecting cases). The Court has found this necessary both because qualified immunity is important to “‘society as a whole,’” . . . and because as “‘an immunity from suit,’” qualified immunity “‘is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial,’” Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. 223, 231 (2009). Today, it is again necessary to reiterate the longstanding principle that ‘clearly established law’ should not be defined ‘at a high level of generality.’ Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U. S. 731, 742 (2011). As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be ‘particularized’ to the facts of the case. . . . Otherwise, ‘[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity . . . into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.’ . . . The panel majority misunderstood the ‘clearly established’ analysis: It failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer White was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. Instead, the majority relied on Graham, Garner, and their Court of Appeals progeny, which—as noted above—lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level. Of course, ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning’ to officers, United States v. Lanier, 520 U. S. 259, 271 (1997), but ‘in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent,’ Anderson v. Creighton, supra, at 640. For that reason, we have held that Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside ‘an obvious case.’ Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U. S. 194, 199 (2004) (per curiam); see also Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U. S. ___, ___ (2014) (slip op., at 13) (emphasizing that Garner and Graham ‘are “cast at a high level of generality”’). This is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under Garner and Graham. Of note, the majority did not conclude that White’s conduct—such as his failure to shout a warning—constituted a run-of-the-mill Fourth Amendment violation. Indeed, it recognized that ‘this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances’ in light of White’s late arrival on the scene. . . . This alone should have been an important indication to the majority that White’s conduct did not violate a ‘clearly established’ right. Clearly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action in circumstances like this from assuming that proper procedures, such as officer identification, have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers in instances like the one White confronted here. On the record described by the Court of Appeals, Officer White did not violate clearly established law. The Court notes, however, that respondents contend Officer White arrived on the scene only two minutes after Officers Truesdale and Mariscal and more than three minutes before Daniel’s shots were fired. On the assumption that the conduct of Officers Truesdale and Mariscal did not adequately alert the Paulys that they were police officers, respondents suggest that a reasonable jury could infer that White witnessed the other officers’ deficient performance and should have realized that corrective action was necessary before using deadly force. . . This Court expresses no position on this potential alternative ground for affirmance, as it appears that neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals panel addressed it. The Court also expresses no opinion on the question whether this ground was properly preserved or whether—in light of this Court’s holding today—Officers Truesdale and Mariscal are entitled to qualified immunity. For the foregoing reasons, the petition for certiorari is granted; the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated; and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.”)

White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 553 (per curiam) (2017) (Ginsburg, J., concurring) (“I join the Court’s opinion on the understanding that it does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment to Officers Truesdale and Mariscal. See 814 F. 3d 1060, 1068, 1073, 1074 (CA10 2016) (Court of Appeals emphasized, repeatedly, that fact disputes exist on question whether Truesdale and Mariscal ‘adequately identified themselves’ as police officers before shouting ‘Come out or we’re coming in’ (internal quotation marks omitted)). Further, as to Officer White, the Court, as I comprehend its opinion, leaves open the propriety of denying summary judgment based on fact disputes over when Officer White arrived at the scene, what he may have witnessed, and whether he had adequate time to identify himself and order Samuel Pauly to drop his weapon before Officer White shot Pauly.”)

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1775-78 (2015) (“The real question. . . is whether, despite these dangerous circumstances, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they decided to reopen Sheehan’s door rather than attempting to accommodate her disability. Here we come to another problem. San Francisco, whose attorneys represent Reynolds and Holder, devotes scant briefing to this question. Instead, San Francisco argues almost exclusively that even if it is assumed that there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the right was not clearly established. This Court, of course, could decide the constitutional question anyway. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (recognizing discretion). But because this question has not been adequately briefed, we decline to do so. . . Rather, we simply decide whether the officers’ failure to accommodate Sheehan’s illness violated clearly established law. It did not. To begin, nothing in our cases suggests the constitutional rule applied by the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit focused on Graham v. Connor,. . . but Graham holds only that the ‘ “objective reasonableness” ’ test applies to excessive-force claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . That is far too general a proposition to control this case. ‘We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Qualified immunity is no immunity at all if ‘clearly established’ law can simply be defined as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Even a cursory glance at the facts of Graham confirms just how different that case is from this one. That case did not involve a dangerous, obviously unstable person making threats, much less was there a weapon involved. There is a world of difference between needlessly withholding sugar from an innocent person who is suffering from an insulin reaction. . . and responding to the perilous situation Reynolds and Holder confronted. Graham is a nonstarter. Moving beyond Graham, the Ninth Circuit also turned to two of its own cases. But even if ‘a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,’ Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. —, — (2014) (per curiam) (slip op., at 4), it does not do so here. The Ninth Circuit first pointed to Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), but from the very first paragraph of that opinion we learn that Deorle involved an officer’s use of a beanbag gun to subdue ‘an emotionally disturbed’ person who ‘was unarmed, had not attacked or even touched anyone, had generally obeyed the instructions given him by various police officers, and had not committed any serious offense.’. . The officer there, moreover, ‘observed Deorle at close proximity for about five to ten minutes before shooting him’ in the face. . . Whatever the merits of the decision in Deorle, the differences between that case and the case before us leap from the page. Unlike Deorle, Sheehan was dangerous, recalcitrant, law-breaking, and out of sight. The Ninth Circuit also leaned on Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (C.A.9 1994), another case involving mental illness. There, officials from San Francisco attempted to enter Henry Quade’s home ‘for the primary purpose of arresting him’ even though they lacked an arrest warrant. . . Quade, in response, fired a handgun; police officers ‘shot back, and Quade died from gunshot wounds shortly thereafter.’. . The panel concluded that a jury should decide whether the officers used excessive force. The court reasoned that the officers provoked the confrontation because there were no ‘exigent circumstances’ excusing their entrance. . . Alexander too is a poor fit. As Judge Graber observed below in her dissent, the Ninth Circuit has long read Alexander narrowly. . . Under Ninth Circuit law. . . an entry that otherwise complies with the Fourth Amendment is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction. . . Under this rule, qualified immunity necessarily applies here because, as explained above, competent officers could have believed that the second entry was justified under both continuous search and exigent circumstance rationales. Indeed, even if Reynolds and Holder misjudged the situation, Sheehan cannot ‘establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.’. . Courts must not judge officers with ‘the 20/20 vision of hindsight.’. . When Graham, Deorle, and Alexander are viewed together, the central error in the Ninth Circuit’s reasoning is apparent. The panel majority concluded that these three cases ‘would have placed any reasonable, competent officer on notice that it is unreasonable to forcibly enter the home of an armed, mentally ill suspect who had been acting irrationally and had threatened anyone who entered when there was no objective need for immediate entry.’. . But even assuming that is true, no precedent clearly established that there was not ‘an objective need for immediate entry’ here. No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read Graham, Deorle, and Alexander beforehand, that officer could not know that reopening Sheehan’s door to prevent her from escaping or gathering more weapons would violate the Ninth Circuit’s test, even if all the disputed facts are viewed in respondent’s favor. Without that ‘fair notice,’ an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does it matter for purposes of qualified immunity that Sheehan’s expert, Reiter, testified that the officers did not follow their training. . . Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, (and here, given the generality of that training, it is not at all clear that Reynolds and Holder did so), that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. Rather, so long as ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,’ a plaintiff cannot ‘avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert’s report that an officer’s conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.’ . . Considering the specific situation confronting Reynolds and Holder, they had sufficient reason to believe that their conduct was justified. Finally, to the extent that a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges, . . . no such consensus exists here. . . .In sum, we hold that qualified immunity applies because these officers had no ‘fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.’ . . Because the qualified immunity analysis is straightforward, we need not decide whether the Constitution was violated by the officers’ failure to accommodate Sheehan’s illness. * * * For these reasons, the first question presented is dismissed as improvidently granted. On the second question, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

[Note: The Court dismissed the writ of certiorari on the question of whether Title II applies to “on-the-street responses to reported disturbances” as “improvidently granted.” See King v. Hendricks County Commissioners, 954 F.3d 981, 988-89 (7th Cir. 2020) (“Whether Title II applies to law enforcement investigations and arrests, and if so to what extent, is an open question in this circuit. Our fellow circuits are split. [collecting cases] The Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide this issue in City & County of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, . . . but it dismissed the question as improvidently granted after San Francisco changed its argument after the Ninth Circuit’s decision and before the Supreme Court could rule. . . . Like the First Circuit in Gray, we may assume without deciding that Title II applies to the officers’ interaction with Bradley. We also may assume that Hendricks County could be held vicariously liable under Title II for Hays’s actions, and that ‘deliberate indifference’ is the appropriate standard by which to analyze the institutional defendants’ conduct. No matter, because in order to prevail on his claims King must show that “‘but for” [Bradley’s] disability, he would have been able to access the services or benefits desired.’ . . King’s evidence falls short on that critical point. The police responded promptly to Bradley’s call for assistance, and there is no competent evidence contradicting Hays’s account that he shot Bradley because Bradley ran at him with a knife. We have been given no reason to believe that Hays’s response would have been different had someone not suffering from a mental illness done the same thing, and King does not propose anything that Hays should have done differently to accommodate Bradley’s mental illness. Hays’s ‘failure to disarm, or take the decedent under control, was not because he was inadequately trained to deal with disabled individuals, but because the decedent threatened him with a deadly weapon before he could subdue him.’ . . ‘Thus, if the decedent was denied access to medical services it was because of his violent, threatening behavior, not because he was mentally disabled.’”); Clark v. Colbert, 895 F.3d 1258, 1265 (10th Cir. 2018) (“[W]e have never squarely held the ADA applies to arrests. See J.H. ex rel. J.P. v. Bernalillo Cty., 806 F.3d 1255, 1260–61 (10th Cir. 2015); cf. Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 (noting, in dicta, that the arrest context is not categorically beyond the ADA’s scope). Likewise, we have never held a municipality incurs liability under the ADA for failing to adequately train its employees. See J.V. ex rel. C. v. Albuquerque Pub. Sch., 813 F.3d 1289, 1297 (10th Cir. 2016). . . . But we need not confront either of those open questions to resolve this appeal, as Clark has failed to rebut the district court’s conclusion that the ADA does not transfer liability through the Broken Arrow officers to the Wagoner County Board in this case.”); Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 178-82 (3d Cir. 2018) (“As a threshold matter, we consider whether the ADA applies when police officers make an arrest. Although the question is debatable, we think the answer is generally yes. . . . The first question, then, is whether arrestees can be ‘qualified individuals’ under the ADA, and the best response is that they can, for there is nothing to categorically exclude them from the statute’s broad coverage. . . . The second question is whether arrestees may have disabilities covered by the ADA, and the answer to that is clearly ‘yes.’. . . Saving the third qualifying question for last, we next note that the fourth requirement, that the claimant has been excluded from a service, program, or activity or discriminated against by reason of his disability, is also one that can be satisfied in the context of an arrest. If the arrestee’s ‘disability “played a role in the ... decisionmaking process and ... had a determinative effect on the outcome of that process[,]”’ i.e., if the arrestee’s disability was a ‘but for’ cause of the deprivation or harm he suffered, then the fourth element of an ADA claim has been met. . . . The most controversial question pertinent to whether the ADA applies when police officers are making arrests comes in the context of the statute’s third requirement. We must consider whether arrests made by police officers are ‘services, programs, or activities of a public entity,’ or alternatively, whether police officers may be liable under the ADA for ‘subject[ing a qualified individual] to discrimination’ while effectuating an arrest. . . . [C]ourts across the country are divided on whether police fieldwork and arrests can rightly be called ‘services, programs, or activities of a public entity....’. . . Fortunately, we do not need to resolve that issue in this case, because § 12132 is framed in the alternative and we can look instead to the second phrase, namely, to whether the arrestee was ‘subjected to discrimination’ by the police. . . . The ‘subjected to discrimination’ phrase in Title II is ‘a catch-all phrase that prohibits all discrimination by a public entity, regardless of the context.’. . . It follows, then, that police officers may violate the ADA when making an arrest by failing to provide reasonable accommodations for a qualified arrestee’s disability, thus subjecting him to discrimination. Given that catchall, we believe that the ADA can indeed apply to police conduct during an arrest. That conclusion, which is suggested by the wide scope of the ADA’s text, has support from our sister circuits. See, e.g., Sheehan, 743 F.3d at 1217 (“Title II of the [ADA] applies to arrests.”); Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 973 (8th Cir. 2013) (“[T]he ADA ... appl[ies] to law enforcement officers taking disabled suspects into custody.”). Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all. See, e.g., Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding “that Title II does not apply to an officer’s on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other incidents ... prior to the officer’s securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life”); Gohier v. Enright, 186 F.3d 1216, 1221 (10th Cir. 1999) (“[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law.”). . . . Even though the ADA generally applies in the arrest context, Haberle’s claim for money damages against the Borough fails as a matter of law because she has not adequately pled that the Borough acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of an ADA violation. She seeks compensatory damages from the Borough under the ADA, but that remedy is not available absent proof of ‘intentional discrimination.’ S.H. ex rel. Durrell v. Lower Merion Sch. Dist., 729 F.3d 248, 261 (3d Cir. 2013) (“[C]laims for compensatory damages under ... § 202 of the ADA also require a finding of intentional discrimination.”). To prove intentional discrimination, an ADA claimant must prove at least deliberate indifference, . . . and to plead deliberate indifference, a claimant must allege ‘(1) knowledge that a federally protected right is substantially likely to be violated ... and (2) failure to act despite that knowledge.’. . . Haberle, however, fails to allege that the Borough was aware that its existing policies made it substantially likely that disabled individuals would be denied their federally protected rights under the ADA. . . . She relies on general allegations that the Borough has ‘a history of violating the civil rights of residents[,]’ . . . offering only hazy support for that statement. Even if she could ultimately prove a generalized history of civil rights violations, that would not necessarily demonstrate ‘a pattern of past occurrences of injuries like the plaintiff[’s.]. . . . Because those other vaguely referenced violations have not been adequately alleged to be ‘similar to the violation at issue here, they could not have put [the Defendant] on notice’ that policies, practices, and procedures had to be changed. . . . Nevertheless, with respect to that defect, Haberle should be given an opportunity to amend her complaint, if possible, to salvage her ADA claim against the Borough, since this failure in her complaint is not one as to which we can say definitively that amendment would be futile. . . . Haberle likewise fails to allege that the risk of harm was ‘so great and so obvious,’ as to obviate the need for her to allege facts pertaining to the Borough’s knowledge. . . . At most, she claims that the Borough’s conduct falls ‘beneath the nationally recognized standards for police department operations’ with regard to those with mental illness. . . . But, assuming that is true, falling below national standards does not, in and of itself, make the risk of an ADA violation in such circumstances ‘so patently obvious that a [municipality] could be held liable’ without ‘a pre-existing pattern of violations.’”) Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 183-86 (3d Cir. 2018) (Greenaway, Jr., J., concurring) (“I join the majority opinion and agree that Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) applies to arrests when the arrestee is ‘subjected to discrimination’ by the police. . . . However, I would also hold that—based on the text of Title II, the Department of Justice’s interpretations of Title II, and the Supreme Court’s holding in Pa. Dep’t of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 118 S.Ct. 1952, 141 L.Ed.2d 215 (1998)—that arrests constitute ‘services, programs, or activities of a public entity’ under the ADA. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. . . . [T]he majority’s holding only allows an arrestee to succeed on an ADA claim if he or she can prove discrimination by a public entity, leaving open the question of whether an arrestee can recover under the ADA for being ‘denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity.’ 42 U.S.C. § 12132. This is significant because ‘[c]ases charging discrimination are uniquely difficult to prove and often depend upon circumstantial evidence.’. . . In my estimation, the statutory text of the ADA makes clear that arrests can qualify as a ‘service[], program[], or activit[y]’ of the police, and I therefore see no reason to hang a cloud of doubt over an arrestee’s right to recovery under this alternate theory. . . . [T]he majority is reluctant to determine whether an arrest qualifies as a service, program, or activity under Title II because—according to it—this is an issue that ‘courts across the country are divided on’ . . . Two of our sister circuits have addressed this precise issue to date. In Sheehan v. City and Cty. of S.F., the Ninth Circuit held that arrests are covered by Title II because ‘[t]he ADA applies broadly to police “services, programs, or activities.”’ . . . Conversely, the Fourth Circuit in Rosen v. Montgomery Cty. Md. concluded that arrests are not services, programs, or activities because ‘[t]he terms “eligible” and “participate” imply voluntariness on the part of an applicant who seeks a benefit from the State.’ 121 F.3d 154, 157 (4th Cir. 1997) (quoting Torcasio v. Murray, 57 F.3d 1340, 1347 (4th Cir. 1995)). The Supreme Court, however, squarely rejected Rosen’s reasoning in Yeskey. . . . Accordingly, ‘[c]ourts across the country have called Rosen’s holding into question in light of the Supreme Court’s decision in [Yeskey].’ Seremeth v. Bd. of Cty. Comm’rs Frederick Cty., 673 F.3d 333, 337 (4th Cir. 2012) (collecting cases). . . . Indeed, in Seremeth, the Fourth Circuit declined to rely on Rosen and held that Title II applies to police interrogations based on the phrase ‘services, programs, or activities’ in addition to the catch-all antidiscrimination phrase. . . . We therefore need not be troubled by declining to follow Rosen and its logic. Rather, we should be cognizant that no court of appeals has held that arrests are not ‘services, programs, or activities of a public entity,’ 42 U.S.C. § 12132, since the Supreme Court decided Yeskey twenty years ago. . . . The statutory text, the Department of Justice’s interpretations of the text, and the Supreme Court’s broad interpretation of the ADA in Yeskey establish that arrests are ‘services, programs, or activities of a public entity’ under Title II. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. I therefore see no reason to be less than plain that an arrestee with a disability has two paths to vindicate his or her disability rights.”)

See also Roell v. Hamilton Cty., Ohio, 870 F.3d 471, 489-90 (6th Cir. 2017) (“Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit has squarely addressed whether Title II of the ADA applies in the context of an arrest. Nancy Roell urges us, however, to adopt the reasoning of several of our sister circuits that have found Title II applicable to law-enforcement activities, including arrests. A few opinions have indeed indicated that arrestees might be able to bring cognizable claims under Title II. But, in doing so, they have also noted that the exigent circumstances inherent in an arrest inform the reasonable-accommodation analysis. [collecting cases] We need not decide whether Title II applies in the context of arrests because, even if Nancy Roell’s failure-to-accommodate claim is cognizable, Hamilton County is entitled to summary judgment based on the facts of this case. This circuit has previously held that ‘the “determination of what constitutes reasonable modification is highly fact-specific, requiring case-by-case inquiry.”’ . . . Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston unquestionably faced exigent circumstances while attempting to restrain and arrest Roell. As detailed above, they responded to an unsecured scene to find an individual who had committed, at the very least, a series of property crimes and who posed a continuing threat to the deputies and to others. In fact, almost immediately after the deputies arrived, Roell swiftly approached them brandishing a hose with a metal nozzle and a garden basket. The deputies, in other words, were required to make a series of quick, on-the-spot judgments in a continuously evolving environment. Nancy Roell's proposed accommodations—that the deputies use verbal de-escalation techniques, gather information from the witnesses, and call EMS services before engaging with Roell—were therefore ‘unreasonable ... in light of the overriding public safety concerns.’ . . . In the context of the exigent circumstances surrounding Roell's arrest, Nancy Roell cannot make out a viable ADA claim under her failure-to-accommodate theory. Nor has she presented any evidence that Hamilton County intentionally discriminated against Roell based on his disability. The district court therefore did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Hamilton County on Nancy Roell's ADA claim.”)

See also Reyes v. Galpin, No. 3:18CV831 (JBA), 2019 WL 959680, at *8-9 (D. Conn. Feb. 27, 2019) (“It is clear, at least, that the ADA can apply to police activity in some situations. Even Hainze v. Richards, the sole case cited by the Defendants in support of their proposition that Officers Koval and Galpin were not required to consider ADA compliance before acting, acknowledges that police actions must, at some point, begin to comply with ADA requirements. . . . Plaintiff further alleges that Chief Campbell was ‘on notice ... that a significant number of individuals arrested or otherwise detained by officers under [his] employ are either mentally ill or appear to be so’ and that it ‘was foreseeable to the Chief that police officers would routinely confront’ such individuals, . . . but that the Defendants nonetheless ‘offer no training on how to make reasonable accommodations’ for individuals protected by the ADA with whom officers come into contact[.] . . . Without yet deciding the precise scope of the ADA's requirements in this situation, the Court finds that Plaintiff has pled facts which render plausible her allegation that Mr. Reyes suffered a violation of his right to a reasonable accommodation of his disability because of an alleged failure to train and despite Defendants' knowledge of the need for such training. Therefore, Count Three states a claim of ADA violation sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss stage.”); Taylor v. Ambrifi, No. 115CV03280NLHKMW, 2018 WL 3377155, at *5 (D.N.J. July 11, 2018) (“The Third Circuit recently clarified, ‘Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all.’ Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 181 (3d Cir. 2018). . . . Here, the Court will deny without prejudice Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's ADA violation claims for two reasons. First, despite Defendants' arguments to the contrary, a police officer and a municipality may violate a person's rights under the ADA during a law enforcement encounter, and such a claim is actionable in this Circuit. Second, the factual basis for Plaintiff's ADA claims is the same as for his constitutional violation claims. Because a jury must assess the facts to determine what occurred during Plaintiff's encounter with Ambrifi, along with Delanco Township's training practices of its officers, the Court cannot conclude as a matter of law whether Defendants violated the ADA on the present record. Defendants, however, may renew their motion on Plaintiff's ADA claims at the appropriate time during or after trial, if appropriate."); McHenry v. City of Ottawa, No. 16-2736-DDC-JPO, 2017 WL 4269903, at *12-13 (D. Kan. Sept. 26, 2017) ("Defendants contend that the ADA does not apply in situations where police officers face violent conduct. . . No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent addresses this question directly. . . Every circuit that has reached this issue has held that an arrest is a public benefit that falls within the scope of the ADA. See, e.g., Sheehan v. City & Cty. of S.F., 743 F.3d 1211, 1231–32 (9th Cir. 2014) (cataloging cases), rev'd on other grounds, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015). The difference among the circuits is the rule that applies to when exigent circumstances exist. Most circuits hold that an exigency is a circumstance that courts must take into account when deciding which reasonable accommodations a public entity must make. See, e.g., Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1084 (11th Cir. 2007). The Fifth Circuit takes a different approach, holding that the ADA does not apply to police officers making an on-the-street response until they have secured the scene. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding ADA did not apply to an officer encounter where the individual was walking towards an officer with a knife and did not drop the knife when told to do so). The Sixth Circuit also follows a slightly different path, holding a disabled individual's disability was not the cause of an officer shooting. Thompson v. Williamson Cty., Tenn., 219 F.3d 555, 558 (6th Cir. 2000). Instead, the Sixth Circuit reasoned, the individual's failure to disarm was the cause. Id. Our court has faced this question in a case where an individual approached officers while holding a knife. Sudac v. Hoang, 378 F. Supp. 2d 1298, 1306 (D. Kan. 2005) (granting summary judgment). These circumstances led the officers to shoot the individual. . . Judge Lungstrum reasoned that the officers did not owe an ADA duty to accommodate the individual in this situation because of the threatening manner he presented. . . He thus applied the logic of Hainze and Thompson. . . The court finds Sudac persuasive and concludes that it applies the rule that our Circuit, if faced with the question, would adopt. The court thus holds that the ADA applies to arrests unless an exigency exists. Applying that rule here, plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts that, if supported by evidence and accredited by the factfinder, could support a finding that Mr. Jennings did not present an imminent threat to himself or others. These allegations prevent the court from granting a Motion to Dismiss the ADA claim against Ottawa and Franklin County."); Adle, on behalf of Gerken v. Maine State Police Dep't, No. 1:15-CV-458-NT, 2017 WL 3902859, at *16-21 (D. Me. Sept. 6, 2017) ("On the undisputed facts, Mr. Gerken had established himself as an unusually resilient individual. After pepper spray, Taser fire, an attempt by a game warden to wrest the knife from his grip, a blast from a fire hose, and being shot, Mr. Gerken still had hold of the knife. The light in the woods was dimming. Sgt. Grass was less than thirteen feet from Mr. Gerken. Despite orders to stop moving and stay down, the officers saw Mr. Gerken sitting up and making a lunging motion with the knife. The situation had been unfolding quickly, and now each officer was called on to make a split-second judgment. All three officers made the decision to shoot until Mr. Gerken was incapacitated. . . Under Berube, the law was established that an officer need not perfectly calibrate the amount of force required to protect himself in an emergency situation. On these facts, under this law, the Plaintiff has not shown that no reasonable officer, confronted with this situation, would have made the same choice that Sgt. Grass, Sgt. Shead, and Det. Mitchell each made. Accordingly, I find that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claims under § 1983. . . . There is division within the Circuits over whether Title II of the ADA applies at all to encounters with violent, mentally ill individuals. The Fifth Circuit has held that Title II does not apply to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents, whether or not those calls involve subjects with mental disabilities, prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000). In contrast, the Fourth Circuit takes the view that exigent circumstances factor into whether the requested modification is reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Waller ex rel. Estate of Hunt v. Danville, 556 F.3d 171, 175 (4th Cir. 2009); . . . cf. Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1085 (11th Cir. 2007) (holding exigent circumstances surrounding an arrest "go more to the reasonableness of the requested ADA modification than whether the ADA applies in the first instance," where a nonviolent, deaf individual requested an accommodation); Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 ("[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law."). As for controlling authority on the question, the Supreme Court has yet to decide the issue. . . The First Circuit noted in 2006 that "[i]t is questionable whether the ADA was intended to impose any requirements on police entering a residence to take someone into protective or other custody beyond the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment." . . Courts within this District have long referred to an 'exigent circumstances exception' or have followed Hainze. [collecting cases] Regardless of whether there is a per se rule that the ADA does not apply in exigent circumstances or whether exigency is one factor among many to determine whether a requested accommodation is reasonable, the threshold question is whether exigent circumstances existed. The Plaintiff argues that exigent circumstances did not exist leading up to the execution of the tactical plan and that the MSP's militaristic response unreasonably exacerbated Mr. Gerken's mental health crisis. The Plaintiff's experts opined that, under the totality of the circumstances, the collective law enforcement conduct. . . caused Mr. Gerken's condition to deteriorate and ultimately led to his death. . . . On the facts before me, taken in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, no reasonable juror could conclude that the situation faced by the MSP did not involve exigent circumstances and a threat to human safety. The MSP did not have the option of packing up and going home when it got dark. There is no dispute that Mr. Gerken was armed with a knife, that he was disturbed, that he had earlier told an 8-year-old to stop looking at him or he would kill her, that he had refused to drop the knife for the first responders, that he had resisted Sgt. Dunham's attempt to disarm him, and that he had withstood pepper spray and an attempt to Taser him. Except for the odd outburst, Mr. Gerken remained unresponsive, for over six hours of attempted negotiations, and he never once let go of the knife. It is undisputed that shortly before the tactical plan was executed, Mr. Gerken said, 'I will cut you' as he waved his knife in the air. Although the Plaintiff points out that everybody was safe as long as Mr. Gerken lay on the ground, no one knew if and when Mr. Gerken would get up. To say that Mr. Gerken might still be there today if the police had not used the fire hose is speculative. On these facts, no reasonable juror could conclude that there was no exigency. Many of the Plaintiff's accommodations were tried without success or rejected as unworkable. There is no dispute that negotiations extended over six hours. The Plaintiff offers no facts to suggest that lights were available that could have effectively lit the forest and allowed for further negotiations. . . . Even under the totality of the circumstances test set forth in Waller, the record indicates that the officers on the scene provided Mr. Gerken with reasonable accommodations. . . . The MSP conducted a lengthy, personalized negotiation by experienced officers. The officers shifted away from negotiations only when they perceived an increased risk to themselves and the public. As discussed above, Sgt. Grass's decision to use the fire hose as an alternative, non-lethal tool was objectively reasonable in these circumstances. Once Mr. Gerken rose to his feet and began to run, knife in hand toward Det. Mitchell's advance, exigent circumstances certainly curtailed any duty to accommodate Mr. Gerken's disability."); Williams v. City of New York, 121 F.Supp.3d 354, 364-65 & n.12, 369-71 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("There is no dispute that Plaintiff is a qualified individual with a disability. . . or that the City is a public entity and is subject to the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. The City concedes that NYPD actions fall within the scope of Title II of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act generally but argues that 'on the street' interactions between police officers and 'qualified individuals with a disability' are excluded from coverage until the crime scene has been secured and the arrestee has been transported to the stationhouse. . . In other words, the City argues that the NYPD bears no burden to provide any accommodation to disabled individuals until after the individual has been arrested and booked. The City advances two theories to support its position: first, 'on-the-street encounters' are not covered 'services, programs, or activities;' and, second, exigent circumstances and overriding public safety concerns make it unreasonable to require police officers to accommodate disabled individuals before making an arrest. . . The City's crabbed interpretation of Title II's coverage of police activity simply does not comport with the language of Title II and its implementing regulations, particularly in light of the remedial purpose of the statute and the weight of authority that has considered the issue. . . .The Second Circuit has yet to address the question whether and to what extent Title II of the ADA applies during an on-the-street interaction leading to an arrest. . . The Supreme Court granted certiorari in City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S.Ct. 702 (2014), to consider the question whether Title II of the ADA applies 'to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents ... prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life,' 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1773 (2015). The Court dismissed the question presented as improvidently granted, however, because the petitioner, respondent, and United States as amicus curiae all conceded on the merits that 42 U.S.C. § 12132 applies to arrests. . . The issue, therefore, remains undecided. . . .The City argues that a plaintiff has no remedy under § 1983 for alleged violations of Title II of the ADA because Congress adopted a comprehensive private remedial scheme that displaced private rights of action under § 1983. . . Because the remedial scheme of Title II of the ADA derives from the same source as the remedial scheme of Title IX, the Supreme Court’s conclusion that parallel and concurrent § 1983 claims and implied private causes of action are available under Title IX applies with equal force to Title II of the ADA. Accordingly, a plaintiff can bring a cause of action under § 1983 to enforce rights protected by Title II of the ADA.”); Lookabill v. City of Vancouver, No. 13-5461 RJB, 2015 WL 4623938, at *8-9 (W.D. Wash. Aug. 3, 2015) (“The principle case that Plaintiffs rely upon, Sheehan v. City and Cnty. of San Francisco, 743 F.3d 1211 (9th Cir.2014), was before the U.S. Supreme Court in 2015. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, —U.S. —, —, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). (In Sheehan, the Ninth Circuit held that the ADA applies to arrests.) The Sheehan defendants initially requested certiorari on the question of whether the ADA ‘requires law enforcement officers to provide accommodations to an armed, violent, and mentally ill suspect in the course of bringing the suspect into custody,’ arguing that there was a split in the circuits as to whether the ADA applies to arrests. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, —U.S. —, —, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). The U.S. Supreme Court ‘dismissed’ [sic] the question, holding that certiorari was improvidently granted because the defendants failed to brief the question to the Court (arguing instead that under 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.139(a) and 35.104, ‘a person who poses a direct threat or significant risk to the safety of others is not qualified for accommodations under the ADA’) and failed to adequately raise that new issue in the Ninth Circuit. Id. The ADA claim was remanded to the Ninth Circuit and the Ninth Circuit remanded the ADA claim to the district court. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit’s holding in Sheehan, that the ADA applies to arrests, is still binding on this Court. . . . The City also advances the same argument here that the Sheehan defendants raised with the Supreme Court, but the Supreme Court did not reach. It argues that Mr. Lookabill was not a ‘qualified individual with a disability’ requiring accommodation. . . . In the circumstances presented here, Mr. Lookabill was not a ‘qualified individual with a disability’ because he posed a ‘direct threat’ to the ‘health or safety of others.’ The officers were called to the scene to deal with Mr. Lookabill, who appeared to be intoxicated and had threatened people with a gun. He was armed, non-compliant, and acting erratically. He begged the police to come get the gun from him and then would ask them to shoot him. He threatened to shoot himself. Mr. Lookabill would say he wanted to be a policeman but then would scream obscenities at them. Mr. Lookabill kept ‘target glancing’ the officers. All present were aware he had military training and had served in Iraq. Further, the undersigned has already held that ‘[a]t the time they opened fire, the officers had probable cause to believe that Mr. Lookabill posed an immediate threat to the officers or others. Mr. Lookabill moved quickly and deliberately for his gun without provocation. He had been repeatedly warned not to do so by several policemen with their guns drawn.’ . . . Mr. Lookabill posed a significant threat to the officers, other civilians, and to himself. He was not a qualified individual with a disability under the ADA. Plaintiffs argue that certain accommodations should have been implemented, for example that the officers should not have ordered Mr. Lookabill to the ground, but should have him ‘put his hands above his head and turn around’ and that the officers should not have been positioned so closely to Mr. Lookabill, and that way would not have felt threatened. Plaintiff does so without any evidence to support these suppositions. Aside from bare assertions, Plaintiffs fail to show that these actions would have mitigated the risk posed by Mr. Lookabill when the officers encountered him or afterward. There is no showing that any modification of policy, practice, or procedure or the provision of auxiliary aids or services would have mitigated the risk. 28 C.F.R. § 35.139(b). In addition to failing to show that Mr. Lookabill was a ‘qualified individual with a disability,’ Plaintiffs failed to show that the officers’ alleged discrimination or failure to accommodate was ‘by reason of’ his disability.”); Jones v. Lacey, No. 14-CV-10384, 2015 WL 3579282, at *17 n.1 (E.D. Mich. June 5, 2015) (“Defendants do not appear to dispute that the ADA applies to Lacey’s conduct during this incident. While the Court is not inclined to address an issue that neither party briefed, the Court notes that in this circuit, ‘[c]ase law addressing whether or how Title II of the ADA is applicable to police conduct related to effectuating an arrest or an investigation is limited.’ *Scozzari v. Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 5, 7 (2013) (per curiam) (“There is no suggestion in this case that Officer Stanton knowingly violated the Constitution; the question is whether, in light of precedent existing at the time, he was ‘plainly incompetent’ in entering Sims’ yard to pursue the fleeing Patrick. . . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that he was. It did so despite the fact that federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect. . . . To summarize the law at the time Stanton made his split-second decision to enter Sims’ yard: Two opinions of this Court were equivocal on the lawfulness of his entry; two opinions of the State Court of Appeal affirmatively authorized that entry; the most relevant opinion of the Ninth Circuit was readily distinguishable; two Federal District Courts in the Ninth Circuit had granted qualified immunity in the wake of that opinion; and the federal and state courts of last resort around the Nation were sharply divided. We do not express any view on whether Officer Stanton's entry into Sims' yard in pursuit of Patrick was constitutional. But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not 'beyond debate.' al-Kidd, supra, at —, 131 S.Ct., at 2083. Stanton may have been mistaken in believing his actions were justified, but he was not 'plainly incompetent.'")

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2084, 2085 (2011) ("A Government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, '[t]he contours of [a] right [are] sufficiently clear' that every 'reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. . . . The constitutional question in this case falls far short of that threshold. At the time of al-Kidd's arrest, not a single judicial opinion had held that pretext could render an objectively reasonable arrest pursuant to a material-witness warrant unconstitutional. . . . [Ashcroft] deserves qualified immunity even assuming. . . that his alleged detention policy violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Weise v. Casper, 131 S. Ct. 7, 7, 8 (2010) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("I cannot see how reasonable public officials, or any staff or volunteers under their direction, could have viewed the bumper sticker as a permissible reason for depriving Weise and Young of access to the event. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeals held respondents entitled to qualified immunity because 'no specific authority instructs this court ... how to treat the ejection of a silent attendee from an official speech based on the attendee's protected expression outside the speech area.' 593 F.3d 1163, 1170 (C.A.10 2010). No 'specific authority' should have been needed. . . . I see only one arguable reason for deferring the question this case presents. Respondents were volunteers following instructions from White House officials. The Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, 111 Stat. 218, 42 U.S.C. § 14501 et seq., had respondents invoked it in the courts below, might have shielded them from liability. Federal officials themselves, however, gain no shelter from that Act. Suits against the officials responsible for Weise's and Young's ouster remain pending and may offer this Court an opportunity to take up the issue avoided today.")

Safford Unified School Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 129 S. Ct. 2633, 2643, 2644 (2009) ("[T]he T.L.O. concern to limit a school search to reasonable scope requires the support of reasonable suspicion of danger or of resort to underwear for hiding evidence of wrongdoing before a search can reasonably make the quantum leap from outer clothes and backpacks to exposure of intimate parts. The meaning of such a search, and the degradation its subject may reasonably feel, place a search that intrusive in a category of its own demanding its own specific suspicions. . . . T.L.O. directed school officials to limit the intrusiveness of a search, 'in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction,' . . . and as we have just said at some length, the intrusiveness of the strip search here cannot be seen as justifiably related to the circumstances. But we realize that the lower courts have reached divergent conclusions regarding how the T.L.O. standard applies to such searches. [collecting cases] We think these differences of opinion from our own are substantial enough to require immunity for the school officials in this case. We would not suggest that entitlement to qualified immunity is the guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law in the other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear if we have been clear. That said, however, the cases viewing school strip searches differently from the way we see them are numerous enough, with well-reasoned majority and dissenting opinions, to counsel doubt that we were sufficiently clear in the prior statement of law. We conclude that qualified immunity is warranted.”).

Safford Unified School Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 129 S. Ct. 2633, 2644 (2009) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“This is, in essence, a case in which clearly established law meets clearly outrageous conduct. . . .The strip search of Savana Redding in this case was both more intrusive and less justified than the search of the student’s purse in T.L.O. Therefore, while I join Parts I-III of the Court’s opinion, I disagree with its decision to extend qualified immunity to the school official who authorized this unconstitutional search.”).

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 599 (2004) (per curiam) (“We express no view as to the correctness of the Court of Appeals’ decision on the constitutional question itself. We believe that, however that question is decided, the Court of Appeals was wrong on the issue of qualified immunity. . . .Graham and Garner, following the lead of the Fourth Amendment’s text, are cast at a high level of generality. . . . Of course, in an obvious case, these standards can ‘clearly establish’ the answer, even without a body of relevant case law. [citing Hope v. Pelzer]. . . . The present case is far from the obvious one where Graham and Garner alone offer a basis for decision. . . . We therefore turn to ask whether, at the time of Brosseau’s actions, it was ‘ “clearly established” ’ in this more ‘ “particularized” ’ sense that she was violating Haugen’s Fourth Amendment right. . . . The parties point us to only a handful of cases relevant to the ‘situation [Brosseau] confronted’: whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight. . . .These three cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case. None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that Brosseau’s actions fell in the ‘ Ahazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’” . . . The cases by no means ‘clearly establish’ that Brosseau’s conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.”).

Groh v. Ramirez, 124 S. Ct. 1284, 1293, 1294 (2004) (“Given that the particularity requirement is set forth in the text of the Constitution, no reasonable officer could believe that a warrant that plainly did not comply with that requirement was valid. . . . [E]ven a cursory reading of the warrant in this case—perhaps just a simple glance—would have revealed a glaring deficiency that any reasonable police officer would have known was constitutionally fatal.”)

Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S. Ct. 2508, 2514-18 (2002) (“We agree with the Court of Appeals that the attachment of Hope to the hitching post under the circumstances alleged in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . In assessing whether the Eighth Amendment violation here met the Harlow test, the Court of Appeals required that the facts of previous cases be ‘ ‘materially similar’ to Hope’s situation.’ . . . This rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard, though supported by Circuit precedent, [footnote omitted] is not consistent with our cases. . . . Our opinion in Lanier . . . makes clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. Indeed, in Lanier, we expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be ‘fundamentally similar.’ Although earlier cases involving ‘fundamentally similar’ facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding. The same is true of cases with ‘materially similar’ facts. Accordingly, pursuant to Lanier, the salient question that the Court of Appeals ought to have asked is whether the state of the law in 1995 gave respondents fair warning that their alleged treatment of Hope was unconstitutional. . . . The use of the hitching post as alleged by Hope ‘unnecessar[ily] and wanton [ly] inflicted pain,’ . . . and thus was a clear violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Arguably, the violation was so obvious that our own Eighth Amendment cases gave the respondents fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution. Regardless, in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections (“DOC”) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents’ conduct violated ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . [F]or the purpose of providing fair notice to reasonable officers administering punishment for past misconduct, [there is no] reason to draw a constitutional distinction between a practice of handcuffing an inmate to a fence for prolonged periods and handcuffing him to a hitching post for seven hours. The Court of Appeals’ conclusion to the contrary exposes the danger of a rigid, overreliance on factual similarity. . . . The obvious cruelty inherent in this practice should have provided respondents with some notice that their alleged conduct violated Hope’s constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Hope was treated in a way antithetical to human dignity—he was hitched to a post for an extended period of time in a position that was painful, and under circumstances that were both degrading and dangerous. This wanton treatment was not done of necessity, but as punishment for prior conduct. Even if there might once have been a question regarding the constitutionality of this practice, the Eleventh Circuit precedent of Gates and Ort, as well as the DOJ report condemning the practice, put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of the hitching post under the circumstances alleged by Hope was unlawful. The ‘fair and clear warning,’ . . . that these cases provided was sufficient to preclude the defense of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . . We did not take, and do not pass upon, the questions whether or to what extent the three named officers may be held responsible for the acts charged, if proved. Nothing in our decision forecloses any defense other than qualified immunity on the ground relied upon by the Court of Appeals.”).

Saucier v. Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151, 2156 (2001) (“The relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.”).[See discussion of Saucier, infra]

Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341 (1986) (qualified immunity protects “all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law”).

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269-72 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] (“Nor have our decisions demanded precedents that applied the right at issue to a factual situation that is ‘fundamentally similar’ at the level of specificity meant by the Sixth Circuit in using that phrase. To the contrary, we have upheld convictions under § 241 or § 242 despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court, so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights. [citing cases] But even putting these examples aside, we think that the Sixth Circuit’s ‘fundamentally similar’ standard would lead trial judges to demand a degree of certainty at once unnecessarily high and likely to beget much wrangling. This danger flows from the Court of Appeals’ stated view . . . that due process under § 242 demands more than the ‘clearly established’ law required for a public officer to be held civilly liable for a constitutional violation under § 1983 or Bivens. [cites omitted] This, we think, is error. In the civil sphere, we have explained that qualified immunity seeks to ensure that defendants ‘reasonably can anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability,’ . . . by attaching liability only if ‘[t]he contours of the right [violated are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ [citing Anderson] So conceived, the object of the ‘clearly established’ immunity standard is not different from that of ‘fair warning’ as it relates to law ‘made specific’ for the purpose of validly applying § 242. The fact that one has a civil and the other a criminal law role is of no significance; both serve the same objective, and in effect the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the fair warning standard to give officials (and, ultimately, governments) the same protection from civil liability and its consequences that individuals have traditionally possessed in the face of vague criminal statutes. To require something clearer than ‘clearly established’ would, then, call for something beyond ‘fair warning.’ This is not to say, of course, that the single warning standard points to a single level of specificity sufficient in every instance. In some circumstances, as when an earlier case expressly leaves open whether a general rule applies to the particular type of conduct at issue, a very high degree of prior factual particularity may be necessary. . . But general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though ‘the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful,’ In sum, as with civil liability under § 1983 or Bivens, all that can usefully be said about criminal liability under § 242 is that it may be imposed for deprivation of a constitutional right if, but only if, ‘in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [under the Constitution is] apparent,’ [citing Anderson] Where it is, the constitutional requirement of fair warning is satisfied.”).

Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987) (“The ‘contours’ of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.....in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.”)

D.C. CIRCUIT

Vasquez v. District of Columbia, 110 F.4th 282, 288 (D.C. Cir. 2024) (“An official is said to have sufficient notice if there is ‘controlling authority’ or ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,’ . . . that clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct ‘in the particular circumstances that he or she faced[.]’ . . . The District Court agreed with Officer Agosto, and easily disposed of this argument because Mr. Vasquez failed to cite a single case ‘from the Supreme Court or this Circuit that would hold an officer accountable in circumstances like those faced by Officer Agosto.’ . . . Minutes into oral argument, Mr. Vasquez’s counsel conceded that ‘there is strangely a paucity of case law on this precise situation.’ . . . This concession kills Mr. Vasquez’s appeal. There is simply no way that the proposed theory of Fourth Amendment liability is ‘clearly established’ if, when asked to present one case in support of his theory, counsel submits that no such case exists. Mr. Vasquez’s briefing relies primarily on one case, Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725 (6th Cir. 2006). But Gregory does not come close to providing Officer Agosto with sufficient notice that his conduct was unlawful. In Gregory, a state police employee was alleged to have ‘intentionally withheld exculpatory information in order to continue Plaintiff’s detention without probable cause.’ . . . But here, Mr. Vasquez suggests that Officer Agosto negligently failed to uncover the existence of readily available exculpatory evidence. There is no way Officer Agosto, who is alleged to have negligently investigated, was put on notice that his conduct was unconstitutional because other state police employees intentionally withheld exculpatory evidence to aid a criminal prosecution.”)

Johnson v. District of Columbia, 927 F.3d 539, 546 (D.C. Cir. 2019) (“‘Although the Supreme Court’s decisions do “not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established,” for purposes of qualified immunity, “existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.”’ . . . Much turns, then, on the level of generality at which the relevant decisions establish the pertinent right. . . . A plaintiff may be unable to overcome qualified immunity if the precedents define the right abstractly rather than in a manner ‘particularized to the [pertinent] facts.’ . . . Johnson’s claim falls short on that ground. Months before his initial parole hearing, the Supreme Court recognized that ‘[t]he presence of discretion does not displace the protections of the Ex Post Facto Clause.’ . . . But that broadly framed principle would not have put a reasonable officer on adequate notice that the specific violation alleged here—denying a presumption of suitability in the face of essentially unfettered discretion to depart from the presumption—would entail a significant risk of a longer term of incarceration so as to violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. Indeed, Garner itself acknowledged that determining the Ex Post Facto consequences of any particular change is a ‘question of particular difficulty when the discretion vested in a parole board is taken into account.’ . . . Neither Johnson nor his amicus identifies any contemporaneous precedent establishing the contours of the claimed right with the requisite specificity.”) Hedgpeth v. Rahim, 893 F.3d 802, 807-11 (D.C. Cir. 2018) (“Although there is a dearth of decisions interpreting D.C.’s public intoxication law in relevant respects, decisions from other courts applying comparable public-intoxication laws in similar circumstances support the reasonableness of the officers' belief of probable cause. . . We therefore conclude that the officers could have reasonably believed Hedgpeth was intoxicated and posed a danger to himself or others. As a result, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hedgpeth's claim of an unlawful arrest. . . Here, the district court considered the reasonableness of Officer Rahim's use of a forcible takedown maneuver under the assumed facts to be a close question, in light of, among other things, the misdemeanor nature of the suspected offenses. The court, though, did not decide that underlying Fourth Amendment question, instead concluding that Officer Rahim is entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. Even if there is a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer's use of force, he is protected by qualified immunity unless his force violated clearly established law. . . . The pertinent question here is whether 'any competent officer,' in light of '[p]recedent involving similar facts,' . . . would consider it unlawful to use a takedown maneuver against a suspect who was shouting repeatedly and belligerently at the officers, who refused their orders to put his hands behind his back, and who had been described by a person with him as 'hard to handle.' We conclude that this is not 'an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that' the use of a takedown maneuver in those circumstances 'would violate the Fourth Amendment.' . . . This does not mean an officer invariably has authority to forcibly take down a suspect in the course of a routine arrest. But here, in light of the circumstances of this case and the applicable precedent, this case is not one in which 'the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' . . . That conclusion is fortified by decisions from other courts sustaining an arresting officer's use of an analogous level of force against a noncomplying suspect.") Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1034-38 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("Because the Supreme Court's reasoning in Cady focused on attributes unique to vehicles, some circuits have confined the community caretaking exception to automobiles. See, e.g., Ray v. Twp. of Warren, 626 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 2010); United States v. Bute, 43 F.3d 531, 535 (10th Cir. 1994); United States v. Erickson, 991 F.2d 529, 532 (9th Cir. 1993); United States v. Pichany, 687 F.2d 204, 207-09 (7th Cir. 1982). The Fifth and Eighth Circuits have extended the exception to warrantless searches of the home, see United States v. York, 895 F.2d 1026, 1029 (5th Cir. 1990); United States v. Quezada, 448 F.3d 1005, 1007-08 (8th Cir. 2006), but the authorized scope of the searches has been quite limited. The Sixth Circuit appears to have equivocated. Compare United States v. Rohrig, 98 F.3d 1506, 1521-25 (6th Cir. 1996), with Goodwin v. City of Painesville, 781 F.3d 314, 331 (6th Cir. 2015) and United States v. Williams, 354 F.3d 497, 508-09 (6th Cir. 2003). Neither this court nor the D.C. Court of Appeals has held that the community caretaking exception applies to a home. United States v. Proctor, 489 F.3d 1348, 1353 (D.C. Cir. 2007); Hawkins v. United States, 113 A.3d 216, 222 (D.C. 2015). The instant case does not require the court to decide whether the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home because even assuming it may, the officers point to no authority as would justify the EOD [Explosive Ordnance Disposal Unit] search. In cases where this doctrine justified a warrantless search of a home, the police officers were presented with circumstances requiring immediate action if they were to fulfill their caretaking function, and the ensuing searches were characterized by brevity and circumspection. . . Here, the

MPD had been on the scene for five hours and fully secured the area prior to the EOD entry and search, and Corrigan was in MPD custody after surrendering peacefully. There was ample time and opportunity for the MPD to investigate further and, as appropriate, to seek a search warrant. Yet, instead of doing so, the officers conducted another, more invasive search of Corrigan's home. . . . [U]pon viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Corrigan as the non-movant, . . . we conclude that the officers fail to demonstrate that the extensive EOD search of Corrigan's home was justified by any plausible exigency. And assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home, the officers lacked probable cause to believe that there was a risk to the community demanding the kind of swift, warrantless response that doctrine would authorize. We therefore hold that the EOD search violated Corrigan's rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . . For the brief and limited warrantless ERT 'sweep' of Corrigan's home, the officers had a sufficiently reasonable basis for believing there was probable cause to look for a potentially injured and incapacitated person as to entitle them to qualified immunity. . . . Although a close question, the information known to Glover suggested that a reasonable officer on the scene could have believed that there was probable cause to order a brief "sweep" to check whether the ex-girlfriend was injured and remained incapacitated inside Corrigan's home. . . . Consistent with that belief, the ERT 'sweep' was limited to spaces large enough to contain an individual, . . . and thus was not more intrusive than necessary to address the claimed exigency. By contrast, based on the facts known to the officers at the time, no reasonable officer could have believed that an exigency continued to exist as would justify a second warrantless break in of Corrigan's home to search for explosives. The evidence shows only that the MPD officers were presented with a potentially suicidal military veteran who possessed 'military items' and had IED training, but no information about actual or reported threats by him to others, much less that he had IED materials at home or would commit suicide in a manner that threatened others. . . . The unfocused nature of the EOD search underscores its patent unreasonableness, both in terms of its scope and the lack of a reasonable basis for it. . . . Clearly established law foreclosed the broad and invasive search that was executed. And even assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the warrantless search of a home, it cannot shield the officers from liability. It is clearly established that this doctrine encompasses only police searches that are occasioned by, and strictly circumscribed by, the need to perform caretaking functions 'totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence related to' a crime. . . . That is, the police must be lawfully inside a home for a reason unrelated to ferreting out crime. . . . Finally, the wide berth for reasonableness that the Supreme Court has accorded officers involved circumstances in which they must make split second judgments. . . . In Corrigan's case, the MPD had more than five hours, between the Fifth District's officers' arrival on the scene and the MPD's first contact with Corrigan himself, to gather information about a possible threat and apply for a warrant upon probable cause. . . . The more intrusive EOD search was conducted after the ERT 'sweep' revealed no injury to others or suspicious items in plain view. Corrigan had peacefully submitted to MPD custody. As such, this was not a case in which officers had to make a split-second decision that, judged with the benefit of hindsight, is revealed to be mistaken. . . . Rather, this is a case in which officers disregarded the long-established 'basic principle of Fourth Amendment law that searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable.' . . . They thereby contravened established law clearly putting them on fair notice that warrantless searches of a home based on an exception to the warrant requirement must be supported by a reasonable belief based on objective facts and narrowly circumscribed to the specific exigency claimed. Our dissenting colleague parts company with our analysis only as to qualified immunity. As to that issue she acknowledges that ‘there can be “an obvious case” where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation “clearly establish[es]” the answer, even without a body of relevant case law’ articulated at a high level of specificity. . . This is that ‘obvious case.’ A few clear propositions, all well established at the time of the search, admit of no relevant legal uncertainty in the context the EOD faced: The Fourth Amendment prohibits warrantless searches of a home, . . . unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies, . . . the exigent circumstances exception requires ‘genuine exigency,’ . . . and the community caretaking exception, which no binding precedent has applied to the search of a home, is, in any event, limited to police functions that are ‘totally divorced’ from criminal investigation[.]. . . As general as these propositions may be, their application here is straightforward, implicating no ‘hazy border’ between acceptable and unacceptable conduct by trained law enforcement officers. . . . Nothing in Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308 (2015), where the police were attempting to execute an arrest warrant, calls our conclusion into doubt. . . . Given the lack of any exigency in the instant case, Mullenix, like the entire run of recent cases granting qualified immunity, is relevant only insofar as it reinforces the familiar, objective immunity standard that we apply.”)

Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1039-47 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (Brown, J., dissenting) (“As Law and Order reminds us every evening, the police are the ones ‘who investigate crime.’ Nowadays, though, we demand much more from them. The series of unfortunate events presented by Matthew Corrigan’s lawsuit is distressing, and I agree with the conclusion that the second search of Corrigan’s apartment violated the Fourth Amendment. Nevertheless, given the varied role played by police officers, and its effect on the standard Corrigan must meet to pierce the officers’ qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . . Properly applied, the qualified immunity analysis shows the officers’ initial actions were not only responsible, but commendable. When the officers’ actions transgressed the Fourth Amendment, Corrigan’s rights were protected by the district court granting his motion to suppress and entering a nolle prosequi on all charges against him. Now, when Corrigan seeks half-a-million dollars in a § 1983 lawsuit, a different issue is in play: whether controlling law was ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [t]he[y] [did] violate[d]’ Corrigan’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The court concludes it was, but I am at a loss to understand how this holding can be squared with the simple fact that neither the Supreme Court’s precedent, nor ours, nor a robust consensus of our sister circuits clearly answered the legal questions faced by the officers in this case. There is much on which the majority and I agree. Under the circumstances of this case, the first search was permissible; the second search was not; and the information the police garnered from the first search and further investigation changed the calculus. However, on the question of how these issues impact the scope of qualified immunity, we part company. First, by imposing an artificially high burden on police conduct in exigent circumstances, the court conflates the ‘probable cause’ normally required to search a person’s home and the ‘objectively reasonable basis’ used to evaluate intrusions based on exigent circumstances. . . .This conflation signals the majority opinion’s fundamental flaw: grafting general Fourth Amendment standards from the criminal investigation context on to the exigency context. Related to this first problem is the second—and more significant—issue with today’s opinion: The metric for measuring what law is ‘clearly established’ is more protean than my colleagues concede. . . .The standard for law to be ‘clearly established’ is quite demanding. The Supreme Court’s most recent pronouncement on the issue confirms ‘[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right. We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. Put simply, qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law. . . . The source of ‘clearly established’ law is quite constrained as well. Controlling precedent from the Supreme Court, the applicable state supreme court, or from the applicable circuit court, constitutes ‘clearly established’ law—but it is unclear what else, if anything, does. . . .If there is no controlling authority in the plaintiff’s jurisdiction at the time of the incident, ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ ‘is necessary’ to show ‘clearly established’ law. . . This makes sense. It is simply not reasonable to ask police departments around the country to keep abreast of every circuit court’s latest ‘clearly established’ pronouncement and parse its application to the myriad factual permutations officers encounter on a daily basis. . . Accordingly, the Supreme Court is circumspect about the use of out-of-circuit cases to compose ‘clearly established’ law. Since al-Kidd, it is only assumed for sake of argument that ‘a right can be “clearly established” by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals.’ See Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015) (per curiam); City & Cnty. of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015); Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012). . . Finally, characterizing the appropriate law as ‘clearly established’ is quite exacting. . . .To be sure, there can be ‘an obvious case’ where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation ‘ “clearly establish[es]” the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . But, that circumstance is inapposite when a case is ‘one in which the result depends very much on the facts.’ . . In that latter circumstance, a more ‘particularized’ inquiry into the applicable law is required. . . There, we ask whether a prior case ‘squarely governs the case here,’ not whether a prior case puts this one in a ‘hazy border’ between acceptable and unacceptable conduct[.] . . . Behavior on the border is still behavior protected by qualified immunity. . . . The majority cites no Supreme Court case and no D.C. Circuit case squarely governing Corrigan’s claim. Indeed, the majority all but concedes there is no such case when justifying its review of both the ‘constitutional violation’ and ‘clearly established’ prongs of the qualified immunity analysis; doing so ‘to avoid “leav[ing] the standards of official conduct permanently in limbo.”’ . . The majority finds ‘clearly established’ law by reasoning the facts of this exigent circumstances case back to the general principles of warrantless home searches in the criminal investigation context. This is inappropriate in Corrigan’s case, where the officers were not searching for criminal activity but responding to a potentially-suicidal suspect with ‘military items.’ . . But even if this was appropriate, the majority’s analysis rests on ‘legal facts,’ not law. . . The facts aid the analysis, but only to the extent they are closely aligned (or are obviously distinguishable from) controlling authority or persuasive authority. The ‘clearly established’ inquiry is its own question, not a rehash of the facts giving rise to a constitutional-rights violation. . . The factual regurgitation is telling, however, because it confirms Corrigan’s claim is one where the existence of ‘clearly established’ law ‘depends very much on the facts of [this] case.’ . . ‘Clearly established’ law in this context thus depends upon a prior case ‘squarely govern[ing]’ this one. . . Since the majority can point to no clearly analogous case prohibiting the officers’ conduct, that should end the inquiry. . . . At the time—with no Supreme Court or D.C. Circuit case squarely governing the emergency situation faced here—a reasonable officer could read Mora, Sutterfield, and Hendrix and conclude that the warrantless searches conducted in Corrigan’s apartment might be within the realm of the officer’s authority to abate public safety concerns posed by possession of military equipment by an individual with IED training. This is so even as the second search was a ‘substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep.’ . . But determining whether the law was ‘clearly established’ is not an exercise in Monday-morning quarterbacking—law enforcement officers should not be subject to personal liability simply because the judiciary has not precisely defined the rules of the road. . . It is therefore insufficient to apply, retrospectively, criminal investigation limitations on police conduct to the exigent circumstances context simply because these limitations have long existed in the investigatory context. Ultimately, the court’s analysis rests on the ‘Fourth Amendment standard’ of reasonableness. . . The ‘inquiry’ of ‘objective reasonableness’ as to a Fourth Amendment violation, however, ‘is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.’ . . The fact that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in searching Corrigan’s apartment a second time without a warrant is, for purposes of finding the ‘particular’ issue faced by the officers answered by ‘clearly established’ law, a non sequitur. What “every reasonable” official would have understood to be ‘clearly established’ in case law is not the same question as what is ‘objectively reasonable’ for purposes of determining a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . It does not take six pages to explain why law is ‘clearly established’ unless the case is ‘one in which the result depends very much on the facts.’ . . But the majority will not—and indeed, cannot—admit this. If the majority did admit this, it would then have to concede no case ‘squarely governed’ at the time the officers entered Corrigan’s apartment. . . . We do not need to make ‘bad law’ just because ‘bad facts’ are often accused of doing so. There is much to regret about the procedures police continued to pursue here—especially in light of the many observations and revelations which objectively decreased the imminence of any dire threat. Good intentions, however, are no substitute for good reasons. ‘Because of the importance of qualified immunity to society as a whole, the [Supreme] Court often corrects lower courts when they wrongly subject individual officers to liability.’ . . Indeed, if this decision were affirmed by the Supreme Court on the ground that the officers violated clearly established law, it would mark the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court has ruled in favor of a § 1983 plaintiff on the question. See Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 565 (2004); Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46. Yet the Supreme Court’s exacting standard to identify ‘clearly established’ law does not play even a supporting role in the court’s analysis, which, at most, strings together generalized statements and some out-of-circuit cases, affixes the label ‘clearly established’ onto the newfangled ‘rule’ drawn from them, and then employs this ‘rule’ to deny qualified immunity. If we want to join the game of second-guessing first responders, we will find ourselves at the end of a long queue. But flouting the clear trend of controlling authority is both unwarranted and unwise, so I respectfully dissent.”)

Dukore v. D.C., 799 F.3d 1137, 1144-45 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (“In reviewing a grant of qualified immunity, we must consider the right asserted ‘not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear[.]’ . . . So the right we must consider in this case is ‘not the general right to be free from retaliation for one’s speech,’ but rather ‘the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.’ . . . The Supreme Court has ‘never held that there is such a right.’ . . . Nor was there in February 2012 (nor is there now) any settled consensus view in this court or other federal courts of appeals such that ‘the statutory or constitutional question’ has been placed ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Quite the opposite, in July 2011, this court recognized that the federal courts of appeals were split on whether a plaintiff claiming retaliatory arrest had to show that the arrest lacked probable cause, and expressly declined to take sides. See Moore, 644 F.3d at 423 n. 8. That means that, at the time of the arrests in this case, precedent in this and other circuits was either inconclusive or actively in conflict on whether the existence of probable cause precluded an arrest from being deemed ‘retaliatory.’ That is a far cry from placing the question beyond debate. Dukore and Canavan argue that the right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment is clearly established. And they argue that the only confusion in the law concerned retaliatory prosecutions, as discussed in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006). Dukore and Canavan further contend that any ripples of uncertainty generated by Hartman in other jurisdictions did not unsettle this circuit’s law, because we have recognized that ‘retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations[.]’ Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C.Cir.2013). The absence of confusion in this jurisdiction, they conclude, left as governing law for the officers the clearly established background right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment. That argument turns the qualified immunity burden upside down. It is Dukore’s and Canavan’s burden to show that the particular right in question—narrowly described to fit the factual pattern confronting the officers . . . was clearly established. It was not the District’s burden to show that the right had been called into question. The generality of Dukore’s and Canavan’s constitutional principle and the widespread instability in the law on the precise question of probable-cause arrests prevent them from discharging that duty.)

Doe v. D.C., 796 F.3d 96, 104-05 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (“The parties do not dispute that in an exigency the state may, consistent with the Constitution, seize children without a court order or a pre-deprivation hearing. But the precise contours of when an exigency exists to justify removal without a warrant or pre-deprivation hearing are not settled, as the other Circuits’ varied formulations demonstrate. Given the uncertainty regarding when exactly an exigency exists and the lack of our own controlling precedent, the law in question was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the seizure. The individual defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity as the district court held.”)

Fox v. Gov't of D.C., 794 F.3d 25, 30-31 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (“Certainly, a plausible argument can be made that the officer’s conduct in the present case crossed that constitutional line. That, however, is not good enough to pierce the officer’s claim of qualified immunity. Under Saucier and Pearson and their progeny, the piercing requires a violation of a constitutional right clearly established at the time of the incident. Not only has Mrs. Fox not established that her right not to be seized in the circumstances of this case was ‘clearly established,’ she did not even argue this matter in her opening brief. As also noted above, where a litigant has forfeited an argument by not raising it in the opening brief, we need not reach it. In short, we need not decide the constitutional issue because Mrs. Fox has not properly brought it before us. Given the circumstances of Mrs. Fox’s alleged seizure, nothing in her brief shows that existing precedent has placed her Fourth Amendment right beyond debate. . . . Consequently, Mrs. Fox has not shown that Officer Boyd violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment right when he ordered her to get out of the car and put her hands on the hood during her husband’s traffic stop.”)

Mpoy v. Rhee, 758 F.3d 285, 293-95 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (“Mpoy argues . . . that the context of the statement suggests he was speaking as a citizen rather than an employee because he sent the email outside the ‘chain of command’—by sending it directly to Chancellor Rhee rather than to his principal’s immediate superiors. As noted above, we held in Winder that ‘a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.’ . . . But granting that whether speech is made inside or outside a chain of command may be a contextual factor in determining whether the employee made it to report interference with his job responsibilities, . . . there is little doubt that Mpoy was using the email to Rhee as an internal channel through which he could, in his capacity as a teacher, report such interference. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that, under the Winder test, Mpoy’s email constituted employee speech unprotected by the First Amendment. . . . Winder, however, is not the last word on this subject. In June of this year, the Supreme Court decided Lane v. Franks, in which it held that the First Amendment ‘protects a public employee who provided truthful sworn testimony, compelled by subpoena,’ at least where testifying was outside the scope of the employee’s ‘ordinary job responsibilities.’ . . . In so holding, the Court focused particularly on the nature of compelled testimony. . . . Moreover, because it was ‘undisputed that Lane’s ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings,’ . . . the Court, as in Garcetti, had no occasion to consider how the scope of such responsibilities should be determined in other circumstances. As a consequence, Lane does not directly or necessarily contradict Winder’s application of Garcetti. . . . Nonetheless, it is possible that Winder’s broad language, interpreting Garcetti as leaving an employee unprotected when he reports conduct that ‘interferes with his job responsibilities,’ . . . could be in tension with Lane’s holding that an employee’s speech is unprotected only when it is within the scope of the employee’s ‘ordinary job responsibilities,’ . . . or ‘ordinary job duties[.]’ In particular, the use of the adjective ‘ordinary’—which the court repeated nine times—could signal a narrowing of the realm of employee speech left unprotected by Garcetti. Neither Garcetti nor any other previous Supreme Court case had added ‘ordinary’ as a qualifier. . . . But we need not resolve that question today. As the Court noted in Lane—and went on to hold in that case—even if speech is protected by the First Amendment, a court must dismiss claims against a government official in his personal capacity if the official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In Lane, the Court found that precedent in the Eleventh Circuit, in which the case was brought, ‘did not preclude [the defendant] from reasonably holding that belief. And no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt on the controlling Eleventh Circuit precedent.’. . . As we held in Part II.B, under this circuit’s Winder test, Mpoy’s email constituted unprotected employee speech. (And no Supreme Court case at the time ‘cast doubt’ on that precedent.) A fortiori, the defendants could reasonably have believed that they could fire Mpoy on account of that email. . . .Indeed, even if we are wrong in concluding as a matter of law that the email ‘report[ed] conduct that interfere[d] with his job responsibilities,’. . . it surely would not have been unreasonable for the defendants to believe that it did, and hence that it was lawful to fire Mpoy under Winder. There is one further wrinkle to consider. The question under the qualified immunity doctrine is whether the official violated a right that was ‘clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct,’ and thus whether the defendants ‘could reasonably have believed, at the time [they] fired’ Mpoy that his speech was unprotected. . . . Winder was decided approximately a year after the defendants fired Mpoy, and hence could not itself have been the basis for reasonable belief on the part of the defendants. But Winder said that the test it was articulating was the consistent holding of ‘our cases applying Garcetti,’ . . . and all of the cases Winder cited were decided before Mpoy was fired. Accordingly, because this court read its preexisting law as yielding the test we announced in Winder, it could not have been unreasonable for the defendants to do so as well. Presswood and Rhee are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Amobi v. District of Columbia Dept. of Corrections, 755 F.3d 980, 993 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (“‘[M]alicious prosecution is actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to the extent that the defendant’s actions cause the plaintiff to be unreasonably “seized” without probable cause, in violation of the Fourth Amendment.’” Pitt, 491 F.3d at 511. Nevertheless, because the relevant conduct at issue in this case occurred before we issued our decision in Pitt v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494 (D.C. Cir. 2007)], clearly establishing malicious prosecution as a violation of constitutional rights, qualified immunity is appropriate here.”)

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (per curiam) (“The Supreme Court has directed this court to determine whether our decision in Moore v. Hartman, 644 F.3d 415 (D.C.Cir.2011) (“Moore V “), holding that ‘probable cause is not an element of the First Amendment right allegedly violated’ in a retaliatory prosecution suit, id. at 423, remains good law in light of Reichle v. Howards, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). There, in examining whether the law governing retaliatory arrest claims was clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in 2006, the Court expressly declined to decide whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265–66, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is ‘best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.’ Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Instead, the Court hinged its decision in Reichle on the fact that Hartman unsettled Tenth Circuit precedent that had conflated retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution claims. See id. at 2094–96. Because it was uncertain whether the Tenth Circuit's retaliatory arrest law remained clearly established, the defendants in Reichle were entitled to qualified immunity. The Court in Reichle was thus agnostic on the issue central to our holding in Moore V. Because retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations and because the precedent in this Circuit clearly established in 1988, when the challenged conduct by the Postal Inspectors took place, the contours of the First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory prosecution, nothing in Reichle changes our conclusion that the absence-of-probable-cause requirement is not 'an element of a First Amendment retaliation violation.' Moore V, 644 F.3d at 424. If the Postal Inspectors believe that the Court in Reichle meant to decide what it refused to decide in Hartman and bring to a halt this three decades old case involving evidence that, unlike in Reichle where probable cause was conceded, 'comes close to the proverbial smoking gun,' Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 884 (D.C.Cir.2004) (" Moore III "), they are free to once again petition for certiorari and ask the Supreme Court if it wishes to end this saga.")

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Kavanaugh, J., dissenting) ("In its recent decision in Reichle v. Howards, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), the Supreme Court indicated that it is not clear whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 252, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is 'best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.' Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Because the First Amendment law on this point is not clear, the defendants in this case cannot be said to have violated 'clearly established' First Amendment law. Therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and the suit may not proceed. I respectfully dissent.")

[Post-mortem on Moore: Moore v. Hartman, No. CV 92-2288, 2015 WL 1812852, at *90-91 (D.D.C. Apr. 17, 2015) ("After a 'herculean effort,' see Moore V, 644 F.3d at 427, and a 'procedural history portending another Jarndyce v. Jarndyce,' Hartman, 547 U.S. at 256, 126 S.Ct. 1695, the plaintiff received his days in court. While the plaintiff's claims may have been sufficient to survive the pleadings, the trial evidence revealed the plaintiff's claims to lack any persuasive force. . . .In sum, rather than produce a smoking gun, the plaintiff's trial evidence produced much hot air that was insufficient to sustain his claims. As a result, and for the reasons explained above, the Court again—as two other Judges on this Court previously held—denies the plaintiff's FTCA claim and enters judgment in favor of the United States. As a consequence of the plaintiff's failed FTCA claim, the plaintiff's request for a new trial on his Bivens claim is rendered moot. In any event, having received one jury trial on his claim for retaliatory inducement to prosecution, the plaintiff presents no grounds that would justify a second jury trial. Thus, even if the plaintiff's Bivens claim were not otherwise barred, the plaintiff would not be entitled to a new trial.

As the Supreme Court noted over sixty years ago, '[t]here must be an end to litigation someday....' Ackermann v. United States, 340 U.S. 193, 198, 71 S.Ct. 209, 95 L.Ed. 207 (1950). While this has no doubt been a long and arduous journey for the plaintiff, the journey was no shorter or any easier for the defendants. For the past twenty-five years, this litigation has cast a shadow over the careers, retirements, and estates, of the Postal Inspectors targeted by the plaintiff in this suit—only to have their long ago actions and motives vindicated at trial by two separate fact-finders. At trial, the plaintiff requested approximately one-quarter billion dollars in damages, an ‘astronomical’ award based on his inflated career aspirations and the profound sense of wrong the plaintiff believes himself to have suffered for what he discounts as merely ‘look[ing] like we made some bad decisions on people.’ . . . Having examined the totality of the evidence presented at trial, the plaintiff not only made ‘bad decisions,’ but those bad decisions helped fund a corrupt scheme that cost taxpayers millions of dollars. The indictment at issue in this case was not premised on retaliation or malice, but resulted from a diligent and comprehensive investigation following the corrupt payments back to their source. In this case, the evidence led directly to the plaintiff. For the reasons set forth above, the plaintiff’s claims are denied. An appropriate Order accompanies this Memorandum Opinion.”)]

Atherton v. District of Columbia Office of the Mayor, 706 F.3d 512, 515, 516 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (“We agree with the District Court in substance. Assuming arguendo that Mathews requires a judicial determination and formal process prior to dismissal from a grand jury, no reasonable official in Appellees’ position would have understood those requirements to be ‘clearly established’ as a constitutional matter. . . . Here, the procedural due process owed a grand juror seems as unclear today as it was over a decade ago when Atherton was dismissed from jury service on April 11, 2001. The parties have cited no cases directly on point and this Court has found just one of passing resemblance.”)

International Action Center v. United States, 365 F.3d 20, 25 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (“It does no good to allege that police officers violated the right to free speech, and then conclude that the right to free speech has been ‘clearly established’ in this country since 1791. Instead, courts must ‘define the right to a degree that would allow officials reasonably [to] anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability for damages’....” The district court ruled that the MPD supervisors were not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs’ inaction theory because plaintiffs had alleged that ‘it was ‘highly likely,’ given the circumstances at the Navy Memorial on January 20, 2001, that the MPD officers would violate citizens’ constitutional rights.’ . . . But applying a basis for liability at such a level of generality – a duty dependent upon ‘the circumstances of the case’ or arising ‘from the surrounding circumstances’ – is not faithful to the teaching of the Supreme Court in Anderson or this court in Butera.”).

Butera v. District of Columbia, 235 F.3d 637, 647, 652, 654 (D.C. Cir. 2001) (“Under the first stage of the Wilson inquiry—whether the plaintiff has asserted the relevant constitutional rights at the appropriate level of specificity—we conclude, consistent with the Supreme Court’s instructions in Anderson and Wilson, that the district court erred by defining the constitutional rights as Eric Butera’s right to life, bodily integrity, personal security, and personal privacy, and as Terry Butera’s ‘liberty interest’ in the companionship of her son. Although courts have acknowledged the existence of these general rights in certain circumstances, . . . they are overly broad where a qualified immunity defense is asserted. Applying the standards of Wilson and Anderson, we conclude that the relevant inquiries are (1) whether Eric Butera has a constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from danger that it created or enhanced that resulted in harm by third parties, and (2) whether Terry Butera has a liberty interest in the society and companionship of her independent adult child. This narrower definition of the rights allows a reasonable police officer to anticipate whether his actions amount to a constitutional violation. . . . Upon examining relevant case law on the ‘State endangerment’ exception to DeShaney, we conclude that, in December 1997, Eric Butera’s constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from third-party violence was not clearly established within the meaning of Anderson. . . . Terry Butera’s claim of a constitutional right to the companionship of her 31-year-old son has a more difficult hurdle to overcome: It fails the first prong of the Wilson test. The Supreme Court has not spoken to the precise issue, and the precedent in this and nearly all of the other circuits suggests that no such right exists.”).

Harris v. District of Columbia, 932 F.2d 10 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Rejecting argument that Estelle v. Gamble, Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., and Youngberg v. Romeo, created clearly established right to medical care for someone taken into police custody for purpose of obtaining medical care, but not formally committed, either by conviction, involuntary commitment, or arrest, to the charge of the District).

Fischer v. District of Columbia, No. 24-CV-00044 (CRC), 2025 WL 894445, at *10-11 (D.D.C. Mar. 24, 2025) (“Fischer has failed to plausibly allege First Amendment retaliation or abridgement claims. But, even if the complaint could be read to assert such claims, Fischer has not shown that the officers’ conduct violated clearly established law. Because the events of January 6th were ‘unprecedented,’ . . . no legal principle ‘clearly prohibit[ed]’ the MPD officers’ ‘conduct in the particular circumstances before’ them. . . . Without a prior case placing the MPD officers’ conduct ‘beyond debate,’ they are entitled to qualified immunity on Fischer’s First Amendment claims against them, which the Court will accordingly dismiss. . . . Fischer alleges a Fourth Amendment violation because the officers’ ‘[i]ndiscriminate[] shooting’ of ‘munitions into a crowd’ was an unreasonable use of force. . . . A Fourth Amendment seizure ‘requires the use of force with intent to restrain.’ . . . Here, however, Fischer is explicit that the MPD officers deployed force ‘with no intent to arrest.’ . . . Instead, he contends, ‘the intent of the police was certainly to disburse [sic] the crowd.’ This concession is fatal to Fischer’s Fourth Amendment claim: The MPD officers’ use of force for this ‘other purpose’ of dispersing the crowd does not qualify as a seizure. Because Fischer has not alleged a Fourth Amendment seizure, his claim cannot proceed. Again, however, even if the complaint could be construed to state such a claim, given the ‘unprecedented’ circumstances surrounding the violent encroachment of the U.S. Capitol, Fischer has not demonstrated that ‘every “reasonable official”’ would have understood the MPD officers’ conduct to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Accordingly, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

Goodwin v. District of Columbia, No. CV 21-806 (BAH), 2025 WL 637467, at *11-12 (D.D.C. Feb. 27, 2025) (“Based on this record, a reasonable jury could find that defendant Crisman deployed pepper spray against protesters who were in violation of the curfew but otherwise posed no apparent immediate danger to law enforcement officers or other individuals, and who were not actively resisting arrest or fleeing, and that his actions could not have been motivated by a reasonable-but-mistaken belief that the protesters entering Mr. Dubey’s house were doing so illegally. If a reasonable jury resolved the disputes of fact in plaintiffs’ favor in this manner, that same reasonable jury could then conclude that none of the Graham factors. . . supported defendant Crisman’s use of force: that plaintiffs had committed only a non-violent misdemeanor, posed no immediate threat to safety, and were not actively resisting or fleeing arrest, making the deployment of pepper spray against them an unconstitutional use of excessive force. The next question is whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although the D.C. Circuit has never directly ruled on the matter, other courts of appeal have ‘clearly established that force is least justified against nonviolent misdemeanants who do not flee or actively resist arrest and pose little or no threat to the security of the officers or the public.’ [collecting cases] Although the application of qualified immunity is a close question in this circumstance, the prevalence of persuasive caselaw from other federal circuit courts clearly holding that using force such as pepper spray on non-violent, non-resisting, and non-fleeing misdemeanants is unreasonable is sufficient to demonstrate that the constitutional right at issue in this claim was clearly established at the time the alleged violation occurred. Defendants resist this conclusion, reframing the qualified immunity question as whether the law was ‘clearly established that pepper spray could not be used to prevent unrestrained arrestees from illegally entering a private residence.’. . This reframing of the issue is premised on the reasonableness of Crisman’s belief that the people entering Mr. Dubey’s home were doing so illegally, . . .but this premise reflects a material dispute. Based on the specific circumstances here, a jury could find that Crisman could not have reasonably believed that the people entering the house were doing so illegally, since other officers on the scene promptly recognized and alerted other officers that the homeowner was permitting entrance into his house. Given this material disputed fact, Crisman is not entitled to summary judgment on the excessive force claim raised by plaintiffs Goodwin, Lane, and Pearlmutter. To be clear, the denial of qualified immunity to Crisman does not mean that plaintiffs’ version of the facts is accepted nor that Crisman’s version is rejected. Rather, when confronted with disputed facts bearing on whether qualified immunity is triggered, summary judgment must be denied, since ‘it is the jury’s role, not [the Court’s], to decide whose version of facts is correct.’”)

Ferris v. District of Columbia, No. 1:23-CV-481-RCL, 2023 WL 8697854, at *11-12 (D.D.C. Dec. 15, 2023) (“[E]ven if Plaintiffs have adequately alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment, their claims would still be dismissed for failure to overcome the Individual Defendants’ qualified immunity. As discussed above, in Black Lives Matter D.C., another court in this district considered a Fourth Amendment claim for unreasonable seizures arising out of MPD’s response to police-related protests in the District in the summer of 2020. . . The court held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because ‘the plaintiffs have not pointed to a case clearly establishing that attempting to move members of a crowd (rather than keep them in a location) can constitute a seizure.’. . . see also Dundon, 85 F.4th at 1257 (holding that “it was not clearly established as of November 2016 that use of force to disperse the crowd was a seizure”). That conclusion is equally true in this case. According to Plaintiffs, it is clearly established that ‘the use of force that furthers no governmental interest is unconstitutional’ and that ‘use of force against non-violent and non-resisting persons is unconstitutional.’. . . However, such general pronouncements do not suffice when officers are accused of violating the Fourth Amendment in particular. . . Plaintiffs also argue that cases have held ‘that use of less lethal projectile weapons to move or disperse crowds constitutes a seizure regardless of whether individuals are ultimately arrested.’. . . But the cases cited by Plaintiffs do not suffice to clearly establish that officers violate a person’s Fourth Amendment rights by using less lethal munitions to disperse a crowd (or inflict pain) rather than to effect arrests. The D.C. Circuit has explained that to ‘assess the officers’ claim of qualified immunity, “we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court” and, if neither provides an answer, “to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view.”’. . . Disagreement among lower court judges about the underlying right may be a reason to find qualified immunity. . . But plaintiffs cannot cite any binding precedents from the Supreme Court or D.C. Circuit. Nor have they shown a consensus view among the lower courts. What they offer instead is a smattering of out-of-circuit cases, many of which are irrelevant. Some of the cases were decided after some or all the events in question . . . and therefore do not speak to whether the law was clearly established ‘at the time of the challenged conduct.’. . . Some are inapposite because they also involved an allegation that defendant officers intended to apprehend or confine the plaintiffs. . . Others are distinguishable because they involved police herding protestors to a particular area, rather than dispersing them. . . That leaves just three cases. See Bennett, 410 F.3d at 834 (“Fourth Amendment jurisprudence suggests a person is seized ... when a reasonable person would not feel free to remain somewhere, by virtue of some official action.”); Nelson, 685 F.3d at 873, 878 (finding a seizure when police officer shot plaintiff in the eye with a pepperball projectile as part of an effort to disperse a crowd); Otero v. Wood, 316 F.Supp.2d 612, 626 (S.D. Ohio 2004) (finding excessive force when police fired a projective weapon into an unruly crowd and struck plaintiff). However, other courts have seen things differently, holding that police officers’ exclusion or expulsion of a person from an area, even through the use of force, is not a Fourth Amendment seizure. [collecting cases] In light of the conflicted, out-of-circuit authority, the Court finds that in the summer of 2020 it was not clearly established that police officers’ expulsion of a person from an area, even through the use of force, was a Fourth Amendment seizure. Finally, since the Plaintiffs’ unreasonable seizure claims fail, their excessive force claims—which they have based on the Fourth Amendment rather than due process—fail as well. . . Therefore, the Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claims against the Individual Defendants must be dismissed.”)

Stevenson v. District of Columbia, No. CV 19-972 (RBW), 2022 WL 16713034, at *9 (D.D.C. Nov. 4, 2022) (“Although, generally speaking, the Court agrees that a ‘reasonable officer [sh]ould have understood that, at the time [the plaintiff] was taken into custody, repeatedly fondling an individual’s genitals incident to their arrest would constitute a violation of that person[‘s ... [Fourth Amendment] rights[,]’ Dickey, 174 F. Supp. 3d at 371, it is not accurate to say that this is the ‘true test for qualified immunity[.]’ . . . Rather, the right at issue must be clearly established and, ‘in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or [] Circuit decision on point[.]’ . . . The Court has identified no Supreme Court or Circuit precedent establishing that sexual assault committed by a police officer violates the Fourth Amendment. Nor has the Court determined that ‘the clearly established weight of authority from other courts [supports the conclusion that] the law [is] as the plaintiff maintains.’ . . . Therefore, ‘existing precedent [has not] placed th[is] ... constitutional question beyond debate[.]’ . . . and the Court must therefore conclude that, although a reasonable jury could conclude that a Fourth Amendment violation occurred in this case, . . . the Unknown MPD Employees are entitled to qualified immunity regarding that violation and cannot be held liable.”)

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 47 (D.D.C. 2021) (“Having found a plausible allegation of a constitutional violation, the Court must consider whether the right alleged to be violated was clearly established at the time. No doubt, the general right to be free from retaliation for protected speech is clearly established. . . . But the Supreme Court has held that such a formulation draws the question at too high a level of generality. . . . The appropriately tailored question is whether a peaceful protestor has the right to be free from government violence in retaliation for the message of their protest. The Court finds that every reasonable officer would have been aware of such a right on June 1, 2020. . . . In Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831 (8th Cir. 2021), the Eighth Circuit decided a case highly analogous to this one and held that a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ clearly established that deploying a tear-gas canister without warning at peaceful reporters at a police brutality protest violated the right to be free from First Amendment retaliation. . . . So too here. Even if the case law were insufficient to provide notice, though, the right to be free from government violence for the peaceful exercise of protected speech is so fundamental to our system of ordered liberty that it is ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Taking the facts as alleged, this is the ‘rare obvious case where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even [if] existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’ . . . As noted above, the parties will have the opportunity to attempt to prove and rebut their claims at the discovery stage. And record evidence gathered during discovery will shed light on whether the defendants had a legitimate, non-retaliatory justification for their actions on June 1, 2020. At this early stage, taking the alleged facts as true, the plaintiffs have alleged enough to overcome qualified immunity and survive the motions to dismiss.”)

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 48-49 (D.D.C. 2021) (“The plaintiffs also bring Fourth Amendment claims against the D.C. and Arlington defendants for unreasonable seizures conducted with excessive force. The plaintiffs have not, however, pointed to a violation of any clearly established Fourth Amendment right that can overcome the defendants’ entitlement to qualified immunity. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers attacked and improperly dispersed the protesters—they did not restrain them or attempt to seize them in place. . . . Indeed, quite the opposite was true—the officers attempted to cause the protestors and fleeing crowd to leave their location, rather than cause them to remain there. . . . And the plaintiffs allege that they all did in fact leave Lafayette Square. . . . These alleged facts lie in stark contrast to the Supreme Court’s recent holding that ‘the application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued.’ Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 1003 (2021) (emphasis added). One could make the argument that, although the plaintiffs were not physically restrained, their freedom of movement was restrained because the defendants sought to route them in certain directions. But even assuming that the plaintiffs were seized by being forced to leave Lafayette Square, the plaintiffs have not pointed to a case clearly establishing that attempting to move members of a crowd (rather than keep them in a location) can constitute a seizure. And where assessing qualified immunity in the context of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has repeatedly ‘stressed the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. In an effort to ground their claim in relevant precedent, the plaintiffs point out that ‘Supreme Court and Circuit precedent hold[s] that even a momentary limitation of a person’s freedom of movement is a seizure if it results from means intentionally applied.’. But this frames the issue at far too high a level of generality, which the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed against. . . The relevant question is not whether a momentary use of force can constitute a seizure—of course, it can—but whether the use of tear gas to move members of a crowd can constitute a seizure. Because the plaintiffs have pointed to no case clearly establishing an answer to that question, the defendant officials are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Goolsby v. D.C., 317 F.Supp.3d 582, ___, ___ (D.D.C. 2018) (“Both sets of individual defendants have argued that their actions are protected by qualified immunity. As to the Officers, the Court agrees in full and will dismiss the section 1983 claims against them. But as to the Dispatchers, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claims and that Goolsby has pled an alternative Fifth Amendment theory. . . . In sum, case law suggests that, at the very least, a reasonable officer could have believed that he could permissibly temporarily detain Goolsby since he matched the suspect from a 911 call seeming to report criminal activity and fled when ordered to stop by the police. . . . Finally, a reasonable officer, having observed Goolsby flee, could have believed that he could place Goolsby in handcuffs during the detention without turning the Terry stop into a full-blown arrest requiring probable cause. . . . As with the false arrest claims, Goolsby points to no specific cases with similar facts to rebut the Officers’ assertion of qualified immunity. Rather, his primary argument is that ‘a reasonable officer would have known that applying any force would be excessive because there was not even a reasonable suspicion to justify an investigatory stop.’. . . But as noted, Goolsby has pled that the Officers reasonably believed they were responding to an attempted robbery. As a result, they could have reasonably believed they could temporarily detain Goolsby. And even if that conclusion were erroneous, the simple fact that a detention was impermissible does not automatically make the use of force to effectuate that detention excessive. . . . As to the level of force itself, the Court takes as true the facts as pled by Goolsby. According to his complaint, the officers ‘violently slamm[ed] [him] to the ground and twist[ed] [his] arm to a gut-wrenching degree while [he] screamed in pain.’. . . While this issue presents a somewhat closer question than in the false arrest claims, the Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate here, too. For one, Goolsby nowhere points to a case with similar facts holding the officers used excessive force. This disregards the Supreme Court’s counsel that in the context of excessive force claims, ‘police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’ . . . And this omission is particularly problematic since the level of force, as pled, does not rise to the level that the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has clearly established as a constitutional violation, namely the use of force after an individual has already been placed in handcuffs or otherwise subdued. . . . Nor does Goolsby point to cases from other courts of appeals that would suggest any injury here clearly rendered the use of force excessive. Given this absence of cases with similar facts indicating force similar to that used here resulting in ‘severe injuries’ was excessive, any constitutional violation was not clearly established. To conclude, the Officers’ conduct alleged here falls within a gray area between clearly-sanctioned uses of force from cases such as Wasserman, Oberwetter, and Scott and clearly-excessive uses of force from cases such as Johnson. As such, and given the similarity of these facts to those in Wasserman and Scott, a reasonable officer could have concluded the use of force alleged here was reasonable. The Court therefore must accord the Officers qualified immunity for their alleged conduct. . . . Since the Dispatchers are not alleged to have authorized the Officers’ conduct or approved of it—indeed, they were not physically present during any of the events that occurred and have no supervisory or other authority over the Officers—the argument is simply that the Dispatchers’ affirmative act of providing false or misleading information to the Officers set in effect a chain of events leading to Goolsby being unlawfully arrested and subjected to excessive force. . . . The Dispatchers respond that they should be granted summary judgment because their actions are protected by qualified immunity. . . . In their view, no cases put them on notice that ‘in providing incorrect information to police officers [they] could be held liable for the constitutional torts of the officers.’ . . . The Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate as to Goolsby’s excessive force claims against the Dispatchers, but that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment as to his false arrest claims. . . . Beginning with the false arrest claims, the Court will again start with the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether any violation by the Dispatchers was clearly established. Goolsby once more cites no relevant cases, here ones involving dispatchers held liable for false arrest under section 1983. The only relevant court of appeals decisions the Court is aware of—all of which reviewed summary judgment grants to dispatchers—held the dispatcher not liable because he acted negligently or within the scope of his discretion. . . . That said, though neither side points to it, there is a common law tradition—albeit one that does not specifically involve dispatchers—that suggests a scenario under which a violation might be clearly established. The Supreme Court has recognized that when section 1983 was passed, ‘the generally accepted rule was that one who procured the issuance of an arrest warrant by submitting a complaint could be held liable if the complaint was made maliciously and without probable cause.’ . . . This is in line with the general tort law principle that one who instigates a false arrest, such as by directing a police officer to arrest someone without any suspicion of wrongdoing, is also liable for false arrest or imprisonment. . . . Combined, these rules would seem to put any reasonable dispatcher on notice that certain kinds of false reports might violate the Fourth Amendment, namely maliciously misleading police officers without suspicion of wrongdoing in a manner that leads to another’s detention. . . . In light of this legal background, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . The most natural explanation for the erroneous information passed along is simply negligence or confusion on the part of the dispatcher. But it could also be the case that the dispatcher intentionally misdirected the patrol officers for some nefarious purpose. . . . Since the dispatcher's mental state is relevant to whether a section 1983 claim has been stated or a clearly established violation occurred, the current factual record yields a genuine issue of material fact that precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . Goolsby also raises excessive force claims against the Dispatchers. As with the false arrest claim, Goolsby cites no case law that has ever found a dispatcher liable for a police officer's use of force. Nor is the Court aware of any. While the cases discussed above might support possible false arrest claims against the Dispatchers, they provide no indication that the Dispatchers might be liable for excessive force claims. In the absence of any case law suggesting that a dispatcher can be held liable for a police officer's use of excessive force, the Court concludes that any constitutional violation here is not clearly established. Dismissal of the excessive force claims against the Dispatchers is thus appropriate on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Young v. D.C., 107 F.Supp.3d 69, 80 (D.D.C. 2015) ("In this case, the plaintiff has not alleged that any requests from medical personnel to remove any restraints were made, let alone ignored by the police, or that the restraints applied to the plaintiff hindered his medical treatment or exacerbated any pain he suffered. Without deciding whether the use of handcuffs and shackles on a pretrial detainee, who has been shot by the police and is being treated at the hospital, amounts to a due process violation on these bare allegations, the Court concludes that the absence of a clear legal consensus on the constitutionality of such restraints in these circumstances leads inexorably to the conclusion that defendant Powell is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim set out in Count II.")

Kenley v. D.C., 83 F.Supp.3d 20, 39 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Plaintiff . . . has not cited any cases in which the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has addressed police officers' constitutional duty under the Due Process Clause to disclose exculpatory information to the prosecution long before trial. Looking to other circuits, in fact, it appears that there is disagreement about whether the due-process rights articulated in Brady are implicated at all where plaintiffs were not convicted in their criminal cases – e.g., if they were acquitted at trial or if the charges were dismissed prior to trial. [citing cases and Michael Avery, Paying for Silence: The Liability of Police Officers Under Section 1983 for Suppressing Exculpatory Evidence, 13 Temp. Pol. & Civ. Rts. L.Rev. 1, 2 (2003)] The Court is, consequently, not persuaded that there was a clearly established due-process right under which police officers who were aware of potentially exculpatory information had to disclose it to the prosecution when the case was first papered or within a short time after. The officers, therefore, are immune from any Fifth Amendment claim based on their nondisclosure.")

Patterson v. United States, 999 F.Supp.2d 300, (D.D.C. 2013) ("Given the clearly established law that governs free speech and permissible arrests for disorderly conduct, and also taking the facts alleged in Patterson's complaint as true and drawing all inferences in Patterson's favor, . . . no reasonable officer could conclude that Patterson's conduct was likely to produce violence or otherwise cause a breach of the peace, as required to justify either punishing his speech under the First Amendment or arresting him for disorderly conduct. . . There is a significant body of jurisprudence that addresses the confluence of these First and Fourth Amendment violations in the context of arrests for disorderly conduct under the D.C. Code, and these cases outline the parameters of permissible police action in circumstances that are similar to those at issue here. . . . In short, because no reasonable officer could conclude that there was probable cause to believe that Patterson was committing disorderly conduct on the facts as alleged in the complaint, the complaint ably supports the claim that Patterson was arrested in retaliation for his protected speech and that the individual officers therefore violated Patterson's clearly established First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Consequently, the individual defendants have not satisfied Saucier's qualified immunity test. . . . Undaunted, the individual defendants strenuously dispute the 'clearly established' nature of Mr. Patterson's alleged First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory arrest under the circumstances presented in the complaint. . . . But this argument plainly puts the cart before the horse because the constitutional right that Defendants deem unclear and unestablished is the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. . . . Plaintiffs make no such allegation here, and Defendants do not address whether the right to be free of retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established. Moreover, as explained above, it is clear from the D.C. Circuit's Dellums opinion that the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established in this jurisdiction. In other words, in the D.C. Circuit, a police officer is unquestionably on notice that arresting a speaker solely based on the content of his speech and without probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime is a violation of the First Amendment.")

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43, 57-59 (D.D.C. 2013) ("In the end, the ultimate question for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable officer would have known that the searches of plaintiff were unreasonable. Based on the alleged facts, which must at this stage be accepted as true, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would have known that a cross-gender search of a female detainee by male USMS employees that included intimate physical contact, exposure of private body parts, and verbal harassment, all in front of male detainees and male USMS employees in the absence of an emergency, was unreasonable. . . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that plaintiff has alleged a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment rights and, therefore, that the USMS defendants are not entitled to have those claims dismissed on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because plaintiff's due process right not to be held in the alleged conditions of confinement is not clearly established. Specifically, defendants rely on the absence of any cases specifically holding that a female transgender detainee has the right not to be held with male detainees or otherwise treated as if she were male. . . . Defendants' arguments again miss the significance of the fact that plaintiff is legally a female and that defendants are alleged to have known that. Thus, the absence of transgender cases is not itself dispositive. . . . [A]s with the Fourth Amendment claim, plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights include the same rights as any other female detainee. Accordingly, the cases involving the sexual harassment of female prisoners are not, as defendants suggest, 'irrelevant.' And those cases establish that a female detainee has the right not to be sexually harassed, verbally or physically, by other detainees or guards. . . . Considering the allegations in the complaint, applicable MPD policies, and existing caselaw, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would know that treating a female detainee as plaintiff was treated (i.e. holding her with male detainees and otherwise treating her as if she were male) exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . and, therefore, would know that those actions violated her constitutional rights.”)

Brown v. Short, 729 F.Supp.2d 125, 141 (D.D.C. 2010) (“[A]t the time of the search at issue, the law was clearly established that strip searches of arrestees charged with minor offenses would, absent individualized suspicion, be held unreasonable under Bell even where the arrestee was to be intermingled with the general prison population and especially where the official conducting the search did not take reasonable efforts to protect the privacy of the party being searched. Thus, it should have been “clear to a reasonable [official]” that a partial strip search of Ms. Brown, a detainee charged only with civil contempt, without individualized suspicion, and without regard to her privacy, would be considered unreasonable under Bell.”).

In re Iraq and Afghanistan Detainees Litigation, 479 F.Supp.2d 85, 108 -109 (D.D.C.,2007) (“Determining whether the defendants’ acts violated clearly established constitutional rights need not require extended explication in this case because, as discussed at some length above, Supreme Court precedent at the time the plaintiffs were injured established that the Fifth Amendment did not apply to nonresident aliens outside the sovereign territory of the United States. . . . The plaintiffs seek to avoid this result by recasting the issue as whether it was clearly established that torture was unlawful, not whether it was clearly established that the constitutional right existed. . . . But the cases make clear that what must be ‘clearly established’ is the constitutional right. . . . At the time the defendants committed the alleged violations, no constitutional right could be invoked by the plaintiffs; as a result, no reasonable official could have understood that what he was doing violated the Fifth Amendment as it applied to them, regardless of whether the defendants’ conduct otherwise was illegal under some other source of law. Similarly, it also was not clearly established that the Eighth Amendment applied to nonresident aliens who were detained by the military but never convicted of a crime.”).

Freeman v. Fallin, 310 F.Supp.2d 11, 15, 16 (D.D.C. 2004) (“In their motion, the defendants contend that ‘[i]t was not clearly established during 1999-2000[] that manipulation of random drug testing procedures to gather evidence of alleged drug use in criminal proceedings was a Fourth Amendment violation.’ . . . Specifically, the defendants argue that there is no case law addressing whether manipulation of random drug testing procedures violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . The court concludes that there is no intervening change of law, new evidence, or need to correct a clear error or prevent manifest injustice that would warrant granting the defendants’ motion. . . . At the time of the defendants’ alleged actions in 1999-2000, there was no question that agencies could subject federal employees engaged in certain safety-sensitive tasks to suspicionless drug testing under the ‘special needs’ doctrine. . . . At the same time, the Supreme Court had made clear through a string of decisions issued in 1989, 1995, and 1997 that special-needs testing could not be undertaken for purposes of criminal prosecution. . . . The defendants argue, however, that this case law does not define the constitutional right at the ‘appropriate level of specificity.’ . . . Accepting the plaintiffs’ allegations as true, the court concludes that here, the state of the law certainly would have given the defendants fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional. . . . In its string of decisions, the Court—whose binding precedent clearly ‘establishes’ the law—made clear that the special-needs doctrine permits suspicionless drug testing of certain employees by agencies as long as the testing is performed for reasons unrelated to law enforcement.”).

Polk v. District of Columbia, 121 F. Supp.2d 56, 69, 71 (D.D.C. 2000) (“Although no reported case has addressed the precise conduct at issue here, Lanier indicates that the law nonetheless may be ‘clearly established’ if general statements of Fourth Amendment law gave fair and clear warning to Det. Valdes that he could not delegate his authority to detain a suspect. . . . In the instant case, there can be little doubt that the Constitution forbids police officers to share their authority to conduct searches and seizures with unauthorized civilians. . . . The court determines that it would not be unfair to hold Det. Valdes liable for allegedly deceiving the plaintiffs into believing his companion was an officer, and having perpetuated this fraud, allowing the civilian to detain one of the plaintiffs.”).

United States v. Edelin, 76 F. Supp.2d 1, 4 (D.D.C. 1999) (“[E]ven if a court was to find ‘perp walks’ unconstitutional, the defendant would still have to show the law to have been clearly established at the time of his booking in order to overcome the government officials’ qualified immunity. In Wilson, although the Supreme Court agreed with the Ayeni court that the practice of ‘media ride-alongs’ was unconstitutional, it abrogated the Ayeni court’s holding that the government was liable for its actions. . . . The Supreme Court found that the government officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the law regarding ‘media ride-alongs’ was not clearly established prior to the Supreme Court ruling. . . . Given that the Supreme Court found the law pertaining to ‘media ride-alongs’ to be uncertain at the time of the defendant’s booking in January of 1999, it stands to reason that the law regarding ‘perp walks’, as an extension of that law, was also not clearly established. Therefore, the government officials would most likely be entitled to qualified immunity for their actions with regard to the defendant.”).

FIRST CIRCUIT

Pike v. Budd, No. 23-1593, 2025 WL 942827, at *12–13 (1st Cir. Mar. 28, 2025) (“Budd argues that there is no controlling case law from the Supreme Court nor within our circuit that clearly establishes that an official in Budd’s position who engages in his particular conduct in a shared work setting violates the Equal Protection Clause. Budd also asserts that there is no consensus of persuasive out-of-circuit authority that clearly establishes the same. We disagree. In our circuit, it is clearly established that a state actor violates the Equal Protection Clause upon creating a hostile work environment. Clearly established law instructs that sexual discrimination violates the Equal Protection Clause, . . . that discriminatory treatment standards under Title VII are equally applicable to an equal protection claim, . . . that on-the-job sexual harassment ‘is actionable under [Section] 1983 as a violation of the equal protection clause,’ . . . that the ‘accumulated effect’ of repeated verbal harassment in the workplace may reasonably constitute sexual harassment, . . . and that if a ‘state official directly engage[s] in sexual harassment or sexual discrimination, he would, of course, be subject to section 1983 liability[.]’ . . . Lipsett unambiguously states that an official who sexually harasses an employee within the workplace is on notice that they may be sued under § 1983. . . . Budd relatedly argues that Lipsett, alongside Pontarelli, only provides notice that employers may be liable, pointing to the lack of a traditional employer-employee relationship between him and Pike. But as we have explained, due to the unique shared work setting, Pike’s role as a TRC counselor, and Budd’s role as the presiding judge over TRC, the context of Pike and Budd’s working relationship is akin to an employee-employer relationship such that clearly established principles would put Budd on notice that his sexually harassing conduct would amount to a constitutional violation of equal protection rights. . . . [A]t bottom, we think it clearly established that § 1983 liability requires a state actor to hold some power over the plaintiff whose rights he violates. And the fact that no case involves a judge sexually harassing a subordinate who reports to a separate, private employer does not excuse a reasonable official in Budd’s place from realizing that his conduct would not pass muster under the Constitution. . . . Here, Budd clearly acted as Judge Budd, who had significant power over Pike as a counselor working in his courtroom, when he committed the alleged conduct. . . . Moreover, we are convinced by the consensus of binding and persuasive authority referenced above that Budd was on notice that his position of authority over Pike could further contribute to the coerciveness of his actions, . . . even when the alleged hostile conduct is limited in number[.] . . . In summary, being that Budd was a state judge who repeatedly made unwelcome and intimidating sexual advances towards Pike, he would have reasonably known that such conduct falls within the realm of our clearly established principles. Accordingly, Budd would be hard pressed to assert that he was unaware that his unwelcome sexual advances towards Pike would violate her equal protection right to be free from a hostile work environment. . . . Qualified immunity is a ‘good faith’ immunity involving the presumptive knowledge and respect for ‘basic, unquestioned constitutional rights.’ . . . If intentional discrimination has occurred, then ‘good faith’ immunity is logically excluded. . . . Therefore, at the time Budd allegedly made his unwelcome sexual advances to Pike, a reasonable official in his position would have known that such conduct would violate the equal protection right to be free from a hostile work environment. . . . In summary, it is clear that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits state actors from employing their authority to discriminate on the basis of sex. . . . It is equally clear that creating a hostile environment in the workplace on the basis of sex is one form of sex discrimination. . . . [E]ven though we do not have a prior case on all fours with this one, cases that clearly establish each of the above elements suffice.”)

Wadsworth v. Nguyen, 129 F.4th 38, 59-61 & n.12 (1st Cir. 2025) (“On review, we agree with Wadsworth that at the time in question her equal protection right to be free from non-physical harassment was clearly established -- under both out-of-circuit case law and First Circuit case law. Given our analysis of the claim as to what a reasonable jury could find on this record, it is clear that, at this juncture, qualified immunity does not protect Principal Cavanaugh. To begin, as discussed earlier in this decision, in Lipsett, this court made clear that sexual harassment in the form of ‘pointed threats,’ ‘sexual advances,’ and ‘sexually charged nicknames,’ along with other forms of sex-based comments, is enough to establish a prima facie case of sexual harassment in an educational context. . . . Lipsett, standing alone, provides clear guidance that a teacher’s conduct that includes threats, sexualized comments, and sexually charged nicknames can rise to the level of sexual harassment.¹² [fn. 12: We note that Wadsworth has not cited Lipsett to support her position. Instead, she relies on out-of-circuit case law. This is of no matter, however, as, ‘[i]n conducting a qualified immunity analysis, a court should “use its full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.”’ . . . Furthermore, the out-of-circuit cases on their own are sufficient to support our conclusion.] Further, Wadsworth has pointed our attention to four other circuits that have held that conduct similar to what is alleged here -- perpetrated by an educator against a student -- violates the student’s equal protection rights. . . . Although these cases do not present factual scenarios identical to the one at hand, identity is not required. As we have explained, ‘[i]n arguing for clearly established law, a plaintiff is not required to identify cases that address the particular factual scenario that characterizes [their] case.’ . . . In fact, the cases described do not present a general statement of law but rather describe situations quite similar to what Wadsworth experienced here. Moreover, the students in those cases were arguably far less vulnerable than Wadsworth was and the power differential between the victims and their perpetrators was, in comparison, arguably much smaller than the student-principal dynamic at play here. Each of the cases discussed above, with the exception of Hutchison, involved university students, and, given that students in higher education are generally older and less vulnerable than high school students, it is particularly apparent that the legal principles established in these cases apply equally, if not with more force, to teachers and administrators in the high school setting. Given the facts and holdings in these cases and the record in the present case, a reasonable jury could conclude that Principal Cavanaugh sexually harassed Wadsworth in violation of her equal protection rights, and we have no doubt that, assuming Cavanaugh did so, a reasonable high school teacher or administrator would understand that the described conduct would violate the student’s constitutional rights.”)

Heredia v. Roscoe, 125 F.4th 34, 47-48 (1st Cir. 2025) (“Our precedent has clearly established that the conduct here was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. In Jennings, . . . after finding that the constitutional violation there was obvious, this court noted other cases concluding that ‘the law was clearly established against the use of increased force on a suspect no longer offering resistance because “the unlawfulness of the conduct is readily apparent even without clarifying case[]law.”’ . . . This conclusion was reiterated in Raiche, where this court held that ‘[a] reasonable officer with training on the Use of Force Continuum would not have needed prior case law on point to recognize that it is unconstitutional to tackle a person who has already stopped in response to the officer’s command to stop and who presents no indications of dangerousness.’ . . . Thus, under Jennings and Raiche, we find that it was clearly established that it is unconstitutional for an officer to use a takedown maneuver to take an arrestee to the ground, hitting the arrestee’s head on the pavement, after the arrestee had already shown his hands and submitted to arrest. . . . Every reasonable officer would understand that this conduct was unlawful based on our prior case law. .

. This case has significant overlap with those cases where this court has previously found Fourth Amendment violations and where officers were not protected by qualified immunity. A jury could find: that Heredia was not given any warning before he was initially grabbed by an officer, . . . that prior to Roscoe grabbing him, Heredia did not present an immediate threat to officers, . . . that after initially resisting, Heredia ultimately submitted to arrest and Roscoe increased the use of force, . . . and that Roscoe used significant force in throwing Heredia on his head onto the pavement[.] . . Under these circumstances, in view of our prior case law, every reasonable officer would have known this conduct violated Heredia’s constitutional rights.”)

Berge v. School Committee of Gloucester, 107 F.4th 33, 42-44 (1st Cir. 2024) (“Addressing step one of the qualified-immunity analysis, we — after taking Berge’s allegations as true (though knowing that discovery or trial evidence may cast the case in a different light) — have a hard time picturing a more textbook First Amendment violation. Berge very publicly recorded public officials performing public duties in the publicly accessible part of a public building — all to get information about the district’s COVID-19 policies, in a form he could then share, with the goal (to quote again from the complaint) of ‘expos[ing] and comment[ing] on the unreasonableness’ of those ‘polic[ies].’ . . If the First Amendment means anything in a situation like this, it is that public officials cannot — as they did here — threaten a person with legal action under an obviously inapt statute simply because he published speech they did not like. . . . [A]s Berge’s appellate papers point out, ‘this is a right to publish case’ — without a distinct ‘claim over [a] right to record.’ And as Berge’s counsel indicated at oral argument, we need not — given the case’s posture — decide whether Berge had a First Amendment right to record. So even if Berge had no First Amendment right to record (and we express no opinion either way), that would not mean — given the complaint’s facts — that the individual defendants could then baselessly burden his First Amendment right to publish. . . . From this we hold that Berge’s speech involved a matter of public concern. Shifting then from qualified immunity’s step one (constitutional rights violation) to step two (clearly established law), we also think it follows naturally from the above cases that Berge has plausibly pled a violation of a clearly established right to publish on a topic of public interest when the violators acted (as a reminder, but using a different case quote, a right is ‘clearly established’ when it is no longer among the ‘hazy’ area of constitutional issues that might be ‘reasonably misapprehend[ed].’ . . And by ‘acted’ we mean (as the complaint alleges) threatening Berge with an obviously groundless legal action: Surely no sensible official reading these long-on-the-books opinions could believe that that act — assuming it represents an adverse action — was not a burden on Berge’s First Amendment right to publish on a matter of public concern. So given all this, Berge’s complaint plausibly alleges that the threat constituted First Amendment retaliation in violation of his clearly established right. . . . Convinced that Berge ‘failed to meet his burden of showing’ a violation of ‘any clearly-established First Amendment right to publish his recording,’ the individual defendants — sort of echoing the district judge — fault him for not citing a case showing that he could record and publish ‘non-law enforcement personnel (such as school administrators) performing official duties in a limited or non-public forum where reasonable, viewpoint-neutral restrictions on speech are routinely permitted.’ But a ‘directly’ on-point case is ‘not require[d].’ . . We say that because the general constitutional rules highlighted above — including (for example) that ‘the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... for speaking out,’ . . . are so clear that (even without a pre-existing case involving the same facts, and still assuming the threatened legal action would constitute an adverse action) the unlawfulness of what occurred is apparent[.] . . . We cannot now hold the individual defendants qualifiedly immune on the retaliation count and so vacate the judge’s dismissal of count 1 against them.”)

Jakuttis v. Town of Dracut, 95 F.4th 22, 30-33 (1st Cir. 2024) (“Because Chartrand and Mellonakos are being sued in their individual capacities under § 1983, they are liable for damages only if ‘(1) they violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was “clearly established at the time.”’ . . . Thus, if an objectively reasonable official in Chartrand’s or Mellonakos’s shoes ‘might not have known for certain that the[ir] conduct was unlawful,’ then Chartrand and Mellonakos ‘[are] immune from liability.’ . . . Otherwise, neither is. . . The First Amendment retaliation claim that Jakuttis brings against, respectively, Chartrand and Mellonakos turns, at least in significant part, on whether Jakuttis made the report of misconduct in the DPD that he claims occasioned the allegedly unlawful retaliation while ‘speaking as [a] citizen[][,]’ . . . rather than as part of his ‘official duties.’ After all, Jakuttis acknowledges that the First Amendment retaliation claim at issue cannot proceed against either Chartrand or Mellonakos unless the speech in question -- his report of misconduct in the DPD -- qualified as ‘citizen speech.’ . . . We may assume for present purposes that Jakuttis is right that it is clearly established that a police supervisor or fellow police officer may not retaliate against an employee in their police department for speech that employee made as part of their official duties owed to a different law-enforcement agency (a proposition about which we express no view). For, even accepting that proposition, we conclude that the record establishes that it would not have been clear to a reasonable person in either Chartrand’s position or Mellonakos’s position that Jakuttis was conveying the report of misconduct in his capacity as a TFO rather than in his capacity as a DPD employee. And, because Chartrand and Mellonakos reasonably could have understood Jakuttis to have been making the report of misconduct in the DPD as part of his official DPD duties, they are entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity on the ground that it was not clear to them that the speech that allegedly occasioned their unlawful retaliation was ‘citizen speech.’”)

Johnson v. City of Biddeford, 92 F.4th 367, 369-81 (1st Cir. 2024) (“The key issue on appeal is whether judgment for Officer Edward Dexter was correctly entered on grounds of qualified immunity against the appellants’ claim of violation of substantive due process rights under the enhancement-of-danger prong of the state-created danger test as articulated by this court in Irish v. Fowler, 979 F.3d 65, 75 (1st Cir. 2020). We affirm, holding a reasonable officer in Dexter’s position would not have understood, on the facts here, that he was by his actions and inactions violating any such rights. . . . Officer Dexter, in speaking with Pak but failing to make various inquiries such as whether Pak had access to a firearm, may have made a serious misjudgment. The qualified immunity defense, however, ‘demands deference to the reasonable, if mistaken, actions of the movant.’ . . . A reasonable officer could have understood Officer Dexter’s conduct to be consistent with the constitution, and so he is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Lawless v. Town of Freetown, 63 F.4th 61, 68-69 (1st Cir. 2023) (“[I]t is clearly established that employing authorities may preside at termination hearings even though they instituted the termination proceedings. . . . That kind of bias--essentially a predisposition to terminate an employee’s contract--is precisely the kind of bias in play here. . . . While this Circuit has openly questioned whether ‘the issue of bias can be addressed with an abstract broad statement that the due process standard of Loudermill either always or never requires that the hearing officer be unbiased,’ . . . such ‘abstract broad statements’--were they offered--would not serve as clearly established law for purposes of our qualified immunity inquiry. . . . Consequently, the Chmielinski panel’s contemplation of a decisionmaker ‘so utterly biased’ that the Loudermill response right can be deemed a hollow exercise, . . . does not afford such clear guidance that any reasonable official in the Appellants’ position would have been on notice that presiding at Lawless’s termination hearing would violate the due process clause. . . . Given that the clear legal statements available in binding precedent tend more to frustrate than support Lawless’s due process claim against the Appellants, we have little difficulty concluding that the doctrine of qualified immunity shields the Appellants from liability against Lawless’s due process claim.”)

Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. Doe, 51 F.4th 402, 409-18 & n.14 (1st Cir. 2022), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied (1st Cir. Dec. 2, 2022) (“[T]he [district] court denied summary judgment and authorized discovery on the theory that the proper focus was not just on the encounter itself but on the information possessed by the officers and their ‘plans, actions, observations, and means available to respond’ in the lead-up to the encounter. . . . The court also found that it could not ‘fairly rule’ on the qualified immunity defense because the facts were ‘insufficient to determine exactly what the particular conduct was.’ . . . The ‘clearly established’ prong itself comprises two inquiries. . . . The plaintiff must ‘identify either controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority sufficient to put an officer on notice that his conduct fell short of the constitutional norm.’ . . . The plaintiff must also ‘show that an objectively reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the law.’ . . . The plaintiff’s burden to demonstrate that the law was clearly established is thus ‘a heavy burden indeed.’ . . . We hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity under each aspect of the ‘clearly established’ prong of the defense. First, we hold that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because the Estate has not identified any authority that would put the officers on notice that their actions were unlawful. Second, we hold independently that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable officer facing the same fraught situation as Doe 1 and Doe 2 would not have known that the challenged conduct violated the law. And the officers are entitled to qualified immunity whether the focus is on the thirty-second fatal encounter or the fatal encounter plus the officers’ actions in the hour beforehand. . . . The district court found that consideration of the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity defense was premature before discovery. . . . We deem this inconsistent with the Supreme Court’s command to ‘resolv[e] immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . Even where certain facts are disputed, courts must assess whether a plaintiff’s allegations -- or here, the Estate’s allegations as modified by the current undisputed evidence in the summary judgment record -- make out a claim sufficient to overcome qualified immunity before denying a motion for summary judgment and authorizing discovery. . . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the current record for the reasons we now discuss. . . . We hold first that the Estate has failed to meet its burden to identify controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority sufficient to put the officers on notice that their conduct violated the law. . . . While a case ‘directly on point’ is not required, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . And ‘specificity is “especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,” where it is “sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.”’. . . The Estate has not come close to meeting its burden of identifying controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority. The Estate did not advance any argument on this point, much less identify sufficiently analogous precedents. It did not do so despite the fact that the government pointed out this absence of argument both in the district court and in its opening briefs. The fact that the Estate cited -- in the district court, not in its appellate briefing -- to a single, twenty-one-year-old, out-of-circuit case does not satisfy its burden for a number of reasons beyond the obvious reason of waiver by the Estate. That case, Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (9th Cir. 2001), is insufficient as a matter of law to meet the Estate’s burden: it is neither controlling authority nor a ‘consensus’ of persuasive authority. . . . We hold independently that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because objectively reasonable officers in their position would not have understood their actions to violate the law. . . . We hold further that a reasonable officer in this situation would have understood Rahim to have a lethal knife in his hands. We also hold that a reasonable officer, on the undisputed facts, would have understood Rahim’s actions to show that he had every intention to use this knife to kill the officers and, if they were unsuccessful in stopping him, to kill other people. . . . [I]n the case before us the officers reasonably believed that Rahim was a terrorist suspect, that he was armed with a military-style knife and -- from an objective perspective based on intelligence -- intended to kill, and that he posed an imminent threat both to law enforcement and to members of the public. After the Task Force intercepted Rahim’s 5:18 a.m. call on the morning of June 2, 2015, the officers were operating under substantial time pressure to stop Rahim before he could board public transportation. When they approached him in the CVS parking lot shortly after 7:00 a.m., Rahim refused repeated commands to put his hands up. Instead, he advanced on the officers with something in his hands. The officers retreated across the length of the parking lot while repeatedly commanding Rahim to ‘drop it!’ Rahim refused and taunted them to drop their weapons. The officers did not fire until Rahim had refused at least nine total commands, was within twenty-five feet of the officers, and had backed them up against the edge of the parking lot. At this point, two officers made the split-second decision to fire. The entire encounter lasted around thirty seconds. Under these circumstances, an objectively reasonable officer would not have understood the challenged conduct to violate the law. . . . An objectively reasonable officer would have understood Rahim to be dangerous, armed with a military-style knife, and preparing to conduct a terrorist attack, an extremely serious crime. The encounter was precisely the sort of ‘tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving’ situation where officers are forced to make split-second decisions for their safety and the safety of others. . . . The officers gave clear and repeated warnings before employing deadly force, warnings which Rahim ignored. They did not fire until Rahim had advanced and was close enough to them to use a knife. And the fact that two officers simultaneously made the split-second decision to fire supports the objective reasonableness of their decision. The officers had a more-than-reasonable basis for believing Rahim was armed with a military-style knife both before and during the encounter. The officers also had a more-than-reasonable basis to believe that Rahim had left his apartment that morning with an intent to kill a ‘boy[] in blue’ and/or other people. There is no dispute Rahim said exactly those things. . .The officers are entitled to qualified immunity even if we consider their actions between learning of Rahim’s phone call to Wright at some point after 6:00 a.m. and approaching him in the CVS parking lot shortly after 7:00 a.m. The Estate suggests that, after learning that Rahim was an imminent threat, the officers should have apprehended him sooner and/or acquired a warrant. But the officers were operating under significant time pressure during this period, with at most an hour to develop a plan, call for backup, approach Rahim, and stop him from boarding public transportation. And the Estate’s only theory, that this pre-confrontation conduct may render the officers’ later actions unreasonable by bearing on their ‘intent’ in approaching Rahim, is not viable because the excessive-force inquiry is undertaken ‘without regard to [officers’] underlying intent or motivation.’ . . . The Estate has not otherwise asserted a claim based on the officers’ conduct during this earlier period. And the Estate has pointed to no precedent, and we have found none, establishing that the officers’ pre-confrontation conduct violates clearly established law.¹⁴ [fn 14: We disagree with the district court’s interpretation of our precedents on the relevance of officers’ pre-seizure actions. We have not adopted the broad rule that officers have a duty to avoid creating situations which increase the risk that deadly force may be used. See Napier v. Town of Windham, 187 F.3d 177, 188 (1st Cir. 1999); St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 71 F.3d 20, 27 (1st Cir. 1995). And while we have recognized that pre-seizure conduct may be relevant in the reasonableness analysis, we have done so in cases where there is a much closer connection between such conduct and the ultimate seizure. Cf. Young v. City of Providence ex rel. Napolitano, 404 F.3d 4, 22 n.13 (1st Cir. 2005) (distinguishing Napier as ‘not hold[ing] that events immediately leading up to a shooting cannot be considered as part of the totality of the circumstances along with the precise instant surrounding a shooting’ (emphasis added)).] Nor has the Estate shown that an objectively reasonable officer in Doe 1 or Doe 2’s position would understand such conduct to violate the law. The officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.”)

Estate of Rahim by Rahim v. Doe, 51 F.4th 402, 418-24 (1st Cir. 2022) (Barron, C.J., dissenting), pet. for reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, ___ F.4th ___ (1st Cir. Dec. 2, 2022) (“The officers who fatally shot Usaamah Abdullah Rahim seek summary judgment based on qualified immunity. They do so, however, even before the plaintiff, Rahim’s Estate, has had a chance to question them about what they knew at the time that they fired on Rahim. Thus, there is good reason to be concerned that the officers’ request is premature. To be sure, the Estate appears to accept that the record is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers had been reliably informed by the time that they confronted Rahim that a suspect matching his description was on the loose who had threatened to behead someone and was ‘armed with a knife.’ The Estate also appears to accept that the record is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers, upon confronting Rahim, commanded that he drop whatever he may have had in his hands and that he refused to comply. But, to me, the key question is whether the record also is sufficiently developed to establish conclusively that the officers had information at the time that they fired on Rahim that reasonably led them to think that he was advancing toward them while holding in hand what they thought was a deadly weapon or that in so advancing he was at least reaching for one. For, if the record in even its present undeveloped state is also conclusive in that respect, then the officers are entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity, even accepting the District Court's determination that the Estate's questioning of the officers might produce testimony that would give rise to a factual dispute about whether they could have taken steps to defuse the situation. . . I reach that conclusion because, in that event, the summary judgment record conclusively would show that the officers were faced with a split-second decision about how best to address the immediate threat that Rahim posed when they fired on him. And, it would then follow, the Estate would not be able to show that the officers' use of force to subdue Rahim violated clearly established law, notwithstanding that the Estate might be able to show through questioning of the officers that they could have done things to prevent that climactic moment from occurring. . . The Estate contends, however, that the record is not clear in conclusively establishing that the officers reasonably thought that Rahim was holding in hand or reaching for a deadly weapon when they fired on him. And, I agree with the Estate on that score. Thus, I conclude that the summary judgment record -- at least in its present state -- permits a reasonable juror to find that the officers' use of deadly force against Rahim was excessive under clearly established law. . . To conclude otherwise, the majority first relies on the Estate's alleged failure to 'meet[] its burden' to identify 'sufficiently analogous precedents' to show that the use of deadly force against Rahim violated clearly established law. But, a plaintiff seeking to overcome a defense of qualified immunity need not identify an identical case to fend off that defense, . . . and, when prompted below, the Estate offered authority to show that the use of deadly force by the officers would have been excessive if in using such force they did not understand Rahim to have had a deadly weapon in hand or to have been reaching for one[.] . The majority does not identify a single case that indicates otherwise. . . . The majority may mean to be arguing that the Estate did not identify precedent to show that the officers' conduct would have violated clearly established law insofar as the officers did reasonably believe that Rahim was holding a knife in his hand at the key moment. But, that contention depends on an underlying contention about what the present state of the undeveloped record conclusively shows, which turns out to be the basis for the majority's second rationale for ruling as it does. I thus now turn to that rationale. . . In this second rationale, the majority asserts that 'it is not plausible that any of the officers will probably testify in a deposition that Rahim was unarmed.' . This assertion does not help the majority if by 'unarmed' the majority is agreeing with the Estate that the record at present conclusively shows that Rahim had a weapon on his person, though not in his hand, and that he was not reaching for that weapon. As I have just explained, the use of deadly force against Rahim by officers who did not think that he was holding a deadly weapon or reaching for one when they fired on him would be excessive under clearly established law. But, the majority may mean to be contending that it is not plausible that the officers 'probably' would provide testimony that could give rise to a genuine issue of disputed fact about whether Rahim was holding a knife in his hand when the officers shot him, such that we must treat the present record as if it conclusively establishes that the officers did reasonably think that Rahim had such a weapon in hand at that key moment. Here, too, though, I am not persuaded. There is literally nothing in the record on appeal that purports to state the officers' own views on that matter, and we must construe the record as it comes to us in the light most favorable to the Estate, because the Estate is the non-moving party. . . In addition, qualified immunity does not protect those who are asserting it from discovery about the information that they in fact 'possessed at the time of [their] allegedly unlawful conduct' if their possession of that information would bear on whether the immunity applies. . . The majority does point to an account of what the officers say they saw in Rahim's hand that the officers themselves offered in affidavits. But, the District Court excluded that account from consideration of the motion for summary judgment precisely because the Estate had not been given a chance to test that account through adversarial questioning. . . and the government, in appealing the District Court's denial of the motion, does not challenge that aspect of the District Court's summary judgment ruling. That appellate waiver aside, it also is not evident that we have jurisdiction to consider the officers' untested account in resolving this interlocutory appeal. After all, we must decide this appeal by taking as given the facts on which the District Court relied. . . Finally, we cannot predict how the officers would be likely to testify if questioned by the party suing them by choosing to credit their as-yet-untested account. Our adversarial system does not permit us to rely on such a say-so understanding of how truth is best discovered. Accordingly, I can see no basis for concluding that it is probable that no evidence would emerge during discovery that would permit a reasonable juror to find that the officers thought that, as Rahim moved towards them, he neither had a deadly weapon in hand nor was reaching for one that was on his person. Indeed, the officers themselves - - once subjected to adversarial questioning -- could provide testimony that would provide support for just such a finding. I should add that no precedent is to the contrary to my conclusion in this regard. . . . [N]o case supports effectively preventing a plaintiff from questioning a defendant about facts critical to the determination of whether qualified immunity is warranted. . . . The majority's final rationale is that the Estate has 'conceded' that the officers '[went] into the encounter' with a reasonable belief 'that Rahim was armed and planned to carry out an imminent attack.' If the majority means to suggest only that the Estate has conceded that the officers had been reliably informed that Rahim had threatened to kill someone and was armed with a knife (in the sense of having one on his person) that day, then I cannot disagree. But, that concession would not on its own permit us to reverse the District Court and order that it grant summary judgment based on qualified immunity to the officers. The record as it presently stands still would not conclusively establish in that circumstance that at the moment that the officers chose to use deadly force against Rahim they reasonably thought that he was holding or reaching for a deadly weapon. Perhaps, then, the majority means that the Estate conceded -- either below or on appeal -- that the officers did have information that reasonably led to them to hold the belief that Rahim had a knife or other deadly weapon in his hand (or even that he was reaching for one) when they shot him. But I can find no support in the record for our concluding that the Estate has made a concession of that kind. True, the Estate's counsel did contend below that his client could survive summary judgment even if that was what the officers thought about what Rahim had in his hand at the key moment. But, the Estate's counsel also repeatedly argued in the alternative that further discovery could produce facts that would call into question whether the officers ‘believ[ed] [that Rahim] had a knife’ and whether that alleged belief was ‘reasonable.’ Indeed, as the majority acknowledges, the Estate filed a Rule 56(d) affidavit seeking an opportunity to pursue such discovery. And, the Estate argues on appeal that it ‘disputes all of the[] facts’ about the incident as presented by the officers, and that, ‘[b]ecause there has been no discovery ... [the Estate] has not been able to interview or take depositions of any of the officers ... [or] any of the civilian witnesses ... some of whose accounts differ from those of the officers.’. Qualified immunity prevents many claims of excessive force from succeeding precisely because of the in-the-moment nature of the judgment that officers attempting to subdue suspects must make. It does not permit courts to credit, though, the untested accounts that defendants accused of excessive force offer when the plaintiff has been denied any chance to test those accounts. The Estate pressed below and is pressing to us the argument that summary judgment must be denied to the officers because the Estate has not yet had a chance to test their account of just how much of a threat Rahim posed at the key moment. I am convinced that it is plausible that such testing would reveal a genuine factual dispute about whether the officers thought Rahim had a weapon in hand (or was reaching for one) during their deadly encounter with him. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from the majority’s decision to reverse the District Court’s denial of the officers’ motion for summary judgment.”)

French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 130-36 (1st Cir. 2021) (“While the officers’ conduct does not involve the gathering of evidence from the curtilage of French’s home with the help of a dog, it does plainly demonstrate that, if we consider their actions as a whole, they exceeded the scope of the implicit social license that authorized their presence on French’s property. Despite obvious signs that the occupants of the home were aware of and did not want to receive visitors -- their refusal to answer the door upon Morse and Gray’s initial knock and Gray’s second knock, and their swift covering of windows and turning off lights in response to that second knock -- the police doubled down on their efforts to coax French out of the home. Any reasonable officer would have understood that their actions on the curtilage of French’s property exceeded the limited scope of the customary social license to ‘approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.’. . Indeed, Officer Morse revealed such an understanding when he observed that French was not likely to come to the door upon another attempt and that the officers should secure a warrant. Yet, the officers disregarded Morse’s advice and reentered the curtilage without a warrant. . . . We are not concerned only with the number of officers present or the hour, location, or length of the attempted knock and talks. Instead, we are focused on the legal principle at the core of Jardines -- the scope of the implied license to enter the curtilage -- and the application of that principle to the conduct of the officers in totality. Here, as in Jardines, the officers had their feet ‘firmly planted on the constitutionally protected extension of [the] home’ and their activity was therefore limited to that which was implicitly authorized (absent explicit consent) by the homeowner. . . . Far from engaging only in conduct that a homeowner might reasonably expect from a private citizen on their property -- that is, again, approaching the door, knocking promptly, and leaving if not greeted by an occupant -- the officers reentered the property four times and took aggressive actions until French came to the door so that the officers could pursue their criminal investigation. By so doing, the officers engaged in precisely the kind of warrantless and unlicensed physical intrusion on the property of another that Jardines clearly established as a Fourth Amendment violation. Hence, the officers violated clearly established law and are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . There are two major problems with the dissent. It goes to great lengths to make an exigent circumstances argument that the appellees never make. It also fails to address the principle at the heart of Jardines: the scope of the knock and talk exception to the warrant requirement is controlled by the implied license to enter the curtilage. . . . The dissent claims that Jardines cannot have clearly established the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct in this case because the Court's reasoning in Jardines was dependent upon the fact that the officers entered the property with a drug-sniffing dog 'to gather information on the curtilage, not to speak with a resident.' According to the dissent, because the officers in this case entered the property with an intent to speak to French and not to engage in a search with a drug-sniffing dog, Jardines is inapposite. . . . [T]he constitutional violation in Jardines was the officers' 'physical[] ent[rance] and occup[ation]' on the curtilage of Jardines' home 'to engage in conduct not explicitly or implicitly permitted by the homeowner.' . . . Because there was no explicit permission by Jardines, the Court reasoned that the officers' permission to enter the property was authorized by an implicit social license -- informed by 'the habits of the country' -- to enter the property of another and seek to speak with an occupant. . . . That license, the Court explained, has both a physical and a purpose-based limitation. . . . The Court concluded that the officers abided by the terms of the physical scope of the license -- their activities on the property were limited to areas that a member of the public might be expected to visit. However, the officers in Jardines exceeded the limited purpose authorized by the license through their conduct. They did so by seeking evidence of drugs with the help of a trained, drug-sniffing dog. That the precise manner in which the officers in this case exceeded the scope of the implied license differs from that in Jardines is inconsequential. The officers in this case, like the officers in Jardines, in the absence of any license to do so, 'physically intrud[ed]' on a suspect's property repeatedly and engaged in intrusive conduct that no reasonable visitor could have understood as impliedly authorized by a resident. . . . [W]e conclude that, viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to French, Officers Morse and Gray violated French's Fourth Amendment rights by exceeding the lawful bounds of a warrantless 'knock and talk.' We further conclude that the unlawfulness of the officers' conduct was clearly established at the time by the principles of law set forth in Florida v. Jardines.") French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 136-37, 142-48 (1st Cir. 2021) (Lynch, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion as to the affirmance of summary judgment arising from claims about the February arrest of Christopher French. I strongly dissent from the reversal of the grant of qualified immunity to Officers Gray and Morse as to the September 14 incident. In my view, the majority is wrong that Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013), which concerned officers' entry onto private property for the purpose of using a drug-sniffing dog on the curtilage of the house, clearly established the purported illegality of the officers' conduct in knocking at French's home on September 14, 2016. The doctrine of qualified immunity has sometimes been abused, but the majority's denial of qualified immunity here is flatly contrary to Supreme Court and circuit law and creates a circuit split. Moreover, this unfortunate ruling will disincentivize police from taking action after persons of any gender have credibly alleged that they have been threatened and are frightened by former romantic partners. . . .French and the majority argue that Jardines itself clearly established that the officers' conduct on September 14, 2016, violated French's constitutional rights. I disagree for several reasons. First, the holding of Jardines is not applicable here because the facts are entirely distinct, and Jardines' reasoning relied on facts not present here. Second, as made clear by Supreme Court and circuit court decisions published after Jardines, Jardines' general discussion of the knock and talk exception was not adequately specific to clearly establish the purported illegality of the officers' conduct here. Finally, the majority seems to posit that the officers' actions somehow forced French to come to the door. . . . In the instant case, it is undisputed that the officers were knocking on the door to try to speak with French, not to search the property, as in Jardines. Jardines is not about the limitations, if any, on the duration or location of a knock and talk license to contact the resident of a home, and thus could not clearly establish the purported illegality of the officers' conduct. . . . Jardines also did not concern a situation in which the officers had to act quickly to ensure the safety of a victim or prevent the destruction of evidence. . . . Nor did Jardines discuss how the analysis might change when officers are investigating a crime for which state law authorizes a warrantless arrest. . . . Subsequent decisions from the Supreme Court and from our sister circuits make clear that the purported illegality of the officers' actions -- including knocking at the window, knocking multiple times, and knocking late at night -- was not clearly established by Jardines' general rule. . . . The majority's entire approach to qualified immunity runs counter to both the Supreme Court's and this circuit's precedents. The 'clearly established' inquiry is not supposed to entail elucidating an abstract principle from a single case and asking how a reasonable officer would have applied that principle in a given situation. Rather, it requires asking whether the constitutionality of the official's behavior was placed 'beyond debate' by existing precedent. . . . The inquiry requires 'specificity,' particularly in Fourth Amendment cases. . . . The majority makes clear that it is not concerned with what it views as trivial details like 'the number of officers present or the hour, location, or length of the attempted knock and talks.' It should be. In ignoring the specifics of the case and the very real questions left open by Jardines to reach its decision, the majority defines clearly established law at the 'high level of generality' the Supreme Court has expressly foreclosed. . . . The need for swift action also distinguishes this case from Jardines and undercuts the majority's argument that general principles of Jardines clearly established the purported illegality of the officers' conduct. . . . The majority's decision, in my view, disincentivizes police from acting on and taking seriously the complaints of persons of any gender who credibly seek law enforcement help when they have been threatened by former romantic partners. I cannot agree that Jardines was sufficiently analogous to place the legality of these officers' actions 'beyond debate.' In my view, under controlling Supreme Court precedent, the only correct result here is the affirmance of the grant of qualified immunity to these officers. The officers here acted reasonably in making repeated efforts to reach French where he was acting erratically and Nardone explained that the danger to her would increase as French was given more time to break into and read the contents of her phone. The officers knew French was awake despite the time, and it was a rational choice in a multi-tenant apartment for the officers to knock on French's bedroom window to try to speak to him. Nothing in Jardines or any other case clearly established that these actions violated the Fourth Amendment. I dissent.”)

See also French v. Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 93-95 (1st Cir. 2022) (Lipez, J., joined by Thompson, Kayatta, and Barron, JJ., responding to dissents from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“Contrary to the depiction of the facts that our dissenting colleagues promote and rely upon, this case does not involve an imminent risk of physical harm to an intimate partner. As the majority opinion explains in detail, the woman who summoned the police was at her own home, at a different location, when the events at issue transpired. . . Hence, there is simply no equivalence between what occurred in this case and the facts of the two recent Supreme Court cases cited by the joint dissent, in which law enforcement officers were entitled to qualified immunity for ‘actions taken while dealing with situations of intimate partner violence.’ Dissent of JJ. Lynch and Howard (citing City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9 (2021) (per curiam); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (per curiam)). We are mindful of the troubling relationship and threatening behavior that provides the backdrop for this case. But, in the proceedings below and on appeal, there was never a claim by the officers that they confronted circumstances requiring split-second decision-making. The depiction of an episode of imminent, physical, intimate partner violence has been and continues to be a construct of the joint dissent. Indeed, at one point, an officer proposed returning to the police station so that he could apply for a warrant. . . The officers chose not to take that step, and neither the defendants nor the record suggest that their choice was based on the risk of any harm that could occur in the interim. We do not disagree with our dissenting colleagues’ observation that the doctrine of qualified immunity ‘recognizes that it is difficult for officials to anticipate how relevant legal doctrines will apply in various situations absent specific guidance from courts.’ But this case simply does not give rise to the questions concerning the knock-and-talk exception posited by our colleagues: ‘whether knocking multiple times might be acceptable, whether knocking at a window instead of a door in a multi-tenant apartment is permissible, or how much time must pass between unsuccessful knock and talks before attempting again.’ A reasonable officer might well be uncertain about the propriety of these or similar scenarios. Here, however, the officers engaged in conduct that blatantly transgressed the limited social license clearly delineated by Justice Scalia. Jardines thus leaves no uncertainty about the unlawfulness of their conduct. . . . It is important to recognize the competing interests at stake. To be sure, we must be mindful of the difficulties faced by police officers in performing their duties and the need to protect them from liability for judgments that are reasonable, even if mistaken. We fully agree with the joint dissent about the importance of freeing officers to make such judgments in the context of imminent threats of intimate partner violence when such circumstances are present. But we cannot forget the important constitutional protection that the warrant requirement affords to individuals in their homes -- the location that is ‘first among equals’ in the realm protected by the Fourth Amendment. . . The knock-and-talk exception is a carefully circumscribed, clearly articulated departure from the warrant requirement. Here, no reasonable officer could have mistakenly believed that the repeated, escalating intrusions at French’s home were permitted by the knock-and-talk exception. In sum, the majority’s decision adheres to the Supreme Court’s precedent on both qualified immunity and the knock-and-talk exception to the warrant requirement. No further review is warranted.”)

French v. Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 95-98 (1st Cir. 2022) (Lynch, J., joined by Howard, C.J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“We dissent from the denial of en banc review by our colleagues in the majority. The denial of further review by the full en banc court compounds the error of the panel majority opinion’s refusal to adhere to binding precedent from the Supreme Court, this court, and other circuits. The panel majority opinion creates a departure from Supreme Court law, and thus this case is worthy of Supreme Court review. Fuller discussion of these issues can be found in Judge Lynch’s dissent from the panel majority opinion. French v. Merrill, 15 F.4th 116, 136 (1st Cir. 2021) (Lynch, J., dissenting in part). The panel decision and the denial of en banc review frustrate the very purposes for which qualified immunity was created. Qualified immunity serves the important purpose of freeing government officials to act without fear of liability when they make reasonable decisions in the course of their duties. . . This doctrine recognizes that it is difficult for officials to anticipate how relevant legal doctrines will apply in various situations absent specific guidance from courts. . . While government officials must conform their conduct to the Constitution, the law of qualified immunity prohibits the imposition of penalties on them for their reasonable conduct, especially when there is no clear guidance from the courts as to the contours of the constitutional right at issue. Nothing in Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013) put the officers in this case on notice that their actions were in violation of any clearly established rule. . . . In Jardines, the Supreme Court held that police use of a drug-sniffing dog to inspect the curtilage of a person’s home constitutes a search under the Fourth Amendment. . . The Court briefly discussed the knock and talk exception to the warrant requirement, noting that it is coextensive with the implied license for visitors ‘typically’ to ‘approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.’. . This discussion of the ‘typical[]’ knock and talk does not set forth with any kind of specificity the parameters of a permissible knock and talk. It provides a framework for how to consider what might or might not be allowed under the knock and talk exception, but it provides no settled answer to questions such as whether knocking multiple times might be acceptable, whether knocking at a window instead of a door in a multi-tenant apartment is permissible, or how much time must pass between unsuccessful knock and talks before attempting again. Reasonable police officers (and judges) could read Jardines and disagree about the answers to these questions. The constitutionality of these questions is therefore hardly ‘beyond debate,’ as the Supreme Court has instructed that they must be. . Further, the panel majority violates two other rules about qualified immunity: that the qualified immunity inquiry must be focused on the specific context of the case and that it must focus on what the officers knew at the time. . . . Not only did the officers in this case lack notice of the purported unconstitutionality of their knock and talk, but the context of the case and the information known to the officers render their actions more, not less, reasonable. . . . Within the last few months, the Supreme Court has twice reaffirmed the importance of the principle that clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes must be defined with specificity. See City of Tahlequah v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 11 (2021) (per curiam) (“We have repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.”); Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 8 (2021) (per curiam) (“[T]o show a violation of clearly established law, [the plaintiff] must identify a case that put [the defendant] on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful.”). In both of these cases, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed denials of qualified immunity to law enforcement regarding actions taken while dealing with situations of intimate partner violence. . . . These recent Supreme Court decisions send an unmistakable signal that the proper course of action in this case would have been to affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity. For many years, police departments gave threats of this sort a low priority or ignored them altogether. . . . Under the majority’s decision, these police officers, who should be commended for taking the victim’s concerns seriously and acting promptly, are now being penalized for a reasonable decision made in the course of the investigation. This decision will disincentivize police from taking decisive action in such cases for fear of liability -- precisely what qualified immunity was created to avoid. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we dissent and urge further review.”)

French v. Merrill, 24 F.4th 93, 98 (1st Cir. 2022) (Gelpi, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“I respectfully dissent from the denial of en banc review by the Court. This case raises a question of exceptional importance regarding the Fourth Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . Ultimately, the Court’s opinion will impact how police officers in all five First Circuit jurisdictions respond to critical and time-sensitive situations such as that involving the female victim and her former partner here. As such, I believe this case is suited for review by the full Court.”)

Lachance v. Town of Charlton, 990 F.3d 14, 20-28 (1st Cir. 2021) (“In determining whether the unlawfulness of officers’ conduct was clearly established, ‘the salient question ... is whether the state of the law [at the time of the officers’ conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiff] was unconstitutional.’ . . . The answer to that question is ‘yes’ when: (1) the law was ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would [have] interpret[ed] it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply’; and (2) ‘[t]he rule’s contours [were] so well defined that it [would have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . The rule establishing the conduct’s illegality must be ‘dictated by [either] “controlling authority” or “a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,”’ the latter of which ‘does not require the express agreement of every circuit’ but rather some sister circuit law can suffice. . . . In the Fourth Amendment context, the ‘[s]pecificity’ of the rule set forth in such precedent ‘is especially important,’ because it can be ‘difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine,’ such as excessive force, ‘will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’ . . . Of course, prior cases with materially similar facts are not necessary to clearly establish conduct’s illegality; a ‘general constitutional rule’ located in prior authority can suffice to defeat qualified immunity even in ‘novel factual circumstances.’ . . . But that is true only in an ‘obvious case,’ . . . where ‘any reasonable officer should have realized that [the conduct at issue] offended the Constitution[.]’ . . . As such, ‘relevant case law,’ where ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment,’ is ‘usually necessary’ to overcome officers’ qualified immunity. . . . The district court . . . found that ‘it was clearly established that [Lachance] had a constitutional right to be free from an officer kneeling on his back after he had been restrained,’ but that there were fact issues that bore on whether a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated that right, namely whether an officer kneeled on Lachance’s back at all and, if so, for how long. However, the court found that it was not clearly established that the push, even assuming it was carried out with a lot of force, violated the Constitution under the circumstances. The court noted that Lachance failed to point to any controlling or persuasive case law to show that his right to be free from such force was clearly established, although the court identified one out-of-circuit case that might support his position. . . . In fact, the court added, in-circuit case law ‘suggests that forcefully pushing a resistant plaintiff to the ground is not excessive[.]’ There may be some tension in our cases about how to analyze multiple-force scenarios. [discussing Jennings and Alexis] We have found no circuit that is completely averse to applying a segmented approach where it makes sense. [collecting circuit cases using segmented approach] It seems to us that the segmented approach is also consistent with Supreme Court precedent. In Graham, the Court made clear that the reasonableness of a use of force is to be determined ‘at the moment’ that the force was applied. . . . It explicated that the reasonableness inquiry depends on ‘the facts and circumstances confronting’ the officer in ‘a particular situation,’ which facts and circumstances are ‘often ... tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’. . . Put differently, ‘[e]xcessive force claims ... are evaluated for objective reasonableness based upon the information the officers had when the conduct occurred.’. . . Such language seems to favor a segmented approach, at least when circumstances relevant to the reasonableness inquiry changed between one use of force and another. . . . After all, if the reasonableness of an officer’s use of force depends on the information available to that officer under a particular set of circumstances, which appear to have meaningfully changed between one use of force and another, then it only makes sense to consider those uses separately. . . . Here, there was clearly a change in circumstances between the push and the kneel that was relevant to the reasonableness inquiry. Before the push, Lachance was still standing and actively attempting to make his way outside, and he had been resisting the officers’ efforts to stop him by issuing instructions, grabbing his arms, and redirecting him. After the push, Lachance was on the floor with visible bruising on his back and, although he was flailing his arms and legs, may have been attempting simply to stand up (as opposed to going outside) when an officer kneeled on his back to keep him down. On these facts, it made sense for the district court to segment its analysis. . . . Proceeding to analyze the push separately from the kneel, we conclude that the push was not a clearly established violation of Lachance’s right to be free of unreasonable seizures. Lachance argues that the Graham factors are lopsided in his favor and that this is sufficient to show that his right was clearly established. But it is well-established that the Graham factors, while instructive, are not exhaustive of the totality of the circumstances that must be considered in each excessive force case. . . . Moreover, the Graham test is geared toward criminal suspects as opposed to persons who are suspected only of experiencing a medical emergency for which they require aid. See Estate of Hill by Hill v. Miracle, 853 F.3d 306, 313 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Lachance cites a number of purportedly factually analogous cases, but none are materially similar enough to have provided reasonable officers under the circumstances with fair warning that they would violate Lachance’s rights by pushing him in the manner that the defendant officers did. He cites as controlling authority our decision in Ciolino, . . . but that decision could not have clearly established his right as of the date of the push in January 2014. . . The same is true of most of the decisions that Lachance relies on. . . Here, Lachance posed a risk of serious physical harm to himself were he permitted to stumble outside to a steep, icy stairway. Moreover, whereas in those cases the plaintiffs at no point resisted the officers, here Lachance clearly did by continuing toward the door even after they grabbed his arms and repeatedly told him to stop walking. . . Therefore, Lachance has failed to meet his burden of showing that the defendants violated his clearly established rights. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants as to the push.”) Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65, 76-80 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) (“A rule is clearly established either when it is ‘dictated by “controlling authority” or “a robust ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’” . . . A ‘robust consensus’ does not require the express agreement of every circuit. Rather, sister circuit law is sufficient to clearly establish a proposition of law when it would provide notice to every reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful. . . ‘[T]he salient question . . . is whether the state of the law [at the time of the defendants’ conduct] gave [them] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [the plaintiffs] was unconstitutional.’ [citing cases, including Hope v. Pelzer and Taylor v. Riojas] The Supreme Court has established that cases involving materially similar facts are not necessary to a finding that the law was clearly established. . . The circuits have followed that rule. . . A defendant’s adherence to proper police procedure bears on all prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. . . When an officer violates the Constitution, state law, of course, provides no refuge. A lack of compliance with state law or procedure does not, in and of itself, establish a constitutional violation, but when an officer disregards police procedure, it bolsters the plaintiff’s argument both that an officer’s conduct ‘shocks the conscience’ and that ‘a reasonable officer in [the officer’s] circumstances would have believed that his conduct violated the Constitution.’ . . The defendants’ main argument is that because this circuit to date has not recognized the state-created danger doctrine, the law was not clearly established. That is simply incorrect. The Supreme Court has stated that clearly established law can be dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority. . . The widespread acceptance of the state-created danger theory, described above, was sufficient to clearly establish that a state official may incur a duty to protect a plaintiff where the official creates or exacerbates a danger to the plaintiff. The defendants’ reliance on Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056 (1st Cir. 1997), is also misplaced. In Soto, this court concluded that the state-created danger doctrine was not clearly established. . . The broad acceptance of the doctrine ‘militate[d] in favor of finding that there [was] clearly established law in this area,’ but two circumstances prevented the court from holding that the law was clearly established. . . First, the court noted that at the time of the defendants’ conduct in Soto, the First Circuit had never ‘discuss[ed] the contours of [the state-created danger] doctrine.’ . . Second, the court relied on the fact that while the Third Circuit had then recently ‘comprehensively described’ the state-created danger theory, the history of the doctrine was ‘uneven,’ and that only ‘more recent judicial opinions . . . ha[d] begun to clarify the contours’ of the doctrine. . . All of this had changed by the time Detective Perkins left the voicemail for Anthony Lord. By July 2015, this court had discussed the state-created danger doctrine at least a dozen times, even if it had never found it applicable to the facts of a specific case. And our sister circuits' law developed as well in the decades since Soto. The officers argue that because the Fifth and Eleventh Circuits have rejected the state-created danger doctrine, . . . the doctrine cannot be clearly established. Again, as a proposition of law this is wrong. A circuit split does not foreclose a holding that the law was clearly established, as long as the defendants could not reasonably believe that we would follow the minority approach. . . . After Rivera, the defendants could not reasonably have believed that we would flatly refuse to apply the state-created danger doctrine to an appropriate set of facts. Rivera was a critical warning bell that officers could be held liable under the state-created danger doctrine when their affirmative acts enhanced a danger to a witness. This court did not simply dismiss Rivera's claim without analysis, as would have been appropriate if the state-created danger doctrine could never apply to any set of facts in this circuit. Instead, Rivera outlined the elements of the state-created danger doctrine and performed a nuanced analysis of why each particular action of the defendants was not the type of affirmative act covered by the doctrine. . . . Rivera warned that if an officer performed a non-essential affirmative act which enhanced a danger, a sufficient causal connection existed between that act and the plaintiff's harm, and the officer's actions shocked the conscience, the officer could be held liable for placing a witness or victim in harm's way during an investigation. Defendants also argue that they are immune from suit because no factually similar cases alerted them that their conduct was impermissible. This too is incorrect. As we have just said, a general proposition of law may clearly establish the violative nature of a defendant's actions, especially when the violation is egregious. . . . Not only is the argument wrong, but its premise is wrong; there are factually similar earlier cases. Both were decided after Soto. . . . The plaintiffs allege that the defendants, even in the face of Irish's expressed fear that Lord would react violently, contacted him in a manner that a reasonable jury could find notified him that Irish had reported him to the police. The plaintiffs also allege that the defendants failed to convey her request for protection to their superiors for several hours and further failed to inform her in a timely fashion that the request had been denied. A jury could also conclude that the defendants played a role in the decision to withdraw all resources from the area without telling the plaintiffs that they had done so, thereby allowing the plaintiffs to believe more protection was available than was actually true. Finally, the defendants' apparent utter disregard for police procedure could contribute to a jury's conclusion that the defendants conducted themselves in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the danger they knowingly created, and that they thereby acted with the requisite mental state to fall within the ambit of the many cases holding that a violation of the Due Process Clause requires behavior that 'shocks the conscience.' . . . Whether the jury will or should conclude as much is, of course, not a question for this court, but it was clearly established in July 2015 that such conduct on the part of law enforcement officers, if it occurred, could give rise to a lawsuit under § 1983.”)

Roy v. Correct Care Solutions, LLC, 914 F.3d 52, 72-73 (1st Cir. 2019) (“Supervisors like Ross and Bouffard are liable under the Equal Protection Clause for a hostile work environment created by their subordinates in state government only if their ‘link’ to the unlawful harassment was one of “‘supervisory encouragement, condonation, or acquiescence,” or “gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference.”” Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 864 F.2d 881, 902 (1st Cir.1988)

(quoting Bohen v. City of East Chicago, 799 F.2d 1180, 1189 (7th Cir. 1986)). Two First Circuit cases apply this principle. In the single case finding supervisory liability under § 1983 for sexual harassment, the defendants knew of severe abuse but failed even to investigate. . . In the other case, which found no supervisor liability, the defendant, the harasser’s supervisor, at first discouraged the plaintiff from filing a formal complaint but then actively encouraged her to do so. . . Ross and Bouffard’s conduct falls somewhere between these guideposts. Complaints against Snow and Parrow were investigated and addressed while complaints about Turner, DeGuisto, and officers’ retaliatory behavior were not. ‘[A]s is common where there is a lack of precedent, this is not a case in which a reasonable officer must have known that he was acting unconstitutionally.’ . . Ross and Bouffard also receive qualified immunity from the First Amendment retaliation claim because reasonable officials could have believed that revoking Roy’s security clearance would not violate the Constitution. To show a First Amendment violation, one thing Roy must demonstrate is that she was speaking as a private citizen on a matter of public concern. . . Complaints like Roy’s made to supervisors and public officials about sexual harassment and safety at public agencies can be protected citizen speech on matters of public concern. . . But we cannot say that a reasonable official must have known that Roy’s complaints were constitutionally protected. Significantly, Roy only complained internally. And, although the Supreme Court has established that form is never ‘dispositive’ of the public concern question, . . . it has sometimes seen a plaintiff’s failure ‘to inform the public’ about her concerns as cutting against First Amendment protection[.] . . . Reasonable officials in Ross and Bouffard’s positions, then, could have deemed Roy’s complaints unprotected. As a result, even if Roy could ultimately make out a First Amendment violation, the defendants receive qualified immunity.”) Escalera-Salgado v. United States, 911 F.3d 38, 40-42 (1st Cir. 2018) (“The district court’s qualified immunity analysis relied upon our circuit’s oft-repeated assumption ‘that Puerto Rico tort law would not impose personal liability’ in tort actions ‘where the officers would be protected in Bivens claims by qualified immunity.’ . . This assumption was never based on Puerto Rican authority expressly embracing the ‘clearly established’ inquiry employed in Bivens cases. Rather, the assumption was based on a ‘parallel’ between Puerto Rico’s tort law and federal qualified immunity principles. . . . We need not decide in this case whether our repeated assumption concerning the availability of a qualified immunity defense in an FTCA action arising in Puerto Rico is correct. Escalera makes no argument that the district court erred by assuming the defense to be applicable. Instead, Escalera argues that the district court erred in concluding that the officers did not violate clearly established law. . . Turning our attention to that argument, we ask whether the officers’ actions ‘violate[d] clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . In assessing whether an official’s conduct violated clearly established law, we typically reason by analogy, asking whether there is any prior case in which the use of force was deemed unlawful under circumstances reasonably similar to those present in the case at hand. . . . When a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the defense is inapplicable. See Rivera-Corraliza v. Morales, 794 F.3d 208, 215 (1st Cir. 2015). Here, then, Escalera had the burden to identify ‘controlling authority or a robust consensus of persuasive authority such that any reasonable official in the defendant’s position would have known that the challenged conduct is illegal in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’ . . . Escalera failed to compare his shooting to the facts of a single case in which an officer’s use of force was held to be constitutionally excessive. Nor is this a case in which the HSI officers’ conduct was self-evidently unlawful. The officers had ample reason to suspect danger: (1) They had been warned that Escalera was a gang leader and had guns in the apartment; (2) No one answered the door when beckoned; (3) Escalera did not comply with police commands to show his hands and to remain still; and (4) Escalera ‘lifted his shirt, reached for his waistband, and moved for cover behind a bedroom wall.’ Escalera’s best point is that the officers did not actually see a weapon or the ‘bulge’ of an apparent weapon. But he cites no case law clearly establishing that actually seeing a weapon is the sine qua non of reasonableness in circumstances such as those presented here -- where the officers were forewarned that Escalera might well be armed and dangerous, and where Escalera’s behavior would lead almost anyone to believe he was reaching for a weapon. The district court therefore did not err in dismissing Escalera’s claim on the clearly-established step of qualified immunity analysis.”)

Begin v. Drouin, 908 F.3d 829, 835-36 (1st Cir. 2018) (“In determining whether an objectively reasonable police officer would have thought it lawful to shoot Begin, a crucial consideration is the exact number and location of the Riverview employees relative to Begin at the moment Drouin fired. . . . Neither party points us to testimony by Begin or the Riverview employees clearly locating themselves on a diagram of the room, nor even describing narratively with any precision exactly where they were at the time of the shooting. Drouin reports seeing only one person other than Begin in the waiting area as she reached the entrance, and that was the person who then proceeded to back away from Begin. The size of the room itself, we are not told. On appeal, Drouin simply asserts that the others were ‘within striking distance of Begin,’ but that is wishful gloss that claims no support in the district court’s Rule 56 assessment of the undisputed facts. The district court did find that there was evidence the Riverview personnel were in ‘close proximity’ to both Drouin and Begin, but that no one was ‘between’ Drouin and Begin when Begin raised the knife, and that no one faced any immediate threat from Begin. Does this mean only that no one was in the direct line of fire? Or does it mean that no one was in the room between Begin and Drouin as she stood with gun drawn facing him standing stationary in front of his chair? Given the unchallengeable Rule 56 finding that a jury could find that Begin posed no immediate threat to anyone but himself, and given the ambiguous record concerning precisely where each person stood at the moment Drouin decided to fire, we have no choice but to assume that Begin could not have reached out and stabbed anyone first without advancing as many as twenty feet toward the barrel of Drouin’s raised gun. This reading of the ambiguous record on interlocutory review provides an unwelcoming backdrop for Drouin’s immunity defense. Indeed, nowhere in her sixty-one pages of briefing does Drouin claim that a reasonable officer would have fired were she twenty feet away from Begin with all of the Riverview employees aside or behind her, or otherwise similarly removed from Begin, and Begin offering no hint of an advance. Rather, Drouin predicates most of her argument upon her preferred, but presently unacceptable, spin on the record as locating ‘three people ... within striking distance of Begin.’ Our review of our own case law suggests why Drouin never argues that she can prevail even if no one was closer to Begin than she was. In our 2017 decision in McKenney, we considered the state of the law as it was clearly established as of April 2014, approximately nine months before the events at the heart of this case transpired. . . We determined that ‘well-settled precedents’ addressed ‘the lawfulness of using deadly force against an individual who was suicidal, armed, slow in gait, some distance away from the officer, and had received no commands or warnings for several minutes.’ . . . Of course no two cases are identical. But a case need not be identical to clearly establish a sufficiently specific benchmark against which one may conclude that the law also rejects the use of deadly force in circumstances posing less of an immediate threat. . . We must assume on the record in this case that Drouin knew that Begin was intent on harming himself, that he threatened no one else by word or movement, and that he had not received any warning or order from Drouin. While Begin was closer to Drouin (twenty feet) than McKenney was to the officer who shot him (sixty-nine feet), Begin had a knife while McKenney had a gun. We think that an objectively reasonable officer would regard a knife at twenty feet as posing no greater threat to an armed police officer than does a gun at sixty-nine feet. Nor do the facts here otherwise render Begin more threatening than McKenney. So, given that the law at the time the officer in McKenney fired clearly established that that shooting was unlawful on the plaintiff’s version of the facts, then the facts here -- as we must assume them to be -- also support such a finding.”) Hill v. Walsh, 884 F.3d 16, 19-23 (1st Cir. 2018) (“Because the law on the emergency aid exception to the warrant requirement was not clearly established at the time of the incident, we uphold the district court’s entry of judgment based on qualified immunity. We also take this opportunity to clarify our circuit’s emergency aid doctrine: officers seeking to justify their warrantless entry need only demonstrate “‘an objectively reasonable basis for believing” that “a person within [the house] is in need of immediate aid.”’ . . . They do not need to establish that their belief approximated probable cause that such an emergency existed. We thus modify our previous pronouncements in United States v. Martins, 413 F.3d 139 (1st Cir. 2005), and its progeny. . . . The district court granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment on the ground that they did not violate the Fourth Amendment. We affirm on the basis that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and no claim is stated against the City. . . . Here, the officers allege that they entered 3 Eldridge Street because (1) they received a section 35 warrant of apprehension for Matthew, which was issued by a judge who determined that ‘there [were] reasonable grounds’ to believe Matthew would not appear for his civil commitment hearing, and, importantly, that ‘any further delay in the proceedings would present an immediate danger to [his] physical well-being,’ Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 123, § 35; (2) the warrant stated ‘3 Eldridge Street,’ in its subject line; (3) Officers Henault and Enos thought that they saw a person inside 3 Eldridge Street, whom they believed -- but could not confirm without entry -- was Matthew; and (4) a door to the home was unlocked, and the officers assumed the door would have been secured if the house was unoccupied. There is no clearly established law on point. The Supreme Court has never addressed whether a section 35 warrant -- or any warrant to compel attendance at a civil commitment hearing, for that matter -- is sufficient to justify the police’s warrantless entry into the home pursuant to the emergency aid exception. We have also never had the occasion to consider section 35 warrants in this context. . . The district court also aptly pointed to a second wrinkle: this court's language and the test adopted by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts disagree as to the government's burden of proof under the emergency aid exception. . . . We take this opportunity to clarify our circuit law. In light of the Supreme Court's most recent decision on the emergency aid exception, Michigan v. Fisher, we hold that the government need not show probable cause, only 'an objectively reasonable basis' for believing that a person inside the home is in need of immediate aid . . . in order to effectuate a warrantless entry. This basis need not 'approximate probable cause.' . . . We offer this clarification to bring our case law in line with Supreme Court precedent. The Court's choice of language is instructive. It used 'objectively reasonable basis' for the officers' belief; it did not use the familiar tests of 'reasonable suspicion' or 'probable cause.' At least two of our sister circuits have also so concluded. See United States v. Toussaint, 838 F.3d 503, 508-09 (5th Cir. 2016) (adopting the "objectively reasonable basis" standard); Schreiber v. Moe, 596 F.3d 323, 330 (6th Cir. 2010) (same). . . . The Hills' only rejoinder is that regardless of the contours of the emergency aid exception, it was not 'objectively reasonable' for the officers to believe that Matthew was inside 3 Eldridge Street. They argue that the face of the section 35 warrant clearly indicated that Matthew was 'CURRENTLY AT MORTON HOSPITAL,' a fact the officers would have 'reasonably known' or 'discover [ed],' . . . had any of them read the warrant carefully, or had Officer Henault reviewed the police blotter, or had Officers Marques or Lavoie verified Matthew's location when radioed. But hindsight is twenty-twenty. The officers' actions do not establish that the decision to enter the home was not objectively reasonable at that time. Given Matthew's history of overdosing and resisting the police, the subject line of the warrant (3 Eldridge Street), and the appearance of a person inside the home, a reasonable officer could have reasonably concluded that her entry was lawful pursuant to the emergency aid exception. We cannot say no reasonable officer would have thought the entry constitutional. And where there is reasonable debate about the constitutionality of the officers' actions, there is qualified immunity.") McKenney v. Mangino, 873 F.3d 75, 81-83 (1st Cir. 2017) ("[D]efendants who invoke our limited power of interlocutory review to redress denials of qualified immunity must be prepared to accept the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and 'develop the argument that, even drawing all the inferences as the district court concluded a jury permissibly could, they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law.' . . . In other words, an appellant must explain why he is entitled to qualified immunity even if one assumes that the district court properly analyzed the facts. . . . Here, the defendant concentrates on the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm and faults the district court for failing to identify a sufficiently similar case that would have served to place him on notice that his use of deadly force violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . . In his view, the contours of the relevant Fourth Amendment law were so blurred at the time that he shot McKenney that he is deserving of qualified immunity. We have jurisdiction to consider this purely legal asseveration. . . . Jurisdiction notwithstanding, this argument lacks force. Although the district court frankly acknowledged that it could not find '[a] case presenting a nearly identical alignment of facts,' . . . such an exacting degree of precision is not required to thwart a qualified immunity defense. To be sure, 'the clearly established law' employed in a qualified immunity analysis 'must be particularized to the facts of the case.' . . . This instruction fits hand in glove with the Supreme Court’s warning that, when dealing with qualified immunity, we should not over-rely on precedents that are ‘cast at a high level of generality.’ . . . Even so, there need not be ‘a case directly on point’ to satisfy the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm. . . . The test is whether existing case law has ‘placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . In some cases, ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’ . . . What counts is whether precedents existing at the time of the incident ‘establish the applicable legal rule with sufficient clarity and specificity to put the official on notice that his contemplated course of conduct will violate that rule.’ . . . The Court’s landmark decisions in Graham and Garner, which articulate generalized standards for excessive force liability under the Fourth Amendment, ‘do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.’ . . . But taking the facts and the reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the threat presented lacked immediacy and alternatives short of lethal force remained open. Seen in that light, this was a case in which the feasibility of a more measured approach was apparent. Moreover, the district court did precisely what the Supreme Court has instructed courts to do: it focused on ‘the specific context of the case.’ . . . With that context in mind, it relied on well-settled precedents addressing the lawfulness of using deadly force against an individual who was suicidal, armed, slow in gait, some distance away from the officer, and had received no commands or warnings for several minutes. . . . We conclude, without serious question, that the precedents identified by the district court and those discussed supra gave the defendant fair warning that, if the facts were as the plaintiff claimed them to be, his use of deadly force against McKenney offended clearly established Fourth Amendment law—and an objectively reasonable officer would have realized as much. Therefore, the district court properly concluded that the absence of a precedent on all fours was not dispositive.”)

Morse v. Cloutier, 869 F.3d 16, 27-30 (1st Cir. 2017) (“Given the two determinations we have thus far reached — that the district court’s exigent circumstances assessment is unreviewable at this juncture and that Morse (unlike the suspect in Santana) was not in a public place at the critical time — we hold that the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, make out a violation of a constitutional right. . . . Accordingly, we proceed to the next step of the qualified immunity paradigm and consider whether the applicable law was so clearly established that no reasonable officer would have entered the plaintiffs’ home without a warrant. . . . Payton and its progeny clarify a matter of Fourth Amendment law that Joyce, which relied on the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity paradigm, left unaddressed: namely, the doorway arrest exception recognized in Santana does not apply in a case in which a door was never opened, the person behind the door (screen door though it was) was first observed by law enforcement while he was behind that door, and no exigent circumstances existed. Of greater relevance here, this steadily growing stockpile of precedent makes pellucid that Payton, by 2009, constituted both a firm line and a bright line. Put simply, it constituted clearly established law. That clearly established law was sufficient to give reasonable police officers fair and clear warning that using force to enter the plaintiffs’ home to effectuate Morse’s arrest — without either a warrant or a reasonable basis for believing that exigent circumstances existed — would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. The fact that the Supreme Court has not yet considered the precise factual scenario that the defendants faced does not demand a different conclusion. After all, the Court has recognized that ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning.’ . . . The Court added that ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’ . . . This is such a case. In all events, this case differs in material respects from Joyce. At the very least, those distinctions should have signaled to reasonable officers that their conduct did not fall within the same zone of uncertainty identified in Joyce. . . . The short of it is that the situation that existed when Morse closed the interior door to his home was such that a reasonable police officer, in the absence of exigent circumstances, should have realized that forcibly breaking into the house without any sort of warrant would offend Morse’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure inside his own home. Merely because arrests near doorways may present close calls in some cases does not mean that they present close calls in all cases. Here, the defendants invite us, in effect, to cheapen the currency of Payton and its progeny and to award them qualified immunity. In the circumstances of this case, honoring their request would require us to ‘disregard the overriding respect for the sanctity of the home that has been embedded in our traditions since the origins of the Republic.’ . . . We thus decline the defendants’ invitation. Morse was subjected to a warrantless arrest inside his home, and we agree with the district court that, on this scumbled record, the officers involved in that arrest are not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage.”)

López-Erquicia v. Weyne-Roig, 846 F.3d 480, 484-87 (1st Cir. 2017) (“The preferred approach is to decide the merits question first, reaching the reasonableness question only if the merits question is resolved against the defendant. . . . In this case, though, we face an unusual twist: in her answer to the complaint, Weyne admitted that party affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for López’s position. Hence, the district court deemed the merits question ‘uncontested.’ And on appeal, while protesting that she could not have conceded a point of law, Weyne offers no developed argument for why that is so. Like the district court, then, we also treat the merits question as ‘uncontested.’ This concession nevertheless does little to narrow the scope of our inquiry. To answer the reasonableness question—whether a reasonable official at the time could have understood López’s job to be unprotected—we pretty much have to run through the entire merits analysis anyhow. We do so not to answer the uncontested merits question, but rather to see how close a question it is. Furthermore, the test we apply in assessing the closeness of the question ‘is objective, rather than subjective; we focus on what a reasonable [official] could have believed, not on allegations about what [the official] actually believed.’ . . . Though qualified immunity does not shield ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,’ . . . an official cannot ‘fairly be said to “know” that the law forbade conduct not previously identified as unlawful[.]’ . . . With this twist explained, we turn to examining López’s job to see how a reasonable official could have viewed it. . . . We need not precisely locate López’s AFSI Director position on the spectrum established by the foregoing precedent. Rather, we need determine only whether that precedent ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate,’ Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011), i.e., whether it clearly established the position’s constitutionally protected status. . .

.To be sure, López’s position was not classified as a trust position, and ‘a legislature’s classification system is ... entitled to some deference.’ . . . Nevertheless, our precedent makes clear that ‘[a]ctual functions of the job ... control’ our analysis. . . . Here, those actual functions preclude us from finding that a reasonable official, even one familiar with the law, . . . would have found it clear that López’s position fell inside the First Amendment’s protective ambit. That, in turn, means that Weyne is immune to a federal claim for damages under § 1983, even if the reorganization was targeted at López because of her political affiliation.”)

Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70-73 (1st Cir. 2016) (“The Supreme Court has historically reserved the question of whether the Fourth Amendment standard of objective reasonableness or a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process standard requiring a defendant to have a ‘sufficiently culpable state of mind,’ . . . applies to persons who have been arrested but who are not yet ‘pretrial detainees’ because they have not yet gone before a magistrate judge for a probable cause hearing. . . . At the time of the district court’s decision, other circuits were split over this question. [collecting cases]The First Circuit has not yet answered the question, although some district courts within the First Circuit have applied the majority rule. . . . Since then, the Supreme Court has held that the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee’s Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim is simply objective reasonableness. . . . Since Kingsley has extended the objective reasonableness standard for use of force from the arrest stage through the probable cause hearing, whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment standard applies presents less of a problem in cases like this one than before. In this case, the district court ‘identif[ied] the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force,’ . . . as the Fourth Amendment’s protection against unreasonable seizures. The parties do not challenge that holding, and we have no reason to do so as the alleged use of excessive force here occurred while Officers Pérez and Rivera were transporting Rojas to the police station and then to a jail cell. Given these facts, and given the authority favoring the application of the Fourth Amendment to similar factual scenarios, we apply the Fourth Amendment standard to Rojas’s excessive force claim. . . . Since there is sufficient evidence to make out an excessive force claim, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the first ground. Nor is Officer Pérez entitled to qualified immunity on the ‘clearly established’ ground. The district court stated in a footnote that Defendants may be entitled to qualified immunity because it was unclear in 2007 which constitutional standard governed arrestees’ excessive force claims in the First Circuit. We are not persuaded. The main difference between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force standards prior to Kingsley was whether, in retrospect, we inquire into an officer’s subjective mindset. However, at their core, both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments are concerned with whether an officer’s actions depart from what a reasonable officer would do, and whether those actions serve some legitimate governmental purpose. . . . A reasonable officer faced with the question of what to do with Rojas would have known that using more force than necessary violated both of those standards and therefore a clearly established constitutional rule to use force in the way that the officers here appear to have done. Here, during the entire time period in which the officers are alleged to have applied excessive force to Rojas (i.e., from Rojas’s arrest to his death in the holding cell), Rojas was handcuffed and did not pose a great physical threat to the officers. The record suggests that Rojas initially appeared paranoid, screaming incoherently, and that, while handcuffed, he attempted to resist being transported to the police station and being incarcerated. There is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officers used force that resulted in disproportionately severe injuries to Rojas—e.g., multiple lacerations, contusions, and abrasions throughout his body—and ultimately in his death. We therefore conclude that, regardless of whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment applied after his arrest, a reasonable officer would have known that using force in the way that the officers here appear to have done in the particular factual circumstances that they encountered violated Rojas’s constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.”) Matalon v. Hynnes, 806 F.3d 627, 634-36 (1st Cir. 2015) (“Although we do not decide the question, we assume, favorably to O’Neill, that the community caretaking exception may apply to warrantless residential searches. Even on this favorable assumption, O’Neill’s claim founders. In MacDonald—the case upon which O’Neill primarily relies—local police responded to a telephone call from a person concerned that her neighbor’s door was open though he was not home. . . Unable to contact the resident, the police entered the home and, once inside, found evidence of marijuana cultivation. . . We concluded that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because their entry into the home was arguably within the scope of the community caretaking exception. . . Wrestling from their contextual moorings our statements in MacDonald that the doctrine was ‘nebulous’ and surrounded by ‘rampant uncertainty,’ . . . O’Neill submits that this lack of certitude shields her actions. But this uncertainty does not assist O’Neill’s cause: while the parameters of the community caretaking exception are nebulous in some respects (such as whether the exception applies at all to residential searches), the heartland of the exception is reasonably well defined. Some attempts to invoke the exception plainly fall outside this heartland. This is such a case. As we explain below, a reasonable officer standing in O’Neill’s shoes should have known that her warrantless entry was not within the compass of the community caretaking exception and, thus, that her intrusion into the plaintiff’s home abridged his constitutional rights. . . Here, the record establishes beyond hope of contradiction that O’Neill was engaged in a quintessential criminal investigation activity—the pursuit of a fleeing felon in the immediate aftermath of a robbery—when she ordered the search of the plaintiff’s home. O’Neill testified at trial that she arrived at the plaintiff’s residence after being directed there by a witness to the crime and that she believed the suspect had fled into the dwelling. Thus, her actions fall far beyond the borders of the heartland of the community caretaking exception. . . . In sum, the contours of both the plaintiff’s right to enjoy the sanctity of his home and the heartland of the community caretaking exception were sufficiently clear to alert O’Neill that her plan of action—a warrantless entry—would infringe the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. Put another way, an objectively reasonable officer should have known that a warrantless entry into the plaintiff’s home could not be effected on the basis of the community caretaking exception. Though the precise dimensions of the community caretaking exception are blurred, that circumstance does not mean that every attempt to resort to the exception must be regarded as arguable. . . What matters here is that the exception is sufficiently defined to place O’Neill’s conduct well outside its heartland and, thus, to render qualified immunity inapplicable. . . . We summarize succinctly. In the circumstances of this case—where the officer was indisputably engaged in an ongoing criminal investigation when the warrantless search occurred—the community caretaking exception does not apply. There was no lack of clarity on this point at the time the search took place. Consequently, a reasonable officer in O’Neill’s position should have known that her intrusion into the plaintiff’s home would transgress his constitutional rights. She was, therefore, not entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court appropriately denied O’Neill’s motion for judgment as a matter of law.”)

Morales v. Chadbourne, 793 F.3d 208, 215-17 (1st Cir. 2015) (“It was thus clearly established well before Morales was detained in 2009 that immigration stops and arrests were subject to the same Fourth Amendment requirements that apply to other stops and arrests—reasonable suspicion for a brief stop, and probable cause for any further arrest and detention. Moreover, there could be no question in 2009 that detention authorized by an immigration detainer would require more than just reasonable suspicion. Although the line between an arrest that requires probable cause and a temporary detention for interrogation which does not is not always clear, pre-2009 cases did clearly show that 48 hours of imprisonment—which is what the detainer requests, see 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d)—falls well on the arrest side of the divide. . . . Based on the ‘robust consensus of cases [and] persuasive authority’ discussed above, al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2084, it is beyond debate that an immigration officer in 2009 would need probable cause to arrest and detain individuals for the purpose of investigating their immigration status.”)

[See also Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 400–01 (D.R.I. 2017) (“The fact that there is not a case precisely on point to provide notice that, in order for an officer’s reliance on information in a database to be deemed objectively reasonable, he is obligated to conduct such an electronic search thoroughly, keeping in mind the limitations inherent in such databases does not automatically qualify Agent Donaghy with immunity. . . . A recent United States Supreme Court decision does not change that axiom. Relying on long-standing authority, the Supreme Court ruled last week that ‘[o]f course, “general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning” to officers, but “in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.”’ [citing White v. Pauly] The Court has already determined that Agent Donaghy did not have probable cause to issue the detainer for Ms. Morales. . . . Agent Donaghy turns the focus of his argument on the fact that in 2009, there were no published cases holding that an officer did not have probable cause to issue a detainer after a fruitless search of an electronic database for immigration information. Essentially, he argues that he could not have known in 2009 that he should not have relied on the database. In taking this position, he places the blame on the database itself (and, as to INFACIS, on the state law enforcement officers who maintain it) and argues that it was reasonable for him to rely on the information (or lack thereof) contained in the database. . . . Agent Donaghy is not entitled to qualified immunity because it was not objectively reasonable for him to assume or to draw an inference from the INFACIS database that Ms. Morales was not a citizen because the citizenship field was blank. As for the second database, Agent Donaghy testified that he knew CIS was incomplete and that he knew it was possible that Ms. Morales could have naturalized under her maiden name. Moreover, it was also not reasonable to assume that his failure to find a match in CIS using her married name meant that she was not a citizen. It is undisputed that ICE expected its agents to search by social security numbers when they are available; Agent Donaghy had her social security number and he did not use it to determine Ms. Morales' status. . . . It was most certainly beyond debate in 2009 that an ICE officer should not issue a detainer without probable cause, see Morales II, 793 F.3d at 216–17, and should not conduct an investigation that was so obviously deficient. His act in issuing the detainer without probable cause after a clearly insufficient search was obviously unconstitutional. The cases that Agent Donaghy cites where a court allowed qualified immunity when an officer relied on incorrect, as opposed to incomplete information in a database is [sic] not persuasive. . . . A database search is only successful and its results are only reliable under a probable cause analysis if the information contained in the database is complete and if the search is thorough and based on available identifiers. ICE statistics from 2009 show that Agent Donaghy personally issued 77 detainers, 31 of which were later cancelled and only 2 led to an individual being taken into ICE custody. According to Director Chadbourne, a cancelled detainer indicates that the individual subject to the detainer is either a United States citizen or a lawful permanent resident. In other words, almost 50% of the detainers he issued that year were ultimately erroneous. Agent Donaghy cannot argue that his unlawful behavior would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer. Where an individual's liberty is at stake, a 50/50 success rate is not acceptable. Agent Donaghy's conduct in issuing a detainer on an obviously incomplete investigation was unlawful and that unlawfulness would have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer. . . . He is not entitled to qualified immunity.”) and Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 407–08 (D.R.I. 2017) (“Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable corrections director in May 2009 would not have understood that his conduct violated Ms. Morales’ constitutional rights. In light of that definition, the Court looks at the law and policy in May 2009 to determine whether Director Wall would have been on notice that his conduct in honoring the ICE detainer constituted an unlawful seizure. It is important to note at the outset that even Ms. Morales concedes that RIDOC officials are not equipped or required to make citizenship and/or removability determinations. Her position seems inconsistent with her argument that Director Wall and/or his corrections employees should have independently assessed Ms. Morales’ citizenship both when she was processed initially at the ACI on the state charges and when she returned from court, held solely on the ICE detainer, to somehow ensure that the detention was constitutional. And while the law across the circuits is clear today that the RIDOC was not required to detain Ms. Morales pursuant to the ICE investigatory detainer, it was not so clearly established in 2009 such that Director Wall acted unreasonably in honoring the detainer. See Orellana v. Nobles Cty., No. CV 15–3852 ADM/SER, 230 F.Supp.3d 934, 939–41, 2017 WL 72397, at *4 (D. Minn. Jan. 6, 2017) (legality of ICE detainers has shifted, citing several 2014 court decisions that held a detainer was a mere request rather than a mandatory requirement); Galarza v. Szalczyk, Civil Action No. 10–cv–06815, 2012 WL 1080020 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2012), vacated and remanded by Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014); Rios–Quiroz v. Williamson Cty., TN, No. 3–11–1168, 2012 WL 3945354 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 10, 2012). The Court has previously found, and the First Circuit confirmed, that there could be no question in 2009 that immigration detainers had to be issued based on probable cause. Morales II, 793 F.3d at 211. Therefore, when the State was confronted in 2009 with an ICE-issued detainer, it would have been reasonable for it to assume that ICE had probable cause to issue it.

Director Wall has consistently maintained and the facts established that he believed that RIDOC's long-standing policy of honoring ICE detainers was legal and not capable of violating any individual's constitutional rights. Moreover, in 2009 it was reasonable to assume that honoring the ICE detainer was mandatory. This is especially true here where the language of the detainer itself, citing federal law, stated that it was mandatory. See 8 C.F.R. § 287.7 (section "requires that you detain the alien for a period not to exceed 48 hours ... to provide adequate time for DHS to assume custody of the alien."). Indeed, before 2009, most state and local law enforcement in New England, honored ICE detainers without independently assessing probable cause, and it was ICE's expectation that the states would hold individuals when ICE issued a detainer. . . Therefore, the Court finds that it was reasonable for Director Wall and RIDOC to conclude in 2009 that the ICE detainer it received was valid, supported by probable cause, and mandatory. His 'reasonable, although mistaken, conclusion about the lawfulness of [his] conduct' does not subject him to personal liability. . . . In light of the facts and the law, the Court finds that based on the totality of the circumstances and undisputed facts, Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.""]

Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 5-10 (1st Cir. 2014) ("The issue before us is whether it was clearly established that Gericke was exercising a First Amendment right when she attempted to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. If she was not exercising a First Amendment right, or, on her facts, a reasonable officer could have concluded that she was not, then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . On appeal, the officers argue both that there was no First Amendment right to film law enforcement officers during the late-night traffic stop, when Hanslin had a gun and Kelley faced two cars and four individuals, and that, even if such a right existed, it was not clearly established at the time of the traffic stop in this case. . . .Gericke attempted to videotape Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop of Hanslin. Thus, the threshold question here is whether the occasion of a traffic stop places Gericke's attempted filming outside the constitutionally protected right to film police that we discussed in Glik. It does not. . . .A traffic stop, no matter the additional circumstances, is inescapably a police duty carried out in public. Hence, a traffic stop does not extinguish an individual's right to film. This is not to say, however, that an individual's exercise of the right to film a traffic stop cannot be limited. . . .The circumstances of some traffic stops, particularly when the detained individual is armed, might justify a safety measure—for example, a command that bystanders disperse—that would incidentally impact an individual's exercise of the First Amendment right to film. Such an order, even when directed at a person who is filming, may be appropriate for legitimate safety reasons. However, a police order that is specifically directed at the First Amendment right to film police performing their duties in public may be constitutionally imposed only if the officer can reasonably conclude that the filming itself is interfering, or is about to interfere, with his duties. Glik's admonition that, '[i]n our society, police officers are expected to endure significant burdens caused by citizens' exercise of their First Amendment rights' will bear upon the reasonableness of any order directed at the First Amendment right to film, whether that order is given during a traffic stop or in some other public setting. . . .Importantly, an individual's exercise of her First Amendment right to film police activity carried out in public, including a traffic stop, necessarily remains unfettered unless and until a reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. . . . Such a restriction could take the form of a reasonable, contemporaneous order from a police officer, or a preexisting statute, ordinance, regulation, or other published restriction with a legitimate governmental purpose. Under Gericke’s version of the facts, no such restriction was imposed or in place. . . . According to Gericke, she immediately complied with all police orders: she returned to her car with her camera when Sergeant Kelley asked her to do so, he never ordered her to stop filming, and once she pulled into the parking lot, he never asked her to leave the scene. Therefore, under Gericke’s version of the facts, her right to film remained unfettered, and a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge without probable cause in retaliation for her attempted filming. . . . Gericke’s attempt to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop was unmistakably an attempt to film a law enforcement officer in the discharge of his duties in a public space. Therefore, as the events in Glik occurred well over two years before the events here, Gericke’s right to film the traffic stop was clearly established unless it was reasonably restricted. Under Gericke’s account, no order to leave the area or stop filming was given. Hence, we need not analyze whether a reasonable officer could have believed that the circumstances surrounding this traffic stop allowed him to give such an order. That hypothetical scenario involving a possible restriction on the right to film is irrelevant to this interlocutory appeal. In the absence of a reasonable restriction, it is self-evident, based on first principles, that Gericke’s First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public remained unfettered. . . . Under Gericke’s account, she was permissibly at the site of the police encounter with Hanslin. It would be nonsensical to expect Gericke to refrain from filming when such filming was neither unlawful nor the subject of an officer’s order to stop. In the absence of such restrictions, a reasonable police officer necessarily would have understood that Gericke was exercising a clearly established First Amendment right. . . . Under Gericke’s version of the facts, where there was no police order to stop filming or leave the area, a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge against her because of her attempted filming of Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. It was clearly established at the time of the stop that the First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public, including a traffic stop, remains unfettered if no reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. Accordingly, we hold that the district court properly denied qualified immunity to the officers on Gericke’s section 1983 claim that the wiretapping charge constituted retaliatory prosecution in violation of the First Amendment.”)

[See also Project Veritas Action Fund v. Rollins, 982 F.3d 813, 832-34, 836 (1st Cir. 2020) (“The logic that Glik and Gericke relied on in setting forth that encompassing description of First Amendment-protected recording of police supplies strong support for understanding it to encompass recording even when it is conducted ‘secretly,’ at least as Section 99 uses that term. To understand why, one need only consider the Hyde dissent’s example of the recording of the beating of Rodney King. Like the many recordings of police misconduct that have followed, the recording in the King case was made from a location unlikely to permit it to qualify as recording conducted in ‘plain sight’ of those recorded, just as the dissent in Hyde emphasized. But, as recent events around the nation vividly illustrate, such undetected recording can itself serve ‘a cardinal First Amendment interest in protecting and promoting “the free discussion of governmental affairs,” and ‘not only aids in the uncovering of abuses ... but also may have a salutary effect on the functioning of government more generally.’. In fact, as the Martin Plaintiffs point out, audio recording of that sort can sometimes be a better tool for ‘[g]athering information about’ police officers conducting their official duties in public, and thereby facilitating ‘the free discussion of governmental affairs’ and ‘uncovering ... abuses,’ than open recording is. . . . That is not only because recording undertaken from a distance -- and thus out of plain sight of the person recorded -- will often be the least likely to disrupt the police in carrying out their functions. It is also because recording that is not conducted with the actual knowledge of the police officer -- even if conducted proximate to the person recorded -- may best ensure that it occurs at all, given the allegations that the Martin Plaintiffs set forth about the resistance from official quarters that open recording sometimes generates. In sum, a citizen’s audio recording of on-duty police officers’ treatment of civilians in public spaces while carrying out their official duties, even when conducted without an officer’s knowledge, can constitute newsgathering every bit as much as a credentialed reporter’s after-the-fact efforts to ascertain what had transpired. The circumstances in which such recording could be conducted from a distance or without the officers’ knowledge and serve the very same interest in promoting public awareness of the conduct of law enforcement -- with all the accountability that the provision of such information promotes -- are too numerous to permit the conclusion that recording can be prohibited in all of those situations without attracting any First Amendment review. We thus hold that the Martin Plaintiffs’ proposed recording constitutes a type of newsgathering that falls within the scope of the First Amendment, even though it will be undertaken secretly within the meaning of Section 99. . . . That such recording qualifies as a species of protected newsgathering does not mean that Section 99’s criminal bar against it necessarily violates the First Amendment. We cautioned in Glik that the right to record that was recognized there ‘is not without limitations.’. . . We thus must determine whether the ‘limitations’ that Section 99 imposes on this type of recording -- conducted secretly as it will be -- comport with the First Amendment. Glik had ‘no occasion to explore those limitations’ because the audio recording of the officers at issue there occurred ‘peaceful[ly],’ from a ‘comfortable’ distance, in a ‘public space,’ and in a manner that did ‘not interfere with the police officers’ performance of their duties.’. . . But, although Glik made clear that such peaceable open recording -- which captured an ‘arrest on the Boston Common’ -- was ‘worlds apart’ from the recording of a ‘traffic stop,’. . . Gericke explained that the distinct concerns about public safety and interference with official duties implicated by such a stop did not, without more, ‘extinguish’ the right we recognized in Glik. . . In fact, although Gericke recognized that the circumstances of a given police encounter ‘might justify a safety measure’ that could incidentally constrain citizens’ right to record, it held that ‘a police order that is specifically directed at the First Amendment right to [record] police performing their duties in public may be constitutionally imposed only if the officer can reasonably conclude that the [recording] itself is interfering, or is about to interfere, with his duties.’. Gericke did recognize that the government might choose to regulate such recording in a more general, ex ante manner. But, it concluded that the government would need a ‘legitimate governmental purpose’ to impose a limitation of that sort. . . . Thus, in light of Glik and Gericke, we must decide whether either the Commonwealth’s interest in prohibiting conduct that ‘interfere[s]’ with police officers’ ability to carry out their duties or some other ‘legitimate governmental purpose’ justifies Section 99’s ban on the secret, nonconsensual audio recording of police officers discharging their official duties in public spaces. . . . [W]e conclude that the District Court rightly determined that, even though intermediate scrutiny does not require that a measure be the least restrictive means of achieving the government’s interests, Section 99 is not narrowly tailored to further either of the identified governmental interests -- namely, preventing interference with police activities and protecting individual privacy -- notwithstanding their importance.”)]

Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, 723 F.3d 91, 97 n.7 (1st Cir. 2013) (Hernandez I) (“Though the question of whether the Fourth Amendment provides substantive protection during the pretrial period is a question of first impression in this circuit, it cannot be seriously argued that an objectively reasonable officer in Martz and Taylor’s position would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable. Indeed, we have previously concluded that it is ‘self-evident’ that ‘those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.’ Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44–45 (1st Cir.2004) (concluding that ‘the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967’).”)

Drumgold v. Callahan, 707 F.3d 28, 43 & n.10 (1st Cir. 2013) (“The essence of Callahan’s argument is that the affirmative disclosure obligation Brady imposed on prosecutors in 1963 was not expanded to include law enforcement officers until Kyles was decided in 1995. That is true, so far as it goes. . . . As we have said, though, this case also involves the deliberate suppression aspect of Brady. There can be no doubt that, under the line of cases running from Mooney and Pyle to Brady, the law was firmly settled at the time of Drumgold’s criminal trial that a law enforcement officer may not deliberately suppress material evidence that is favorable to a defendant. . . . Moreover, to the extent that Callahan acted deliberately, a reasonable officer in his position plainly would have appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct. Callahan claims that a reasonable officer would not have recognized the evidence in question as material because Drumgold’s lawyer had not bothered to cross-examine another prosecution witness, Travis Johnson, on the fact that the district attorney’s office paid for his accommodations during the criminal trial. However, Johnson had to travel to Boston from another state to testify, and the benefits he received were tailored to facilitate his appearance at the trial. By contrast, viewed in the light most favorable to Drumgold, see Walden, 596 F.3d at 52, the benefits Evans received had little to do with ensuring his availability to testify or, for that matter, his safety as a cooperating witness. Evans was permitted to remain in the Howard Johnson hotel for eight months, he was free to come and go as he pleased, and no one monitored his whereabouts. A reasonable officer would have discerned the difference between the open-ended benefits Evans received and the far more limited benefits Johnson received. As a result, there is no basis for awarding Callahan judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds. . . . We do not mean to suggest that a law enforcement officer can be liable today in a damages action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 only for deliberately suppressing evidence. Non-disclosure with a less culpable state of mind might suffice. . . . This is a difficult question that has engendered a range of views. [collecting cases] We do not reach this question here. Our holding is limited to the law as it was clearly established in 1989, when Callahan engaged in the conduct at issue here.”)

San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 687 F.3d 465, 499-501 (1st Cir. 2012) (Lipez, J., concurring) (“The qualified immunity inquiry in the context of a procedural due process claim cannot turn on whether it was clear that the circumstances fit the mold of Zinermon rather than Parratt–Hudson. The constitutional violation at issue is the denial of predeprivation process, and to assess the reasonableness of the defendant’s conduct, we logically must focus on the clarity of the law concerning the plaintiff’s entitlement to a hearing. It has been clearly established for more than a half-century that ‘a deprivation of life, liberty, or property [ordinarily must] “be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case.”’ . . . Hence, if we had determined that any of the defendants in this case had violated SGCP’s due process rights by failing to hold a meaningful hearing before suspending their permits, the only basis for qualified immunity should be the defendant’s reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented an ‘extraordinary situation[]’ in which a valid governmental interest justified postponing the hearing until after the challenged action. . . Uncertainty about the applicability of Parratt–Hudson is irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis because the Parratt–Hudson has nothing to do with the rationale for protecting officials from damages liability: to eliminate the risk that, in areas where the law is not clearly established, officials will refrain from independently acting in the public interest for fear of being sued. . . In sum, the qualified immunity doctrine in the procedural due process context must be applied consistently with its purpose to shield well-meaning and reasonable public officials from the burden of damages while holding accountable those officials who ‘exercise power irresponsibly,’ Glik, 655 F.3d at 81. The Parratt–Hudson doctrine itself denies a federal remedy to individuals harmed by the random and unauthorized conduct of state actors; the uncertainty surrounding the doctrine’s scope should not be used to further extend the immunity of rogue state officials. . . . Under standard qualified immunity principles, the only pertinent question when an unconstitutional denial of predeprivation process has occurred is whether the defendant should have known that the Constitution required such predeprivation process.”)

Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 85, 88 (1st Cir. 2011) (“In summary, though not unqualified, a citizen’s right to film government officials, including law enforcement officers, in the discharge of their duties in a public space is a basic, vital, and well-established liberty safeguarded by the First Amendment. Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to the appellants on Glik’s First Amendment claim. . . . Simply put, a straightforward reading of the statute and case law cannot support the suggestion that a recording made with a device known to record audio and held in plain view is ‘secret.’ We thus conclude, on the facts of the complaint, that Glik’s recording was not ‘secret’ within the meaning of Massachusetts’s wiretap statute, and therefore the officers lacked probable cause to arrest him. Accordingly, the complaint makes out a violation of Glik’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The presence of probable cause was not even arguable here. The allegations of the complaint establish that Glik was openly recording the police officers and that they were aware of his surveillance. For the reasons we have discussed, we see no basis in the law for a reasonable officer to conclude that such a conspicuous act of recording was ‘secret’ merely because the officer did not have actual knowledge of whether audio was being recorded. We thus agree with the district court that, at this stage in the litigation, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity from Glik’s Fourth Amendment claim.”) Decotiis v. Whittemore, 635 F.3d 22, 30-38 (1st Cir. 2011) (“At the time of the district court’s order, this Court had not yet had occasion to consider the application of Garcetti, and particularly the question of what it means to speak ‘pursuant to’ one’s employment duties. We recently considered the application of Garcetti in two cases, Foley v. Town of Randolph, 598 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010), and Mercado-Berrios, 611 F.3d 18, both of which inform the analysis. . . . The instant case presents what may be a not uncommon scenario: a public employee who is hired to perform certain specific functions believes her employer is not complying with the law and suggests to constituents a method to exert pressure on the public agency to encourage compliance. The question presented by such a case is: when does the public employee take off her employee hat and put on her citizen hat? . . . Although no one contextual factor is dispositive, we believe several non-exclusive factors, gleaned from the case law, are instructive: whether the employee was commissioned or paid to make the speech in question, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 421; the subject matter of the speech, id. at 421 (citing Givhan v. W. Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410, 414 (1979)); whether the speech was made up the chain of command, see id. at 420; whether the employee spoke at her place of employment, see Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Acad., 492 F.3d 1192, 1205 (10th Cir.2007); whether the speech gave objective observers the impression that the employee represented the employer when she spoke (lending it “official significance”), Foley, 598 F.3d at 7-8 & n.9; whether the employee’s speech derived from special knowledge obtained during the course of her employment, see Williams v. Dallas Ind. Sch. Dist., 480 F.3d 689, 694 (5th Cir.2007); and whether there is a so-called citizen analogue to the speech, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 423. . . . In short, while we cannot conclusively say that Plaintiff’s speech was made as a citizen, the scope of our review on a motion to dismiss does not demand as much; it is sufficient that the complaint alleges facts that plausibly set forth citizen speech. See Sepulveda-Villarini v. Dep’t. of Educ. of P.R., 628 F.3d 25, 30 (1st Cir.2010) (Souter, J.) (“A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss....”). We conclude that Decotiis has surmounted this bar, and therefore the district court’s dismissal for failure to state a claim was in error. . . . At the time of Whittemore’s alleged retaliatory action, the Supreme Court’s decision in Garcetti was the only controlling case in the First Circuit, and even Garcetti stated that its analysis was not to be mistaken for ‘a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee’s duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.’ . . . There were no decisions in this circuit explaining the scope of a public employee’s employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties, nor was there a body of decisions from other circuits that could be said to have put Whittemore on clear notice. Even though the broad constitutional rule, as set forth in Garcetti, may have been clearly established, the contours of the right were still cloudy. . . . Furthermore, though we conclude that Decotiis stated a plausible claim for relief, the district court’s opinion was a well-reasoned exposition reflecting a thoughtful analysis of the law as it existed at the time. This lends support to the conclusion that the state of the law at the time of the alleged constitutional violation was not clear enough in the circuits generally, and in this circuit particularly, to put Whittemore on fair notice that her actions constituted a constitutional deprivation. . . . We therefore hold that regardless of whether Whittemore did in fact violate Plaintiff's First Amendment rights, which is yet to be determined, a reasonable person in Whittemore's position could have believed that she was not violating Decotiis's constitutional rights by not renewing her contract. As such, qualified immunity is available to Whittemore in her individual capacity.")

Mosher v. Nelson, 589 F.3d 488, 495, 496 (1st Cir. 2009) ("For purposes of qualified immunity, we must decide, given the state of the law in 2004, whether a reasonable official in Nelson's position, with his knowledge of the circumstances that existed in Max 2 when Burns killed Mosher, would have understood that the practice of allowing patients to visit in other patients' rooms following morning count presented a substantial risk of serious harm to the patients. The district court concluded that, given the circumstances in Burrell, the law was not clearly established that failure to change the visiting practice would constitute a violation of Mosher's constitutional rights. The district court held that Nelson was entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. No case had held that the same circumstances that occurred at BSH or materially similar circumstances constituted a Fourteenth Amendment violation. In addition, the cases addressing a detainee's right to be free of punishment before conviction did not clearly apply to the circumstances that existed in Max 2 in August of 2004. It was not clearly established law that in the absence of a history of violence or individualized threats, a prison official's failure to discontinue a long practice of a brief period of unsupervised visits was deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to a patient. A reasonable official in Nelson's place, given the circumstances and the legal standard, could have believed that allowing the practice to continue would not lead to events that would violate a patient's rights. Therefore, Nelson is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lopez-Quinones v. Puerto Rico Nat. Guard, 526 F.3d 23, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The crucial question here is whether a reasonable official acting at the time of Lopez' termination should have known on what side of the Elrod/Branti line Lopez' own position fell. . . Largely for prudential reasons, the test is not subjective but asks what a reasonable official would have thought. . . On the present facts, this is a close call but the issue is treated as one of law, . . . and, in disagreement with the able district judge, we believe that as the law stood when the decision was made a reasonable official could (albeit mistakenly) have deemed Lopez outside Elrod/Branti's protection. . . . Those reading our past decisions like Duriex-Gauthier could reasonably have believed that in general, middle managers with impressive sounding titles and duties were generally outside the protected category. . . . Some of our precedents may suggest that even if an official has significant policymaking responsibility, he is still protected unless it is also established that the policy judgments are those for which 'partisan' political motivations or judgments are appropriate [B]y contrast, other language from our case law indicates that involvement in policy or matters implicating political disagreement is sufficient. . . It is conceivable that there are rare cases where the distinction might matter-say, a high official whose duties were nonetheless entirely technical. . . But for the most part policymaking is in the nature of things the basis for preserving the right of the democratic political process to operate; civil service protections can be afforded by statute but the Constitution does not require them. The reference to ‘partisan’ politics comes from Branti but it is far from clear that it comprised a separate test. . . And for his part, plaintiff has not cited any analogous First Circuit cases that would have put defendants on notice of jeopardy. Given past precedent, we cannot say it was clearly established that Lopez, a director of a significant unit within the Puerto Rico National Guard, was insulated from political dismissal. Accordingly, while Lopez may seek injunctive relief for his termination, he may not obtain monetary relief from the individual defendants in their personal capacities.”).

DeMayo v. Nugent, 517 F.3d 11, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 2008) (“The district court essentially mandated that, to avoid dismissal, DeMayo find a case involving a violation of an individual’s constitutional rights under the exact same set of circumstances. The proper inquiry is more abstract: whether Nugent and Lugas were on notice that ‘police officers need either a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances in order to make a lawful entry into a home.’ Kirk v. Louisiana, 536 U.S. 635, 638 (2002); see also Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 590 (1980) (“[T]he Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant.”). In our view, the ‘firm line’ drawn by Kirk and Payton provided Nugent and Lugas with sufficient notice that their entry into DeMayo’s home was in violation of clearly established law. The defendants contend that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is an expanding area of law, the contours of which are not clearly established. The fact that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is evolving, however, does not necessarily mean that every situation implicating the subject touches upon the supposed nebulous borderline of acceptable conduct. Regardless of whether the outer boundaries of the doctrine are clearly defined, the defendants’ conduct fell squarely outside the realm of legitimate uncertainty. . . . As explained above, the record is utterly bereft of specific facts that could have justified the officers’ entry. Thus, without disputing the premise, it is a non sequitur for Nugent and Lugas to argue that because the precise quantum or nature of evidence that gives rise to exigent circumstances is not fully fleshed out in the case law, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Law enforcement officers may not violate constitutional rights, then expect qualified immunity when a court refuses to craft an unprecedented exception to a clearly established rule of law. . . . In this situation, there were no factual ambiguities or close calls that would render the defendants’ conduct objectively reasonable.”).

Jordan v. Carter, 428 F.3d 67, 74-76 (1st Cir. 2005) (“If we simply considered whether the law clearly established that a public employer may not penalize an employee for speech about a matter of public concern, it would be beyond debate that ample legal precedent existed to guide appellant’s conduct. But using such a broad formulation to deny immunity is precisely what we have been told not to do. . . Appellant, however, urges us to award him immunity based on a similarly generic argument. He emphasizes the abundant case law recognizing that it is rare for immunity to be denied when the constitutional right at issue involves weighing various factors. . . Appellant claims that this cannot be the rare case because the complaint depicts disciplinary conduct imposed for a mixture of protected and unprotected speech, a combination that would engender uncertainty in any attempt to balance interests. . . . Although Dirrane also presented an appeal of a motion to dismiss, it provides limited support for appellant's immunity request. We described the complaint there as 'very lengthy,' . . . and we noted allegations detailing the statements that plaintiff made, to whom, and, at least to some extent, their timing. We have none of those particulars here. Appellant could have, but did not, move for a more definite statement. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(e); Educadores Puertorriquenos En Accion v. Hernandez, 367 F.3d 61, 67 (1st Cir.2004). We therefore cannot eliminate the possibility that the facts once developed will show a violation of clearly established law. As we have intimated above, if plaintiffs' criticism consisted of serious expressions of concern, voiced in an appropriate manner, about the effect of their supervisors' poor performance on public safety or other public matters, and appellant's retaliation was primarily aimed at silencing their criticism for his own advantage, precedent would have clearly established that the balance of interests tipped decisively in plaintiffs' favor. Appellant is thus not entitled to immunity based on prong two. . . . In the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, we consider whether an objectively reasonable officer in the defendant's position would have understood his action to violate the plaintiff's rights. . . . At this stage, as we have noted, the record requires us to look upon plaintiffs' speech as significantly involving matters of public concern. Similarly, we must assess and balance the interests of the parties, favoring plaintiffs in our reading of the allegations. And, since appellant concedes that the allegations establish that plaintiffs' speech was the motivating factor for imposing sanctions, the required inquiry leads to but one result. We cannot award immunity to appellant on the basis that a reasonable officer would not have realized the impropriety of his conduct. . . . We are fully aware that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials not only from personal liability but also from the burdens of litigation, see Saucier, 533 U.S. at 200-01, and that immunity is often appropriate in cases involving public employee speech. It is not an automatic entitlement, however, and a court may not cut off a plaintiff's claims based simply on the odds. Here, the record is insufficiently developed to permit a reasoned assessment of either the speech or conduct at issue, and we accordingly must draw all inferences in the plaintiffs' favor. From that perspective, we conclude that the district court properly denied appellant's motion for dismissal of the individual claims based on the defense of qualified immunity. We do not mean to imply any likely outcome as this case further proceeds.") Torres-Rivera v. O'Neill-Cancel, 406 F.3d 43, 54, 55 (1st Cir. 2005) ("O'Neill focuses on the second step in the analysis, and he argues that in August 1998 there was no clearly established duty for officers to intervene in situations of excessive use of force by other officers except those involving an actual arrest or pretrial detention. . . . This argument is simply wrong. Davis and the case law do not distinguish an officer's duty to intervene during an 'investigatory stop' from that during an arrest or pre-trial detention. The Fourth Amendment duty applies here where Ernid was seized. . . . In keeping with these principles, no reasonable officer would have concluded that this stop was outside of these Fourth Amendment obligations. . . . Further, the alternate basis of joint participant liability in the failure to intervene claim against O'Neill was clearly established in 1998. . . . O'Neill does not make any argument that this theory of liability was unclear at the time of the beating. O'Neill is not entitled to qualified immunity because the law was clearly established in 1998 that an officer in O'Neill's circumstances had a duty to intervene.”).

Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 85-88 (1st Cir. 2005) (“Uniquely among the defendant police officers, Trooper McDonald argues that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer (merely a searching officer). Thus, we must ask ‘whether the state of the law at the time of the putative violation afforded [Trooper McDonald] fair warning that his ... conduct was unconstitutional.’ . . . Just as a police officer who seeks an arrest warrant despite the lack of probable cause may not ‘excuse his own default by pointing to the greater incompetence of [a] magistrate’ who erroneously issues a warrant, [citing Malley], a police defendant who acts intentionally or with reckless disregard for the truth may not insulate himself from liability through the objectively reasonable conduct of other officers. . . . Thus, Trooper McDonald’s argument that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone prior to Burke’s arrest because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer is unavailing. However Trooper McDonald chooses to characterize or minimize his role, the summary judgment record establishes that he was centrally involved in the collection of evidence to be used to secure an arrest warrant for Burke. . . . At the time of Burke’s arrest, his constitutional right to be free from arrest pursuant to a warrant that would not have issued if material exculpatory evidence had been provided to the magistrate was clearly established, as was Trooper McDonald’s concomitant constitutional duty of full disclosure of exculpatory information to fellow officers seeking warrants based on probable cause. . . . When viewed in Burke’s favor, the facts in the record reveal that Trooper McDonald knew the DNA analysis had excluded Burke as a suspect on the morning of December 10, but failed to communicate that information to the officers preparing applications for search and arrest warrants despite his awareness of their ongoing preparation and ample opportunity to communicate the newly acquired information. . . . Given the clearly established prohibition on material omissions by officers central to an investigation from an arrest warrant application, and given Trooper McDonald’s knowledge of the crucial facts, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that a reasonable, similarly situated officer would feel free to communicate only inculpatory bite mark evidence to fellow officers seeking warrants on probable cause while withholding his knowledge of directly contradictory DNA results. Accordingly, Trooper McDonald was not entitled to a favorable summary judgment ruling on his qualified immunity defense.”).

Wagner v. City of Mount Holyoke, 404 F.3d 504, 509 (1st Cir. 2005) (“The general right invoked by Wagner—to engage in speech on matters of public concern without retaliation—was clearly established prior to 1994. But qualified immunity requires that the general right be placed in a reasonably specific context; and given the facts surrounding Wagner’s discipline, this is not a case in which reasonable officers, in light of clearly established law, ‘must have known that [they were] acting unconstitutionally.’ . . . To the contrary, Wagner’s broad range of complaints (some consisting of unprotected and antagonistic speech), coupled with his disregard of confidentiality protocols and his disobedience in following the department’s chain of command, would have permitted a reasonable superior officer to believe that he was entitled to discipline Wagner regardless of the content of his speech, consistent with the protections of the first amendment. Even if this reasoning were mistaken, it would not have been egregiously so and, accordingly, qualified immunity is available.”)

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2005) (“We believe an objectively reasonable Massachusetts official could have drawn the conclusion—albeit incorrectly—that a budget-driven layoff effectuated by reference to performance is nonetheless a budget-driven layoff, and thus exempt from the procedural requirements applicable to terminations for cause. Although we have now clarified that due process requires that an employee who holds a property right in his job be given notice and opportunity to respond whenever he is terminated in a ‘person-directed rather than position-directed personnel action[],’ . . . a reasonable official could have taken into account the possibly (and ultimately) temporary nature of Whalen’s termination and the financial crisis that triggered it to conclude that the Loudermill line of cases was not implicated. Certainly, in terms of future employment, a budgetary layoff is likely to have less drastic consequences than a classic termination-for-cause; an official focusing on the “layoff” label and the nature of the harm, against the backdrop of the “reorganization exception,” reasonably may have miscalculated in weighing the competing interests. . . . In sum, because we believe an objectively reasonable official in the defendants’ position would not necessarily have understood that his action violated the plaintiff’s rights, we hold that the district court properly granted qualified immunity to the individual defendants.”).

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 30 (1st Cir. 2005) (Stahl, J., dissenting) (“At the time Whalen was targeted for layoff based on performance-related factors, the law was such that a reasonable officer, when selecting an employee for removal based on such factors, was on notice that such an employee was entitled to due process. The fact that budgetary constraints prompted the officials to evaluate Whalen’s performance is irrelevant—even in this ‘novel factual circumstance[],’ the ‘officials [were] still on notice’ that Whalen was entitled to some form of due process as soon as factors other than seniority were considered in his being selected for removal. . . . In their search through our precedent for a perfect factual match to the facts of this case, my brethren ignore the Supreme Court’s clear direction in Hope v. Pelzer that ‘[a]lthough earlier cases involving ‘fundamentally similar’ facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.’ Id. Indeed, this same error was made by four members of this court sitting en banc in Savard v. Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23 (1st Cir.2003) (en banc) (opinion of Selya, J.), when this Court evenly divided over the propriety of such a search for the perfect precedential match. The proper inquiry is ‘whether the state of the law [at the time of the action] gave [Appellees] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Whalen] was unconstitutional.’ . . . And here, the answer is unequivocally yes.”).

Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 66 (1st Cir. 2004) (“The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether ‘the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear.’ . . . This is too abstract an inquiry, at either the first or the second prong. . . . The proper question is whether an officer on October 21, 1997, should have understood based on prior law that it was unlawful, without a warrant or consent, to take industrial wastewater from underneath a manhole cover on a privately-owned street, but headed irretrievably to a public sewer 300 feet away. . . . The law did not clearly establish any such Fourth Amendment right. We have found no court decisions holding that there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in industrial wastewater on its way to a public sewer. The law goes the other way. . . . The most obvious analogy, as we have noted, is between solid waste left out for the trash collector, for which there is usually no reasonable expectation of privacy, and liquid waste flowing into the public sewer system. . . . Even if Riverdale had a reasonable expectation of privacy in its wastewater at Manhole 1, prior law would not have put an officer on notice that producers of industrial wastewater located underneath a manhole on a private street but headed for a public sewer 300 feet away enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the wastewater. The officers are entitled to immunity on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis as well.” [footnotes omitted]).

Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 46-48(1st Cir. 2004) (“The appellants resist this impressive array of authority on two fronts. First, they accuse the plaintiffs and the district court of having defined the right in question too broadly. In their view, modeling the right as a right to be free from a contrived conviction—a right not to be framed by the government—casts too wide a net. They suggest instead that the plaintiffs’ allegations should be squeezed into a more circumscribed mold and read as setting forth a Brady violation. . . . Having erected this straw man, the appellants then shred it: although Brady was decided prior to 1967, they assert that it was not clearly established then (indeed, it may not be clearly established today) that the duties imposed by Brady apply to law enforcement officers under circumstances in which the prosecutor is unaware of the contrivance. . . . It is certainly true that the manner in which a right is defined can make or break a qualified immunity defense. Courts must be careful not to permit an artful pleader to convert the doctrine of qualified immunity into a hollow safeguard simply by alleging a violation of an exceedingly nebulous right. . . . Courts must be equally careful, however, not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiff’s complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability. Here, the amended complaints, fairly read, are not susceptible to the appellants’ animadversions. The right defined by the plaintiffs and recognized by the district court does not even approach the level of generality thought to be impermissible. . . . Nor does the plaintiffs’ inability to identify a pre-1967 scenario that precisely mirrors the scandalous facts of this case ensure the success of the appellants’ claims of qualified immunity. There is no requirement that the facts of previous cases be materially similar to the facts sub judice in order to trump a qualified immunity defense. . . . General statements of the law are capable of conveying fair warning. . . . It follows logically that, in some situations, ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’. . . We conclude, without serious question, that Mooney and its pre-1967 progeny provided reasonable law enforcement officers fair warning that framing innocent persons would violate the constitutional rights of the falsely accused.”)

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 110 (1st Cir. 2004) (“Given the facts alleged in the complaint, as described in Part I.A. supra, we have no trouble finding that a reasonable official similarly situated to Swift would have known that terminating Mihos for his vote violated his constitutional rights. Taking the allegations in the complaint as true, Mihos exercised his best judgment as to the proper course of action, cast his vote, and was fired in retaliation for that vote for reasons unrelated to legitimate governmental interests. No reasonable public official could have failed to realize that a member of a public instrumentality cannot be terminated on such grounds for voting on matters of public concern within his authority.”).

Fabiano v. Hopkins, 352 F.3d 447, 457, 458 (1st Cir. 2003) (“The nature of Fabiano’s First Amendment claim makes it extremely difficult for him to prove that this right was clearly established at the time his employment was terminated. ‘Because Pickering’s constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The facts of this case do not present the sort of unusual circumstances that would support the finding of a clearly established right notwithstanding Pickering. As we noted supra, there is a very close question as to whether Fabiano’s allegations made out a constitutional claim. Fabiano’s supervisors had, on at least one formal occasion, stated a basis for distrusting his judgment, . . . and were reasonably concerned about the potential conflict of interest (and the appearance of such conflict) that his Zoning Board lawsuit entailed. We cannot say that they knew or should have known that firing Fabiano under these circumstances was unlawful. Accordingly, we conclude that Joyce and Hopkins are entitled to qualified immunity on Fabiano’s First Amendment claims.”).

Acevedo-Garcia v. Monroig, 351 F.3d 547, 563, 564 (1st Cir. 2003) (“Defendants contend that the court erroneously characterized the ‘constitutional right’ at issue as plaintiffs’ right not to be discriminated against on the basis of their political beliefs during the implementation of the layoff plan. They decry the excessive abstractness of this ‘right,’ citing language from the Supreme Court’s decision in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987). . . . It is difficult to divine from defendants’ briefs how they would articulate the right at issue—the pertinent discussion is geared exclusively to demonstrating the absence of any clearly established rule regulating the implementation of seniority-based layoff plans. Of course, this approach commits the Anderson fallacy in reverse by construing the relevant rights/rules with such specificity that the predictably scant jurisprudence on point would never satisfy the ‘clearly established’ threshold. In the end, their argument is unavailing. The clearly established law both in this circuit and beyond precludes government officials from discharging civil or ‘career’ employees for politically-motivated reasons.”).

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Selya, J., joined by Boudin, Lynch, and Howard, JJ.) (“We acknowledge that strip searches are intrusive and degrading (and, therefore, should not be unreservedly available to law enforcement officers). The Roberts decisions exemplify this thinking; they hold unequivocally that the ACI’s policy of strip-searching persons arrested for non-violent, non-drug-related misdemeanors, in the absence of particularized suspicion, violated the Constitution. . . . The questions on which this appeal turns, therefore, involve the second and third branches of the qualified immunity algorithm. We must determine whether the law was clearly established, prior to March 17, 2000, to the effect that prison officials need at least reasonable suspicion before subjecting misdemeanor arrestees to strip searches when introducing them into the general population of a maximum security prison, and whether a reasonable prison official, situated similarly to the defendants, would have understood at that time that the policy in place at the ACI transgressed the Constitution. . . . In conducting our appraisal, we have endeavored to take into account all the decisional law, in and out of our own circuit, that was on the books at the time of the events in question. . . . In the end, we recognize that both Swain and Arruda offer valuable insights, but that neither is a very exact match. While Swain makes clear that strip searches ought not lightly to be indulged, the factual context of the case presented rather minimal security concerns. And while Arruda makes clear that institutional security needs may require intrusive measures in a maximum security setting, that case dealt not with persons arrested for relatively innocuous misdemeanors, but, rather, with hardened criminals. So long as the facts in these cases are distinguishable in a fair way from the facts at hand—and we believe that they are—then neither of them can be said to have clearly established the law for purposes of a qualified immunity determination in the instant case. . . . The plaintiffs . . . go beyond Swain and Arruda in an effort to convince us that reasonable correctional officials should have realized the unconstitutionality of the ACI’s strip search policy prior to March 17, 2000. They point to a line of cases stating that blanket strip searches of misdemeanor arrestees, conducted without particularized suspicion, are unconstitutional. . . . The short of the matter is that, throughout the last quarter of the twentieth century, courts had pursued two divergent lines of precedent. This case, as we said in Roberts II, 239 F.3d at 111, fell along neither axis, but, rather, into the tenebrous middle. We are mindful that there is a distinction for qualified immunity purposes between an unconstitutional but objectively reasonable act and a blatantly unconstitutional act. . . . Here, the lack of any direct precedent and the undulating contours of the law during the relevant period combine to persuade us that the constitutional violation was not obvious; the defendants reasonably could have thought, prior to Roberts I, that there was room in the law for the ACI’s strip search policy. . . . Our brethren suggest that we require an exact match with the facts of previously decided cases before we will deny a defendant the shield of qualified immunity. That is simply not so. What is so is that ‘[t]he meaning of reasonableness [of a search] for Fourth Amendment purposes is highly situational’ and requires ‘a balancing of the need to search against the invasion which the search entails.’ . . . The cases that our brethren cite in an effort to show that reasonable suspicion was clearly established as a condition precedent to a strip search of a person in custody are no more on point than the cases, cited above, that authorize various exceptions to that generality. Given this cacophony of voices, a reasonable prison official, faced with the novel factual situation that confronted those who were in charge of the ACI, had no way of knowing which voice should guide him in drawing the Fourth Amendment balance. It is the absence of clear guidance, not the absence of a perfect precedential match, that makes qualified immunity appropriate here.”).

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 41, 42 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Bownes, J., joined by Coffin, Torruella, and Lipez, JJ.) (“We are deeply troubled by the weight our colleagues give to our statement in Roberts II that institutional security concerns in this case ‘fall somewhere between’ those exhibited in Swain and Arruda. 239 F.3d at 111. Our colleagues describe this statement as an acknowledgment that the ACI’s strip search policy fell into a ‘gray area’ of the law. We respectfully disagree. The Roberts II statement merely recognizes the obvious: that the facts of the present case fall somewhere between those of Swain and Arruda. Such an observation is not surprising. Indeed, most cases will fall somewhere between Swain and Arruda because those two cases represent the opposite ends of the spectrum. Swain was a case involving an arrestee who was placed in a cell in a local police station. In contrast, Arruda involved extraordinarily violent convicted felons who were confined to a special security section of a maximum security prison. What our colleagues have done is to construe a dictum probably intended to soften criticism of the prison officials into a sweeping carte blanche, protecting officials for a wide swath of conduct elsewhere long since forbidden. Placing so much weight on the Roberts II statement runs the risk of creating an impenetrable defense for government officials. Our colleagues’ reliance on the Roberts II statement implies that qualified immunity will only be denied in this circuit when the facts of the case at bar are the same as those in previously decided cases. This risk is compounded by our colleagues’ statement that Swain could not give the defendants fair warning because it is not ‘a very exact match’ to the facts of this case. Such reasoning flouts the Supreme Court’s holding in Hope v. Pelzer In short, they reject Swain as giving ‘clear guidance’ because of factual differences, while claiming allegiance to Hope’s ruling that ‘fundamentally similar’ facts are not necessary. This seems to us an attempt to have it both ways. Our colleagues may well be correct that the strip search policy at issue in this case, and others like it, are ‘dead and buried.’ But their qualified immunity analysis will live on; it will undoubtedly be used in future cases involving other important constitutional rights.”).

Dwan v. City of Boston, 329 F.3d 275, 280-82 (1st Cir. 2003) (“Given the objective circumstances of this case, we see nothing unreasonable about the actions taken by the defendants. It is beyond dispute in this case that unidentified policemen on the scene badly beat a black undercover police officer, mistakenly believing him to have shot another policeman, and it is almost certain that some of the other officers present knew who had done it, denied having knowledge, and supported each other’s stories. The individual defendants, to their credit, were trying to penetrate this familiar wall of silence and bring the wrongdoers to justice. Dwan may or may not have had such knowledge. But what the defendants knew was that he had told a story as to why he did not see what happened, admittedly supported by one of Dwan’s fellow officers but contradicted in substance by two others (who had no obvious motive to lie), and Dwan then declined to testify about the matter before a grand jury without immunity. On this basis, the defendants were perfectly entitled to begin an investigation into whether Dwan’s original claims constituted false reporting and other violations of departmental regulations. Nor was there anything unreasonable in placing him on administrative leave with pay pending this investigation even though this meant he was not eligible for extra duty which would have meant more pay. Administrative leave, for one reasonably suspected of serious misconduct, is a routine measure—here mitigated by continued pay. That Dwan suffered some disadvantage—as does any innocent citizen who is lawfully but mistakenly arrested—does not make it a constitutional violation. . . . Because the individual defendants did not violate Dwan’s Fifth Amendment rights, the first prong of the Saucier inquiry is decisive in their favor. And, as to the second prong, a violation of the Fifth Amendment in these circumstances is not ‘clearly established’ or readily apparent. Whether a Fifth Amendment right exists in the ‘abstract’—as it obviously does—is not the question. . . Thus, there is qualified immunity here even if we are wrong in finding that Dwan’s constitutional rights were not violated.”).

Suboh v. District Attorney’s Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 90, 93, 94 (1st Cir. 2002) (“The district court based its ruling on an abstract right to ‘familial integrity’ inherent in the substantive component of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . There is a danger in the use of broad abstract terms such as ‘familial integrity’. The Supreme Court has warned against using generalized definitions of constitutional rights in the qualified immunity setting. . . . Articulating the right as one of ‘familial integrity’ casts too broad a net. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . The constitutional right at issue here is the right to procedural and substantive due process before the state takes a child away from his or her parent. . . . One tried and true way of determining whether this right was clearly established at the time the defendants acted, is to ask whether existing case law gave the defendants fair warning that their conduct violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. . . This inquiry encompasses not only Supreme Court precedent, but all available case law. . . A parent’s liberty interest in the care and custody of her child was established long before the facts of this case arose. . . . We have no doubt that there is a clearly established constitutional right at stake, although we have found no case exactly on all fours with the facts of this case. The difference in contexts in which the right is discussed in the case law does not mean such a right does not exist.”).

Hatch v. Dep’t for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, 21-25 (1st Cir. 2001) (“The Court has not had occasion to formulate the contours of the constitutional rule under which a state official lawfully may take temporary custody of a child during an investigation of abuse or neglect, nor has this court dealt definitively with the issue. Other courts have grappled with it, however, and most of them have concluded that a case worker—we use that term generically—may place a child in temporary custody when he has evidence giving rise to a reasonable and articulable suspicion that the child has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse. . . . We hold . . . that the Constitution allows a case worker to take temporary custody of a child, without a hearing, when the case worker has a reasonable suspicion that child abuse has occurred (or, alternatively, that a threat of abuse is imminent). It follows, therefore, that a parent’s right to the care, custody, and control of a minor child is inviolate unless a case worker has such a suspicion. In this instance, the appellant’s complaint (though it unsuccessfully espouses a broader statement) sufficiently identifies this clearly established constitutional right. Thus, the appellant satisfies the first prong of the tripartite test. . . . We now must determine whether the contours of the constitutional right that we have identified—a parent’s right to custody in the absence of a case worker’s reasonable suspicion of child abuse—were clearly established at the time of the critical events. . . . The appellant contends that the right here was sufficiently defined at the time of Brown’s actions. Brown disagrees, maintaining that our previous decisions, e.g., Watterson, 987 F.2d at 8; Frazier, 957 F.2d at 930-31, highlight the amorphous nature of the constitutional interest involved and thus compel the conclusion that the contours of the right were not clearly established. The critical inquiry here is whether the dimensions of the right were sufficiently well-defined that a reasonable official would have understood that his actions violated that right. . . . This does not mean that a court must already have outlawed similar conduct; the test is satisfied if, viewed in the light of preexisting jurisprudence, the unlawfulness of the conduct is apparent. . . . To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law. . . . Several years elapsed between the dates on which Frazier and Watterson were decided and the date on which Brown took temporary custody of the appellant’s son. During that interval, an emerging body of decisional law outside our own circuit has shed a brighter light on the contours of the constitutional right asserted by the appellant. Although our sister circuits have reached different conclusions on the constitutional standard to be applied when a state actor takes a child into temporary custody, those decisions share a common denominator: at an irreducible minimum, a case worker must have no less than a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (or imminent danger of abuse) before taking a child into custody prior to a hearing. . . . Recent district court decisions have hewed to the same line. . . . Given the widespread agreement that has developed as to the applicable legal regime, we conclude that, in the spring of 2000, an objectively reasonable case worker surely would have believed that taking temporary custody of a child prior to a hearing would violate the parents’ interest in the child’s care, custody, and control if he acted without a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (actual or imminent). That conclusion has important implications for this case: since clearly established law gave reasonable warning to Brown that he risked liability for violating the appellant’s constitutional rights if he took custody of John without a reasonable basis for his suspicions of child abuse, the appellant has survived the second step of our inquiry. . . . While the first two steps in the qualified immunity pavane deal with abstract legal principles, the final step deals with the facts of the particular case. The question here is whether Brown had reliable information, sufficient to support a reasonable suspicion of abuse, when he removed John from his father’s custody. . . . We hold that the information known to Brown when he took temporary custody of John met both the qualitative and quantitative requirements of the reasonable suspicion standard. . . . Consequently, the appellant falters at the third step of the qualified immunity inquiry.”).

Davis v. Rennie, 264 F.3d 86, 114 (1st Cir. 2001) (“The question is whether it would be clear to a reasonable supervising nurse or mental health worker who saw another MHW use excessive force against a patient that he or she had a legal duty to intervene. . . . The cases involving police and prison guards clearly established at least the same duty for mental hospital staff at a state institution. . . . Nurse Wieggers’s argument that she had no duty to intervene because Plesh, a security officer, was also present draws too fine a distinction between the facts here and existing case law. [citing Lanier] As we have said, Nurse Wieggers could have tried to stop Bragg by calling out rather than physically intervening. As Bragg's supervisor, she had the responsibility to do so, and it is reasonable to expect her to have known that.").

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) ("To determine a defendant's eligibility for qualified immunity, courts must define the right asserted by the plaintiff at an appropriate level of generality and ask whether, so characterized, that right was clearly established when the harm-inducing conduct allegedly took place. . . This does not mean that a right is clearly established only if there is precedent of considerable factual similarity. . . It does mean, however, that the law must have defined the right in a quite specific manner, and that the announcement of the rule establishing the right must have been unambiguous and widespread, such that the unlawfulness of particular conduct will be apparent ex ante to reasonable public officials.").

Rivera-Ramos v. Roman, 156 F.3d 276, 279-81 (1st Cir. 1998) ("This court has made it crystal clear, on a number of occasions, that identifying some abstract constitutional right extant at the time of the alleged violation does not itself show that the conduct alleged is a violation of 'clearly established' law. Instead, the focus must be upon the particular conduct engaged in by (or attributed to) the defendants; immunity is forfeited only if a reasonable official would clearly understand that conduct to be a violation of the Constitution. The need to focus on specific facts is so well-settled that the issue need not be discussed further. . . The closest First Amendment precedents are Supreme Court cases, circa the 1960s, that involved government action taken against individuals because of their supposed radical political beliefs or associations. These cases involve employment as a school teacher or state-university faculty member, admission to the bar, and even nonsensitive work in a defense plant. These cases provide general language helpful to the plaintiffs, but none of them involves constitutional standards for the denial or revocation of a gun dealer license. Assuming that police officer defendants 'caused' the license revocation or weapons seizure, the Supreme Court cases as of 1969-70 clearly forbade such action based on anyone's general beliefs that Puerto Rico should have independence, or on their membership in organizations devoted to securing such independence by peaceful means. Conversely, we do not think that it would have been a violation of 'clearly established law' for police officers to have sought to deny or revoke a firearms dealer license to individuals who had expressed a commitment to violence and who were members of an organization that was reasonably perceived to be committed to violence. . . In sum, we conclude that the district court's denial of qualified immunity rested upon a mistakenly abstract view of what is clearly established law and that the case must be remanded for further consideration of the qualified immunity issue consistent with this opinion.").

Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 5, 6 (1st Cir. 1998) ("We have not had occasion to address the question whether, to be liable under section 1983, a supervisor must have violated an independent, 'clearly established' right, or whether a supervisor may be liable based only on his proximity to a subordinate's violation of a 'clearly established' right. Other circuits, however, have addressed this interplay between the 'clearly established' requirement and supervisory liability. We follow their lead and adopt an approach that comports with the core principle of qualified immunity by protecting supervisory officials from suit when they could not reasonably anticipate liability. When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a section 1983 action, the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate’s actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. . . . In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated ‘clearly established’ inquiry—one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor’s potential liability.”).

See also Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *8-9 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) (“When a plaintiff seeks to hold liable a defendant based on his supervisory role over others who allegedly violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights, the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate’s actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated ‘clearly established’ inquiry—one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor’s potential liability. . . . As to the first step of the ‘clearly established’ inquiry, the violations of Gallagher’s subordinates—CPS and the Bristol County Sheriff’s Office defendants—were violations of clearly established constitutional rights. Doan’s right to be free from involuntary medication—implicated by the allegations that CPS defendants gave Doan Haldol even though she was incapable of giving informed consent and they did not have a court order to do so, . . . was clearly established, as the Supreme Court has stated that prisoners ‘possess[] a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs.’. . . Doan’s right to be free from harm—implicated by Gallagher’s failure to protect Doan from the involuntary medication of Haldol—was also clearly established in Supreme Court case law. . . . As to the second step of the analysis, it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for the violations of his subordinates in this context, where Gallagher was alleged to have known about the constitutional violations. A supervisor can be liable for the actions of his subordinates if he or she ‘is on notice’ to ‘ongoing violations’ and ‘fails to take corrective action.’. . . Here, Doan has alleged that Gallagher was aware of the ongoing constitutional violations that she was suffering, had the power to alleviate those violations by relocating Doan, but failed to take corrective action. Gallagher relies on cases from other circuits holding that non-medical jail or prison officials such as Gallagher are entitled to rely on the expertise of medical personnel. See Arnett v. Webster, 658 F.3d 742, 755 (7th Cir. 2011) (stating that “if a prisoner is under the care of medical experts, a non-medical prison official will generally be justified in believing that the prisoner is in capable hands”); Spruill v. Gillis, 372 F.3d 218, 236 (3d Cir. 2004) (same). However, ‘non-medical officials can be chargeable with ... deliberate indifference where they have a reason to believe (or actual knowledge) that prison doctors or their assistants are mistreating (or not treating) a prisoner.’ Arnett, 658 F.3d at 755. This is what Doan alleges; that Gallagher knew that CPS was involuntarily medicating Doan and failed to take any corrective action. Accordingly, Gallagher is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.”)

Roldan-Plumey v. Cerezo-Suarez, 115 F.3d 58, 65, 66 (1st Cir. 1997) (“In earlier political discrimination cases, we found defendants entitled to qualified immunity because their allegedly unconstitutional actions took place prior to the development of clearly established law in this area. [cites omitted] This case is different. Appellees discharged Roldan on May 6, 1994. The contours of the law regarding discharge based on party affiliation grew much clearer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. By 1993, this circuit had decided two waves of political discrimination cases. At the time appellees discharged Roldan, this circuit’s law regarding discharge based on political discrimination was indeed clearly established. To be sure, the law may still be blurred around the edges. But this is not a borderline case. In determining entitlement to the qualified immunity defense in the political discrimination context, we look only to the inherent duties of a position and ask whether the defendant could reasonably believe the position in question was one that “‘potentially concerned matters of partisan political interest and involved at least a modicum of policymaking responsibility, access to confidential information, or official communication.’””).

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 22 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (per curiam) (“The Supreme Court cases, with Steagald at one pole and Santana at the other, do not definitively resolve our own case. Even a quick review of lower court cases reveals that there is no settled answer as to the constitutionality of doorway arrests. [citing cases] Circuit court precedent is also divided, with some decisions helpful to the police in this case and others less so. Given the unsettled state of the law, we have no hesitation in concluding that the officers in this case are protected by qualified immunity which protects public officials against section 1983 liability so long as they acted reasonably.”).

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 26 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (Seyla, J., dissenting) (“In sum, I believe that the officers’ entry into a third party’s home in the absence of consent, a search warrant, or exigent circumstances plainly violated Steagald and thus violated the homeowner’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. [cite omitted] By hedging on this point, the en banc court not only denies the plaintiff her day in court but also invites the proliferation of such incidents. Since we will be seen as sanctioning that which we are unwilling to condemn, I respectfully dissent.”).

Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056, 1065 (1st Cir. 1997) (“While this history would appear to militate in favor of finding that there is clearly established law in this area, in 1991 the First Circuit had not yet addressed the issue of state-created dangers. . . . Of course, a violation of clearly settled law may be found even where the Supreme Court and the circuit in question have not specifically addressed the question. . . . However, we cannot extract a clearly established right from a somewhat confusing body of caselaw through the use of hindsight, or ‘permit claims of qualified immunity to turn on the eventual outcome of a hitherto problematic constitutional analysis.’” citing Martinez-Rodriguez).

St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 70 F.3d 20, 27-28 (1st Cir. 1995) (“Plaintiff contends that in executing a search warrant, the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against ‘unreasonable searches’ requires the police to identify themselves as police and state their purpose. . . . It falls to the court to determine whether this right allegedly violated was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incident. . . . Plaintiff relies on the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Wilson v. Arkansas, 115 S.Ct. 1914 (1995), which held that the reasonableness of the search of a dwelling depended in part on whether law enforcement officers announced their presence and authority prior to entering, thus incorporating the common law ‘knock and announce’ rule into the Fourth Amendment. Assuming arguendo that the Wilson rule supports plaintiff’s case, [footnote omitted] plaintiff’s argument succeeds only if Wilson merely restated what was already clearly established constitutional law at the time of the shooting in 1990. . . . Plaintiff’s argument fails because at the time of the shooting the notice requirement was not clearly of constitutional dimension.”).

Martinez-Rodriguez v. Colon-Pizarro, 54 F.3d 980, 988 (1st Cir. 1995) (“When used in [qualified immunity] context, the phrase ‘clearly established’ has a well-defined meaning. It denotes that at the time the challenged conduct occurred the contours of the right were sufficiently plain that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized not merely that his conduct might be wrong, but that it violated a particular constitutional right. The inquiry into the nature of a constitutional right for the purpose of ascertaining clear establishment seeks to discover whether the right was reasonably well settled at the time of the challenged conduct and whether the manner in which the right related to the conduct was apparent. In mounting this inquiry, courts may neither require that state actors faultlessly anticipate the future trajectory of the law. . . nor permit claims of qualified immunity to turn on the eventual outcome of . . . problematic constitutional analysis.”)

McClintock v. Pollawit, No. 3:24-CV-30039-KAR, 2025 WL 928781, at *6 (D. Mass. Mar. 27, 2025) (“In the interests of judicial economy, the court proceeds directly to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. In disregarding Defendant’s qualified immunity argument, Plaintiff fails to meet his heavy burden of demonstrating that the Fourth Amendment right he advances, i.e., the right not to be arrested for unlawful possession of CBD gummies absent testing proving that they had a concentration of Delta-9 THC greater than 0.3% of the product’s dry weight, was ‘clearly established’ at the time of his arrest. Plaintiff neither identifies ‘controlling authority’ nor a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ – and the court has found neither – sufficient to send a ‘clear signal’ to Defendant that arresting Plaintiff for possessing marijuana in violation of the Federal and Massachusetts commercial vehicle regulations was unlawful based on the sheer possibility that the CBD gummies could contain a concentration of Delta-9 THC less than or equal to 0.3% their dry weight. . . Plaintiff also fails to show that ‘an objectively reasonable official in the defendant’s position would have known that his conduct violated that rule of law.’. . To the contrary, an objectively reasonable police officer in Defendant’s position would have believed that he had the authority to arrest Plaintiff for a probable violation of the federal and Massachusetts regulations at issue to enforce the law and protect the public from a commercial truck driver who might become impaired by a controlled substance that was in his possession while driving. . . A reasonable official in Defendant’s position would not have known that he might violate Plaintiff’s constitutional right by arresting him before determining the percentage of Delta-9 THC in the CBD gummies, something that he likely could not have done without laboratory testing. . . Thus, the court is unable to conclude that every reasonable law enforcement officer in Defendant's position would have understood that what he was doing violated Plaintiff's rights. . . Defendant is entitled on qualified immunity grounds to dismissal of Plaintiff's claim that his warrantless arrest violated his Fourth Amendment rights.")

Hayes v. Town of Dalton, No. 3:21-CV-30055-KAR, 2025 WL 918684, at *12–15 & n.4 (D. Mass. Mar. 25, 2025) ("Circuit courts, including the First Circuit, have long held that a plaintiff states an equal protection claim when she alleges that a police department has a policy or practice of providing less protection to victims of domestic abuse than to other assault victims for discriminatory reasons. . . . Cases decided by courts in other circuits have further discussed and defined the essential elements of class of one equal protection claims when a plaintiff alleges that they received unequal protection or were the target of unequal law enforcement for reasons that lacked a rational basis and were for improper reasons unrelated to the duties of the defendant law enforcement officer. [fn. 4: The court acknowledges that Plaintiff cited little of this authority in support of her argument against qualified immunity. 'This is of no matter, however, as, "[i]n conducting a qualified immunity analysis, a court should 'use its full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.'"] In arguing for qualified immunity, Marley relies on Sargent v. Town of Hudson, Civil No. 14-cv-509-AJ, 2017 WL 4355972 (D.N.H. Sept. 27, 2017), in which the court held that it was not clearly established in 2011 that police officers could provide less protection to a victim of domestic violence due to her abuser's relationship with law enforcement than they would to other victims of domestic violence. . . This court respectfully disagrees. As the judge in Sargent acknowledged, '[t]here is a long line of Supreme Court and First Circuit precedent recognizing class-of-one claims challenging certain types of governmental action.' . . Controlling precedent in the First Circuit established in 1997 that a victim of domestic violence stated a claim for violation of her constitutional right to equal protection when she produced sufficient evidence to show that a police force had a custom or policy of providing less protection to female victims of domestic violence than to other assault victims. Soto, 103 F.3d at 1066 (citing Watson, 857 F.2d at 694). Relying on the same precedent on which the First Circuit relied in deciding Soto, the Tenth Circuit held in Dalton that, by 2016, it was clearly established that it was a violation of the constitutional right to equal protection to deny protective services to an individual whose domestic partner was a police officer. . . This is what Plaintiff asserts Marley did. . . In Soto and similar cases in other jurisdictions, courts have held that police officers could not selectively withhold protective services because of invidious discrimination based on the race, gender, or religion of the individual seeking protection. . . . The cases discussed above do not present factual scenarios that are identical to the scenario that is the basis of Plaintiff's claims. However, 'identity is not required.' . . . The cases provide, as a general statement of law, that law enforcement officers may not treat similarly situated individuals differently when there is no rational basis for the different treatment and where such different treatment is motivated by an invidious purpose unrelated to the duties of the officer. . . Marley, as a DPD officer, was presented with credible and uncontradicted information from two knowledgeable sources that Sherilyn's life was at risk by suicide. Hamilton told Marley that Sherilyn had not responded to attempts to reach her. A jury could find, based on the conversation between Marley and Hamilton, that Marley knew he was required by DPD guidelines to respond to Sherilyn's apartment unless he could persuade Hamilton to withdraw the request for protective services, and that he worked to persuade Hamilton to withdraw his request for services so as to protect Nutting at Sherilyn’s expense. . . . Assuming Marley did so, ‘a reasonable [law enforcement officer] would understand that the described conduct would violate [Sherilyn’s] constitutional rights.’”)

Daly v. Mason, 752 F.Supp.3d 346, ____ (D. Mass. 2024) (“Plaintiff points to Lane, highlighting that the Supreme Court held that ‘a public employee who provides truthful sworn testimony, compelled by subpoena ... is speech as a citizen on a matter of public concern.’ . . The Court finds Lane to be persuasive here. While the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity to the defendant in Lane because the ‘question was not “beyond debate” at the time [the Defendant] acted,’ the Court set new precedent in finding that truthful sworn testimony by public employees outside of the scope of their typical job duties is speech eligible for First Amendment protection. . . Therefore, Defendants were reasonably on notice that ‘the challenged conduct is illegal in the particular circumstances.’ . . As Plaintiff successfully spotlighted controlling authority that existed at the time of the alleged violation, he satisfies his burden in demonstrating the ‘clearly established’ standard. Thus, the Court finds that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Conlon v. City of Newton, No. CV 23-10026-FDS, 2024 WL 3090453, at *10 (D. Mass. June 21, 2024) (“There are myriad factual questions surrounding the critical moments before the shooting, many of which are not alleged in the complaint. It does not, for example, explain how rapidly Conlon approached, or whether he held the knife as if to strike Chisholm, or whether the officers took any other intervening actions. That lack of specificity poses a challenge for both parties in the context of qualified immunity. On the one hand, without clearly articulated facts it is difficult to evaluate the objective circumstances that faced officers at the scene. On the other, a lack of specificity can thwart plaintiffs’ efforts to show that a specific right was clearly established at the time of the incident. Even so, the Supreme Court has directed courts to resolve immunity questions at the earliest possible stage of litigation. . . Accordingly, the Court will proceed to consider whether, as pleaded, the factual circumstances presented in the complaint support a viable claim. . . Here, whether the officers’ use of deadly force was objectively reasonable is a close question. At the moment of the shooting, an officer at the scene could reasonably believe that Conlon posed a threat to Chisholm—he had escalated the situation by rearming himself with a knife in response to an attempt to subdue him and was approaching Chisholm from twelve feet away. . . Both Scaltreto and Benes concluded that deadly force was required ‘almost simultaneously.’ . . While the specific circumstances of the suspected armed robbery are unclear, an officer at the scene would at least have had reasonable cause to believe that Conlon had threatened someone with the knife. . . The complaint does not indicate whether a warning was given before the fatal shots were fired, or how much time elapsed between the attempted use of the less-than-lethal shotgun and the shooting itself. Overall, the factual circumstances would suggest that the officers’ use of deadly force was likely objectively reasonable. However, considering the limited record, the Court will not make a conclusive determination as to that issue. Instead, it will proceed to consider whether, at the time of the incident, the state of the law was sufficiently established to put a reasonable officer on notice that using deadly force under those circumstances would amount to a constitutional violation. It was not. Plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden to show any authority—controlling or otherwise—that would support finding a constitutional violation when officers use deadly force in response to an advancing suspect in a mental-health emergency who is armed with a knife. Indeed, several controlling authorities appear to establish the reverse. . . . Although the factual allegations contained in the complaint here are obviously not identical to either of those cases [Kisela and Estate of Rahim], their holdings at least illustrate that the existing precedent at the time of the shooting in January 2021 did not put the constitutional question facing Benes and Scaltreto ‘beyond debate.’. . . Accordingly, they are entitled to qualified immunity for their use of force.”)

Wright v. Moniz, No. CV 21-10137, 2024 WL 3023558, at *9–12 (D. Mass. June 17, 2024) (“[A] jury could reasonably find that Defendants violated Wright’s procedural due process rights by failing to provide him with an adequate opportunity to be heard regarding his classification. So, the critical question is whether Wright’s procedural rights were ‘clearly established’ as of October 12, 2017, the starting point of the limitations period. Defendants argue they ‘reasonably could have believed that the process [Wright] received protected his procedural due process rights.’. . . In support, Defendants contend Moniz implemented Plymouth’s policy (PCCF 421) governing periodic review for those in AdSeg and complied with the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court’s decision in LaChance v. Comm’r of Corr., 463 Mass. 767, 978 N.E.2d 1199, 1201 (2012) (holding that the inmate’s ten-month administrative segregation in the special management unit on awaiting action status, ‘during which he had the benefit of only informal status reviews,’ was unlawful). But PCCF 421 allows for an inmate to ‘offer a verbal or written statement’ at his hearing ‘and/or submit documentation to contest the rationale for his placement in administrative segregation.’. . . Likewise, in LaChance, the Supreme Judicial Court held that the federal and state Due Process Clauses require prison officials to provide an inmate confined to administrative segregation, among other things, a ‘hearing at which he may contest the asserted rationale for his confinement.’. . . and LaChance unambiguously require[s] that an inmate in solitary confinement have an opportunity to be heard. Most importantly, the Supreme Court has long held that the Due Process Clause requires a person placed in solitary confinement to receive at least notice and an ‘opportunity to present his views to the prison official charged with deciding whether to transfer him’ there. . . . The touchstone of this right is the ‘fair opportunity for rebuttal’ of the prison decisionmaker’s rationale. . . . A reasonable jury could find that Wright’s right to receive a ‘fair opportunity for rebuttal’ was clearly established, and that Defendants violated that right by never allowing him to participate in his hearings. . . . Accordingly, Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity on the procedural due process claim. Their motion is denied as to Wright’s timely procedural due process claims but is allowed as to those arising prior to October 12, 2017, which are barred by the statute of limitations.”)

Wright v. Moniz, No. CV 21-10137, 2024 WL 3023558, at *11-12 (D. Mass. June 17, 2024) (“A reasonable jury could find that between April 21, 2017, when Wright asked to be removed from AdSeg and placed in a non-camera cell, and October 18, 2017, when he was convicted, Wright’s continued solitary confinement exceeded any real security risk and constituted punishment in the constitutional sense. However, Defendants argue qualified immunity protects them from liability. To overcome qualified immunity, Wright must show “(1) [Defendants] violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was ‘clearly established at the time.’ . . . Having found that a reasonable jury could conclude Defendants violated Wright’s substantive due process right, the Court asks if that right was ‘clearly established’ as of April 21, 2017. For a right to be clearly established, the law must make ‘the contours of the right’ clear enough that ‘under the specific facts of the case, a reasonable defendant would have understood that he was violating the right.’ . . . A plaintiff can show a right was established ‘when it is dictated by controlling authority or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority,’ which ‘does not require the express agreement of every circuit and can be established by sister circuit law.’ . . . The Supreme Court has held since 1979 -- and the First Circuit has affirmed repeatedly -- that prison officials cannot impose a condition of confinement on a pretrial detainee with the intent to punish him, no matter how serious the alleged crimes. . . . Moreover, the First Circuit and other circuits have held that keeping a pretrial detainee in administrative segregation for comparable or even smaller amounts of time amounted to punishment. [collecting cases] But neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit has squarely held that assigning a high-profile terrorism suspect to solitary confinement in order to protect him violates his substantive due process rights. After all, even a model inmate can be attacked while awaiting trial where knowledge of the terrorism charges is widespread in the prison. Absent a showing of expressly punitive intent, other circuits have ‘upheld the placement of pretrial detainees in Administrative Segregation ... for purposes of the detainees’ protection.’ [citing cases] Wright can point to no Supreme Court or First Circuit caselaw indicating that as of 2017, a reasonable prison official would know that keeping him in prolonged solitary confinement in a camera cell for his protection was so excessive as to violate his substantive due process rights. Thus, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and their motion for summary judgment is allowed as to Wright’s substantive due process claims.”)

Doe v. University of Massachusetts, No. CV 23-12077-WGY, 2024 WL 1521758, at *9 (D. Mass. Apr. 9, 2024) (“Turning to the second prong, it is not clearly established that every reasonable state official would know that their conduct in finding a violation of the Student Conduct Code was a violation of Doe’s constitutional rights under the First Amendment. In fact, in the absence of First Circuit precedent, there is persuasive recent Eighth Circuit authority contrary to Doe’s position on this issue. See Rowles v. Curators of U. of Missouri, 983 F.3d 345, 357 (8th Cir. 2020) (“We agree with the district court that ... [the individual defendants] are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because [plaintiff] cannot show that he was deprived of a clearly established constitutional right.... It was reasonable for [the individual defendants] to conclude that it was permissible under the First Amendment to punish Rowles for violating the University’s policies against harassment and stalking.”). Here, Doe’s claims of clearly established constitutional rights are asserted at too general a level. Rather, Doe cites cases that are not directly in point and do not address the circumstances presented here. Doe fails to meet his high burden. The Individual Defendants are also entitled to qualified immunity because, as the Court determines below, there was no violation of a constitutional right. Accordingly, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for monetary damages under Section 1983 on this prong.”)

Estate of Miller, by & through Miller v. Roycroft, No. 21-CV-10738-AK, 2024 WL 1416066, at *13 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2024) (“[F]or purposes of this motion, the Court finds that a reasonable officer would have been aware that subduing an unarmed and mentally unstable individual with compressive body weight who stated he could not breathe would violate that person’s clearly established right to be free from excessive force. Thus, Roycroft is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Smith v. Daou, No. 21-CV-12056-DJC, 2024 WL 911733, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 4, 2024) (“The law underlying Smith’s failure-to-protect claim was clear at the time of the alleged misconduct. For instance, in Youngberg, . . . decided in 1982, the Supreme Court recognized ‘for the first time the substantive rights of involuntarily committed [developmentally disabled] persons under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution.’ As previously discussed, under Youngberg, substantive due process is violated where the ‘decision by the professional is such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment.’ . . . The First Circuit has recognized that the application of Youngberg is premised on the institutional setting, rather than the identity of the person. . . . Even assuming arguendo that the law under Youngberg was not clear at the time of the alleged misconduct, the law surrounding failure-to-protect claims under Farmer is well established. . . . to sustain an Eighth Amendment claim, as discussed above, there is ample guidance from other federal circuit courts, including the First Circuit, acknowledging the possibility of extreme cases where threats of violence resulting in psychological harm may be actionable. . . . Turning to the facts of this particular case, the Court is unable to determine at this stage ‘whether a reasonable defendant would have understood that his conduct violated [Smith’s] constitutional rights’ under Youngberg and Farmer. The application of either constitutional standard in this case would require the Court to resolve factual questions best left for the summary judgment stage. . . . In light of this undeveloped record, and accepting the truth of Smith’s allegations, the Court cannot determine whether the Commonwealth Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and, thus, declines to dismiss the amended complaint on such grounds.”)

Marrero v. City of Brockton, 710 F.Supp.3d 83, 89-90 (D. Mass. 2024) (“[I]t is premature to determine whether the right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the defendant’s alleged violation. While in Lewis, decided in 1998, the Supreme Court determined that the facts presented did not constitute a violation of the plaintiff’s substantive due process rights, it did recognize the possibility of such a violation in connection with a high-speed chase. In Sauers, over a strong dissent, the Court held that as of 2014 a police officer did not have ‘fair warning that he could be subject to constitutional liability for actions taken in conscious disregard of a great risk of harm during the course of a police pursuit’ although officers would be deemed to have such knowledge going forward. . . . Regardless whether the majority or dissent in Sauers was correct, by 2020 there were ample cases finding liability in connection with high-speed chases. [citing cases] Therefore, Officer Gaucher’s motion to dismiss based on a claim of qualified immunity will be denied. Further development of the factual record is appropriate.”)

Miller v. Pugliese, No. CV 20-10660-MLW, 2023 WL 6202373, at *7 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2023) (“In view of the foregoing facts, a reasonable factfinder would conclude that the warrantless entry into Miller’s home was not justified by the hot pursuit doctrine, or any other exigency, and the officers’ entry and seizure of Miller violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Therefore, the remaining question is whether the Fourth Amendment rights that were violated in this case were clearly established at the time and only a malicious or plainly incompetent officer would have violated them. . . .In this case, the relevant question is whether Miller had a clearly established right to have hot pursuit end when he entered his home when the pursuing officers had probable cause to arrest him for a misdemeanor, but no exigency in addition to the flight itself existed. In 2017, the existing precedent did not place this ‘constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Therefore, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. That the rights concerning a hotly pursued fleeing misdemeanor were not clearly established at the time of the March 4, 2017 incident has been repeatedly and explicitly recognized by the Supreme Court. In 2013, in Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. 3, 134 S. Ct. 3, 187 L.Ed.2d 341 (2013), a police officer entered private property without a warrant in hot pursuit of a fleeing suspect whom the officer had probable cause to arrest for a misdemeanor. . . . There was no immediate danger or other exigency. . . . Reversing the Ninth Circuit, the Court held that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Court noted that ‘federal and state courts nationwide [were] sharply divided on the question.’ . . . Therefore, it held that ‘whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not “beyond debate,”’ whether a suspected misdemeanor’s flight alone permitted warrantless entry to arrest during hot pursuit. . . . The Court later recognized that the question was unsettled as of 2021. In Lange, the Court wrote:

Courts are divided over whether the Fourth Amendment always permits an officer to enter a home without a warrant in pursuit of a fleeing misdemeanor suspect. Some courts have adopted such a categorical rule, while others have required a case-specific showing of exigency. We granted certiorari to resolve the conflict.

Lange, 141 S. Ct. at 2017 . . . In Lange, the Court for the first time settled that question which had divided lower courts. It held that:

The flight of a suspected misdemeanor does not always justify a warrantless entry into a home. An officer must consider all the circumstances in a pursuit case to determine whether there is a law enforcement emergency. On many occasions, the officer will have good reason to enter—to prevent imminent harms of violence, destruction of evidence, or escape from the home. But when the officer has time to get a warrant, he must do so—even though the misdemeanor fled.

. . . . As the relevant law was not clearly established before Lange was decided in 2021, the individual defendants are protected by qualified immunity for their conduct in 2017.”) Choy v. City of Brockton, No. CV 23-10340-RGS, 2023 WL 3629805, at *4 (D. Mass. May 24, 2023) (“Count II is a claim for malicious prosecution. It is premised on Drugan and Warmington having fabricated evidence to prosecute Choy. Sidestepping the first prong of the qualified immunity test, Drugan and Warmington seek dismissal on the ground that the ‘constitutional right to be free from malicious prosecution was not clearly established until’ nearly a decade after Choy's arrest and prosecution. . . While at least two other cases from this district have credited defendants' argument, see Schand v. City of Springfield, 380 F. Supp. 3d 106, 135 (D. Mass. 2019); Echavarria v. Roach, 2017 WL 3928270, at *8 (D. Mass. Sept. 7, 2017), the court declines to do so here. The proper inquiry under the second step of the test is whether the underlying right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, not the cause of action itself. . . Drugan and Warmington cannot plausibly maintain that a reasonable official would not have known that fabricating evidence to further the prosecution of criminal defendant was unlawful in 2003, when Choy was arrested. That the First Circuit did not explicitly. . . identify the vehicle through which to bring a malicious prosecution claim until 2013 does not change the decades of law establishing that the illegality of 'deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.' See Limone, 372 F.3d at 45; see also Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, 723 F.3d 91, 100 (1st Cir. 2013). The court accordingly denies the motion to dismiss Count II.")

Baker v. Goodman, No. 2:19-CV-00251-JAW, 2022 WL 580471, at *26-31 (D. Me. Feb. 25, 2022) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the question presented is whether a reasonable officer in Sgt. Goodman's position would have understood that he violated the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force against a seemingly intoxicated individual holding a gun who was approximately 114 feet away from the officer; who had been warned earlier to drop his gun and did not respond in any way to the warnings; had previously waved the weapon around but had not pointed it at the officers or members of the public, had not threatened anyone with the gun or made any sudden moves; remained in the same place throughout the duration of the event; and who was bent over, looking down, and facing away from the officer at the time he was shot. . . . In light of the case law available at the time of Mr. Baker's death, there was a 'controlling consensus' that under the circumstances, again viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmovants, Sgt. Goodman's exercise of force violated Mr. Baker's Fourth Amendment rights. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, it is 'clearly established' that it is unreasonable and in violation of the Fourth Amendment for an officer to fire on an armed, immobile person who is not using his weapon in a threatening manner. . . . Furthermore, a factfinder could reasonably conclude that the threat Mr. Baker posed at the moment he was shot did not justify the use of deadly force. Mr. Baker never threatened the officers or members of the public, he was not a suspect for the commission of any crimes, he was not engaged in any altercation with others, and members of the public were not attempting to get away from Mr. Baker. . . . In the absence of undisputed evidence that Mr. Baker threatened the officers or members of the public, Mr. Baker's possession of the weapon alone is not enough to justify Sgt. Goodman's use of deadly force. It is well established that 'the mere possession of a [deadly weapon] by a suspect is not enough to permit the use of deadly force.. . Instead, deadly force may only be used by a police officer when, based on a reasonable assessment, the officer or another person is threatened with the weapon.' . . Although Sgt. Goodman repeatedly told Mr. Baker to put down his weapon, and Mr. Baker failed to respond in any way, such a failure to respond is not per se reasonable grounds for using deadly force when the plaintiff is intoxicated or experiencing a mental health event. . . Here, Sgt. Goodman was on notice that Mr. Baker appeared intoxicated, the record shows that Mr. Baker took a drink of alcohol prior to being shot, and Mr. Baker was standing in a hunched position which a jury could reasonably interpret as being consistent with intoxication. Both parties agree that at some point after Sgt. Goodman's arrival, but before Sgt. Goodman and Officer Knutson took up their position next to the pick-up truck, Mr. Baker was 'brandishing the rifle' and was holding the rifle with the barrel facing into the Subway restaurant. . . However, Mr. Baker later put the gun down against the wall of the Subway restaurant, and then subsequently picked it up again, at which point the parties dispute how Mr. Baker was holding the gun and where the barrel was pointed. . . Even if Sgt. Goodman had been justified in shooting Mr. Baker when the barrel of the gun was pointed into the restaurant, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that, upon picking up the gun once again, Mr. Baker was not holding it in a threatening manner (as discussed above) and, as a result, Sgt. Goodman was no longer justified in shooting Mr. Baker. . . Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Baker's death that Sgt. Goodman did not have license to shoot Mr. Baker if the perceived threat justifying deadly force had passed. . . . The Court does not diminish that Sgt. Goodman was faced with an unknown and potentially serious situation in a public place, and that Mr. Baker was carrying a weapon that looked like a rifle. The Court is also sensitive to the admonition of the United States Supreme Court that '[t]he calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments - - in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving - - about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.' . However, here the Court is not acting as a factfinder. Instead, on the record before the Court, and in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, 'Graham [v. Connor], supra and [Tennessee v.] Garner, [471 U.S. 1 (1985)] stand for the proposition that a person has a constitutional right not to be shot unless an officer reasonably believes that he poses a threat to the officer or someone else.' . Here, the Plaintiffs have raised genuine issues of material fact that preclude a conclusion that at the time Sgt. Goodman shot him, Chance Baker posed such a threat. Although Sgt. Goodman subjectively believed that he, other officers, and the public were at risk, the Court must view the reasonableness of his use of force through an objective lens. . . Based on the Court's analysis and in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Baker's death that Sgt. Goodman's action violated Mr. Baker's Fourth Amendment rights. Sgt. Goodman is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity. As the Court's analysis reveals, here 'the legal question of immunity turns on which version of the facts [the Court] accept[s]' which means that summary judgment is inappropriate.") Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2021 WL 4480771, at *23 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2021) ("The affirmative disclosure obligation imposed by Brady was not expanded to include law enforcement until 1995. . . Where deliberate suppression is involved, however, the First Circuit has explained that '[t]here can be no doubt that, under the line of cases running from Mooney and Pyle to Brady, the law was firmly settled [by 1989] that a law enforcement officer may not deliberately suppress material evidence that is favorable to a defendant.' . Because Plaintiff is asserting that Garvin, Roach, and Guillermo deliberately suppressed evidence, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is inappropriate. It was clearly established by 1994 that police officers cannot deliberately suppress material evidence, and to the extent they acted deliberately, 'a reasonable officer in [their] position plainly would have appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct.' . Roach's, Guillermo's, and Garvin's arguments assume that the Bonifacio Report was not material because the crimes were not similar and that they had no duty to disclose such information. As explained above, however, questions of fact regarding the exculpatory nature of the report, as well as the other allegedly suppressed evidence which these defendants have not addressed, still remain. Accordingly, Garvin, Guillermo, and Roach are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Massachusetts ex rel. Powell v. Holmes, 546 F.Supp.3d 58, __ (D. Mass. 2021) (“More than thirty years ago, the First Circuit found that it had ‘long been “clearly established” that due process safeguards must be afforded’ when ‘persons are deprived of property interests.’ Amsden v. Moran, 904 F.2d 748, 752 (1st Cir. 1990) (citing Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 711 (1976); Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 569-70 (1972)). Indeed, Holmes and O’Connor offer no argument to the contrary. Furthermore, no reasonable officer would have understood that their conduct as alleged in the complaint—disposing of plaintiff’s guns and other items without notice, opportunity to be heard, or adequate state-law remedies—would come close to satisfying due-process requirements.”)

Weichel v. Town of Braintree, No. 1:20-CV-11456-IT, 2021 WL 1948096, at *6 (D. Mass. May 14, 2021) (“Although Whelan argues that the First Circuit did not recognize a malicious prosecution cause of action under the Fourth Amendment until 2013 and that this entitles him to qualified immunity, the question is not whether the cause of action existed but whether the alleged conduct was prohibited. As the court has determined that the law clearly established that the conduct underlying Weichel’s malicious prosecution was prohibited, Whelan is not entitled to qualified immunity based on Weichel’s allegations. The failure to intervene claim is a different matter. As the court noted, while the First Circuit has not limited failure-to-intervene claims, nor has it explicitly required officers to intervene—other than in excessive force cases—when an individual’s constitutional rights are being violated. As a result, it was not clearly established in 1980 that Whelan had a duty to intervene, and he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity as to that claim.”)

Bradley v. Cicero, No. CV 18-30039-MGM, 2021 WL 294286, at *4–5 (D. Mass. Jan. 28, 2021) (“Although the issue of qualified immunity is clearly waived, the court addresses the underlying merits because they relate to another asserted ground for a new trial, one based on erroneous jury instructions, which is discussed later. Defendants’ argument rests on the state of the law regarding pat frisks under the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution and Article 14 of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights, both of which protect against unreasonable searches and seizures. In a decision issued a month before trial in this case, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts noted its past articulations of the pat frisk standard had not always been clear, possibly causing confusion. Commonwealth v. Torres-Pagan, 138 N.E.3d 1012, 1016–17 (Mass. 2020). . . Defendants argue Torres-Pagan, then, stands for the fact that the particular pat frisk standard requiring reasonable belief a person is armed and dangerous (as opposed to reasonable concern for officer safety) was not clearly established at the time of the incident in August 2015, and qualified immunity applies to Defendants. Plaintiff argues any possible confusion could have been only with respect to the state law standard under Article 14, and not with respect to the federal law standard under the Fourth Amendment as articulated by the Supreme Court in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). The court agrees that the federal standard for pat frisks was clearly established and controlled by Supreme Court precedent at the time of the incident. But, in addition, the court views the state law standard to have been clearly established notwithstanding the language in Torres-Pagan. The Supreme Judicial Court has consistently stated that the state standard is consistent with that of Terry. In 1969, the Supreme Judicial Court acknowledged in Commonwealth v. Matthews, 244 N.E.2d 908 (Mass. 1969) that a ‘State is free to develop its own law of search and seizure to meet the needs of local law enforcement “It may not, however, authorize police conduct which trenches upon Fourth Amendment rights, regardless of the labels which it attaches to such conduct.”’. . It recognized Terry requires a police officer to have reason to believe an individual is armed and dangerous in order to conduct a lawful pat frisk. . . And as it stated in Torres-Pagan, the Supreme Judicial Court never intentionally strayed from that standard. . . Furthermore, even when potential confusion was developing in state court decisions, the law as applied aligned with the federal standard of armed and dangerous. In the cases the Supreme Judicial Court calls out as inaccurately stating the standard, the analysis was still ultimately grounded in the question of a suspect being armed. . . . Although there have been a few Supreme Judicial Court which inaccurately stated the standard and the court appreciates Defendants’ arguments regarding confusion, the court finds the law was clearly established at the time of the incident at issue here. Specifically, that law was that a pat frisk is unconstitutional without an officer’s reasonable belief a person is armed and dangerous as set out in Terry, the state standard follows the federal standard and, moreover, the state standard is necessarily constrained by the limits of what is permissible under the Federal Constitution.”)

Nasir v. Town of Foxborough, No. 19-CV-11196-DJC, 2020 WL 1027780, at *7-8 (D. Mass. Mar. 3, 2020) (“[T]he First Circuit has recognized that the ‘scope and boundaries of the community caretaking exception [to the warrant requirement] are nebulous’ and thus police action pursuant to the function may permit a finding of qualified immunity. MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8, 14 (1st Cir. 2014). Nevertheless, the Nasirs’ Section 1983 claim survives because although the Officers’ entry into the home and detention of the Nasirs may be protected by qualified immunity—or is otherwise unactionable, . . . the Officers’ participation in an unlawful taking is not. Qualified immunity protects officers assigned to a civil standby in monitoring a private repossession where the reasonable officer in his position would not have known that his action constituted invalid participation in a taking. . . As such, where officers, without a court order, participate in the repossession of property whose ownership is in dispute, they are entitled to qualified immunity when they are presented evidence of ownership and/or otherwise conduct and investigation so as to support a reasonable belief that the taking was lawful. . . . As alleged here, the Nasirs repeatedly objected to Ansari-Nasir and her family’s removal of certain items. . . and immediately tried to report stolen items after the incident. . . . [I]n face of an active dispute of ownership, in the absence of a court order. . . and without extrinsic evidence supporting one party’s claim to property over others’—it was unreasonable for the Officers to believe they were participating in a lawful repossession.”)

Allende v. Comm'r, New Hampshire Dep't of Corr., No. 19-CV-208-JD, 2019 WL 5905818, at *4 (D.N.H. Nov. 12, 2019) (“The Second Circuit long ago recognized the First Amendment right of Rastafarian prisoners to wear their hair in dreadlocks. See Benjamin v. Coughlin, 905 F.2d 572, 576-77 (2d Cir. 1990); Michel v. Manna, 2017 WL 1381859, at *4 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 17, 2017) (Rastafarian prisoner’s right to wear dreadlocks clearly established). Other courts, however, have not recognized that right. See Luther v. White, 2019 WL 511795, at *13 (W.D. Ky. Feb. 8, 2019) (citing cases and holding that it was not clearly established in January of 2017 that prison grooming standards banning dreadlocks violated the free exercise clause of the First Amendment). In December of 2012, the Tenth Circuit considered whether it was clearly established that a prison grooming policy, which required hair to be able to be combed out, would violate First Amendment free exercise rights. Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1333 (10th Cir. 2012). The Tenth Circuit concluded that the law was unsettled and, therefore, not clearly established. There is no Supreme Court case or First Circuit case on point. In 2011, the First Circuit held that enforcement of the New Hampshire State Prison’s policy restricting facial hair did not violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. Kuperman v. Wrenn, 645 F.3d 69, 77 (1st Cir. 2011). Given the state of the law in March of 2017, it was not clearly established that enforcement of the New Hampshire State Prison’s hair grooming policy would violate a prisoner’s First Amendment free exercise right. The defendants sued in their individual capacities in Claim One are entitled to qualified immunity and the claim is dismissed.”)

Taylor v. Moore, 383 F.Supp.3d 91, __ (D. Mass. 2019) (“The parties provide dueling First Circuit cases as to whether it was clearly established at the time of the incident, in 2014, that Moore’s single use of a taser when a subject refused to be handcuffed violated Taylor’s constitutional rights. Taylor relies primarily on Parker v. Gerrish, which the First Circuit decided in 2008. . . . The First Circuit held then ‘that the police officer could be found to have violated the Fourth Amendment by tasing an unarmed suspect who, in the course of an arrest, “present[ed] no significant active resistance or threat” at the time of the tasing.’. Defendants argue that Parker is inapplicable to the present case, and that the First Circuit’s recent decision in Gray v. Cummings should guide the Court. . . . On these facts, the First Circuit held that a reasonable jury could find it was an excessive use of force for an officer to use a taser once, in drive-stun mode, to quell a nonviolent, mentally ill individual who was resisting arrest. . . . However, the court granted the officer qualified immunity, reasoning that ‘[b]ased on the body of available case law,

... an objectively reasonable police officer in May of 2013 could have concluded that [his actions], did not violate the Fourth Amendment.’ . . In distinguishing Parker, the court stated that Gray was ‘a horse of quite a different hue’ because there was ‘no indication [in Gray] that [the patient], despite ample opportunity to do so, ever complied with [the officer’s] command to put her hands behind her back.’ . . Whereas in Parker, it appeared as if the plaintiff was in the process of complying by releasing his wrist to be cuffed, in Gray, ‘[e]ven when [the officer] warned [the patient] that she would be tased, she did not comply but, rather, continued cursing and told him to “do it.”’ . . Defendants argue Gray indicates Moore would have not known in 2014 that his use of a taser on Taylor violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . But in so arguing, Defendants fail to view the totality of the facts in the light most favorable to Taylor. Defendants assert that even on the ground, Taylor was resisting arrest and refused to put her flailing hands behind her back, while Taylor states that she could not comply because she was unable to move while prone, on the street, with Moore’s knee pinned on her back in a full body mount. Moreover, she claims Moore used excessive force when he ‘slammed’ her body to the ground and then repeatedly pushed her head into the ground, causing a concussion, even after she agreed to do whatever Moore wanted. These are exactly the kind of fact disputes meant for trial. Additionally, the record indicates that Moore simply told Taylor to ‘shut up’ or be tased, but tasing someone for ‘insolence’ qualifies as a clearly established constitutional violation under Parker, while tasing someone for failing to comply with a direct order to put her hands behind her back shields Moore from liability under Gray. Finally, it was clearly established in 2010 that ‘slamming’ a slightly built, non-violent drunk driver into the ground when she was not given an opportunity to submit is a constitutional violation. . . Because of the unresolved factual disputes regarding Moore’s use of force, the claim of qualified immunity is denied without prejudice to its being reasserted at trial after resolution of factual questions. . . The Court denies Defendants’ motion for summary judgment on Count I.”)

Abdul-Hasib v. National Railroad Passenger Corp., No. CV 18-10933-RGS, 2019 WL 2266870, at *3 (D. Mass. May 28, 2019) (“As the Supreme Court has reminded us, because of the fact-intensive nature of the inquiry, when it comes to excessive force claims, the qualified immunity doctrine does have special bite. . . Seizing on this caution, defendants, citing Kisela, argue that Officer Smith is entitled to qualified immunity. However, Kisela and Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 311 (2015) (per curiam) (cited in Kisela), are cases involving the use of deadly force and have little relevance to this garden variety excessive force claim. It is true that to defeat a claim of qualified immunity, the precedent invoked ‘must be clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.’ . . The case that comes the closest to providing support for Officer Smith is City of Escondido v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503 (2019) (per curiam) (finding no clearly established rule prohibiting the ‘takedown’ of a person engaged in the misdemeanor offense of resisting a police officer). However, the issue here is not the takedown of Abdul-Hasib, but what happened next. In the context of this case, it has long been clear that there is no justification for the use of disproportionate force by police in the course of making a routine arrest. That a genuine dispute of fact exists over the amount of force used by Officer Smith to restrain Abdul-Hasib once he was pinned to the ground is enough to preserve the excessive force claims under § 1983 and the MCRA.”)

Doe on behalf of B.G. v. Boston Public Schools, No. 17-CV-11653-ADB, 2019 WL 1005498, at *7 (D. Mass. Mar. 1, 2019) (“Plaintiff correctly points out that the right to bodily integrity is clearly established, and it is beyond dispute that, by October 2014, a consensus of persuasive authority clearly established that state officials could be held liable where they affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed an individual in danger that he or she would not otherwise have faced. . . The Supreme Court, however, instructs that ‘ “clearly established law” should not be defined “at a high level of generality.”’ . . While qualified immunity does not require ‘a case directly on point’ for law to be clearly established, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . As discussed supra, the constitutional violation adequately pleaded is that, by delaying or suppressing the filing of 51A Reports concerning sexual assaults perpetrated on minor children, Gavins was deliberately indifferent to acts of sexual assault perpetrated on B.G. and A.R. by A.J. in violation of their substantive due process right to bodily integrity. Gavins would not be entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable school principal, between October 2014 and October 2016, would have known that delaying or suppressing the filing of 51A Reports was deliberately indifferent in the situations that she encountered. The Court finds that, irrespective of whether the conduct alleged is reprehensible or the harm tragic, Plaintiffs have not met their burden to show that the existing case law clearly established that the conduct at issue violated B.G.’s and A.R.’s constitutional rights. . . . While ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,’ . . . as discussed supra, the First Circuit has never found the state-created danger theory applicable to any specific set of facts, let alone in the context of peer-on-peer harassment. Further, Plaintiffs have not set forth, and this Court has been unable to identify, a consensus of persuasive authority establishing, beyond debate, that Gavins’ actions were clearly unconstitutional at the time that B.G. and A.R. were victimized. Thus, although common sense and professional ethics might seem sufficient to establish that a school principal should have known not to delay or suppress the filing of 51A Reports, the law requires more. More specifically, to deny Gavins the protections of qualified immunity, the Court must find that prohibition to be clearly set forth in existing case law. Because the Court has been unable to find a consensus of authority establishing that affirmative acts by school officials that lead to or enhance the danger of peer-on-peer sexual assault violate students’ due process right to bodily integrity, the Court must find that she is entitled to qualified immunity and dismiss Count I on that basis.”)

Quinn v. US Prisoner Transport Inc., No. 2:18-CV-00149-DBH, 2019 WL 257980, at *11-13 (D. Me. Jan. 17, 2019) (“Decisions related to the conditions under which a prisoner is transported as part of the extradition process are not discretionary decisions within the scope of absolute immunity afforded prosecutors. . . In this case, Defendant allegedly chose to use private contractors to transport Plaintiff, rather than public employees. Although there are few cases that directly address public officials’ screening, training, and supervisory duties with respect to contractors, as opposed to employees, the lack of a specific case involving a public official’s responsibility for a private contractor’s alleged constitutional deprivations during the transport of prisoners is not dispositive of the qualified immunity issue. . . At the time the Transport Defendants transported Plaintiff to Maine, the law was clearly established that Transport Defendants' alleged conduct was in violation of Plaintiff's constitutional protections. In fact, at this stage of the proceedings, Defendant does not challenge Plaintiff's assertion that the Transport Defendants' performance was constitutionally deficient. The central question as to Defendant Robinson is whether the law was clearly established that a governmental official, such as Defendant Robinson, alleged to be involved in the transport decision, is absolved of responsibility for assuring that during transport, the treatment of the prisoners satisfied basic constitutional requirements, by simply contracting with a third-party to transport the prisoners, without an assessment of and regardless of the quality of the services provided by the third-party. . . . [T]he law was clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's transport to Maine, a government official responsible for the safety and well-being of prisoners, cannot abdicate that responsibility by contracting with a third-party. Necessarily, therefore, if a government official is aware or obviously should have been aware that the third-party's practices present a genuine risk of a constitutional deprivation, but the official does not take readily available measures to mitigate the risk, the government official can be legally responsible for the deprivation. Plaintiff has alleged such facts in this case. Contrary to Defendant's argument, therefore, the relevant law was clearly established at the time Plaintiff was transported to Maine.")

Cosenza v. City of Worcester, Massachusetts, 355 F.Supp.3d 81, 95-101 & n.5 (D. Mass. 2019) ("[T]he First Circuit has instructed that 'where the answer to the first prong of the immunity question may depend on the further development of the facts, it may be wise to avoid the first step.' . . . Accordingly, I will begin my assessment of the qualified immunity question with the second prong of the analysis. The Supreme Court has explicitly held that unduly suggestive identification proceedings resulting in an unreliable identification of the criminal defendant violate due process. . . . Several courts have found police not entitled to immunity after utilizing suggestive procedures that procure false identifications. [collecting cases] Thus, I find that the first aspect of the second prong is met—it was clearly established at the time Plaintiff's investigation took place that he was constitutionally protected against unduly suggestive identification procedures. Plaintiff argues because it was clearly established that unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures were unconstitutional at the time of Plaintiff's case, our job is done for the purposes of this motion. 'This formulation of the inquiry, however, is not sufficiently specific. An affirmative answer to [whether Plaintiff was protected against unduly suggestive identification procedures], though accurate, would state an abstract principle of law, disassociated from the facts of the case.' . . . Indeed, the second aspect of the prong requires this Court to inquire whether a reasonable defendant would have understood whether his particular conduct violated Plaintiff's rights. In other words, would a reasonable officer had known the identification procedures allegedly utilized were unduly suggestive. The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . Thus, the dispositive question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.' . . . Under this second aspect, I again find that Plaintiff's right was clearly established. Defendants argue that their identification procedures were only found unnecessarily suggestive by the Superior Court based on new state procedures promulgated after Plaintiff's conviction and not clearly established constitutional precedent. It follows, according to Defendants that there was no clearly established law to put Defendants on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Further, Plaintiff has not cited, nor has this court identified, any case that would deem the identification procedures utilized in Plaintiff's case unnecessarily suggestive under federal law. . . . However, Plaintiff alleges in his Amended Complaint that 'during the identification procedure, when conferring with M.H. about Plaintiff's photograph, Defendants Hazelhurst and Doherty told M.H. Plaintiff's name, and they told her that he lived in her complex.' . . . In addition, 'Defendants Hazelhurst and Doherty suggested to M.H. that she should identify Plaintiff as her attacker during the identification procedure.' . . . While the Court is unaware of any caselaw explicitly holding this type of procedure is unnecessarily suggestive, the First Circuit has held that when an officer's conduct is so clearly unconstitutional, no precedent directly on point is necessary to provide adequate notice to a reasonable officer. . . . I find that the coerciveness of Defendants' suggestion that M.H. identify Plaintiff so patently evident that a reasonable officer should have been on notice that it was unlawful. Thus, it was clearly established that the unnecessarily suggestive identification procedures were unconstitutional at the time of Plaintiff's conviction. Further, it is patently obvious that a reasonable officer would have understood that the practices utilized by Defendants fell within the scope of this proscribed conduct. Therefore, Defendants are not shielded from liability by qualified immunity. . . . Defendants argue that the caselaw demonstrates Plaintiff's right was not clearly established and they are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. However, the courts in Rodriguez-Mateo and Echavarria focused their attention on whether the cause of action and not the underlying right was clearly established. I respectfully disagree with the reasoning of those courts as the relevant inquiry is whether the underlying right was clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's malicious prosecution. As the court in Davis v. Murphy recognized, 'there is a difference between articulating a precise cause of action that a plaintiff may bring and establishing that certain conduct violates the Constitution.' 2018 WL 1524532, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 28, 2018); see also King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 580 n.4 (6th Cir. 2017) (distinguishing 'recognition of § 1983 claims from ... articulation of whether a given right is clearly established ' (emphasis in original)); Fields v. Wharrie, 740 F.3d 1107, 1114 (7th Cir. 2014) ('[W]hen the question is whether to grant immunity to a public employee, the focus is on his conduct, not on whether that conduct gave rise to a tort in a particular case.'). Accordingly, I must assess whether Plaintiff's right to be free from malicious prosecution was clearly established in 2000. I find that it was. . . . Defendants' again argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity. According to Defendants, a claim for failure to intervene has been clearly established in the context of an excessive use of force but not for failure to intervene in a different due process violation. Defendants are correct that 'First Circuit cases have primarily, if not exclusively, concerned allegations of failure to intervene in the excessive force context.' . . . On the other hand, the First Circuit has not 'explicitly limit[ed] failure-to-intervene claims to excessive force cases' and 'occasionally described actionable failure to intervene claims in terms that could encompass a broad range of constitutional rights.' . . . Plaintiff again contends that Defendants' reasoning circumvents the relevant inquiry. In Plaintiff's view, a failure to intervene claim is merely a pathway to liability. According to Plaintiff, the relevant inquiry is whether the underlying right was clearly established. As discussed above, Plaintiffs underlying constitutional rights that were allegedly violated were indeed clearly established at the time of his prosecution. The First Circuit, however, seems to have suggested that the duty to intervene in the context at issue must have also been clearly established. In Torres-Rivera, for instance, the First Circuit held that an officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in the excessive force context that ‘the law was clearly established in 1998 that an officer in O’Neill’s circumstances had a duty to intervene.’. . This language implies that not only must the underlying right be clearly established but also the duty for an officer to intervene in the relevant circumstances. . . Therefore, like the court in Echavarria, I find that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for their failure to intervene claim in a constitutional violation because that violation was not the excessive use of force. . . . It may seem inconsistent that the Court finds qualified immunity unavailable to Defendants for Plaintiff’s malicious prosecution claim but available here. In both circumstances, Plaintiff rightly argued that an underlying, and clearly established constitutional right was violated. For Plaintiff’s malicious prosecution claim, however, what was missing was merely the cause of action. Thus, a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated Plaintiff’s rights. In the context of the failure to intervene, however, not only was a pathway to liability potentially absent but also a clearly established duty to intervene. Therefore, it would not be sufficiently clear to a reasonable officer that his omission in failing to intervene would constitute a violation of Plaintiff’s clearly established underlying right.”)

Davis v. Murphy, No. 13-CV-11900-IT, 2018 WL 1524532, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 28, 2018) (“Qualified immunity focuses on the particular conduct at issue. If courts have held ‘certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand, the officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity based simply on the argument that courts had not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.’ Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 204, 202-203 (2001). This means there is a difference between articulating a precise cause of action that a plaintiff may bring and establishing that certain conduct violates the Constitution. See King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 580 n.4 (6th Cir. 2017) (distinguishing “recognition of § 1983 claims from . . . articulation of whether a given right is clearly established”); see also Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 428 (10th Cir. 2014) (holding right to be free from excessive force was clearly established despite uncertainty about whether claim arose under Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendment). While courts have struggled at times to identify the precise cause of action for malicious prosecution, it has long been established that a police officer violates the Constitution by intentionally or recklessly making false statements in, or omitting true exculpatory statements from, materials submitted to a magistrate in support of probable cause. See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 171 (1978). Hernandez-Cuevas recognized that no reasonable officer ‘would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable.’. . As of 2004, the First Circuit had held that it is ‘self-evident’ that ‘those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.’. . Such conduct did not first become unconstitutional in 2004. Limone even held that ‘the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967.’. . ‘The “dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.” Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (per curiam) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001)). Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis, McManus knew Sheridan was setting up Davis and even watched this setup occur on video. Then, despite knowing Sheridan’s narrative was false, McManus presented it to a magistrate to secure a criminal complaint and to a grand jury to secure an indictment. If these facts are true, no reasonable officer in 2010 would think such conduct was lawful. Of course, it remains in dispute whether this is what occurred. A jury could find McManus did not act with such knowledge or recklessness. But McManus has not shown that, as a matter of law, his conduct did not violate a clearly established right. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”) Allphin*, 786 F.2d 268, 276 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 848 (1986), in concluding that a right subject to a balancing test can rarely be found ‘clearly established’; finding the right of familial integrity to be such a right).

Borucki v. Ryan, 827 F.2d 836, 848 (1st Cir. 1987) (“[W]hen the law requires a balancing of competing interests, it may be unfair to charge an official with knowledge of the law in the absence of a previously decided case with clearly analogous facts.”).

Allen v. Town of East Longmeadow, No. 17-CV-30041-MGM, 2018 WL 1152098, at *7 (D. Mass. Feb. 9, 2018) (“Regardless of whether the individual defendants were implicated in a release of personal information about Plaintiff that was improper under state law, Plaintiff has offered ‘no support for the proposition that, as of [March 2014], this provision had a clear basis in federal constitutional or statutory law. ‘Mere violations of state law do not, of course, create constitutional claims.’” . . . Where, as here, Plaintiff has failed to satisfy her burden to identify controlling or persuasive precedent that clearly established the constitutional right to equal protection she claims was violated by the individual defendants, they are protected by qualified immunity.”)

Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2017 WL 3928270, at *8, *11 (D. Mass. Sept. 7, 2017) (“The individual defendants also contend that the malicious prosecution claim is barred by qualified immunity, and they appear to be correct. In Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, the First Circuit chronicled the long history of cases that addressed whether the Constitution affords a right to be free from malicious prosecution. . . . The court went on to hold that the Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from malicious prosecution, and thus ‘ma[de] explicit what has long been implicit in our case law.’ . . . Prior to the Hernandez-Cuevas decision, the First Circuit had described it as an ‘“open question whether the Constitution permits the assertion of a section 1983 claim for malicious prosecution on the basis of an alleged Fourth Amendment violation,”’ and accordingly, held that ‘[s]uch uncertainty in the legal landscape entitles state actors to qualified immunity.’ . . . Since the Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution was not clearly established until 2013, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's § 1983 claim that Defendants engaged in malicious prosecution of him in violation of his constitutional rights in or before 1996. . . . Defendant Cooney additionally implies that he is entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to intervene claim because the right was not clearly established in cases not involving excessive force. Plaintiff responds that failure to intervene is a pathway to liability, not the underlying constitutional violation, and it is the constitutional right itself that must be clearly established at the time of the deprivation. While this theory has its merits, the First Circuit has reasoned in the excessive force context that 'the law was clearly established in 1998 that' an officer who was a bystander 'had a duty to intervene' where another officer was using excessive force. . . . Thus, it appears that the duty to intervene itself must be clearly established. . . . As discussed supra, within the First Circuit, it remains uncertain whether an officer has a duty to intervene in cases that do not concern excessive force. Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to intervene claim.")

Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, No. 16-11689-PBS, 2017 WL 3159979, at *14–15 (D. Mass. July 25, 2017) ("In recent years, the Supreme Court has published a number of per curiam reversals of denials of qualified immunity, emphasizing that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.' . . . While it does not require 'a case directly on point' for law to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . . The question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,' . . . and it must be answered 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition[.] . . . Two constitutional violations adequately pleaded against the individual defendants are: (1) violation of the First Amendment by public school teachers by singling out and mocking a student in front of a class, giving him an unjustifiably low grade, or giving him mean looks on multiple occasions in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault, and (2) violation of the First Amendment by public school administrators by ignoring a student's reports of bullying by other students and teachers, in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault. With respect to the first theory, the case law is clear that the teachers' harassment against a student in retaliation for reporting a sexual assault is impermissible retaliation in violation of the student's First Amendment rights. See, e.g., Seamons v. Snow, 84 F.3d 1226, 1238–39 (10th Cir. 1996) (holding that student's reporting of sexual hazing was entitled to First Amendment protection, and school officials were not entitled to qualified immunity when they punished him by throwing him off the football team). The second theory is harder because the parties have cited no case law directly on point that supports the theory that deliberate indifference by school officials to sexual harassment and bullying by fellow students can be a retaliatory adverse action under the First Amendment. In other words, it is not clear under the existing case law whether inaction can be an adverse action rising to the level of retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, the Court finds that qualified immunity applies to the claim that Dean Doherty, Superintendent Tiano, Principal Caliri, and A.D. Moreau engaged in First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by taking no action in response to his complaints about harassment by other students. The Court denies qualified immunity for the claim that Siragusa, Kender, and Cole engaged in First

Goodhile v. Gribbons, 186 F. Supp. 3d 4, 13 (D. Mass. 2016) (“As explained above, the facts present a colorable claim that Gribbons violated Mr. Goodhile’s constitutional rights by using unreasonable force. The issue is whether the legal contours of the right were sufficiently clear, and whether the violation would have been clear to a reasonable officer under the circumstances. . . . The pertinent question in this regard is whether prior existing case law or general Fourth Amendment principles gave Gribbons notice that it was unconstitutional for a police officer to repeatedly strike an unresponsive seventy-six-year-old man who was holding a sheathed knife and who had not been accused of committing a crime. . . . The First Circuit has held that a reasonable officer who has been trained on a use-of-force continuum does not need prior case law on point to recognize that it is unconstitutional to use substantial force on an individual who does not pose a significant threat. . . . Here, Gribbons was operating with the benefit of a use-of-force protocol to be applied to situations involving resisting suspects. This policy provided guidance for reasonable behavior and cited to Graham v. Connor, . . . the case in which the Supreme Court established the applicable standard for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. According to the policy, an officer is not entitled to use a baton on a suspect unless the suspect is assaultive, meaning that the suspect is engaged in behavior that is ‘likely to result in bodily harm to the member, to others at the scene or to the suspect himself.’ . . . Considering the facts as alleged by Plaintiff, Gribbons’s conduct departed from this standard. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, I find that Gribbons is not entitled to summary judgment on count III. Based on the record before me, a rational jury could conclude that Gribbons’s conduct was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances, in violation of Mr. Goodhile’s Fourth Amendment rights. A jury could further find that a sensible officer would have known that his behavior was unreasonable and in violation of applicable law.”)

Sanchez v. Mitchell, No. CV 16-10415-LTS, 2016 WL 6780289, at *2 (D. Mass. Nov. 15, 2016) (“Sanchez’s damages claims against Defendants in their individual capacities fail to overcome qualified immunity. . . . Here, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate’s access to a religious diet under the First Amendment. The First Circuit has not spoken. Cases from other circuits indicate that reasonable restrictions on an inmate’s access to religious diets are acceptable, particularly where the inmate has not complied with procedures that call into question the sincerity of his belief. . . . Additionally, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate’s access to a religious diet under RLUIPA. Other courts have recognized that the law in this area is not well settled and that courts have disagreed on what RLUIPA requires. . . . In short, ‘[i]t seems unlikely that claims on the current theory of denial of a religious diet due to claimed disciplinary infractions would be considered a violation of a clearly established right, particularly since this is a claim that appears to be the subject of an emerging circuit split.’ Denson v. Gelb, Civ. A. No. 14-14317-DPW, 2015 WL 4271481, at *3 (D. Mass. July 13, 2015). Thus, Sanchez’s claims for monetary damages against Defendants in their individual capacities fail.”)

Mattei v. Dunbar, 217 F.Supp.3d 367, 379-81 (D. Mass. 2016) (“[W]hile there is not First Circuit law on point, other circuits have recognized that the denial of good-time credits can form the basis of a retaliation claim under § 1983 when done in retaliation for the exercise of constitutional rights. . . Finally, prior to the alleged retaliatory act, it was also well-established that mere threats of retaliation can violate First Amendment rights. . . . Thus, a reasonable official would have understood that soliciting another inmate to physically harm Mattei in retaliation for filing grievances violated his First Amendment rights even though no actual physical harm resulted. . . .The First Circuit has not yet directly addressed the question whether § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages in § 1983 actions raising constitutional claims. . . However, most circuits have held that § 1997e(e) does apply to § 1983 actions alleging constitutional violations, so that Mattei cannot recover damages for mental or emotional injuries resulting from constitutional violations absent a showing of physical injury. . . Because the statutory language ‘[n]o Federal civil action’—does not allow for exceptions, this Court concludes that § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages for mental and emotional injuries absent a showing of physical injury, regardless of whether the claims at issue are of a constitutional nature or not. Mattei, therefore, cannot recover compensatory damages for mental or emotional injuries suffered as a result of his alleged First Amendment violation. That, however, does not end the inquiry. Section 1997e(e) does not preclude either nominal damages or punitive damages. . . Nominal damages are appropriate to vindicate certain constitutional rights absent any showing of actual injury. . . In other words, nominal damages vindicate the deprivation of a constitutional right itself, not any specific injury suffered as a result. Thus, nominal damages are not claims for mental or emotional injury and are therefore not barred by § 1997e(e). Punitive damages, too, are unrelated to claims for mental or emotional injury. . . Claims for punitive damages are premised on the nature of the constitutional violations itself rather than on the nature of the injury inflicted. Such claims serve to punish and deter egregious constitutional violations; they are not claims based on mental or emotional injury and are therefore not precluded by § 1997e(e). . . Thus, to the extent Mattel’s pro se complaint can be read to include requests for nominal and punitive damages, he may be legally entitled to relief.”)

Holloman v. Clarke, No. 14-12594-NMG, 2016 WL 5339721, at *2–3 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2016) (“[C]ases before 2012, when the conduct here allegedly occurred, clearly establish that an officer has a duty to intervene when another officer uses excessive force against a pretrial detainee. . . Even though the Supreme Court held in 2015 that the Fourteenth Amendment objective standard applies to pretrial detainees in excessive force cases, both the Fourteenth Amendment and the standard for failure to intervene turn on the reasonableness of the circumstances. As a result, the standard was clearly established in 2012. . . Because Holloman has alleged a constitutional violation that was clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct of Ferrarra and Maine, they are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Town of Wayland, 179 F.Supp.3d 155, 170-71 (D. Mass. 2016) (“Following the Supreme Court’s admonition in Mullenix, the Court examines whether Moskowitz-Dodyk’s particular conduct regarding her repeated encouragement of a friendship between Coe and Philip violated John's constitutional rights, as clearly established between 1998 and 2000. Without ascending to too-high levels of abstraction, the First Circuit's most apposite discussion of the state-created danger doctrine was the 1999 case Hasenfus, in particular its discussion of the factually-similar Armijo. And the same dicta which enabled this Court to hold that John suffered a constitutional rights violation also provides enough flexibility to preclude finding sufficient clarity to overcome Moskowitz-Dodyk's qualified immunity. Hasenfus specifically mentioned that 'the facts in [Armijo] go a step beyond the typical endangerment cases cited by the Tenth Circuit, cases that involve manifestly outrageous behavior by the authorities certain to cause harm.' . . . This distinguishing of Armijo from 'typical endangerment cases,' combined with the expressed equivocation on Armijo's correctness, . . . underscore, at least within the First Circuit between 1998 and 2000, that the law did not clearly establish that Moskowitz-Dodyk acted unconstitutionally towards John. A reasonable officer could read that portion of Hasenfus and conclude that Moskowitz-Dodyk's conduct was not unlawful. . . . In opposition, John first argues that, for several decades, courts have recognized a right to bodily integrity, that sexual abuse infringes this right, and that state-created dangers may violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . As discussed, however, these broad statements discuss Fourteenth Amendment rights at too high a level of generality. . . . John next cites Billingsley v. Franklin Area Sch. Dist., C.A. No. 11-160, 2012 WL 259992 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 27, 2012) as an example of a court denying qualified immunity when a defendant "gave a known perpetrator of sexual abuse access to" the victim plaintiff. . . . However, Billingsley relied exclusively on Third Circuit case law, and thus did not face anything similar to Hasenfus's ambiguous dicta. . . . Accordingly, it has little persuasive value here.)

Morse v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts Executive Office of Pub. Safety Dep't of State Police, 123 F.Supp.3d 179, (D. Mass. 2015) ("A reasonable juror could conclude that seizing Charles Morse at gunpoint and detaining Lesa Morse with handcuffs was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . . Nonetheless, the Court finds that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim because Plaintiffs' rights, in the context of this specific case, were not clearly established. . . . Charles Morse's asserted right is the right to not be handcuffed at gunpoint while under arrest for serious crimes. Lesa Morse's asserted right is the right of an innocent bystander to not be handcuffed while officers effect the arrest of another individual in the residence. Yet Plaintiffs cite no cases that would have given Defendants clear notice that the specific type of force used against each Plaintiff was unconstitutional, and the Court is aware of none. To the contrary, case law suggests that aiming guns at Morse during his arrest at least arguably fell within the realm of reasonableness. . . . Lesa Morse was handcuffed by Sergeant Cloutier due to concerns about officer safety after she began yelling and did not obey commands to hang up the phone. . . . Again, cases suggest that such a use of force was at least arguably reasonable. . . . Accordingly, the Court must apply qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . . The Court underscores that this finding applies only to the use of force employed by Defendants after they entered the home, which Plaintiffs assert gives rise to a constitutional violation independent from the warrantless entry and arrest. For the reasons stated above, Plaintiffs' claims of a Fourth Amendment violation will survive summary judgment based on the warrantless entry and arrest."), aff'd on other grounds, 2017 WL 3667648 (1st Cir. Aug. 25, 2017)

Johnson v. Han, No. CV 14-CV-13274-IT, 2015 WL 4397360, at *6-8 (D. Mass. July 17, 2015) (“O’Brien further argues that Counts I through IV should be dismissed under the doctrine of qualified immunity because there is no clearly established law that supervisors violate a criminal defendant’s constitutional rights by allowing subordinates to withhold exculpatory evidence and to fabricate inculpatory evidence, or by failing to train and supervise their subordinates in conducting drug-analysis tests and disclosing results. . . . Prior to 2009, it was clearly established by the First Circuit that a police officer could not withhold exculpatory evidence. . . . The prohibition on fabricating inculpatory evidence was also well-established before 2009. . . . The First Circuit has not expressly ruled that it is clearly established that a state-employed chemist similarly cannot withhold exculpatory evidence from prosecutors or present false inculpatory evidence at trial. However, in 2005 the First Circuit held that ‘[t]he intentional or reckless fabrication of inculpatory evidence or omission of material exculpatory evidence by a forensic examiner in support of probable cause may amount to a constitutional violation.’ See Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 89 (1st Cir.2005). The court sees no reason to distinguish between a forensic report used to support probable cause and a drug-analysis report used to support conviction. . . . This court has similarly held that it was clearly established before 2009 that a forensic analyst could not withhold exculpatory information. . . . Other Courts of Appeals have held the same. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the court finds that a reasonable state-employed chemist would have known in 2009 that she had a duty not to withhold exculpatory test results and that she could not knowingly present fabricated evidence of guilt in support of a criminal defendant’s conviction. Even if such a rule was not established in case law, the court further finds that this rule is an obvious extension of the principle that a police officer cannot withhold exculpatory evidence or fabricate inculpatory evidence. . . . Accordingly, the court reaches the same conclusion under either method of demonstrating that a law is clearly established. Having found the law proscribing a state-employed lab chemists from withholding exculpatory evidence and presenting fabricated evidence of guilt to be clearly established, the court must determine if, in 2009, a reasonable supervisor would understand that she ‘would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by her subordinates in that context.’. . . Although the court has not identified extensive case law expressly treating supervisory liability in this context, the court finds that no reasonable supervisor could fail to grasp that liability would attach for exhibiting deliberate indifference towards the falsification and withholding of evidence by her subordinates. The prohibition of such unconstitutional behavior applies with obvious clarity to the acts of supervisors who condone or deliberately turn a blind eye to these acts.”)

Cavanagh v. Taranto, 95 F.Supp.3d 220, 234-39 (D. Mass. 2015) (“Although the right Cavanagh alleges is clearly established, to avoid qualified immunity the bounds and contours of a violation of that right must also be sufficiently clear such that no reasonable official could believe that the conduct of these officers at the time constituted deliberate indifference and therefore a violation of Ms. Scopa’s constitutional right. . . . Under this standard, the question is whether any reasonable officer in the position of each of the defendants at the time would have reasonably believed that ‘his actions, or willful failure to act, amounted to ‘deliberate indifference’ to the serious risk’ that Ms. Scopa would harm herself. . . I consider each of the identified violations—viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—in turn. . . . Cavanagh has not adduced any evidence that would permit a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that these defendants had actual knowledge of Ms. Scopa’s risk of suicide or were willfully blind to that risk. Under these circumstances, a reasonable official in the shoes of these defendants would not believe that his or her failure to identify Ms. Scopa as presenting a risk of harming herself constituted a violation of her constitutional right. . . .A reasonable officer under the circumstances here would understand that cell checks are for the purpose of ensuring inmate safety, but would be unaware that Ms. Scopa had any suicidal predisposition and would not be looking for specific signs of self-harm. . . .A reasonable officer in Coppinger’s position would not necessarily think that his failure to take action in response to the looped shoelace was ‘so inadequate as to shock the conscience’ or in reckless disregard of Ms. Scopa’s safety and therefore would rise to the level of a violation of Ms. Scopa’s right. . . Accordingly, at the time of Ms. Scopa’s death it was not ‘beyond debate’ that failing to take action in response to viewing a looped shoelace on the floor of a detainee’s cell, absent any other indicators of suicidal tendencies, was so clear a violation of the detainee’s Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment right that ‘every “reasonable official would have understood” that this inattention violates that right.”) Cocroft v. Smith, 95 F.Supp.3d 119, 127-28 (D. Mass. 2015) (“Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest was not clearly established at the time. It is true that Cocroft asserted that Officer Smith arrested her in retaliation for exercising her First Amendment rights. On this issue, Officer Smith may very well be correct that it is an unsettled question of law whether a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause is unlawful. However, the Court need not resolve this question because the jury found for Officer Smith on Cocroft’s retaliatory arrest claim. Therefore, the Court will focus on Officer Smith’s argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity on Cocroft’s claim that her arrest was not supported by probable cause. Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because a reasonable officer in his position would have believed that probable cause existed to believe that Cocroft committed the crime with which she was charged—disorderly conduct, or that she had committed the crime of interfering with a police officer in the exercise of his duties. The doctrine of qualified immunity protects a state actor from liability for damages under section 1983 as long as his conduct did not violate clearly established constitutional or federal statutory rights. The official’s actions are gauged by a standard of objective reasonableness. To obtain the benefit of qualified immunity, a police officer need not follow an unquestionably constitutional path. The case at hand exemplifies this point; where, as here, a section 1983 action rests on a claim of false arrest, the qualified immunity standard is satisfied ‘so long as the presence of probable cause is at least arguable.’ . . . In the preceding section, I found that there are no grounds to disturb the jury’s finding that Cocroft’s arrest was unlawful, i.e. , that Officer Smith lacked probable cause to arrest her for committing a crime. I find that the presence of probable cause for the arrest is not arguable. Furthermore, a reasonable officer in Officer Smith’s position would have known that his conduct violated Cocroft's rights. Accordingly, Officer Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Meagher v. Andover Sch. Comm., 94 F.Supp.3d 21, 42-44 (D. Mass. 2015) (“Although this court finds that McGrath deprived Meagher of her right of free speech, it concludes that the contours of this right were not clearly established at the time of Meagher’s termination. Therefore, McGrath is immune from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . This court finds that a reasonably competent official in McGrath’s position could have believed that she was not violating the First Amendment by terminating Meagher under the circumstances of this case. As an initial matter, there is no dispute that McGrath obtained the advice of counsel before she decided to terminate the plaintiff’s employment. . . . More importantly, at the time of the termination in 2012, the Supreme Court had not had occasion to clarify ‘the scope of a public employee’s employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties’ following its decision in Garcetti. . . . As evidenced by the differing interpretations given by the plaintiff and defendants in this case to the post-Garcetti decisions, the parameters of the First Amendment privilege remained murky. . . . It was not until 2014, when the Supreme Court decided Lane, that the Court explained that ‘the mere fact that a citizen’s speech concerns information acquired by virtue of his public employment does not transform that speech into employee—rather than citizen—speech[,]’ and that the ‘critical question’ for purposes of the First Amendment analysis ‘is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee’s duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.’. . . Moreover, both before and after Lane, as the First Circuit has emphasized, each case must turn on the specific factual context in which the speech at issue was made. . . . Therefore, ‘the contours of the [First Amendment] right were still cloudy’ and not clearly established at the time of the events in question in this case. . . . Even if this court were to assume that no reasonable official could have believed that Meagher was speaking pursuant to her official duties as a teacher, McGrath would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the outcome of the balancing of interests in this case, as required by the Supreme Court in Pickering, ‘was not so clear as to put all reasonable officials on notice that firing [Meagher] would violate the [Constitution].’. . . As the First Circuit has cautioned, ‘[b]ecause Pickering’s constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered clearly established for qualified immunity purposes.’. . . Consequently, it is ‘only in the extraordinary case’ that qualified immunity will not apply. . . . This is not such a case. . . . Accordingly, this court finds that McGrath could have reasonably determined that Meagher’s actions were disruptive to the operation of the school system, and ‘could have reasonably concluded that firing [the plaintiff] would not violate her First Amendment rights.’. . . Therefore, McGrath is entitled to qualified immunity.”) O’Connor v. Spain, 84 F.Supp.3d 60, 66-67(D. Mass. 2015) (“[T]his Court finds that a reasonable official in Defendant’s position could have believed that suspending Plaintiff for her comments did not violate her constitutional rights. The legal contours of the First Amendment rights of a public employee are, for better or worse, inherently murky. In Decotiis, for example, the First Circuit observed that the cases governing whether public employees speak as private citizens ‘reveal the muddiness of this area of the law,’ and concluded that it was not clearly established that Plaintiff's criticism of her employer was protected speech. . . Plaintiff does not cite a single case that would have put Defendant on notice that suspending Plaintiff for her election-related comments violated the First Amendment, and this Court is aware of none. The boundary between speaking as a private citizen and a public employee has not been drawn with such certainty that it clearly protects Plaintiff's right to endorse municipal election candidates while at work. This conclusion gains further support in the context of this specific case. Defendant was told by multiple individuals that Plaintiff had expressed her support for certain candidates by making an announcement in the dining room at the Senior Center during work hours. . . At least one senior told Defendant that she felt Plaintiff was telling the seniors how to vote. . . In an effort to be thorough and deliberate in his response, Defendant appointed the Chief of Police to investigate the complaints. The investigator concluded that Plaintiff did in fact make statements in support of certain candidates while on the job, and that the majority of those present believed Plaintiff was trying to influence their votes. . . A reasonable town manager could conclude from the available information that Plaintiff's speech was not protected because she was not speaking as a private citizen, and because the town has a significant interest in preventing its employees from using their official positions to endorse candidates in municipal elections. Indeed, this result is all but compelled by the totality-of-the-circumstances and interest-balancing nature of the First Amendment test for public employees. . . . Because a reasonable town manager could conclude that suspending Plaintiff would not violate her free speech rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, no material fact dispute exists that would preclude summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against Defendant in his individual capacity.")

Williams v. City of Brockton, 59 F.Supp.3d 228, 243-44 (D. Mass. 2014) ("At the time of the alleged violations, it was 'clearly established in this circuit and the Supreme Court' that 'retaliatory action in employment, involving a public employee's speech on a question of public concern' constituted a violation of the First Amendment. . . Therefore, the individual Police Defendants have not established that they are immune from liability on Williams' surviving claims against them under the doctrine of qualified immunity.") Baggett v. Ashe, CA 11-30223-MAP, 2014 WL 4252442, *12, *13 (D. Mass. Aug. 26, 2014) ("At the time of this constitutional violation, clearly established law prohibited a male officer from viewing a female inmate during a strip search. Cookish, 945 F.2d at 447. It was also plainly unconstitutional to require a female inmate to expose herself, particularly to the extreme degree required during a strip search, in the presence of a male officer. Cofield, 391 F.3d at 337. Given these cases, any reasonable official would have recognized the unreasonableness of requiring a female inmate to strip in the presence of a male officer holding a video camera and pointing it at her. The unconstitutionality of such a policy was, quite simply, 'a foregone conclusion.' Bonitz, 804 F.2d at 173 n. 10. Given the clarity of the law at the time the policy was put in place, a reasonable official would have been properly on notice that the policy would inevitably result in an unconstitutional search. Moreover, even if the state of the law were ambiguous—which it was not—this policy was so clearly 'antithetical to human dignity' that qualified immunity would still be inappropriate. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Any reasonable official viewing the policy would have concluded that it had the potential to humiliate and demean the female inmates. However sincere Defendants' attempts to comply with the law may have been, it was unreasonable for them to neglect the obvious ramifications of their policy. Ultimately, a reasonable individual in Defendants' position could not have concluded that permitting male officers to videotape female inmates during strip searches—even if the officers looked away—was constitutional. Therefore, Defendants are not entitled to the protections of qualified immunity, and Plaintiff is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.”)

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 65-67 (D. Mass. 2014) (“State drug analysts are as much an arm of the government as are police officers, and can also inflict constitutional injury if they fail to disclose material exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecution. Therefore, it seems clear that defendants can be found liable for failing to provide exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecutor for disclosure to the defendant. The alleged exculpatory or impeachment evidence in this case concerns the reliability of the testing performed by Dookhan. Dookhan testified at plaintiff’s trial. Plaintiff alleges that Dookhan’s supervisors, including defendants, knew that she often tested up to five times more samples per month than other chemists; that they were aware of complaints about Dookhan from Peter Piro and Michael Lawler; and that they ignored the fact that Dookhan circulated several different versions of her resume within the office. None of that information was disclosed to plaintiff during his criminal prosecution. Assuming the facts alleged in the complaint are true, defendants knew about material impeachment evidence concerning Dookhan and failed to disclose it to the prosecutor in plaintiff’s case. The complaint therefore states a claim under § 1983. . . Defendants nonetheless contend that the complaint should be dismissed because they are entitled to qualified immunityThe complaint here alleges that defendants knew that Dookhan performed five times as many tests as other chemists, that they had received complaints that she forged quality-control tests, and that they ignored the fact that she circulated different copies of her resume. An objectively reasonable crime-laboratory supervisor would have understood that such information should be reported to prosecutors, because fabricated or unreliable drug-analysis results would affect the outcomes and, indeed, the basic fairness, of the affected criminal cases. At the very least, an objectively reasonable laboratory supervisor would have done something to investigate the alleged irregularities to see if there was a problem to disclose. As alleged by plaintiff, the 2010 audit of Dookhan’s work was insufficient to address those issues because, among other things, it did not include re-testing of samples. As noted, no case law directly on point has imposed civil liability on state laboratory officials for Brady violations. However, “[i]t follows logically that, in some situations, “a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.”” . . . It was well-established that a police officer could be held liable for not disclosing exculpatory information. It would have been obvious that the same principle would extend to state drug-laboratory chemists and supervisors. Accordingly, defendants were on reasonable notice that the information they knew about Dookhan should have been disclosed. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. In the context of a motion to dismiss, the Court must accept the plausible factual allegations in the complaint as true. . . The complaint alleges that defendants knew about serious concerns over the accuracy of Dookhan's chemical testing and did not disclose that information to prosecutors in his case. That is sufficient to defeat a claim of qualified immunity at the pleadings stage.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 69 (D. Mass. 2014) ("Defendants contend they are entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's claims for supervisory liability under § 1983. 'When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a § 1983 action, the "clearly established" prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context.' . . . Again, although there is no direct authority for holding state crime laboratory supervisors liable for their deliberate indifference to constitutional violations by their subordinates, the constitutional rights and supervisory liability doctrine that underlie plaintiff's claims are clearly established. . . . The qualified immunity analysis here therefore turns on whether, in the particular circumstances confronted by defendants, they should have reasonably understood that their conduct jeopardized the constitutional rights of criminal defendants subject to the laboratory testing procedures. . . . Reasonable officials in defendants' position, as alleged in the complaint, would have known their conduct could violate a criminal defendant's rights to due process and a fair trial. Assuming the allegations in the complaint are true, defendants were 'put on notice of behavior which was likely to result in the violation of the constitutional rights of citizens.' . . . Whether plaintiff can prove those claims is a question for another day.")

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13-10208-GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *10, *11 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) (O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("In Hernandez-Cuevas, the First Circuit explicitly joined with those circuits employing the constitutional approach, and held that a plaintiff may bring a malicious prosecution claim under § 1983 if he or she can establish that the defendant (1) caused (2) a seizure of the plaintiff pursuant to legal process unsupported by probable cause, and (3) criminal proceedings terminated in the plaintiff's favor. . . . Although it did so in 2013, the Court nevertheless noted that

'[t]his holding makes explicit what has long been implicit in our case law. In the past we have held that 'some truths are self-evident.... [I]f any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'

Id. at 100 (quoting Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44-45 (1st Cir.2004)).

Although qualified immunity presents a legal issue, courts analyzing the issue must be careful 'not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiff's complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability.' . . . A fair reading of the Amended Complaint is that Solomon alleges that Keenan joined with Dookhan and others in a scheme to falsify evidence, destroy and withhold exculpatory evidence, obstruct justice and offer false testimony. At no point could a reasonable police officer have believed that such conduct would be permissible. Qualified immunity does not bar any of the claims asserted against Keenan.”)

Abrami v. Town of Amherst, No. 09–30176–DPWJ, 2013 WL 3777070, *8, *9 (D. Mass. July 16, 2013) (“The contours of an officer’s authority and a suspect’s rights in the context of a doorway seizure are not well defined. Some courts, for example, have found that a suspect opening the door to the police does not relinquish his right of privacy in the home unless he acquiesces in detention, while others have found that acquiescence is not required. . . . Some courts have also indicated that a suspect’s rights may differ when the door is opened to law enforcement, as opposed to a lay invitee. . . . But the various approaches to doorway seizures only serve to reinforce that Abrami’s rights, when he voluntarily presented himself to Humber through the doorway, were not clearly established. Indeed, the substantial uncertainty surrounding doorway seizures has formed the basis for qualified immunity in the past. . . . I conclude that, on the facts most favorable to Abrami, Humber mistook the extent to which Abrami had relinquished his expectations of privacy in the home (and effectively consented to entry) merely by voluntarily coming to the door and placing himself in public view. . . . But Humber’s mistake was reasonable, given the considerable uncertainty surrounding the rights of suspects engaged in doorway interactions with law enforcement—with respect to their Fourth Amendment protection against both an arrest or investigatory seizure and any accompanying entry into the home. Moreover, Humber accompanied his reasonable mistake about the extent to which Abrami had forfeited his expectations of privacy with the proportionally modest entry of requiring that the door to the apartment remain open while he conducted an investigatory doorway seizure. Humber is thus entitled to qualified immunity. On this basis, summary judgment must enter on the aspects of Count I alleging unlawful entry, as well as those alleging that Abrami’s arrest was unlawful as a result of any such entry.”)

Walker v. Jackson, 952 F.Supp.2d 343, (D. Mass. 2013) (“The Walkers seek to hold the defendants liable for failing to intervene to prevent Officer Jackson’s allegedly unreasonable search. But the court has not found any cases holding officers liable in analogous circumstances. Indeed, the cases within the First Circuit deal almost exclusively with the failure to intervene in the use of excessive force. . . . Nevertheless, this court cannot definitively conclude that a claim alleging a failure to intervene in an unreasonable search fails to state a constitutional violation. Other circuits addressing failure to intervene claims have described liability in more general terms. According to the Second Circuit, ‘An officer who fails to intercede is liable for the preventable harm caused by the actions of the other officers where that officer observes or has reason to know: (1) that excessive force is being used; (2) that a citizen has been unjustifiably arrested; or (3) that any constitutional violation has been committed by a law enforcement official.’ . . . But even when courts define liability more broadly, the facts of the cases tend to involve acts of excessive force or unlawful arrest. . . . It is therefore unclear whether liability may be imposed for failing to intervene in an unreasonable search. It is plain, however, that the contours of the constitutional right were not sufficiently clear to give the defendants notice that their conduct in this case was unconstitutional. The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene. Accordingly, the court agrees that the defendants have qualified immunity as to Count II.”) Holder v. Town of Newton, No. 09-cv-341-JD, 2010 WL 5185137, at *6, *7 (D.N.H. Dec. 15, 2010) (“Courts that have considered the issue have determined in similar circumstances that a right of individuals to possess and bear firearms for private civilian purposes, as opposed to military purposes, was not clearly established before 2008, when the Supreme Court decided District of Columbia v. Heller, 128 S.Ct. 2783, 2799 (2008)). See, e.g., Emerson v. City of New York, 2010 WL 2910661, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. July 19, 2010); Cardenas v. City of Chicago, 2010 WL 2609866, at *7, n. 8 (N.D. Ill. June 25, 2010) (citing cases). . . . Therefore, to the extent Holder could show that Streeter and Jewett violated his Second Amendment rights, which has not been established in this case, they are protected by qualified immunity.”)

Vendouri v. Gaylord, No. 10-cv-277-SM, 2010 WL 4261233, at *5 (D.N.H. Oct. 26, 2010) (“In this case, the right at issue is not the general parental right to direct the upbringing and education of her child. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, the right at issue here is the claimed right of a noncustodial parent to be notified by her child’s school whenever the child is dismissed from school to the parent who has been awarded legal and physical custody by a court of competent jurisdiction (or that parent’s appropriate representative). None of the relevant Supreme Court opinions, nor controlling decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, establishes such a right. James, the opinion on which Vendouri relies, was decided after the conduct Vendouri complains of and identifies a significantly narrower parental right than the one Vendouri claims the school defendants violated in this case. . . . Moreover, James holds that at the time of the conduct underlying that case, the right of a noncustodial parent to be notified of an actual legal transfer of custody was not clearly established. If the narrow right at issue in James was not clearly established when the school defendants engaged in the conduct Vendouri challenges, then the broader right on which Vendouri bases her claim was not clearly established either.”)

Oxley v. Penobscot County, No. 09-cv-21-B-W, 2010 WL 582222, at *12 (D. Me. Feb. 12, 2010) (“My reading of the cases is to the effect that arrestees subject to a temporary seizure at a jail who will not be joining the prison population are entitled to the same Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures as any other arrestee, and that officers cannot manipulate the standard simply by processing or booking an arrestee at a facility that houses others for penological purposes. I arrive at this conclusion by reading existing caselaw, beginning with Bell v. Wolfish. . . . I am persuaded that a reasonable officer in Ms. Kelleher’s position could reasonably have believed that a strip search in a private setting by officers of the same sex as Ms. Oxley would not violate the constitution because contraband was discovered on the person of Ms. Oxley’s traveling companion at the jail and because Ms. Oxley was being processed in the county jail pending release on bail. . . . A reasonable officer in her position could have believed that the jail environment and presence of contraband on Ms. Hughes was minimally sufficient to justify the search in question.”).

Toro v. Murphy, No. 07-11721-PBS, 2009 WL 5064575, at *6, *7 (D. Mass. Dec. 17, 2009) (“The crucial question in this case is whether the unlawfulness of Murphy’s conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in the same position. This demands an analysis of the laws concerning materiality that existed at the time of Murphy’s alleged withholding. At that time, evidence was material if it [sic] ‘the omitted evidence create[d] a reasonable doubt that did not otherwise exist.’ United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 112-13, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976). . . . At the time of the Plaintiff’s criminal trial, the Agurs standard required timely disclosure of exculpatory evidence if, ‘on consideration of the entire record, the evidence is capable of creating a reasonable doubt that would not otherwise exist.’ . . . In addition, this duty was extended to the police officers who investigated the case. Commonwealth v. Redding, 382 Mass. 154, 157, 414 N.E.2d 347, 348 (1980) (“The police are also part of the prosecution, and the taint on the trial is no less if they, rather than the State’s Attorney, were guilty of nondisclosure.”) (internal citations omitted). . . . The Agurs standard was sufficiently specific to ‘clearly establish’ the right to exculpatory evidence regarding alternative suspects. The big question is whether a reasonable officer in Murphy’s position in 1981 would have believed that the evidence of an alternative suspect should have been turned over. Murphy himself has admitted, through deposition testimony, that if he had the report, it should have been turned over as both exculpatory and material. . . . In these circumstances, Murphy is not protected by qualified immunity.”).

Bowler v. Town of Hudson, 514 F.Supp.2d 168, 183 (D. Mass. 2007) (“Plaintiffs argue that the First Amendment right of the high school students to engage in non-disruptive speech was clearly established, and that the individual defendants should have known that censorship of HSCCA posters was unconstitutional under Tinker and Fraser. The First Amendment jurisprudence governing a school’s regulation of student access to violent speech on the internet with the benign intent to protect students from images which may be upsetting and psychologically damaging is not settled, as is indicated by the fractured decisions in Pico regarding the role of the subjective intent for the censorship and the uncertain status of the ‘right to be left alone’ under Harper. Given the Court’s own difficulty in determining whether a First Amendment violation occurred in this case, the Court cannot find that the First Amendment rights in this case were ‘clearly established’ in order to defeat the individual defendants’ claim of qualified immunity .The Court also finds no evidence that a similarly situated official would have acted differently. The plaintiffs do not dispute that the videos linked by the HCSSA website were upsetting, . . .and plaintiffs do not otherwise challenge the blocking of access to the URL on HHS computers by Technology Director Ms. Schuck. It is understandable that, after limiting access to the URL on HHS computers, a reasonable school administrator would proceed to remove the URL from the Club’s posters. Qualified immunity contemplates such errors and mistakes. . . Finally, and curiously, plaintiffs have not argued against qualified immunity for the individual school administrators on the ground that they were impermissibly motivated to punish the Club’s speech because of its content. . . . As a result, the Court similarly considers abandoned any claim that the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because of their impermissible motivation. The Court thus ALLOWS summary judgment as to the qualified immunity of the individual defendants.”).

Mongeau v. City of Marlborough, 462 F.Supp.2d 144, 153 (D. Mass. 2006) (“In the immediate case, Mongeau may have a viable claim that his constitutional rights were violated. As discussed, the First Circuit has left the door slightly ajar in substantive due process claims in land-use actions involving allegations of corruption or bribery. Given that the First Circuit has explicitly refused to decide whether such an allegation can make out a section 1983 claim, such a right is not ‘clearly established.’ Consequently, as counterintuitive as it may seem, Reid is entitled to qualified immunity even if he required mitigation payments in order to grant a permit. This is the logical conclusion that must follow from Harlow and the First Circuit opinions discussing section 1983 in the context of land-use disputes. This qualified immunity follows in the wake of the First Circuit’s express reluctance to recognize any type of section 1983 claim in this particular context.”).

Charles v. City of Boston, 365 F.Supp.2d 82, 89 (D. Mass. 2005) (“Bogdan’s related qualified immunity argument must also fail because it turns on the absence of a clearly established duty for him to disclose directly to a defendant, which is not the constitutional breach that Charles is alleging. Bogdan’s duty to disclose Brady information to the prosecutor was clearly established at the time of his investigation into the 1980 rapes (not to mention his duty—unquestionably well-established—to testify truthfully on the stand). Thus, if the qualified immunity question is ‘whether a reasonable official could have believed his actions were lawful in light of clearly established law and the information the official possessed at the time of the allegedly unlawful conduct,’ . . . the answer is an unequivocal ‘no.’ Bogdan, an experienced crime lab technician, must have known of his legal obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutors, their obligation to pass it along to the defense, and his obligation not to cover up a Brady violation by perjuring himself. That there is no statutory or common law rule explicitly proscribing such conduct—no case that says ‘a crime lab technician whose tests go a long way to exculpating the defendant must disclose that to the prosecutor and cannot lie about them on the stand’—does not mean that Bogdan’s behavior is immunized. Some acts are unlawful on their face.”).

King’s Grant Inn v. Town of Gilford, No. Civ.03-249-SM, 2005 WL 361547, at *4, *5 (D.N.H. Feb. 16, 2005) (not reported)(“The general principle stated in Shuttlesworth, however, is too abstract for useful application in considering qualified immunity. See Riverdale Mills, 392 F.3d at 66 (“The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether ‘the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear.’”). Rather, the proper question here is whether a local government official, in April, May, and June of 2003, should have understood, based on established law, that it was unlawful to deny a request for an exotic dancing permit based upon the applicant’s having a ‘significant history’ of violating alcoholic beverage control laws. . . . When the constitutional right at issue here is properly cast, it becomes apparent that the right was not clearly established. The selectmen made their permit decisions pursuant to an ordinance that had not, to that point, been challenged on constitutional grounds. And, the ordinance was adopted pursuant to the implicit mandate of a state statute, requiring that holders of liquor licenses may ‘provide entertainment and dancing ... provided they have received written authorization by the town or city.’ . . . At the time the individual defendants denied plaintiff’s permit applications, no decisional law was in place describing the permissible bases on which written authorization for entertainment and dancing in establishments licensed to serve liquor might, constitutionally, be either granted or withheld. Moreover, neither the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit nor the United States Supreme Court has resolved a case sufficiently similar to this one to provide clear notice that defendants’ denial of plaintiff’s permit applications amounted to a denial of First Amendment rights. The general principle established in Shuttlesworth was applied, by the Eleventh Circuit, in a somewhat similar factual setting, as described earlier. But, it is not at all clear that the opinion in Fly Fish, constitutes ‘a consensus of persuasive authority elsewhere[.]’ . . . It cannot be said, then, that the constitutional right at issue here, properly framed, was clearly established in federal decisional law. Finally, the third permit denial (on June 2, 2003) took place after the New Hampshire Superior Court had held that the Inn was not likely to succeed on the merits of its First Amendment claim. At the very least, then, on that occasion, defendants’ reliance on the decision of the New Hampshire Superior Court, particularly given the absence of specific federal precedent, was not unreasonable, and did not result in forfeiture of their qualified immunity. Because the contours of the legal right defendants violated were not clearly established at the time they acted, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from personal liability, and they are entitled to partial summary judgment on that point.”).

McIntyre v. United States, No. CIV.A.01-CV-10408-RC, 2004 WL 2230406, at *17, 23-25 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2004) (“[W]hen plaintiffs allege that, in disclosing the informant status of McIntyre to Bulger and Flemmi, Connolly acted affirmatively to put the life of McIntyre in jeopardy, they have sufficiently alleged a violation by Connolly of McIntyre’s substantive due process right to be protected from the danger of the government’s own creation. But the plaintiffs argue in vain when they assert that the ‘state-created danger’ theory, or the ‘constitutional duty not to affirmatively abuse governmental power so as to create danger to individuals and render them more vulnerable to harm,’ . . . was clearly established at the time Bulger and Flemmi are alleged to have murdered McIntyre. Soto v. Flores forecloses this argument . . . The defense of qualified immunity applies unless the law is clearly established either by materially similar precedent or by general legal principles that apply with obvious clarity to the facts of the case. . . Under the facts as alleged by the plaintiffs, it cannot be doubted that Connolly violated the substantive due process rights of McIntyre. In fact, because Connolly allegedly participated in and/or aided and abetted the murder of McIntyre, the right in question might be characterized as the right not to be murdered by the government. As so characterized, the right is clearly established by the words of the Fifth Amendment itself. . . But, even if the right is characterized as a right not to be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder, the right was clearly established before McIntyre was murdered. The fact that there is no case proclaiming the existence of the right under factual circumstances like those presented by the case before me does not preclude a determination that the right was clearly established. The Supreme Court has rejected the notion that the determination of whether a constitutional right is clearly established requires that a court find that the facts before it are fundamentally similar to a previous case declaring the right. . . . Based on these principles, I hold that in 1984, the substantive due process right to not be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder was clearly established. Although in 1984 the courts had not addressed factual circumstances ‘fundamentally similar’ to those alleged by the plaintiffs in this case, ‘in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness’ of Connolly’s conduct was ‘apparent.’ . . . The text of the Fifth Amendment provided the general prohibition against the government’s depriving citizens of life. It was also clearly established in 1984 that constitutional violations can be effectuated by private actors acting in concert with government actors. . . . Although none of the parties have addressed the issue, I also hold that, based on the plaintiff’s allegations, it was reasonable for Connolly to have been aware that his conduct violated McIntyre’s clearly established right to be free from government-involved murder. There are no allegations supporting a conclusion that Connolly made a reasonable mistake as to what the law required, . . . that he was reasonably ignorant of crucial facts, . . . or that any other circumstance existed that would have made it unreasonable for Connolly to appreciate that his conduct was unconstitutional.”)

Hudson v. Maloney, 326 F.Supp.2d 206, 210-12 (D. Mass. 2004) (“That the plaintiffs clearly identified viable and pertinent constitutional rights in their Complaint under the First and Fourteenth Amendments is not seriously contested by defendants. . . . Consequently, it is to the second step of the Saucier test that the court turns: would a reasonable prison administrator when confronted, in September of 2002, at the latest, with plaintiffs’ demands for Halal meals prepared by Muslim inmates, have determined that a clearly established right was being invoked. Here, it is important not to confuse the general with the particular and to frame the issue precisely. In September of 2002, a reasonable prison official would have known that a prisoner’s right to the free exercise of his religion, so long as it did not compromise institutional security, was clearly established, and further that this right encompassed a diet consistent with the prisoner’s sincere religious beliefs. . . . Rather, the precise question that would have been asked is whether the law had clearly established a Muslim inmate’s right to a particular dietary ingredient (Halal meal), prepared in a particular way (by other Muslim inmates), or whether it was sufficient for prison authorities to provide an alternative diet (vegetarian or pork-free) that was ‘consistent’ with the teachings of the inmate’s faith, if not every aspect of his belief. In consulting the decisions of courts that had considered the issue before September of 2002, [footnote omitted] a reasonable prison official would have learned that the vast majority of these courts had determined that a prison permissibly discharged its constitutional duty to respect the dietary beliefs of Muslim inmates by offering an alternative, pork-free diet, and more broadly, that the law permitted prison authorities to limit the dietary options available to prisoners in the interests of reducing the costs and burdens entailed in accommodating the smorgasbord of food-related religious beliefs likely to be encountered in a prison population. . . . In light of this legal precedent, no reasonable prison official would have concluded that Muslim inmates had an established right to Halal meals prepared by other Muslim inmates or that prison administrators did not have broad discretion in the matter of prison dietary alternatives.”).

Quiles v. Kilson, 337 F.Supp.2d 224, 231(D. Mass. 2004) (“In the instant case, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the strip searches conducted. It is possible that the plaintiffs’ allegations about the City’s practice of strip searching, if true, would establish a constitutional violation. The law at the time of this alleged violation, however, was not clear because the First Circuit had not yet decided Swain. The law does not require state actors to ‘carry a crystal ball’ as to what the future trajectory of the law will be. . . The defendants cannot be expected to have known that the searches, made pursuant to a valid warrant and a City policy with respect to strip searching, violated the law. The individual defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the inside plaintiffs.[footnote omitted] With respect to the outside plaintiffs, the question of qualified immunity is more problematic. The searches themselves were questionable because if the defendants were not in the Apartment, they were almost certainly illegal. The ‘all persons’ warrant applied only to the persons in the Apartment. There is nothing in the affidavit or elsewhere to suggest that children were involved in selling drugs at 7 Congress Street. If they were not in the Apartment, there was no probable cause to search the outside plaintiffs. Unlike the law with respect to strip searching, which was unclear at the time of the incident, the law relating to probable cause was clear. An objectively reasonable officer should have known that it violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the outside plaintiffs to search them if they were not originally inside the Apartment. The individual defendants are not, therefore, entitled to a qualified immunity defense with respect to the outside plaintiffs.”).

Suboh v. Borgioli, 298 F.Supp.2d 192, 205, 206 (D. Mass. 2004) (“In its opinion on this case, the First Circuit ruled that it was clearly established as of 1998 that ‘a state official could not effectively resolve a disputed custody issue between a parent and another without following any due process procedures at all[.]’ . . . It then indicated that the relevant question, in determining whether Borgioli was entitled to qualified immunity, was whether ‘a reasonable officer could have concluded on the facts before him that the Kandys had undisputed custody of the child, despite Suboh’s claims, and so no process of any sort was due before the child could be released to the Kandys.’ . . By framing the issue in such a way, the First Circuit necessarily reduced the scope of facts determinative to the qualified immunity analysis. Were there, for example, a genuine dispute as to whether Suboh told Borgioli that she was Sofia’s biological mother or that she wanted custody of her daughter, the jury would indeed be needed to resolve these crucial questions. To the extent that the determinative facts were unclear or disputed prior to the trial, however, that dispute was resolved by Borgioli’s own trial testimony. As noted above, on the stand Borgioli testified that Suboh told him that she was Sofia’s biological mother, that she had not signed any papers giving custody of Sofia to her parents, and that she wanted to regain custody of her daughter. Regardless of the apparent credibility or lack thereof of Suboh’s statements, [footnote omitted] the Court fails to see how any reasonable officer could not have, at a minimum, concluded that there were indeed competing claims to Sofia’s custody such that he simply could not decide the dispute himself. Borgioli argues that ‘there was certainly a hotly contested factual dispute as to what [he] knew at various points in his investigation,’ . . . but it is undisputed that the crucial piece of information—that Suboh was claiming to be Sofia’s biological mother and was asserting a right to custody of her daughter—was known to Borgioli when he decided to place Sofia in the custody of the Kandys. Accordingly, at this point, there are simply no remaining factual disputes that a jury needs to resolve for the Court to be able to rule on qualified immunity, given Borgioli's own testimony. In such a circumstance, it is appropriate for the Court to rule on qualified immunity straightaway, . . . and that is what the Court has done here. Given the Court's determinations that (1) the undisputed facts of this case establish that Suboh's procedural due process rights were violated by her failure to receive any hearing attendant to the loss of custody of her daughter; and (2) the undisputed facts demonstrate that Borgioli is not entitled to qualified immunity, the scope of the new trial is necessarily limited. All that remains for the new trial is the important question of what— if any—damages were proximately caused by Borgioli's violation of Suboh's procedural due process rights.”).

Pliakos v. City of Manchester, No. 01-461-M., 2003 WL 21687543, at *13, *14 (D.N.H. July 15, 2003) (unpublished) (“A difficult question is presented in this case regarding the level of specificity with which it is appropriate to define the constitutional right plaintiff claims was violated. All can agree that the right not to be subjected to ‘unreasonable’ or ‘excessive’ force during the course of an arrest was, when Pliakos was taken into custody, clearly established. . . . If the constitutional right plaintiff claims was infringed must necessarily be defined more precisely, it is far less clear that such a right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of Pliakos’s arrest. . . . Except for Pliakos’s predisposition to positional asphyxia (due to, among other things, obesity, acute cocaine intoxication, cardiac hypertrophy, and his violent struggle), he likely would have suffered no lasting adverse effects from his brief detention on his stomach. Reduced to its essence, then, the question presented is whether Pliakos had a clearly established right not to be restrained in the manner (and for the duration) that he was, in light of the risk factors he presented with regard to positional asphyxia (some of which were obvious and others of which were unknown to the officers). . . . The case precedent discussed above does not establish a constitutional right not to be handcuffed in a prone position if one presents some of the risk factors for positional asphyxia. In fact, many of the courts that have confronted this relatively rare situation have specifically concluded, under circumstances very much like those presented in this case, that there is no such constitutional right at all, much less a ‘clearly established’ right. See, e.g., Phillips, supra; Cottrell, supra. Necessarily, then, an objectively reasonable police officer, presented with the violent circumstances that confronted the defendants on October 13, 1999, would not have realized that restraining Pliakos in the manner (and for the period of time) that defendants did would amount to a violation of his clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure or the use of excessive force.”).

Demers v. Leominster School Department, 263 F. Supp.2d 195, 208 (D. Mass. 2003) (“Because I determined that Michael’s constitutional rights were not infringed by the actions of the School Officials, no reasonable government official in the Defendants’ shoes would have believed that he or she was violating Michael’s rights by suspending him because of the drawing and note. Michael had a record of emotional disturbances and school behavioral problems, some which involved violence or aggression toward others. It was not clearly established at the time that Michael was suspended that disciplining a student, who made a violent and threatening drawing, violated that student's constitutional rights. Finally, there is limited case law on the issue of school violence in this Circuit, which lends further credence to conclude that this area of the law is unsettled. . . . Therefore, the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Aceto v. Kachajian, 240 F. Supp.2d 121, 126, 127 (D. Mass. 2003) (“In sum, the Court holds that on May 23, 2000, it was clearly established under published caselaw that when a non-threatening, non-flight-risk, cooperating arrestee for a minor crime tells the police she suffers from an injury that would be exacerbated by handcuffing her arms behind her back, the arrestee has a right to be handcuffed with her arms in front of her even if the injury is not visible. If the Court assumes Aceto’s account of the facts to be true, any reasonable officers confronting Aceto’s situation would have known that handcuffing her arms behind her back was unlawful excessive force.”).

Soto v. Bzdel, 214 F. Supp.2d 69, 75-77 (D. Mass. 2002) (“In the court’s opinion, a plaintiff may state a constitutional claim if, while a police officer is making an arrest pursuant to a warrant, the officer fails to release the plaintiff after the officer receives information upon which to reasonably conclude that the warrant had been recalled. Thus, viewing the facts here in a light most favorable to Plaintiff—particularly the fact that Plaintiff made Defendants aware of the Notice of Recall, but that Defendants chose not to look at that notice—the court finds, for present purposes, that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably ‘seized’ in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . With regard to the second and, in effect, the third questions, Plaintiff asserts that the law was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incident that Fourth Amendment seizures must be conducted in a reasonable manner. That may be true as a general proposition. . . . However, as the First Circuit has explained, ‘the inquiry whether the right at issue [is] clearly established properly focuses not upon the right at its most general or abstract level, but at the level of its application to the specific conduct being challenged.’ Singer v. State of Me., 49 F.3d 837, 845 (1st Cir.1995) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). . . . [T]he court must answer the second question in the qualified immunity analysis in the negative. Plaintiff has ‘not brought to [the court’s] attention any cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which [he] seek[s] to rely,’ nor has he ‘identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . . It need hardly be said, therefore, with regard to the third question that no objectively reasonable officer in October of 1999 would have believed that disregarding Plaintiff’s Notice of Recall and arresting him based on information from the WMS [Warrant Management System], as did Defendants, was [un]lawful in light of clearly established law. . . . [E]ven though Defendants may well have been cavalier in dealing with Plaintiff, and thus might lose were the court to consider the merits, they cannot reasonably be charged with knowing that they were violating a clearly established right. This ought not hold true in the future. Presently, however, Defendants fall under the umbrella of qualified immunity and the court will grant them summary judgment on Counts I and IV.” [footnotes omitted]).

Moreta-Ramirez v. Lemert, 156 F. Supp.2d 138, 142 (D.P.R. 2001) (Clearly, the duty to disclose established by Brady, is imposed on the prosecution. Brady does not express a view as to the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. . . In fact, the existence of a constitutionally-derived liability on the part of police officers for failure to disclose and the contours of such liability are not clearly established.”).

Reid v. Simmons, 163 F. Supp.2d 81, 96, 97 (D.N.H. 2001) (“In summary, because it was not clearly established in 1987 that a police officer’s failure to disclose potentially, though not obviously, exculpatory impeachment material (particularly that which was generated in unrelated investigations) would constitute a discrete and actionable violation of the defendant’s constitutional right to due process (independent of the Brady violation which is, of course, caused by the prosecutor’s failure to turn over such information), Simmons is entitled to qualified immunity. He is also entitled to the protections afforded by qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable police officer in his situation in 1987, looking forward before Reid’s criminal trial, would not have appreciate[d] the potentially material and exculpatory nature of the investigative reports in question. So, even if Simmons did fail to disclose the reports, he cannot be charged with having understood that such a failure would violate federal law by depriving Reid of his right to due process and a fair trial.”).

Greenleaf v. Cote, No. CIV. 98-250-B, 2000 WL 863217, at *3 & n.3 (D. Me. March 3, 2000) (“greeing with courts in Konop and Sostarecz that students had clearly established right to be free from unreasonable search of belongings by school officials; disagreeing with Jenkins v. Talladega City Bd. of Ed., 115 F.3d 821 (11th Cir. 1997)).

Grendell v. Gillway, 974 F. Supp. 46, 52 (D. Me. 1997) (“[A]lthough the Court is mindful that the First Circuit has never held verbal threats or harassment to constitute conscience-shocking behavior, the Court is equally mindful that abhorrent conduct is still abhorrent even though it has not been subject to judicial determination. For these reasons, the Court finds that, lack of direct precedent notwithstanding, Gillway’s alleged conduct is shocking to the conscience and violative of Grendell’s substantive due process rights. Since the Court finds that Grendell has alleged that Gillway violated a constitutional right, it is now appropriate to turn to the issue of qualified immunity and, consequently, the question of whether this right was clearly established at the time Gillway acted. . . .The Court is persuaded that Grendell’s right to be free from behavior that is shocking to the conscience was clearly established at the time of Gillway’s alleged conduct and therefore holds that Gillway is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Simply because there is no clearly defined case law condemning certain conduct does not mean police officers should be free to engage in such conduct, no matter how offensive or destructive to a fair and just society that conduct may be, and then hide behind the shield of qualified immunity. The Court is convinced, therefore, that even in the absence of precedent, conduct that shocks the conscience is so patently egregious that the constitutional right it violates is necessarily clearly established and that a reasonable officer should know that his conduct violates that right.”).

Ferreira v. Dubois, 963 F. Supp. 1244, 1258 (D. Mass. 1996) (“[I]t was not clearly established that procedural due process afforded an inmate/defendant the right to have interpreter services for a non-English speaking inmate/witness at a prison disciplinary hearing. Nor was it clearly established that an inmate/defendant had a right to require the hearing officer to query the inmate/witness as to his ability to speak and/or comprehend English. “).

SECOND CIRCUIT

Soukaneh v. Andrzejewski, 112 F.4th 107, 121-25, 127-29 (2d Cir. 2024) (“[O]n this record, Andrzejewski did not have probable cause to handcuff and detain Soukaneh in his police cruiser for at least half an hour based on Soukaneh’s disclosure of a gun and facially valid permit, and thus, he violated Soukaneh’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable and warrantless arrest and detention. . . . Andrzejewski argues that due to the ‘absence of case law on point from this Circuit [or] the Supreme Court, a reasonable officer could believe that he or she was justified in detaining an armed individual, who had been lawfully pulled over for a traffic violation, long enough to confirm that the individual had a valid pistol permit.’. . . But Andrzejewski’s characterization of Soukaneh’s detention neglects to account for its forcible nature and protracted length, as well as the admitted absence of reason for questioning the permit’s facial validity in the first instance. Additionally, Andrzejewski makes no argument whatsoever that the detention was only as long and as intrusive as reasonably necessary to confirm the validity of the gun permit. Indeed, the absence of any evidence or assertions about the timing or duration of the license check is conspicuous. Accordingly, we must assess whether it was clearly established that Andrzejewski violated Soukaneh’s Fourth Amendment rights when he detained Soukaneh in handcuffs, in the back of a police cruiser, for over half an hour, in the context of a traffic stop, and when: (1) Soukaneh was compliant with the officer’s requests, (2) Soukaneh engaged in no suspicious or evasive behavior, (3) Soukaneh volunteered that he held a facially valid firearms license and disclosed the presence and location of a gun in his possession pursuant to that license, and (4) Andrzejewski provided no other basis for a finding of probable cause as to any other offense to support the ensuing intrusions. Although Andrzejewski is correct that there is no factual twin for this case in the Second Circuit or Supreme Court, the standard for the clear establishment of a right is not so exacting. While ‘clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality for purposes of qualified immunity analysis,’ ‘it is error to demand [the] specificity’ of a factual twin. . . . We conclude that the ubiquity of Fourth Amendment protections established in the plethora of traffic stop cases put Andrzejewski on notice of the protected rights at issue during his de facto arrest of Soukaneh in the absence of probable cause. We have made clear that ‘a constitutional right to be free from arrest without probable cause, as well as a constitutional right to be free from unreasonably prolonged or intrusive investigative detention’ are themselves the clearly established rights that justify the denial of qualified immunity. [citing Gilles v. Repicky, 511 F.3d 239, 247 (2d Cir. 2007)]. . . . Even in the absence of a case in the specific context of verifying a gun permit during a traffic stop, a reasonable officer in Andrzejewski’s position would know that this type of detention was unwarranted where there was no reasonable or asserted basis for questioning the legitimacy of the gun permit, where Soukaneh did not engage in any suspicious or non-compliant behavior, and where there were no facts to support the inference that he was engaging in criminal activity. This is not a case in which there were circumstances, however insufficient to establish probable cause, that might suggest to a reasonable officer that there was something illegal about a suspect's possession of a weapon. Here, there was literally no reason to believe that Soukaneh's possession of the gun—whose presence Soukaneh freely acknowledged, and for which he provided a facially valid permit that Andrzejewski had no reason whatsoever to believe was forged or had been revoked—was unlawful. . . . The law as it stood at the time of the events in question left no doubt that a person in possession of a firearm and a facially valid permit for that firearm had a clearly established right to be free from the kind of forcible and prolonged detention to which Soukaneh was subjected, absent any objective reason to suspect that the permit was forged or otherwise invalid. . . . [S]ince Andrzejewski had no reason to believe there was anything illegitimate about the permit or the weapon, and since Soukaneh had not otherwise acted suspiciously, Andrzejewski had no reason to prolong the stop further to check the validity of the facially proper gun license and no basis to think that Soukaneh presented any danger. Moreover, even assuming that Andrzejewski could detain Soukaneh briefly to run the permit check, that would at most justify simply moving Soukaneh away from the car so that he did not have ready access to the gun. There was certainly no reasonable suspicion to believe that the car contained any other weapon or contraband on these facts so as to justify a search of the vehicle. . . . Last, we address whether Andrzejewski's warrantless searches of Soukaneh's car and trunk violated clearly established Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable searches. We hold that they did. The case law from the Supreme Court and from this Court set forth in the preceding sections clearly established, as of the time of Andrzejewski's stop of Soukaneh, (1) that a reasonable apprehension of danger is necessary to establish reasonable suspicion warranting a Terry frisk of a vehicle subsequent to a car stop, and (2) that probable cause that evidence of a crime will be found is necessary to justify a warrantless search of a vehicle pursuant to the automobile exception. . . . [W]e hold that Andrzejewski violated Soukaneh's constitutional rights when he searched the interior and trunk of Soukaneh's vehicle, and that case law from the Supreme Court and this Circuit clearly established Soukaneh's right to be free from an unreasonable search under the alleged circumstances.”)

Tripathy v. McKoy, 103 F.4th 106, 116-17 (2d Cir. 2024), pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-229 (U.S. Aug. 27, 2024) (“Even accepting Tripathy’s allegations as true, we cannot agree that Defendants violated his clearly established rights by enrolling him in SOCTP [Sex Offender Counseling Treatment Program]. To our knowledge, no binding precedent establishes that a generally applicable program violates the Free Exercise Clause by requiring an inmate who is an incarcerated felon to accept responsibility for the conduct underlying his conviction. In fact, the only appellate authority we are aware of that addresses this type of challenge (1) is not binding and (2) concluded that such acceptance-of-responsibility programs did not violate an inmate’s religious freedom. See Searcy v. Simmons, 299 F.3d 1220, 1228 (10th Cir. 2002). Other decisions of the Supreme Court and our sister Circuits have similarly upheld these programs against challenges premised on other constitutional rights, such as due process and free speech. See McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24, 29, 122 S.Ct. 2017, 153 L.Ed.2d 47 (2002) (rejecting claim based on Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination); Newman v. Beard, 617 F.3d 775, 781 (3d Cir. 2010) (rejecting claim based on First Amendment right to free speech). Because Tripathy does not offer, and we are not aware of, any authority for the proposition that Defendants violated his clearly established rights by enrolling him in SOCTP, we affirm the district court’s decision dismissing his First Amendment claims as barred by qualified immunity.”)

Connecticut Citizens Defense League, Inc. v. Thody, No. 23-724-CV, 2024 WL 177707, at *6 (2d Cir. Jan. 17, 2024) (not reported) (“No case authority clearly establishes that the police chiefs’ conduct violated a federal right of the appellants. As the district court explained, despite Supreme Court precedent affirming ‘that the Second and Fourteenth Amendments protect an individual right to keep and bear arms for self-defense,’ it had ‘not found any case to hold that a seven-month (or even a two-year) delay in obtaining a firearm permit violates the Constitution.’ . . . Appellants have not identified any such case, nor—with the exception of one out-of-circuit case—are we aware of one. . . . Accordingly, their claims for monetary damages for violations of the Second Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment were properly dismissed under the doctrine of qualified immunity.”)

Wiggins v. Griffin, 86 F.4th 987, 994-96 (2d Cir. 2023) (“We acknowledge that defining a right at the appropriate level of generality is not always straightforward. . . . This is apparent when, as in this case, the parties and the district court each articulate a different right at stake. The Supreme Court has cautioned that a broadly defined right creates ‘virtually unqualified liability,’ . . . yet we have also recognized that a too-narrowly defined right ‘effectively insulate[s] the government’s actions[.]’ . . . The district court erred in defining Wiggins’s right as the ‘right to attend religious services despite the fact that his name did not appear on a call-out list.’ . . . Not only is this characterization of the right at issue too narrow; it ignores the substance of Wiggins’s pleas. Wiggins did not challenge the prison’s use of a call-out list generally. Rather, he contested Defendants’ inaction in response to his requests to be reinstated on such list. Nevertheless, Defendants argue that an incarcerated individual does not have a clearly established right to a ‘call-out system that automatically updates.’ . . . We have never found such a narrowly construed right. We have, however, held that incarcerated individuals have the right to engage in religious exercise absent a legitimate penological justification for the denial. . . . The failure of prison administrators to update the call-out list violated this clearly established right. Whether any of the Defendants are liable for the violation of this clearly established right depends on the resolution of competing narratives. . . . However, it is not the court’s role on summary judgment to make ‘[a]ssessments of credibility and choices between conflicting versions of the events.’ . . . In short, a jury may find that one or more Defendants⁶ purposefully ignored or delayed processing Wiggins’s requests, seeking to deny his participation in communal worship, or may have been deliberately indifferent to Wiggins’s requests. In such a scenario, they would have violated Wiggins’s clearly established right. . . . Furthermore, because Defendants acknowledged that the call-out system required their input, they could not escape liability by arguing that ‘reasonable persons in their position would not have understood that their conduct was within the scope of the established prohibition.’ . . . But, on the other hand, a Defendant may have simply missed Wiggins’s requests or failed to take extra steps to ensure they were processed. If so, qualified immunity may be appropriate. Because the record contains evidence to support the conflicting accounts, the question is one for the jury. . . . Jebamani, Kopp, and Howard are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage.”)

Peoples v. Leon, 63 F.4th 132, 142-44 (2d Cir. 2023) (“We agree with Leon that Peoples’s constitutional right to Internet access was not clearly established at the time Leon undertook the acts for which he seeks to hold her liable. . . . In reaching this conclusion we consider the Supreme Court’s watershed 2017 decision in Packingham v. North Carolina, as well as subsequent decisions within this Circuit. . . . [W]e conclude that the right of individuals on post-release supervision to be free from broad restrictions on access to the Internet was not clearly established until the Eaglin decision in January 2019. Because every allegedly wrongful act by Leon occurred in 2018, we conclude that she is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to those acts. . . . Peoples challenges two other special conditions recommended by Leon and imposed by the Board. One provides that Peoples must ‘comply with all case specific sex offender conditions to be imposed by the P.O.’. . . The other requires Peoples to ‘provide copies of financial documents to [the] parole officer upon request.’. . . As above, the question is whether ‘[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what [they are] doing violates that right.’. . . We conclude that neither condition was so clearly unlawful when Leon recommended it that its unlawfulness would have been apparent to any reasonable official. . . . We conclude that the imposition of the financial disclosure condition in this case was not so clearly unlawful as to defeat Leon’s qualified immunity from Peoples’s claims. This Court previously joined at least two sister circuits in reasoning that ‘monitoring an offender’s finances deters the offender from returning to a life of crime by forcing [them] to account for [their] income.’. . . To be sure, the fit between the financial disclosure condition and Peoples’s underlying convictions for rape is more tenuous, but in the absence of more authority from Peoples, we cannot conclude that the condition so clearly violated his legal rights as to defeat Leon’s qualified immunity.”)

National Rifle Association of America v. Vullo, 49 F.4th 700, 719-21 (2d Cir. 2022), vacated and remanded, 144 S. Ct. 1316 (2024) [The Court had not granted cert. on the qualified immunity issue and noted that “[o]n remand, the Second Circuit is free to reconsider whether Vullo is entitled to qualified immunity.” Id. at *11 n.7] (“[E]ven assuming the NRA sufficiently pleaded that Vullo engaged in unconstitutionally threatening or coercive conduct, we conclude that Vullo is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established and any First Amendment violation would not have been apparent to a reasonable official at the time. While it was clearly established, as a general matter, that ‘the First Amendment prohibits implied threats to employ coercive state power to stifle protected speech,’. . . the contours of that right were not so ‘sufficiently clear’ that a reasonable official in the circumstances here would have understood that what she was doing violated that right. . . . The right alleged to have been violated ‘must have been “clearly established” in a more particularized, and hence more relevant, sense.’. . . The violation must have been apparent in light of pre-existing case law for qualified immunity to be denied. . . . Here, the various cases addressing the issue did not provide clear and particularized guidance but involved very different circumstances and much stronger conduct. The cases do not clearly establish that Vullo's statements in this case were unconstitutionally threatening or coercive. . . The NRA has not cited, and we are not aware of, any case analogous to this one, where a government official has been held to have violated the First Amendment by making statements like those in the Guidance Letters and Press Release, which use only suggestive language and rely on the power of persuasion. In the Guidance Letters, Vullo commends DFS-regulated entities for their commitment to corporate social responsibility and for being 'key players in maintaining and improving public health and safety in the communities they serve.' . . In the Press Release, she praises businesses for 'lead[ing] the way and bring[ing] about the kind of positive social change needed to minimize the chance that we will witness more of these senseless tragedies.' . . Moreover, the Press Release states that the Governor was 'directing the Department of Financial Services to urge insurers and bankers' to assess the risks of doing business with gun promotion groups, . . . not to investigate or take any enforcement action against them. It certainly was not clearly established at the time that any of these statements would violate the First Amendment, and indeed, as discussed above, many cases emphasized the right of government officials to speak, to take and express views, and to try to persuade. Furthermore, as the district court acknowledged, we have never held that nonthreatening government speech becomes threatening simply because the speaker oversaw an earlier, legitimate law enforcement investigation, and we decline to do so today. As for the Consent Decrees and Lloyd's meetings, the NRA similarly has not cited, and we are not aware of, any case like this one, where a government official makes purportedly threatening statements urging an entity to cut ties with what is essentially its accomplice during an ongoing, legitimate investigation into serious misconduct, where the investigation results in consent decrees, and where the entities admit to violations of the law and agree to millions of dollars in fines and other significant relief. Moreover, assuming Vullo offered to go easy on Lloyd's if it severed ties with the NRA, we have never held that law enforcement officials may not offer leniency in exchange for help advancing their policy goals, especially when those policy goals aim to minimize the influence of a noncompliant business partner that has repeatedly violated the law. And again, as noted, DFS explicitly permitted Lloyd's (and the other entities) to continue doing business with the NRA. Qualified immunity balances the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise their power irresponsibly with the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties responsibly. . . The Complaint's factual allegations show that, far from acting irresponsibly, Vullo was doing her job in good faith. She oversaw an investigation into serious violations of New York insurance law and obtained substantial relief for the residents of New York. She used her office to address policy issues of concern to the public. Even assuming her actions were unlawful, and we do not believe they were, the unlawfulness was not apparent by any means. Accordingly, even assuming the NRA plausibly alleged a First Amendment violation, Vullo would be protected by qualified immunity in any event.")

Walker v. Schult, 45 F.4th 598, 618-21 (2d Cir. 2022) ("In the present case, the district court appears to have assumed that the jury's verdict established that Walker's Eighth Amendment rights had been violated. . . The jury had indeed been instructed that it could return a verdict in Walker's favor if it found that a defendant or defendants had ‘deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities’:

Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they deprive an inmate of his basic human needs, such as food, clothing, medical care, sleep, and safe and sanitary living conditions. For the purposes of the Eighth Amendment, Mr. Walker can demonstrate the deprivation of a Constitutional right by showing that he was incarcerated in cell 127 in the Mohawk B unit at FCI Ray Brook under conditions that posed a substantial risk of serious damage to his health and safety or that the conditions which he was forced to endure deprived him of minimal civilized measures of life necessities.

. . . But, while the jury was thus instructed as to the law, its job was simply to find the facts; and the district court, in describing the evidence in its posttrial Rule 50 ruling, lost sight of the jury’s actual and implied factual findings. . . . [T]he jury found as facts only that Walker suffered mental or emotional injury because of ‘overcrowding/lack of space’ and ‘threats of violence/lack of safe living conditions.’ . . . And despite those ‘threats,’ any actual violence and deprivation of safety were unrealized, as the jury had found that Walker did not prove physical injury. . . . As discussed in Part II.A. above, ‘overcrowding’ itself, i.e., ‘confin[ing] cellmates too closely,’ does not violate the Eighth Amendment unless it is accompanied by some treatment that ‘deprive[s] inmates of the minimal civilized measure of life’s necessities.’ . . . ‘[O]nly those deprivations denying “the minimal civilized measure of life’s necessities[]” . . . are sufficiently grave to form the basis of an Eighth Amendment violation.’ . . . Walker has not called to our attention any Supreme Court case--and we know of none--in which the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was held to have been violated by prison overcrowding alone. . . . In sum, to the extent that the district court concluded that Walker established an Eighth Amendment violation based not solely on overcrowding and its attendant decrease in safety from violence but also on deprivations of such basic necessities as sleep, ventilation, or sanitary living space, the court impermissibly relied on its own view of the facts, and thereby invaded the province of the jury. To the extent that the court instead did not rely on facts beyond the jury’s findings of overcrowding and the attendant decrease in safety, those factual findings by the jury should also have informed the legal determination by the district court as to whether Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. In light of the authorities discussed above, the jury’s findings were insufficient to support a conclusion that Walker was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life’s basic necessities. It may be that the findings that the (unrealized) threat of violence and the constant anxiety as to lack of safety resulting from the undisputed overcrowding--here lasting for some 2¹/₂ years--which led the jury to find that Walker had suffered mental or emotional injury, were sufficient to warrant a decision that Walker was subjected to cruel and unusual psychological punishment, thereby warranting an award of nominal damages. But we need not resolve that question, because we see no authorities that clearly established such a legal principle. In the absence of clearly established law to inform Defendants that their conduct in not moving Walker to another cell in an overcrowded prison violated Walker’s rights under the Eighth Amendment, Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from his claims for damages, including for nominal damages.”)

Sabir v. Williams, 52 F.4th 51, 65-66 (2d Cir. 2022) (amending and superseding opinion at 37 F.4th 810 (2d Cir. 2022)) (“We reject the wardens’ argument that Salahuddin’s holding is an ‘abstract legal principle’ that ‘cannot establish law for purposes of qualified immunity.’. . . There are, of course, some contexts in which a higher degree of specificity is required to establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity than in others. For example, the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition of ‘unreasonable searches and seizures’ is an ‘abstract right[]’ because ‘it may be difficult for an officer to know whether a search or seizure will be deemed reasonable given the precise situation encountered.’. . . No such concerns are present here. Based on RFRA’s requirements, it is not ‘difficult for an [official] to know whether’ an unjustified substantial burden on religious exercise ‘will be deemed reasonable.’. . . [I]f an official substantially burdens a sincere religious exercise but cannot point to evidence that the application of the burden was in service of any interest—let alone a compelling one—the official has violated RFRA. Thus, the wardens are not entitled to dismissal of the SAC on the basis of qualified immunity because our case law, in conjunction with the text of RFRA, clearly established at the time of the events at issue that substantially burdening Sabir’s and Conyers’s religious exercise with no justification, as was alleged by the plaintiffs, violated RFRA.”)

Washington v. Napolitano, 29 F.4th 93, 98-99 (2d Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 485 (2022) ([W]e hold that, if a police officer finds an individual’s statements regarding his lack of intent to commit a crime to be credible in light of the totality of the circumstances, or if (at the very least) such exculpatory statements could materially impact the probable cause determination by a neutral magistrate judge, that officer cannot then use the incriminating portions of those statements as the foundation for probable cause in an arrest warrant affidavit for that individual, while either knowingly or recklessly concealing from the judge that credibility assessment (if it has been reached) and/or the exculpatory details of those statements. It is clearly established in this Circuit that such a concealment, which deprives the judge of material information that could impact the probable cause determination, would not be protected by qualified immunity.”) Torcivia v. Suffolk Cty., New York, 17 F.4th 342, 367-68 (2d Cir. 2021) (“We agree with the District Court that Torcivia has identified no Second Circuit or Supreme Court precedent that ‘clearly established’ that by failing to discharge him for roughly sixteen hours for emergent mental health evaluation, allowing him first to return to sobriety and possibly keeping him for a few hours after he was medically cleared to be discharged, the State Defendants or Intern Smith violated Torcivia’s constitutional rights. . . . On the contrary, we have rejected unlawful seizure claims made by plaintiffs detained for longer periods of time than Torcivia. . . . Torcivia argues that in so detaining him, the State Defendants and Intern Smith violated New York state law and that accordingly, they violated a clearly established federal constitutional right. Even assuming that these defendants did violate state law as he contends, Torcivia’s argument fails. ‘Our precedents have firmly established that the mere violation of a state law does not automatically give rise to a violation of federal constitutional rights.’. . . Because Torcivia has not shown that the State Defendants or Intern Smith violated a clearly established constitutional right by failing to discharge him for evaluation and because this factor is dispositive, no further analysis is necessary. We affirm the District Court’s order granting summary judgment in favor of the State Defendants and Intern Smith on Torcivia’s § 1983 claim.”)

Horn v. Stephenson, 11 F.4th 163, 171-73 (2d Cir. 2021) (“Stephenson does not dispute that Walker clearly established the duty of police to share with the prosecutor any Brady evidence that is favorable to the accused. Nor does he contest in this appeal that the GRC Reports were material and exculpatory. He presses a qualified immunity defense on the sole basis that Walker does not apply to a firearms examiner employed by the State Police Laboratory. We disagree and conclude that a police forensic examiner, whether an analyst or technician fulfilling any of the roles associated with forensic analysis, in 1999 reasonably would have understood that he or she was required to turn over exculpatory information to the prosecutor. . . . As an employee of a division of the Connecticut State Police whose principal function was to assist law enforcement in carrying out its investigative efforts, Stephenson reasonably would have understood himself to be a member of the police to whom Brady applies. That Stephenson was a technical specialist, and not a sworn officer, does not place him beyond the scope of Walker. It is well settled that the absence of precedent involving ‘fundamentally similar’ facts is not fatal to a finding that the law is clearly established. . . . [T]he salient question ... is whether the state of the law ... gave [the defendant] fair warning that [his] alleged treatment of [the plaintiff] was unconstitutional.’. . . Here, no reasonable police forensic examiner would have understood Walker to turn on the distinction between sworn and unsworn police officers advanced by Stephenson. . . . Our conclusion, based on Walker, that Brady applies to forensic examiners in state crime laboratories is reinforced by decisions of our sister circuits that by 1999 had reached the same conclusion. [noting cases from 5th and 10th Circuits] This pattern of decisions is not undermined by the single, Eighth Circuit case cited by Stephenson for support. . . . In Villasana v. Wilhoit, the crime laboratory technician concealed reports from the prosecutor in accordance with agency policy. . . . Focusing on the issue of fault, the court concluded that the technician was entitled to qualified immunity because ‘there [wa]s no evidence the defendants acted in bad faith, that is, engaged in “a conscious effort to suppress exculpatory evidence.”’. . . Nowhere in Villasana did the court hold or suggest that Brady is limited to certain subgroups of police officers. To the contrary, it assumed that state crime laboratory technicians have a constitutional duty not to withhold exculpatory information intentionally.”)

Wagschal v. Skoufis, 857 F. App’x 18, __ (2d Cir. 2021) (“Even assuming that, after Knight’s vacatur, it would remain clearly established that a public official’s use of Facebook’s tools to hide specific comments on the official’s public page violates the First Amendment, such a rule was not clearly established in 2018 by Knight or any other decision from our Court or the Supreme Court. In so commenting, we take heed of the Supreme Court’s caution against determining what constitutes ‘clearly established law’ at too high a level of generality. . . . The ‘hide comments’ feature limits the user’s interaction on Facebook in a different, and less substantial, way than does the blocking at issue in Knight. Blocking a person on Twitter may well frustrate his or her ability to follow along with and engage in an online discussion, while hiding a comment on Facebook merely shields the comment from viewing by the general public. . . . Whether hiding comments in this manner would place an unconstitutional burden on speech was not a question addressed by Knight, in which we dealt with the President’s use of the blocking function on Twitter. . . Skoufis is therefore also entitled to qualified immunity with regard to Wagschal’s damages claim arising from his temporarily hidden comments.”)

Ketcham v. City of Mount Vernon, 992 F.3d 144, 151-52 (2d Cir. 2021) (“While the absence of serious injury is certainly a matter that the jury can consider in assessing both the reasonableness of the force and potential damages from any misconduct, a district court should not grant summary judgment on this basis alone. Additionally, there is presumably no proper law enforcement justification for deliberately pushing a restrained individual’s head into a car’s hard, metal doorframe. Thus, if a jury credits Ketcham’s testimony that Patterson deliberately slammed his head into the car’s doorframe despite him being restrained and not resisting, that force would be excessive. Regardless of the extent of Ketcham’s injuries, the infliction of harm against a restrained and unresisting suspect is excessive force, and such conduct would violate the Fourth Amendment. As an alternative basis for upholding the district court’s decision, Appellees argue that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. To demonstrate entitlement to qualified immunity, the officers must show that their actions did not violate clearly established law, or that it was objectively reasonable for them to believe that their actions did not violate such law. . . The district court did not address this argument. Because we conclude that reasonable officers would not disagree as to the illegality of the alleged handcuffing conduct, qualified immunity is rejected in that respect. . . The established law of this Circuit makes clear that the excessive tightening of handcuffs after an explicit verbal complaint of pain is made violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, it would be unreasonable for officers to believe that ignoring Ketcham’s cries to loosen the over-tight, non-double-locked restraints did not violate clearly established law. If credited by a jury, Ketcham’s testimony indicates Patterson did just that. We therefore reject his qualified immunity defense as to the handcuffing allegations. We reach the same conclusion with regard to the alleged head-slamming conduct. By March 2017, it was ‘clearly established by our Circuit caselaw that it is impermissible to use significant force against a restrained arrestee who is not actively resisting.’ . . . Therefore, accepting as true Ketcham’s testimony that Patterson ‘slammed [his] head into the car’s door frame’ despite being restrained and physically docile, . . . we must reject Patterson’s qualified immunity defense in this respect as well.”)

Vasquez v. Maloney, 990 F.3d 232, 238-43 (2d Cir. 2021) (“Law that was clearly established in January 2015 put the Officers on notice that their detention of Vasquez was unconstitutional. . . . On this record, the Officers did not satisfy even the low threshold that would satisfy either justification for an investigative Terry stop. That is, they offered no specific and articulable facts—at all—supporting an inference that Vasquez was (1) involved in or (2) wanted in connection with a crime. . . . [T]he Officers seek to justify their seizure of Vasquez based solely on Detective Cruz’s recollection of Vasquez and his previous arrests by Clarkstown police, and Detective Cruz’s uncorroborated belief that ‘there might be’ a warrant for Vasquez’s arrest. . . . But, absent any basis in articulable facts, speculation that a warrant ‘might’ be outstanding is the quintessential ‘inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or “hunch,” . . . and here it was readily dispelled by the dispatcher’s report that there was no outstanding warrant. . . . Since Terry, it has been clearly established that when an officer can point to no facts at all to justify a hunch, the detention violates the Fourth Amendment. The Officers suggest that our decision in United States v. Santa, 180 F.3d 20 (2d Cir. 1999), supports their claim to qualified immunity. . . . Santa offers no safe harbor for the Officers. In that case, the officers articulated a specific fact—a computer record of an outstanding warrant which they first checked and confirmed—on which they reasonably relied, even though that record turned out to be erroneous. Here, by contrast, the Officers do not claim to have relied on anything, not even one officer’s faulty memory of an outstanding warrant, in seizing and detaining Vasquez. Absent any articulation of a factual basis for a belief that a warrant existed, Santa offers their position no support. . . . The Officers further contend that denying them qualified immunity amounts to a requirement that ‘police exhaust all available means of technology to determine whether an arrest warrant was open before conducting a basic safety search.’ . . . But the problem here is not so much that the police failed to confirm the existence of a warrant; it is that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Vasquez, they did not even purport to have any basis for believing that there was a warrant outstanding for his arrest in the first place. . . . In sum, we hold that it was clearly established law in January 2015 that an officer’s unconfirmed hunch that an arrest warrant might possibly exist, coupled with nothing more than the officer’s recognition of a suspect from prior arrests, does not constitute reasonable suspicion justifying a Terry stop or frisk. Accordingly, at this stage and on the limited factual record before us, the Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for their detention and frisk of Vasquez.”)

Gerard v. City of New York, 843 F. App’x 380, ___ (2d Cir. 2021) (“We need not, and exercise our discretion not to, decide whether Detective Bia’s alleged conduct would have given rise to a constitutional violation, in part because the record is murky on what precisely Gerard alleges Detective Bia did with his gun and what circumstances confronted Detective Bia at the time of the alleged incident. . . . Drawing all inferences in favor of Gerard and assuming, for purposes of this appeal only, that Detective Bia brandished his gun and threatened to shoot Gerard when he volubly refused to comply with the court order, Detective Bia was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . It is clearly established that the use of deadly force against an unarmed, non-dangerous person is unconstitutional. . . . This Court has also held that verbal harassment, absent ‘any appreciable injury,’ cannot support an excessive force claim. . . . But neither the Supreme Court, nor this Court, has clearly established that a verbal threat combined with a display of a firearm, without any physical contact, constitutes excessive force, much less when it is directed at an uncooperative detainee who is loudly and profanely resisting a court order.”)

Hurd v. Fredenburgh, 984 F.3d 1075, 1089-90, 1092 (2d Cir. 2021) (“It was not clearly established during the period of Hurd’s prolonged detention that an inmate suffers harm of a constitutional magnitude under the Eighth Amendment when they are imprisoned past their mandatory conditional release date, nor was it clearly established that an inmate has a liberty interest in mandatory conditional release protected by the Fourteenth Amendment’s substantive due process clause. Hurd nevertheless urges us to find that these rights were clearly established because they follow from existing precedent. For his Eighth Amendment claim, Hurd relies on Sample, 885 F.2d 1099, Calhoun, 999 F.2d 647, Sudler v. City of New York, 689 F.3d 159 (2d Cir. 2012), and Francis, 942 F.3d 126. These cases confirm a uniform legal principle that no federal, state, or local authority can keep an inmate detained past the expiration of the sentence imposed on them. But in the qualified immunity analysis, the Supreme Court has admonished that rights should not be defined at a high level of generality and instead must be ‘particularized to the facts of the case.’. . . None of the cases upon which Hurd relies addresses a conditional release scheme, let alone one in which an inmate is entitled to mandatory release prior to the expiration of their maximum sentence. More to the point, none of them confirm that prolonging an inmate’s detention past their conditional release date might violate the inmate’s rights under the Eighth Amendment. . . . It was clearly established that New York State could not detain Hurd past the expiration of his maximum sentence, but it was not clearly established that once Hurd’s conditional release date was approved, continued detention beyond that date qualifies as a constitutional harm for Eighth Amendment purposes. . . . As for his substantive due process claim, Hurd admits that no decision has held that imprisonment past a mandatory conditional release date violates the Fourteenth Amendment’s substantive protections. He nevertheless argues that ‘such a conclusion follows inescapably from the procedural due process cases, as a prisoner must have such a right once state officials have actually granted him discretionary early release.’. . . We disagree. The substantive due process analysis differs from procedural due process; and it is not the case that one must follow from the other. And for the same reasons that our precedents do not dictate the outcome of his Eighth Amendment claim, Hurd’s liberty interest in conditional release does not obviously follow from the procedural due process cases upon which Hurd relies. Fredenburgh is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Hurd’s Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims.”)

Hayes v. Dahlke, 976 F.3d 259, 276 n.8 (2d Cir. 2020)(“Dahlke alternatively argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because ‘it was objectively reasonable to believe that the thorough search Hayes described did not violate the Eighth Amendment.’. . . We disagree. Although there is clearly a factual dispute as to whether Dahlke ever engaged in the conduct alleged by Hayes, there can be no doubt that the illegality of such conduct was clearly established by Crawford the year before the frisk took place. See 796 F.3d at 254 (“A correction[] officer’s intentional contact with an inmate’s genitalia or other intimate area, which serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer’s sexual desire or to humiliate the inmate, violates the Eighth Amendment.”).”)

Pourkavoos v. Town of Avon, 823 F. App’x 53, ____ (2d Cir. 2020) (“[W]e have cautioned against ‘convert[ing] the fair notice requirement into a presumption against the existence of basic constitutional rights.’. . . In Edrei, we held that our rule was clearly established ‘that using force in a crowd control context violates due process’ and as such that it was sufficient to put police officers on notice of the unlawful nature of using a ‘long-range acoustic device’ that could produce volumes unsafe for human ears during a protest. . . . To hold otherwise, we explained, would be akin to ‘saying police officers who run over people crossing the street illegally can claim immunity simply because we have never addressed a Fourteenth Amendment claim involving jaywalkers.’ . . . So too here. Our precedent establishes, and it should come as no surprise, that officers may not knowingly omit information likely to influence a judge or a prosecutor’s probable cause determination.”)

Booker v. Graham, 974 F.3d 101, 106-07 (2d Cir. 2020) (“We may ‘grant qualified immunity on the ground that a purported right was not “clearly established” by prior case law, without resolving the often more difficult question whether the purported right exists at all.’ . . . We need not reassess the legitimacy of Defendants’ penological interest in the lockdown, the reasonableness of the lockdown restrictions, or the feasibility of alternative means by which Defendants could have accommodated Booker’s observance of Ramadan. Instead, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment to Defendants on the alternative basis of qualified immunity—i.e., because there was no clearly established law requiring the accommodation of inmates’ religious practices during a prison lockdown. . . . [W]e have never held that a prison has an obligation to provide religiously compliant meals during a facility-wide, safety-motivated lockdown. Nor have we held that a prison must accommodate group prayers or religious bathing rituals under such circumstances. Indeed, Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent make clear that ‘a generally applicable policy will not be held to violate a plaintiff’s right to free exercise of religion if that policy “is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.”’ . . . Federal law does not provide any clearly established right of an inmate confined to the SHU to attend group prayer, and New York law actually prohibits it.”)

Liberian Community Ass’n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 187-91 (2d Cir. 2020) (“Boyko and the Mensah-Siehs—the only Appellants seeking damages—advance three legal bases for their claim: substantive due process, procedural due process, and the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition on unreasonable seizures. We discuss only whether, at the time of Dr. Mullen’s alleged conduct, it was clearly established that her conduct ran afoul of these constitutional protections.¹⁵ [fn. 15: Appellants urge us to ‘address the merits of the constitutional issue even if the Court were to conclude that Dr. Mullen’s conduct is shielded by qualified immunity.’ . . . Yet the Supreme Court has cautioned us to ‘think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.’ . . . While there are circumstances in which discretion is properly exercised to address step one of the qualified immunity analysis even when qualified immunity is appropriate at step two, this is not such a situation.] Taking a generalized statement like that found in Project Release or Jones as evidence of a ‘clearly established rule’ in the context of quarantines conflicts with the Supreme Court’s directive that we should not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . Quarantines against infectious disease, involving different public safety concerns and implicating different liberty interests, are simply not sufficiently analogous to civil commitment of the mentally ill to clearly establish applicable due process constraints. . . . In sum, there was by no means a ‘robust consensus’ on the proper standard for analyzing quarantine claims at the time of the conduct at issue here. . . . To the extent the substantive due process restrictions articulated by Appellants existed then, they were ‘at best undeveloped.’ . . . That district courts in this Circuit (Best and Shinnick, specifically) have employed different analyses only further ‘demonstrates that the law on the point [was] not well established.’ . . . In such circumstances, where the precedent is simply not ‘clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply,’ . . . the qualified immunity bar applies. As the Supreme Court has recognized, public officials cannot be expected ‘to predict the future course of constitutional law’ based on their reading of a handful of non-precedential opinions. . . . Neither civil commitment law nor other infectious disease cases had clearly articulated the substantive due process standard Appellants urge should have governed Dr. Mullen’s actions. Accordingly, the district court did not err in affording qualified immunity as to this claim.”)

Liberian Community Ass’n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 191-93 (2d Cir. 2020) (“The inquiry into the existence of a procedural due process right is guided by the three-factor balancing test enunciated in Mathews v. Eldridge[.] . . . At the start, because that analysis entails balancing multiple factors, procedural due process, ‘unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances.’ . . . Rather, ‘due process is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands.’ . . . ‘Given this flexible, context-dependent approach, it will be a rare case in which prior precedents have definitively resolved a novel claim of procedural due process. That makes particularly fertile ground for qualified immunity, given that state officials can be liable only for violations of rights that have been established “beyond debate” and with “particular[ity]” by existing constitutional precedents.’ . . . Again, Appellants and the dissent rely almost exclusively upon cases imported from the civil commitment context or upon Connecticut state law. But as already explained, the civil commitment cases are insufficiently analogous to clearly establish the procedural rights Appellants urge us to adopt in this case. . . . And ‘[a] violation of state law neither gives plaintiffs a § 1983 claim nor deprives defendants of the defense of qualified immunity to a proper § 1983 claim.’ . . . Indeed, we have been unable to find—and Appellants do not identify—any cases articulating federal procedural due process protections in the quarantine context. The most analogous case, Greene v. Edwards, 164 W. Va. 326, 327–29, 263 S.E.2d 661 (1980) (per curiam), held that due process guarantees certain procedural rights—including adequate notice, a right to counsel, and an elevated burden of proof—when the state seeks to involuntarily confine an individual with tuberculosis. . . . And cases from both the Supreme Court and our Court make clear that the federal procedural due process guarantee does not require state officials to inform individuals of all the procedural guarantees they enjoy under state law. . . . While the full panoply of their rights under state law was not immediately conveyed to them in writing, nor was a hearing convened, Appellants point to no case that clearly establishes that Dr. Mullen violated the Constitution by failing to undertake these measures.”)

Liberian Community Ass’n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 193-94 (2d Cir. 2020) (“Appellants have cited no case in which a court has invalidated a quarantine order under the Fourth Amendment. And although they characterize their quarantines as ‘scientifically unjustified,’ . . . a number of factors could support a determination that the quarantines were at least arguably reasonable as a matter of Fourth Amendment law. . . . Put simply, it was not clearly established that it was unreasonable, pursuant to the Fourth Amendment, for Appellees to quarantine individuals traveling from a nation suffering from an Ebola epidemic for the duration of the disease's incubation period. And in such circumstances, Dr. Mullen is entitled to qualified immunity. To be clear, we need not and do not reach the merits of Appellants' constitutional claims. We conclude simply that the district court did not err in determining that no clearly established law existed at the time of Dr. Mullen's actions such that every reasonable official would have known that her conduct fell outside the boundaries of due process and Fourth Amendment constraints. No significant precedent had previously articulated the requirements of substantive due process, procedural due process, or the Fourth Amendment in the quarantine or infectious diseases contexts, as urged by Appellants here. In such circumstances, the district court properly concluded that Dr. Mullen is entitled to qualified immunity.") Liberian Community Ass'n of Connecticut v. Lamont, 970 F.3d 174, 194, 198-200 (2d Cir. 2020) (Chin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("As we have seen most strikingly with the current epidemic, the government surely has a compelling interest in preventing the spread of disease. At the same time, however, the government's power to protect the community may not be exercised in an unreasonable or arbitrary manner. While intrusions on personal liberties will of course be necessary to safeguard public health and safety, they must be based on scientific and not political considerations. In my view, plaintiffs-appellants Ryan Boyko and Laura Skrip and Louise Mensah-Sieh, Nathaniel Sieh, and their children (collectively, "plaintiffs") plausibly alleged that defendant-appellee Dr. Jewel Mullen, then-Commissioner of Public Health, violated their constitutional rights by ordering them, in connection with the Ebola outbreak in 2014, into quarantine for two weeks in the case of Boyko and Skrip and three weeks in the case of the Mensah-Sieh family, when quarantine was not scientifically or medically warranted or justified. Moreover, in my view, plaintiffs plausibly alleged violations of clearly established rights such that, at the pleadings stage of the case, it was error for the district court to dismiss these claims based on qualified immunity. Accordingly, I would reverse as to plaintiffs' claims for damages. . . . In short, in my view the complaint alleges, plausibly and with great detail, that Dr. Mullen and the other state officials infringed on plaintiffs' fundamental right to liberty, without justification or individualized consideration, when alternative, less restrictive measures were available to protect the public health and safety. . . . As discussed above, in my view the facts alleged in the complaint make out a violation of plaintiffs' rights to substantive and procedural due process. Similarly, in my view these rights were clearly established when Dr. Mullen and the other state officials required plaintiffs to be quarantined. I believe it was error for the district court, on a motion to dismiss when it should have assumed the factual allegations of the complaint to be true, to sustain the affirmative defense of qualified immunity as a matter of law. The district court held that Dr. Mullen's actions did not violate clearly established law because there is no case law regarding an individual's substantive and procedural due process rights in a quarantine scenario, and that, in any event, quarantine here was 'objectively reasonable.' . . . As discussed above, however, there are some quarantine and other isolation cases, as well as other analogous cases, including, for example, civil commitment cases dealing with compulsory confinement to protect public safety. And while it may be true that there have been few epidemic cases over the years, the Supreme Court has noted that a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful.”. . . The general constitutional rules discussed above are beyond debate. Freedom from physical restraint is a fundamental liberty interest that cannot be infringed upon by the government unless the restriction is narrowly tailored to further a compelling state interest and less restrictive alternatives to accomplish that goal are not available. . . . Moreover, even assuming some ambiguity in the case law, the Connecticut statute -- which incorporates due process protections -- applies with obvious clarity here, as the statute specifically provides that quarantine may be ordered only if necessary to protect the public health, and only if quarantine is the least restrictive alternative available. The complaint alleges in great detail that, given the nature of Ebola, the CDC, scientists, and health experts uniformly agreed that quarantine was not necessary for individuals like plaintiffs, who were asymptomatic and who were no-risk or low-risk for Ebola exposure, and that less restrictive alternatives, such as active monitoring, were available to protect the public. Hence, the complaint plausibly alleges that it was not objectively reasonable for Dr. Mullen and the other state officials to order plaintiffs into quarantine, and to have done so without proper notice or individualized assessment or other procedural safeguards. Finally, I note that the complaint plausibly alleges that the Connecticut officials did not act in good faith, as they purportedly imposed quarantine on plaintiffs not based on scientific or medical reasons but for political reasons. The complaint alleges that Dr. Mullen and other state officials knew that quarantine was not necessary to protect the public health. But in October 2014, the Governor of Connecticut was ‘actively campaigning to be reelected ... [and p]ublic polling and media accounts at the time described the gubernatorial race as extremely close.’. . . The Connecticut officials adopted a policy, as the Governor’s office apparently touted, that was ‘more stringent’ than guidelines issued by the CDC, one that mandated quarantine even for asymptomatic individuals, when quarantine was not scientifically justified. . . . The complaint alleges that the state officials ordered plaintiffs to be quarantined and then continued them in quarantine, even though they knew plaintiffs did not present a risk to public health, because of ‘sensationalist news accounts [that] stoked public fear that travelers might bring Ebola across the ocean to [Connecticut].’. . . These allegations, in my view, are plausible. Accordingly, I dissent from the majority’s affirmance of the district court’s dismissal of plaintiffs’ claims for damages.”) Lennox v. Miller, 968 F.3d 150, 156-58 (2d Cir. 2020) (“Officer Clarke asserts he is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions, even viewed in the light most favorable to Lennox, did not violate ‘clearly established’ law. The operative question thus becomes whether it was clearly impermissible on July 22, 2016 under the circumstances presented for a police officer to use the force that a jury could find Officer Clarke used—that is, when the handcuffed arrestee was not actively resisting arrest—to take down that arrestee, kneel on top of her with his full body weight, and slam her head into the ground. Courts are cautioned not to define clearly established law at ‘a high level of generality,’ and ‘police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.’. . . That is not to say that there must be ‘a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, but ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . Years before the incident at issue here, we took note of the ‘well established’ principle ‘that the use of entirely gratuitous force is unreasonable and therefore excessive.’. . . And we have not limited potential findings of excessive force to situations where officers were using equipment like pepper spray or tasers. . . . On July 22, 2016, it was therefore clearly established by our Circuit caselaw that it is impermissible to use significant force against a restrained arrestee who is not actively resisting. . . . As Muschette suggests, and as we have recently explained in great detail in Jones v. Treubig, this is true despite differences in the precise method by which that force was conveyed. Because a reasonable jury could find that the force used by Officer Clarke was significant and that Lennox was not resisting when such force was used, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that Officer Clarke did not violate clearly established law. The district court thus properly denied Officer Clarke qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings, and we affirm this denial without expressing a view as to Officer Clarke’s ultimate entitlement to judgment in his favor after factual disputes are resolved. . . . Even assuming that Officer Miller observed Officer Clarke’s use of force, there is no evidence in the record that would suggest he had a realistic opportunity to intervene that he then disregarded. Nor do we know of any clearly established law that would require him to abandon his crowd control duties and intervene to stop Officer Clarke’s use of force. Thus, Officer Miller was entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, and we reverse the judgment as to him.”)

Elder v. McCarthy, 967 F.3d 113, 131 (2d Cir. 2020) (“We established in Kingsley that a hearing officer is required to identify the witnesses an inmate seeks to call using ‘readily available’ prison records, . . . even where the inmate cannot ‘identify [the witnesses] by name[.]’ . . . Kling made a paltry effort to do so. Nor does he argue that he was somehow reasonably ignorant that those records existed. In light of our guidance in Kingsley, Kling’s ineffectual efforts to identify Elder’s requested witnesses were not ‘objectively reasonable.’ Kling is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Vega v. Semple, 963 F.3d 259, 273-81 (2d Cir. 2020) (“The Defendants in this appeal have staked their defense on the second step. For the purposes of their motion to dismiss in the District Court, the Defendants merely asserted that they had not violated any clearly established law; they did ‘not disput[e] . . . that the plaintiffs’ alleged conditions of confinement at Garner . . . amounted to or could amount to a constitutional violation.’ . . . Accordingly, the District Court considered only the second step—whether the right was clearly established at the relevant times pleaded in the complaint. Like the District Court, our inquiry is only as to whether the Defendants violated clearly established law. . . . Though the rule is stated simply enough, the application of the rule often presents challenges. As Dean John C. Jefferies, Jr. has commented, ‘determining whether an officer violated “clearly established” law has proved to be a mare’s nest.’ . . . Defining the precise right at issue poses a ‘chronic difficulty’ for courts. . . . By framing the relevant right too narrowly, we may unduly permit officials to escape liability; by framing the relevant right too generally, however, we risk allowing plaintiffs ‘to convert the rule of qualified immunity . . . into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.’ On the one hand, ‘the clearly established right must be defined with specificity.’ . . . Indeed, the Supreme Court instructs courts that ‘[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,’ and that ‘[t]his inquiry must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . On the other hand, the Supreme Court has also emphasized that, while the ‘contours of the right must be sufficiently clear[,]’ that ‘is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . In attempting to determine the right at issue here, the District Court turned to a Supreme Court case decided in 1993, Helling v. McKinney. . . . The District Court concluded that Helling established a prisoner’s right to be free from toxic environmental substances that, like ETS, posed an unreasonable risk of some future harm. Accordingly, the District Court denied Defendants qualified immunity for conduct alleged to have occurred after Helling, decided on June 18, 1993, finding the right to be clearly established as of that date. On de novo review, we hold the same: as of June 18, 1993, reasonable officials were on notice that deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs’ excessive exposure to radon, then a known toxic environmental substance, violated their Eighth Amendment right. Reasonable officials had such ‘fair notice’ as of that date because of Helling’s clear pronouncement: inmates exposed to toxic substances did not need to wait to get sick to file a lawsuit; they did not need to wait, in other words, for ‘tragic event’ to occur. . . . Rather, they could bring a claim under the Eighth Amendment as soon as an ‘unreasonable risk of serious damage to ... future health’ existed. . . . But in what context would a reasonable official know that right to be violated? This court has stated that ‘after Helling it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to an inmate’s exposure to levels of ETS that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmate’s health.’ . . . Put another way, as of 1993, no reasonable prison official could be unaware that deliberate indifference to levels of ETS that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmate’s health was a Constitutional violation. But what about radon exposure? Were the ‘contours of the right’ in Helling ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand’ that deliberate indifference to radon exposure ‘violates that right’ as well? The answer is ‘yes.’ As the District Court concluded: ‘[i]f anything, knowing or reckless exposure of prisoners to radon, given the facts alleged by Plaintiffs, is more obviously unconstitutional than exposure of prisoners to ETS was in 1993.’ . . . The District Court reached this conclusion because, while the dangers of ETS were still being debated in 1993, ‘radon in 1993 had already five years earlier been identified “as a human carcinogen by the International Agency for Research on Cancer ... and added by Congress that same year to the Toxic Substances Control Act.”’ . . . If a reasonable officer was aware of the future risk of ETS by that point, then surely a reasonable officer would have been aware of the future risk of a known carcinogen like radon. . . . Taking the allegations as true, we conclude that the mitigation effort implemented was not a reasonable measure taken to abate the risk of excessive radon exposure in the cell block; instead, the allegedly excessive radon in the cell block went unattended. A conscious decision not to address a known risk of excessive radon exposure, as described by Plaintiffs, would violate clearly established law for all the reasons we have expressed above. . . . First, Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity on the basis that no binding decision discusses the constitutional implications of radon exposure to inmates. Essentially, they argue that qualified immunity must be granted absent binding precedent that addresses the very same carcinogen in this case. The argument is not compelling. The Supreme Court has held that ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . We have repeatedly rejected this type of argument, . . . and we do so once more today. . . Defendants next argue that the District Court erred by relying on statutes, not case law, in partially denying qualified immunity. We disagree. While ‘[o]fficials sued for constitutional violations do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some statutory or administrative provision,’ . . . we have previously held that ‘we may examine statutory or administrative provisions in conjunction with prevailing circuit or Supreme Court law to determine whether an individual had fair warning that his or her behavior would violate the victim’s constitutional rights.’ . . The District Court did not rely exclusively on any alleged violation of statutes or regulations to determine that Defendants had violated clearly established rights. Rather, the District Court relied on the binding case law in Helling and this Circuit’s decision in LaBounty v. Coughlin, recognizing a prisoner’s right to be free from exposure to friable asbestos, . . . to establish the contours of the right. In conjunction with those cases, it referred to regulations and statutes provided in the complaint to bolster the conclusions that radon is a dangerous carcinogen; that society is unwilling to tolerate the risks accompanying certain levels of radon exposure; and that such risks are—and have been since 1988—well known. Both the Supreme Court and this Court have similarly considered statutes as part of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Moreover, our decision also relies on our binding decisional law in Warren v. Keane, which held that, after Helling, it was ‘clearly established’ that defendants could violate the inmates’ Eighth Amendment rights by exposing them to unreasonable levels of ETS with deliberate indifference. . . Third, Defendants argue that the denial of their qualified immunity motion is inconsistent with the Supreme Court’s decision in Taylor v. Barkes. . . We think that Taylor is distinguishable and does not preclude our ruling on qualified immunity. [court discusses Taylor] . . . Just as important as what the Supreme Court did conclude in Taylor is what it did not conclude. It did not conclude that it would have been reasonable for the prison guards to completely forego suicide-prevention screening—to simply not act at all. Nor did it conclude that it would have been consistent with clearly established law for the prison guards to forego preventive measures if they were aware that an inmate posed a suicide risk—to operate in a state of knowing indifference. And so, the Supreme Court did not address the distinct possibility that complete inaction in the face of a risk to a prisoner’s health—or complete indifference to that risk once it was known—could be unreasonable, in violation of a prisoner’s clearly established constitutional rights. With that in mind, we see no difficulty in appreciating the difference between the present appeal and Taylor. In this case, Plaintiffs have alleged that prior to 2014, Defendants failed to take any steps to mitigate the substantial risk of excessive radon exposure. . . Unlike Taylor, where there was a risk-mitigation system in place that allegedly should have been better, the Plaintiffs here complain that Defendants took no action whatsoever. Worse still, Plaintiffs here plausibly allege that Defendants had knowledge of the radon exposure risk and still failed to act. Taylor granted immunity to prison guards who took some effort to remediate the health risks of the prisoners they oversaw; but it hardly stands for the principle that prison guards are immune even where no action is taken, especially when a health risk is known. . . In sum: Plaintiffs have alleged that from Garner’s inception, Defendants had knowledge of an unreasonable risk of serious harm to the inmates’ health, namely excessive radon exposure, and that Defendants were deliberately indifferent in failing to take any reasonable steps (including testing and mitigation) to abate this risk. . . On the basis of these allegations, accepted as true, we conclude that a failure to take any steps to abate the risk of excessive radon exposure violated Plaintiffs' clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to exposure to excessive radon gas, a toxic substance that poses a serious health risk—a right clearly established in Helling.”)

Jones v. Treubig, 963 F.3d 214, 224-28, 230, 236, 240 (2d Cir. 2020) (“The Second Circuit has set forth the procedure by which district courts should resolve disputes on factual issues at trial that are relevant to the qualified immunity analysis. In particular, ‘[i]f there are unresolved factual issues which prevent an early disposition of the defense [of qualified immunity], the jury should decide these issues on special interrogatories.’ . . . The first step of the qualified immunity test—namely, whether the defendant violated a statutory or constitutional right—was determined by the jury in this case, which found that Lt. Treubig used excessive force against Jones in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. As stated above, Lt. Treubig does not appeal this finding. Accordingly, our task here is to determine whether the right at issue was ‘clearly established’—that is, whether ‘it was objectively reasonable for [Lt. Treubig] to believe [his] acts did not violate those rights.’ . . . Before the incident at issue here in April 2015, it was clearly established in this Circuit that it is a Fourth Amendment violation for a police officer to use significant force against an arrestee who is no longer resisting and poses no threat to the safety of officers or others. . . . Notwithstanding that the focus of this appeal is the use of a taser, not pepper spray, we have warned that ‘[a]n officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.’ . . . It follows then that, after Tracy, any reasonable officer would understand that, because it violated clearly established law to use pepper spray against a non-resisting and non-threatening individual, the same would be true for the use of a taser. . . . In other words, the explicit focus of Tracy’s Fourth Amendment analysis was on the officer’s significant use of force in a gratuitous and excessive manner during an arrest, rather than the particular mode of that force. Therefore, following Tracy, it was clearly established that an officer’s significant use of force against an arrestee who was no longer resisting and who posed no threat to the safety of officers or others—whether such force was by pepper spray, taser, or any other similar use of significant force—violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e now turn to whether the right articulated in Tracy was clearly established in the more particular context in which the challenged conduct regarding the taser occurred in this case. . . . With respect to the second tasing cycle, the district court concluded that ‘there is nothing in the cases from the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit that gave “fair warning” that the second use of the taser was unconstitutional at the time of the plaintiff’s arrest.’ . . . As discussed below, in reaching this conclusion, the district court erroneously relied upon a factual finding—namely, that Jones was continuing to resist after the first tasing—that was rejected by the jury in a special interrogatory and is inconsistent with the trial evidence as construed most favorably to Jones, which is the applicable standard on a Rule 50 motion. Moreover, the district court relied upon the fact that ‘[t]he jury found that Lt. Treubig believed—although incorrectly—that the plaintiff was resisting arrest and that the second use of the taser was needed to gain control of the plaintiff’s arms.’ . . . A mistake of fact, however, in the absence of an additional jury finding that the mistake was reasonable (when there are disputed material facts on that question) is insufficient to support an officer's claim that he is entitled to qualified immunity, and no such finding of reasonableness was made by the jury here. Similarly, for the reasons provided below, the fact that the re-cycling of the taser followed in rapid succession after the first tasing and that Jones was unhandcuffed at the time of the re-cycled taser does not undermine our qualified immunity analysis in this case. For the reasons explained below, we hold that, after considering the jury's factual findings in the special interrogatories and construing the evidence regarding the remaining factual disputes most favorably to Jones, Lt. Treubig's second use of the taser under the particular circumstances he confronted violated clearly established law. . . . Not only was there evidence in the record to support that Jones was no longer resisting arrest at the time of second tasing, but the jury made that specific factual finding in a special interrogatory. . . . [O]ur qualified immunity analysis must assume that, even though Jones may have been resisting arrest during the initial parts of the police encounter up to the time of the first tasing, when Lt. Treubig re-cycled his taser and sent another electric shock through Jones, he was no longer trying to get off the ground, no longer actively resisting arrest, and no longer posing a threat to the police officers. Instead, construing the evidence most favorably to Jones, at that point, he was face down on the ground with his arms spread. On those facts, no reasonable officer could believe that the use of the taser a second time against Jones was lawful. . . . [W]here such an opportunity to re-assess reasonably exists, officers must consider whether additional force is necessary under the circumstances confronting the officer—a point made clear under the circumstances in Tracy. . . . Notwithstanding the fact that Lt. Treubig's two uses of the taser occurred in rapid succession, there was clear evidence that he had enough time to re-assess the situation between the first and second use of the taser. . . . In sum, upon a review of the relevant legal authority, we hold that it was clearly established as of April 2015 that a police officer cannot use significant force, such as a taser, against an individual who is no longer resisting or posing a threat to the officers or others. In light of the jury's findings and viewing the record on the remaining factual disputes in the light most favorable to Jones, we must assume for the qualified immunity analysis that Jones was subdued when Lt. Treubig re-cycled his taser, in that Jones was no longer resisting arrest or posing a threat to the officers or others, but rather lying face down on the ground with his arms spread. No qualified immunity can thus exist on those facts. As a result, we reverse the district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law, and instruct that the jury verdict against Lt. Treubig should be reinstated.")

McCray v. Lee, 963 F.3d 110, 119-20 (2d Cir. 2020) ("The operation of the 'clearly established' standard 'depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant "legal rule" is to be identified.' . . . To deny qualified immunity, '[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . But this does 'not' mean that the official enjoys immunity 'unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.' . . . In this Circuit the rights of prisoners to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise had been clearly established nearly three decades before the events of which McCray complains. . . . [T]he district court defined the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise at an unduly narrow level of specificity, stating that defendants here would be entitled to qualified immunity 'because there is no clearly established constitutional right to a prison yard without naturally accumulating ice or snow during winter months.’ . . But the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise is not confined to a particular season; although not constant, the right is ongoing. The right need not be described with specific references to the weather or characteristics of the seasons of the year in order for a reasonable prison official to understand that climatic features may necessitate responsive measures to ensure that the right to a meaningful opportunity for physical exercise not be denied.”)

Barnes v. Fedele, 813 F. App’x 696, ____ (2d Cir. 2020) (“Nuttall relies primarily on White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551 (2017), which he argues changed the law after our last remand and required there to be ‘clearly established’ precedent showing that an official violated the law before he can be stripped of qualified immunity. . . We disagree. White did not change the law; it merely ‘reiterate[d] the longstanding principle that clearly established law should not be defined at a high level of generality.’ . . Here, the law is and has been specific and clear: Prison officials may only abridge a prisoner’s free exercise rights if doing so is ‘reasonably related to some legitimate penological interests.’ . . Importantly, Nuttall was the only Defendant involved in creating the Directive, yet he did not provide a declaration explaining the penological purpose behind its creation. Indeed, he did not provide any declaration. Nevertheless, the district court imputed the penological interest articulated by Chappius onto Nuttall. . . This was error, as nothing in the record sets forth Nuttall’s motivation or thinking. As we indicated when this case was last before us, the analysis for the Defendants who merely applied the Directive is different than the analysis for the Defendant who implemented it. . . It is possible, after all, that Chappius’s ‘understanding’ of the policy, . . . was not aligned with Nuttall’s reason for signing the Directive. Accordingly, on the record before us, Nuttall is not entitled to summary judgment.”)

Mudge v. Zugalla, 939 F.3d 72, 78-82 (2d Cir. 2019) (“The plaintiff has failed to establish that the right to the meaningful use of his teaching license was clearly established at the time. He has also failed to demonstrate that the defendants’ conduct was sufficiently stigmatizing under clearly established law so as to give rise to a ‘stigma-plus’ claim. We therefore reverse the judgment and remand the case with instruction to the district court to enter summary judgment in favor of the defendants. . . . Multiple district and state courts have expressed the view that New York State recognizes that a teaching-license holder is entitled to a ‘meaningful opportunity’ to seek employment pursuant to that license, and that denial of such an opportunity constitutes a constructive revocation without due process. . . . The plaintiff contends that the defendants violated his procedural due process rights by denying him a meaningful opportunity to seek employment pursuant to his teaching license. . . Assuming arguendo that a constitutional violation did, in fact, take place, the plaintiff has failed to establish that the right was clearly established at the time of the defendants’ conduct. The constitutional right to the meaningful use of a teaching license has not been recognized by the Supreme Court or by this Court; it has, as noted, been adopted by federal-district and state courts only. In the qualified immunity context, that is insufficient to constitute ‘clearly established’ law. . . And although state law may create property interests, it cannot, of its own force, create a clearly established substantive federal constitutional right. . . Because the plaintiff has failed to establish that the defendants violated his clearly established due process right, the district court erred in denying the defendants qualified immunity as to that claim and declining to grant summary judgment with respect to it. . . .The defendants also argue that the district court erred in denying them qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's "stigma-plus" claim. Here too, we agree with them. . . .Again, the plaintiff may or may not have made out a constitutional claim, but he has in any event failed to establish that the defendants' conduct violated a clearly established right. At the time of the defendants' alleged violation, at least, it was not clearly established that notice of the mere existence of an internal investigation into a license holder's behavior, without some detail as to the possible misconduct being investigated, could give rise to a stigma-plus claim. . . .The plaintiff has demonstrated at most that the defendants interfered with his relationship, actual and potential, with a single employer: Middleburgh. That falls decidedly short of demonstrating under clearly established law that the defendants created a significant roadblock to his ability to practice his profession. . . .Thus, even if Mudge had shown facts making out a stigma-plus claim, it was objectively reasonable for the defendants to conclude, in light of then existing law, that their conduct was lawful at the time they engaged in it. The defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's stigma-plus claim and summary judgment in the defendants' favor on that claim should, on remand, be granted too.")

Brandon v. Kinter, 938 F.3d 21, 39 & n.14 (2d Cir. 2019) ("It is clearly established law in our Circuit that 'to deny prison inmates the provision of food that satisfies the dictates of their faith does unconstitutionally burden their free exercise rights.' . . .The defendants contend, however, that the law was not clearly established as to how many religiously compliant meals must be denied before the prisoner's religious beliefs are substantially burdened. Assuming arguendo that this is so, the argument cannot save them. As discussed above, a genuine dispute of material fact exists as to the number of noncompliant meals that Brandon was served. Based on the evidence in the record, a reasonable jury could find that Brandon was denied 63 religiously appropriate meals. And the defendants make no argument that a reasonable officer would have believed that 63 noncompliant meals was not a substantial burden. . . .The defendants may, of course, still argue at trial that they reasonably believed that the meals actually did not contain pork. But because genuine disputes exist as to the facts underlying such a defense, we cannot grant summary judgment to the defendants on such a ground. We today also hold that even the 10 meals that concededly contained pork violated Brandon's rights. Given the material dispute as to the number of pork-containing meals that were served to Brandon, we need not today decide what number of meals would constitute a sufficiently clear violation of Brandon's rights as to preclude a qualified immunity defense.")

Naumovski v. Norris, 934 F.3d 200, 218-19 (2d Cir. 2019) ("To the extent the District Court relied on our recent en banc decision in Zarda v. Altitude Express, Inc. in recognizing Naumovski's arguable sexual orientation discrimination claims, . . . it erred for at least two reasons. First, Zarda specifically addressed the question of whether Title VII prohibits sexual orientation discrimination. It did not address whether the Constitution prohibits sexual orientation discrimination. Thus, Zarda is only 'clearly established law' for statutory sexual orientation discrimination claims under Title VII. It does not, however, 'clearly establish' constitutional (i.e. §

1983) sexual orientation discrimination claims. Second, even if it were reasonable for the District Court to interpret Zarda as establishing a sexual orientation discrimination claim under the Constitution, . . . the conduct at issue in this case predated the issuance of the Zarda decision. Prior to Zarda, our Court had expressly declined to recognize sexual orientation discrimination claims under Title VII, much less the Constitution. . . Thus, if anything, the ‘clearly established law’ at the time Defendants terminated Naumovski’s employment was that sexual orientation discrimination was not a subset of sex discrimination. Insofar as the District Court relied on Zarda, therefore, Defendants were surely entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor could the District Court rely on freestanding constitutional principles separate from Zarda. To date, neither this court nor the Supreme Court has recognized § 1983 claims for sexual orientation discrimination in public employment. Moreover, when the conduct in this case occurred, neither of the Supreme Court’s landmark same-sex marriage cases—United States v. Windsor. . . and Obergefell v. Hodges. . .—had been decided. It was, therefore, not yet clear that all state distinctions based on sexual orientation were constitutionally suspect. . . Thus, even if it is possible today that sexual orientation discrimination in public employment may be actionable under § 1983, at the time of the challenged conduct here such a constitutional prohibition was not yet ‘clearly established.’ Accordingly, Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on discrimination claims based on an arguable sexual orientation theory.”)

Mara v. Rilling, 921 F.3d 48, 72, 76-81 (2d Cir. 2019) (“Even if the facts admitted any ambiguity as to Mara’s arrest status on January 2, 2013, which we conclude they do not, police officers aware of the totality of circumstances just detailed—particularly, Mara’s agreement to a police meeting and the officers’ express statement to Mara that he was always free to leave the interview—could reasonably have believed that Mara would not have understood himself to be under arrest at the interview and, therefore, that probable cause was not required to speak with him. Certainly no clearly established law would have compelled ‘every reasonable officer’ to have concluded otherwise in the context described. . . Accordingly, as a matter of law, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mara’s federal and state claims of unlawful arrest on January 2, 2013. . . We conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mara’s federal and state claims of unlawful arrest and/or malicious prosecution stemming from the February 2013 arrest warrant because (1) the Kazmierczak photo identification was not, in fact, so defective as to require deletion from a corrected Rilling affidavit; (2) with that eyewitness identification included, the affidavit clearly states probable cause to arrest Mara for the Blackman assault, even if Mara’s statements are deleted; and (3) with probable cause thus established, it cannot be said that every reasonable officer would conclude that Mara could not lawfully be arrested or prosecuted as a result of the February 2013 arrest warrant. . . . To the extent he complains that his statements were used to support an arrest warrant that would otherwise have lacked probable cause, his claim would appear to invoke the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. We need not pursue the question of how the Fourth and Fifth Amendments might interact in such circumstances. . . For reasons discussed in the immediately preceding point of this opinion, we conclude that, even when Mara’s statements are deleted from the warrant application, the remaining facts, specifically, eyewitness Kazmierczak’s identification of Mara as Blackman’s assailant, convincingly established probable cause for his arrest. Thus, because Mara can demonstrate no Fourth or Fifth Amendment injury from the use of his statements in a warrant affidavit otherwise supported by probable cause, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on his coerced self-incrimination claim. . . . In sum, because Mara’s interrogation cannot be characterized as brutal or extreme, he cannot show a violation of substantive due process or state tort law, much less show that established precedent would have required every reasonable officer to have recognized such violations. Accordingly, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.”)

Mitchell v. City of New York, No. 18-588, 2019 WL 409441 (2d Cir. Jan. 31, 2019) (not reported) (“The only truly distinguishing fact between this case and Wesby is that in Wesby, the police officers made more of an effort to determine if the house was truly abandoned. . . . That is not enough of a difference to deny the City Defendants qualified immunity. Wesby emphasized that qualified immunity is appropriate unless a court can ‘identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. . . The case need not be directly on point, ‘but the existing precedent must place the lawfulness of the particular arrest beyond debate.’. . . Thus, there must be a ‘body of relevant case law [that] clearly establish[es] the answer with respect to probable cause.’. . . Plaintiffs identify no such case here.”)

Kaminsky v. Schriro, 760 F. App’x 69, ____ (2d Cir. 2019) (“Even if the area was curtilage, the officers’ belief that the area in which they waited was not curtilage was reasonable. At the time of the incident in question, the principal authority for classifying an area proximate to a house as curtilage or not was United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 107 S.Ct. 1134, 94 L.Ed.2d 326 (1987), which sets out a highly fact-specific four-factor test. . . . In a careful and thorough opinion, the experienced district court analyzed the Dunn factors and concluded that the area where the officers stood was not curtilage. Kaminsky cites no authority, extant at the time of the incident, sufficiently analogous to the specific facts of this case to have required a reasonable officer to reach a contrary conclusion. To the extent that cases post-dating the incident, such as Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 133 S.Ct. 1409, 185 L.Ed.2d 495 (2013), United States v. Alexander, 888 F.3d 628 (2d Cir. 2018), and Collins v. Virginia, ____ U.S. ____, 138 S.Ct. 1663, 201 L.Ed.2d 9 (2018), can be argued to call the district court’s analysis into question in any way, the officers cannot be expected to have anticipated such developments. The district court’s decision at a minimum establishes that a reasonable officer in 2011 could reasonably have concluded that the area in question was not curtilage.”)

Gorman v. Rensselaer County, 910 F.3d 40, 46-47 (2d Cir. 2018) (“Here, the district court granted defendants qualified immunity on summary judgment based on the ‘context’ of Gorman’s statement ‘as revealed by the whole record.’. . . We agree: the context was a volatile, intra-family feud that embroiled Patricelli and the Gorman siblings. That context indicates that the speech ‘primarily concern[ed] an issue that [was] personal in nature,’. . . ‘was calculated to redress [Gorman’s] personal grievances’ against Patricelli, and had no ‘broader public purpose[.]’ . . . It was score-settling, and had small practical significance to the public. Accordingly, at the time of the alleged violations, a reasonable officer would not have known that it was clearly established law that Gorman’s speech constituted a matter of public concern. The Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Gorman’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Gorman v. Rensselaer County, 910 F.3d 40, 48 (2d Cir. 2018) (Droney, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) (“The majority concludes that Sergeant Patricelli and the other officers are entitled to qualified immunity for retaliating against Gorman after Gorman reported Patricelli’s misuse of a confidential law enforcement database. Patricelli’s misuse of that database violated not only the New York Division of Criminal Justice Services’ written policies, but also New York criminal laws. Officer Gorman reported Patricelli’s misconduct to the state authorities responsible for the database and, based on their recommendation, then to the state prosecutor. The retaliation and harassment by Patricelli and the other individual defendants that followed included threats and physical abuse of Gorman. Because it was well-established at the time that misuse of such a law enforcement database was of significant public concern, the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. I therefore dissent.”)

Shannon v. Venettozzi, 749 F. App’x 10, __ (2d Cir. 2018) (“Shannon first argues that Officer McTurner’s alleged conduct in 2011 was objectively unreasonable and therefore violated his Eighth Amendment rights. We agree that it was objectively unreasonable for a correctional officer to behave as alleged in light of our current standards of decency. As we recognized in Crawford, in 2015, the Eighth Amendment is violated by even a single instance of ‘[a] corrections officer’s intentional contact with an inmate’s genitalia or other intimate area’ when such contact ‘serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer’s sexual desire or humiliate the inmate.’ . . . But Shannon’s legal claim arises from events predating Crawford by four years. Although the conduct alleged in the amended complaint is reprehensible both then and now, when it occurred in 2011, our precedent did not establish that such conduct was clearly unconstitutional. Rather, in Boddie, we had held that a ‘small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent’ was not sufficient to state a claim. . . . And, prior to our decision in Crawford, district courts had routinely interpreted Boddie to mandate the dismissal of similar claims at the pleading stage. . . . In line with this conclusion, we recently affirmed the district court’s grant of qualified immunity in Crawford itself, explaining that ‘[a]t a minimum, any constitutional distinction between [Crawford’s] case and Boddie was not clearly established” in 2011, when the conduct in Crawford, too, allegedly occurred. See Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App’x 57, 59 (2d Cir. 2018) (summary order). The same is true here. We therefore affirm the District Court’s grant of Officer McTurner’s motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds.”)

Colvin v. Keen, 900 F.3d 63, 75-76 (2d Cir. 2018) (“The Defendants were entitled to summary judgment unless there was clearly established law to the effect that Colvin’s speech was on a matter of public concern. There is no clearly established law to that effect. The speech of a public employee is addressed to a matter of public concern where it can be ‘fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community.’ . . . To qualify, the speech must have ‘a broader public purpose’ and not be merely ‘calculated to redress personal grievances.’ . . .

In determining whether speech addresses a matter of public concern, we examine the ‘content, form, and context of a given statement.’. The precedents do not show a ‘clearly established’ law favoring Colvin on this question. This court has found, on the one hand, that speech debating issues of discrimination, speech seeking relief from ‘pervasive or systemic misconduct’ by public officials, and speech that is “part of an overall effort to correct allegedly unlawful practices or bring them to public attention’ all go to matters of public concern. . . By contrast, we have found speech that ‘concerns essentially personal grievances’ does not qualify as speech on a matter of public concern[.] . . We have also reasoned that speech is not on a matter of public concern where it has ‘no practical significance to the general public[.]’ . . It is true that, under certain circumstances, we have found speech to be on a matter of public concern where it sought to ‘vindicate ... constitutional rights ... in the face of alleged police misconduct.’ . . In Golodner, we reasoned that ‘it is axiomatic that misconduct within a police department implicates a matter of public concern.’ . . In that case, however, the speech at issue related to alleged policies and patterns of police misconduct that ‘raise[d] serious constitutional concerns.’ . . Colvin’s speech, by contrast, was not addressed to misconduct at all. Colvin merely identified herself as an attorney, told her co-worker and the police officers that she wanted to get her co-worker an attorney and union representative, and advised her friend not to say anything until such representatives arrived. Colvin said nothing to indicate that Ms. Buch’s arrest was constitutionally improper. . . Since her speech was not addressed to police misconduct at all, much less to the sort of pattern of misconduct alleged in Golodner, Golodner does not clearly establish that Colvin’s speech was on a matter of public concern.”)

Berg v. Kelly, 897 F.3d 99, 112-13 (2d Cir. 2018) (“Police officers charged with protecting the President . . . might have reasonably believed that they could temporarily deny freedom of movement to persons on the scene, perhaps even until the President had departed. In short, while the present record does not permit us to conclude, as a matter of law, that the Officers’ actions went no further than the special need to protect the President warranted, no then clearly established law would have alerted reasonable officers that their actions did not fall within the special needs exception. Nor is a different conclusion warranted because the police did not deny all pedestrians and traffic movement to the same degree as the protesters. Reasonable officers might have been particularly alert to risks posed by the Occupy Wall Street protesters, whose professed intent was to ‘#OccupyObama.’ . . That a reasonable officer might objectively think that OWS protesters would not leave the area upon release but, rather, would attempt to approach or gain access to the hotel and the President found some support in other OWS protesters’ actions only weeks earlier in shutting down the Brooklyn Bridge. . . In sum, in the absence of clearly established law prohibiting the challenged detentions in the circumstances presented, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . The OWS protesters also assert that they were unlawfully detained for the duration of the President’s visit in retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Because the Officers have qualified immunity from suit based on their temporary detention of the protesters, these claims also fail. In Singer v. Fulton County Sheriff, 63 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir. 1995), we concluded that ‘if [an] officer either had probable cause or was qualifiedly immune from subsequent suit (due to an objectively reasonable belief that he had probable cause), then we will not examine the officer's underlying motive in arresting and charging the plaintiff.' The same reasoning applies to qualified immunity based on an objectively reasonable belief of special needs. We have determined above that officers in the position of protecting the President, as here, would have an objectively reasonable belief under the circumstances that the special needs presented in this case justified their limited detention of the protesters. Our rationale in Singer thus accords the Officers qualified immunity from the protesters' retaliation claims.")

Simon v. City of New York, 893 F.3d 83, 88, 97 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that, with the facts taken in the light most favorable to Simon, the defendants violated the Fourth Amendment. A warrant must be executed in conformity with its terms. . . Here, the warrant required the defendants to produce Simon to court on August 11, 2008, at 10:00 a.m., but they instead detained her for 18 hours over August 11 and 12, occasionally interrogated her about a crime, and never presented her to a judge. We further conclude that the unlawfulness of the defendants' conduct was clearly established when they acted. This is an uncommon "obvious case" in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.' . . No officer who is executing a warrant that requires that a prospective material witness be brought before a judge at a fixed date and time to determine whether the witness should be detained can reasonably believe that she is free instead to detain and interrogate the witness for hours on end outside of court supervision. . . . Miller, O'Rourke, and Yanez-Marquez, when considered in light of this Court's decisions explaining that an officer executing a warrant must generally comply with its terms, . . . might be thought to 'clearly foreshadow' our ruling today, which would likewise be sufficient to conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . But we need not decide whether these out-of-circuit authorities clearly foreshadow today's decision. This is one of the uncommon "obvious case[s]" in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.' . . We conclude, with the First Circuit, that this Fourth Amendment violation is so obvious that it violated clearly established law despite the lack of binding authority directly on point.")

Edrei v. Maguire, 892 F.3d 525, 539-44 (2d Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2614 (2019) ("[F]or purposes of 'clearly established law,' we apply the Fourteenth Amendment analysis from Glick, not the Supreme Court's 2015 decision in Kingsley. We begin with the delicate task of defining the right at issue. . . . Here, defendants' frame the question as 'whether the officers violated the Fourteenth Amendment by using the LRAD 100X to aid in moving protesters to the sidewalks after the protest became obstructive and potentially violent.' . . This framing puts not one but two thumbs on the scale in favor of defendants. First, it focuses on the officers' professed objective—moving protesters onto the sidewalk—while ignoring the degree of force that the officers allegedly used. Second, it recasts the protest as 'violent,' a characterization that, based on plaintiffs' allegations and the scene captured in the videos, is at best arguable. . . Perhaps this is an inference that a factfinder might ultimately make, but at this stage we must draw all inferences in favor of the plaintiffs, not the defendants. . . . [A]ccepting the facts alleged by the plaintiffs, the question here is whether, in 2014, non-violent protesters and onlookers, who officers had not ordered to disperse, had a right not to be subjected to pain and serious injury that was inflicted to move them onto the sidewalks. Preliminarily, we address whether this conduct alleges a Fourteenth Amendment violation under the legal standard applicable in 2014. Although our earlier discussion drew on Kingsley, the result is the same under Glick's parallel factors. To repeat, this Court's longstanding test for excessive force claims teaches that force must be necessary and proportionate to the circumstances. . . . Would reasonable officers have known that subjecting non-violent protesters to pain and serious injury simply to move them onto the sidewalks violated the Fourteenth Amendment? Defendants insist that the circumstances before them were too dissimilar from then-existing precedents to provide this notice. They raise two principal arguments. Neither withstands scrutiny. First, the defendants deny that it was clearly established in December 2014 that using force in a crowd control context violates due process. In their view, because this Court has not applied 'substantive due process principles to crowd control,' the officers lacked notice that the right against excessive force applies to non-violent protesters. . . . But that is like saying police officers who run over people crossing the street illegally can claim immunity simply because we have never addressed a Fourteenth Amendment claim involving jaywalkers. This would convert the fair notice requirement into a presumption against the existence of basic constitutional rights. Qualified immunity doctrine is not so stingy. . . . Training our focus on controlling authority, we see that this Court has repeatedly emphasized that officers engaging with protesters must comply with the same principles of proportionality attendant to any other use of force. . . . Both Parmley and Amnesty America gave the defendants fair warning that the prohibition on excessive force applies to protesters. This is true even though both those cases arose under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Shifting attention from the protesters to the technology at issue, defendants' second argument is that, at the time of the events, the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to LRADs. . . . [N]ovel technology, without more, does not entitle an officer to qualified immunity. . . . Given our call for common sense in the face of new technology, defendants cannot credibly complain they lacked notice that the proscription on excessive force applied to acoustic devices. . . . Even though sound waves are a novel method for deploying force, the effect of an LRAD's area denial function is familiar: pain and incapacitation. . . . Using common sense, any reasonable officer with knowledge of the LRAD's operations would understand that the area denial function represents a 'significant degree of force.' . . . To recap, assuming the truthfulness of the allegations in the complaint, and drawing all reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor, the defendants knew or should have known that the area denial function could cause serious injury. When engaging with non-violent protesters who had not been ordered to disperse, no reasonable officer would have believed that the use of such dangerous force was a permissible means of moving protesters to the sidewalks. Whatever legitimate interest the officers had in clearing the street, the use of sound capable of causing pain and hearing loss in the manner alleged in the complaint was not rationally related to this end. We therefore conclude that the district court properly denied the defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . . Our decision regarding the defendants' use of the LRAD is a narrow one. We do not hold that the Fourteenth Amendment bars law enforcement from using LRADs. To the contrary, we are confident that, in appropriate circumstances, following careful study and proper training, LRADs can be a valuable tool for law enforcement. Their usefulness as a long-range communications device is plain. We also think that, under certain conditions, an LRAD that is properly calibrated might be a lawful means of ordering (or perhaps even compelling) protesters to disperse. We merely hold (1) that, on the allegations before us, which we must accept as true, the plaintiffs have stated a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim and (2) that purposefully using the LRAD in a manner capable of causing serious injury to move non-violent protesters to the sidewalks violated law that was clearly established as of 2014. We are also mindful that the complaint before us is just one side of the story, told from the perspective of the plaintiffs. But courts and juries must assess excessive force claims from ‘the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.’ . . . It follows that, once the allegations are tested by evidence, particularly evidence about what the officers saw and knew, the defendants may yet be entitled to qualified immunity. We can envision various factual showings that would change the calculus. One key variable is the state of unrest at the protest. The evidence may show that the defendants observed a more violent scene than is portrayed in the complaint and incorporated videos. Another key consideration is how the LRAD was used, most notably the volume of the device and its proximity to protesters and passersby. And, third, as Kingsley acknowledges, much hinges on what the defendants knew. Perhaps the defendants had not seen the report on the Model 3300 and lacked knowledge of the LRAD’s harmful effects. The complaint alleges that the NYPD ‘has not properly trained its officers’ on LRAD use and acknowledges that Department’s use of force protocols ‘do not account for LRAD use.’ . . . So perhaps the defendants had received training but reasonably believed that they were not using the device in an unsafe or gratuitous manner. Any one of these non-exhaustive factors could warrant a reappraisal of qualified immunity.”) Monaco v. Sullivan, 737 F. App’x 6, __ (2d Cir. 2018) (“The district court held that Monaco failed to make an adequate showing to survive summary judgment on either the objective or the subjective prongs. When assessing the subjective prong, the district court applied Caiozzo, where we held that a plaintiff must show ‘that the government-employed defendant disregarded a risk of harm to the plaintiff of which the defendant was aware.’ . . . Monaco failed to meet this standard, the court concluded, because the record contained no evidence suggesting that Packard knew that his failure to prescribe Lithium posed a threat to Monaco. On appeal, Monaco does not dispute that he would not meet the Caiozzo test. He instead points out that this Court overruled Caiozzo. In Darnell, decided a year after the district court’s decision in this case, we held that a plaintiff can meet the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test as long as the defendant ‘should have known’ that his action ‘posed an excessive risk to [the plaintiff’s] health or safety.’ . . . Monaco therefore argues on appeal that we should vacate the district court’s grant of summary judgment because it applied the now-defunct Caiozzo standard, and a jury could reasonably conclude that Packard acted recklessly under Darnell. We disagree. Assuming arguendo that Monaco is correct that Packard’s failure to prescribe Lithium was reckless, Packard would still be entitled to qualified immunity. Darnell was decided in 2017 and thus could not have clearly established that reckless medical treatment amounts to deliberate indifference at the time Packard treated Monaco. Indeed, before Caiozzo, we had never decided this issue at all. . . . Because Packard did not violate clearly established law when he treated Monaco in 1998, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.”)

Montero v. City of Yonkers, New York, 890 F.3d 386, 394, 398-403 (2d Cir. 2018) (“We conclude that the district court correctly held that the existence of a civilian analogue is not dispositive of whether a public employee spoke as a private citizen, but it is merely a factor the court could consider as part of the inquiry into whether the public employee’s speech was made pursuant to his ordinary employment-related responsibilities. We nevertheless find that the district court erred in ruling that Montero’s speech was not protected because it was tangentially related to his job responsibilities. That fact is not dispositive as a matter of law. It is clear from the pleadings that Montero’s union remarks did not fall within his responsibilities as a police officer, and he therefore made these remarks as a private citizen. Because at least some of Montero’s remarks addressed a matter of public concern, moreover, we vacate and remand the district court’s judgment dismissing Montero’s First Amendment retaliation claim as to defendant Olson. We affirm the district court’s dismissal of the claims against defendants Moran and Mueller for a different reason: their alleged acts were protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . We conclude that Montero sufficiently pled that his union remarks cannot be considered ‘part-and-parcel of his concerns about his ability to properly execute his duties.’ . . . The ‘critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee’s duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.’ . . . Montero made his remarks as union vice president, a role in which he was not required to serve. . . . Nevertheless, Montero would have us go further and decide categorically, as some circuits have, that when a person speaks in his or her capacity as a union member, he or she speaks as a private citizen. . . . While we therefore decline to decide categorically that when a person speaks in his capacity as a union member, he speaks as a private citizen, we conclude that, under the facts of this case as set out in the amended complaint, when Montero spoke in his capacity as a union member, he spoke as a private citizen. This was because, taking the amended complaint’s allegations as true, Montero spoke in his role as a union officer, and his union speech was not composed of statements made as a ‘means to fulfill’ or ‘undertaken in the course of performing’ his responsibilities as a police officer. . . . Consequently, he engaged in citizen speech for purposes of the First Amendment. . . . At this stage in the proceedings, we cannot say that Montero’s union remarks about how reductions in police manpower might reduce public safety and his call for a vote of no-confidence in Commissioner Hartnett were solely ‘calculated to redress [his] personal grievances’ against Olson and his allies. . . . Nor, despite the City defendants’ contentions otherwise, do we find it critical to this inquiry that Montero made his remarks at a non-public meeting. . . . We therefore conclude that Montero has sufficiently pled that his criticism of cuts in police manpower at the June 2010 union meeting and his call for a no-confidence vote in Police Commissioner Hartnett at the February 2011 union meeting qualified as statements on matters of public concern. . . . Defendants Moran and Mueller argue that even if Montero’s speech was constitutionally protected and they took adverse employment actions against him for this speech, they are, even on the present state of the proceedings, entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. . . . It is true that at the time Moran and Mueller allegedly retaliated against Montero, we had stated in Weintraub that the ‘lack of a citizen analogue [was]

“not dispositive” in [that] case.’ . . . As detailed above, the role of a citizen analogue in determining whether one speaks as a citizen remained murky, however, and we had expressed no view as to its role in protecting union speech outside the context of a union grievance. . . . Thus, we had not made clear that, under the circumstances as alleged in the amended complaint, Montero spoke in his capacity as a private citizen. On appeal, Montero contends, once again, that Clue ‘clearly establishe[s]’ that a person’s union activity criticizing management is categorically protected by the First Amendment. . . . But, as noted above, Clue was decided before Garcetti, and focused solely on whether the union plaintiffs had spoken on a matter of public concern. . . . After Garcetti, it is clear that courts must determine both whether the plaintiff spoke on a matter of public concern and whether he or she spoke as a private citizen. Moreover, in Weintraub, we plainly rejected the notion that one is necessarily speaking as a private citizen when acting in his or her union capacity. Because the specific question of whether the plaintiff’s alleged union remarks were protected by the First Amendment was not beyond debate at the time of Moran and Mueller’s alleged retaliation against Montero, nor does Clue hold otherwise, we conclude as a matter of law that under the claims as pled by Montero, these defendants are protected from liability by qualified immunity.”)

Hancock v. County of Rensselaer, 882 F.3d 58, 61, 69 (2d Cir. 2018) (“[W]e find that even individuals with non-stigmatizing medical conditions have a right to privacy in their medical records, even if their interest in privacy might be less. We REMAND this case back to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this analysis, including a consideration of whether qualified immunity might apply. . . . Because the district court found that Appellants did not have claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, it did not have to pass on whether the individual Appellees were entitled to qualified immunity from those claims. In remanding the case, we instruct the court to determine whether Mahar, Hetman, and/or Young are entitled to it. . . . We note that on a summary judgment motion, facts are to be interpreted most favorably to non-movants, i.e. Appellants in this case. We have just discussed how their version of the facts plausibly alleges a violation of a constitutional right. That leaves only the question of whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, keeping in mind that qualified immunity law does not require a case on point concerning the exact permutation of facts that state actors confront in order to establish a clear standard for their behavior.”)

Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App’x 57, ____ (2d Cir. 2018 (“Plaintiffs first argue that the violative nature of Prindle’s conduct was clearly established by Boddie v. Schnieder, where we stated that ‘sexual abuse of a prisoner by a corrections officer may in some circumstances violate the prisoner’s right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment.’ . . . This argument is not persuasive. Although Boddie held that inmate sexual abuse could, in principle, violate the Eighth Amendment, it concluded that a ‘small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent’ were insufficient to state a claim. . . . Contrary to plaintiffs’ argument, the allegations we considered in Boddie are quite similar to the allegations here. A reasonable officer could therefore have believed that the sexual abuse here alleged, even if it might violate state criminal law or subject him to tort liability, did not violate the Eighth Amendment. At a minimum, any constitutional distinction between this case and Boddie was not clearly established in March 2011. . . .Plaintiffs next argue that, in 2011, out-of-circuit authorities ‘clearly foreshadow[ed]’ our holding in Crawford I that Prindle’s actions violated the Constitution. . . . We disagree. Although some other courts had described an inmate’s right to be free of sexual abuse in admirably clear, broad terms, . . . ‘[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established,’ . . . and out-of-circuit authority was, at the time, sharply divided on whether abuse comparable to Prindle’s was cruel and unusual.”) Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 56-59 (2d Cir. 2017) (“[W]e agree with the district court that Allah’s substantive due process rights were violated when he was assigned to Administrative Segregation in October 2010 while a pretrial detainee. Although prison officials are to be afforded deference in matters of institutional security, such deference does not relieve officials from the requirements of due process or permit them to institute restrictive measures on pretrial detainees that are not reasonably related to legitimate governmental purposes. . . . Here, in assigning Allah to Administrative Segregation in October 2010, prison officials made no individualized assessment whatsoever of the risk that Allah posed to institutional security. Instead, they placed Allah in Administrative Segregation solely on the basis of his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) the Administrative Segregation program during a prior term of incarceration, consistent with their practice of doing so for any such inmate, unless he or she had nearly completed all three phases of the program or more than five years had elapsed since the inmate’s prior term of incarceration. . . . That practice may serve as a useful rule of thumb for determining when an inmate who has previously been identified as a security risk is sufficiently rehabilitated, such that prison officials may want to consider whether he or she should re-enter the general prison population. We do not quarrel with the proposition that such rules of thumb may often be appropriate in guiding the many day-to-day decisions that prison officials must make to safeguard institutional security. But when such rules of thumb are applied inflexibly to justify severe restrictions on pretrial detainees at the expense of any meaningful consideration of whether those restrictions are justified by a legitimate governmental purpose, due process concerns come into play. Here, prison officials adhered reflexively to a practice that did not allow for individualized consideration of Allah’s circumstances and that required him to be placed in Administrative Segregation regardless of his actual threat, if any, to institutional security. On that basis, Allah was isolated in his cell for up to 23 hours a day; required for months to wear restraints whenever out of his cell, including when showering; allowed very limited opportunities to see his family; and subjected to the numerous other restrictions described above. . . . We agree that Wolfish and its progeny put prison officials on notice that pretrial detainees have a substantive due process right not to be subjected to restrictions amounting to punishment. But just as ‘[t]he general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,’ . . . the general principle articulated in Wolfish does not clearly establish that a substantive due process violation would result from Allah’s placement in Administrative Segregation based solely on his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) that program. Nor does Allah identify any other case law that would have placed Defendants on notice that their conduct violated substantive due process.”)

Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 60, 62-63 (2d Cir. 2017) (Pooler, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part, and dissenting from the judgment) (“I concur with the majority’s holding that Allah’s constitutional rights were violated when prison officials failed to consider whether he posed a risk to the institution before placing him in extended solitary confinement. I would additionally hold, however, that the restraints imposed in this case were unconstitutional as a response to the minimal infraction Allah committed. And I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity for having imposed the restraints. . . . In light of the similarity of Allah’s conditions to the Supreme Court’s example in Wolfish, and in light of the lack of legitimate government interest in instituting those conditions, I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity. Accordingly, I dissent from the portion of the majority’s opinion granting immunity to the officials and from its disposition reversing the judgment below.”)

Brown v. City of New York, 862 F.3d 182, 190-92 (2d Cir. 2017) (“On the uncontested facts and the two facts that it presumed in Brown’s favor, the District Court held that the officers were shielded from liability by their qualified immunity. We agree. As instructed by the Supreme Court, we are ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,’ . . . and we consider, as we must, the particular circumstances in which the force was used in effecting Brown’s arrest. The force applied, which was the repeated use of pepper spray, the kicking of Brown’s legs out from under her to bring her to the ground, and Plevritis’s using his hand to push Brown’s face onto the pavement, occurred after Brown refused to comply with the instructions to place her hands behind her back for handcuffing. During her noncompliance with the instructions, she was warned prior to each application of the pepper spray. The issue presented, therefore, is whether, under clearly established law, every reasonable officer would have concluded that these actions violated Brown’s Fourth Amendment rights in the particular circumstance presented by the uncontested facts and the facts presumed in Brown’s favor. Here, those circumstances involved a person’s repeatedly refusing to follow the instructions of police officers who were attempting to apply handcuffs to accomplish an arrest. No precedential decision of the Supreme Court or this Court ‘clearly establishes’ that the actions of Naimoli or Plevritis, viewed in the circumstances in which they were taken, were in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The excessive force cases on which Brown relies do not suffice for this purpose. . . . There is some tension in this Court’s case law concerning whether out-of-circuit precedent can ever clearly establish law in this Circuit. Compare Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir. 2006), with Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015). Even assuming that such precedent may suffice in certain circumstances, however, we conclude that no such circumstances exist in this case. This is not a case, for example, ‘where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own court foreshadowed’ the establishment of the rule of law on which Brown seeks to rely. . . . Similarly, we must reject Brown’s argument that summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds was improper because the officers allegedly violated the New York City Police Department Patrol Guide directive not to use pepper spray from a distance of less than three feet. Our presuming in Brown’s favor the disputed fact as to the distance the officers maintained, as the District Court did, does not change our conclusion. Brown is unable to demonstrate that any administering of pepper spray at a distance of as short as one foot upon an uncooperative arrestee violated ‘clearly established’ Fourth Amendment law against excessive force. Brown argues that the two officers ‘were not entitled to qualified immunity since they violated clearly established law by using substantial and unnecessary force to arrest Ms. Brown when she posed no threat to the officers or others, and there were less aggressive techniques to arrest her for a noncriminal and slight offense.’ . . . Her argument is grounded in the Graham factors, but this Court already has concluded that these factors ‘would seem to point toward a determination of excessive force,’ . . . in concluding that a jury possibly could find the force used against Brown to have exceeded that permitted under the Fourth Amendment. Her positing that she posed no threat and that less forceful methods existed to accomplish her arrest is not directed to the inquiry we must make as to qualified immunity. Again, that inquiry is whether every reasonable police officer would view the force used by Naimoli and Plevritis, in the circumstances in which that force was applied, as excessive according to clearly established law.”)

Johnson v. Perry, 859 F.3d 156, 175-77 (2d Cir. 2017) (“Johnson has not called to our attention any case in which a parent has been held to have a First Amendment right to unlimited access to school property. Given the responsibility of school officials to prevent ‘the kind of boisterous and threatening conduct’ that would interrupt the ‘peace and quiet’ and ‘disturb[] the tranquility’ required for the academic aspects of a school’s functions, . . . we cannot conclude that a parent has a general and unlimited First Amendment right of access to school property. To the extent that Perry banned Johnson from Capital Prep property for purposes other than attendance at sporting events, we conclude that Perry should have been granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity for that aspect of Johnson’s First Amendment claim. . . . As indicated in Part II.C. above, unless there is a clear and present danger of disruptions such as disorder, riot, obstruction of the event, or immediate threat to public safety, the school may regulate access to its gymnasium when it is being used as a limited public forum only if its restrictions are reasonable and viewpoint-neutral. The version of the events proffered by Johnson, with the record taken in the light most favorable to him, would permit a rational juror to find that Perry’s ban of Johnson from Capital Prep basketball games was neither viewpoint-neutral nor reasonable. The jury could permissibly find that Perry had repeatedly bullied JD, that Perry had falsely denied bullying her and maligned her, and that Johnson had vehemently complained of the bullying and the falsehoods. The jury could further infer that Johnson presented no threat of disruption or of harm to anyone--nor even any specter of intimidation, his daughter having already withdrawn from the varsity team before imposition of the ban--and that Perry’s motive in banning Johnson from the Capital Prep limited public forum was to punish him for having expressed his views that Perry had engaged in bullying and falsification. . . . We also conclude, in light of the authorities discussed in Part II.C. above, that the right not to be excluded, based on viewpoint differences or because of possible annoyance, from sports events to which the public was invited was clearly established. Perry’s motion for summary judgment was properly denied as to this aspect of Johnson’s First Amendment claim. . . Finally, we can see no basis for Perry’s claim of qualified immunity with respect to his ban against Johnson's attendance at school sports events held beyond school property. First, the distinction between school regulations applicable on school property and those targeting events beyond school property is one that other Circuits, in assessing whether school authorities' restrictions violated First Amendment rights, had found important, and indeed dispositive. . . . Second, the state championship basketball game from which Perry had Johnson removed was held not only off Capital Prep property but in a stadium at the Mohegan Sun casino, a venue that was privately owned. Persons attending sports events there are invitees of the owner. 'First Amendment protections ... are especially strong where an individual engages in speech activity from his or her own private property,' Papineau, 465 F.3d at 56, or on private property on which the individual is an invitee.'")

Estate of Devine v. Fusaro, 676 F. App'x 61, (2d Cir. 2017) ("Even when we view the record in the light most favorable to the Estate, we conclude, as the district court did, that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the asserted right, i.e., Devine's right to be free from less-than-lethal force in the circumstances, was not clearly established in the described circumstances. As the district court observed, three undisputed facts support that conclusion: (1) the police used force designed to be less-than-lethal, rather than deadly; (2) they used such force against a man reasonably believed to be suicidal and armed with a loaded gun while occupying public property; and (3) they used such force only after several hours of a standoff and negotiations that had not convinced Devine to surrender his gun. . . . We accept as true the Estate's assertion that an interval of several minutes passed between the two rounds of rubber baton projectiles fired by Defendants, during which Devine stated, '[W]hat are you doing? ... You guys are going to make me do this[.]'. . . But the Estate points to no law clearly establishing that, following such a statement, the firing of a second round of rubber batons in a less-than-lethal manner violated Devine's clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. We acknowledge the tragic circumstances of this case; nevertheless, because the law afforded the defendant officers no 'fair and clear warning' that their conduct might violate Devine's constitutional rights, we affirm the qualified-immunity-based judgment.")

Garnett v. Undercover Officer C0039, 838 F.3d 265, 268, 274-80 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2016) ("In Ricciuti, we held that, even if there is probable cause to arrest a defendant, an officer who subsequently fabricates that defendant's confession 'and forwards that information to prosecutors ... violates the accused's constitutional right to a fair trial, and the harm occasioned by such an unconscionable action is redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.' . . . This case calls for us to consider whether Ricciuti requires the same result when the fabricated information at issue is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors. We hold that it does. . . . The instant case presents this court with an important legal question: whether Ricciuti's holding—that a Section 1983 plaintiff may sue for denial of the right to a fair trial based on a police officer's fabrication of information—applies when the information fabricated is the officer's own account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity, which he or she then conveys to a prosecutor. We answer that question in the affirmative, while emphasizing the essential limiting principles encompassed by the Ricciuti standard. . . . Ricciuti's reasoning applies as much to a situation where, as here, the falsified information was the officer's account, conveyed to prosecutors, of what he heard the defendant say or do during the alleged offense, as it did in Ricciuti, where the officer was describing what he heard the defendant say during an interview after his arrest. UC 39 makes two arguments against relying on Ricciuti. First, UC 39 argues that Ricciuti does not control this case because Ricciuti addressed only whether qualified immunity was available to police officers who willfully fabricated evidence, rather than the merits of Ricciuti's denial of the right to a fair trial claim. . . . Second, UC 39 argues that falsification of evidence has always been addressed under the auspices of false arrest and malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. UC 39 maintains that application of a denial of the right to a fair trial claim to falsified evidence would upset the balance between liability and probable cause developed in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. On the first point, UC 39 is incorrect that Ricciuti's holding is limited to the question of immunity. In Ricciuti, the panel held that fabrication of evidence violated a 'clearly established constitutional right[]' and thus the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Thus, in order to find that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity, the panel necessarily also held that the officers' conduct in fabricating Ricciuti's supposed 'confession' violated a clearly established constitutional right, the right to a fair trial. . . . Whether this right is rooted in the Sixth Amendment or Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, or both, is an issue we need not decide because the constitutional harm resulting from the falsified information at issue is in any event redressable in an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . In short, a Section 1983 claim for the denial of a right to a fair trial based on an officer's provision of false information to prosecutors can stand even if the officer had probable cause to arrest the Section 1983 plaintiff. . . . First, claims alleging the denial of a right to a fair trial based on fabricated information are redressable under the Constitution, regardless of which constitutional provision provides the basis for the claim—'[c]ertain wrongs affect more than a single right and, accordingly, can implicate more than one of the Constitution's commands.' . . . Second, probable cause, which is a Fourth Amendment concept, should not be used to immunize a police officer who violates an arrestee's non-Fourth Amendment constitutional rights. . . . Third and lastly, any limitation of false information allegations to false arrest and malicious prosecution claims would ignore the collateral consequences that are associated with fabricated information even if the officer had probable cause for the initial arrest. . . . Although we hold that any information fabricated by an officer can serve as the basis of a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial, we acknowledge concerns raised by the City of New York ("City") about attaching liability for false information to an officer's account of his or her own observations of an alleged criminal activity giving rise to an arrest. For example, the City posits that an affirmance of Ricciuti would lead to the retrial of every unsuccessful state prosecution as a federal Section 1983 action and would turn an individual's resentment at being prosecuted into allegations of fabrication against police officers. The City cautions that such retrials would impose burdens on society by chilling the work of honest officers and by diverting energy away from general policing and towards defensive litigation. This court does not take those concerns lightly. Nonetheless, the City's proposed distinction between fabricated testimony about what an officer claims to have seen during a 'buy and bust' and fabricated testimony about a purported confession is incoherent. The court's holding in Ricciuti covers 'false information,' . . . not merely false information about confessions. The information fabricated by Lieutenant Wheeler in Ricciuti, exactly like the fabricated information at issue here, is nothing more or less than a false account of something the officer claimed to have seen or heard the defendant say, which he forwarded to prosecutors and to which he would be expected to testify at trial. That the officer here fabricated testimony about what he heard in a bodega, rather than what he heard in a police station during an interview, cannot conceivably make a difference. Having considered the City's policy arguments, we find that the standard outlined in Ricciuti places appropriate limitations on the availability of a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial based on fabrication of information by a police officer which serve to address the City's fears. As the jury was properly instructed here, the standard in Ricciuti restricts fair trial claims based on fabrication of information to those cases in which an (1) investigating official (2) fabricates information (3) that is likely to influence a jury's verdict, (4) forwards that information to prosecutors, and (5) the plaintiff suffers a deprivation of life, liberty, or property as a result. . . . In order to succeed on a claim for a denial of the right to a fair trial against a police officer based on an allegation that the officer falsified information, an arrestee must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the officer created false information, the officer forwarded the false information to prosecutors, and the false information was likely to influence a jury's decision. . . . These requirements all provide necessary limits on the reach of a denial of a fair trial claim based on false information. In particular, the requirements that the information be both false and likely to influence a jury's decision constrain the types of information that can serve as the basis for a denial of the right to a fair trial claim. Ricciuti has been the law for nearly twenty years, without the dire results that the City predicts from the perfectly routine application of its principles to the facts here. Experience thus suggests that the limiting principles of Ricciuti have proven effective to date in restricting claims for a denial of the right to a fair trial against police officers on the basis of false information. The court thus embraces the limiting principles inherent in the Ricciuti standard while affirming that Ricciuti's holding applies to falsified information contained in an officer's account of his or her observations of alleged criminal activity which he or she conveys to prosecutors.") Vill. of Freeport v. Barrella, 814 F.3d 594, 609 & n.57 (2d Cir. 2016) (“[W]e reject Hardwick’s qualified-immunity argument, which contends—rather incredibly—that it was ‘objectively reasonable’ for him to believe in 2010 that federal law did not forbid discrimination based on Hispanic ethnicity. . . . This case presents many knotty legal and factual issues. For purposes of qualified immunity, however, the question is simple. The jury found that Hardwick appointed Bermudez rather than Barrella because the former was ‘a White person of Hispanic origin’ and the latter was ‘a White person of Italian origin.’ . . . Would a reasonable official in Hardwick’s position have known that such intentional discrimination against non-Hispanic whites violated Barrella’s rights under federal antidiscrimination law?⁵⁷ [fn 57 Importantly, Hardwick does not argue that the law was not clearly established with respect to when intentional racial discrimination might be permissible. For instance, he does not claim that he gave preference to a Hispanic as part of an arguably lawful affirmative-action program, or that he was attempting to appeal to Hispanic voters. . . . Accordingly, we consider qualified immunity with respect to ‘unjustified’ racial discrimination only.] The answer is plainly yes. As Hardwick acknowledges, a right is clearly established if ‘the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has recognized the right.’ . Under that standard, it has been clear since the Reagan Administration that § 1981 bars employers from discriminating based on Hispanic ethnicity or lack thereof. . . . Indeed, defendants manage to obscure the clarity of established law only by failing to cite Albert v. Carovano in any of the four briefs they collectively submitted, despite the District Court’s citation of that case in its opinions below. . . . The most charitable reading of Hardwick’s assertion of qualified immunity is that the law was unsettled with respect to Title VII. But Title VII is irrelevant to Hardwick’s personal liability, which stems solely from § 1981. . . . And in any event, it has long been obvious under Title VII that employers may not discriminate based on Hispanic ethnicity, even if it has not hitherto been clearly established that such discrimination would constitute discrimination on the basis of race. . . . In short, we conclude that the District Court correctly denied defendants’ pre-and post-verdict motions for judgment as a matter of law pursuant to Rule 50.”)

Mangino v. Inc. Vill. of Patchogue, 808 F.3d 951, 953, 956-59 & n.10 (2d Cir. 2015) (“The principal question presented is whether, in August 2005, there was a clearly established right to be free from abuse of process under New York law even where probable cause existed. We conclude that there was not. . . . ‘The existence of probable cause will defeat ... a First Amendment claim that is premised on the allegation that defendants prosecuted a plaintiff out of a retaliatory motive, in an attempt to silence [him].’ Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 215 (2d Cir.2012); see also Hartman v. Moore Here, as the District Court correctly found, . . . probable cause existed with respect to each of the criminal summonses issued to Mangino. . . . We turn next to Mangino’s argument that the District Court erred in dismissing his abuse-of-process claim, which dismissal we also review de novo. . . . The basis for this dismissal was the District Court’s determination that Nudo was entitled to qualified immunity because, under New York law, ‘although there was a clearly established right to be free from malicious abuse of process at the time of the alleged conduct’—that is, in August 2005—‘it was not clearly established that such a claim [could] exist even when probable cause existed for the issuance of the [summonses].’ . . . We agree. There has been considerable confusion within our Circuit regarding whether probable cause is a complete defense to a claim of abuse of process under New York law. . . . We need not, and do not, resolve this confusion here, as its very existence establishes that Nudo is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . This appeal ‘presents the legal possibility that law, which may have once been clear [for purposes of qualified immunity], can become unclear later.’ . . . Which is to say, it may be the case that, under this Circuit’s interpretation of New York law, the existence of a right to be free from abuse of process even where probable cause existed was incontrovertible in 1963, when Weiss was decided, but had been called into question by 1988, when PSI Metals was decided, or 2005, when the alleged conduct occurred. No matter-‘[t]he nature of the law is not always to move from unsettled to settled. Although one of our decisions may not be expressly overruled, later cases ... may bring its reasoning or holding into such doubt that the elements set out in the case are no longer clearly established....”).

Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538, 547, 550 (2d Cir. 2015) (“Notwithstanding the legally permissible one-sided nature of grand jury proceedings, everyone possesses the additional and distinct ‘right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity.’. . . This right was violated, Morse contends, when the defendants knowingly created false or misleading billing summaries that were determined to be material to the grand jury’s decision to indict. We conclude that the omissions in this case were properly considered under the rubric of Zahrey, under which government officials may be held liable for fabricating evidence through false statements or omissions that are both material and made knowingly. . . . Having concluded that the defendants’ falsifications constituted a violation of Morse’s constitutional rights, we must next determine whether the falsifications violated clearly established law that sufficiently warned the defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional. We conclude that they did. . . . We conclude that the right in question was clearly established such that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Although there is no prior decision of ours precisely equating the fraudulent omission of factual information from a document with the affirmative perpetration of a falsehood, Ricciuti and its progeny, including Zahrey, clearly establish that ‘qualified immunity is unavailable on a claim for denial of the right to a fair trial where that claim is premised on proof that a defendant knowingly fabricated evidence and where a reasonable jury could so find.’. . . As discussed in detail above, because there is no plausible legal distinction between misstatements and omissions that we can perceive in this context, we conclude that it was not ‘objectively legally reasonable’ for the defendants in this case to believe that it was permissible for them to knowingly make material omissions in the creation of the billing summaries, thereby knowingly altering evidence during a criminal investigation.”)

Edwards v. Arnone, 613 F.3d 44, 46 (2d Cir. 2015) (“The district court in this case described the right at issue as one ‘to recreate free from restraints’ and held that, as a matter of law, such a right was not clearly established. . . . We disagree, however, and conclude that the district court erred in finding that no clearly established right was implicated because the court defined the scope of the relevant right too narrowly. . . . Taken together, our earlier decisions have clearly established a right for inmates to have some meaningful opportunity for exercise, unless the prison has a legitimate safety justification and has adequately considered feasible alternatives. As such, the district court erred by defining the scope of the right at issue too narrowly and by concluding that no right implicated in this case is clearly established. . . . The defendants nevertheless press that, even if the district court did not consider the adequacy of the safety justification, we should affirm because, at the time of the defendants’ actions, ‘there was no decisional law requiring that inmates in [Phase I of Administrative Segregation] exercise without handcuffs and leg restraints.’. . . But ‘the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.’. . . Under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable juror may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that fully restraining inmates during out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to the defendants without first considering whether disputed issues of fact precluded summary judgment with respect to the adequacy of the defendants’ proffered safety justification for the exercise-restraint policy imposed on Edwards. We therefore vacate the judgment and remand for the district court to consider in the first instance the adequacy of the safety justification for the imposition of this policy on Edwards.”)

Gardner v. Murphy, 613 F. App'x 40, 42, 43 (2d Cir. 2015) (“Here, the defendants argue that all reasonable jurors would agree that the prison officials acted reasonably in permitting Gardner to exercise only while handcuffed behind his back. We disagree. Of particular relevance on this interlocutory appeal are the district court’s conclusions that questions of fact remained as to whether the plaintiff had some meaningful opportunity to engage in exercise and whether the defendants had an adequate safety justification for their imposing restraints on Gardner’s exercise. Because we lack jurisdiction to resolve the adequacy of the plaintiff’s opportunity for exercise or the defendants’ safety justification, . . .the question we must confront on this appeal narrows considerably: We must decide solely whether reasonable jurors could disagree about whether it would have been objectively reasonable for the defendants to believe that they would not violate Gardner’s clearly established constitutional rights by requiring him to be handcuffed behind his back during exercise, absent an adequate safety justification for the restraints. The defendants argue that reasonable officials could debate the legality of the conduct now at issue because neither the Supreme Court nor this Court ‘has held that requiring an inmate to recreate in restraints for security reasons is unconstitutional.’. . We are unpersuaded for several reasons. First, the defendants’ argument assumes that there is in fact a valid safety rationale, which we must assume is not true for purposes of this appeal. Second, the defendants’ position defines the scope of the right too narrowly. We have recognized that a restriction on the meaningful opportunity to exercise must be based on a valid security exception. . . Here, it is undisputed that while in Phase I of the Administrative Segregation Program, Gardner was permitted to attend outdoor recreation only while handcuffed behind his back. Such a restriction may be found to infringe an inmate’s right to a meaningful opportunity to exercise, and, if so, must be justified by a valid security concern. Accordingly, if it finds unpersuasive a proffered safety justification, a reasonable jury could readily conclude that a corrections official acted unreasonably by permitting an inmate to exercise only in restraints. . . . [A]s we have noted previously, ‘the absence of legal precedent addressing an identical factual scenario does not necessarily yield a conclusion that the law is not clearly established.’. . Accordingly, we hold that under existing clearly established case law, a reasonable jury may conclude that reasonable officers would agree that handcuffing inmates behind their backs during their out-of-cell exercise without an adequate safety justification is unconstitutional. We therefore cannot conclude on this interlocutory appeal that the district court erred in denying summary judgment to the defendants.”)

Golodner v. Berliner, 770 F.3d 196, 205-07 (2d Cir. 2014) (“Few issues related to qualified immunity have caused more ink to be spilled than whether a particular right has been clearly established, mainly because courts must calibrate, on a case-by-case basis, how generally or specifically to define the right at issue. . . In a sense, we must apply the Goldilocks principle. If the right is defined too narrowly based on the exact factual scenario presented, government actors will invariably receive qualified immunity. If, on the other hand, the right is defined too broadly, the entire second prong of qualified immunity analysis will be subsumed by the first and immunity will be available rarely, if ever. . . Since neither result maintains the delicate balance ‘between the interests in vindication of citizens’ constitutional rights and in public officials’ effective performance of their duties’ that lies at the heart of qualified immunity, Davis v. Scherer, 468 U.S. 183, 195 (1984), we must chart a middle course. Our definition must be ‘particularized’ in the sense that ‘[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.’ . . . Once we identify the right at issue we look to whether the Supreme Court or this Court had articulated that right with adequate specificity at the time of the retaliatory actions. . . . Here, the determinative question is whether Berliner and Myers could reasonably have believed—based on the law as it existed in the second half of 2009—that the First Amendment did not prevent them from discontinuing the City’s existing relationship with an independent contractor on account of a lawsuit the contractor filed against the City alleging an unconstitutional dual-arrest policy and police misconduct. . . . As an initial matter, ‘the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern’ is beyond debate. . . . Next, as discussed at length above, the speech at issue has nothing to do with personal employee grievances related to Golodner’s conditions of employment and extends well into the realm of public concern. This conclusion is firmly supported by the relevant jurisprudence in place in 2009. . . . Next, although the right at issue is most often raised in the context of a government official firing an employee in retaliation for his or her speech, any attempt to distinguish the case on appeal from those cases based on Golodner’s status as a contractor is vitiated by the Supreme Court’s 1996 decision in Board of County Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996). . . . Finally, it was clearly established that a complaint may constitute a form of speech for First Amendment purposes. . . . Based on the relevant case law at the time of the individual defendants’ alleged retaliatory actions, we have no trouble concluding that the constitutional right implicated here was clearly established.”)

Harris v. O’Hare, 770 F.3d 224, 241 (2d Cir. 2014) (“Because the police officers lacked a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances to invade Plaintiffs’ curtilage, and because Defendants cannot offer any other basis on which the officers’ intrusion would be lawful, we conclude that Defendants violated Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights. We also hold that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for this violation because, under the undisputed facts, it would not have been objectively reasonable for them to have believed that their conduct was lawful.”) Raspardo v. Carlone, 770 F.3d 97, 114-15 (2d Cir. 2014) (“Although we have long recognized that Title VII-based hostile work environment claims by government employees are actionable under § 1983, . . . we have not specified in our prior decisions the role of individual responsibility required for a defendant in a § 1983 case involving claims of sex-based harassment by multiple defendants, nor have we charted supervisory liability in this context. This case demonstrates how hostile work environment claims that may readily be brought against employers under Title VII do not always fit easily within the context of individual liability under § 1983. The Title VII framework often requires courts to consider the workplace conduct of multiple employees and supervisors in determining whether the plaintiff has experienced a hostile work environment. . . . Section 1983, however, applies by its terms only to individual ‘persons’ responsible for violating plaintiffs’ rights. . . . In order to overcome a government official’s claim to qualified immunity and ‘establish individual liability under § 1983, a plaintiff must show ... that the defendant caused the plaintiff to be deprived of a federal right.’. . . If a defendant has not personally violated a plaintiff’s constitutional rights, the plaintiff cannot succeed on a § 1983 action against the defendant. Our few prior decisions addressing multi-defendant § 1983 hostile work environment cases have denied qualified immunity to defendants whose conduct, considered alone, was sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the plaintiff’s employment. . . . Thus, our prior cases have established only that when a plaintiff alleges that multiple individual defendants have engaged in uncoordinated and unplanned acts of harassment, each defendant is only liable under § 1983 when his own actions are independently sufficient to create a hostile work environment. We therefore cannot say that it is clearly established law that an individual defendant has violated a plaintiff’s equal protection rights if he has not personally behaved in such a way as to create an atmosphere of severe or pervasive harassment. Accordingly, absent such behavior, an individual defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Terebesi v. Torres, 764 F.3d 217, 232, 233 (2d Cir. 2014) (“At least two circuits and one decision from the District of Connecticut have suggested that the decision to employ a tactical team may violate the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition on excessive force. [citing cases] The district court referred to these decisions in denying summary judgment on this issue. . . . In November 2012—after the district court’s decision in this case, but before the appeal was briefed—a panel of this Court determined that ‘there was no “clearly established” right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a police SWAT team.’ Fortunati v. Vermont, 503 F. App’x 78, 81 (2d Cir.2012) (non-precedential summary order). . . . We agree that there is no clearly established right in this Circuit to be free from the deployment of a tactical team in general. . . . It is difficult to ask that a police officer identify clearly established law that three judges of this Court could not find. We therefore reverse the decision of the district court insofar as it denied qualified immunity to Chief Solomon for his decision to call out a tactical team in connection with the search of Terebesi’s home.”)

Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 160-62 & n.6 (2d Cir. 2013) (“The officers do not dispute that the search violated Gonzalez’s right to be free from unreasonable searches; their position is that the right violated was not clearly established. We need not determine whether the facts alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right prior to determining whether that right was clearly established. . . . This is especially true here, where the issue was not fully briefed by the government. . . . Defendants–Appellees are not liable under § 1983 unless the right at issue was clearly established, meaning that ‘[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’. . . At the time of the search, we had never held that the Fourth Amendment is violated by a suspicionless search (strip search or visual body cavity search) of a person arrested for felony drug possession. Although we have repeatedly held that the police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search of a person arrested for a misdemeanor, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether that rule applied to those arrested for felony drug crimes, given the propensity of drug dealers to conceal contraband in their body cavities. . . Judge McMahon (who seems to have had a full share of these cases) has repeatedly emphasized that we have never applied the rule from Weber and Shain to searches of suspects arrested for felony drug crimes. . . The New York Court of Appeals' decision in People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303 (2008), does not support the view that the search of Gonzalez violated a clearly established federal constitutional rule. Hall was decided after the search at issue in this case. It is not a ruling of the Supreme Court or this Court. . . While we can expect police officers to be familiar with black-letter law applicable to commonly encountered situations, they cannot be subjected to personal liability under § 1983 based on anything less. There are so many permutations of fact that bear upon the constitutional issues of a search: the arrest can be for a misdemeanor or a felony, for a drug offense or not; the search can be a strip search, a visual body cavity search, or a manual one; the person arrested can be headed to the general prison population or a single cell; the place of the search can be private or less than private; the impetus for the search can be a tip, or the policeman's observations or experience or hunch, or the neighborhood, or a description, or some or all of the above; and other considerations as well. The policeman is not expected to know all of our precedents or those of the Supreme Court, or to distinguish holding from dicta, or to put together precedents for line-drawing, or to discern trends or follow doctrinal trajectories. Otherwise, qualified immunity would be available only to a cop who is a professor of criminal procedure in her spare time. The police cannot be expected to know such things at risk of personal liability for the policeman's savings, home equity, and college funds. And such personal liability is the only kind of liability imposed by § 1983 (absent a Monell claim). That tells us something about the threshold of liability in these cases. . . The premise—that a suit against an individual government employee is in substance a suit against his employer—is wrong. Doubtless in some political subdivisions of this Circuit the government supplies defense counsel and pays the judgment if an officer is personally liable under § 1983. But this Circuit includes scores of counties and hundreds of towns and municipalities; and there are thousands of political subdivisions in the nation. Not all of them will indemnify their employees for § 1983 judgments; many cannot even afford to furnish a defense; some can barely keep the school open. . . We conclude that a reasonable officer—even one familiar with the cases described above—would not have understood that conducting an otherwise suspicionless visual body cavity search of a person arrested for a felony drug offense was unlawful; the defendants in this case are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”) Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 164-71 (2d Cir. 2013) (Pooler, J., dissenting) (“Here, the relevant question is whether the heightened standard for an anal body cavity search of a felony arrestee was clearly foreshadowed by this Circuit or the Supreme Court, at the time of Gonzalez’s search in 2006. . . .Regardless of whether the Supreme Court or this Circuit directly held this rule, it was undoubtedly foreshadowed previous to Gonzalez’s arrest, thus, I must disagree with the majority’s conclusion in Part III. . . .Despite Supreme Court precedent and over two decades of this Circuit’s case law rejecting cavity searches, the district court stated and Appellees still contend that the rule was not clearly established until Hall, 10 N.Y.3d at 310–11. .

. Regardless of Hall, the rule established therein was already clearly suggested by the Supreme Court and presaged by this Circuit. As the majority states, ‘we have repeatedly held that police may not conduct a suspicionless strip or body cavity search.’ Even if no federal case prior to Hall stated the rule as explicitly applying to felony arrestees, the waterfall of decisions from Schmerber to Weber to Shain to Murcia made Hall’s and Sarnicola’s ultimate results a fait accompli—as reflections of this Circuit’s developing case law. In addition, even Appellees are in accord with the district court and the New York Court of Appeals, recognizing that the rule on searches was ‘evolving’ in this direction. . . We have held that such foreshadowing requires the rule to be deemed clearly established. . . Accordingly, where the Supreme Court and this Court clearly foreshadowed a ruling on the issue, and other courts have also acknowledged this outcome, we should conclude that the rule was clearly established. . . . Moreover, even accepting that the strip search of the defendant was in accordance with police procedure, that, too, does not excuse police who should have known that to perform a strip search of the defendant absent reasonable suspicion was unjustified. . . . Accordingly, where the unlawfulness was ‘apparent,’ . . . and the searching officers’ suspicion was based on ‘vague’ information, an objectively reasonable person in the officer’s position should have known that this conduct was unreasonable and qualified immunity should therefore not apply.”)

Spavone v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 719 F.3d 127, 138 (2d Cir. 2013) (“Simply put, the record reveals no basis on which to conclude that Fischer and Joy could not reasonably have believed, as Joy has affirmed, that the mental health needs of DOCS inmates were being met ‘in the correctional facility setting through the comprehensive services provided by OMH.’ This conclusion means that a reasonable public official in the position of Fischer or Joy could reasonably have believed there was a rational basis for distinguishing between leaves of absence for the treatment of mental illness as opposed to other sorts of illness. And this conclusion, in turn, entitles Fischer and Joy to qualified immunity.”)

Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157, 166-70 (2d Cir. 2013) (“[W]e conclude that Earley I itself, in June 2006, clearly established that the administrative imposition of PRS terms not imposed by the court is unconstitutional. We conclude further, that as to Annucci—the only defendant discussed in plaintiffs’ briefs on appeal—the dismissals as a matter of law on the basis of qualified immunity on the present record were inappropriate. . . . Earley I dealt with the AEDPA principle that a federal court may not grant habeas unless the state court’s adjudication of the claim was ‘contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States,’ 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1). It was in that context that Earley I ruled that the federal-law principle that punishment for a crime could not properly be imposed administratively but could only be imposed by the court had been clearly established by the United States Supreme Court in Wampler . . . That AEDPA question is not the same as whether a federal right is clearly established for purposes of denying an official qualified immunity: The conclusion that a ‘legal proposition was “clearly established” for purposes of its application by professional state court judges does not require a conclusion that it was “clearly established” in the qualified immunity context, which governs the conduct of government officials who are likely neither lawyers nor legal scholars.’ . . We thus ruled in Scott that Earley I’s holding did not mean that the Wampler principle that there was a right not to be subjected to administratively imposed PRS was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. . . .Earley I itself, however, in dealing with the precise conduct at issue in the present cases—the administrative imposition of PRS on a prisoner who has not had that condition imposed on him by the sentencing court—applied Wampler and plainly held such an imposition of PRS to be unconstitutional. . . . We conclude that Earley I itself clearly established that where the court has not included PRS in a defendant’s sentence, DOCS may not add that term without violating federal law. . . . State court decisions that rejected Earley I’s holding could not disestablish the federal right to due process for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis. . . . Because Earley I’s explicit ruling that ‘New York’s Department of Correctional Services has no ... power to alter a sentence’ clearly established the contour of the right plaintiffs seek to vindicate, our inquiry ends there.”) [See also Reyes v. Fisher, 934 F.3d 97 (2d Cir. 2019); Hassell v. Fischer, 879 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2018)]

Bailey v. Pataki, 708 F.3d 391, 404-07 (2d Cir. 2013) (“We have already determined that there is sufficient evidence in the record to support, as a matter of law, the plaintiffs’ procedural due process claims. We therefore turn to the question of whether the right at issue was clearly established. In answering that question, we look to whether (1) the right was defined with reasonable clarity, (2) the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit has confirmed the existence of the right, and (3) a reasonable defendant would have understood from the existing law that his conduct was unlawful. . . . We have further held that where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own Court foreshadowed the right, the law was sufficiently ‘well established’ that its violation stripped the defendant of his immunity. . . . We ultimately agree with the district court that ‘the basic proposition that due process requires a predeprivation hearing unless there is an immediate danger to society’ was well established prior to 2005. . . . Despite the litany of cases cited by the defendants to suggest that due process tolerates civil commitment of inmates without either notice or a hearing, each of those cases involved critical factors not present here. In none of the cases was a civil commitment effected without notice or a predeprivation hearing where the inmate was safely confined, and, indeed, where the standard the inmate met was not one of immediate and acute dangerousness but rather potential recidivism five, ten, or fifteen years after his release. . . . The defendants offer no Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent for the proposition that due process is satisfied if an individual in the plaintiffs’ position has the opportunity to request a hearing after he has been labeled an SVP and civilly committed. Except for emergent or otherwise unusual circumstances, such as where an emergency makes it necessary for the State to act immediately to avoid imminent harm to the person being restrained or to the public, or where predeprivation process is highly impracticable, the Supreme Court has long held that ‘the Constitution requires some kind of a hearing before the State deprives a person of liberty.’”))

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 710 (2d Cir. 2012) (“We do not doubt that Looney’s interest in his continued full-time employment was important, or that he has felt the negative effects of being deprived of his pension and health care benefits. Unfortunately, however, Looney’s interest in these items does not suffice to guarantee them constitutional protection as property rights to which he has any procedural entitlement. . . . We therefore conclude that Looney has not adequately alleged a constitutionally protected property interest in his full-time employment. Accordingly, the District Court erred in determining that Black was not entitled to qualified immunity as to Looney's procedural due process claim.”)

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) (“It is true that Looney alleges that his supervisor, in admonishing him for this alleged speech, requested that he refrain from discussing matters ‘outside [Looney’s] job duties.’ . . . It is also alleged that his speech regarded an ‘outside agency enforcing a cease and desist order against Town residents.’ . . . But ‘[f]ormal job descriptions often bear little resemblance to the duties an employee actually is expected to perform, and the listing of a given task in an employee’s written job description is neither necessary nor sufficient to demonstrate that conducting the task is within the scope of the employee’s professional duties for First Amendment purposes.’ Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 424–25. Similarly, whether ‘speech was unprotected does not rest on the fact that [the] speech was made in the workplace as opposed to elsewhere.’ . . . The face of Looney’s complaint alleges nothing more than a vague set of circumstances regarding speech which necessarily ‘owed its existence’ to Looney’s role as Building Official. . . . Because the speech at issue is alleged to have been made in the course of Looney’s official duties, he has not adequately alleged that such speech is entitled to First Amendment protection.”)

Looney v. Black, 702 F.3d 701, 713 (2d Cir. 2012) (Droney, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent from the majority’s resolution of both the due process and First Amendment claims. I cannot conclude that the allegations in Looney’s complaint call for qualified immunity and warrant dismissal at this juncture. As to Looney’s procedural due process claim, the allegations of the representations and conduct by defendant First Selectman Black and the other Town officials, and the importance of the salary and benefits to Looney, are sufficient to show that he had a property right to full-time employment protected by procedural due process during his four-year statutory term as a Building Official. As to Looney’s First Amendment retaliation claim, the allegations in the complaint sufficiently demonstrate that Looney’s speech was made as a private citizen and on a matter of public concern. Although discovery may uncover facts to the contrary, it would be premature to conclude otherwise on a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity.”) Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 213, 214 (2d Cir. 2012) (“The due process right asserted by Fabrikant—her right not to have her dogs sterilized by the SPCA, at least without some form of process, prior to being sent to foster homes while she was awaiting trial in state court on animal abuse charges—is not a right that was ‘clearly established’ at the time of defendants’ challenged actions in 2002. Nor has the right achieved that status today. It was not then, and is not now, ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood’ that spaying or neutering Fabrikant’s dogs following their seizure from her home violates a clearly established due process right. . . . Fabrikant cites no binding precedent that comes close to establishing that the asserted due process right was clearly established in 2002. . . In fact, she appears to concede that no such binding authority exists; instead, she argues that we should extend existing precedent to prohibit defendants' behavior and to find that the due process right that she has asserted on this appeal was clearly established in 2002. That argument, however, is foreclosed by Reichle and other recent Supreme Court jurisprudence, which recognizes that although '[w]e do not require a case directly on point, ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011). Here, as in Reichle and al-Kidd, the question 'falls far short of that threshold.'").

McGarry v. Pallito, 687 F.3d 505, 511-14 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Because the Thirteenth Amendment 'denounces a status or condition, irrespective of the manner or authority by which it is created,' Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207, 216 (1905), institutions housing pretrial detainees are not exempt from the Amendment's scope. . . . McGarry's allegations state a claim under the Thirteenth Amendment. He alleges that his work in the prison laundry was compelled and maintained by the use and threatened use of physical and legal coercion. He supports his allegations with well-pleaded facts that the defendants threatened to send him to 'the hole' if he refused to work and that he would thereby be subjected to 23 hour-per-day administrative confinement and shackles. These allegations plausibly allege 'threat of physical restraint or physical injury' within the meaning of Kozminski. . . . Likewise, McGarry also plausibly alleges facts supporting his assertion that defendants coerced him through legal process by threatening him with DRs, which are alleged to be taken into consideration when making recommendations for a release date and, therefore, lengthen any period of incarceration. . . . [I]t is clearly established that a state may not 'rehabilitate' pretrial detainees. The Supreme Court has unambiguously and repeatedly held that a state's authority over pretrial detainees is limited by the Constitution in ways that the treatment of convicted persons is not. . . . This Court also has held that, while the State has legitimate interests in the health, safety, and sanitation of the correctional facility and its inhabitants, where pretrial detainees are concerned, those interests do not include rehabilitation. . . . In light of this authority, it was clearly established that prison officials may not rehabilitate pretrial detainees, and it was not 'objectively reasonable' for defendants to conclude otherwise. . . . We are prepared to continue to assume that correctional institutions may require inmates to perform personally related housekeeping chores such as, for example, cleaning the areas in or around their cells, without violating the Thirteenth Amendment. However, on a motion to dismiss, 'it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized for objective legal reasonableness.' . . . As such, we look to the complaint to determine if, at the pleading stage, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. It is clearly established that requiring hard labor of pretrial detainees—persons not 'duly convicted'—violates the Thirteenth Amendment. See U.S. Const. amend. XIII, § 1. Reviewing the allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to McGarry, we conclude that a pretrial detainee's compelled work in a laundry for up to 14 hours a day for three days a week doing other inmates' laundry cannot reasonably be construed as personally related housekeeping chores and that officers of reasonable competence could not disagree on these points. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that, at this stage of the proceeding, defendants have not demonstrated that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Southerland v. City of New York, 680 F.3d 127, 160 (2d Cir. 2012), reh’g en banc denied, 681 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2012) (“The fact that Tenenbaum changed the legal ‘rubric’ applicable to the Southerland Children’s constitutional claim—from substantive due process to illegal seizure—however, is not alone determinative of whether the constitutional rights implicated in the Children’s seizure were clearly established prior to the time of the seizure. It would be inappropriate, we think, to afford Woo qualified immunity on the Southerland Children’s claim solely because, two years after the events in question, we shifted the constitutional label for evaluating that claim from the Fourteenth to the Fourth Amendment. . . What matters is whether an objectively reasonable caseworker in Woo’s position would have known that removing a child from his or her home without parental consent, circumstances warranting the removal, or court order would violate a constitutional right—not whether the caseworker would have known which constitutional provisions would be violated if the caseworker proceeded to act in a particular way. . . . Although the standard for determining whether the circumstances justify seizure of a child without judicial authorization or parental consent under the Fourth Amendment was not established by 1997 and, as we have pointed out, remains unsettled to this day, the Children’s right not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances was firmly established, albeit under a procedural due process framework. . . Regardless of whether probable cause or exigent circumstances must be established to justify a warrantless seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes, the existence of emergency circumstances sufficient to justify removal of the Southerland Children in a manner comporting with their due process rights would also certainly suffice to justify their removal in a manner comporting with their Fourth Amendment rights barring unreasonable seizure. To that extent, at the time of the events in this case, the Southerland Children’s Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure were clearly established. In light of this determination, the next question the Court must address is whether ‘it was objectively reasonable for [Woo] to believe [that his] acts did not violate th[e Childrens’ clearly established] right [],’ Holcomb, 337 F.3d at 220, not to be taken from the care of their parent without court order, parental consent, or emergency circumstances. Once again, for the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, the legal origin of the right is not determinative. If Woo has established that he was objectively reasonable in believing that he did not violate the Children’s right to be free from unwarranted seizure without exigent circumstances, court order, or parental consent, then he is protected against their Fourth Amendment seizure claim, no matter the standard used to determine liability on this claim on the merits. For the same reasons as in our procedural due process analysis—that we cannot conclude as a matter of law on the current record that it would have been objectively reasonable for Woo to believe that his actions did not violate the Children’s constitutional right not to be removed from their home barring exigent circumstances—we cannot conclude as a matter of law that Woo must prevail on the ‘objectively reasonable’ inquiry as to the violation of the children’s Fourth Amendment illegal seizure claims. . . Thus, qualified immunity is unavailable to Woo at this stage on the current record.”)

Nagle v. Marron, 663 F.3d 100, 115, 116 (2d Cir. 2011) (“In the present case, Appellees do not argue that Nagle did not have a clearly established right not to suffer adverse employment actions in retaliation for her protected speech. Rather, they argue that it is not clearly established that speech protected at one time ‘remains protected when discovered years later’ in a ‘geographically remote community.’ Appellees cite no cases suggesting that First Amendment protection wanes over time. More importantly, they point to no basis on which a reasonable official might conclude that it would so wane, thereby permitting the official to retaliate for the speech. As we have previously observed, there are material questions of fact in this case as to whether the complained-of tenure decision was made in retaliation for Nagle’s speech. But assuming, as we must, that this causation question is decided against Appellees at trial, no reasonable official could think that such speech-retaliatory conduct was constitutionally permissible based simply on the passage of time. Insofar as Appellees mean to rest on the cases cited by the district court in its discussion of this issue, we note that none of those cases held, or even supported the conclusion, that First Amendment protection deteriorates over time and space. On the contrary, every case the district court cited held or assumed that earlier expressive acts could give rise to a claim of retaliation. . . . It is true that no case in our Circuit has specifically held that First Amendment protection does not grow weaker over time and space. But as the Supreme Court has explained, ‘the very action in question’ need not have been the subject of a holding in order for a right to be clearly established. . . . Fried and Castar knew or should have known that retaliation for protected speech would violate an employee’s First Amendment rights, and they had no reason to think that speech protected in Virginia in 2004 would not be protected in New York in 2007. We therefore hold that, based on the record on appeal, neither Fried nor Castar are subject to qualified immunity from Nagle’s suit.” footnotes omitted)

Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 241-43 (2d Cir. 2011) (on prong one of qualified immunity, holding officer’s claim that he was retaliated against for his refusal to obey supervisors’ instructions to retract truthful report relating to another officer’s use of excessive force and file a false report was not controlled by Garcetti and was within the scope of First Amendment protection; on prong two, leaving qualified immunity question for resolution by district court after issues of fact resolved by jury, but noting that “[a]ny uncertainty [in circuit’s prior clearly established law] introduced by Garcetti and Weintraub, which were not decided until after defendants’ retaliation against [plaintiff] . . . would not entitle defendants to qualified immunity because the availability of that defense depends on whether the unlawfulness of their conduct was apparent in light of ‘pre-existing law.’”)

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 107 (2d Cir. 2010) (“In the presence of a statute that requires all sentences for certain crimes to be accompanied by mandatory PRS [Post Release Supervision], and New York cases that routinely upheld the administrative imposition of that PRS, we conclude that it was not clearly established for qualified immunity purposes prior to Earley that the administrative imposition of PRS violates the Due Process Clause.”)

Manganiello v. City of New York, 612 F.3d 149, 165 (2d Cir. 2010) (“In the present case, given the jury’s findings that Agostini misrepresented the evidence to the prosecutors, or failed to pass on material information, or made statements that were false, and engaged in such misconduct knowingly, and given the ample evidentiary support for those findings, the district court correctly concluded that no reasonable officer could have believed Agostini’s actions to be lawful. Agostini’s motion for judgment as a matter of law based on qualified immunity was properly denied.”)

Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 434, 435, 437 (2d Cir. 2009) (“The issue in this case is whether defendants were on notice that their affirmative interactions with an individual accused of domestic violence, their failure to arrest the accused individual, and their disregard of established procedures for responding to domestic violence incidents, which were reasonably likely to encourage the accused individual to believe that he would not be arrested, punished, or otherwise interfered with while engaging in domestic violence, would contribute to the vulnerability of the complainant by emboldening her abuser, thereby giving rise to a substantive due process violation. . . . We . . . find that the state-created danger theory, at the time of defendants’ actions here, clearly established that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply. Together, Dwares and Hemphill stand for the proposition that police officers may not engage in conduct that encourages or condones a private actor’s infliction of intentional violence In sum, the rule drawn from Dwares, although its application was not clearly established under the circumstances in Pena, applied with ‘obvious clarity’ to Okin’s case. . . . We conclude that the state of the law in 2001 to 2003 gave defendants fair warning that police conduct that encourages a private citizen to engage in domestic violence, by fostering the belief that his intentionally violent behavior will not be confronted by arrest, punishment, or police interference, gives rise to a substantive due process violation, and that defendants, if found liable, would not be entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hartline v. Gallo, 546 F.3d 95, 102 & n.5, 103 (2d Cir. 2008) (“Ultimately, if the facts of this case amount to reasonable suspicion, then strip searches will become commonplace. Given the uniquely intrusive nature of strip searches, as well as the multitude of less invasive investigative techniques available to officers confronted by misdemeanor offenders, that result would be unacceptable in any society that takes privacy and bodily integrity seriously. . . . We note that this case presents a markedly different set of circumstances than those addressed by the standard of the ‘special needs’ of penal or other institutions to conduct strip searches by reason of the presence of a larger, or dangerous, or vulnerable population, where introduction of secreted contraband from the outside raises a substantial risk of harm. See N.G. v. Connecticut, 382 F.3d 225, 234-37 (2d Cir.2004); Covino v. Patrissi, 967 F.2d 73, 76-80 (2d Cir.1992). No such special needs exist where, as here, an arrestee is taken to an empty cell for purposes of an evidentiary search, subsequent booking, and release. . . . Defendants do not dispute that for more than twenty years this Court has held that a misdemeanor arrestee may not be strip searched in the absence of individualized reasonable suspicion that she is secreting contraband. . . . It is true that this Court has never decided a case with facts just like those now before us. However, we have also never decided a case suggesting that a strip search on these facts would be constitutionally permissible. Thus, we are comfortable concluding that in the absence of indicia that this Court has found to support individualized reasonable suspicion in the past, a reasonable jury might determine that Defendants were acting in a fashion that clearly violated Hartline's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Higazy v. Templeton, 505 F.3d 161, 174 (2d Cir. 2007) ("The objective prong of the qualified immunity test asks whether an officer in Templeton's shoes would have known that he was violating the right in question. We believe that a reasonable jury could conclude that he would. For the purposes of our inquiry here, we conclude that when the facts are cast in the light most favorable to Higazy, an officer in Templeton's shoes would have understood that the confession he allegedly coerced from Higazy would have been used in a criminal case against Higazy and that his actions therefore violated Higazy's constitutional right to be free from compelled self-incrimination.")

Russo v. City of Bridgeport, 479 F.3d 196, 208, 209, 211, 212 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Today, we hold that the right mentioned in Baker and enunciated in the above cited cases protected Russo from a sustained detention stemming directly from the law enforcement officials' refusal to investigate available exculpatory evidence. The Bridgeport police officers retained sole custody of the videotape evidence—and stored it in an improper manner—for a full 68 days after Russo alerted them that examining the pictures of the perpetrator for tattoos could exonerate Russo. They did this after intentionally misstating that the robber had tattoos. Moreover, their failure to perform the simple task of checking the tape resulted in all of Russo's 217-day incarceration. We must clarify the source of this right, however. Although Justice Blackmun in Baker—and several circuits including our own in Satchell—have suggested that the right was rooted in substantive due process, we now conclude, in light of more recent guidance from the Supreme Court, that the right should instead be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. . . . We therefore treat Russo's claim as being based on the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. And, doing so, we conclude, in light of (1) the length of time of Russo's wrongful incarceration, (2) the ease with which the evidence exculpating Russo—which was in the officers' possession— could have been checked, and (3) the alleged intentionality of DePietro's and Borona's behavior, that Russo has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably seized. In other words, the evidence Russo has proffered suffices to prevent summary judgment on Russo's claim of a Fourth Amendment violation by DePietro and Borona. . . . Based on our determination that a reasonable factfinder could conclude that DePietro and Borona's conduct violated Russo's Fourth Amendment rights, we move to the second step of the Saucier inquiry and assess whether these officers are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . First, Russo had a clearly-established constitutional right to be free from prolonged detention caused by law enforcement officials' mishandling or suppression of exculpatory evidence in a manner which 'shocks the conscience.' . . Today we have clarified that Russo's claim should be 'treated under the Fourth Amendment,' . . . rather than under substantive due process. But this clarification is of no consequence to the question of whether the right was clearly established, because the proper inquiry is whether the right itself—rather than its source—is clearly established.”).

Jones v. Parmley, 465 F.3d 46, 57-61(2d Cir. 2006) (“Defendants concede that plaintiffs had a constitutional right to protest but instead argue that the contours of the right were not sufficiently clear because of the absence of decisional law supporting the existence of a right to continue with a demonstration after some of the participants create a public safety hazard.’ While we recognize that to be clearly established, the right ‘must have been recognized in a particularized rather than a general sense,’ . . . we disagree for the reasons that follow with defendants’ contention that the right at issue in this case was too general to be clearly established. Defendants misapprehend the nature of the inquiry here. They essentially argue that we should find qualified immunity unless a Supreme Court or Second Circuit case expressly denies it, but that standard was rejected by the Supreme Court in favor of one in which courts must examine whether in ‘the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [is] apparent.’ . . . As we established in the previous section, the Supreme Court has long applied the ‘clear and present danger’ test to protest cases to determine when police interference is constitutional. . . . In the protest context, the Supreme Court has already well articulated the contours of the right and made clear that the police may not interfere with demonstrations unless there is a ‘clear and present danger’ of riot, imminent violence, interference with traffic or other immediate threat to public safety. . . . Taken as a whole, the facts as alleged by plaintiffs reveal an orderly, peaceful crowd, the overwhelming majority of whose members had not entered the I-81 roadway. Given the above, it is clear to this Court that a reasonable factfinder could determine under plaintiffs’ version of events that the demonstration did not constitute a ‘clear and present danger’ and thus that the NYSP’s actions violated a clearly established constitutional right to protest. . . . Here, defendants concede that they issued no dispersal order and instead stood in a ‘skirmish line,’ waited thirty-five seconds, and then charged into the crowd, arresting protesters indiscriminately. . . . In the end, the district court properly concluded that the facts as alleged by plaintiffs demonstrate that defendants violated plaintiffs’ clearly established First Amendment rights ‘of which a reasonable person would have known.’”)

Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98, 115 (2d Cir. 2005) (“Although it is a close question, we think that the substantive due process violation that the plaintiffs allege here was not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. Dwares did not address, let alone decide, whether repeated inaction on the part of government officials over a long period of time without an explicit statement of approval, might effectively constitute such an implicit ‘prior assurance’ that it rises to the level of an affirmative act. Dwares also did not indicate whether government officials may implicitly send a message of official sanction by engaging in related misconduct themselves or by participating in or tolerating such a practice. And Dwares did not expressly address the question of the scienter required for section 1983 liability. The rule of law that we draw from Dwares today was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the conduct in question here. . . . We therefore conclude that the pre-accident individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the substantive due process claims. Insofar as the complaints alleged such substantive due process violations against them, they should have been dismissed.”).

Huminski v. Corsones, 396 F.3d 53, 88, 89, 92, 93 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended on rehearing) (“We have pointed out at some length why it is clear to us that Huminski had a personal right of access to the Rutland courts. We have also noted, however, that we can find no Supreme Court or previous Second Circuit authority that actually decides this issue and thereby establishes that the First Amendment right of access to judicial proceedings or courthouses is violated when one identified person, rather than the public or press at large, is excluded from judicial proceedings. . . . The defendants therefore are not liable for damages to Huminski for their violation of his First Amendment right of access and, to that extent, the district court erred in denying their motion for summary judgment. . . . The Notices Against Trespass in effect prohibit indefinitely any and all expressive activity in which Huminski might want to engage in and around Rutland state courthouses. These notices are thus pervasive enough to be viewed as creating a ‘First-Amendment-Free Zone’ for Huminski alone in and around the Rutland courts. The defendants’ singling out of Huminski for exclusion, thereby permitting all others to engage in similar activity in and around the courts, suggest to us that the trespass notices are not reasonable. . . . Our review thus suggests to us that the defendants violated Huminski’s First Amendment right of free expression by issuing the trespass notices. The defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with regard to this claim because this right was clearly established at the time that the defendants issued the trespass notices.”).

Palmer v. Richards, 364 F.3d 60, 67, 68 (2d Cir. 2004) (“Whether Palmer’s liberty interest was clearly established depends, in turn, on whether the duration and conditions of Palmer’s confinement in SHU not only infringed a liberty interest, but also were of such a degree that an officer in Richards’s position should have known, in light of Sandin and the law of this Circuit, that Palmer’s liberty interests were at stake. . . . The same factual question that prevents us from determining whether Palmer’s liberty interest was infringed by his SHU confinement also prevents us from deciding whether Richards is entitled to qualified immunity. Given the state of the record, it is impossible to conclude that Palmer endured merely the normal SHU conditions that we have surveyed in our previous cases; instead, it is possible that Palmer endured unusually harsh SHU conditions that constituted an ‘atypical and significant deprivation’ under Sandin, in which case Palmer’s right to due process protections was clearly established. Richards made no effort before the district court to demonstrate what Palmer’s conditions were, content to rest on the argument that ‘since plaintiff served only 77 days in SHU, no liberty interest is implicated.’ We had repeatedly held, prior to Palmer’s disciplinary hearing in August 2000, that SHU confinements shorter than 101 days would deprive a prisoner of a liberty interest—and thus trigger due process rights—if the conditions of confinement were severe enough. . . . Our decisions, therefore, ‘clearly foreshadow’ a finding that Palmer’s liberty interests could have been infringed, entitling him to hearing procedures that conform to due process, . . . although we cannot conclude as much without knowing more about the conditions of his confinement. Richards, therefore, did not carry his burden on summary judgment to show, on the undisputed facts, that no clearly established right of Palmer's was infringed.”).

Cobb v. Pozzi, 363 F.3d 89, 111 (2d Cir. 2004) (as amended) (“The defendants argue that the equal protection principles articulated in Olech were not clearly established law at the time of the alleged unconstitutional conduct at issue in this appeal and that they should therefore be shielded from that claim on the grounds of qualified immunity. They also contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because they treated the defendants in a manner that was objectively reasonable. We reject each of these arguments. First, the law pertaining to ‘class of one’ equal protection claims was clearly established in 1999 (i.e. when the events at issue here took place). . . . As the Supreme Court underscored in Olech, the Court has long ‘recognized successful equal protection claims brought by a Aclass of one,’ where the plaintiff alleges that she has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment.’ . . . The defendants nonetheless contend that the specific contours of a ‘class of one’ equal protection claim were modified when the Supreme Court decided Olech in 2000 such that the standards for this type of claim could not have been ‘clearly established’ in 1999. However, in African Trade & Info. Ctr., where the plaintiffs brought a ‘class of one’ equal protection claim premised on conduct that had taken place in 1998, we explained that ‘[i]f plaintiffs had alleged that [the defendant’s conduct] ... was wholly arbitrary, or irrational, they would have alleged a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.’ . . . Because that is the type of ‘class of one’ equal protection claim with which the district court charged the jury at the close of the trial, there can be little doubt in the wake of our decision in African Trade & Info. Ctr. that the relevant standards for the particular Olech-based equal protection claim advanced at trial were clearly established even with respect to conduct that pre-dated Olech.”)

Blouin v. Spitzer, 356 F.3d 348, 361 (2d Cir. 2004) (“Blouin has not demonstrated that clearly established federal law barred the defendants from effectuating the state’s interest in prolonging the life of one of its citizens, whatever its quality.”).

Ford v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 582, 597, 598 (2d Cir. 2003) (“We agree with the district court’s discussion of qualified immunity insofar as it found that the constitutional right at issue is clearly established. . . . Defendants argue that the specific right at issue has not been clearly established, as this Court has never held that ‘prison officials were obligated to provide an inmate with an Eid-ul-Fitr meal.’ We, however, have clearly established that a prisoner has a right to a diet consistent with his or her religious scruples Defendants are correct that we have never had occasion to recognize a prisoner’s right to the Eid ul Fitr feast in particular, but courts need not have ruled in favor of a prisoner under precisely the same factual circumstance in order for the right to be clearly established. . . . We find that prior cases make it sufficiently clear that absent a legitimate penological justification, which for present purposes we must assume defendants were without, prison officials’ conduct in denying Ford a feast imbued with religious import was unlawful. [footnote omitted] We part company with the district court, however, over the reasonableness of defendants’ belief that they did not violate Ford’s constitutional rights. The district court held that it was ‘objectively reasonable for defendants to rely on’ the advice of the DOCS religious authorities to conclude that the postponed Eid ul Fitr feast did not retain religious significance. . . Whether the prison officials, with or without the counsel of the religious authorities, thought that the Eid ul Fitr feast was not religious is beside the point. [footnote omitted] Despite the fact that all the religious authorities testified to their belief that the postponed Eid ul Fitr was without religious significance, the proper inquiry was always whether Ford’s belief was sincerely held and ‘in his own scheme of things, religious.’ . . We do not suggest that religious authorities can never be employed in assisting prison officials in making that determination, but the religious authorities’ opinions that a particular practice is not religiously mandated under Muslim law, without more, cannot render defendants’ conduct reasonable.”).

Patel v. Searles, 305 F.3d 130, 139, 140 (2d Cir. 2002) (“Having found that the right to intimate association extended to Patel’s family relationships, we must still determine, in this specific factual context, whether defendants’ actions violated a clearly established ‘constitutional right[] of which a reasonable person would have known.’ In this regard, defendants point out that even in the more common fact pattern of a child abuse investigation, our precedents have not delineated the exact boundaries of associational rights, making it difficult for social workers to know when their actions are unconstitutional. . . Similarly, since neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever ruled upon a fact pattern similar to the one now before us, the officers maintain that they, like the social workers in Wilkinson, had no reasonable basis to conclude that their alleged actions violated the Constitution. Defendants’ contentions are not without merit. Yet, at the pleading stage of this litigation, we are unable to conclude that it is ‘beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.’ Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46. Plaintiff has alleged sufficiently serious misconduct that were we to reverse the district court, it would be equivalent to holding that the right to intimate association does not impose any clearly established limits on the tactics that a police officer may use in the course of an investigation. . . . As a consequence, we do not think it would be objectively reasonable for the police to engage in an extended public and private defamatory misinformation campaign to destroy a family, hoping that those tactics might produce incriminating leads in a murder investigation.”).

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) (“We hold that in order for a supervisor to be held liable under section 1983, both the law allegedly violated by the subordinate and the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff seeks to hold the supervisor liable must be clearly established. By 1993, it was clearly established that a police officer violates a person’s Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily privacy when that officer views, photographs or otherwise records another’s unclothed or partially unclothed body, without that person’s consent. By 1993, it was also clearly established that a supervisor could be liable if he had actual or constructive notice that it was highly likely his subordinate, while on duty, might violate another’s right to privacy in his or her unclothed body, but the supervisor deliberately or recklessly disregarded that risk by failing to take reasonable action to prevent such a violation, and that failure caused the constitutional injury to the plaintiff.”).

Shain v. Ellison, 273 F.3d 56, 66 (2d Cir. 2001) (“[I]t was clearly established in 1995 that persons charged with a misdemeanor and remanded to a local correctional facility like NCCC have a right to be free of a strip search absent reasonable suspicion that they are carrying contraband or weapons.”)

Kerman v. City of New York (Kerman II), 261 F.3d 229, 237 (2d Cir. 2001) (“We find that at the time of the officers’ conduct in this case no clearly established law prohibited a warrantless entry into an apartment on the ground of exigent circumstances based solely on an anonymous 911 call. Therefore, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment to all nine defendant police officers with regard to defendants’ entry into Kerman’s apartment.”).

Johnson v. Newburgh Enlarged School District, 239 F.3d 246, 253 (2d Cir. 2001) (“Bucci’s reliance on the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent expressly holding students have a substantive due process right, as he puts it, ‘not to be struck by a teacher’ construes the right too narrowly. In Rodriguez, decided one year before Bucci’s alleged attack on T.J., we held that individuals possess a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right ‘in the non-seizure, non-prisoner context’ to be free from excessive force employed by government actors acting under the color of government authority. . . . To the extent that no case applying this right in the educational setting has previously arisen in our circuit, we view this unremarkable absence as a strong indication that the right to be free from excessive force is so well-recognized and widely observed by educators in public schools as to have eluded the necessity of judicial pronouncement. . . . [W]e believe that for claims based on intentionally tortious harmful conduct employed in the absence of any legitimate government interest, the requisite degree of particularity is lessened. Such conduct in the ‘non-seizure, non-prisoner context’ by any government actor under any circumstances is unjustifiable and, therefore, no additional situation-specific ‘contouring’ of the right to be free of excessive force is required. Accordingly, we hold that the right to be free of excessive force as announced by this court in Rodriguez was sufficiently concrete to put Bucci on notice that he could not use intentionally harmful force in the absence of a legitimate and discernible government aim.”).

Ford v. Moore, 237 F.3d 156, 163 n.4 (2d Cir. 2001) (“The application of qualified immunity law to supervisory liability claims presents important and unresolved questions. What law must be ‘clearly established’ to defeat a qualified immunity defense: the law violated by the subordinates, or the supervisory liability doctrine under which the plaintiff hopes to hold the defendant liable, or both? And what must be ‘objectively unreasonable’: the subordinates’ acts, or the supervisor’s failure to act, or both? These questions have gone largely unexplored. The First Circuit, in a thoughtful opinion, recently appeared to conclude that a court should examine whether the constitutional right allegedly violated by the subordinates and the plaintiff’s supervisory liability theory are clearly established, and if they are, then move on to evaluate the supervisor’s objective liability in failing to act. See Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir.1998). This Circuit has not explicitly discussed the issue, but has at least once used a rule different from the First Circuit’s, looking to the clarity of the law allegedly violated by the subordinates, and then moving on to the objective reasonableness of the defendant's actions. [citing cases] Because we hold that Lt. Moore is entitled to qualified immunity under even the narrow rendering of the doctrine favorable to the Plaintiff (one in which only the law violated by the subordinates must be clearly established, and only the supervisor's acts must be objectively unreasonable), we leave this matter to be resolved another day.”).

Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342, 344, 349, 356, 357 (2d Cir. 2000) (“We hold that there is a constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigatory capacity, at least where the officer foresees that he himself will use the evidence with a resulting deprivation of liberty. We also believe that this right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey’s alleged misconduct occurred. . . .It is arguable that in this case the right should be identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any governmental misconduct occurring in the investigative phase of a criminal matter. A right defined that broadly, however, would cover too much ground because some investigative actions, though fairly labeled as “misconduct,” might not merit condemnation as a denial of due process. On the other hand, the right need not be identified at such a level of particularity as to focus only on fabrication of evidence by a prosecutor acting in an investigating capacity. . . . We think the right at issue in this case is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigating capacity. . . . Although no prior decision has found a violation by an investigating prosecutor of the right not to be deprived of liberty on the basis of fabricated evidence, the cases in which such claims have been made reveal some support for Zahrey’s position. . . . Anderson instructs . . . that for a right to be clearly established for purposes of a qualified immunity defense, the precise conduct at issue need not previously have been ruled unlawful. . . We think the right at issue in this case should not be defined at such a level of particularity as to be limited to a right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of an investigating prosecutor’s fabrication of evidence. The right is appropriately identified as the right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of any government officer’s fabrication of evidence. That right was clearly established in 1996, when Coffey’s alleged acts occurred . . .”).

Lauro v. Charles, 219 F.3d 202, 216 (2d Cir. 2000) (“There are . . . differences between Ayeni and this case that, we believe, render the likeness between the two less than obvious. Thus, the police action in Ayeni was a search, while in this case it was a seizure. More importantly, the search in Ayeni invaded a private home, an area that has traditionally been given the highest degree of protection by the Fourth Amendment . . . , while the seizure in this case infringed Lauro’s personal privacy in the course of detention by the police, a situation in which the privacy protections of the Fourth Amendment must often yield to law enforcement needs. . . . For purposes of determining whether the rule we announce today was clearly established by Ayeni, these are significant distinctions. . . .In light of Wilson’s admonition that the particular right must be defined with specificity, we are not prepared to say that a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern that the search in Ayeni and the seizure in this case infringe what are merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right.”).

Tenebaum v. Williams, 193 F.3d 581, 596, 597 (2d Cir. 1999) (“[N]ot until today have we specifically held that where there is reasonable time consistent with the safety of the child to obtain a judicial order, the ‘emergency’ removal of a child is unwarranted. We cannot say that this principle was clearly enough articulated in or implied by our case law as of 1990 to require the defendants to answer in damages for their failure to abide by it at that time. . . . Because we now hold that it is unconstitutional for state officials to effect a child’s removal on an ‘emergency’ basis where there is reasonable time safely to obtain judicial authorization consistent with the child’s safety, caseworkers can no longer claim, as did the defendants here, that they are immune from liability for such actions because the law is not ‘clearly established.’ But there remains substantial protection for caseworkers under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, so long as it is ‘objectively reasonable [for them] to believe that [their] acts [do] not violate these clearly established rights.’ . . . We are confident that the doctrine of qualified immunity applied in light of these principles will continue to provide ample protection for caseworkers, enabling them to fulfill their crucial duties safely and effectively.”).

Powell v. Schriver, 175 F.3d 107, 115 (2d Cir. 1999) (“In our view, it was as obvious in 1991 as it is now that under certain circumstances the disclosure of an inmate’s HIV-positive status and—perhaps more so—her transsexualism could place that inmate in harm’s way. Accordingly, we hold that ‘under preexisting law,’ a reasonable prison official in December of 1991 would have known that such disclosure, under certain circumstances and absent legitimate penological purposes, could constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk that such inmate would suffer serious harm at the hands of other inmates.”).

Lewis v. Cowen, 165 F.3d 154, 166, 167 (2d Cir. 1999) (“In determining that Hickey had violated a clearly established right of which a reasonable person should have known, both the district judge and the magistrate judge identified the right at issue as the ‘freedom of speech.’ . . . The district and magistrate judges defined the right in question far too broadly. The relevant inquiry is not whether the defendants should have known that there was a federal right, in the abstract, to “freedom of speech,” but whether the defendants should have known that the specific actions complained of violated the plaintiff’s freedom of speech. Such an inquiry requires that a court define the constitutional right with some specificity. . . . The present case illustrates the problem of defining the right too broadly. Under the district court’s formulation, no defendant in any First Amendment action could ever successfully assert the qualified immunity defense. We think the proper qualified immunity question in this case is whether the defendants should have known that terminating a policymaking public employee for refusing to promote agency policy as directed by his employer would violate the First Amendment. As this opinion indicates, the magistrate judge should have answered this question in the negative. A highranking policy-making employee does not have, and never has had, a First Amendment right to refuse his employer’s directive to promote agency policy.”).

Bruneau v. South Kortright Central School District, 163 F.3d 749, 755, 756 (2d Cir. 1998) (“The law does not clearly impose a duty on school officials under Title IX or the Fourteenth Amendment to stop peer sexual harassment. Indeed, there are no court of appeals cases before 1998 holding school officials potentially liable for peer sexual harassment in the school environment. Even now, there is disagreement among the circuits as to whether a school district and school officials may be held liable for sexual harassment where the officials are not directly involved in the harassment. . . . We hold that it was not clearly established law in the fall of 1993 that a § 1983 claim could be stated against individual officials for failure to prevent peer sexual harassment among students.”).

Smith v. Garretto, 147 F.3d 91, 95 (2d Cir. 1998) (“Though we must be careful not to define the right in terms of the precise circumstances of a case, an approach so narrow that the defined right would rarely if ever be said to have been previously established, see LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73 (2d Cir.1998), we think the right at issue here must be defined as a right to be free of a retaliatory entrapment, rather than the more general right to be free of any retaliatory action. . . . No case has previously been decided in which an entrapment was ruled to be a retaliatory violation of First Amendment rights. It is therefore not clear whether the First Amendment claimant must show that the criminal case against him was frivolous, or merely lacking in probable cause, or whether he can prevail, as Bodak appears to contend, simply by alleging that although he committed a crime without any apparent inducement, he acted with a benign motive and the prosecutor’s motive was retaliatory. However the law might develop with respect to the retaliatory initiation of a plan to see if a target is willing, for whatever reason, to accept the invitation to commit a crime, it was not clearly established at the time of Bodak’s acceptance of the offered bribe that Garretto’s alleged action violated any constitutionally protected right. For that reason, Bodak’s allegations encounter an insuperable defense of qualified immunity.”).

LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68, 73, 74 (2d Cir. 1998) (“The chronic difficulty with this [qualified immunity] analysis for courts is in accurately defining the right at issue. An overly narrow definition of the right can effectively insulate the government’s actions by making it easy to assert that the narrowly defined right was not clearly established. On the other hand, as the Supreme Court noted in Anderson, if the right is defined too broadly, ‘[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity that our cases plainly establish into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.’ Anderson, 483 U.S. at 639. With these warnings in mind, we find that the district court erred in describing the right at issue as ‘the right to be free from crumbling asbestos.’ . . . Instead, we find that the right to be free from deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, established in Estelle v. Gamble . . . best encompasses the alleged conduct. . . . Given the known dangers of friable asbestos in 1991-92 [footnote omitted], we hold that a reasonable person would have understood that exposing an inmate to friable asbestos could violate the Eighth Amendment.”).

Danahy v. Buscaglia, 134 F.3d 1185, 1193 (2d Cir. 1998) (“The foregoing observations are expressed not to support a finding that plaintiffs were Policymaker/Confidential employees as a matter of law, but rather to show that officers of reasonable competence, based on the information before the defendants concerning the positions of plaintiffs, measured against the decided federal cases (i.e., those in existence at the time the defendants acted) applying the Elrod/Branti exception, could reasonably have perceived that they were, and therefore that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, enough facts were known to defendants so that an officer of reasonable competence could believe that all of the plaintiffs held confidential positions in a highly specialized prosecutor's office.”).

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 97-98 (2d Cir. 1997) (“The claim as to the first demotion . . . requires consideration of the distinction between the Pickering and the Elrod lines of decisions and poses the specific issue of whether an employer motivated to act against an employee for exercising both his speech and associational rights is insulated from liability by Elrod. The claim as to the second demotion . . . appears to present only issues implicating the Pickering line of cases, but since the complaint alleges circumstances warranting a conclusion that McEvoy was a policymaker even after his first demotion, the second demotion poses the specific issue of the significance that should be attached to an employee's policymaker role in applying Pickering. As our discussion . . . reveals, both issues were unsettled at the time of the demotions. As a result, the contours of the rights alleged to have been violated by [defendants] were not ‘sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violates [those] right[s],’ . . . and these defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Moreover, our resolution of the first issue entitles [defendants] not only to qualified immunity but also to have the claim against them regarding the first demotion dismissed entirely.”).

McEvoy v. Spencer, 124 F.3d 92, 104-05 (2d Cir. 1997) (“[A]s we have previously discussed, the law was unsettled regarding whether an employee's policymaking status automatically immunized an employer's adverse action even in a pure Pickering case. Although we decide in this opinion that no dispositive policymaker exception exists in the Pickering balancing test, [defendants] did not violate a clearly established right of McEvoy's when, reasonably believing that he was a policymaker, they demoted him from Deputy Chief to Captain because of speech activities. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”).

Brown v. City of Oneonta, 106 F.3d 1125, 1131 (2d Cir. 1997) (“Because we agree with appellants' contention that it was unclear whether FERPA's [Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act] emergency exception allowed release of the list, we find that they are entitled to qualified immunity on that ground. . . . The statute, as it read in 1992, made no specific direction whether an educational institution might release information from students' education records to police to aid them in their search for a violent criminal who might be on campus.”).

Williams v. Greifinger, 97 F.3d 699, 706 (2d Cir. 1996) (concluding that at time of plaintiff's confinement in medical keeplock, right to exercise was clearly established).

Schechter v. Comptroller of City of New York, 79 F.3d 265, 271 (2d Cir. 1996) (“Although the district court correctly reasoned that a constitutional right to access to the courts has long been established, this general right does not meet the specificity requirements of Anderson. All of the cases cited . . . for the existence of a constitutional right of access to the courts involve impediments to such access by incarcerated prisoners. . . . These cases do not establish with ‘reasonable specificity,’ that the provision of misleading legal advice to an unincarcerated adversary constitutes a constitutional violation.” [cites omitted]).

Genas v. State of New York Dep’t of Correctional Servs., 75 F.3d 825, 830-31 (2d Cir. 1996) (“[T]he district court analyzed plaintiff’s religious discrimination claim, and concluded that ‘the contours of the right to be free from religious discrimination and an employer’s duty to make reasonable accommodation for religious observance are clearly defined.’ We hold that the district court erred by defining the right at too abstract a level of generality. . . . Though the duty to reasonably accommodate the religious preferences of employees has been clearly established, it has not been established that an employer acting under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement must do more to accommodate religious preferences than is required by the agreement.”).

Rodriguez v. Phillips, 66 F.3d 470, 476-77 (2d Cir. 1995) (“[W]e must determine whether in January 1991 the right to be free from the use of excessive force was so clearly defined in this non-seizure, non-prisoner context that defendant Epstein knew his actions were unlawful. Earlier in our jurisprudential history, the contours of this right were clearly defined. All excessive force claims were analyzed under a single substantive due process standard Our silence and that of the Supreme Court on the continued viability of Fourteenth Amendment excessive force actions after Graham, together with the recited decisions of our sister circuits, demonstrate that any federal right of a non-arrestee/non-prisoner to be free from excessive force was not clearly established at the time of Epstein’s alleged actions. While we now read the 1989 Graham decision not to preclude a claim such as Ms. Rodriguez’, we agree with the Eleventh Circuit’s comment that Graham ‘forecloses any contention that the law was clearly established in 1990 and 1991 that use of excessive force violated the Due Process Clause.’ [Swint] Since, in January 1991, Sara Rodriguez did not have a clearly established substantive due process right to be free from use of excessive force, Officer Epstein is entitled to qualified immunity on this cause of action and the denial of summary judgment in his favor was error.”).

Brown v. D’Amico, 35 F.3d 97, 99-100 (2d Cir. 1994) (“In essence, [Plaintiff] is asserting the right to be free from an arrest under circumstances where (a) probable cause is furnished, (b) probable cause would arguably have been negated if information in the applicant’s possession had been disclosed to the issuing magistrate, and (c) the undisclosed information had previously been disclosed to an investigatory grand jury that had made a finding of probable cause. We hold that [Defendant] is entitled to qualified immunity because this right was not clearly established in December 1986 when he applied for an arrest warrant Plaintiff might object that we have defined the right asserted at an undue level of particularity. We do not believe that we have. We do not grant immunity because no previous case has presented the exact set of facts now before us. [citing Anderson] Rather, we uphold the claim of immunity because no case has considered the responsibilities of a state law enforcement officer in the special state procedural context presented here. A police officer violates no settled interpretation of the Fourth Amendment when the officer omits from a warrant application information that has previously been included in the aggregate of evidence that led a neutral investigatory grand jury to make a finding of probable cause. We observe that a more abstract level of generality might be appropriate in other cases involving charges of false arrest and malicious prosecution.”).

Soares v. State of Connecticut, 8 F.3d 917, 922 (2d Cir. 1993) (“Given the absence of any preexisting caselaw recognizing plaintiff’s alleged right not to be handcuffed and in light of the presently existing conflict of views, it is plain that [defendants] did not violate plaintiff’s ‘clearly established’ rights. . . .”).

Stokes v. Wayne County, No. 6:21-CV-06657 EAW, 2025 WL 755437, at *12 n.11 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2025) (“Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s malicious prosecution claim because Plaintiff’s charges were dismissed in the interest of justice. . . Defendants contend: [P]laintiff obtained a dismissal due to a lack of speedy trial. This is not a clearly established affirmative indication of innocence. Qualified immunity applies as the Supreme Court’s ruling in Thompson v. Clark (142 S. Ct. 1332) was issued in 2022 [after] the involved 2020 arrest. The qualification for a favorable termination of a criminal proceeding was not clearly established in 2020. (Id.). Defendants appear to conflate the requirement that a right be clearly established for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, and the development of the law as to what a plaintiff must establish to prove the elements of a malicious prosecution claim. The Supreme Court held in Thompson v. Clark that ‘a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution does not require the plaintiff to show that the criminal prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence. A plaintiff need only show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction.’. . This holding did not alter the scope of qualified immunity. Rather, it dealt with what a Plaintiff must prove in terms of favorable termination of a criminal proceeding to establish the elements of a malicious prosecution claim.”)

Byrd v. Middletown Board of Education, No. 3:24-CV-207 (VAB), 2024 WL 4871885, at *6 (D. Conn. Nov. 22, 2024) (“Indeed, Ms. Byrd acknowledges that ‘there ha[s] never been a case in the Second Circuit or in the District Court that ha[s] held that Garcetti applied in the secondary school setting.’. . And, this is the exact reason that the law is not clearly established: the Second Circuit has no holdings on whether Garcetti or any other standard applies to classroom speech in a secondary or primary school setting. There is no ‘existing precedent [that has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.”)

Lewis v. Delmar, No. 21-CV-6738-FPG, 2024 WL 4444448, at *3-5 (W.D.N.Y. Oct. 8, 2024) (“‘It is well settled in this Circuit that a defendant’s ability to rely on qualified immunity from liability is a question of law for the court to decide only when the facts are not in dispute.’. . Although qualified immunity claims ‘should be decided as early as possible in a case,’ it ‘is often best decided on a motion for summary judgment when the details of the alleged deprivations are more fully developed.’ . . . ‘[B]y presenting [their] immunity defense on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion instead of a motion for summary judgment[, the defendants] must accept the more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route.’ . . . [A] dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) on qualified immunity grounds ‘may be appropriate where, for example, a defendant can demonstrate that, as a matter of law, the constitutional right that is alleged to have been violated was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.’ . . . Plaintiff has not responded to Defendants’ qualified immunity argument, and therefore has not provided the Court with any Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent to suggest a prisoner’s right to intimate association with a partner or spouse is well-established. From the Court’s own research, however, no such precedent appears to exist. . . . When addressing this issue via summary order, the Second Circuit concluded that ‘[c]ases in this circuit [] have not clearly established a right to spousal visitation in prison’ and accordingly affirmed that ‘qualified immunity [wa]s appropriate’ for a right-to-intimate-association claim. . . . In light of this, and in the absence of any contrary case law, the Court agrees with Defendants that qualified immunity is appropriate here because Plaintiff’s right to intimate association was not clearly established. Even though qualified immunity is appropriate, however, that does not end the inquiry. Qualified immunity ‘protects government officials from suits brought against them in their individual capacity for money damages,’ . . . but it ‘does not protect a public official against a claim for declaratory or injunctive relief[.]’ . . . In the Second Amended Complaint, Plaintiff seeks not only money damages, but also the restoration of Knight-Lilly’s visitation privileges, permission to have a marriage ceremony, participation in the Family Reunion Program, and an apology letter. . . . Defendants do not acknowledge this in their motion to dismiss and the record does not reflect that Plaintiff’s claims for non-monetary relief were mooted or abandoned. Accordingly, the Court will grant Defendants’ motion to dismiss only as to Plaintiff’s claims for money damages and will allow Plaintiff’s claims for injunctive and declaratory relief to proceed.”)

Foster v. McCabe, No. 1:19-CV-843, 2024 WL 1345341, at *6-8 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2024) (“This case involves the warrantless search of a New York parolee at a residence that he shared with his mother. Although warrantless searches are ‘generally presumed unreasonable,’ a state’s operation of a parole system ‘presents special needs justifying a departure from the traditional Fourth Amendment warrant requirement.’ . . . New York operates a parole system under which a parolee must ‘permit his parole officer to visit him at his residence and/or place of employment’ and must ‘permit the search and inspection of his person, residence and property.’ . . . The Second Circuit has recognized that, as applied to a New York parolee, the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures is evaluated under one of two standards: the ‘Huntley’ standard (named for People v. Huntley, 371 N.E.2d 794, 797 (N.Y. 1977)) or the standard articulated in Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843 (2006). ‘[T]he law is unclear whether the Huntley standard has been superseded by Samson.’ . . . If the Huntley standard applies, then the court analyzes ‘whether the conduct of the parole officer was rationally and reasonably related to the performance of the parole officer’s duty.’ . . . If Samson has superseded the Huntley standard, then the ‘reasonableness’ analysis would presumably not focus on the relationship of the parole search to parole duties. Instead, analogizing Samson, law enforcement could conduct a search of a parolee's residence without limitation—except for searches that New York prohibits as 'so divorced from reasonable suspicion as to be arbitrary and capricious.' . . . No reasonable law enforcement officer could be expected to determine whether Samson supersedes the Huntley standard for parole searches. But all reasonable law enforcement officers should understand that, at minimum, existing law prohibits parole searches that are 'arbitrary, capricious or harassing.' That is the only 'clearly established' right relevant to the unlawful-search claim. . . . Even if Plaintiffs could raise a dispute about whether Ms. Rodgers gave her consent, the City Defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity. The court previously ruled that the State Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Rodgers's § 1983 claim. . . . The court recognized the Supreme Court's holding in Georgia v. Randolph that when police seek to conduct a consent search of a premises, 'a physically present co-occupant's stated refusal to permit entry prevails, rendering the warrantless search unreasonable and invalid as to him.' . . . But Randolph did not involve a parole search and '[t]he courts to have considered the import of Randolph in the context of individuals who co-habit or reside with a parolee or probationer have reached differing conclusions.' . . . Because it is not clear whether the rule from Randolph applies in a parole search like this one, the City Defendants are also entitled to qualified immunity on Ms. Rodgers's § 1983 claim. . . . The court concludes that Defendants have met their burden to show that their conduct was objectively reasonable under then-existing law and that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment on Count 4. For the reasons discussed above, Plaintiffs cannot prevail on their claims challenging the entry and search of the residence. Therefore, in the circumstances here, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to their detention of both plaintiffs while officers carried out the search of the premises.")

May v. Quiros, No. 3:19-CV-00575-VLB, 2023 WL 6050160, at *25–27 (D. Conn. Sept. 15, 2023) ("The Defendants argue that the Second Circuit has never held that an inmate with gender dysphoria is entitled to any particular treatment, and on this fact, the Court is required to grant them qualified immunity. The Defendants' view is impermissibly narrow. . . . A narrow framing of the 'legal rule' similar to the one advanced by the Defendants was rejected by the Second Circuit in LaBounty, which held that the district court erred in describing the rule at issue as the right to be free from the particular threat to the inmate's health. . . . As found in LaBounty, the correct inquiry is whether Ms. Clark had the right to be free from deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. This right is clearly established as held in Estelle and LaBounty, both of which were decided well before the events in this case. . . . The Defendants state they are unable to find any district court case within this Circuit where a denial of hormone therapy or gender assignment surgery has been held to constitute deliberate indifference. The Defendants claim that three district court decisions held the opposite and/or granted qualified immunity. [citing cases] Each of these cases are fundamentally distinguishable as to make them entirely inapplicable to the question of whether it was objectively reasonable for the Provider-Defendants to believe they were acting within the confines of the law. . . . [T]hese cases are distinguishable because Ms. Clark is not arguing that the Defendant-Providers were deliberately indifferent in failing to facilitate hormone therapy or surgery. Ms. Clark is arguing the Defendant-Providers failed to facilitate any informed care from a provider qualified to treat someone with her condition. Thus, cases like Pack, Manning, and Lopez do not apply. No reasonable official could read these cases to justify providing Ms. Clark with uninformed and inadequate care for years during which there is documented pain and suffering. The Defendants also try to point to a ‘Circuit split’ and cite to similarly distinguishable out-of-circuit cases. For the same reasons the three district court cases are deemed inapplicable, the out-of-circuit cases are as well. Thus, no objectively reasonable official with the information these Defendant-Providers had would believe that their conduct was lawful. In contrast to the cases cited by the Provider-Defendants, the Court returns again to Hathaway. While qualified immunity was not an issue in Hathaway, the Second Circuit’s long-standing reasoning forms the basis of Ms. Clark’s ‘clearly established constitutional right.’ That is, a practitioner who merely provides the same course of treatment when it clearly does not alleviate an inmate’s suffering—as evidenced by the inmate’s numerous complaints—acts with deliberate indifference. Given the longevity and import of Hathaway’s reasoning, the Court concludes that no reasonable official would have believed it was lawful to fail to provide informed care to Ms. Clark given her numerous and consistent complaints describing severe anguish would have violated her constitutional rights. Therefore, the Provider-Defendants have failed to meet their burden to show they are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Martinez v. City of New York, No. 16-CV-79 (NRM) (CLP), 2023 WL 4627739, at *12–14 (E.D.N.Y. July 19, 2023) (“The Court first concludes that Plaintiff’s constitutional right to receive adequate medical care as a pre-trial detainee had been clearly established under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution for decades prior to the night that she was taken into custody on January 22, 2015. Indeed, the constitutional right in question ‘was defined with reasonable specificity,’ both the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit have long recognized this right, and, particularly in light of the jury’s answers to the Court’s special interrogatory, ‘a reasonable defendant would have understood that his or her acts were unlawful’ on the facts that the defendant officers faced on the night of Plaintiff’s detention. . . A pre-trial arrestee’s right to adequate medical care has been defined with specificity through a long-established two-part test. . . [U]nder the ‘subjective’ prong of the standard, an officer only violates the Fourteenth Amendment if—at least according to Second Circuit case law as of January 22, 2015—the officer was ‘actually aware’ that the pretrial detainee was suffering from a serious medical condition but nonetheless failed to take appropriate action. Caizzo v. Koreman, 581 F.3d 63, 72 (2d Cir. 2009).¹¹ [fn.11: When deciding whether a defendant officer violated a plaintiff’s ‘clearly established’ constitutional right, a court must look to the law as it existed at the time of the alleged violation. . . In the present case, Plaintiff alleges that the defendant officers were deliberately indifferent to her serious medical needs on January 22, 2015. Prior to that date, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit had concluded that a pre-trial detainee’s Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, like a prisoner’s Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, turned in part on whether the plaintiff could prove that the offending official was subjectively aware of her serious medical need and nonetheless ignored it. . . Since that date, however, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has overruled Caizzo, concluding that a pre-trial detainee can raise a colorable deliberate indifference claim even ‘when an official does not have subjective awareness that the official’s acts (or omissions) have subjected the pretrial detainee to a substantial risk of harm’ as long as the official ‘knew or should have known’ that a certain condition ‘posed an excessive risk to health and safety’ for a pretrial detainee yet the official failed to act. Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017) (emphasis added). In other words, since the night of Plaintiff’s assault, the Second Circuit has loosened the ‘subjective’ prong for a claim for deliberate indifference, allowing a plaintiff to prevail by proving that even if the officer was not knowingly indifferent to her medical needs, he was recklessly so. In light of the Court’s obligation to consider Defendants’ qualified immunity defense in relation to the law as it existed at the time of their conduct, it will apply the Caizzo standard. The legal distinction between Caizzo and Darnell is not meaningful, however, in light of the jury’s determination, as reflected in its responses to the Court’s special interrogatory, that all four defendant officers were subjectively aware that Plaintiff was suffering from extreme pain on January 22, 2015 . . . but nonetheless failed to act for nearly five hours.] The Court concludes that this two-part test, which had existed for at least two decades on the night of Plaintiff’s assault, see Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), was indeed defined ‘with reasonable specificity’ as of 2015, and readily put these defendant officers on notice as to their constitutional duties when exercising custody over a pre-trial detainee experiencing a medical emergency. . . Second, both the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit have recognized a pre-trial arrestee’s right to medical care for injuries or other serious medical needs. . . This, too, supports a finding that the law regarding constitutionally adequate medical care for pre-trial detainees was clearly established in January 2015. Third, a reasonable officer would have understood from this case law that defendants’ conduct on January 22, 2015, as found by the jury, was unlawful. As outlined above, the case law made clear to any reasonable officer that a pre-trial arrestee’s Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care is violated if (1) she is experiencing extreme pain, and (2) the relevant officer(s) actually knew of this fact yet failed to take appropriate action. In response to the special interrogatory, the jury found that both of those requirements were present on the night of Plaintiff’s assault: Plaintiff had complained of extreme pain while she was custody, and each individual officer was subjectively aware of that pain yet did not act until they brought her to Central Booking early the next morning. The jury further found that none of the four defendants ‘reasonably believe[d]’ that the Plaintiff was not in extreme pain while she was in their custody. The Court concludes that the jury’s findings of fact are readily supported by the trial record. . . . In sum, the Court concludes from the foregoing analysis that, as of January 22, 2015, the law around deliberate indifference in the pre-trial context was ‘defined with reasonable clarity’ in light of the fact that ‘the Second Circuit ha[d repeatedly] recognized the right,’ and that ‘a reasonable defendant would have understood from the existing law’ that the defendant officers’ conduct was unlawful. . . Plaintiff’s constitutional right to adequate medical care as an arrestee, which defendants violated, was therefore clearly established on the day of her assault.”)

Thomas v. Mason, No. 1:17-CV-626 (DJS), 2023 WL 2709730, at *10–11 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 2023) (“The Court of Appeals wrote a comprehensive and compelling decision. It is binding on police officers within the State of New York, and its powerful reasoning should be persuasive for federal courts. At no point is this Court stating its conclusion was in error. Rather, this Court is being called upon to make a vastly different determination; to view the conduct of the police officers at the time prior to the Court of Appeals decision, in light of then clearly established federal law, and consider whether any reasonable police officer could have concluded that the interrogation techniques used did not violate that law. . . . For purposes of a qualified immunity discussion, . . . what is most critical is that ‘neither the Second Circuit nor the Supreme Court has “squarely addressed whether threats to charge third-parties amount to coercion.”’. . . The district court opinions expressing this view do not clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes. . . . [T]his Court has found no controlling case issued prior to September 2008, holding that it was unlawfully coercive to tell a suspect undergoing interrogation that providing truthful information could assist in providing necessary medical treatment to a victim. Significantly, Plaintiff also points to no such case either. . . . The Court has little doubt that the police tactics may have felt coercive to Plaintiff, but the voluntariness inquiry is a purely objective one. . . . Despite the tactics used and the emotional context of this interrogation, the Court concludes that some police officers could very reasonably believe that Defendants conduct did not have the effect of overbearing Plaintiff’s will. Because reasonable police officers could disagree on the point, qualified immunity is appropriate. The Court ends this analysis by recognizing that the state court judge presiding at Plaintiff’s trial found that Plaintiff’s inculpatory ‘statements were voluntarily made.’. . . A unanimous panel of the state’s Appellate Division agreed, finding that the prosecution ‘satisfied their burden of demonstrating beyond a reasonable doubt that his statements were voluntary’ and that ‘[t]he circumstances and atmosphere of the interviews fail to demonstrate involuntariness.’. . . ‘To say the least, when a state court judge upholds the constitutionality of police actions, that alerts us to be particularly careful in concluding that the law was truly clearly established before we permit the officers to be held civilly liable.’. . . ‘If judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’. . . The state court judges who considered Defendants’ actions were split almost equally as to what side of that line the conduct fell. That six state jurists, in the calm of their chambers with time to review the record and hear arguments of attorneys, concluded that Defendants’ actions were not coercive is exceptionally strong evidence, in this Court’s view, that Defendants themselves could have reasonably believed in the moment that their actions were not transgressing Plaintiff’s clearly established rights.”)

McDonald v. City of Troy, No. 1:18-CV-1327, 2021 WL 2232565, at *5–6 (N.D.N.Y. June 3, 2021) (“Contrary to Iler’s hopes, his defense of qualified immunity does not require summary judgment in his favor. After all, the Second Circuit has unambiguously held that the ‘clearly established’ label applies to the use of deadly force to stop a fleeing motorist in the absence of a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others. . . Defendants may nevertheless argue that this language conflicts with the Supreme Court’s demand for specificity in defining what rights are clearly established, but any such conflict is irrelevant in this case. . . The facts of this case simply line up too squarely with the facts in Cowan. Both involve an officer firing on an approaching vehicle within a short window of time. . . Both cases involve an officer trying to verbally stop a would-be escapee from fleeing before opening fire. . . Both cases involve a dispute as to whether the officer was actually in danger when he opened fire. . . In short, the factual underpinnings of this case and Cowan are strong enough that, at the very least for the purposes of summary judgment, the Court is satisfied that Iler is not entitled to qualified immunity on his excessive force claims. . . Iler's motion for summary judgment against plaintiff's § 1983 excessive force claim on the basis of qualified immunity must therefore also be denied.”)

Ismael v. Charles, No. 1:18-CV-3597-GHW, 2020 WL 4003291, at *13 (S.D.N.Y. July 15, 2020) (“[T]o succeed on a failure to intervene claim, a plaintiff must show ‘(1) the officer had a realistic opportunity to intervene and prevent the harm; (2) a reasonable person in the officer’s position would [have] know[n] that the victim’s constitutional rights were being violated; and (3) the officer d[id] not take reasonable steps to intervene.’ . . . Qualified immunity also applies to failure to intervene claims. ‘To overcome the defense of qualified immunity for failure to intercede whe[n] others have engaged in excessive force, a plaintiff must show that the failure to intercede permitted fellow officers to violate an individual’s clearly established rights of which a reasonable officer would have known[.]’ . . . The ‘failure to intercede must’ also ‘be under circumstances making it objectively unreasonable for him to believe that his fellow officers’ conduct did not violate those rights.’ . . . But on summary judgment, a defendant must ‘show that no reasonable trier of fact could find that the defendants’ actions were objectively unreasonable.’ . . . Camacho is not entitled to qualified immunity on Ismael’s failure to intercede claim. There is a question of fact about whether the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable manner when they subdued Camacho in the main intake. For one, Ismael testified that the officers punched him after he was handcuffed and shackled. . . . According to Ismael, Camacho permitted this assault to continue until she exclaimed ‘that’s enough.’ If a jury credited that testimony, it could conclude that Camacho’s failure to intervene was objectively unreasonable. And as discussed, it was clearly established that a use of force against a restrained inmate is unreasonable. There is also a factual dispute about whether Camacho had a reasonable opportunity to intervene. That is unsurprising because ‘[w]hether the officer had a “realistic opportunity” to intervene is normally a question for the jury[.]’ . . . So there are factual disputes that preclude the Court from granting summary judgment on Ismael’s failure to intervene claim against Camacho.”)

Mozzochi v. Borden, 959 F.2d 1174, 1178-79 (2d Cir. 1992) (“The district court framed the qualified immunity question ...as whether ‘a citizen possessed a clearly established constitutional right not to have his speech regulated because the state actor disagreed with its content’Framed at the proper level of generality and incorporating the facts ... the qualified immunity question is whether, at the time the alleged acts took place, it was clearly established that an individual’s constitutional rights were violated when a criminal prosecution, supported by probable cause, was initiated in an attempt to deter or silence the exercise by the criminal defendant of his right to free speech, but without the effect of actually deterring or silencing the individual.”).

Zarkower v. City of New York, No. 19CV3843ARRRLM, 2020 WL 2572196, at *7, *9 (E.D.N.Y. May 21, 2020) (“I agree with defendants that at the time of Zarkower’s detention, there was no controlling case law addressing the specific circumstance of an arrestee being issued a DAT, then detained for an additional five hours for the sole purpose of being debriefed about unrelated crimes. . . . Plaintiff has cited no such case law because it does not exist. . . . But that does not mean that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for conduct that so flagrantly violates the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable custodial detention. . . This is an obvious case ‘where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’. . By focusing on Riverside’s rule that 48 hours of detention is presumptively reasonable, the defendants lose the forest for the trees. That particular sentence in Riverside exists within a world of Fourth Amendment law where all custodial arrests must be justified by probable cause. Riverside, building on Gerstein, acknowledges that the probable cause determination cannot always happen before an arrest, and in many cases, for logistical reasons, it cannot happen immediately after the arrest either. . . The point of Riverside is that there can be some delay between the arrest and the probable cause determination, as long as that delay is not unreasonable. . . The case before me now does not actually involve a delayed judicial probable cause determination. It involves a circumstance where police formally issued a DAT explicitly stating that there would not be a prompt judicial probable cause hearing, and that instead, the arrestee would be released to return for arraignment at a later date. Riverside authorizes post-arrest detention for the purposes of processing an arrest and arranging a judicial probable cause determination, while taking into account logistical realities that prevent the hearing from happening immediately upon arrest. Riverside does not provide any authority for detaining a person after their arrest has been fully processed and there is a formal decision made to release the person without holding a prompt probable cause hearing. Defendants seem to take the position that because issuing a DAT is discretionary, the fact that Zarkower was issued a DAT five hours before his release is somehow irrelevant. . . But defendants simultaneously acknowledge that ‘[i]n certain circumstances police officers may, but are not required, to issue a DAT to an arrestee rather than hold him in custody until a judge is available.’. . In the hours following a warrantless arrest, police officers are faced with a binary choice of either detaining an arrestee until a judge is available for a probable cause hearing or releasing the arrestee pursuant to a DAT. That decision is to be made within the officer’s discretion. But once the second option is chosen, the detention is no longer justified by Riverside. This case does not involve a question of whether issuing a DAT is discretionary. Zarkower asserts that he was issued a DAT. Once he received the DAT, it was clear that he was not going to be promptly arraigned, and the constitutional reason for the detention evaporated. . . . Some actions are so outrageous and so obviously unconstitutional that reasonable officers are on notice without a case addressing similar facts. . . The fact that there is no Second Circuit precedent addressing detention for purposes of ‘debriefing’ does not absolve police officers from understanding that Riverside authorizes a brief detention for purposes of processing the arrest and arranging a probable cause hearing and nothing more. Nothing in Riverside could be interpreted to authorize detaining someone for the sole purpose of asking questions about crime in the community. . . . This is an obvious case of an unreasonable, unconstitutional seizure.”)

Case v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 9148 (AT), 2019 WL 4747957, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2019) (“To begin, there are no material disputes as to the facts underlying the question of qualified immunity. The parties agree that the congregation of protestors on the morning of November 17, 2011 was sizable, and that the crowd was, at times, at a standstill in the middle of sidewalks and roadways. . . In addition to the large crowds, video footage shows pedestrians and vehicles attempting, unsuccessfully, to access the sidewalks and roadways at certain moments, individuals standing or sitting in the roadway for stretches of minutes, and a sometimes-chaotic atmosphere. . . . Given the totality of the circumstances, the Court cannot say that the Individual Defendants' 'judgment was so flawed that no reasonable officer would have made a similar choice' when deciding whether and how to regulate the public's movements at the protest. . . . The Court, therefore, holds that, 'for qualified immunity purposes, the officers' did not 'invas[e] Plaintiffs' clearly established rights of association, assembly, and free exercise, as they were executing . . . order[s] to disperse—a permissible time, place, and manner restriction on speech in a public area.' . . . The substantial crowd presence at Plaintiffs' arrest locations justified Defendants' asserted need to regulate the demonstrators' movement (or, at times, their refusal to leave). Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the First Amendment time, place, and manner claim against the Individual Defendants is GRANTED.")

McKenzie v. City of New York, No. 17 CIV. 4899 (PAE), 2019 WL 3288267, at *7–8 (S.D.N.Y. July 22, 2019) ("The Court assumes arguendo that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity: although neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has had occasion to squarely so hold, every circuit to consider the question has 'concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space, subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions.' . . . But these circuits have also recognized that such a right may not apply in certain circumstances, for example, 'in particularly dangerous situations, if the recording interferes with the police activity, if it is surreptitious, if it is done by the subject of the police activity, or if the police activity is part of an undercover investigation.' . . . This qualification is important here, because the circumstances presented are not ones in which McKenzie's right to film his ongoing encounter with the police was clearly established. McKenzie was not a bystander witness; he was the subject of the police activity. Furthermore, at the time he asserts a First Amendment right to film, he was in the process of being arrested. As McKenzie concedes, he attempted to grab his phone, which was lying on the center console next to him, only after Twum had ordered McKenzie to exit the vehicle and told him that he was under arrest, . . . and, as noted earlier, McKenzie admits refusing to comply with Twum's order to turn off the motor and exit the car[.] . . . In these circumstances, whether or not McKenzie had a legally protected First Amendment interest in filming before Twum had told him he was under arrest, it was not clearly established, as a matter of law, that he had a constitutional right to commence filming while he was in the course of being arrested (let alone in the course, possibly, of resisting arrest). Qualified immunity 'depends upon whether the right plaintiff asserts is so clearly established that defendants should have known it.' . . . On the undisputed facts, that was not so here.")

Horn v. City of New Haven, No. 3:18-CV-1502 (JAM), 2019 WL 3006540, at *6-7 (D. Conn. July 9, 2019) ("Although the facts of Walker did not happen to involve a ballistics expert or forensic firearms examiner, the Walker decision clearly foreshadowed that Brady applies to any law enforcement member of the prosecution team. Indeed, Stephenson himself was no mere lay witness but was an employee of the Connecticut State Police who was enlisted to generate evidence for use in the prosecution of a robbery and murder. Why should ballistics experts and forensic firearms examiners be free to hide exculpatory evidence from prosecutors while other police officials may not? Stephenson has no answer to this question that makes any sense. The fact that no particular case happens to involve a police firearms examiner is no more significant than the fact that no particular case may involve the violation of someone's constitutional rights on a Tuesday in a Leap Year or by a police officer born in North Dakota. In light of the Second Circuit's decision in Walker, no objectively reasonable police officer in 1999 and 2000 would have concluded that police ballistics experts and forensic firearms examiners are exempt from the Brady disclosure rule. . . . All in all, I cannot agree with Stephenson's argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity for lack of clearly established law that Brady applies to law enforcement officers who are employed as ballistic experts or forensic firearms experts. Accordingly, I will deny Stephenson's claim to qualified immunity at this time.")

Ramos v. Town of East Hartford, No. 3:16-CV-166 (VLB), 2019 WL 2785594, at *9-13, *18 (D. Conn. July 2, 2019) ("Courts in the Second Circuit have found that tasers constitute a 'significant degree of force' and a 'serious intrusion' on the individual's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Although the Court has established that the initial use of the taser was reasonable under the circumstances, it must consider the duration of the taser use. The undisputed evidence shows that Defendant Kaplan deployed the taser for twenty seconds. . . . The parties dispute whether Maldonado was resisting or posing a threat to the Defendants, and the Court finds that the video is inconclusive on this issue. . . . Therefore, the reasonableness of force used by Defendant Kaplan depends on when Maldonado was subdued and no longer a threat to Defendants or to Ramos. Considering the video evidence and the testimony of the parties, the Court cannot pinpoint as a matter of law when Maldonado was no longer resisting the Defendants or posing a threat to their safety, in addition to Ramos's safety. Therefore, Defendant Kaplan's Motion for Summary Judgment on the Estate's excessive force claim for use of a taser is DENIED. . . . It is undisputed that Maldonado was tased in a single interval for a continuous period of twenty seconds. Defendant Kaplan was aware that a taser can be lethal. . . . Defendant Kaplan also knew that the regular taser cycle was five seconds. . . . He was instructed to fire at five-second bursts then assess impact, and he knew it was better to not exceed the five-second interval. . . . Kaplan used the taser for a prolonged period, approximately four times that recommended because he suspected it was not working; however, he did not know for certain whether the taser was working and whether Maldonado received excessive electrical charge. . . . Defendant Kaplan was also instructed to try not to target a person's chest, among other areas, because it could interfere with the heart. . . . When Defendant Kaplan initially began tasing, he was responding to Maldonado's unexpected and rapidly evolving aggression and was in very close quarters. A reasonable officer under those conditions is unlikely to have the time and space to target the taser. However, for at least a portion of the time he used the taser Officer Kaplan did have the opportunity and space to target another part of Maldonado's body. . . . As of the date of this incident, it was clearly established within the Second Circuit that tasing and physically assaulting an individual who was not actively resisting arrest or posing an immediate threat to officers constituted excessive force. . . . Here, there is a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Maldonado was resisting during the entire time the taser was deployed and when Defendant Lis punched him and shoved him towards the holding cell wall. This fact dispute precludes the Court from granting summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.”)

Black Lives Matter v. Town of Clarkstown, No. 17-CV-6592 (NSR), 2018 WL 5997908, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 14, 2018) (“First, as discussed above, Plaintiffs plausibly claim that Defendants violated their First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory surveillance and intimidation at the July rally for their participation in Black Lives Matter. Plaintiffs’ Amended Complaint plausibly alleges that Defendants intentionally subjected them to surveillance based on their participation in Black Lives Matter in violation of their First Amendment rights. Second, it was clearly established at the time of Defendants’ actions in 2015 to 2016 that the government cannot retaliate against individuals for exercising First Amendment free speech and association rights. . . No reasonable official would have thought engaging in surveillance and intimidation solely based on Plaintiffs’ membership in Black Lives Matter was lawful. The Omnibus Crime Act expressly prohibits the electronic surveillance of individuals or groups without reasonable suspicion that those individuals are involved in criminal conduct, 28 C.F.R. § 23.20, and the substantial weight of case law indicates that the government cannot deprive individuals of their freedoms of association or speech. . . There are no also no facts supporting qualified immunity on the face of the Amended Complaint. Accordingly, Defendants Sullivan’s and Cole-Hatchard’s requests for qualified immunity is denied.”)

Gibbs v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:16-CV-635 (JAM), 2018 WL 4119588, at *8-11 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2018) (“The qualified immunity doctrine is doubtlessly most easily applied when one side or the other can cite a prior case with virtually identical facts. But that’s a lot to ask in terms of coincidence. And it’s a shaky proposition as well to presume that police officers devote themselves like fastidious law students to monitoring appellate court opinions for the latest nuances in fact-laden developments of Fourth Amendment law. That is why for qualified immunity purposes there need not necessarily be a case right on point, because ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law even in novel factual circumstances, and there can be the rare obvious case, where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’. . As discussed above, since the Supreme Court’s decision in Tennessee v. Garner, it has been clear that a police officer may not use deadly force against a fleeing suspect unless the officer ‘has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.’. . Moreover, in the qualified immunity context, if the substantive Fourth Amendment standard requires a determination of probable cause, a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity so long as there is even arguable probable cause. . . Although the Garner rule is itself a constitutional sub-rule of the more general rule that a police officer may not use objectively unreasonable force, the Supreme Court has cautioned that—absent a so-called ‘obvious case’—the Garner rule may be too general a guide for whether an officer’s use of force violated clearly established law. . . Fair enough. I will consider in light of the facts of Garner and other cases whether an objectively reasonable police officer would have known as of April 2013 that the Constitution does not permit him to kill a fleeing suspect after the officer sees the suspect lose or abandon his weapon. . . . At the least, the facts and holding of Garner ‘clearly foreshadow’ the application of the Fourth Amendment to this case. . . . This is the . . . kind of obvious case (if I credit plaintiff’s version of the facts). Even though Stukes had previously been armed, Detective Borona knew him no longer to be armed when he advanced up the sidewalk and then shot him for the second time. On plaintiff’s version of the facts, no reasonable officer would have believed the use of deadly force to be necessary. . . . I am not persuaded to the contrary by any of the cases that Detective Borona cites. For one thing, most of the cases he cites issued after the shooting occurred in this case in April 2013. The doctrine of qualified immunity requires a court to evaluate what law was clearly established at the time of the incident in question, not several years later. Detective Borona cites Scott v. Harris, supra, and Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012 (2014), both cases involving police use of force against suspects who led them on Hollywoodstyle high speed car chases that posed a continuing danger to bystanders. Here, by contrast, there was no car chase or anything about Stukes’ unarmed flight on foot that posed a continuing danger to the public. Equally distinguishable is the Supreme Court’s very recent decision in Kisela, 138 S. Ct. at 1152–1154, in which the Supreme Court concluded that an officer who shot and killed a woman with a large knife was entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court’s decision turned on evidence that the woman refused to drop the knife despite repeated commands to do so, such that the officer who shot her reasonably believed she would use the knife on another person standing six feet away. . . . The evident difference between this case and Kisela is that the suspect in Kisela continued to be armed when the police decided to shoot her. . . . In short, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiff, I conclude that they do not allow for the grant of qualified immunity at this time. If Detective Borona knew that Stukes was unarmed and did not have other arguable probable cause to believe that Stukes posed an imminent danger to others, then the use of deadly force on Stukes violated clearly established law, and no objectively reasonable police officer would have resorted to the use of deadly force to kill Stukes as he was running away.”)

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *17–18 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) (“The Supreme Court has never overruled Hope, but its retreat from that decision is palpable. . . . Two years after Hope was decided, the Supreme Court characterized that case as standing for the narrow proposition that the absence of federal appellate authority supporting a claim is not fatal in cases where the constitutional violation is ‘obvious.’. . . And despite the wave of Supreme Court cases addressing (and granting) qualified immunity in recent years, no Supreme Court majority has cited Hope in the qualified immunity context for approximately four years, see Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861, 1866 (2014), and none has cited its ‘novel circumstances’ holding in almost nine years, see Safford Unified Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 377–78 (2009). In this action, Plaintiff argues that Brooks and Obe are not entitled to qualified immunity because, generally speaking, government officials should know that viewpoint discrimination is unlawful in any forum. . . . But the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed lower courts ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’. . . The Second Circuit has followed suit. . . . Here, neither the parties nor the Court has ‘identified any binding authority in existence at the relevant time that ... “directly address[ed]” the reasonableness of the challenged conduct,’. . . particularly in the context of First Amendment claims concerning the government’s use of social media. Nor have decisions from other circuits ‘clearly foreshadow[ed] a particular ruling on the issue.’ . . . After careful consideration, the Court concludes that it must grant qualified immunity to Brooks and Obe on the individual-capacity claims against them.”)

Thompson v. Clark, No. 14-CV-7349, 2018 WL 3128975, at *2, *6-8, *11-13 (E.D.N.Y. June 26, 2018) (as amended) (“Qualified immunity is denied. Its grant, in the instant case, would be inconsistent with the purpose of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . The courts, police, and public, will benefit from a clarifying jury decision in this often replicated situation. . . . Qualified immunity has recently come under attack as over-protective of police and at odds with the original purpose of section 1983: ‘to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.’ . . . The Court’s expansion of immunity, specifically in excessive force cases, is particularly troubling. . . . The legal precedent and policy justifications of qualified immunity, it has been charged, fail to validate its expansive scope. The law, it is suggested, must return to a state where some effective remedy is available for serious infringement of constitutional rights. . . . The failure to address whether or not an act was constitutional prevents the creation of ‘clearly established’ law needed to guide law enforcement and courts on narrow issues not yet decided by the Supreme Court. . . . Although the Court is no longer constrained by a common law good faith defense, it continues to rely on the common law as precedent for granting immunity. . . . The Supreme Court’s recent emphasis on shielding public officials and federal and local law enforcement means many individuals who suffer a constitutional deprivation will have no redress; state governments are protected by sovereign immunity and municipalities are not liable under Monell unless individual liability can be first proven. . . . Courts should, when reasonable, follow Saucier’s guidance to first analyze whether a constitutional violation occurred, instead of skipping to whether the right at issue was ‘clearly established.’ . . . Turning to the application of qualified immunity, courts should, it has been suggested, return to the standard expressed in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), and define ‘clearly established law’ at a ‘high level of generality.’ The key inquiry being whether officers are on ‘notice their conduct is lawful.’ . . . This allows courts to recognize ‘obvious’ constitutional violations, even if not yet specifically outlawed in a prior Supreme Court ruling. Such a standard is vital in a rapidly changing society, where any willing judge or jurist may distinguish precedent as not ‘clearly established’ because of slightly differing facts. . . . If courts, as instructed in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), decline to address constitutional issues by looking first to qualified immunity, and are instructed to rely on ‘existing precedent ... [established] beyond debate,’ government officials and officers may continue to operate in clear violation of constitutional standards without advise of what is constitutional and without fear of redress, because the law will continue to protect ‘all but the plainly incompetent.’ . . . The court declines to apply qualified immunity. Case precedent and policy rationale fail to justify an expansive regime of immunity that would prevent plaintiff from proving a serious constitutional violation.”) established. See Estate of Clark v. Walker, No. 16-3560, 2017 WL 3165632, at *6 (7th Cir. July 26, 2017) (in the Seventh Circuit, the right to treatment of a serious medical need, including risk of suicide, is clearly established); Campos v. Cty. of Kern, No. 14 Civ. 1099 (DAD) (JLT), 2017 WL 915294, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 7, 2017) (“the law regarding the Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care,” including right “to be protected from the known risks of suicide in jail,” was “clearly established” in the Ninth Circuit by “the time of decedent’s suicide, August 2013”).”)

McEvoy v. Matthews, No. 3:16-CV-922 (JAM), 2017 WL 3597473, at *4-5 (D. Conn. Aug. 21, 2017) (“It does not look like the Second Circuit has addressed the application of the community-caretaking or emergency-aid exceptions on facts similar to this case. The First Circuit, however, has applied qualified immunity on highly similar facts, concluding that the community-caretaking exception arguably allowed the police to enter a person’s home on the report of a neighbor who called the police to say that the door to the home was standing wide open. See MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2014). The First Circuit surveyed conflicting precedent about the application of the community-caretaking exception in this context, and concluded that ‘[t]he short of it is that neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff’s home was illegal.’. . . That is equally true here. Plaintiff argues that the community caretaking exception applies only to the police’s search and seizure of automobiles and does not apply to searches by the police inside the home. Maybe plaintiff is right, but the federal courts of appeals are deeply divided on the question. See Sutterfield, 751 F.3d at 556 (collecting cases). And the Second Circuit has yet to take sides. . . . Accordingly, the law was not clearly established as of the time of the officers’ actions in this case that the community caretaking function could not apply to an entry into plaintiff’s home. Just ‘the fact that the courts are divided . . . demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established.’ Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868 (2017). So even if plaintiff is right on the merits about the limits of the community caretaking exception, this would not overcome the officers’ qualified immunity in the absence of clearly established law in plaintiff’s favor. . . . In the event of appellate review of this ruling, it will of course be for the Second Circuit to decide if it wishes in its discretion to offer guidance for the police and citizens alike in this important area of the law.”)

Gerskovich v. Iocco, No. 15 CIV. 7280 (RMB), 2017 WL 3236445, at *8–9 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2017) (“Assuming it were appropriate for the Court to decide the qualified immunity issue at this point (which it is not), the Court would likely conclude, first, that ‘under the First Amendment’s right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas’ and, second, that Captain Iocco and Chief Anger did not have immunity to arrest Plaintiff for exercising that right because the right was ‘clearly established.’ Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *5. The First, Third, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have found that the First Amendment protects the right to record police activity. [collecting cases] In analyzing the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would point out that not all of the Circuits have found that the constitutional right to photograph police activity was ‘clearly established’ at the time of their decisions. Compare Glik, 655 F.3d at 85 (“[T]he right violated by [police officers] was clearly established in this circuit at the time of [the plaintiff’s] arrest [on October 1, 2007].”), with Fields, 2017 WL 2884391, at *6 (“[O]ur case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2012 and 2013].”), and Turner, 848 F.3d at 687 (“Although the right was not clearly established at the time [i.e. September 2015],” “the right is clearly established henceforth.”). . . Qualified immunity, as noted, depends upon ‘whether the right plaintiff asserts is so clearly established [or foreshadowed] that defendants should have known it.’ . . And, while the Second Circuit Court of Appeals has not spoken definitively on this subject, the ‘[d]ecisions of other circuits also may indicate whether the law was clearly established’ by ‘clearly foreshadow[ing] a particular ruling on the issue.’ . . If this Court were resolving the issue of qualified immunity, the Court would likely conclude that decisions from other Circuits clearly foreshadowed a finding here that ‘the First Amendment right to film was ... clearly established at the time of the arrest.’ . . Plaintiff’s alleged conduct in this case was very similar to that of the plaintiffs in Glik, Smith, and Fordyce, and those decisions, in this Court’s view, clearly foreshadow a ruling here that citizens have a right to film police activity and that police officers are not entitled to qualified immunity if they retaliate against a citizen who exercises that right. . . Tellingly, perhaps, the NYPD has trained its officers since the 1970s to understand that citizens may record (photograph) police activity.”)

Soto v. City of N.Y., No. 13 CV 8474-LTS-JLC, 2017 WL 892338, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 6, 2017) (“The scope of the First Amendment right to record police activity is the subject of considerable debate. See Rivera v. Foley, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) (surveying cases and the active split among the Courts of Appeals over this question). To find that officers are entitled to qualified immunity, however, the Court need not resolve that debate: its existence is enough to demonstrate that there was not clearly established law establishing a right to photograph police activity at the time of Plaintiff’s arrest. . . The lack of clearly established law entitles Defendants to summary judgment on Plaintiff’s retaliation claim on the basis of qualified immunity.”)

Charles v. City of New York, No. 12CV6180SLTSMG, 2017 WL 530460, at *21-25 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 8, 2017) (“Even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, the Court may nonetheless find that the right is clearly established ‘if decisions from this or other circuits “clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue.”’ . . Several other circuit courts have either held or implied that a right to film police activity exists, at least under some circumstances. [discussing cases from 1st, 7th, 9th, and 11th Circuits] At least two other circuit court cases have held that the right to record police activity in public places is not clearly established. [discussing cases from 3d and 4th Circuits] At least three district courts in this Circuit have held that the right to record police activity is not clearly established. [discussing Mesa, Rivera, Basinski] At least one district court in this Circuit, however, has found that the First Amendment right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space is clearly established. [discussing Higginbotham] In light of the foregoing cases, the Court concludes that issues of material fact prevent the Court from determining whether Plaintiff had a right to record the police stop under the circumstances of this case. First, the Court agrees with Higginbotham that an argument could be made that a right to videotape police activity in public places was clearly established as of June 5, 2012. As Higginbotham correctly notes, Szymborski and Kelly do not hold that such a right does not exist, but only that the right was not clearly established in the Fourth Circuit as of sometime prior to 2009 and in the Third Circuit as of late May 2007. In contrast, Fordyce, Smith, Glik, and Alvarez all either imply or hold that such a right exists, and Glik and Alvarez were both decided less than a year before the incident at issue. Accordingly, even though neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had explicitly held that there is a right to videotape or film police activity, one could argue that the ‘decisions from ... other circuits “clearly foreshadow [ed]” a ruling that such a right existed under certain circumstances. . . None of those decisions, however, suggest that the right to film police activity is without limitation. To the contrary, three of the four circuit opinions discussed above and cited in Higginbotham expressly note that the right to film police activity is not absolute, but subject to reasonable time, place and manner limitations. . . . In this case, there is a substantial factual issue regarding whether Plaintiff’s filming was interfering with police activity. . . . Since there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Plaintiff was interfering in police activity, the Court cannot determine at this juncture whether Plaintiff had a clearly established right to film. However, even if this Court were to find that Plaintiff’s videotaping interfered with police activity, that finding would not result in dismissal of Plaintiff’s First Amendment retaliation claim on qualified immunity grounds. Plaintiff’s First Amendment claim is not based solely on the theory that Defendants retaliated against Plaintiff for exercising her right to videotape police activity. Plaintiff also claims that the arrest was retaliation for Plaintiff’s ‘request to file a complaint against Officer Benites’ and ‘her speech about the stop-and-frisk she witnessed and the NYPD’s stop-and-frisk practices generally.’”)

Adkins v. City of New York, 143 F.Supp.3d 134, 140-41 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (“[T]he Court concludes that transgender people are a quasi-suspect class. Accordingly, the Court must apply intermediate scrutiny to defendants’ treatment of plaintiff. To state a claim on this basis, plaintiff’s complaint must adequately allege that his removal from the general cell and handcuffing were not ‘substantially related to an important government interest.’ . . On its face, the complaint does so. . . . Although plaintiff’s complaint therefore states a claim that his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated, the claim must still be dismissed if defendants can successfully plead the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff’s rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment were not clearly established at the time of his arrest on October 1, 2011. Windsor v. United States, 699 F.3d 169 (2d Cir.2012), was not decided until October 18, 2012, and the Second Circuit had not previously ruled on what protections are accorded lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender people under the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendments. Accordingly, defendants could not be expected to know that their actions would be subject to any standard more stringent than rational basis review. . . . While the Court does not reach the question of whether defendants’ actions would survive rational basis review on the merits, it does hold that it would have been objectively reasonable for defendants to conclude as much and that qualified immunity therefore attaches. . . . Particularly because many transgender detainees have alleged that they have been held with individuals who posed a risk to their safety, . . . it was reasonable for defendants to conclude that it would not be arbitrary or irrational to hold plaintiff separately. . . Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to immunity, and all claims against them must be dismissed.”)

Gonzalez v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 7721 LGS, 2015 WL 6873451, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 9, 2015) (“In July 2012, when Plaintiff was arrested, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit had directly addressed the constitutionality of recording officers engaged in official conduct. . . As of July 2012, the First, Seventh, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had concluded that the right exists, but the Third and Fourth Circuits had determined that the right was not clearly established. . . In particular, the Third Circuit stated that the First Amendment right to record matters of public concern is far from absolute and does not clearly establish the right to videotape police officers during a traffic stop. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248, 262–63 (3d Cir.2010). . . For these reasons, in July 2012, there was no clearly established right in this Circuit to videotape police officers. See Ortiz v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 7919, 2013 WL 5339156, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2013) (finding defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right to record police officers performing their official duties); Mesa, 2013 WL 31002 at *24–25 (same). But see Higginbotham v. City of New York, — F.Supp.3d —, 2015 WL 2212242, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. May 12, 2015) (concluding that “the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact ‘clearly established’ ”). Accordingly, Officer Medina is entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claim against him.”)

Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 378-81 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (“Pluma [see infra in outline] may be distinguishable on the basis that the plaintiff in that case, although he called himself a ‘citizen journalist,’ did not allege that he ever intended to disseminate his videos: the complaint merely alleged that he went to Zuccotti Park ‘with hopeful reflection upon the efforts of Occupy Wall Street.’ . . To the extent Pluma is not distinguishable, however, the Court declines to follow it. While videotaping an event is not itself expressive activity, it is an essential step towards an expressive activity, at least when performed by a professional journalist who intends, at the time of recording, to disseminate the product of his work. . . The defendants also raise the issue whether, more narrowly, a right to record police activity exists, a question that neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided. All of the circuit courts that have, however, have concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record police officers performing their duties in a public space, subject to reasonable time, place and manner restrictions. [collecting cases] The Court agrees with those cases. If one accepts that photographing and filming receive First Amendment protection as a general matter (at least when they are ‘expressive’), it is difficult to see why that protection should disappear simply because their subject is public police activity. . . . On the other side of the ledger lies the government interest in preventing interference with legitimate police activity. But that interest does not override all others. . . . In any event, the right recognized here and by other courts does not apply when the recording would impede police officers in the performance of their duties. The defendants further assert that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the right to record the police is ‘insufficiently defined.’ . . The Court concludes, however, that the right to record police activity in public, at least in the case of a journalist who is otherwise unconnected to the events recorded, was in fact ‘clearly established’ at the time of the events alleged in the complaint. When neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has decided an issue, a court ‘may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from ... other circuits “clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue.”’ Terebesi v. Torres, 764 F.3d 217, 231 (2d Cir.2014) (quoting Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010)); see also Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011) (requiring, in the absence of controlling authority, ‘a robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority”’ (quoting Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999))). By November 2011, the First, Ninth and Eleventh Circuits had all concluded that the right exists. So had a number of district courts. [collecting cases] The Court is unaware of any decision holding that the recording of police activity by a journalist otherwise unconnected to the events recorded is categorically not protected (rather than holding merely that the right to record was not ‘clearly established’). At the time of Higginbotham’s arrest, there was thus a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ in favor of the right that ‘clearly foreshadowed’ an analogous ruling by the Second Circuit or the Supreme Court. . . In so concluding, the Court parts ways with Mesa v. City of New York, No. 09 Civ. 10464(JPO), 2013 WL 31002 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). That case cited Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir.2010), and Szymborski v. Houck, 353 F. App’x 852 (4th Cir.2009), as evidence of a circuit split on the existence of the right to record, and accordingly concluded that the right was not ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes. . . In this Court’s reading, however, Kelly and Szymborski did not decide whether the right existed: they merely held that, even if it did exist, it was not clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity in those cases’ factual contexts. . . They are thus not relevant to the question whether there is a consensus on the existence of a journalist’s right to record events in which he is otherwise a nonparticipant. In both cases, the plaintiff was affiliated with and in close proximity to the person being stopped or arrested by the police: in Kelly, the plaintiff was the passenger of the person stopped, and in Szymborski, the plaintiff was the wife of the arrestee. . . By contrast, Higginbotham had no relation to the arrestees he was filming, and was at a remove from the arrest. In addition, both cases involved particularly dangerous situations: in Kelly, a traffic stop, which the Kelly court itself recognized as an ‘inherently dangerous situation,’ . . . and in Szymborski, an armed arrestee who defied a police order. Finally, in Kelly, the plaintiff was videotaping the police surreptitiously, whereas Higginbotham’s filming was overt. Certainly, the right to record police activity in a public space is not without limits, and some uncertainty may exist on its outer bounds. For instance, it may not apply in particularly dangerous situations, if the recording interferes with the police activity, if it is surreptitious, if it is done by the subject of the police activity, or if the police activity is part of an undercover investigation. As alleged, however, Higginbotham’s conduct falls comfortably within the zone protected by the First Amendment. The complaint alleges that he was a professional journalist present to record a public demonstration for broadcast and not a participant in the events leading up to the arrest he was filming. There is nothing in the complaint suggesting that his filming interfered with the arrest. Accordingly, and in light of the case law consensus described above, a reasonable police officer would have been on notice that retaliating against a non-participant, professional journalist for filming an arrest under the circumstances alleged would violate the First Amendment.”)

Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 103 F.Supp.3d 465, 511, 514 (S.D.N.Y. 2015), reconsidered in part in Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 133 F.Supp.3d 563 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (“The QAD and IAB speech, in light of Matthews, is not part-and-parcel of Schoolcraft’s role and is therefore protected. Schoolcraft complained of ‘corruption involving the integrity control program’ in the 81st Precinct, mainly attributable to DI Mauriello, resulting ‘in violation of people’s civil rights.’ . . This is virtually identical to Matthews’s speech about his own precinct, when Matthews stated that his own supervisors’ policies were resulting in ‘unjustified stops, arrests, and summonses because police officers felt forced to abandon their discretion in order to meet their numbers and [were] having an adverse effect on the precinct’s relationship with the community.’ . . Moreover, Schoolcraft reported this activity outside the chain of command, and separate from his appeal process. These circumstances distinguish Schoolcraft’s speech from that in Weintraub and warrant the conclusion that his IAB and QAD reports constituted protectable speech outside of official duties under Matthews IV. . . .As discussed above, and particularly in light of this Court’s contrary September 2012 Opinion, Schoolcraft’s protected First Amendment right to report to IAB and QAD was not clearly established at the time it was made. Consequently, the First Amendment Claim cannot be pleaded against any officers in their individual capacities.”)

Greenaway v. Cty. of Nassau, 97 F. Supp. 3d 225, 240-41 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) (“Here, the Nassau Police Officers’ conduct constituted false imprisonment and excessive force, and thus violated a federal right, if Greenaway posed no immediate threat to himself, the officers, or any bystander. As discussed in Sections II and IV above, there are significant factual disputes about whether Greenaway was a threat to anyone. In Garcia, 43 F.Supp.3d at 289–95, the Southern District of New York found no qualified immunity on the first prong of the inquiry where the defendant officer tased someone engaged in non-criminal conduct and where a reasonable fact-finder could have found that the tased person was not a danger to others or actively resisting arrest. If the fact-finder had so found, then the tasing would be a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Similarly, the Court here finds that, since a reasonable factfinder could decide that the Nassau police officers’ conduct amounted to a violation of the Fourth Amendment, there is no qualified immunity on the first prong. With respect to the second prong, the Court finds that tasing a non-violent mentally ill person engaged in non-criminal conduct violated a federal right that was clearly established on April 25, 2010. . . Since a reasonable fact-finder could find that Greenaway was not actively resisting arrest, the record here precludes qualified immunity for the Nassau police officers.”)

Rivera v. Foley, No. 3:14-CV-00196 VLB, 2015 WL 1296258, at *9-10 (D. Conn. Mar. 23, 2015) (“We look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation to determine whether the conduct violated a clearly established right.’ . . At the time of the acts alleged in the Complaint, the right to photograph and record police officers who are engaged in an ongoing investigation was not clearly established as a matter of constitutional law in this Circuit. . . Other circuits are split on this issue. The First Circuit, Seventh Circuit, Eleventh Circuit, and Ninth Circuit all recognize that the First Amendment protects the photography and recording of police officers engaged in their official duties. . . The Third Circuit and the Fourth Circuit take the contrary approach. . . However, ‘[w]hen neither the Supreme Court nor this [C]ourt has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.’ . . Moreover, the Court notes that in cases where the right to record police activity has been recognized by our sister circuits, it appears that the protected conduct has typically involved using a handheld device to photograph or videotape at a certain distance from, and without interfering with, the police activity at issue. . . By contrast, here Plaintiff directed a flying object into a police-restricted area, where it proceeded to hover over the site of a major motor vehicle accident and the responding officers within it, effectively trespassing onto an active crime scene. . . Even if recording police activity were a clearly established right in the Second Circuit, Plaintiff’s conduct is beyond the scope of that right as it has been articulated by other circuits. In sum, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiff’s First Amendment claim concerning the right to photograph police activity.”)

[See also Pluma v. City of New York, No. 13 CIV. 2017 LAP, 2015 WL 1623828, at *6-8 & n.4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015) (“Although some Courts of Appeals have held that the First Amendment protects the right to film the police, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has addressed ‘the right to photograph and record the police.’ Mesa v. City of New York, 09 Civ. 10464, 2013 WL 31002, at *25 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 3, 2013). . . It consequently remains unclear whether Plaintiff’s filming was protected by the First Amendment. . . . [T]he present motion does not raise a qualified immunity defense, and as such the lack of clearly established law on this point does not conclude the Court’s analysis. . . . Even granting that Plaintiff engaged in protected activity, however, the Complaint does not allege a causal connection between that activity and the deployment of pepper spray. On its face, the Complaint fails to allege any motivation related to specific protected speech behind the officers’ decision to push the barricade and deploy pepper spray. Rather, Plaintiff’s briefing relied on the Complaint’s subsequent allegations that the NYPD has a practice of applying excessive force against Occupy Wall Street demonstrators as implicitly supplying the alleged motivation. Assuming these allegations raise an inference that the officers were retaliating against Occupy Wall Street speech, Plaintiff still does not allege that he engaged in that particular expressive conduct. The Complaint makes clear that the commotion began near Plaintiff when he was doing nothing other than ‘peacefully remain[ing] in the park,’ at which point he began to film the police, who shortly thereafter pepper sprayed him and others near him. . . Yet the only allegations about the officers’ motivation for pushing the barricade and deploying pepper spray relates to Occupy Wall Street protest activity, not attempts to film the police. . . Although the Complaint alleges that ‘[t]he police deployed the pepper spray in such a way as to strike those present holding cameras, including the Plaintiff,’ that statement does not suggest that the officers’ were substantially motivated by a desire to retaliate against Plaintiff’s journalistic activities. . . Rather, the only specific allegation of motive is ‘the intention of creating the maximum possible confusion and suffering among the protesters,’ which again focuses only on protest activity in which Plaintiff has not alleged he participated. . . Given that Plaintiff was admittedly ‘a bystander and citizen journalist witnessing the event,’ rather than a protester participating in Occupy Wall Street expressive conduct, the Complaint on its face fails to allege that the police were motivated by Plaintiff’s own protected activity when they caused his injury. . . Accordingly, the Complaint fails to raise a plausible claim for First Amendment retaliation, and that cause of action is dismissed. To the extent Plaintiff moves to amend this claim, his proposed amended complaint does nothing to compensate for the defects in this cause of action; indeed, it does not appear to revise any allegations relating to the officers’ motivation or Plaintiff’s expressive activity. As such, any amendment of this claim would be futile, and Plaintiff is denied leave to amend his First Amendment retaliation cause of action.”)]

Poventud v. City of New York, No. 07 CIV. 3998 DAB, 2015 WL 1062186, at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2015) (“Defendants attempt to avoid a finding that the law was clearly established by defining Plaintiff’s constitutional right to having Defendant Umlauf ‘prepare a DD5 or otherwise document the photo identification procedure involving Francisco Poventud,’ (Defs.’ Mot. Summ. J. 19). Their limited definition of the right is too narrow, and totally unsupported by any case law. Plaintiff’s right to Brady evidence is not tied to how an officer documents eyewitness evidence; it is based on the officer’s obligation to present that evidence and the Government’s disclosure of it to the defense where necessary. That Defendant Umlauf had to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence to the prosecutor, and that disclosure by the prosecutor to the defense was required in time for it to be effectively used at trial was clearly established. . . . In addition to Second Circuit case law, the NYPD and district attorney’s policies and practices demonstrate that Brady obligations related to photo identification procedures and disclosure of exculpatory evidence were clearly established and that reasonable police officers would have known about them.”)

Turczyn ex rel. McGregor v. City of Utica, No. 6:13-CV-1357 GLS/ATB, 2014 WL 6685476, at *4-5 (N.D.N.Y. Nov. 26, 2014) (“Unlike Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales . . . or Neal v. Lee County . . . cases in which police had limited interaction with either the victim or killer prior to the victim’s demise, and upon which defendants rely for dismissal of the claim against Shanley, . . . the allegations here go substantially farther. Turczyn alleges several occasions . . . when Shanley knew of Anderson’s threatening acts and did nothing, which arguably communicated to him prior assurances that there would be no penalty to pay for his conduct. . . . Okin has specifically recognized the liability that may arise under these circumstances. . . . The amended complaint also pleads facts that demonstrate, at this juncture, egregious behavior that shocks the contemporary conscience. As in Okin, the allegations here tend to show that Shanley, who was tasked with accomplishing certain goals related to curbing domestic violence, was deliberately indifferent as to whether or not Anderson would make good on his multiple threats against Turczyn’s life over a twelve-month-period. . . These allegations sufficiently support that Shanley’s affirmative conduct was the product of deliberate indifference that shocks the conscience, and would provide a reasonable jury with a valid basis to so find. . . Finally, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this juncture. Her argument on this issue is two-fold. First, Shanley asserts that no constitutional violation occurred, and, second, she claims that, even if a constitutional violation occurred, the right was not clearly established. . . The first prong of the argument is easily swept aside by reference to the preceding paragraphs that explain that the amended complaint alleges a cognizable substantive due process violation. As for whether or not the right was clearly established, which is a prerequisite to qualified immunity, . . this question has been resolved by the Second Circuit. On the issue, the court has explained that it is ‘clearly established,’ under the state-created danger theory, ‘that police officers are prohibited from affirmatively contributing to the vulnerability of a known victim by engaging in conduct, whether explicit or implicit, that encourages intentional violence against the victim, and as that is the substantive due process violation alleged here, qualified immunity does not apply.’ Okin, 577 F.3d at 434. Accordingly, Shanley is not entitled to qualified immunity at this time.”)

Garcia v. Dutchess Cnty., 43 F.Supp.3d 281, 296-98 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) (“Tracy involved pepper spray; it did not involve a taser. But just as in Tracy, a jury here could reasonably determine on this record that Healy no longer posed a threat to the arresting officers at the time he was repeatedly tased. And as in Tracy, the use of force here was ‘significant,’ ‘somewhere in the middle of the nonlethal-force spectrum’ and ‘on par with pepper spray.’. . It was therefore clearly established law in the Second Circuit as of April 2000 that it was a Fourth Amendment violation to use ‘significant’ force against arrestees who no longer actively resisted arrest or posed a threat to officer safety, regardless of whether that significant force emanated from a pepper spray canister or the trigger of a taser. . . Decisions involving tasers from at least four other federal courts of appeals make pellucid that the contours of the constitutional right at issue here were indeed clearly established by March 2010. [collecting cases] The fact that many of these decisions involve the use of tasers in dart rather than stun mode is not a dispositive difference, given that both methods of deploying a taser constitute ‘significant’ force in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. . . The courts of appeals are in broad agreement that for qualified immunity purposes, ‘it does not matter [if] no case [in a particular] court directly addresses the use of a particular weapon; ... an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.’. . [collecting cases] Defendant Sistarenik seeks refuge in the Second Circuit’s Summary Order in Crowell v. Kirkpatrick, 400 Fed.Appx. 592 (2d Cir.2010), which affirmed a district court’s grant of qualified immunity to officers who used a taser in stun mode against individuals who ‘actively resisted’ arrest for trespass by ‘chain[ing] themselves’ to a barrel drum and repeatedly refusing to unchain themselves despite warnings that they would be tased if they did not leave the property. Crowell provides no safe harbor for Sistarenik. First and foremost, as a Summary Order, Crowell simply has ‘no[] ... precedential effect.’. . Second, because Crowell’s publication post-dated the March 2010 incident at issue here, Sistarenik could not have relied on that decision as a guide to conduct himself. Third, Crowell ‘d[id] not suggest that the use of a taser to effect an arrest is always, or even often, objectively reasonable.’. . Instead, Crowell determined that the totality of the circumstances presented in that case did not amount to a clearly established constitutional violation. Fourth, factual distinctions between Crowell and this case abound. Unlike the Crowell plaintiffs, who continued to resist arrest before being tased, Healy was largely subdued on the floor (or so a jury could reasonably find). And unlike the officers in Crowell who had ‘attempted several alternate means’ of forcing the plaintiffs to unchain themselves before deploying the taser ‘as a last resort,’ Sistarenik used the taser even though the officers had already successfully restrained Healy, again, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff. . . For these reasons, the Court concludes that with regard to the particular circumstances of this case, Crowell has neither persuasive nor precedential value. Construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the record in this case precludes a grant of qualified immunity in Sistarenik's favor.”)

Marchand v. Simonson, 16 F.Supp.3d 97, 117-18 (D. Conn. 2014) (“The Supreme Court has recently stated that ‘federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit. . . of that suspect.’ . . In Stanton, the Supreme Court held that because the law in this area is unsettled, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether they could enter a home while in continuous pursuit of a misdemeanor suspect, and therefore an officer was entitled to qualified immunity from a Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim arising out of such an incident. . . Here, as set out above, although the undisputed facts did not provide actual probable cause for Simonson to arrest plaintiff, they did provide ‘arguable probable cause.’ . As in Stanton, the crimes for which Simonson possessed arguable probable cause, and the crime for which Marchand was arrested, were misdemeanors. As the Court has found that reasonable officers could disagree as to whether Simonson was legally permitted to enter the home or curtilage. . .without a warrant to arrest Marchand for a misdemeanor, Simonson is entitled to qualified immunity and the Court will therefore grant defendants’ Motion on plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment illegal entry claim.”)

Dinler v. City of New York, No. 04 Civ. 7921(RJS)(JCF), 2012 WL 4513352, *11 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2012) (“As stated above with respect to the Fulton Street arrests, the law of individualized probable cause was clearly established well before August 31, 2004. Accordingly, the arresting officers would be entitled to qualified immunity only if they reasonably could have believed that each of the individuals arrested on East 16th Street was involved in unlawful conduct. As noted above, this inquiry turns on the officers’ efforts to release innocent bystanders and to make sure that they arrested only those who participated in the unlawful march. Because there are questions of fact concerning whether the police made sufficient efforts to clear innocent bystanders from East 16th Street before arresting those who remained, the Court must deny Defendants’ motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .Based on the undisputed facts, and particularly the video of the Fulton Street march and arrests, the Court finds that there was not even arguable probable cause to make those arrests. At most, reasonable officers could disagree as to whether some of the marchers were obstructing traffic; however, no reasonably competent officer could have believed that all of the marchers on Fulton Street had violated the law and were properly subject to arrest. As noted above, it was clearly established by 2004 that an officer must have individualized probable cause to arrest an individual and that mere proximity to illegal conduct does not establish probable cause with respect to an individual.”)

Warney v. City of Rochester, 536 F.Supp. 285, 295, 296 (W.D.N.Y. 2008) (“Having determined that Warney did have a right to disclosure of the exculpatory material, the analysis turns upon whether that right is one that was ‘clearly established’ in 2005 or early 2006. In this respect, I believe that Gauger and Harper, which found that the prosecutors were ultimately entitled to qualified immunity based solely on the lack of voluminous case law to ‘clearly establish’ the convicted plaintiff’s due process rights to disclosure, missed the mark by neglecting to examine whether the due process right to prompt post-conviction disclosure of exculpatory evidence is one of which a reasonable prosecutor would have known. . . Based upon the facts alleged in the complaint, I find that plaintiff’s allegations suggest that this is one of the ‘rare cases, where the constitutional violation is patently obvious’ and where ‘widespread compliance with [the] clearly apparent law may have prevented the issue from previously being litigated’ to an appreciable extent. . . Implicit in the prosecutor’s duty to accomplish the ‘dual aim of our criminal justice system[:] ‘that guilt shall not escape or innocence suffer,’ U.S. v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 230 (1975), quoting Berger, 295 U.S. at 88, is an ongoing obligation to disclose to the imprisoned, within a reasonable time, evidence which falls into the prosecutor’s hands which compellingly and forcefully exonerates the prisoner. In short, whether or not he was conversant with the holdings in Harper and Gauger, no reasonable prosecutor in 2005 or early 2006 could have believed that it was constitutionally permissible to withhold or conceal evidence from a convicted citizen, which had substantial power to exonerate him. . . . Again, the prosecutors here do not dispute that at some point after their receipt of the exculpatory evidence, they were constitutionally required to disclose it to Warney. The crux of the parties’ debate is simply whether, under the facts pleaded in the complaint, the ‘clearly established’ duty was one that arose at the time the prosecutors learned of the exculpatory evidence, or at some later time. . . . Thus, the question becomes whether the prosecutors’ disclosure of the exculpatory evidence after the period alleged in the complaint, 72 days at the minimum and potentially several months, comprised reasonably timely disclosure as a matter of law, such that the prosecutors are entitled to qualified immunity . Upon examination of the circumstances as alleged in the complaint, I find that it was not.”)

Saleh v. City of New York, 2007 WL 4437167, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 17, 2007) (“Defendants urge that a reasonable NYPD officer would have no reason to believe that alerting ICE to the presence of illegal aliens constitutes a constitutional violation. By so framing the issue, however, defendants miss the point. This case is not about whether NYPD officers can alert ICE when they encounter illegal aliens, but whether they can retaliate against individuals who file police-misconduct grievances by making referrals to ICE. With respect to such retaliation, the law is clear: ‘[t]he rights to complain to public officials and to seek administrative and judicial relief are protected by the First Amendment.’ . . . When officials take adverse action against those who exercise this right, they can be held liable for a constitutional violation. . . . A defendant’s ability to justify the purported adverse action on non-retaliatory grounds is irrelevant because ‘A[a]n act in retaliation for the exercise of a constitutional right is actionable under section 1983 even if the act, when taken for different reasons, would have been proper.’” . . . Accordingly, it may be sound practice for NYPD officers to alert ICE when they encounter unlawful aliens under normal circumstances, but when they do so for retaliatory purposes, they run afoul of the Constitution. . . . In light of this firmly established law, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that reporting Saleh to ICE in retaliation for filing a CCRB complaint violated the First Amendment to the Constitution. Accordingly, the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Garcia v. Brown, 442 F.Supp.2d 132, 144, 145 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (“After Dwares, the law in this Circuit clearly provides that police officers who give express permission to a private citizen to injure another are violating the injured person’s Due Process rights. But not until Pena—which came down a year after the events that are the subject of this lawsuit—was it clearly settled that giving implicit permission for a private civil rights violation qualified as unconstitutional. Indeed, the Second Circuit dismissed the case against the defendants in Pena on qualified immunity grounds. The question, then, is whether the facts of this case are closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. If the former, the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged wrongdoing; if the latter, it was not. I conclude that the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena. . . . Because the facts of this case are far closer to those of Dwares than of Pena, I conclude that Officer Brown does not qualify for qualified immunity under the second prong of Harlow.”), aff’d, 2008 WL 681340 (2d Cir. Mar. 11, 2008).

Shapiro v. City of Glen Cove, No. CV 03-0280(WDW), 2005 WL 1076292, at *26 (E.D.N.Y. May 5, 2005) (not reported) (“The ‘appropriate inquiry is, therefore, how closely analogous’ the defendants’ allowing media to enter and remain in the building is to actions by police that had been held unconstitutional at the time the events took place, that is, in January 2000. . . Here, the unconstitutionality of the defendants’ alleged acts was not apparent, because the relevant cases—Wilson and Ayeni—did not set forth with the requisite specificity the right to be free from media presence during a search of a building at which the claimant had only a diminished expectation of privacy and where the claimant was not present during the media intrusion. Both Wilson and Ayeni emphasized the violation of the plaintiffs in their homes, and, while Lauro held that the holdings of the earlier cases were not limited to the home, Lauro was decided after January 18, 2000 and cannot be considered in the inquiry into whether the law that they enunciate was ‘well-established.’ Thus, reasonable police officers could have construed Wilson and Ayeni as being applicable only to media presence in a home. Moreover, Wilson, Hanlon and Ayeni involved situations in which the government actors had expressly invited or arranged for the media to be present, which is not the case here. Further, in those cases the plaintiffs were themselves present at the site and personally subjected to the media intrusion, with the plaintiffs in Wilson and Ayeni . . . appearing in the photographs or video footage that the media took. The relevant cases are, in short, insufficiently analogous to the facts of this case to allow the court to find that ‘a reasonable police officer should clearly have been able to discern’ that allowing the media to enter 19 Eastway Drive and record the events ‘infringed merely different aspects of the same previously defined constitutional right’ enunciated in the earlier cases. . . Finally, even if the right that Shapiro alleges was violated was well-established in January 2000, we cannot say that the defendants were unreasonable for failing to reach that conclusion at the time, and they are entitled to qualified immunity on the media ride-along claim.”).

Young v. Goord, No. 01 CV 0626(JG), 2005 WL 562756, at *8 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 10, 2005)(not reported) (“Assuming arguendo a clearly established right not only to have prison officials react promptly to new legislation in new cases, but also to apply that legislation to pending proceedings that are based on pre-legislation events, the question then would be how fast must the reaction be? As Young's counsel put it at oral argument: 'The question is how quickly after the statute did they have to react to it.' . . . Given the undisputed facts alleged by Young—the statute became effective on September 22, 2000; 25 days later, Annucci instructed all superintendents about the law and directed them to comply; and by the following day all of the sanctions against Young were lifted—there are no set of facts on which Young could be entitled to relief. DOCS's response to RLUIPA was admirably swift. No one could reasonably suggest that the defendants' belief that they acted quickly enough to satisfy the Constitution was either incorrect or objectively unreasonable.'").

Garcia v. Scoppetta, 289 F.Supp.2d 343, 353 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) ("The individual defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. Even accepting the allegations of plaintiff's complaint as true, she fails to state a claim of violation of clearly established law. The law of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit does not conclusively support the existence of the right in question. Its decision in Nicholson v. Scoppetta certifying key issues to the New York Court of Appeals indicates that critical areas of the law in this field are not yet established. Although the Nicholson opinion focuses on the uncertainty surrounding the law on removals, it is also relevant to prosecutions for neglect. One of the questions the Court certified to the New York Court of Appeals concerns the definition of a 'neglected child' under the New York Family Court Act and whether it includes instances in which the sole allegation of neglect is allowing the child to witness domestic violence. Such a determination is relevant to whether defendants may prosecute mothers for neglect on this basis alone. In the absence of clearly established law on what constitutes a neglected child, defendants can not reasonably have been expected to know whether or not the initiation of neglect proceedings against plaintiff violated her rights. They are entitled to qualified immunity.'").

Brooks v. Berg, 270 F. Supp.2d 302, 311, 312 (N.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[T]he Second Circuit has held that defendants who act pursuant to a facially invalid policy are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As noted above, Section 1.31 of the DOCS Health Services Policy Manual provides for the continued treatment of inmates who were diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. The policy's silence regarding the treatment of transsexual inmates who were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration is apparently read by prison officials to indicate that DOCS will not provide any treatment to these inmates. While Defendants rely heavily on this policy as justification for their actions, they do not explain the puzzling distinction that the policy makes between those inmates who were diagnosed before incarceration and those who were diagnosed after being incarcerated. Surely inmates with diabetes, schizophrenia, or any other serious medical need are not denied treatment simply because their conditions were not diagnosed prior to incarceration. . . . This blanket denial of medical treatment is contrary to a decided body of case law. Prisons must provide inmates with serious medical needs some treatment based on sound medical judgment. There is no exception to this rule for serious medical needs that are first diagnosed in prison. Prison officials are thus obliged to determine whether Plaintiff has a serious medical need and, if so, to provide him with at least some treatment. Prison officials cannot deny transsexual inmates all medical treatment simply by referring to a prison policy which makes a seemingly arbitrary distinction between inmates who were and were not diagnosed with GID prior to incarceration. In light of the numerous cases which hold that prison officials may not deny transsexual inmates all medical attention, especially when this denial is not based on sound medical judgment, the Court finds that Defendants have failed to establish as a matter of law that their actions were objectively reasonable.”), vacated in part by Brooks v. Berg, 289 F.Supp.2d 286 (N.D.N.Y. 2003).

Small v. City of New York, 274 F. Supp.2d 271, 281 (E.D.N.Y. 2003) (“The City and the individual officer defendants argue that qualified immunity protects them from plaintiffs’ substantive due process claim of the right to be free of state created danger because the contours of the state created danger doctrine are not clearly established in this Circuit. That argument is without merit. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided Dwares in 1993. Thus, for at least a decade, officials in this Circuit have been on notice that police action which emboldens private citizens to injure others may give rise to a substantive due process violation.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Williams v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 117 F.4th 503, 508, 514-27 (3d Cir. 2024) (“Our prior precedents and the record before us leave no room for doubt that it has long been clearly established that someone with a known preexisting serious mental illness has a constitutional right not to be held—without penological justification—in prolonged solitary confinement. . . . [T]he Secretary only argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Williams’ right was not clearly established. The Secretary does not dispute that Williams’ Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated. Accordingly, that argument is forfeited. Given the nearly infinite combination of factors that can underlie a given claim, requiring an exact factual match with prior decisions would be tantamount to morphing qualified immunity into absolute immunity because no plaintiff could ever identify a sufficiently identical precedent. We do not, therefore, limit our focus to whether we have previously decided cases with identical facts and circumstances. However, before we can turn to relevant caselaw, we must appropriately ‘frame the right’ that Williams alleges was violated, ‘with all reasonable inferences drawn in’ his favor, as the nonmovant. The Supreme Court has cautioned against framing the right at ‘a high level of generality.’ Instead, we must ‘define the right allegedly violated at the appropriate level of specificity’ to determine ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ This inquiry should consider the specific context of the case, not simply a broad proposition. The District Court appears to have defined the right at issue here as a death row prisoner’s Eighth Amendment right not to be held in solitary confinement. It then determined that pursuant to our prior decision in Porter, Williams’ alleged right had not been clearly established. However, in its analysis, the District Court failed to frame the right with the ‘appropriate level of specificity’ because it ignored the relevance of Williams’ preexisting serious mental illness and the Secretary’s knowledge of it, along with the lack of a penological justification for placing and continuing to hold Williams in solitary confinement. . . . Although the Secretary argues that the record does not support Williams’ assertion that the Secretary knew or should have known about his preexisting serious mental illness, the record does raise a genuine dispute of fact as to the DOC's knowledge that Williams was seriously mentally ill. Where 'issues of fact may preclude a definitive finding on the question of whether the plaintiff's rights have been violated, the court must nonetheless decide whether the right at issue was clearly established.' Therefore, we must decide whether the right of a death row prisoner, with a known preexisting serious mental illness not to be placed and held in prolonged solitary confinement—without penological justification—was clearly established at the relevant time. We hold that it was. . . . Undoubtedly, holding a prisoner with a known preexisting serious mental illness in solitary confinement for a protracted period without penological justification would result in 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.' . . . This violation is so obvious that the Supreme Court and Third Circuit cases gave respondents fair notice that this treatment of Williams was unlawful. . . . We then determined in Clark that qualified immunity did not apply because 'the right of a prisoner known to be seriously mentally ill to not be placed in solitary confinement for an extended period of time by prison officials who were aware of, but disregarded, the risk of lasting harm posed by such conditions,' was well established at the time of the violative conduct. . . . Even though Clark concerned violations that began in January 2016, we recognized that the constitutional right was 'long protected by Eighth Amendment jurisprudence,' including Young, Farmer, and Hope. We determined that Third Circuit and Supreme Court precedent supported our conclusion that Clark's right was clearly established, and found that the defendant had fair notice that he was violating Clark's right in light of our precedents, prison policy, state statute, and a federal lawsuit that survived a motion to dismiss. Here, we rely on much of the same law that we did in Clark and determine that the Secretary had fair notice that Williams's conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment because controlling precedent clearly established the right of a death row prisoner with a known preexisting serious mental illness not to be held in prolonged solitary confinement without penological justification. This conclusion is easily buttressed by the comprehensive 2014 DOJ report, which—relying on Farmer, Hope, Young, and other binding precedent—warned the Secretary that the DOC's practices of knowingly holding seriously mentally ill prisoners in solitary confinement for extended periods of time was cruel and unusual. . . . We have recognized that a variety of sources can be considered when evaluating whether officials received fair warning that their conduct was unlawful. . . . The Supreme Court recognized in Hope v. Pelzer that DOJ reports like this one should not be ignored when determining whether officials had fair notice that they were violating clearly established law. . . . The significance of the 2014 DOJ report simply cannot be ignored. The Secretary was directly informed that under binding precedent, placing someone with a known history of serious mental illness in solitary confinement for a prolonged period of time without penological justification clearly was unlawful. We therefore conclude that the Secretary personally had fair warning by 2014—at the very latest—that Williams's conditions of confinement clearly violated basic principles of Eighth Amendment established by controlling precedent. And that personal notice buttresses our holding that a reasonable person in the Secretary's shoes would have known that it clearly violated basic principles of Eighth Amendment law—established by controlling precedent—to hold a death row prisoner with a known history of serious mental illness in solitary confinement for a prolonged period of time without penological justification. . . . Moreover, we are not willing to accept the argument that one can escape liability by relying upon a policy that s/he knows to be unconstitutional. Given the 2014 DOJ report, the Secretary had to know that any policy requiring an individual with a known preexisting serious mental illness to be confined in solitary without a legitimate penological justification was contrary to law. Accordingly, we hold that individuals with a known history of serious mental illness have a clearly established right not to be subjected to prolonged, indefinite solitary confinement—without penological justification—by an official who was aware of that history and the risks that solitary confinement pose to someone with those health conditions. To hold otherwise would fail in the face of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence. Given this record, the right at issue was clearly established. . . .Lest there be any confusion, we reiterate that we hold ‘that individuals with a known history of serious mental illness have a clearly established right not to be subjected to prolonged, indefinite solitary confinement—without penological justification—by an official who was aware of that history and the risks that solitary confinement pose to someone with those serious health conditions.’ That is nearly identical to the holding in Clark v. Coupe, and it is hardly a novel or surprising proposition. In Clark, we framed the clearly established right at issue as: ‘the right of a prisoner known to be seriously mentally ill to not be placed in solitary confinement for an extended period of time by prison officials who were aware of, but disregarded, the risk of lasting harm posed by such conditions.’ Relying on much of the same binding precedent Clark did, our current holding merely clarifies that the clearly established right in Clark extends to individuals on death row. . . .It should not be a controversial or novel proposition that a personalized report setting forth binding, applicable case law, and detailing how a specific defendant is systematically violating the Eighth Amendment, is highly relevant to a finding that such defendant had ‘fair notice.’ We simply cannot agree with our dissenting colleague’s belief that the defendants should nevertheless be wrapped in the protective cloak of qualified immunity after such ‘fair and clear warning’ of the clearly established law. . . .[A]t the time of Williams’ confinement, the due process rights of an active death-row prisoner had not been clearly established. The Court in Williams I held that individuals on death row who had been granted resentencing hearings had a liberty interest that prohibited the state from housing them in solitary confinement on death row without ‘regular and meaningful review of their continued placement.’ However, we did not reach a conclusion as to whether the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limited the State’s ability to subject prisoners with active death row sentences to prolonged solitary confinement. Similarly, in Porter we did not reach a determination as to whether prisoners with active death row sentences had a procedural due process claim. Given that we have not determined whether an active death-row prisoner has a procedural due process interest in avoiding continued solitary confinement, the DOC is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”) (footnotes omitted)

Williams v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 117 F.4th 503, 556-59 (3d Cir. 2024) (Phipps, J., dissenting in part) (“In denying qualified immunity to the former Secretary of the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, John Wetzel, with respect to death-row inmate Roy Lee Williams’s claim for cruel and unusual punishment brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the Majority Opinion relies on a new rule of constitutional law: death-sentenced inmates with any known history of mental illness cannot be subjected to prolonged solitary confinement. To arrive at the conclusion that such a constitutional right was clearly established between 2014 and 2019, when Williams was in solitary confinement, so as to defeat qualified immunity here, where Secretary Wetzel relies only on the “clearly established” prong in seeking such immunity, the Majority Opinion ignores this Court’s precedent and misapplies foundational principles. For those reasons, elaborated below, I respectfully dissent.”)

Trent v. County of Somerset, No. 22-2891, 2024 WL 4144403, at *5 (3d Cir. Sept. 11, 2024) (not reported) (“Walker argues the District Court defined the right too generally. For our part, we observe that the District Court did not actually define the right at all. The most that can be gleaned from the opinion is that ‘the threat of dismissal, depending on its clarity and credibility, can form the basis for a claim of retaliation in violation of the First Amendment.’ . . . But that is not a definition of a right. A sufficiently specific expression of the right at issue would be: the right of a public employee to be free from retaliatory discharge for making statements to an elected official that were unrelated to the public employee’s job duties and critical of the official’s policies. . . . At the relevant time—in 2019, when Trent was fired—this right was clearly established. In 1968, the Supreme Court held that a teacher could not be fired for writing a letter to the editor critical of the school board’s budget. . . . In 1987, the Supreme Court held that a sheriff’s office could not fire a clerical employee for making a harsh critical remark about the president. . . . In 2014, we held that a school district could not fire an employee for speaking about the superintendent’s corrupt contracting practices. . . . These cases clearly establish the right in question.”)

Trent v. County of Somerset, No. 22-2891, 2024 WL 4144403, at *6 (3d Cir. Sept. 11, 2024) (not reported) (Hardiman, J., dissenting) (“A proper evaluation of qualified immunity requires the trial court to define the constitutional right at issue with sufficient detail that ‘a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . As my colleagues note, ‘the District Court did not actually define the right at all.’ . . . A panel of this Court has the discretion to define the right in the first instance. But where, as here, the District Court failed to apply the correct qualified immunity standard (or any standard), I think it more judicious to vacate and remand. . . . Because we are a ‘court of review, not of first view,’ . . . I would pursue that course here and remand with instructions to the District Court to define the right at issue. Only then can that court determine whether Walker is entitled to qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent.”)

Spahr v. Collins, No. 22-2787, 2024 WL 3738878, at *3-4 (3d Cir. Aug. 9, 2024) (not reported) (“The District Court defined the right here as ‘the right [of parents] to not be coerced to relinquish custody of their [minor] children without due process of law.’ . . . In doing so, the Court recited the right as a ‘broad general proposition’ rather than ‘in light of the specific context of the case’ as we require. . . . Here, Plaintiffs do not assert that child safety agreements themselves violate due process, nor do they identify what specific process they should have received before or after they were presented with the Agreement. . . . Instead, Plaintiffs’ central assertion is that informing a parent that the child will be placed in foster care if the parent does not sign the agreement is coercive and thereby renders the agreement involuntary and in violation of due process. As a result, in the context of this case, the right is best phrased as follows: a parent presented with a child safety agreement has the right to consider the agreement without being told that she faces the possibility that the state will petition a court for an order to place the child in foster care unless she signs the agreement. Contrary to Plaintiffs’ views, our opinion in Croft v. Westmoreland County Child and Youth Services, 103 F.3d 1123 (3d Cir. 1997), does not clearly establish this right. There, we observed that separating a parent and child from the family home ‘during the pendency of child abuse investigations absent any procedural safeguards raises a procedural due process issue.’ . . . We explained, however, that caseworkers may immediately remove a child if they have ‘some reasonable and articulable evidence giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that a child has been abused or is in imminent danger of abuse.’ . . . Although we noted that telling a parent that his child will be placed in foster care if he did not leave the home during the pendency of the child abuse investigation is ‘blatantly coercive,’ . . . that statement is dicta because it was not necessary to the ‘analytical foundations,’ . . . of Croft’s holding that a parent has a viable due process claim when an official removes her child without ‘objectively reasonable suspicion of abuse.’ . . . When such objectively reasonable suspicion of abuse exists, Delaware law gives DSCY officials the authority to remove a child from a home. . . . From a practical perspective, the official must then determine where to place the child. The child safety agreement provides one type of placement, and the foster care system provides the other. . . . Informing a parent of those options, and the legal consequences thereof, is no more legally coercive than informing a criminal defendant offered a plea agreement of the maximum penalty he faces for his crimes absent the agreement. . . . In short, if a child is subject to removal from his home based on objectively reasonable suspicion of abuse or neglect, then informing his parent of the legal consequences of failing to enter a child safety agreement, such as foster care placement, does not constitute illegal coercion. Even if we held that such conduct could constitute illegal coercion, which we do not, to say that it would be constitutionally improper to tell a parent the legal consequences of a decision was not clearly established in this circuit at the time of the events here. Our sister circuit courts have also held that there is no due process violation when a child welfare official tells a parent that a child believed to be in an abusive situation will be removed from the parent’s custody and placed in foster care unless the parent agrees to a plan that places the child with a person of the parent’s choosing pending the completion of the investigation. . . . Given the absence of Supreme Court precedent, a binding statement from our circuit, or consensus of authority from other circuits who have spoken on the topic, we cannot say that the law is clearly established that a child welfare official violates procedural due process when she informs a parent that her child is being removed from the home based upon an objectively reasonable suspicion of abuse and that the state will petition the court for an order to place the child in foster care unless the parent signs a child safety agreement that places the child with a family member or other responsible person. Therefore, the District Court erred in concluding that Collins was not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Spahr v. Collins, No. 22-2787, 2024 WL 3738878, at *5 (3d Cir. Aug. 9, 2024) (not reported) (Phipps, J., concurring in the judgment) (“[E]ven if Spahr’s procedural due process rights were violated – either by the deprivation of the physical custody of her children through coercion or by the absence of a hearing in front of an impartial tribunal to ascertain that she legitimately consented to the loss of physical custody of her children – Spahr’s claim against Collins fails on qualified-immunity grounds. That is so because neither this Court’s precedent nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority affords notice to Collins that her specific actions violated Spahr’s procedural due process rights, and those actions were not obviously unconstitutional. . . . For that reason, I concur in the disposition of this appeal, which concerns only the individual-capacity claims against Collins and does not involve a broader challenge to a lack of process under Delaware law in connection with Child Safety Agreements.”)

Montemuro v. Jim Thorpe Area School Dist., 99 F.4th 639, 642, 645 (3d Cir. 2024) (“A state employee has a constitutionally protected property interest in his job if he can only be terminated for cause. . . . We look to ‘state law and rules’ to determine whether an employee can be fired only for cause, . . . and, in this instance, an answer is there: Pennsylvania law establishes that a school board president can be fired only for cause. . . . Montemuro claims he was not provided due notice or a hearing before the Board elected another president a week after his own election. So, the first qualified immunity prong is satisfied: Montemuro has adequately alleged that the Board violated his property right by removing him from office without a hearing. . . . Three propositions are controlling here: first, employees who can only be removed for cause have a property interest in their employment; second, school board presidents in Pennsylvania can only be dismissed for cause; and third, employees with a property interest in their employment cannot be fired without notice and a hearing. We believe that, under existing precedent, all three were indeed clearly established.”)

Wright-Gotshall v. State of New Jersey, No. 23-1990, 2024 WL 1826421 (3d Cir. Apr. 26, 2024) (not reported), cert. denied, No. 24-230 (U.S. Nov. 4, 2024) (“Courts must frame the right at issue ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . However, the Appellants attempt to frame the rights they assert as ‘straight forward and well established: the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, the right to bodily integrity, the right to privacy, and the right to equal protection under the laws.’ . . . The Appellants’ framing is the type of ‘broad general proposition’ that does not pass muster under the qualified immunity inquiry and is too abstract to provide guidance to reasonable state officials. . . . The District Court articulated the right at issue as ‘the right to be free from government-mandated workplace testing of an infectious disease.’ . . . This articulation appropriately framed the right ‘beyond a high level of generality,’ . . . and characterized the issue to reflect ‘the specific context of the case.’ . . . The Appellants fail to establish that, at the time of the challenged conduct, binding precedent or a meaningful consensus of out-of-circuit authority recognized the right at issue as properly framed by the District Court. The Appellants could have demonstrated that the right was clearly established by citing ‘closely analogous’ case law or by showing that the challenged conduct was ‘so patently violative of the constitutional right that reasonable officials would know without guidance from a court.’ . . . The Appellants cite to some cases to show that the right at issue is clearly established, but none are closely analogous. . . . These cases are distinguishable because, where testing was at issue, it was not for an airborne communicable disease and occurred outside of the context of a global pandemic. Thus, the individual defendants were not ‘on notice that their conduct violate[d] established law.’ . . . We agree with the District Court that the Appellants assert no clearly established right here, so we need not address whether the Appellants plausibly alleged violations of their constitutional rights.”)

Anglemeyer v. Ammons, 92 F.4th 184, 192-93 (3d Cir. 2024) (“Construing the evidence in the light most favorable to each plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that the officer who harmed each plaintiff used objectively unreasonable force. At the time of the officers’ conduct, it was clearly established that it was unlawful for the officers to inflict serious bodily harm on individuals who were plainly unarmed, substantially outnumbered by law enforcement, cooperative, not suspected of wrongdoing, and in their own home.”)

Thomas v. City of Harrisburg, 88 F.4th 275, 283-85 (3d Cir. 2023), as amended (Dec. 6, 2023), cert. denied sub nom Kinsinger v. Thomas, No. 23-1108 (U.S. Oct. 7, 2024) (“The District Court properly recognized the ‘right to medical care for persons in custody of law enforcement.’. The Supreme Court has established such a right, as have we. . . There has not yet, however, been a recognition by this Court of the right to medical care after the ingestion of drugs. That then is the issue that we must determine here: Has such a right been clearly established? The Officers suggest we should articulate the right as follows: whether Mr. Thomas had a constitutional right established ‘beyond debate’ to be taken to a hospital emergency room for treatment when none of the officers witnessed him ingest drugs, he repeatedly denied cocaine ingestion even when warned it could cause his death, his companions denied seeing cocaine, he denied experiencing symptoms consistent with cocaine or fentanyl toxicity, he did not request medical care, showed no overt signs of being in medical distress and was taken directly to the prison booking center where he was assessed medically and cleared by the prison’s medical staff to remain. . . The law, however, does not require such specificity. Although the Officers are correct that the right must be defined beyond a high level of generality, . . . there need not be ‘a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.’. . . Instead, the law requires only that the right ‘is sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’. . . That standard is met when a violation is ‘so obvious’ it becomes likewise evident that a clearly established right is in play, ‘even in the absence of closely analogous precedent.’. . . As a result, qualified immunity is not appropriate when the case in question presents ‘extreme circumstances’ to which ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity.’. . . That is the case before us. We may rely on general principles to find that the facts here present a violation that is ‘so obvious’ ‘that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the [Officers’] conduct... violate[d] federal law when [they] acted.’. . . As applied to the facts of this case, we hold therefore that when an officer is aware of the oral ingestion of narcotics by an arrestee under circumstances suggesting the amount consumed was sufficiently large that it posed a substantial risk to health or a risk of death, that officer must take reasonable steps to render medical care. . . In this case, that care would have been to take the arrestee to a hospital, as provided for in the Harrisburg Police Department policy. . . For the above reasons we will affirm the District Court’s denial the Officers’ claims for qualified immunity.”)

Thomas v. City of Harrisburg, 88 F.4th 275, 285-86 (3d Cir. 2023), as amended (Dec. 6, 2023) cert. denied sub nom Kinsinger v. Thomas, No. 23-1108 (U.S. Oct. 7, 2024) (“The District Court does not directly address whether individuals have a clearly established right to intervention. We agree with the Officers that we have not recognized any such right, nor has the Supreme Court. Though we have recognized a right to have a government actor intervene when the underlying constitutional violation involves excessive force or sexual assault of a person in custody or detention, we have since concluded that our precedent does not establish, let alone clearly establish, a right to intervention in other contexts. . . . Because there is no clearly established right to intervention in the medical context, we need not address the Officers’ contention that Sherelle Thomas has failed to plausibly allege a violation of such a right. . . . Because there is not a clearly established right to intervention to prevent a violation of the right to medical care, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity as to Sherelle Thomas’s failure to intervene claim.”)

Thomas v. City of Harrisburg, 88 F.4th 275, 286-88 (3d Cir. 2023), as amended (Dec. 6, 2023), cert. denied sub nom Kinsinger v. Thomas, No. 23-1108 (U.S. Oct. 7, 2024) (Phipps, J., dissenting in part) (“I do not believe that it is clearly established that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes a duty on law enforcement officers to transport a detained suspect who ingested drugs to a hospital. The Majority Opinion disagrees and holds the transportation-to-a-hospital rule is so obvious that it precludes qualified immunity for the officers who took Thomas to a detention center with medical staff on hand. I respectfully dissent for the reasons below. The lynchpin of the qualified immunity analysis is not so much the first prong – whether a violation of a federal right has occurred – because that rises and falls with the merits of the action. . . . Rather, qualified immunity does most of its work through the second prong – whether the violation of a federal right has been clearly established. . . . The mainline method of proving that a right is clearly established at the second prong relies on the notice provided to government officials from the articulation of the constitutional right in question at an appropriate level of specificity by either binding precedent or a robust consensus of persuasive authority. . . . But here, the Majority Opinion offers no precedent for the proposition that as of December 14, 2019, the Due Process Clause required that officers transport to a hospital a detained suspect who appears to have ingested drugs. . . . Without any caselaw support, the Majority Opinion resorts to the extraordinary-circumstances exception – an argument not raised by Thomas’s Estate. Under the exception, which is available only in ‘exceedingly rare cases,’ a federal right may be clearly established for purposes of the second prong even in the absence of controlling precedent or a robust consensus of persuasive authority if the wrongdoing is ‘so obvious that “every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official’s conduct did violate federal law when the official acted.”’ . . . The Supreme Court has applied the extraordinary circumstances exception very differently than the Majority Opinion now does. [discussing Hope and Taylor] But under the Eighth Amendment standard, which the Majority Opinion applies to the due process claims here, the defendant law enforcement officers did not act with such obvious cruelty. Thomas exhibited no plain symptoms of distress. And he responded coherently to inquiries by other later-arriving officers. The only time he expressed physical discomfort was en route to the booking center, which had on-site medical staff. During that ride, Thomas communicated to the officer that he felt hot and requested the officer to roll down the window despite an outside temperature of forty-six degrees. And after Thomas arrived at the detention center, not even the examining nurse realized the urgency of the situation. Under these circumstances, the response by law enforcement officers – who interacted with Thomas to varying degrees and who are not medical professionals – falls well short of the obvious cruelty alleged in Hope and Taylor. Despite invoking the extraordinary circumstances exception, the Majority Opinion does not attempt to construe defendants’ conduct as obvious cruelty. Instead, it concludes that a due process violation was obvious based on allegations that the Harrisburg Police Department had ‘a policy to take an arrestee to the hospital rather than the booking center if they have consumed illegal narcotics in a way that could jeopardize their health and welfare.’. . The Majority Opinion relies on those allegations about the policy – not to demonstrate obvious cruelty – but rather to show that defendants were on notice that they should have taken Thomas to a hospital, instead of the detention center, which had medical staff on hand. The extraordinary circumstances exception, however, is not such a broad workaround for the second prong: a municipal policy cannot substitute for controlling precedent or a robust consensus of persuasive authority as a means of providing notice that a constitutional right is clearly established. Moreover, any notice provided by the policy was not of constitutional dimension – the policy relayed only the Harrisburg Police Department’s presumptive action plan under the circumstances, and it lacks force of law. Thus, that policy does not set a constitutional standard of conduct for the Harrisburg Police Department, much less for every law enforcement agency operating within this Circuit’s geographical bounds. Such an approach inverts the role of the Constitution as the highest law of the land: constitutional protections should inform police policies; the policy of one police department does not define the constitutional standard of conduct for an entire circuit. For these reasons, I believe that the Majority Opinion errs in holding that it was clearly established as of December 2019 that law enforcement officers must transport to a hospital a detained suspect appearing to have previously ingested illegal drugs. And here, because the allegations do not identify obvious cruelty, the officers should receive qualified immunity.”) Rush v. City of Philadelphia, 78 F.4th 610, 620-22 & n.11 (3d Cir. 2023) (“The District Court defined the constitutional right violated here as the right to be free from unreasonable use of lethal force, specifically where an officer ‘sho[ots] at an unarmed driver attempting to escape at a slow speed who had hit a car,’ and/or ‘us[es] deadly force against an individual driving a car,’ from the side window while the car was moving away from the officer, ‘when the driver did not pose a threat to the safety of the officer (or others).’ . . It then found that this right was clearly established. . . (citing Abraham, 183 F.3d at 279; Eberhardinger v. City of York, 782 F. App’x 180 (3d Cir. 2019); Lamont, 637 F.3d at 185). We agree and will affirm the District Court’s denial of qualified immunity and summary judgment to Officer Nicoletti. . . . This particular constitutional question has been ‘beyond debate’ in this Circuit since 1999. [court discusses Abraham] While too recent to serve as ‘clearly established’ law here, our decision in Jefferson v. Lias underscored the enduring applicability of Abraham where, ‘based on the record, [the district court] was [un]willing to determine that the driver’s conduct while fleeing was so egregious that it posed an immediate risk to the officers and the public’ sufficient to justify lethal force. . . In Jefferson, we left for the jury questions of fact relating to where the defendant officer stood at the time of discharge and the extent he was actually in danger of harm by the driver. . . This was despite that the use of force there followed a high-speed car chase (which sets forth an arguably more threatening situation than the one faced both by Officer Nicoletti and the officer in Abraham). . . Having found the officer's conduct would violate clearly established law under Abraham if proved, we also noted that '[o]ther Courts of Appeals [that] have considered actions where officers have used deadly force against non-dangerous suspects attempting to evade arrest while driving have ruled in parallel.' . . . Unlike here, where Mr. Dennis's car was stopped, the driver's car in Brousseau v. Haugen was indisputably still moving while trying to elude capture when an officer shot him in the back from behind. See 543 U.S. 194, 197, 125 S.Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004).¹¹ [fn. 11: Although otherwise involving fairly similar facts, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the incident in Brousseau occurred before the decision in Abraham, and Abraham therefore could not have 'clearly established' the right asserted, though the interlude suggests that it otherwise might have, if published earlier.] In Plumhoff v. Rickard, officers suspected that the driver of the car had hit a pedestrian and the shooting took place after a high-speed car chase reaching speeds of over 100 miles per hour. . . Finally, City and Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan . . . and Kisela . . . involved individuals brandishing knives, and City of Tahlequah, Okla. v. Bond . . . involved an individual threatening to hit officers with a hammer. These cases fail to present a more analogous factual situation than Abraham itself, and we agree with the District Court that the right at issue here was clearly established thereby for purposes of affirming its denial of qualified immunity.")

Mervilus v. Union County, 73 F.4th 185, 194-96 (3d Cir. 2023) ("[W]e rule that Mervilus's fabrication-of-evidence claim requires persuasive evidence Kaminskas formulated or submitted false evidence willfully, knowingly, or with a reckless disregard for its truth. . . . Having clarified the state of mind necessary to make out a fabrication claim, we now review whether Mervilus submitted enough evidence for a jury to find the standard met. . . . The right at issue is the due process protection against criminal investigators' fabrication of inculpatory evidence against a defendant. Prior to the events in question, that right had long been recognized by the Supreme Court and Courts of Appeal, including this one. [citing cases] Thus, because a jury may find that Kaminskas fabricated the polygraph evidence, we cannot conclude he is immune from suit.")

Mack v. Yost, 63 F.4th 211, 228-33 (3d Cir. 2023) ("For our purposes, . . .we proceed with the understanding that a violation of RFRA occurred, although we reiterate that this conclusion is made solely for the purpose of reviewing the summary judgment ruling now on appeal and is based on viewing in the light most favorable to Mack the record as it now stands. . . . Because the Defendants have failed on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, they are only entitled to summary judgment if they can bear the burden of showing, on the second prong, that reasonable officers could not have known that their actions violated clearly established law. . . . Mack misses the mark when he frames the relevant right as a freedom from 'restrictions on or hindrances to central religious practices' or 'direct or indirect governmental action' that burdens his religious practices. . . That is far too broad and generic a statement. . . Indeed, it is hard to imagine any RFRA violation – which necessarily requires that government 'substantially burden' the exercise of religion. . . that would not involve a 'restriction on' or 'hindrance[] to' religious exercise achieved through either ‘direct or indirect’ government action. But the Defendants also fail to correctly frame the right. Their framing is, in a sense, too narrow, as it ignores the present factual and procedural realities of the case. Taking their cue from our decision in Mack II, they assert that the right at issue is freedom from a ‘hostile work environment’ – one consisting of ‘mostly verbal’ ‘anti-Muslim harassment’ – that ‘indirect[ly]’ causes an inmate to ‘refrain from praying during his prison work assignment.’ . . . Mack II, however, was decided at the pleading stage, based on a liberal construction of Mack’s pro se amended complaint. . . . Our discussion of Mack’s allegations focused on Roberts slapping an ‘I LOVE BACON’ sticker on Mack’s back and later saying to him, ‘there is no good Muslim, except a dead Muslim!’ . . . The record is different now, and so is the procedural posture. We are reviewing the District Court’s ruling at summary judgment, with the benefit of a developed factual record, including, in particular, Mack’s deposition testimony. That testimony, taken at face value, reveals that in addition to the harassment we identified from Mack’s allegations, the Defendants actively and intentionally interfered with Mack’s ability to practice his Muslim faith. . . . In light of that deposition testimony, we conclude that the District Court erred in how it framed the relevant right in its ‘clearly established law’ analysis. The Court largely sided with the Defendants’ view and looked to see whether the unlawfulness of their ‘mostly verbal’ anti-Muslim harassment and hostility was clearly established. . . . But a better characterization of the RFRA violation – one that more appropriately reflects ‘the specific context of the case,’ as viewed in the light most favorable to Mack, . . . is that the Defendants violated Mack’s right to engage in prayer free of substantial, deliberate, repeated, and unjustified disruption by prison officials. That understanding of the right tracks Mack’s portrayal of the harm he experienced, and it takes account of the Defendants’ failure to tie their behavior to any legitimate penological interest, let alone a compelling one as required by RFRA. . . . We are therefore free to, and do, conclude that the relevant right here is the right to pray free of substantial, deliberate, repeated, and unjustified disruption by prison officials. . . . We take a ‘broad view’ of what makes a right clearly established, which can be satisfied ‘even without a precise factual correspondence between the case at issue and a previous case.’ . . . Having considered the cases Mack cites, we cannot say they include ‘factually analogous’ binding precedent, or amount to a ‘robust consensus’ of persuasive authority, that conduct like the Defendants’ was unlawful. . . . Nevertheless, the facts do present a violation of RFRA that appears ‘so obvious,’ even in the absence of closely analogous precedent, ‘that every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the [Defendants’] conduct ... violate[d] federal law when [they] acted.’ . . . We are convinced that it should be clear to any reasonable correctional officer that, in the absence of some legitimate penological interest, he may not seek to prevent an inmate from praying in accordance with his faith.”)

Mack v. Yost, 63 F.4th 211, 237-39 (3d Cir. 2023) (Hardiman, J., dissenting) (“The Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished courts not to define rights too broadly when determining whether law was ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity. In all but the rare case, the Court has also required factually analogous precedent that would render the violation beyond debate. Because those imperatives require us to affirm the judgment of the District Court, I respectfully dissent. . . . I agree with my colleagues on many points. Though a qualified immunity defense is available under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), we should not ‘disturb the District Court’s conclusion that the Defendants unlawfully infringed Mack’s religious liberty.’ . . . I disagree with my colleagues that Defendants and the District Court framed the right too narrowly. The Supreme Court’s demanding standard requires the right to be defined with ‘a high degree of specificity.’ . . . The right articulated in the majority opinion—‘the right to pray free of substantial, deliberate, repeated, and unjustified disruption by prison officials’—is too general. . . . The majority sidesteps the absence of on point caselaw by deeming the RFRA violation ‘so obvious’ that every objectively reasonable officer would know that Defendants’ conduct violated federal law. . . . I agree with my colleagues that the obvious case does not demand factually analogous precedent, but it still requires that the law be ‘sufficiently clear’ such that ‘every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful.’ . . . The majority identifies general RFRA and Free Exercise principles—that an official may not put substantial pressure on an individual to substantially modify his behavior and violate his religious beliefs, that both direct and indirect burdens on religion are prohibited, and so on—as evidence that Defendants violated clearly established law. . . . But the unlawfulness of Defendants’ conduct in this case ‘does not follow immediately’ from these legal propositions. . . . While every reasonable officer would know that purposefully disrupting an inmate’s ability to pray is wrong, he would not know whether the level of disruption here imposed a substantial burden on religion. So this case is not the ‘rare’ obvious one. . . . That Defendants acted out of anti-Muslim animus and ‘actually meant for their actions to be a substantial burden on Mack’s prayers,’ . . . doesn’t show that they violated clearly established law, either. Defendants cannot impose a ‘substantial burden’ under RFRA merely by willing it—‘whether a burden is substantial under RFRA is a question of law. . . . And while an inquiry into a defendant’s subjective state of mind may be appropriate ‘where such state of mind is an essential element of the underlying civil rights claim,’ . . . the RFRA substantial burden inquiry is ‘objective.’ . . . The majority opinion cites not a single case where courts have found RFRA or Free Exercise violations sufficiently ‘obvious’ to overcome qualified immunity. My colleagues claim it ‘would be odd to expect much binding precedent about obvious RFRA violations’ because the Supreme Court only recently recognized a cause of action under RFRA for damages against officials in their individual capacity. . . . But damages ‘have always been available under § 1983 for clearly established violations of the First Amendment.’ . . . And the majority relies on pre-RFRA Free Exercise caselaw to argue that the violation here was clearly established. . . . So while no ‘critical mass of earlier obvious violations’ is required, . . . the absence of any obvious religious exercise violations suggests we should hesitate to find one here. Finally, the majority dismisses the stark differences between this appeal and other ‘obvious’ cases by positing that obvious RFRA violations will ‘involve less viscerally abhorrent conduct’ than infringement of other constitutional rights. . . . But even accepting that proposition, Mack’s case still does not clear the obviousness hurdle. Mack failed to show the ‘extreme circumstances’ or ‘particularly egregious facts’ indicative of the obvious case. . . . That reality does not excuse Defendants’ reprehensible behavior. It means only that, as of 2009, it was not ‘obvious’ that disrupting Mack’s prayers in the prison workplace by making loud noises and jokes substantially burdened his religion. . . . For the reasons stated, I would affirm the District Court’s summary judgment for Defendants on qualified immunity grounds.”)

Clark v. Coupe, 55 F.4th 167, 178-88 (3d Cir. 2022) (“In assessing whether qualified immunity was properly granted, we engage in a two-part analysis: (1) whether the plaintiff sufficiently alleged a right had been violated, and (2) whether that right was clearly established when it was allegedly violated to the extent ‘that it would have been clear to a reasonable person that his conduct was unlawful.’. The District Court dismissed Clark’s conditions of confinement claim based on the second part, finding no clearly established right, without addressing whether he sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation. We will do so now. Clark raised an as-applied challenge, alleging the particular conditions of his confinement violated his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. In defining the right allegedly violated, we assess whether Clark’s allegations show the conditions he endured were cruel and unusual, rather than determine if he succeeded in alleging a broader claim that solitary confinement of a mentally ill inmate violates the Eighth Amendment. . . . [W]e conclude his allegations that he was kept in solitary confinement by prison officials who were deliberately indifferent to the effects of prolonged isolation on his already severely compromised mental health are sufficient to raise a viable Eighth Amendment claim. . . . Having held Clark sufficiently alleged a violation of his Eighth Amendment right due to the conditions of his confinement, we must now determine whether qualified immunity was properly awarded. This entails deciding if the particular right outlined in Clark’s complaint was clearly established at the time of his stint in the SHU. The District Court ruled no established law was violated. We hold now that ruling was premature given the nature of his allegations. Because Clark sufficiently alleges the circumstances of his time spent in solitary confinement violated rights long protected by Eighth Amendment jurisprudence, we will reverse the grant of immunity and remand for further proceedings. . . . To determine whether such ‘fair warning’ existed, we search first for ‘factually analogous’ cases in the Supreme Court, and then turn our inquiry to whether ‘binding opinions from our own Court’ were in existence. . . . If neither source provides relevant caselaw, we consider whether ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Court of Appeals could clearly establish a right for purposes of qualified immunity.’. . . Finally, ‘[w]e may also take into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere.’. . . Before searching for relevant caselaw, however, we must first identify the specific right Clark alleged was violated. Defining the contours of the right is critical to determining whether it was clearly established; we must define the right ‘at the appropriate level of specificity.’. . . We define the right with specificity because only then can we determine whether ‘the violative nature of the [officials’] particular conduct is clearly established.’. . . We turn then to the complaint and the specific facts surrounding the alleged violation. The District Court defined Clark’s alleged right as prohibiting prison officials from ‘housing a mentally ill inmate in solitary confinement for long periods of time.’. . . As so defined, the court held the complaint did not allege a violation of a clearly established Eighth Amendment right and dismissed the claim. But, given the facts averred in Clark’s complaint, we find this characterization of the alleged right insufficiently specific. In defining the alleged right, the circumstances surrounding Clark’s confinement in the SHU matters. The particularities of the prison officials’ alleged conduct in imposing the seven-month stay must be considered when deciding whether qualified immunity was appropriate. . . . Based on the allegations in the complaint, the particular conduct at issue was prison officials keeping Clark in solitary confinement for seven months despite knowing of his serious mental illness. He alleged these DOC defendants had been made aware of the devastating effects of the JTVCC's solitary confinement units and had direct notice that extended stays in the SHU 'exacerbate the symptoms of mental illness for prisoners and result in further deterioration of their mental health.' . . He claimed he was kept in the SHU because the manifestations of his mental illness would be treated as 'prison rule infractions,' which resulted in increased punishment and additional time in the SHU. . . As noted earlier, Clark alleged complaining about his prolonged stay in isolation would result in his being sent to the 'naked room,' an isolation cell where he received only an open smock for clothing. . . His allegations included the assertion that the DOC defendants had the 'authority and ability' to change their practices but deliberately did not do so, choosing instead to intentionally inflict 'extreme emotional and mental distress' on him. . . Viewing these allegations in their totality, we modify the District Court's enunciation of the alleged right to: the right of a prisoner known to be seriously mentally ill to not be placed in solitary confinement for an extended period of time by prison officials who were aware of, but disregarded, the risk of lasting harm posed by such conditions. In determining whether this articulated right was clearly established at the time of Clark's seven-month stay in the SHU, we broaden the scope beyond determining whether 'the very action in question has been held unlawful.' . . The Supreme Court does not require that earlier cases share the same or even similar facts for a right to be deemed clearly established; it is enough that the prior cases are 'factually analogous.' . . Further, we must look at analogous cases with the understanding that this Court takes a 'broad view of what constitutes an established right of which a reasonable person would have known.' . . As a result, state officials can still receive fair warning that their conduct is violative even in 'novel factual circumstances' never previously addressed in caselaw. . . Here, Clark alleged facts that put the officials' conduct squarely in the purview of established Eighth Amendment law. By alleging prison officials imposed solitary confinement for months, knowing the isolation carried a substantial risk of exacerbating his mental illnesses but keeping him there until he suffered serious harm, Clark alleged conduct that no reasonable corrections officer could conclude was constitutionally permissible. . . . We hold Clark's allegations give rise to the reasonable inference that prison officials imposed conditions resulting in the 'gratuitous infliction of suffering.' . . At the time of Clark's stay in the SHU, imposing conditions that cause the 'wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain' had long violated the Eighth Amendment prohibitions against cruel and unusual punishment. . . Clark alleged his pre-existing condition of serious mental illness heightened the impact of solitary confinement, rendering it capable of inflicting severe mental trauma. By claiming the prison officials knowingly imposed such conditions, Clark sufficiently alleged the violation of a clearly established right. . . . In addition to violating the Eighth Amendment, Clark alleges the prison officials violated the Delaware DOC's own policies regarding the imposition of solitary confinement. Clark posits prison officials disregarded the policy by failing to 'consider sufficiently the role mental illness played in ... determining the appropriateness of sanctions or the conditions or duration of the sanctions.' . . By alleging their indifference to prison procedure, Clark inferred the officials knew but ignored the DOC's prohibition against his seven-month stay in segregation. Clearly established law dictated that such internal governing policies are relevant in determining whether the officials received fair warning of a potential constitutional violation. . . Allegations that the officials disregarded prison regulations while inflicting wanton pain provided sufficient grounds for the denial of qualified immunity at the complaint stage. . . Indeed, the DOC policies become all the more relevant in determining whether officials had fair warning that their conduct ‘ran counter’ to the Eighth Amendment given that few cases addressed the constitutionality of solitary confinement for seriously mentally ill prisoners at the time of Clark’s stay in the SHU. . . .The CLASI decision contains additional support for concluding Clark alleged the violation of a clearly established law. In this Court, decisions from district courts are relevant in determining whether prison officials received fair warning that their conduct was violative. . . The district court cases cited in the CLASI opinion provide a robust consensus of decisions specifically addressing the constitutionality of assigning mentally ill prisoners to solitary confinement [.] [collecting cases] In this Court, these cases—cited in a decision ruling against the same Commissioner of the Delaware DOC that Clark named as a defendant for engaging in the same conduct Clark is challenging—are relevant in determining the state of the law. . . Notice of clearly established law also came from Delaware’s own state legislature. Had Clark’s seven-month term in solitary confinement been imposed by a Delaware state court, it would have been illegal. Five years before Clark’s stint in the SHU the Delaware legislature enacted a statute prohibiting courts from imposing a term of solitary confinement longer than three months. . . . This Court has consistently considered relevant state statutes when determining if the grant of qualified immunity is appropriate. . . Here, the defendant prison officials were tasked with implementing the sentences imposed by Delaware state courts. Familiarity with the state’s sentencing structures was therefore an integral part of Commissioner Coupe and Warden Pierce’s responsibilities. The state of Delaware law at the time of Clark’s stay in the SHU provided reasonable prison officials with fair warning that seven months in isolation—which was four months past the limit allowed by sentencing courts in the state of Delaware—was unlawful. While these sources of notice do not, in and of themselves, clearly establish the law, they buttress the Eighth Amendment jurisprudence invoked by Clark’s allegations. Both Supreme Court and this Court’s precedents consider district court cases, prison regulations, and state statutes in determining whether officials received fair warning that their conduct was unreasonable. Here, Clark alleged that the JTVCC’s officials knew his prolonged stint in isolation posed a substantial risk to his mental health but imposed the conditions anyway, despite knowing serious pain resulted and that such pain served no penological purpose. Established Eighth Amendment law prohibited this alleged wanton and gratuitous infliction of pain, and the law in conjunction with other sources of notice warned prison officials that their purported conduct was unlawful. . . Given the specific conduct alleged and the warnings of potential misconduct provided the defendants, we conclude further proceedings are warranted. The District Court’s grant of qualified immunity was premature in light of the possible Eighth Amendment violation. In so holding we are mindful that the allegations in Clark’s complaint may be disproven during discovery, rendering the prison officials’ conduct appropriate. In allowing Clark’s claim to proceed we do not ‘assume that state legislatures and prison officials are insensitive to the requirements of the Constitution or to the perplexing sociological problems of how best to achieve the goals of the penal function in the criminal justice system.’ . . To this end, we recognize it is possible there were exigent circumstances and legitimate penological justifications for Clark’s seven-month stint in solitary confinement that would lead to the conclusion that no clearly established right was violated. . . . Allowing the claim to proceed acknowledges that Clark, by alleging his prolonged stay in solitary confinement was the result of prison officials knowingly disregarding the substantial risk of serious harm posed by the conditions and the foreseeable harm inflicted was in no way penologically justified, alleged the violation of a clearly established right. Accordingly, we will reverse the order of the District Court dismissing this claim and remand for further proceedings.”)

Jefferson v. Lias, 21 F.4th 74, 81-83, 85-86 (3d Cir. 2021) (“Jefferson would have us define the constitutional right as one that ‘bars an officer from opening gunfire into the driver’s side window of a fleeing vehicle passing in front of him if the driver is not believed to be armed, did not previously act in a menacing manner, and if there is no immediate danger to the officer or bystanders.’ . . . Lias, for his part, would define the right at a much higher level of generality, contending that it is not a violation of a clearly-established constitutional right to ‘shoot[] at a fleeing driver to protect those who his or her flight might endanger.’ . . . We would not define the right as narrowly as Jefferson would, but neither would we adopt so broad a formulation as Lias. Instead, we will define the right as follows: a suspect fleeing in a vehicle, who has not otherwise displayed threatening behavior, has the constitutional right to be free from the use of deadly force when it is no longer reasonable for an officer to believe his or others’ lives are in immediate peril from the suspect’s flight. With respect to determining whether this right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the shooting, we first turn ‘to factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, as well as binding opinions from our own Court.’ . . . Following that, we determine whether there exists a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals.’ . . . ‘We may also take into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere.’ . . . Conducting that review, in our view, this right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the shooting in this case by Abraham, where we held in a factually analogous context that ‘[a] passing risk to a police officer is not an ongoing license to kill an otherwise unthreatening suspect.’ . . . Other Courts of Appeals to have considered actions where officers have used deadly force against non-dangerous suspects attempting to evade arrest while driving have ruled in parallel. [collecting cases] Accordingly, binding precedent in our Circuit, along with persuasive authority from other Courts of Appeals, have ‘clearly established’ the right at issue here, as defined above. The force of these holdings is not blunted by the Supreme Court’s decisions cited by the District Court in its analysis. Each cited case involves circumstances where either the fleeing driver in question had displayed threatening or aggressive behavior toward others prior to or during the car chase, or where the Court, based on the record, was willing to determine that the driver’s conduct while fleeing was so egregious that it posed an immediate risk to the officers and the public. [court discusses Brosseau, Scott, Plumhoff, and Mullenix] None of the Supreme Court cases cited by the District Court, then, disturb the ‘robust consensus’ of cases decided by our sister circuits, let alone our own precedent, in clearly establishing that an otherwise non-threatening individual engaged in vehicular flight is entitled to be free from being subjected to deadly force if it is unreasonable for an officer to believe his or others’ lives are in immediate jeopardy from their actions. As such a right is clearly established, and because a jury may conclude that Officer Lias’s decision to shoot Jefferson was not objectively reasonable, Officer Lias is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Dennis v. City of Philadelphia, 19 F.4th 279, 289-92 (3d Cir. 2021) (“The detectives argue that Halsey cannot govern here because it is not particularized to the facts of this case. They claim that Halsey dealt with police officers coercing a false statement via a forceful and relentless interrogation of the suspect for more than eight hours, during which the investigators inserted non-public information into the confession. But a case that is directly on point is not required so long as the precedent placed the constitutional question beyond debate. Halsey did so, recognizing prior precedent that held the fabrication of evidence by law enforcement officers violates the Fourteenth Amendment and that such a right had been established since at least 1985. . . No more need be said as to the stand-alone fabrication of evidence claim than: Halsey established that sufficiently particularized precedent placed these detectives on notice that fabricating evidence to convict a criminal defendant is unconstitutional, regardless of whether that evidence is inserted into a confession to ‘bring about’ his prosecution or to help secure his conviction. . . Second, turning to Dennis’s deliberate deception claim, the detectives contend that this claim is based on the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents, which is too broadly worded and was not established until 1995, when the Supreme Court decided Kyles v. Whitley. . . The right not to be convicted on perjured testimony used by prosecutors at trial has been clearly established by the Supreme Court since at least 1935 in Mooney v. Holohan. . . Seven years later, in Pyle v. Kansas, . . . the Court extended this right by recognizing as a due process violation the conviction of a defendant through perjured testimony and the deliberate suppression of evidence favorable to the accused. Moreover, ‘general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.’. . We conclude that the constitutional rule that framing criminal defendants through use of fabricated evidence, including false or perjured testimony, violates their constitutional rights applies with such obvious clarity that it is unreasonable for us to conclude anything other than that the detectives were on sufficient notice that their fabrication of evidence violated clearly established law. Thus, the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds as to the due process claim in Count I(A) for the detective’s fabricated evidence—here their false statements and testimony as to Dennis’s clothing, Thompson’s false testimony procured by threats and coercion, and their concealment of evidence that they knew revealed a witness’s trial testimony as false. As to the detectives’ citation to Gibson v. Superintendent, . . . that case provides some guidance on the claim in Count I(B) for deliberate deception, but it does not support reversing the District Court’s denial of the motion to dismiss this claim on qualified immunity grounds. Gibson stated that the Supreme Court did not settle the principle that evidence in the hands of police could be imputed to the prosecutor until 1995, when it decided Kyles v. Whitley. . . This principle, however, is separate from the right not to be framed by the use of perjured witness testimony at trial that was recognized by the Supreme Court in Mooney. . . or by the detectives’ own perjured testimony at trial recognized by our Court in Curran v. Delaware. . . . Dennis did not limit his deliberate deception claim to a mere failure to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence; rather, he claims the detectives violated his due process rights to a fair trial by ‘concealing and/or suppressing relevant and material evidence’. . .

as part of a larger scheme to deliberately deceive the court and frame him for Williams's murder. As the District Court noted, Dennis does not seek relief from the detectives for Brady violations. To recharacterize Dennis's claims simply as Brady claims would run afoul of the longstanding principle that the plaintiff, as the master of the complaint, is free to choose between legal theories, . . . and a defendant cannot create a cause of action from the fact pattern on behalf of the plaintiff. . . . Here, Dennis's separate claim under Count I(B) for deliberate deception as a violation of his due process rights relies in part on the detective's failure to disclose certain exculpatory and impeachment evidence, which appears problematic in the face of a qualified immunity defense. Specifically, the detectives argue that a plaintiff can only bring a Brady claim against police officers by alleging that they affirmatively concealed evidence, i.e., by alleging that police officers deliberately suppressed the evidence. Thus, to allege a deliberate deception claim against police officers, the detectives conclude that a plaintiff must allege a Brady claim. We disagree and will not restrict Dennis to a simple Brady claim. . . But the label Dennis chooses also does not answer whether the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim Dennis brought. A Brady claim, in essence, is a claim by a defendant that his due process rights were violated by the failure to disclose exculpatory or impeachment evidence to the defense, while a claim for deliberate deception in violation of due process must go beyond the failure to disclose evidence and arises when imprisonment results from the knowing use of false testimony or other fabricated evidence or from concealing evidence to create false testimony to secure a conviction. . . To be clear, a deliberate deception claim against police officers and a Brady claim are not necessarily coterminous. In other words, a plaintiff alleging a claim against police officers for violation of due process rights by deliberate deception to the court need not bring a Brady claim. Yet, to survive the qualified immunity defense, the claim brought must involve a right with sufficiently clear contours that every reasonable officer would have understood that what he is doing violates that right—and a generalized notion that deliberate deception violates due process will not do. . . The case at bar is a paradigm example: Dennis's deliberate deception claim not only alleges that the Detectives withheld exculpatory and impeachment evidence that would have supported his alibi and defense, but that they also failed to correct testimony they knew was false and concealed from the defense the evidence that revealed that trial testimony as false. These allegations go beyond asserting a mere Brady violation and allege that, in an effort to secure Dennis's conviction, the detectives knowingly deceived the court and the jury through false testimony in violation of Dennis's due process rights. . . Because Dennis's claim for violation of his due process rights by deliberate deception under Count I(B) encompasses allegations that the detectives concealed or suppressed the time-stamped receipt to produce false trial testimony, Gibson does not control. Instead, Mooney, Halsey, Pyle, and Curran do. For those reasons, we will affirm the District Court's denial of the motion to dismiss Dennis's deliberate deception claim on qualified immunity grounds.")

Jacobs v. Cumberland County, 8 F.4th 187, 195-97 (3d Cir. 2021) ("A reasonable factfinder could . . . conclude that Jacobs posed no threat throughout the encounter. The security video shows that Jacobs was standing with his hands behind his back and submitting to Armstrong's compliance hold when Williams approached the bunk. As the District Court observed, a reasonable jury viewing the security footage could find that Williams struck Jacobs while Jacobs was defenseless and obeying orders. In sum, this version of events does not present a question about the appropriate degree of force. Under this set of facts, a jury could find that there was no penological need for any additional force—making each of Williams’s strikes wholly gratuitous and objectively unreasonable. . . . As for the second prong of qualified immunity, a government official is protected from suit unless he ‘violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.’ . . . [T]he central question is whether the existing law gave the officer ‘fair warning’ that his particular conduct was unlawful. . . . Sometimes an officer can receive fair warning if ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though “the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful.”’ . . . But in excessive-force cases, it can be difficult for officers to know how previous judicial opinions apply to new, tense situations. . . . The reasonability of force often hinges on the details of an individual case, making the specificity of caselaw ‘especially important.’ . . . In such cases, ‘officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’ . . . The caselaw does not have to be ‘directly on point,’ but existing precedent must have placed the question of unlawfulness ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Cases with closely analogous facts can thus help ‘move a case beyond the otherwise “hazy border between excessive and acceptable force” and thereby provide an officer notice that a specific use of force is unlawful.’ . . . Here, Williams’s conduct is nowhere near the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’ . . . When the evidence is construed in the light most favorable to Jacobs, we have no difficulty concluding that the unlawfulness of the conduct was ‘beyond debate[.]’ . . . Any reasonable officer would have known that Williams’s strikes were unlawful under this set of facts. First, the Supreme Court has made clear that officers may not expose inmates to gratuitous force divorced from any legitimate penological purpose. . . . That alone would provide officers with at least ‘some notice’ that the treatment of Jacobs was unlawful. . . . Additionally, the specific conduct here—striking a physically restrained and nonthreatening inmate—was clearly unlawful under the precedent of this Court and our sister circuits. [collecting cases] At the time of the relevant conduct, it was clearly established that officers could not gratuitously beat an inmate. Construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Jacobs, any reasonable officer would have known that the conduct here was unlawful.”) Peroza-Benitez v. Smith, 994 F.3d 157, 165-72 & n.3 (3d Cir. 2021) (“The District Court chose to begin with the ‘clearly established’ prong. We will do the same. . . . We answer this question by first looking to factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, as well as binding opinions from our own Court. . . . Next, we consider whether there is a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals.’ . . . We may also take into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere. . . . As we examine the case law, we must keep in mind that this Court takes a ‘broad view of what constitutes an established right of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . And a right may be ‘clearly established’ even without a ‘“precise factual correspondence” between the case at issue and a previous case.’ . . . A public official does not get the benefit of ‘one liability-free violation’ simply because the circumstance of his case is not identical to that of a prior case. . . .We note that ‘appellate review of qualified immunity dispositions is to be conducted in light of all relevant precedents, not simply those cited to, or discovered by, the district court.’ . . . The District Court found that C.I. Haser was entitled to qualified immunity as ‘[his] actions did not violate a clearly established constitutional right, because “a reasonable officer in [his] shoes at the time in question would not have perceived federal law to preclude” his conduct.’ . . . We disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez as the non-moving party – as we are required to do at summary judgment – a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser’s actions violated a ‘clearly established’ right. We first define the right that C.I. Haser allegedly violated. The District Court defined Peroza-Benitez’s right as ‘the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force in the form of multiple punches to the head while hanging out of a window through which he had attempted to flee and while known to be unarmed.’ . . . Here, Peroza-Benitez was unarmed, injured, covered in his own blood, and hanging from a second-story window by his hands, feet dangling, when C.I. Haser – knowing Peroza-Benitez to be unarmed – punched him ‘repeatedly’ in the head with a closed fist. . . . C.I. Haser’s punches ‘stunned and disoriented’ Peroza-Benitez, causing him to fall over ten feet into a below-ground concrete stairwell. . . . Accordingly, we rely on a modification of the District Court’s definition: The Fourth Amendment right of an injured, visibly unarmed suspect to be free from temporarily paralyzing force while positioned at a height that carries with it a risk of serious injury or death. Next, we ask whether Peroza-Benitez’s defined right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of C.I. Haser’s alleged violation. We do not find any factually analogous precedent from either the Supreme Court or our own Court, thus we turn to persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals and district courts. It is within this inquiry that we find the necessary ‘robust consensus of cases’ supporting our holding that a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser, by punching Peroza-Benitez ‘repeatedly’ in the head as he hung out of a second-story window, violated a ‘clearly established’ right. [collecting cases] While each of these cases, including Martin, concerns a police officer tasing, as opposed to punching, an individual vulnerable to falling from a precarious height, tasing is sufficiently analogous to punching in this context such that a reasonable jury could find that C.I. Haser’s actions violated a ‘clearly established’ right. The risk in using a taser on an individual positioned on an elevated surface is that the individual could fall off said surface once incapacitated by the taser and suffer serious injury or death. Officer Smith – who was with C.I. Haser at the window – testified that it is ‘against protocol’ to ‘tase someone on the roof’ because if ‘they fall off, that’s not going to be good. We’re not gonna tase someone that’s on a roof.’ . . . The same exact logic applies to deliberately punching someone ‘to stun’ them. . . . when that person is hanging out of a window. . . . Tasing an individual vulnerable to falling from a precarious height is sufficiently analogous to repeatedly punching an unarmed individual in the head to stun him while he is dangling from a windowsill at a precarious height. Requiring this case to be a factual clone of a previous case would afford C.I. Haser ‘one liability-free violation,’ a premise that this Court has repeatedly cautioned against. . . . In short, there was a ‘clearly established’ right at the time for an injured, visibly unarmed suspect to be free from temporarily paralyzing force while positioned as Peroza-Benitez was. A reasonable jury, on this record, could conclude that C.I. Haser ‘repeatedly’ punched Peroza-Benitez in the head and caused him to fall from a second-story window, in violation of that right. Or a jury could conclude that the facts do not support Peroza-Benitez's account of the incident. But if a jury credited Peroza-Benitez's version, then Peroza-Benitez's 'clearly established' right was violated. Thus there is a genuine dispute of material fact regarding C.I. Haser's conduct, which must be resolved by a jury. So we will vacate the District Court's finding that C.I. Haser was entitled to qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings. . . As to Officer White, the District Court held that he was entitled to qualified immunity because his 'use of non-lethal force in the form of a single tase to [Peroza-Benitez], regard-less of whether or not [Peroza-Benitez] was armed and whether or not he was unconscious in the moments after falling and being tased, cannot be considered a violation of any clearly established precedent.' . . We disagree. The District Court defined Peroza-Benitez's right as 'the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive use of force in the form of the use of a taser while not visibly armed (but after the acting officer was informed moments earlier by a fellow officer that [Peroza-Benitez] was armed and in active flight), while laying [sic] on the ground after having fallen from a window through which he had attempted to flee and been rendered temporarily unconscious, and after having made no further attempt to flee after hitting the ground.' . . While the District Court 'assume[d] [Peroza-Benitez] made no further movements [upon landing] and was knocked temporarily unconscious,' it notably concluded in its analysis that Peroza-Benitez's 'degree of consciousness after hitting the ground is irrelevant' because Officer White 'made a quick decision, deploying his taser immediately, essentially simultaneously with [Peroza-Benitez] hitting the ground.' . . But the consciousness of Peroza-Benitez is not irrelevant to the analysis; it is critical. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez – again, as we must do at summary judgment – Peroza-Benitez was tased by Officer White while lying unconscious after having fallen over 10 feet into a below-ground, concrete stairwell. The duration of time that elapsed between Peroza-Benitez hitting the ground and getting tased does not change the fact that, in the light most favorable to Peroza-Benitez, he was tased while visibly unconscious and after multiple seconds had elapsed. . . such that a reasonable jury could find that Officer White should have known that he was tasing an unconscious individual. . . Thus, Peroza-Benitez's right at issue boils down to the following: The Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force in the form of being tased while visibly unconscious. There is a 'robust consensus of cases' that support the proposition that tasing a visibly unconscious person – who just fell over ten feet onto concrete – is a violation of that person's Fourth Amendment rights. [collecting cases] [W]e hold that the right not to be tased while visibly unconscious was 'clearly established' at the time and that a reasonable jury could find that Officer White violated this right. To be sure, a jury could find that the facts do not support Peroza-Benitez's account – for example, by finding that Peroza-Benitez was not unconscious and was still trying to flee, that Officer White reasonably believed Peroza-Benitez was armed, or that there was not enough time for Officer White to recognize that Peroza-Benitez was unconscious. But if a jury credited Peroza-Benitez's version of events, then Peroza-Benitez's 'clearly established' right was violated. Thus, here too we have a genuine dispute of material fact for the jury to resolve, and we will vacate the District Court's finding that Officer White was entitled to qualified immunity and remand for further proceedings.”)

HIRA Educational Services North America v. Augustine, 991 F.3d 180, 191 & n.7 (3d Cir. 2021) (“Like the plaintiffs in X-Men, HIRA alleges the Legislators urged the agency (DGS) to terminate its contract with HIRA, sought an investigation into the sale, disparaged HIRA, and favored a different recipient of the government contract. HIRA's only attempt to distinguish this case from X-Men is to assert that it 'has clearly articulated both the constitutional and statutory rights that have been violated by the Legislative Defendants and the actions that constituted those violations.' . . . Even assuming that HIRA has alleged violations of constitutional and statutory rights that are not foreclosed by the Legislators' First Amendment rights, that would show only that HIRA has stated a claim; it does nothing to show the Legislators violated clearly established law. Although HIRA rightly notes that the Second Circuit's decision is not binding on this Court, the absence of precedent in its favor from the Supreme Court or this Court dooms its case. . . . That, combined with an adverse precedent from our sister court, puts HIRA well short of showing that the rights it seeks to vindicate here were clearly established. So Vogel and Sainato are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The recent Supreme Court decision in Taylor v. Riojas, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020), does not change our analysis in this case. The Legislators' actions were not so outrageous that 'no reasonable ... officer could have concluded' they were permissible under the Constitution, Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 53, especially in light of X-Men and Firetree.”)

Kamienski v. Ford, 844 F. App'x 520, ___ (3d Cir. 2021) (“Whatever we might make of the allegations’ merits, under the qualified immunity framework [.] . . . withholding evidence did not violate a clearly established right at the time of the criminal trial in this case. In Gibson, the plaintiff alleged that police officers affirmatively concealed material evidence from the prosecutor. . . . But it was not clearly established at the time of the 1994 trial that officers had a duty under Brady to disclose exculpatory information to prosecutors, so they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . And so too here. Mahony and Churchill are entitled to qualified immunity for their conduct at the time of the 1988 trial. . . . Kamienski asks us to disregard Gibson because Mahony and Churchill were personally responsible for the disclosure to Kamienski—unlike the officers in Gibson, who were only under a duty to disclose the evidence to the prosecutor. But this request is self-defeating: if Mahony and Churchill had duties arising from the litigation, they would be intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process and therefore entitled to absolute immunity. . . . In sum, Kamienski cannot have it both ways. Either the detectives were responsible for complying with Brady by disclosing evidence to his defense team—in which case they were acting in a quasi-judicial role and entitled to absolute immunity—or they were investigators entitled to qualified immunity because their duty to disclose Brady material to the prosecutor was not clearly established at the time of the 1988 trial.”)

El v. City of Pittsburgh, 975 F.3d 327, 337-43 & n.7 (3d Cir. 2020) (“Although we would not be required to defer to the District Court if the video showed its conclusion was ‘blatantly and demonstrably false,’ . . . the District Court’s finding that Will was non-threatening is not blatantly contradicted by the video[.] . . . The video clearly shows what happened between the police and the Els, and we have studied it extensively. Indeed, viewing the facts in ‘the light depicted by the video[],’ . . . confirms that the District Court did not make any demonstrably false findings about how the events unfolded. . . . The District Court correctly concluded that, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Will, a jury could conclude there was a violation of his right to be free from the unreasonable use of force. The factors laid out in Graham v. Connor . . . and Sharrar . . . show why. Under the Graham factors, the potential crime at issue (underage purchase of tobacco) was not severe; the Els did not pose an immediate safety threat; and they were neither resisting arrest nor trying to flee. . . Under the Sharrar factors, the Els were not violent or dangerous; they were unarmed; they were outnumbered six to two; and the situation unfolded over a few minutes, not a few tense and dangerous seconds. . . The final Sharrar factor, physical injury to the plaintiff, weighs in Will's favor, because he sustained a hip contusion—although the injury is relatively minor. . . The dissent disagrees with the definition of the right at issue, maintaining that the definition is not specific enough and should encompass facts not found by the District Court. We agree that the right must be defined with specificity. . . Here, however, the District Court followed that directive and did not speak at 'a high level of generality.' . . Moreover, the presence of the video in the record does not permit us to embark upon our own factfinding exercise. Rather, as noted, 'we must accept [the] set of facts' the District Court found . . . unless the video 'quite clearly contradicts' them,[.] . . Scott's rule, permitting us to disregard factual findings that no reasonable jury could believe, is 'a narrow exception to the limits ... on our jurisdiction' on review of a denial of qualified immunity. . . We should apply Scott's narrow exception carefully and strictly, rather than viewing it as an invitation to find our own facts. Therefore, the dissent's preferred articulation of the right at issue is not available to us within the limits of our jurisdiction. . . . In the absence of controlling authority from the Supreme Court or this Court, the District Court correctly looked to excessive force cases from our sister Circuits that involve police use of non-deadly force on unarmed, uncooperative citizens who were not suspected of serious crimes. . . These cases establish a consensus that such an individual has the right not to be taken to the ground during an investigatory stop when he stands up and takes one or two small steps towards a police officer who is standing a few feet away. . . . These cases from our sister Circuits establish a 'consensus ... of persuasive authority,' . . . that an unarmed individual who is not suspected of a serious crime—including one who is verbally uncooperative or passively resists the police—has the right not to be subjected to physical force such as being grabbed, dragged, or taken down.⁷

[fn. 7: The dissent states that our holding places 'unrealistic expectations' on Officer Welling because he "was supposed to realize – in an instant, from four factually dissimilar out-of-circuit decisions – that a grab-and-shove-to-secure under these circumstances was clearly established as unconstitutional.' . . We disagree that the out-of-circuit cases are factually dissimilar, as they involve unarmed individuals who were not suspected of a serious crime and were uncooperative or passively resistant. More fundamentally, the dissent's criticism takes issue not with our opinion, but with the qualified immunity analysis itself. It is black-letter law that an officer is not protected from suit when he or she acts in a way that runs against 'a robust consensus ... of persuasive authority,' . . . regarding what conduct violates the Constitution. If it were too much to ask an officer to know constitutional principles established by a consensus of cases from outside his or her Circuit, the Supreme Court would need to solve that problem.] Officer Welling argues that even if Will had a Fourth Amendment right to be free of the kind of force he used, that right was not clearly established in July 2013, when the incident took place. To support this argument, he launches various attacks on the cases the District Court relied on—but none of these attacks succeed in dismantling the consensus of persuasive authority. . . . For his part, Will argues that we should affirm on an alternative ground—that his right to be free of the kind of force Officer Welling used is clearly established by the excessive force factors provided in Graham . . . and our opinion in Sharrar[.] . . . The factor-based tests of Graham and Sharrar, however, are ‘cast at a high level of generality’ and ‘can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law,’ only ‘in an obvious case.’ . . . We have concluded that cases are obvious, and that general standards clearly establish a right, in extreme situations such as when lethal force is used . . . or when a high school teacher sexually harassed and assaulted students[.] . . . This case does not present that kind of situation, but the Graham and Sharrar factors nevertheless buttress the robust consensus of persuasive authority from our sister Circuits. As discussed above, the factors all tend to show that Officer Welling’s force was excessive: there was no serious crime, no immediate safety threat, and no resistance or flight by the Els; they were not armed and were significantly outnumbered. . . . While we would not hold that these factors, by themselves, clearly established Will’s right to be free of the kind of force Officer Welling used, they support the consensus of cases that show clear establishment of the right. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Will, as we must, the danger to the police and the community was virtually nil. Officers approached two young men who were not engaged in any facially suspicious behavior; they were leaving a corner store. It became clear almost immediately that the men were not armed and that if any offense was being committed, it was, at most, an underage tobacco purchase. The men were upset to be stopped and said so. They did not flee. They were outnumbered six to two. One of them created a hazardous or offensive condition by standing up and taking a few small steps. Under these circumstances, a jury could conclude that taking Will down was an unreasonable use of force. And a consensus of cases from our sister Circuits establishes that in a situation like this, a plaintiff has the right not to be taken to the ground. In reaching this conclusion, we are mindful that reasonableness ‘must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.’ . . . There must be ‘allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’ . . . Officer Welling may have been called upon to make a split-second decision when Will stood up and took a few steps, but his decision was made with the knowledge that Will was unarmed and outnumbered. For these reasons, Officer Welling is not entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.”)

El v. City of Pittsburgh, 975 F.3d 327, 343-47 (3d Cir. 2020) (Phipps, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“[I]n two respects I part ways with the Majority’s affirmance of the order denying qualified immunity to Officer Frank Welling at summary judgment. First, I do not believe that the Majority Opinion articulated the putative constitutional right at issue with the high level of specificity required for the qualified immunity analysis. Second, in my view, it is far from clearly established that Officer Welling’s use of force against Will El – a grab-and-shove-to-secure, which resulted in a bruise on the hip – was unconstitutionally excessive. Thus, I respectfully dissent in part and would reverse the order denying qualified immunity to Officer Welling. . . . I do not believe that the Majority Opinion articulates the putative constitutional right with the requisite level of precision. The Majority describes the Fourth Amendment right in this way: The right of an unarmed individual not to be taken to the ground during an investigatory stop when he stands up and takes one or two small steps towards a police officer who is standing a few feet away. . . . But that articulation ignores important facts. It does not mention that Will El arose and extended an arm to point at an officer at close range. It also neglects that Officer Welling gestured for Will to sit down and that Will refused to. And Officer Welling did not initially take Will to the ground. Before the situation escalated, Welling grabbed and pushed Will back into a boarded-up window with Will maintaining his footing. . . . The inquiry into the putative right should be expressed this way: Whether an unarmed individual who arises to his feet in close range to a police officer, points at an officer, and ignores a gesture to sit back down has a Fourth Amendment right not to be grabbed and shoved backward into a vertical structure while not losing his footing. Such an articulation includes the three omitted events that would matter to every reasonable officer: that Will stood up and extended an arm to point at an officer at close range; that Will ignored Officer Welling's gesture to sit down; and that, as far as the complained of use of force, Welling did not tackle Will or take him to the ground. By excluding these important details, which are plainly evident from the video recording, the Majority Opinion does not identify the right with the 'high "degree of specificity"' required. . . . Under either formulation (the Majority's or mine), the constitutional right at issue was not clearly established. For a constitutional right to be "clearly established," the legal principle 'must have a sufficiently clear foundation in then-existing precedent.' . . . Such a foundation in precedent may rest on either 'controlling authority' or 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' . . . The Majority Opinion does not identify any 'factually analogous precedents of the Supreme Court [or] the Third Circuit.' . . . Without controlling authority to meet the "clearly established" threshold, the Majority relies instead on four decisions from other federal appellate courts as persuasive authority. While the "clearly established" standard does 'not require a case directly on point,' those four cases fall well short of 'a robust consensus of persuasive authority.' . . . None of them involves a sufficiently analogous situation to this one to be 'clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret [them] to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.' . . . In reaching this outcome, the Majority Opinion places unrealistic expectations on law enforcement officers. According to the Majority, Officer Welling was supposed to realize – in an instant, from four factually dissimilar out-of-circuit decisions – that a grab-and-shove-to-secure under these circumstances was clearly established as unconstitutional. Apparently, in that split-second, Officer Welling should have had recall of an Eighth Circuit case from 2012, a Fifth Circuit case from 2009, a Sixth Circuit case from 2006, and an Eleventh Circuit case from 1998 – all of which occurred in different contexts and involved much greater force than the grab-and-shove-to-secure at issue here. . . . Not only that, but Officer Welling – in the same moment – needed to determine whether those factually dissimilar, non-controlling cases represented a robust consensus of persuasive authority. Even if that were possible, that small handful of cases does not place Officer Welling's use of force 'beyond debate,' such that it was a clearly established Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Make no mistake, the Majority imposes a heightened standard for qualified immunity so that it no longer protects ' "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."'. . . Officers without the acumen to conduct a synapse-quick legal analysis of factually dissimilar, out-of-circuit precedent will be denied immunity and subject to suit for their actions. The Majority responds that it is not applying a heightened standard but rather the black-letter law of qualified immunity. . . But in articulating the doctrine, the Supreme Court has not imposed such a high standard on officers. . . To the contrary, the Supreme Court has recognized that ‘it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force, will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’. . Rather than acknowledge that difficulty, or even that the appropriateness of Officer Welling’s use of force is not ‘beyond debate,’. . . the Majority faults Officer Welling for failing to instantaneously distill a loose collage of out-of-circuit caselaw into a robust consensus of persuasive authority that would apply to the particular circumstances of his use of force – which was less than the amount of force used in any of those other cases. . . Under the Graham / Sharrar factors, this is not an ‘obvious case’ of excessive force. . . Instead, these factors generate uncertainty, and that further undermines the Majority’s conclusion that Officer Welling violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . In sum, I concur in part and respectfully dissent in part. As I understand the law, qualified immunity shields Officer Welling from suit because at the time of the incident, it was not clearly established that a grab-and-shove-to-secure, which resulted in a bruise on the hip, constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Given the caselaw at the time, these events occurred in the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force’ in which law enforcement officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Harvard v. Cesnalis, 973 F.3d 190, 207 & n.9 (3d Cir., 2020) (“We have never recognized an independent due process right to be free from a reckless investigation. . . We have also held that, even if such a claim were cognizable, it ‘could only arise under the Fourth Amendment.’. . We will therefore affirm the District Court’s grant of summary judgment for the defendants as to the reckless investigation claim. . . . Even if Harvard had brought the reckless investigation claim under the Fourth Amendment, the officers would nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity because this right was not clearly established at the time of the investigation.”)

Weimer v. County of Fayette, Pennsylvania, 972 F.3d 177, 190-92 (3d Cir. 2020) (“Weimer alleges that Vernon participated in the reckless and deliberately indifferent police investigation and ‘had reasonable and realistic opportunities to intervene to prevent the violations of ... Weimer’s constitutional rights.’. . Vernon responds that she is entitled to qualified immunity because, ‘at the time of the allegations, no clearly established [law] existed to put [her] on notice’ that, as a prosecutor, her failure to intervene in the police investigation would violate Weimer’s rights. . . We agree. It is well established in our Circuit that both police and corrections officers must ‘take reasonable steps to protect a victim from another officer’s use of excessive force.’. . But we have not extended this duty to prosecutors who fail to intervene to prevent police from conducting unconstitutional investigations. Accordingly, we cannot say that ‘any reasonable [prosecutor]’ investigating Haith’s murder would have understood that she was violating Weimer’s constitutional rights in failing to intervene to prevent improper investigatory conduct by police. . . Put differently, the facts here are simply too dissimilar from those in the excessive force cases for us to hold that those cases would have put Vernon on notice that her actions were unlawful. Although the District Court acknowledged that there was no ‘case law in the Third Circuit holding a prosecutor liable for a failure to intervene in the conduct of police officers,’ it identified ‘[a] subsequent decision from the [Western District of Pennsylvania that] ha[d] extended liability for a failure to intervene claim to prosecutors who [were] engaging in investigative conduct.’ . . . Thus, the District Court permitted Weimer’s claim to proceed ‘[g]iven the recent developments in this area of the law and the early stage of this case.’ . . . However, a district court opinion from 2018 cannot serve as a basis for holding that a prosecutor’s duty to intervene to prevent an unconstitutional police investigation was clearly established between 2001 and 2006. For a legal principle to be clearly established, it must be based on precedent existing at the time of the official’s act, and the holding of one district judge, which ‘is not controlling authority in any jurisdiction, much less in the entire United States,’ is insufficient to clearly establish a violation of a constitutional right. . . . Our opinion on appeal in Fogle merely affirmed the trial court’s denial of the prosecutors’ motion to dismiss Fogle’s claims based on absolute immunity. . . . Here, in contrast, Vernon has not only requested absolute immunity on the failure to intervene claim, but she also claims that if absolute immunity does not shield her from suit on this claim, qualified immunity applies. . . . District courts appear to disagree as to whether prosecutors have a duty to intervene in police investigations. . . . Disagreement among district judges may, in and of itself, be a reason to recognize a qualified immunity defense. . . . Whatever might be said of the investigation, the question here is whether Weimer had a clearly established right to have Vernon take reasonable steps to protect her from an unconstitutional police investigation. The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . Weimer’s reframing of the constitutional violation at issue does not change the fact that there was no clearly established law at the time of Vernon’s allegedly violative conduct that would have placed the constitutional question she confronted—to intervene in the police investigation or not to intervene—‘beyond debate.’”)

Starnes v. Butler County Court of Common Pleas, 50th Judicial Dist., 971 F.3d 416, 428 (3d Cir. 2020) (“Doerr argues Starnes did not allege a clearly established right because we have not previously held that a hostile work environment is cognizable under § 1983. But we have been clear that § 1983 shares the same elements for discrimination purposes as a Title VII action. . . . And a robust consensus of persuasive authority exists to clearly establish that creating a hostile work environment constitutes a § 1983 violation.”)

Starnes v. Butler County Court of Common Pleas, 50th Judicial Dist., 971 F.3d 416, 431 (3d Cir. 2020) (“Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has held that unmarried, romantic partners have a fundamental right to intimate association. Nor is there a robust consensus of persuasive authority recognizing such a right.”)

Wagner v. Northern Berks Regional Police Department, 816 F. App’x 679, ____ (3d Cir. 2020) (“Horner is entitled to qualified immunity because the law is not clearly established that an officer lacks probable cause where the affirmative defenses of compulsory joinder or Double Jeopardy bars a prosecution. . . . In fact, the law of this Circuit provides that similarly complicated affirmative defenses, such as necessity . . . and statutes of limitations. . . . are not subjects an officer must consider when evaluating whether there is probable cause. By its own terms, the dissent's analysis shows that the purported unlawfulness of Horner's actions was not clearly established. The dissent fails to 'identif[y] a single precedent—much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases—finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances' where the compulsory joinder rule or Double Jeopardy strips an arresting officer of probable cause to make an arrest. . . . Thus, at a minimum, qualified immunity would shield Horner from liability.”)

Wagner v. Northern Berks Regional Police Department, 816 F. App'x 679, ____ (3d Cir. 2020) (Fuentes, J., dissenting) (“I must . . . disagree with the Majority's holding that, even if Officer Horner lacked probable cause, his conduct is protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity. Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless the plaintiff alleges a violation of a constitutional right that was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the official's conduct. . . . When we define the right allegedly violated, we must frame it ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’. . . Ultimately, the dispositive inquiry is whether ‘it would be clear to a reasonable officer that the conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . . As we have previously stated, qualified immunity ‘protects “all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.”’. . . Although we must consider the facts in each qualified immunity case ‘in light of [its] specific context,’. . . it is not necessary for a plaintiff to point to ‘earlier cases involving fundamentally similar facts.’. . . In our prior cases involving evidence intentionally or recklessly omitted from an affidavit supporting probable cause, we have defined the right in question as the right to be free from prosecutions on criminal charges that lack probable cause.’. . . As explained above, I do not think those cases, which clearly hold that officers cannot omit exculpatory evidence from probable cause affidavits, are meaningfully different from this one, in which Officer Horner is alleged to have clearly disregarded evidence known to him when filing the 2014 affidavit. . . . Given our substantial case law explaining an officer's duty to disclose information that could affect probable cause, I would find that Officer Horner has not established his entitlement to qualified immunity at this stage. Unfortunately, today's Majority Opinion licenses any officer to deliberately withhold information in an affidavit for an arrest warrant, even if they know that information would relieve a defendant of criminal liability for his actions. Qualified immunity and related principles of law are intended to shield officers who act reasonably in discharging their duties in good faith. The law is intended as a shield for such officers, not as a sword for officers who, as is alleged here, attempt to wield their authority to maliciously prosecute defendants. For these reasons, I respectfully disagree with my colleagues and would find that Officer Horner has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity and Wagner's allegations—that Officer Horner deliberately omitted material information from the affidavit in order to harass him—should have survived a motion to dismiss.

Knight v. Bobanic, 807 F. App'x 161, ____ (3d Cir. 2020) (“Appellees moved for summary judgment. Applying the second ‘clearly established right’ prong of the qualified immunity doctrine, the District Court granted their motion. After extensively summarizing the underlying (undisputed and disputed) facts, the District Court offered the following formulation of the right at issue in this case:

Heeding the Supreme Court's recent admonitions to the trial court, considering the above material facts (both undisputed and those that are disputed as viewed in favor of Plaintiff) the Court formulates the right at issue as follows: the right of an individual to be free from the infliction of deadly force by a police officer, where such deadly force was employed without warning or hesitation from the officer, and where the individual himself is in his home, lawfully armed, suspected of domestic violence, has raised at least slightly (but not aimed) one of his weapons, as he was quickly approaching the officers from the interior of his home.

Knight v. Bobanic, No. 2:15-cv-00820, 2019 WL 2151293, at *9 (W.D. Pa. May 17, 2019) (footnote omitted). The District Court then thoroughly examined Supreme Court and Third Circuit 'excessive force' precedent as well as excessive force decisions from other circuit and district courts. In the end, it concluded that neither controlling legal authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive legal authority clearly established, as of the date of the shooting, that all reasonable police officers would have known that Appellees' conduct in this case was unconstitutional. . . . Appellant asserts that the District Court engaged in improper fact-finding in favor of Appellees with respect to whether Shawn Knight had one of the guns raised because he pushed open the screen door. However, it is undisputed that Shawn Knight was holding a revolver in each hand and then opened the screen door that led to the front porch. 'For him to push that screen door open, he would have needed to raise one of his hands, which was holding a revolver, at least slightly.' . . In any event, the record supports the District Court's conclusion that Shawn Knight, at most, raised one of the weapons slightly for just a moment of time. According to Appellant, our 2002 ruling in Curley v. Klem, 298 F.3d 271 (3d Cir. 2002), 'squarely governs' the facts in this case. The defendant state trooper in Curley shot and seriously injured the plaintiff, a police officer whom he mistook for an armed criminal suspect (who had already killed himself). . . Admittedly, we found that there was a factual dispute as to whether the plaintiff had pointed his gun at the defendant (while the District Court here assumed that Shawn Knight did not aim his weapons at Appellees). . . Furthermore, there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the plaintiff had looked inside the vehicle stolen by the suspect, where he would have seen the suspect's body. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Appellant, Trooper Bobanic initially forced his way into the home (even though the alleged domestic violence victim and her mother indicated that the situation had deescalated and that no further police involvement was needed), and Appellees did not identify themselves as police officers or provide any sort of warning (which could have led Shawn Knight, who was sleeping at the time, to believe that the state trooper was a home invader). However, Curley was still a case of mistaken identity, and the plaintiff 'claims that his gun was never aimed in Klem's direction, that he had turned to retreat in a direction away from Klem at the time he was fired upon, and that there was ample evidence indicating that he was not the suspect, including the fact that he was wearing a standard Port Authority police uniform.' . . 'By contrast, in this case, Shawn Knight was exactly the individual that the Troopers believed that he was, namely, a now-armed private citizen suspected of engaging in domestic violence, rushing out of his home in their direction with a gun in each hand.' . . Accordingly, we agree with the District Court that 'the facts of Curley are "distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand,” so Curley does not “clearly establish” the right at issue here.”. . . For the foregoing reasons, we will affirm the order of the District Court.”)

James v. New Jersey State Police, 957 F.3d 165, 168-73 (3d Cir. 2020), reh’g and reh’g en banc denied sub nom Gibbons v. New Jersdy State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (3d Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (“We will not review the District Court’s holding that Trooper Bartelt may have violated a constitutional right—the first prong of qualified immunity. The District Court based this holding on its conclusion that ‘genuine issues of disputed fact’ existed, but it did not identify these disputed facts. . . . To the extent that the District Court is correct that these unstated facts are material to the inquiry, we lack jurisdiction under the collateral-order doctrine to review its holding on this prong. . . . Thus, we will assume without deciding that Trooper Bartelt violated one of Gibbons’s constitutional rights and proceed to qualified immunity’s second prong. . . . On appeal, Trooper Bartelt argues that he did not violate a clearly established right. We agree because, at the time, no Supreme Court precedent, Third Circuit precedent, or robust consensus of persuasive authority had held that ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances as [Trooper Bartelt] ... violated the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Because the events here occurred on May 25, 2011, we will consider only precedents that clearly established rights as of that date. . . . First, we consider whether Trooper Bartelt violated a right that was clearly established by Supreme Court precedent. . . . He did not. The closest factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, Kisela v. Hughes, . . . is instructive. . . . Many of the same distinguishing facts are present here: (1) Gibbons was armed with a gun; (2) Gibbons ignored Trooper Bartelt’s orders to drop his gun; (3) Gibbons was easily within range to shoot Troopers Bartelt or Conza; and (4) the situation unfolded in ‘seconds.’. . . In sum, Trooper Bartelt did not violate a right that had been clearly established by Supreme Court precedent. . . . Next, we consider whether Trooper Bartelt violated a right that had been clearly established by Third Circuit precedent. None of our relevant precedents present a sufficiently similar factual scenario at the ‘high “degree of specificity”’ that Supreme Court precedent requires. . . . So we conclude that he did not. . . . Three factual differences lead us to conclude that Trooper Bartelt did not violate a clearly established right. First, Trooper Bartelt’s pre-standoff knowledge of Gibbons differs from the Bennett officer’s pre-standoff knowledge of the suspect. Trooper Bartelt was aware of several facts from which he could reasonably conclude that Gibbons posed a threat to others. . . . Second, Gibbons was much closer to and less compliant with Trooper Bartelt than the suspect in Bennett. . . . Third, Trooper Bartelt’s standoff with Gibbons lasted only moments, unlike the nearly hour-long standoff in Bennett. Trooper Bartelt’s interaction with Gibbons was over within seconds of his arrival on the scene. He necessarily ‘had mere seconds to assess the potential danger’ posed by the armed and non-compliant Gibbons. . . . For these reasons, although Bennett may be the most analogous precedent from our Court, its holding does not “‘squarely govern[]’ the specific facts at issue’ here. . . . And because no other Third Circuit precedent is factually analogous to this case, we conclude that Trooper Bartelt did not violate a clearly established right under our precedent. . . . The caselaw of our sister circuits prohibits the use of deadly force against non-threatening suspects, even when they are armed and suicidal. . . . But none of the cases that stand for this general principle involve the ‘high “degree of specificity”’ required to clearly establish a right under the circumstances Trooper Bartelt faced.”)

But see James v. Bartelt, 142 S. Ct. 4 (2021) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (“On May 24, 2011, Willie Gibbons was shot and killed by a police officer. It is undisputed that the officer who shot him knew that Gibbons suffered from a mental illness and that he was holding a gun to his own temple. It is also undisputed that Gibbons never threatened the officer in any way and that the encounter was over within seconds, leaving Gibbons fatally wounded. The remaining facts surrounding his tragic death are disputed, including whether Gibbons’ right arm was by his side or raised in surrender, whether the officer instructed Gibbons to drop the weapon or spoke unintelligibly, and whether the officer gave Gibbons a chance to comply or opened fire immediately. In light of these substantial disputes of material fact, the District Court declined to grant qualified immunity to the officer on summary judgment. The Third Circuit took a different view of the facts, reversing and granting qualified immunity. For the reasons ably set forth by Judge McKee in his dissent from denial of en banc review, the Third Circuit erred by improperly resolving factual disputes in respondent’s favor and by overlooking binding precedent to conclude that he did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. See Gibbons v. New Jersey State Police, 969 F.3d 419 (2020). I add only that qualified immunity properly shields police officers from liability when they act reasonably to protect themselves and the public. [citing White v. Pauly and Plumhoff v. Rickard] It does not protect an officer who inflicts deadly force on a person who is only a threat to himself. That proposition is so ‘apparent’ that any reasonable officer is surely ‘on notice’ that such a use of force is unlawful. [citing Hope v. Pelzer] I would grant the petition and summarily reverse the Third Circuit’s judgment. I respectfully dissent from the Court’s failure to do so.”); Gibbons v. New Jersey State Police, 969 F.3d 419, 419, 425-28, 435-38 (3d Cir. 2020) (McKee, J., with whom Greenaway, Krause, and Restrepo, JJ., join, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (“Today, we deny the Petition for Rehearing in this case even though our Opinion squarely contradicts controlling precedent established by our decision in Bennett v. Murphy. . . . Obviously, Bennett does not apply if an individual threatening self-harm also poses a risk to others. Just as the circumstances in Bennett (construed in the plaintiff’s favor) compelled the conclusion that a reasonable officer could not have believed that David Bennett posed a threat to anyone but himself, the circumstances here, viewed in a light favorable to Gibbons, compel the conclusion that Willie Gibbons only posed a threat to himself. When asked whether Gibbons had threatened him “in any way,” Bartelt responded unequivocally: “No.” Thus, when he opened fire, Bartelt violated clearly established law. . . . [M]ore than once, this Court has advised that ‘a court ruling on summary judgment in a deadly-force case’ must be careful ‘to “ensure that the officer is not taking advantage of the fact that the witness most likely to contradict his story—the person shot dead—is unable to testify.”’ The Supreme Court has likewise emphasized ‘the importance of drawing inferences in favor of the nonmovant, even when, as here, a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the standard.’ Instead, the Opinion improperly resolves multiple disputed issues of material fact in Bartelt’s favor when determining if clearly established law applies. For example: whether Gibbons’ right arm was raised in surrender or at his side (ignored by the Opinion), whether it was light or dark when Bartelt shot Gibbons (ignored), whether Bartelt told Gibbons to drop his gun or spoke unintelligibly (Opinion repeatedly assumes Bartelt gave the order), whether Bartelt even gave Gibbons a chance to comply with any command he may have given or opened fire immediately after issuing such command (Opinion repeatedly assumes Gibbons chose not to comply), and most importantly, whether Gibbons threatened Bartelt in any way (ignored). The Opinion implicitly or explicitly resolves each of these inferences against Gibbons when determining whether clearly established law governs this case. But it does not stop there: Bartelt never stated that Gibbons threatened him or anyone other than himself. In fact, Bartelt admits Gibbons made no threat. Here, there is no factual dispute. So the Opinion simply invents one and then resolves it in favor of Bartelt. That is not merely wrong, it is indefensible. . . . The Fifth Circuit's careful en banc decision in Cole v. Carson amplifies the relevance of Tolan. There, officers pursued a suicidal young man, Ryan Cole, and fatally shot him while he pressed a gun to his own head. As here, it was disputed whether the officers warned the victim before opening fire, and, if so, whether they gave him an opportunity to comply. The circumstances are not identical; Ryan Cole survived and his suit subsequently alleged that the officers conspired to lie about the threat he posed in order to justify having shot him. A panel of the Fifth Circuit initially denied qualified immunity, but the Supreme Court summarily reversed and remanded for reconsideration in light of Mullenix v. Luna. On remand, the panel reaffirmed its earlier decision, and the Fifth Circuit granted rehearing before the full court. The en banc court explicitly followed Tolan's requirement that disputed facts be viewed in the non-movant's favor, and found from that perspective:

Ryan was holding his handgun pointed to his own head, where it remained. [He] never pointed a weapon at the Officers, and never made a threatening or provocative gesture towards [the] Officers. [The officers] had the time and opportunity to give a warning for Ryan to disarm himself. However, the officers provided no warning ... that granted Ryan a sufficient time to respond, such that Ryan was not given an opportunity to disarm himself before he was shot.

Viewed in that light, the en banc court affirmed the denial of qualified immunity. The court explained: '[w]e conclude that it will be for a jury, and not judges, to resolve the competing factual narratives as detailed in ... the record as to the [plaintiffs'] excessive-force claim.' While Gibbons' death leaves us reliant on the officers' recounting of events, there are many similarities between Cole and James. In both cases, Tolan requires that the facts be viewed in the non-movant's favor. As noted before, the Opinion entirely ignores Tolan; it also ignores Cole. Under Tolan, we must view the facts in Gibbons' favor; when we do so, Bennett clearly governs this case. . . . I realize that, given the controlling precedent of Bennett, precedents from other Circuits are not relevant to our qualified immunity analysis. Nevertheless, before concluding, I think it helpful to note that every Circuit Court of Appeals that has addressed this issue in a precedential opinion, and there are ten of them, has held that it is a clear violation of the Constitution to shoot someone who is only threatening self-harm. To summarize: Bennett controls this analysis and failing to grant the Petition for Rehearing is a serious mistake. There will always be differences between two events featuring different participants, separated by time and place. The Supreme Court has never required a prior case that is absolutely identical to the circumstances surrounding a plaintiff's claim, nor could it. No such case will ever exist and requiring one tacitly transforms qualified immunity into absolute immunity. What is required is notice. Controlling precedent that is based upon circumstances sufficiently similar (when analyzed at an appropriate level of generality) to inform a reasonable officer that his/her conduct violates clearly established law. Bennett is exactly such a case. To reiterate once again our unqualified pronouncement there, if the victim ‘did not pose a threat to anyone but himself, the force used against him, i.e. deadly force, was objectively excessive.’ For the reasons I have explained, Bennett remains the law of this Circuit even after the denial of this Petition for Rehearing. However, institutionally, en banc reconsideration of the Opinion is certainly preferable to relying on the operation of I.O.P. 9.1 to prevent an officer from subsequently attempting to claim that our law on this issue is not clearly established. It is, and it will remain so after today. While remaining appreciative and cognizant of the risks that law enforcement officers face daily, we must nevertheless take care not to transform the shield of qualified immunity into a sword that licenses unreasonable force. I therefore must respectfully dissent from my colleagues’ decision to deny the petition for rehearing in this case. I do not reach that conclusion lightly. This is only the second time in 26 years on our Court that I have thought it necessary to draft an opinion dissenting from a denial of rehearing. But, in Justice Frankfurter’s words: ‘justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.’ Given our controlling law here, that appearance is sorely lacking if we grant Trooper Bartelt immunity as a matter of law.”) [footnotes omitted]

Thomas v. Tice, 948 F.3d 133, 141 (3d Cir. 2020) (on rehearing) (“Our precedent makes clear that, without some penological justification, an inmate may not be administratively confined in a dry cell. . . . While the penological purpose must always be legitimate, . . . we have never determined the exact quantum or nature of penological interest that is needed to justify confinement in a dry cell. But we are satisfied that there must be at least some interest. Here, the PRC failed to present evidence of any continuing penological interest after its initial interview with Thomas. Without such a penological justification for Thomas’s continued confinement in the dry cell, the PRC members are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Thomas v. Tice, 948 F.3d 133, 145-48 (3d Cir. 2020) (on rehearing) (Greenaway, Jr., J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) (“Put simply, we cannot say as a matter of law that Defendants did not have personal knowledge of, and thus were not personally involved in, the conditions of Thomas’s confinement in the dry cell. Especially since we must make all reasonable inferences in Thomas’s favor, this factual dispute precludes summary judgment. . . . In entirely overlooking these facts, the Majority makes a glaring error. . . . Upon summarily affirming the District Court’s personal involvement analysis, the Majority explicitly declines to determine whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Thomas’s conditions claim. But because, as explained above, we cannot determine as a matter of law that Defendants were not personally involved in the conditions of Thomas’s dry cell, we must answer this qualified immunity question. In so doing, our precedent demands that we resolve this issue in Thomas’s favor. . . . In short, then, qualified immunity does not shield Defendants from Thomas’s conditions claim. Among others, Young, Hope, and the cases on which Mammanna relies clearly established before Thomas’s confinement in the dry cell that the conditions he suffered there taken together violate the Eighth Amendment. Hence, Thomas’s conditions claim must proceed to a jury. . . . Here, Thomas was housed in a dry cell in utterly undignified conditions. On that, the record is clear. As to whether Defendants were personally involved in these conditions, the record reveals a genuine dispute of material facts that precludes summary judgment. Qualified immunity, moreover, is of no aid to Defendants given the ample precedent deeming similar conditions as violative of the Eighth Amendment. I would vacate in full the District Court’s grant of summary judgment and remand to the District Court for trial on both Thomas’s duration and conditions claims. Given my divergence of viewpoint, I dissent from the Majority’s disposition of Thomas’s conditions claim.”)

E. D. v. Sharkey, 928 F.3d 299, 306-09 (3d Cir. 2019) (“This Circuit has longed [sic] viewed the legal rights of an immigration detainee to be analogous to those of a pretrial detainee. . . We now join a number of our sister Circuits in expressly holding that immigration detainees are entitled to the same due process protections. Charles v. Orange County, 925 F.3d 73 (2d Cir. 2019); Chavero-Linares v. Smith, 782 F.3d 1038, 1041 (8th Cir. 2015); Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975, 979 (7th Cir. 2013); Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1326 (10th Cir. 2010); Edwards v. Johnson, 209 F.3d 772, 778 (5th Cir. 2000). . . .The right to ‘not be sexually assaulted by a state employee while in confinement’ was clearly established at the time of Sharkey’s conduct. . . E.D.’s allegations of Sharkey’s sexual assault, which could not have served a legitimate governmental objective and thereby constituted impermissible punishment, set forth a plausible violation of her right to personal bodily integrity protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Regarding Sharkey’s co-workers’ liability, this Court has recognized a detainee’s right to be protected by state actors who knew of ongoing violating conduct under the theory that a reasonable state official ‘could not believe that [their] actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk.’. . Supervisor Diane Edwards’ claim for immunity was properly denied because this Court has recognized the right to have state supervisory officials that neither condone nor authorize, through either their actions or inactions, sexual assault committed by another state actor. . . We therefore agree with the District Court that E.D.’s claims against the individual Defendants alleged the violation of a known constitutional right. . . . We further agree that a detainee’s right to be protected by state officials aware of ongoing sexual assault was clearly established at the time of Sharkey’s conduct. . . Initially, the District Court fittingly recognized that Sharkey’s conduct was illegal in the state in which it occurred. He committed institutional sexual assault in violation of Pennsylvania Statute 18 Pa.C.S. § 3124.2, which forbids an employee of a ‘residential facility serving children and youth’ from having sexual intercourse with a ‘detainee,’ regardless of whether the detainee gave consent. . . That Sharkey’s conduct was illegal renders E.D.’s right to be free from sexual assault ‘so “obvious” that it could be deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases.’. . In any event, there is a materially similar case, decided twelve years before E.D. had entered the country. In 2001 this Court held that juvenile detention facility employees could be liable for their co-worker’s sexual conduct with an inmate if they knew of but ignored the risk their co-worker posed. . . . [W]e agree there is enough evidence to support an inference that the Defendants knew of the risk facing E.D., and that their failure to take additional steps to protect her – acting in their capacity as either a co-worker or supervisor –

‘could be viewed by a factfinder as the sort of deliberate indifference’ to a detainee’s safety that the Constitution forbids. . . We agree there is a genuine need for trial to determine whether the Defendants are liable, and that summary judgment was therefore properly denied.”)

Baloga v. Pittston Area Sch. Dist., 927 F.3d 742, 762-63 (3d Cir. 2019) (“Here, Defendants contend that Serino is entitled to qualified immunity because ‘[t]here is no clearly established case law ... that stands for the [proposition] that ... a grievance about a day off[] constitutes constitutionally protected ... association.’. . But Defendants misunderstand the right at issue. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Baloga, Serino retaliated against Baloga because he ascribed to him responsibility for the union’s grievance based on his leadership of the union. Thus, the right at issue is a public employee’s right not to be subjected to adverse treatment for his leadership role in a public union—not, as Defendants contend, for the content of the grievance that the union filed. Once the right at issue is properly identified, it is apparent that ‘[t]he contours of [that] right,’. . . were clearly established when Serino ordered Baloga’s transfer. The Supreme Court has long recognized the right to become a member of a union and the attendant right not to be penalized for that membership. [collecting cases] So have we and other Courts of Appeals. [collecting cases] Given this ‘robust consensus,’. . . we have no difficulty concluding that Baloga’s right not to face retaliation for his leadership role in a public union was clearly established at the relevant time and, thus, Serino is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Bryan v. United States, 913 F.3d 356, 361-63 (3d Cir. 2019) (“On September 4, 2008, a day before Officer Ogg entered ‘lookouts’ for the travelers and two days before the cabin searches, we ruled for the first time on the constitutional propriety of border searches in the same context presented in this appeal—in remarkable coincidence, searches of cabins aboard the Adventure of the Seas. . . In United States v. Whitted, we acknowledged ‘the surprising dearth of authority’ on whether a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border is a routine search requiring no suspicion, or a non-routine search requiring ‘reasonable suspicion’ (i.e., a ‘particularized and objective basis’ to suspect criminal activity). . . We held for the first time that because of a passenger’s ‘high expectation of privacy’ and the ‘level of intrusiveness,’ a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border is non-routine and requires reasonable suspicion. . . We also held that unsubstantiated information from TECS can establish reasonable suspicion. . . In considering whether a government official is entitled to qualified immunity, a court can determine whether a constitutional right was violated or in the alternative, whether that right was clearly established. . . Following that precedent, we will not opine as to whether there were underlying Fourth Amendment violations involved in the search here. We will instead determine whether the Whitted standard, that a search of a cabin on a cruise ship required reasonable suspicion, was clearly established when Officer Ogg included in his entry of ‘lookouts’ in the TECS System that 100 % examination of the three travelers, i.e., examination of their cabins, was recommended and the next day when the St. Thomas officers searched the travelers’ cabins. . . . Until September 4, 2008, there had been no ruling in the Third Circuit as to what constituted a ‘routine search.’ As for Officer Ogg, he was located in San Juan, Puerto Rico, in the First Circuit. There had not been any such ruling in the First Circuit, and the First Circuit courts would not be bound by Whitted, a Third Circuit case. When such a ruling is made, a ruling which affects the procedures used in border searches, it is beyond belief that within two days the government could determine what was ‘reasonable suspicion’ and what new policy was required to conform to the ruling, much less communicate that new policy to the CBP officers. We can only conclude that as of September 5, 2008, it was not clearly established in either the Third Circuit or the First Circuit that a search of a cruise ship cabin at the border had to be supported by reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, under the circumstances that Officer Ogg confronted, he did not violate clearly established law by entering lookouts for the three passengers the day after we issued our decision in Whitted. He is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of qualified immunity, a legal principle does not become ‘clearly established’ the day we announce a decision, or even one or two days later. . . . We are, however, deciding only this case. For that reason, we decline to draw a bright line demarcating when a legal principle becomes ‘clearly established.’ We leave that exercise for another day.”)

Cole v. Encapera, 758 F. App’x 252, ____ (3d Cir. 2018) (“Cole cites Thomas v. Independence Township, as demonstrating that his due process rights were clearly established. . . In Thomas, the Third Circuit addressed the assertion of qualified immunity in a motion to dismiss, holding that a plaintiff’s ability to succeed on such a due process claim depends on whether he can show that the alleged harassment removed or significantly altered the plaintiff’s liberty and property interests in his business. . . However, the court did not affirmatively address the extent to which a business must suffer reputational and fiscal harm before a plaintiff’s liberty and property interest in his business becomes significantly altered.’ Although Thomas appears applicable at first glance, on closer review, it merely stands for the proposition that Cole has adequately pled a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. By no means did Thomas ‘place[] the ... constitutional question’ here ‘beyond debate.’. . It simply cannot be said that Third Circuit precedent sufficiently establishes the legal principle Cole advances such that ‘every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule [Cole] seeks to apply.’. . Furthermore, Supreme Court case law appears to diverge from Cole’s position. . . Because no Supreme Court or Third Circuit precedent clearly establishes the right at issue, we look to other circuits for a consensus. . . Childs and Shultz point to Fifth Circuit precedent that contradicts Cole’s position that his rights were clearly established. . . We thus reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment to the officers and hold that Shultz and Childs are entitled to qualified immunity on Cole’s Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. . . Here, Cole may appropriately be viewed as having the right to be free from police retaliation directed toward his business because he complained about the officers’ conduct. In Thomas, we found such allegations sufficient to state a claim. . . And, unlike in the due process context discussed above, the discussion in Thomas placed officers like Schultz and Childs on notice of what actions would constitute a First Amendment violation. . . For this reason, the district court correctly denied the officers qualified immunity on Cole’s First Amendment claim.”)

Walker v. Coffey, 905 F.3d 138, 144, 148-50 (3d Cir. 2018) (“[F]or purposes of qualified immunity, we must consider, at a minimum, whether it is clearly established that the Fourth Amendment affords an employee, such as Walker, the right to have the contents of her work emails remain free from a law enforcement search, absent a warrant or valid exception to the warrant requirement. Because we conclude that such a right is not clearly established—especially where, as here, the employer ultimately produces the emails to law enforcement—we hold that Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [W]e would be hard put to find that Walker enjoyed a clearly established right to privacy in the content of her work emails. But because this case involves Walker’s work emails, which were produced to law enforcement by her employer, Penn State, our inquiry does not end there. As explained below, those facts remove any doubt that Walker has failed to allege a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . We emphasize that nothing in this opinion should be taken as condoning the actions of Appellees in this case. On the contrary we are dismayed by their reliance on an invalid subpoena to procure the documents that they sought. And we add a note of caution that, under slightly different circumstances, similar actions might well lead us to a conclusion opposite from the one we reach today. But improper conduct alone does not result in a forfeiture of qualified immunity. . . . Rather, the relevant question is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, Appellees’ conduct violated Walker’s clearly established constitutional rights. Because we conclude that it did not, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Munchinski v. Solomon, 747 F. App’x 52, ___ (3d Cir. 2018) (“Our decision in Perdomo. . . clearly established that a defendant had a right to exculpatory evidence in the hands of the police, not just evidence physically possessed by the prosecutors. But at the time, the prosecution team’s disclosure requirements did not extend to evidence that the defendant, with due diligence, should have discovered on his own. Specifically, ‘[e]vidence [was] not considered to be suppressed if the defendant either knew or should have known of the essential facts permitting him to take advantage of any exculpatory evidence.’ . . . In sum, Warman violated clearly established law if he suppressed or withheld favorable and material evidence in possession of police or prosecutors, but only if Munchinski, in the exercise of diligence, could not have discovered that evidence himself.”)

Kane v. Barger, 902 F.3d 185, 188-95 (3d Cir. 2018) (“Altogether, the record—again, viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—supports the inference that Barger acted for his own personal gratification, rather than investigative ends, in both touching Kane and photographing her intimate bodily areas with his personal cell phone in violation of department policy. That is conscience-shocking behavior. Thus, Barger violated Kane’s right to bodily integrity. . . . Here, the right at issue is an individual’s right not to be sexually fondled and illicitly photographed by a police officer investigating his or her case, for the officer’s own gratification. Thus, based on the above, ‘[t]he ultimate question is whether the state of the law when the offense occurred’ gave Barger ‘fair warning’ that his conduct violated this right. . . . We conclude that it did. Intuitively, it seems absurd to analyze whether the right to be free from an officer’s sexual assault was clearly established by case law at the time of Barger’s conduct. This is because, given the egregiousness of Barger’s violation of Kane’s personal security and bodily integrity, the right here is so ‘obvious’ that it could be deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases. . . . Indeed, while Barger has not been convicted of a crime, his actions—viewed in the light most favorable to Kane—resemble the crime of indecent assault in Pennsylvania, where Barger’s conduct occurred.

. . .Further, at the time of Barger’s conduct, both our case law and that of other circuits placed Barger on notice that he acted unconstitutionally.”)

Santini v. Fuentes, 739 F. App’x 718, 721(3d Cir. 2018) (“Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Santini, the District Court considered: whether Plaintiff had a right to be free from the use of force, including the use of pepper spray and strikes from nightsticks, as a non-suspect witness who walked away from an investigatory discussion, and who admitted he (1) unintentionally did not comply with an officer’s request to keep his hands visible, and (2) resisted arrest. . . We agree with the District Court that this formulation of the question adequately contextualizes the alleged conduct as Saucier instructs, with consideration of specifics rather than ‘broad general proposition[s].’. . This question captures the particular conduct alleged and allows us meaningfully to consider whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. We conclude that the right, if it exists, was not clearly established. First, there are no cases directly on point that suggest that this conduct is unlawful. Santini cites several excessive force cases, but none establish a rule for these facts or state a constitutional right that is obviously applicable to this case. Second, the amount of force used was not so significant that the objectively reasonable officer would know it to be unlawful. This is evidenced by the facts that all force stopped as soon as Santini was in handcuffs and that he suffered no significant or lasting injuries. Finally, the objectively reasonable officer would not know the use of force on these facts to be unlawful. Even in the light most favorable to Santini, the facts suggest some level of resistance to Fuhrmann at all stages of the physical interaction and continued resistance, even as officers instructed him to stop resisting. Also relevant is the repeated non-compliance with the instruction to keep hands visible. Even if the right to be free from police use of force in those circumstances exists, the objectionably reasonable officer might not know that. Because qualified immunity protects officers from reasonable error, we conclude that the grant of summary judgment is appropriate.”)

Olson v. Ako, 724 F. App’x 160, 165 (3d Cir. 2018) (“Here, the District Court correctly noted that ‘a finding of qualified immunity should be made at the earliest possible point,’ but then allowed Plaintiffs’ claim to proceed without so finding. . . . A defense motion for a more definite statement is appropriate to ‘facilitate an early resolution of the qualified immunity issue.’. . Here, Defendants moved alternatively to dismiss or for a more definite statement. When the Court granted their 12(e) motion, they provided Plaintiffs with relevant documents from the underlying criminal matter. Plaintiffs then filed an amended complaint, attaching exhibits including: the arrest warrants for the Plaintiffs, the interviews of M.R. and J.C., the search warrant and Detective Ako’s supporting affidavit, the interview with R.W., the investigation report following the execution of the search warrant, and evidence vouchers signed by Defendant Sullivan. The District Court therefore had a record sufficient to rule on qualified immunity. Considering whether the Defendants are immune, the pertinent question ‘is whether a reasonable officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful, in light of the clearly established law and the information in the officer’s possession.’. . The unlawfulness of the conduct must have been placed ‘beyond debate’ in light of ‘controlling authority’ or ‘a “robust consensus of ... persuasive authority.”’. . Here, neither of Plaintiff’s generalized Fourth Amendment claims convincingly places Defendants’ conduct in the orbit of unlawful, let alone unlawful ‘beyond debate.’ Indeed, the Supreme Court has emphasized that ‘[t]he general proposition ... that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . Plaintiffs’ allegations ‘are the kinds of broad propositions of law that cannot guide a court in determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established.’ . . . And even if we were to consider their allegations at the broad level of generality requested, Plaintiffs have failed to identify, for either claim, a case where an officer in similar circumstances was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.”) Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 435-38, 440-42, 450-52 (3d Cir. 2017) (“Granted, the contours of a given right are necessarily co-extensive with the scope of conduct that violates that right, so that where it would not be clear to ‘a reasonable official ... that what he is doing violates [a] right,’ . . . the second prong of qualified immunity would not be satisfied regardless of whether the lack of clarity arose from an uncertain theory of liability or from the application of a clearly established theory of liability to a set of facts so novel as to deprive an actor of fair notice of the violative nature of his actions. But where a defendant contends that neither the theory of liability nor the right at issue is clearly established, the reviewing court may need to analyze both to determine conclusively whether the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here, the District Court addressed the ‘clearly established’ inquiry only in the first sense, determining that the theory of liability was not clearly established. Because we conclude this was error, we also address the inquiry in the second sense, assessing whether, under the facts of this case, the specific right at issue was clearly established. . . . Here the District Court examined one of the elusive aspects of deliberate indifference with which we and other Courts of Appeals have wrestled over time: whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context—as opposed to the Eighth Amendment context—may be satisfied using an objective test or only a subjective ‘actual knowledge’ test. . . . In the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has rejected an objective standard for ‘deliberate indifference,’ i.e., a standard where liability may be premised on an official’s objective ‘failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not,’ . . . and the Court has instead explicitly required a showing of ‘subjective culpability,’ . . . i.e., a showing that ‘the official kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk[.]’ . . . But uncertainty about whether this ‘subjective culpability’ requirement carried over to pretrial detainees and other plaintiffs asserting substantive due process claims produced a split among the Courts of Appeals. . . . That split led us in Sanford to note, in the substantive due process context, ‘the possibility that deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,’ . . . and to acknowledge shortly thereafter that we ‘ha[d] not yet definitively answered the question of whether the appropriate standard in a non-Eighth Amendment substantive due process case is subjective or objective,’ Kaucher v. Cty. of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418, 430–31 (3d Cir. 2006). More recently, both the Supreme Court and this Court have spoken to the issue. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . distinguishing between the different language of the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause and the different nature of those claims, the Supreme Court held that a pretrial detainee claiming a substantive due process violation based on excessive force ‘must show ... only that the officers’ use of that force was objectively unreasonable’ and not ‘that the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable.’ . . . Consistent with this approach, we too recently embraced an objective standard in the context of a substantive due process claim—in particular, for a claim of state-created danger. In L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, we denied qualified immunity to a teacher who released a kindergartener to a stranger who then abused the child. . . After reiterating our observation in Sanford that ‘deliberate indifference might exist without actual knowledge of a risk of harm when the risk is so obvious that it should be known,’ . . we held this standard was met by the allegations in that complaint. . . . Seeking to benefit from the trajectory of this case law, . . . Appellant would have us rely on L.R. to conclude an objective standard of deliberate indifference was clearly established at the time Schroeter shot Kedra and to reverse the District Court on that basis. We reject that invitation, however, because we assess qualified immunity based on the law that was ‘clearly established at the time an action occurred,’ . . . while L.R. was not decided until nearly two years after the action at issue in this case. That is, regardless of what may be deemed ‘clearly established’ in the wake of Kingsley and L.R., we must look to the state of the law at the time of shooting. And at that point, as the District Court correctly recognized, it was not yet clearly established whether deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context was governed by an objective or subjective standard. . . . The question to which we therefore turn is whether Appellant pleaded deliberate indifference under the subjective test, which was then-clearly established, or under an objective test, which then was not. . . . Contrary to the way that Schroeter and the District Court characterize it, the complaint here clearly and unmistakably alleges facts that support an inference of actual, subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of lethal harm, and neither the Supreme Court nor we have wavered from the well-established principle that a plaintiff may plead and prove deliberate indifference in the substantive due process context using this subjective test. . . . The risk of lethal harm when a firearms instructor skips over each of several safety checks designed to ascertain if the gun is unloaded, points the gun at a trainee’s chest, and pulls the trigger is glaringly obvious, and this obviousness supports the inference that the instructor had actual knowledge of the risk of serious harm. . . . ‘[D]raw[ing] all inferences from the facts alleged in the light most favorable to [Appellant],’ . . . the allegations in Appellant’s complaint are more than sufficient to state a claim for a state-created danger based on actual knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm—the subjective theory of deliberate indifference that was then-clearly established. . . . Having concluded that the facts, as alleged, plead the elements of a substantive due process violation under a clearly established theory of liability, we must still contend with Schroeter’s argument that there was no precedent sufficiently ‘factually similar to the plaintiff’s allegations[] to put [him] on notice that his ... conduct [was] constitutionally prohibited.’ . . . Here, in view of the allegations of the complaint, we define what is at issue as an individual’s right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer’s demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols. . . . We then must determine whether the contours of that right are sufficiently clear that ‘a reasonable officer would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . We typically look to Supreme Court precedent or a consensus in the Courts of Appeals to give an officer fair warning that his conduct would be unconstitutional. . . . We are persuaded that Schroeter had such fair warning at the time of the shooting. This was not merely an accidental discharge of a firearm that happened to be ‘point[ed] ... at another officer’ at the time. . . . Instead, at a training Kedra was required to attend, he was subjected to his training instructor contravening each and every firearm safety protocol by skipping over both required safety checks, treating the firearm as if it were unloaded, pointing the firearm directly at Kedra, and pulling the trigger. Our case law made it clear at that time that state actors may be liable for affirmatively exposing a plaintiff to a deadly risk of harm through ‘highly dangerous ... conduct,’ . . . or through ‘us[ing] their authority as police officers to create a dangerous situation or to make [the victim] more vulnerable to danger had they not intervened,’ . . . and that officials are expected to use the benefit of their expertise and professional training when confronted with situations in which they are responsible for preventing harm to other individuals[.]. . . Under that case law, no reasonable officer who was aware of the lethal risk involved in demonstrating the use of deadly force on another person and who proceeded to conduct the demonstration in a manner directly contrary to known safety protocols could think his conduct was lawful. . . . In addition to our own case law and that of the Supreme Court, ‘we routinely consider decisions by other Courts of Appeals as part of our “clearly established” analysis when we have not yet addressed the specific right asserted by the plaintiff.’ . . . A closely analogous case from the First Circuit confirms that a reasonable officer would anticipate liability for this conduct. [discussing Marrero-Rodriguez v. San Juan, 677 F.3d 497 (1st Cir. 2012)] . . . In sum, the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, and Appellant’s complaint sufficiently pleads a violation of that right. Accordingly, Schroeter was not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Kedra v. Schroeter, 876 F.3d 424, 452-53, 457-58 (3d Cir. Nov. 28, 2017) (Fisher, J., concurring) (“I file this concurrence to explain my belief that the District Court’s judgment should be reversed on narrower grounds than those on which the majority relies. . . . The District Court granted Schroeter qualified immunity under the second prong, concluding that it was not clearly established that he could violate a constitutional right without actual knowledge that his actions posed a substantial risk of harm. The majority reverses, concluding that (1) Kedra has pleaded that Schroeter acted with actual knowledge that his actions posed a substantial risk of harm, and (2) the right at issue here was clearly established. . . . I would limit this decision to the narrowest possible grounds, and would reverse solely because of the allegation that Schroeter pleaded guilty to recklessly endangering another person in Pennsylvania court. I do not believe that the other allegations on which the majority relies are sufficient—separately or together—to state a claim. . . . In short, after scrutinizing the entire complaint, I conclude that aside from Schroeter’s guilty plea to reckless endangerment, the remaining allegations in Kedra’s complaint make out only a strong case of negligence. I do not believe they would be sufficient, by themselves, to state a claim that Schroeter acted with the deliberate indifference required to shock the conscience. . . . To summarize, Kedra adequately pleaded deliberate indifference, and therefore she alleged all four required elements of a state created danger claim. . . . Having adequately pleaded her constitutional claim, Kedra has met the first requirement of the qualified immunity analysis: conduct by an officer that violates a federal right. . . . I arrive, then, at the second element that must be shown in order to defeat Schroeter’s claim of qualified immunity: that ‘the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.’ . . . I agree with the majority’s conclusion that the right at issue in this case was clearly established—but again, based on different reasoning. . . . The majority defines the right at issue here as ‘an individual’s right not to be subjected, defenseless, to a police officer’s demonstration of the use of deadly force in a manner contrary to all applicable safety protocols.’ . . . I would define the right more narrowly, and in accordance with my analysis of the first qualified immunity prong in Section I.A., as: a police officer’s right not to be subjected to a firearms training in which the instructor acts with deliberate indifference, that is, consciously disregards a known risk of death or great bodily harm. Schroeter’s admitted deliberate indifference is crucial, in my opinion, to the conclusion at the first step of the analysis that a right was violated. . . . Therefore, in order to narrowly define the right in light of the particular conduct at issue, . . . I would include deliberate indifference in the definition. . . . Given the unique facts of this case—namely, Schroeter’s guilty plea—I believe it is appropriate to tether the right in question to the standard of care he admitted he breached. The majority’s approach, by contrast, suffers from its focus on the violation of ‘all applicable safety protocols,’ which will inevitably lead to disputes over how many safety protocols need to be violated for qualified immunity to be forfeited. And those disputes, I predict, will devolve into a negligence-type analysis, which precedent clearly forbids. The majority’s definition of the right could prove fertile ground for future plaintiffs seeking to lower the bar yet further in § 1983 cases. Turning to whether the right as I define it was clearly established, I conclude that in light of existing case law, a reasonable person could not have believed that it was consistent with Kedra’s substantive due process rights to subject him to a firearms training at which the instructor was deliberately indifferent to his safety. Therefore, the right was clearly established. Unlike the majority, I do not read existing cases as being ‘fundamentally’ or ‘materially’ similar to this one. . . . The lack of on-point precedent gives me pause, because a case’s ‘present [ation] [of] a unique set of facts and circumstances’ can be ‘an important indication’ that the conduct at issue ‘did not violate a clearly established right.’ . . . Nonetheless, I feel constrained to conclude that Supreme Court and Circuit precedents have ‘clearly established’ the ‘violative nature,’ . . . of conducting a firearms training with deliberate indifference to a known risk. To begin with, the deliberate indifference standard was clearly enunciated in the state created danger context more than a decade ago and was clear at the time of Kedra’s death in 2014. . . . While our state created danger cases are not factually similar to this one—they do not involve police officers conducting firearms training—I cannot see how any reasonable official could believe that acting with deliberate indifference in the police firearms training context would be consistent with trainees’ constitutional rights.”)

In Re: J & S Properties, LLC, 872 F.3d 138, 143-45 (3d Cir. 2017) (“We . . . hold that bankruptcy trustees are government officials, entitled under Harlow to qualified immunity from § 1983 claims by third parties when they act in their official capacity in a manner that is not contrary to clearly established law. . . . In this case, Swope was not plainly incompetent and did not violate clearly established law. We agree with the Bankruptcy Court that there is a ‘dearth of case law on the topic’ of whether a bankruptcy trustee may take control of a building which she is obliged to preserve and which is at imminent risk of destruction or damage, especially in the face of the lack of cooperation by a third-party tenant. . . . Rather than point to any case balancing a bankruptcy trustee’s duties to preserve the estate under her care in the face of ‘exigent circumstances’ and her duties to a third-party tenant, . . .Phoenician cites black-letter Pennsylvania law indicating that self-help eviction is generally impermissible. . . .The Supreme Court has cautioned that the question of ‘objective legal reasonableness’ with respect to clearly established precedent should not be applied at too high a level of generality. . . .Phoenician makes that mistake by noting that its rights to due process of law and to be free of illegal seizure are ‘quite clearly established.’. . . But the existence of those clearly established rights sheds no light on whether Swope’s actions would violate them in the circumstances presented here. . . .The cases Phoenician cites do not approach the level of specificity required for clearly established law. . . .None of the cases upon which Phoenician relies involved a trustee attempting to preserve assets of an estate under her care in the face of past and future damage to those assets. And considering Phoenician’s lack of cooperation by giving Swope a key that only opened the outer door, its refusal ‘to keep the property adequately heated,’ and its failure to meet at the property and maintain insurance, . . . there is no law that clearly establishes the unlawfulness of Swope’s actions. . . . It strains credulity to suggest, as Phoenician does, that ‘every reasonable official would have understood that what’ Swope did constituted an impermissible eviction that violated due process.”)

Borrell v. Bloomsburg Univ., 870 F.3d 154, 162-63 (3d Cir. 2017) (“The record indicates that it is hardly ‘beyond debate’ that Ficca violated Borrell’s due process rights. Although many cases have concluded that graduate students at public universities have property interests in continuing their education, . . . those cases do not speak to the right of a clinical student at a private hospital to a hearing or comparable process before termination—even if the natural consequence of that termination is an inability to complete an educational program. The District Court pointed to no cases even suggesting such a right and we are aware of no such case. And the district court cases cited cannot clearly establish law for qualified immunity purposes in any event. . . . In responding to Ficca’s qualified immunity argument, Borrell seems to miss the relevant question—would a reasonable official have known that her actions violated a clearly established right? Even if, as Borrell claims, Ficca should have known that Richer’s actions were disciplinary and not academic, and Borrell was thus entitled to more process from someone, this does not answer the question of whether Ficca was that person. Given all the factors discussed herein, and given her reasonable understanding that she could not have provided process for the clinical dismissal even if she thought it was necessary in the abstract, the District Court should have granted qualified immunity to Ficca.”)

Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 355-62 (3d Cir. 2017) (“Every Circuit Court of Appeals to address this issue (First, Fifth, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh) has held that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. [collecting cases] Today we join this growing consensus. Simply put, the First Amendment protects the act of photographing, filming, or otherwise recording police officers conducting their official duties in public. . . .Defendants ask us to avoid ruling on the First Amendment issue. Instead, they want us to hold that, regardless of the right’s existence, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the City cannot be vicariously liable for the officers’ acts. We reject this invitation to take the easy way out. Because this First Amendment issue is of great importance and the recording of police activity is a widespread, common practice, we deal with it before addressing, if needed, defenses to liability. . . . We have not ruled on the First Amendment right, instead merely holding that at the time of our rulings the claimed right was not clearly established. Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010); True Blue Auctions v. Foster, 528 F. App'x 190 (3d Cir. 2013). In the years since, First Amendment issues from the recording of police activity recur, and they deal directly with constitutional doctrine. With technological progress and the ubiquity of smartphone ownership—especially in the years since our Kelly decision—we are now in an age where the public can record our public officials' conduct and easily distribute that recording widely. This increase in the observation, recording, and sharing of police activity has contributed greatly to our national discussion of proper policing. Consequently, police departments nationwide, often with input from the U.S. Department of Justice, are developing policies addressing precisely these issues, and our opinion can assist in their efforts to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, in the case before us the constitutional question is not 'so factbound that [our] decision [will] provide[] little guidance for future cases.' . . . All we need to decide is whether the First Amendment protects the act of recording police officers carrying out official duties in public places. We also have excellent briefing on appeal, including counsel for the parties and eight amici, including the U.S. Department of Justice, the Cato Institute, well-known First Amendment law professors, and some of the largest news organizations in the country. We therefore address the First Amendment question before moving to the defenses. . . . The First Amendment protects the public's right of access to information about their officials' public activities. . . . [R]ecording police activity in public falls squarely within the First Amendment right of access to information. As no doubt the press has this right, so does the public. . . . We do not say that all recording is protected or desirable. The right to record police is not absolute. '[I]t is subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.' . . . But in public places these restrictions are restrained. We need not, however, address at length the limits of this constitutional right. Defendants offer nothing to justify their actions. Fields took a photograph across the street from where the police were breaking up a party. Geraci moved to a vantage point where she could record a protestor's arrest, but did so without getting in the officers' way. If a person's recording interferes with police activity, that activity might not be protected. For instance, recording a police conversation with a confidential informant may interfere with an investigation and put a life at stake. But here there are no countervailing concerns. In sum, under the First Amendment's right of access to information the public has the commensurate right to record—photograph, film, or audio record—police officers conducting official police activity in public areas. . . . To determine whether the right is clearly established, we look at the state of the law when the retaliation occurred, here in 2012 (Geraci) and 2013 (Fields). . . . To conduct the clearly established inquiry, we 'frame the right "in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,"' . . . as it needs to be 'specific enough to put "every reasonable official" on notice of it.' . . . At issue here is Plaintiffs' ability to record the police carrying out official duties in public. We have never held that such a right exists, only that it might. . . . In 2010 we held that there was no clearly established right for the public to do so, at least in the context of a police traffic stop. . . . Only a few years later in 2013, in a non-precedential opinion, we held that '[e]ven if the distinction between traffic stops and public sidewalk confrontations is [] meaningful ... [], our case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their duties [in 2009].’ . . . So to resolve whether the right has become clearly established after these decisions, we must decide whether a ‘robust consensus’ has emerged that puts the existence of this First Amendment right ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Plaintiffs contend the absence of Circuit precedent does not end the inquiry, as after the events in Kelly and True Blue the Philadelphia Police Department adopted official policies recognizing the First Amendment right of citizens to record police in public. As plausible as that may be on the surface, it does not win the argument. With one breath Plaintiffs assert that these policies clearly established their legal right, but for purposes of municipal liability (an issue we remand) they vigorously argue that the policies were utterly ineffective in conveying to the officers that this right clearly existed. And Plaintiffs have compiled evidence indicating this was so. . . . As to decisions of other appellate courts relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, Defendants and the District Court argue that those decisions are distinguishable because they involved expressive intent or an intent to distribute. . . . Indeed, the Fifth Circuit just this year recognized that these other appellate decisions did not clearly establish the constitutional right to record. . . . Where District Courts in our Circuit have held in favor of the First Amendment right, Defendants also distinguish those cases for requiring expressive act or intent, not just recording alone, once again echoing the reasoning of the District Court here. . . . Whether Defendants and the District Court correctly distinguished these cases, we cannot say that the state of the law at the time of our cases (2012 and 2013) gave fair warning so that every reasonable officer knew that, absent some sort of expressive intent, recording public police activity was constitutionally protected. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Fields v. City of Philadelphia, 862 F.3d 353, 362-65 (3d Cir. 2017) (Nygaard, J., concurring in the part, dissenting in part) (“I agree with the majority that the cause must be remanded. Because I conclude that the First Amendment right at issue is and was clearly established, I dissent. . . . First, as the majority notes, every Circuit Court of Appeals that has considered the issue ruled that there is a First Amendment right to record police activity in public. Four of these decisions were published before the conduct at issue here, and two of them occurred after our decision in Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248 (3d Cir. 2010), in which we posited that the right was not clearly established at that time. See Am. Civil Liberties Union of Ill. v. Alvarez, 679 F.3d 583 (7th Cir. 2012); Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78 (1st Cir. 2011); Smith v. City of Cumming, 212 F.3d 1332 (11th Cir. 2000); Fordyce v. City of Seattle, 55 F.3d 436 (9th Cir. 1995). . . . I am convinced that such a ‘robust consensus,’ alone, sufficiently grounds a ruling that the right is clearly established. . . . However, our record goes far beyond that. The Police Department’s official policies explicitly recognized this First Amendment right well before the incidents under review here took place. . . . Although the Directives declared a First Amendment right well ahead of this Court, the Philadelphia Police Department Commissioner had a desire to ‘get out ahead’ of what he presciently viewed as an inevitable ruling. With all of this, it is indisputable that all officers in the Philadelphia Police Department were put on actual notice that they were required to uphold the First Amendment right to make recordings of police activity. From a practical perspective, the police officers had no ground to claim ambiguity about the boundaries of the citizens’ constitutional right here. Mindful of the established trend among the Circuit Courts of Appeals, this combined with this clear Guidance from the Commissioner sufficiently grounds a conclusion that the right to record official, public police activity was clearly established and ‘beyond debate.’. However, this, too, ignores another piece of the context of this case that should be considered as part of the ‘reasonable official’ inquiry. The majority cites to the 2011 article of Seth F. Kreimer. . . in which he notes that, given the ubiquity of personal electronic devices with cameras, ‘[w]e live, relate, work, and decide in a world where image capture from life is routine, and captured images are part of ongoing discourse, both public and private. Capture of images has become an adjunct to memory and an accepted medium of connection and correspondence.’ Seth F. Kreimer, Pervasive Image Capture and the First Amendment: Memory, Discourse, and the Right to Record, 159 U. Pa. L. Rev. 335, 337 (2011). If we are to assess the issue from a reasonable officer perspective, we cannot artificially remove him or her from this widespread societal phenomenon. (Indeed, it is not unreasonable to speculate that most—if not all—of the police officers themselves possessed such a personal electronic device at the time that the incidents underlying these cases took place.) A reasonable police officer would have understood, first-hand, the significance of this proliferation of personal electronic devices that have integrated image capture into our daily lives, making it a routine aspect of the way in which people record and communicate events. Apart from any court ruling or official directive, the officers’ own lived experience with personal electronic devices (both from the perspective of being the one who is recording and one who is being recorded) makes it unreasonable to assume that the police officers were oblivious to the First Amendment implications of any attempt by them to curtail such recordings. As I noted above, I concur with the majority’s analysis and conclusions regarding the existence of a First Amendment right to record, and agree that the case against the City of Philadelphia should be remanded for further proceedings. However, in light of the social, cultural, and legal context in which this case arose, I am convinced that—in this unique circumstance—no reasonable officer could have denied at the time of the incidents underlying these cases that efforts to prevent people from recording their activities infringed rights guaranteed by the First Amendment. For these reasons, I dissent from the majority’s conclusion that the police officers are immune from suit.”)

De Ritis v. McGarrigle, 861 F.3d 444, 458 n.12 (3d Cir. 2017) (“As we conclude that there was no constitutional right violated by Roger under then-existing case law, a fortiori, such right was not ‘ “clearly established” at the time of the challenged conduct,’ . . . and thus Roger was entitled to qualified immunity on that independent ground. The District Judge here diligently identified the relevant case law and properly recognized as a general matter that a public employee has a clearly established right to ‘alleg[e] misconduct or wrongdoing by public officials.’ . . . That description of the right, however, is so general as to encompass not only cases where speech alleging misconduct or wrongdoing is protected, . . . but also those where it is not[.] Under our case law, the ‘clearly established’ inquiry requires reference not to such ‘broad general proposition[s],’ but to precedent that is ‘factually similar to the plaintiff’s allegations,’ based on ‘the specific context of the case.’”)

Bag of Holdings, LLC v. City of Philadelphia, 682 F. App’x 94, ____ (3d Cir. 2017) (“BOH does not cite, and the Court has not found, any precedent clearly establishing that operation of a governmental land sale process which results in more favorable treatment for friends and political contributors amounts to an equal protection violation. To now say that Olech established that principle of law would be too near to concluding that any disparate treatment by a government actor without a rational basis—regardless of the factual circumstance—so clearly establishes a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment that the question is beyond debate. Such a broad pronouncement would fail to define the right at issue with sufficient specificity, and it would run contrary to a long-recognized purpose of qualified immunity: to shield public officials from potentially disabling threats of constitutional liability except in those situations where they have fair warning that their conduct violates federal law. . . . Accordingly, we agree with the District Court’s conclusion that Councilman Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Holt v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. 15-3302, 2017 WL 1048055, at *6 (3d Cir. Mar. 20, 2017) (not published) (“We start with the First Amendment retaliation claim, for which a plaintiff must prove: (1) constitutionally protected conduct; (2) an adverse action sufficient to deter a person of ordinary firmness from exercising his constitutional rights; and (3) a causal link between the constitutionally protected conduct and the retaliatory action. . . . Our Circuit has not considered whether the initiation of an internal investigation can constitute an ‘adverse action’ for purposes of a First Amendment retaliation claim, and our sister circuits are split on the issue. Compare Breaux v. City of Garland, 205 F.3d 150, 158 (5th Cir. 2000) (“Investigating alleged violations of departmental policies ... [is] not [an] adverse employment action[.]”), with Dahlia v. Rodriguez, 735 F.3d 1060, 1078–79 (9th Cir. 2013) (holding that placement on administrative leave pending discipline can constitute an adverse action for a First Amendment retaliation cases). This disagreement among our sister courts indicates that Winterbottom is entitled to qualified immunity. After all, ‘[i]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject [a public official] to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’ Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999). We next consider Holt’s racial discrimination claim, where we apply the McDonnell Douglas burden-shifting framework. See Stewart v. Rutgers, The State Univ., 120 F.3d 426, 431–32 (3d Cir. 1997). At the first step of the McDonnell Douglas framework, Holt must establish a prima facie case of discrimination, which includes proving by a preponderance of the evidence that he suffered an ‘adverse employment action.’ . . . In the Title VII context, we recently held that suspension with pay pending an internal investigation does not constitute an adverse employment action. . . . And because of the overlap between Title VII claims and constitutional discrimination claims, we have applied Title VII caselaw to equal protection claims. . . . Given our holding in Jones and the close relationship between Title VII and equal protection claims, it would have been reasonable for Winterbottom to conclude that the initiation of an IAD investigation would not create liability under the Equal Protection Clause. She is thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Pearson v. Prison Health Service, 850 F.3d 526, 542 n.6 (3d Cir. 2017) (“Nurse Rhodes argued that he was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of these events that an official would be liable for a delay in care without expert medical evidence that the inmate suffered harm as a result. This fundamentally misunderstands the qualified immunity inquiry. Qualified immunity requires us to ask whether a reasonable official would have understood, at the time of the challenged conduct, that what he or she was doing violated an established right. Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011). That analysis cannot turn on facts that could not be known to an official at the time, like whether the plaintiff would ultimately be able to produce expert testimony that the delay resulted in harm. It was sufficiently clear at the time of these events that exposing an inmate to the kind of severe and protracted pain and mental anxiety alleged in this case could expose an official to Eighth Amendment liability.”)

Rossiter v. City of Philadelphia, 674 F.App’x 192, ____ (3d Cir. 2016) (“Rossiter alleged that Ramsey and the Department retaliated against him because he exercised his First Amendment right to be a member of the FOP, his union. The District Court found a clearly established right of a public-sector employee to be a member of an association. . . . However, what it did not do was focus specifically on the kind of associational activity present in this case. . . . That a public employee has a right to associate with a union is unchallenged. What is contested here is whether there is an established right of that employee in a pending disciplinary proceeding to associate passively with a union whose representatives oppose internal policies. . . . In Sanguigni, we emphasized Labov ‘d[id] not make clear’ whether Connick’s public concern requirement for public employee speech applies in associational cases. . . . We recognized that, in the years since we decided Labov, our Court had not settled the question of whether a public employee must demonstrate that the union representative’s advocacy raises a matter of public concern in bringing a claim for expressive association. . . . We reserved judgment on whether the public concern requirement applies to association claims when those claims do not allege retaliation for the member’s speech. . . . Our sister Circuits are split on whether an employee must demonstrate that the protected activity relates to a matter of public concern to trigger First Amendment associational rights and consequent protections against retaliation. [collecting cases] We accordingly find no consensus of authority that leveraging a claim against a specific union member facing good faith disciplinary action in an effort to settle internal police affairs implicates a clearly established constitutional right. What the Deputy Commissioner attempted to resolve by tethering Rossiter’s case to resolution of union opposition to the Disciplinary Code may not be Hoyle, but it was not established as unconstitutional when it occurred. Therefore, Ramsey and the Department are entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse the decision of the District Court and remand this case for it to enter judgment in their favor.”)

L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, 836 F.3d 235, 248-50 (3d Cir. 2016) (“Defendants argue that the District Court defined Jane’s right at the highest level of generality: ‘[Jane’s] Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity ... under the state-created danger theory.’ . . . We agree that this definition is too broad. Individuals indeed have a broad substantive due process right to be free from ‘unjustified intrusions on personal security.’ . . . In light of the specific allegations in the complaint, however, the right at issue here is an individual’s right to not be removed from a safe environment and placed into one in which it is clear that harm is likely to occur, particularly when the individual may, due to youth or other factors, be especially vulnerable to the risk of harm. Framed in this way, and surveying both our case law and that of our sister circuits, we conclude that this right was clearly established at the time of Littlejohn's actions. Although there is no case that directly mirrors the facts here, as in Estate of Lagano, there are sufficiently analogous cases that should have placed a reasonable official in Littlejohn's position on notice that his actions were unlawful. . . . [W]e conclude that the state of the law in 2013 was sufficiently clear to put Littlejohn on notice that permitting a kindergarten student to leave his classroom with an unidentified adult could lead to a deprivation of that student's substantive due process rights. . . . State-created danger cases often involve unsettling facts and this case is no different. Even so, our resolution of the legal issues is straightforward. Exposing a young child to an obvious danger is the quintessential example of when qualified immunity should not shield a public official from suit. Accordingly, the order of the District Court is affirmed.")

Mammaro v. New Jersey Div. of Child Prot. & Permanency, 814 F.3d 164, 169-70 (3d Cir. 2016) ("In bringing a substantive due process claim, one alleges that the government has abused its power in an arbitrary manner that 'shocks the conscience.' . . . In this case Mammaro alleged the arbitrary interference with her right to parent her child. . . . She contends that the right at issue is her right to be free from the temporary removal of her child unless there is 'some reasonable and articulable evidence giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that a child has been abused or is in imminent danger of abuse.' . . . This definition is too broad for purposes of qualified immunity, however. We must frame clearly established law 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . We thus consider the substantive due process right of Mammaro as a parent in light of the specific allegations in her amended complaint. She contends that the caseworkers removed her child after she violated the restrictions on her contact with D.M. by removing the child from supervised housing. At the time of the removal, Mammaro alleges that there was insufficient evidence of past abuse or risk of future abuse by her to justify D.M.'s removal. Even if so, for Mammaro's case to have legs she must show that the law was so well established at that time a reasonable caseworker would have understood that temporarily removing a child in those circumstances would violate substantive due process. . . . We conclude that there was no consensus of authority that temporarily removing a child after the parent takes the child from approved housing violates substantive due process. . . . The Court has never found a substantive due process violation when state agencies temporarily remove a child, whatever the circumstances of the removal. Accordingly, no Supreme Court precedent clearly establishes that D.M.'s temporary removal from her mother's custody violated substantive due process. Likewise, assuming a consensus of persuasive authority could clearly establish a right, there is no consensus that removing D.M. was an unconstitutional interference with the parent-child relationship.")

Estep v. Mackey, 639 F. App'x 870, 872-74 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Here, the District Court's order turned on its view that there were disputed issues of material fact, but it reached this conclusion without identifying with the requisite level of specificity the right that was allegedly violated and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. This omission constitutes a legal error that requires us to vacate the order denying summary judgment. . . . In this case, the District Court defined the right at issue as the Fourth Amendment right to be free from the excessive use of force. This formulation lacks the required level of specificity and does not address the question that needs to be answered in this context because it does not describe the specific situation that the officers confronted. . . . As a result, we will remand to the District Court to allow it to more specifically identify the right at issue. After the District Court formulates the right, its second task will be to determine if that right was clearly established at the time the taser was used against Baum. While there need not be a case on point, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Put differently, while a court need not find that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful,’ . . . to be clearly established, it must ‘conclude that the firmly settled state of the law, established by a forceful body of persuasive precedent, would place a reasonable official on notice that his actions obviously violated a clearly established constitutional right.’ . . . If the District Court determines that such a right was clearly established, it would then determine whether the facts it already correctly found to be in dispute are material to assessing whether that right was violated. . . . Our Court has not yet spoken in a precedential opinion about taser use and we decline to do so here, as the District Court has not specifically identified the right allegedly violated and whether it was clearly established at the time Baum was tased. As stated in the text, the identification of the right depends upon the factual circumstances of the case.”)

Michtavi v. Scism, 808 F.3d 203, 207 (3d Cir. 2015) (“Barkes makes clear that there must be precedent indicating that the specific right at issue is clearly established. There is no Supreme Court or appellate precedent holding that prison officials must treat retrograde ejaculation, infertility, or erectile dysfunction; in fact, the weight of authority is to the contrary. The Magistrate Judge relied on Skinner, but Skinner establishes only that states may not sterilize prisoners; it does not hold that prisoners are entitled to treatment for infertility or sexual problems. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit has held that a prisoner is not entitled to treatment for erectile dysfunction. . . . Because there is no authority establishing—let alone ‘clearly’ establishing—a right for prisoners to receive treatment for a right for prisoners to receive treatment for conditions resulting in impotence and/or infertility, such as retrograde ejaculation or erectile dysfunction, Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Young v. Martin, 801 F.3d 172, 180 & n.8, 182 (3d Cir. 2015) (“[I]n Hope, the Supreme Court applied its excessive force jurisprudence for the first time to a prisoner’s allegation that his placement in mechanical restraints was unconstitutional. We conclude, under Hope, that Young’s claims should be analyzed under the excessive force test and that such analysis demonstrates that the District Court’s grant of summary judgment was in error. . . . We conclude from our independent review of the videotape and record evidence that the District Court failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Young’s favor and that, when those inferences are properly drawn, there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether the Defendants’ use of the restraint chair in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . In sum, applying the use of excessive force test, analyzing the record under the criteria identified in Hope, and drawing all inferences in favor of Young as the nonmoving party, we cannot say that ‘there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.’ . . . The Defendants also ask us—in a single sentence—to affirm on the ground of qualified immunity. The District Court did not reach the issue and the availability of the defense was not briefed on appeal. In Hope, the Supreme Court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity because their actions violated ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . We will leave this issue for the District Court to address in the first instance on remand, considering (1) whether ‘the state of the law’ in 2009, including Hope, gave the Defendants ‘fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Young] was unconstitutional,’ . . . and (2) whether Young’s confinement in the restraint chair violated prison regulations of which the Defendants were aware[.]. . . While we conclude that the particular claims here concerning the use of mechanical restraints are properly analyzed under the excessive force test, we note that the record in this case, reflecting Young’s detention in solitary confinement for over six years, and the DOJ investigative report, detailing prolonged solitary confinement at SCI–Greene and five other Pennsylvania prisons, raises serious concerns under the Eighth Amendment’s conditions of confinement test. As Justice Kennedy recently observed, ‘[y]ears on end of near-total isolation exact a terrible price.’ Davis v. Ayala, — U.S. —, —, 135 S.Ct. 2187, 2210, 192 L.Ed.2d 323 (2015) (Kennedy, J., concurring)[.]”)

Potts v. Holt, 617 F. App’x 148, 151-53 (3d Cir. 2015) (“The District Court determined that defendants had not adduced evidence sufficient to show that their suspension of the certified meals program was reasonable under Turner or that it satisfied the RFRA standard. We agree with these determinations because, inter alia, defendants did not establish the nature or even the existence of any nexus between the salmonella outbreak/lockdown and their suspension of certified religious meals. . . The District Court concluded, however, that Potts’s rights were not clearly established at the time of defendants’ alleged conduct. . . . The District Court defined the right at issue in this case as the right to ‘religious meals during a prison-wide lockdown that resulted after an outbreak of food poisoning (or disease generally) in the inmate population.’ . . The District Court further concluded that such a right was not clearly established because there is no case law addressing an inmate’s right to religious meals in a similar factual scenario. There does indeed appear to be a dearth of such case law. . . . ‘Even though there may be no previous precedent directly on point,’ however, ‘an action can still violate a clearly established right where a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law applies with obvious clarity.’ . . Such is the case here. At the time of defendants’ alleged conduct, it was clearly established in this Circuit that prisoners’ general right to freely exercise their religion gives them the more specific right to be served religiously acceptable meals while in prison. . . It also had long been established that prison officials may constitutionally infringe that specific First Amendment right when prison administration so requires, but only when the infringement is reasonable under the Turner factors. . . And RFRA clearly establishes that defendants may not substantially burden an inmate’s exercise of religion without satisfying the standard set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb–1(b). Thus, at the time of defendants’ alleged conduct, it was clearly established both that Potts had a right to religiously acceptable meals and that defendants could not infringe on that right without sufficient justification under Turner and RFRA. . . In light of our precedent addressing prisoners’ religious diets, no reasonable prison official could have believed that he or she could simply withhold Potts’s religious meals for two weeks in the absence of some justification. And in light of Turner and RFRA, no reasonable prison official could have believed that the salmonella outbreak and lockdown provided such justification in the absence of some nexus between the outbreak/lockdown and defendants' ability to provide religious meals, which the current record does not reveal. . . .In sum, the District Court erred in concluding on this record that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Potts's First Amendment and RFRA claims. We express no opinion on the merits of those claims or on whether, at some later stage, defendants might show that they are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Vargas v. City of Philadelphia, 783 F.3d 962, 972 n.13 (3d Cir. 2015) (“The officers’ conduct here would also be shielded by qualified immunity. . . . The case law does not indicate any analogous factual circumstances that would have put the officers on notice that they cannot briefly detain individuals in response to an emergency call and to await trained medical transport without violating the Fourth Amendment. We had not, before today, expressly held that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the seizure of a person outside of a home, which suggests that, to the extent there was doubt, the law in this area was not ‘clearly established.’”)

Estate of Lagano v. Bergen Cnty. Prosecutor’s Office, 769 F.3d 850, 859 (3d Cir. 2014) (“The District Court focused on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that the constitutional right claimed to have been violated was not clearly established at the time of Lagano’s murder. In reaching this conclusion, the District Court reasoned that because ‘[t]here are no published cases that extend the state created danger right to confidential informants in the Third Circuit[,] ... it would be unfair to hold that a constitutional right was “clearly established.”’ . . . The District Court defined the right asserted by the Estate as ‘a confidential informant’s constitutional right to nondisclosure.’ . . . We cannot endorse the District Court’s unduly narrow construction of the right at issue, or its statement that the right was not clearly established. It has been clearly established in this Circuit for nearly two decades that a state-created danger violates due process. . . . That we have not applied the state-created danger theory in the context of a confidential informant is not dispositive on the qualified immunity defense. . . . Thus, the Estate can overcome Mordaga’s qualified immunity defense without proving that we have previously issued a binding decision recognizing a state-created danger in the context of the disclosure of a confidential informant’s status, and the District Court erred in requiring it to do so. The focus of the qualified immunity inquiry is on the allegations made by the Estate. Specifically, the question is whether the facts averred by the Estate fall within the elements of the state-created danger theory, and whether ‘it would be clear to a reasonable officer’ that the alleged disclosure was unlawful under the circumstances. . . . We express no opinion as to whether the amended complaint satisfies these inquiries, but, because the District Court failed to apply the proper standard, we must vacate the District Court’s decision in favor of Mordaga on the qualified immunity defense.”)

Montanez v. Sec’y Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corr., 773 F.3d 472, 487 (3d Cir. 2014) (“At the time that the deductions from Hale’s account first occurred in February 2004, it was not clearly established in this Court that the failure to provide prison inmates with a pre-deprivation opportunity to object to automatic deductions from their prison accounts violated the Due Process Clause. In 2005, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court decided Buck v. Beard, which could be read to suggest that a sentencing hearing was the only pre-deprivation hearing constitutionally required. . . Further, earlier decisions of our Court had held that, in some circumstances, postdeprivation remedies were sufficient constitutional process for deductions. . . For these reasons, there was a sufficient lack of clarity in Third Circuit and Pennsylvania case law regarding automatic deductions that the Corrections Officials should be entitled to qualified immunity in this case.”)

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App’x 348, 356, 358 (6th Cir. 2014) (“Here, Defendants’ alleged decision not to enforce rules against bullying or punishments for bullying gave students license to act with impunity. We decline to establish a standard in which ‘[d]ereliction of duty becomes a school’s best defense,’ particularly in cases such as this where it ‘enabl[es] a pattern of physical abuse to persist,’ Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 196 (3d Cir.2013) (Fuentes, J. dissenting), and would reasonably be expected to embolden them to continue to escalate their abuse. In any event, even assuming there was a state-created danger, reasonable officials would not have believed that their conduct was unlawful based on clearly established law. Defendants correctly argue that federal cases addressing the state-created danger doctrine have not previously found school officials liable for student-on-student harassment. Although these cases are distinguishable, the fact remains that at the time Defendants violated T.S.’s substantive due process right, it was not clearly established that school officials violate due process by failing to address student-on-student harassment. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity for violations of T.S.’s substantive due process right. . . . The equal protection right to be free from student-on-student discrimination is well-established. See Williams, 455 F. App’x at 619; Murrell, 186 F.3d at 1250–52; Flores, 324 F.3d at 1135. It is difficult to imagine how any school administrator could think he would not be liable for allowing unregulated religious and gender-based persecution that spanned a four-year period. In light of the case law, the Shivelys have pled facts that show Defendants were objectively unreasonable in failing to address their complaints of student-on-student harassment and are not entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys’ equal protection claim.”)

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App’x 348, 360-63 (6th Cir. 2014) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Although I agree with the majority in most respects, I respectfully disagree with my colleagues regarding two issues. First, the majority finds no error with the district court’s blanket denial of immunity to all six individual defendants. I disagree. . . . The district court failed to separately analyze the constitutionality of each defendant’s actions. Its failure to do so was error. . . In the same vein, neither did the Shivelys ‘plead that each’ individual defendant, ‘through [the individual defendant’s] own ... actions’ violated the constitution. . . The Shivelys did make specific allegations as to defendants Booth, Nutter, and Lucas (a school principal and two superintendents, respectively). The Shivelys’ complaint alleges that these defendants had knowledge of T.S.’s harassment and that they made decisions about the district’s response to that harassment. However, the complaint is deficient regarding defendants Wells, Miller, and Brown. The complaint does not allege any instances where Wells, Miller, or Brown were informed about T.S.’s harassment or that they made any decisions about how to respond to that harassment. The majority concludes that it is proper to allow claims against Wells, Miller, and Brown to proceed, despite the complaint's failure to make allegations regarding these defendants. I respectfully disagree. The majority reaches this conclusion on the theory that, because Wells, Miller, and Brown were administrators of the schools T.S. attended, it is reasonable to infer that they must have known about the harassment and made decisions in response to it. This, however, is precisely the type of inference that the law prohibits. . . For these reasons, I would hold that we should address the claims against Lucas, Booth, and Nutter, as they were properly pleaded. However, the claims as to Wells, Miller, and Brown should be dismissed because the Shivelys have not shown that they are entitled to relief against these defendants. Second, although I agree with the majority that the district court properly concluded that Lucas, Booth, and Nutter are entitled to qualified immunity on the Shivelys' substantive due process claim, I write separately to emphasize that the majority does not hold that the Shivelys have established a substantive due process violation. Rather, it holds that, assuming the Shivelys did establish such a violation, the right at issue here was not clearly established. Therefore, the majority's rather extensive discussion regarding whether the Shivelys have established a due process violation is unnecessary. Moreover, in my judgment, the Shivelys could not establish a due process violation in any event. As the majority notes, generally 'a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence ... does not constitute a violation of the due process clause.' . . A failure of the state to protect a citizen is only cognizable if the plaintiff can establish that the 'state-created danger exception' is met. . . . The thrust of the Shivelys' allegations are that Booth, Nutter, and Lucas knew about the violence and harassment to which T.S. was subjected and failed to act. Repeatedly, the Shivelys assert that defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because 'defendants did nothing to stop' the violence and 'fail[ed] to address' the violence. However, this court has specifically held that a 'failure to act is not an affirmative act under the state-created danger theory.' . . Accordingly, I would also reverse the district court's judgment on the basis that plaintiffs failed to establish a violation of T.S.'s due process rights.")

Halsey v. Pfeiffer, 750 F.3d 273, 289, 292-96 & n.19 (3d Cir. 2014) ("When falsified evidence is used as a basis to initiate the prosecution of a defendant, or is used to convict him, the defendant has been injured regardless of whether the totality of the evidence, excluding the fabricated evidence, would have given the state actor a probable cause defense in a malicious prosecution action that a defendant later brought against him. We thus pass to the question of whether a state actor can be liable on a stand-alone claim for fabrication of evidence or whether a defendant's fabrication claim must be included as an aspect of a malicious prosecution claim. . . . To the best of our knowledge, every court of appeals that has considered the question of whether a state actor has violated the defendant's right to due process of law by fabricating evidence to charge or convict the defendant has answered the question in the affirmative. See Whitlock v. Brueggemann, 682 F.3d 567, 585 (7th Cir.2012) (collecting court of appeals cases. . . We join these courts in expressly adopting this principle. . . . Accordingly, we hold that if a defendant has been convicted at a trial at which the prosecution has used fabricated evidence, the defendant has a stand-alone claim under section 1983 based on the Fourteenth Amendment if there is a reasonable likelihood that, without the use of that evidence, the defendant would not have been convicted. . . [W]e [do not] decide whether a defendant acquitted at a trial where fabricated evidence has been used against him has an actionable section 1983 claim. We note, however, that if fabricated evidence is used as a basis for a criminal charge that would not have been filed without its use the defendant certainly has suffered an injury. . . . Analogous precedent should have informed appellees or any reasonable state actor that, by fabricating evidence for use in a criminal prosecution, a state actor would violate a defendant's constitutional rights regardless of whether or not the state actor violated other constitutional rights of the defendant. . . .The obviousness of this violation would be difficult to escape even without the closely analogous Supreme Court precedent discussed above. By the time appellees allegedly fabricated Halsey's confession, more than two decades had passed since the Supreme Court had held that the due process clause required that the prosecution reveal exculpatory evidence to a criminal defendant. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S.Ct. 1194 (1963). Reasonable officers should have known that if they could not withhold exculpatory evidence from a defendant, they certainly could not fabricate inculpatory evidence against a suspect or defendant. For these reasons, we will reverse the District Court's entry of summary judgment dismissing Halsey's fabricated-evidence claim.")

Hinterberger v. Iroquois School Dist., 548 F. App'x 50, 2013 WL 6284433, *4 & n.2 (3d Cir. 2013) (not published) ("We note that cases decided in this circuit after Hinterberger's accident have not been models of clarity as to whether a state-created danger claim can be successfully maintained in the context of school sports. [collecting and comparing cases] The differing outcomes in these cases further undermines Hinterberger's contention that Loftus should reasonably have understood her actions in March 2004 to violate a constitutional right. . . . We thus conclude that Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her accident. It was not 'beyond debate' as of March 2004 that Loftus's decision to introduce a new cheerleading stunt following a delay of several months, through the instruction of an experienced cheerleader, with the use of multiple spotters, but without any matting, violated Hinterberger's substantive due process rights. . . . As Hinterberger's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of her injury, Loftus is entitled to qualified immunity from suit.")

Sharp v. Johnson, 669 F.3d 144, 159, 160 (3d Cir. 2012) ("At issue here is whether Sharp had a clearly established right under the First Amendment to separate religious services in accordance with the Habashi sect of Sunni Islam when Sunni Islamic services were already available. The Supreme Court has stated that '[a] special chapel or place of worship need not be provided for every faith regardless of size; nor must a chaplain, priest, or minister be provided without regard to the extent of the demand.' . . . We echoed this when we said, 'The requirement that a state interpose no unreasonable barriers to the free exercise of an inmate's religion cannot be equated with the suggestion that the state has an affirmative duty to provide, furnish, or supply every inmate with a clergyman or religious services of his choice.' Gittlemacker v. Prasse, 428 F.2d 1, 4 (3d Cir.1970). . . . Given this precedent, a reasonable official would not have understood the denial of Sharp's request, whether made by Sharp on behalf of either himself or a small number of inmates, to violate a constitutional right.")

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 10-2002, 2011 WL 2559446, at *4, *5 (3d Cir. June 29, 2011) (not published) (“As the District Court reasoned, after Garcetti and prior to our decision in Reilly on July 1, 2008, the status of First Amendment protection for government employee attendance at hearings as part of employment duties was uncertain. To the extent that Reilly clarified the issue, it did so in the context of testimony presented under compulsion of a subpoena in a criminal trial. Reilly, therefore, does not stand for the proposition that a law enforcement officer has a First Amendment right to attend voluntarily a parking ticket adjudication hearing in derogation of direct orders to the contrary. Thus, it cannot be said that the right asserted in this case was clearly established when Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. Moreover, Reilly is also distinguishable on the ground that it involved discipline for the content of the employee’s testimony. In this case, by way of contrast, the employer made a decision not to pursue parking violation charges against any alleged violators as part of an effort to correct what it felt was an overzealous enforcement of a township parking ordinance. . . . The instant case, rather than focusing on an employer’s retaliation based on the substance of testimony, is far more akin to an employer’s attempt to restrain the actions of employees which were considered to ‘detract from the agency’s effective operation.’ In this case, a decision was made to not devote public resources to pursuing parking citations issued under unique circumstances. Our holding in Reilly certainly did not address this particular context. Nor have the Appellants cited any authority that would preclude a municipality from instructing its law enforcement officers from appearing at hearings to enforce parking violations. Under this set of facts, it simply cannot be said that the Appellants’ ‘right’ to appear at hearings was ‘clearly established.’ In summary, we find that a government employee’s right to attend a court proceeding to enforce parking violations was not clearly established at the time Memorandum No. 07-17 was issued. . . . Thus, we will affirm the District Court’s finding of qualified immunity for Appellants McNeilly and Black and its concomitant grant of summary judgment on this basis.”)

Burns v. PA Dept. of Corrections, 642 F.3d 163, 179 (3d Cir. 2011) (“[W]e do not think it is unreasonable for prison officials at the time of Burns’ hearing to have known that: (1) Burns had a property interest in his prison account, (2) he was entitled to due process before his account could be debited, (3) a later Holloway hearing would determine the amount of money to be deducted, but the actual disciplinary hearing was the only forum for determining if any money should be deducted at all, and (4) due process is violated when a determination to deprive an inmate of a protected interest is based solely on the uncorroborated statements of confidential informants. However, two matters give us pause in concluding that Burns is entitled to relief here. First, although it was not unreasonable for a government official to have realized that due process must be provided in adjudicating whether a prison account can be debited, Burns is the first case that clearly established that the assessment itself implicates a prisoner’s protected property interests, even if the account is not actually debited. The devaluation in the property interest in the inmate’s funds that results from such an assessment was not clearly established before Burns I, and we do not believe that a reasonable official could have foreseen the analogy to a judgment creditor that formed the basis of our holding in Burns I. Second, we think it understandable that the existence of a later Holloway hearing could have caused a reasonable prison official to believe that, because the Pennsylvania state courts have found that a Holloway hearing was necessary to satisfy due process, that hearing was also sufficient to satisfy due process. Although some officials may have been able to deduce that a Holloway hearing was insufficient to satisfy due process, we do not believe that a reasonable official in Canino's position would have had a 'fair warning' that an assessment of the account prior to the Holloway hearing was subject to due process protections. Prior to Burns I, inmates were only entitled to procedural due process before their accounts were debited. Neither this court, nor any Pennsylvania appellate courts had held that an inmate was also entitled to procedural due process before the account was assessed, even if the fund was not debited before we decided Burns I. Thus we cannot conclude that the circumstances here were sufficient to give prison officials 'fair warning' that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, we hold that they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

McSpadden v. Wolfe, No. 08-2209, 2009 WL 1059552, at *5 (3rd Cir. Apr. 21, 2009) ("In the case at hand, Appellees were forced to apply confused caselaw to a confusing factual situation—when presented with a sentence that, in their opinion, violated Bowser, they twice wrote for clarification to the sentencing judge, who, in emphasizing that the April 10, 1997, sentence was 'with all appropriate credit for time served,' led them to believe that the credit specified in the amended order had already been applied. In light of the complexity of Pennsylvania sentencing case law, and the fact that Appellees were confronted with Judge New's ambiguous letter, computation of Appellant's sentence constituted a discretionary function for which qualified immunity may be available.").

Yarris v. County of Delaware, 465 F.3d 129, 142, 143 (3d Cir. 2006) ("At the outset, we note that Youngblood addresses law enforcement officials' constitutional duty to preserve evidence prior to conviction, whereas Yarris's claim is based on the CID Detectives' post-conviction conduct. . . . The CID Detectives contend that their alleged mishandling of DNA samples does not amount to a constitutional violation because they could not have acted in bad faith insofar as DNA testing was still in its infancy at the time of the alleged violation. We disagree. . . . [A]ccepting Yarris's allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, we conclude that even though DNA testing may have been less common at the time of the alleged mishandling of evidence, the CID Detectives were given fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accordingly, the CID Detectives are not entitled to qualified immunity from this claim at this stage of the proceedings.").

Jones v. Brown, 461 F.3d 353, 364, 365 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Bieregu established as a general matter that prisoners have a First Amendment protected interest in being present when their legal mail is opened. . . But as the Supreme Court emphasized in Saucier, 'that is not enough.' . . For two reasons, we believe it cannot be said with confidence that reasonable prison administrators in the defendants' position would have realized that they were violating the teachings of Bieregu. First, as we have explained, prison administrators in defendants' position would not have been violating inmates' rights if they reasonably believed they were acting in the interest of inmate and staff health and safety. As we have further explained, the Turner test is highly fact sensitive and, at the time the challenged regulation was adopted, there was no guidance in our case law regarding the application of Bieregu and Turner in the context of the special circumstances encountered in the Fall of 2001. Without being able to determine whether the October 2001 series of anthrax letters had ended or was on-going, a reasonable administrator might well have understood the legal mail policy to be consistent with those cases. Second, even at a later point in time when it became apparent that there was no significant, on-going risk from anthrax attack, we believe a reasonable prison administrator evaluating whether the legal mail policy should be continued might well have concluded that Bieregu was no longer sound law. As previously noted, at that point we had declared without reservation in Oliver v. Fauver, 118 F.3d 175, 178 (3d Cir.1997), that the Supreme Court had ‘effectively overruled Bieregu.’ While we here hold that this was not true with respect to the First Amendment aspects of Bieregu, in the absence of authority suggesting otherwise, we cannot find a prison administrator to have been unreasonable in taking our statement in Oliver at face value. Accordingly, we will affirm the ruling of both the Allah Court and the Jones Court that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiffs’ damage claims.”).

McKee v. Hart, 436 F.3d 165, 171-73 (3d Cir. 2006) (“Before Sattelle allegedly engaged in the conduct at issue in this case, we held . . . that a public employee states a First Amendment claim by alleging that his or her employer engaged in a ‘campaign of retaliatory harassment’ in response to the employee’s speech on a matter of public concern, even if the employee could not prove a causal connection between the retaliation and an adverse employment action. . . . Jones contends that Suppan and Baldassare, taken together, were sufficient precedent to put Sattelle on notice that his conduct—making harassing comments to Jones arising out of Jones’s voicing of concerns about corruption in the pharmaceutical industry—was constitutionally prohibited. In Suppan, however, we gave little guidance as to what the threshold of actionability is in retaliatory harassment cases. Instead, we merely held that such a claim existed. . . . Moreover, the alleged conduct in Suppan spanned more than a year and involved the supposed lowering of ratings on employees’ promotion evaluations and the admonishment of employees because of their union activities and support for a particular mayoral candidate. . . . Based only on our acknowledgment of a retaliatory harassment cause of action in Suppan and the facts of that case, a reasonable official in Sattelle’s position would not have been aware that making a few comments over the course of a few months (the gist of which was asking an employee to focus on his job) might have run afoul of the First Amendment. Baldassare also does not further Jones’s argument that his First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment was clearly established at the time of Sattelle’s alleged conduct. That case involved a straightforward retaliation claim brought under the First Amendment in which the plaintiff alleged a direct causal connection between his speech on a matter of public concern and his demotion, . . . not that he was subject to a campaign of retaliatory harassment such as the one involved in Suppan and alleged by Jones in this case. Thus, Baldassare would not have helped Sattelle understand that his conduct might be constitutionally prohibited. . . . Brennan provided some additional guidance about what types of conduct would support such a claim, holding that some of the plaintiff’s allegations (that he had been taken off the payroll for some time and given various suspensions as a result of his speech) would support a retaliation claim, whereas other of his allegations (including his claim that his supervisor stopped using his title to address him) would not because of their triviality. . . . However, Brennan was not decided until 2003, after Sattelle's alleged conduct, which occurred in the fall of 2002, had already taken place. Thus, to the extent that Brennan added some specificity to the contours of the retaliatory harassment cause of action, an employee's First Amendment right to be free from such harassment was still not clearly established at the time of Sattelle's conduct. . . . Accordingly, because of the dearth of precedent of sufficient specificity (and factual similarity to this case) regarding a public employee's First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory harassment by his or her employer at the time of Sattelle's conduct, we cannot say that the constitutional right Jones alleged Sattelle violated was clearly established. Sattelle is therefore entitled to qualified immunity under the second, as well as the first, prong of our Saucier analysis.”).

Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 154, 155 (3d Cir. 2005) (Smith II) (“The question we must address, of course, is not simply whether the behavior of the troopers ‘shocks the conscience’ under the applicable standard, but whether a reasonable officer would have realized as much. In this regard, ‘the salient question’ we must ask is whether the law, as it existed in 1999, gave the troopers ‘fair warning’ that their actions were unconstitutional. . . . It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to identify a case presenting analogous factual circumstances, but they must show that the contours of the right at issue were ‘Asufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’” ‘ . . . While the jurisprudence does not yield a clear definition of ‘conscience-shocking’ (applicable to situations such as this), we agree with the District Court that the Smiths have not shown that a reasonable officer in the position of these troopers would have understood his conduct to be ‘conscience-shocking.’ . . . We therefore conclude that the troopers are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the state-created danger claim. . . . [W]e think a reasonable officer could recognize a difference between abandoning a private citizen with whom he had come in contact and failing to prolong a two-hour search for a private citizen whom he has been unable to locate At this stage, such a difference is sufficient for the officers to be entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Rivas v. City of Passaic, 365 F.3d 181, 200, 201 (3d Cir. 2004) (“We discern from these cases that, as of November 1998, our case law had established the general proposition that state actors may not abandon a private citizen in a dangerous situation, provided that the state actors are aware of the risk of serious harm and are partly responsible for creating the opportunity for that harm to happen. As the Supreme Court explained in Hope v. Pelzer . . . in some cases ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though “the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful.”’ In sum, we find that the preexisting law of ‘state-created danger’ jurisprudence was clearly established. As such, it was sufficient to put Garcia and Rodriguez on notice that their conduct, if deemed unlawful, would not shield them with immunity.”).

Doe v. Groody, 361 F.3d 232, 243 (3d Cir. 2004) (“We agree that in determining whether a right is ‘clearly established,’ we should analyze the right with specificity. . . . Where a challenged police action presents a legal question that is ‘unusual and largely heretofore undiscussed’ . . . or where there is ‘at least some significant authority’ that lends support of the police action, . . . we have upheld qualified immunity even while deciding that the action in question violates the Constitution. On the other hand, the plaintiff need not show that there is a prior decision that is factually identical to the case at hand in order to establish that a right was clearly established. . . . The principal narrow question in this case is whether in 1999, when these searches occurred, it was clearly established that police could not broaden the scope of a warrant with an unincorporated affidavit. We think that a review of the cases indicates that it was.”).

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 778 (3d Cir. 2004) (“Therefore, we hold that the right of an arrestee to be free from the use of excessive force in the course of his handcuffing clearly was established when Officer Tate acted in this case, and that a reasonable officer would have known that employing excessive force in the course of handcuffing would violate the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, the district court committed error in granting summary judgment in favor of Officer Tate on the basis of his qualified immunity defense. In reaching our result we point out that other courts of appeals have made determinations consistent with ours. [citing cases] “).

Kopec v. Tate, 361 F.3d 772, 779, 785, 786 (3d Cir. 2004) (Smith, J., dissenting) (“The Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that the determination of qualified immunity requires particularizing the constitutional right ‘in light of the specific context of the case.’ . . This is where I believe the majority’s analysis falls short, because it only relies on the broad proposition that the Fourth Amendment secures the right to be free from the use of excessive force during an arrest, and concludes that Officer Tate violated this clearly established right. This analysis is flawed, in my view, because it fails to determine what the contours of the right were, and neglects to recognize that the law did not provide Officer Tate with fair warning that he was required to respond more promptly than he did to Kopec’s complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. . . . In February 2000, only a handful of cases of § 1983 claims involving tight handcuffing were extant. [citing cases] Prior to the incident at issue in this case, the caselaw did not provide any guidance with respect to how quickly an officer must respond to a complaint that handcuffs have been applied too tightly. Nor was there any guidance in the cases as to how an officer should prioritize his response when there are other tasks in which he is legitimately engaged or may be required to undertake at the time. In light of this caselaw, I conclude that Tate could have reasonably believed that his response to Kopec’s complaints was lawful. To put it another way, I believe the law did not put Officer Tate on notice that he had to respond immediately to Kopec’s complaint that the handcuffs were too tight. Nor was there any caselaw providing Officer Tate with fair notice that he must stop engaging in the legitimate police task at hand, i.e., interviewing Smith, in order to assess whether the handcuffs were too tight. Because the caselaw did not provide Tate with notice that his response was unlawful, he should be entitled to qualified immunity.”).

S.G., as Guardian ad Litem of A.G. v. Sayreville Bd. of Ed., 333 F.3d 417, 423 (3d Cir. 2003) (“[W]e hold that the school’s prohibition of speech threatening violence and the use of firearms was a legitimate decision related to reasonable pedagogical concerns and therefore did not violate

A.G.'s First Amendment rights. In any event, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law to the contrary.”)

Atkinson v. Taylor, 316 F.3d 257, 264 (3d Cir. 2003) (“In the present case, without weighing the underlying evidence with respect to Atkinson’s claim, we conclude that appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity on the ETS claim of future harm. As the Warren Court recognized, the Helling decision established the constitutional right required by the first prong of the Saucier test. . . Atkinson invokes the constitutional right claimed by the Helling prisoner: alleging that he was unwillingly exposed to levels of ETS that pose an unreasonable risk of future harm. Similarly, Atkinson has satisfied the second prong of the Saucier test. The right recognized by the Helling decision is ‘clearly established’ so that a reasonable prison official would know when he is violating that right.”).

McLaughlin v. Watson, 271 F.3d 566, 572 (3d Cir. 2001) (“[W]e agree with Defendant that the District Court erred in summarily dispensing with the qualified immunity issue in favor of Plaintiffs. As discussed above, the analytical framework that a court must use in addressing a ‘qualified immunity’ argument is well-settled in this Circuit. The court cannot—as the District Court essentially did here—stop with a conclusory statement that Stiles’ alleged use of ‘influence with plaintiffs’ employer’ violated the first amendment. Rather, the District Court must go one step further and determine whether the facts alleged by plaintiffs violated a ‘clearly established right.’ This necessarily entails an analysis of case law existing at the time of the defendant’s alleged improper conduct. Without such an analysis there is no way to determine if the defendant should have known that what he or she was doing was constitutionally prohibited In other words, there must be sufficient precedent at the time of action, factually similar to the plaintiff’s allegations, to put defendant on notice that his or her conduct is constitutionally prohibited.”).

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 211 & n.4 (3d Cir. 2001) (“If the facts asserted by the Browns are found to be true, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer Eberly’s position could not have applied these well established principles to the situation before him and have concluded that he could lawfully destroy a pet who posed no imminent danger and whose owners were known, available, and desirous of assuming custody. . . In other words, it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that shooting Immi would be unlawful. . . . If the unlawfulness of the defendant’s conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable official based on the current state of the law, it is not necessary that there be binding precedent from this circuit so advising.”).

Brown v. Muhlenberg Township, 269 F.3d 205, 219-22 (3d Cir. 2001) (Garth, J., dissenting and concurring) (“The issue that has divided this panel and which should concern every judge, every police officer and every official who claims qualified immunity by virtue of his or her office is: how do we determine the second prong of the qualified immunity doctrine—i.e., when is the constitutional right which is claimed to have been violated clearly established so as to visit liability on the official? Distressingly, the majority opinion fails to announce a standard by which the bench and the bar can test whether a particular legal principle—that is the particular constitutional right—is ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity. I strongly urge that in deciding this second prong, at the least a balancing process should be undertaken whereby the factors to be balanced are: (1) Was the particular right which was alleged to have been violated specifically defined, or did it have to be constructed or gleaned from analogous general precepts? [citing Wilson v. Layne] (2) Has that particular right ever been discussed or announced by either the Supreme Court or by this Circuit? (3) If neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has pronounced such a right, have there been persuasive appellate decisions of other circuit courts– and by that I mean more than just one or two–so that the particular right could be said to be known generally? (4) Were the circumstances under which such a right was announced of the nature that an official who claimed qualified immunity would have, acting objectively under pre-existing law, reasonably understood that his act or conduct was unlawful? Can it really be held that the Fourth Amendment ‘seizure of property’ right was readily and generally known to apply to the shooting of a Rottweiler which was loose on the street? Can we really say that this particular Fourth Amendment principle was defined with particular specificity and was therefore clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity? I am aware of no authority which defines the principle with sufficient particularity so as to make it applicable to the situation here. . . . The relevant focus has to be on the final part of the qualified immunity inquiry–whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established so that a reasonable official in Eberly’s position would understand that what he was doing violated that right. . . . If there has never been a constitutional right articulated that would prevent a police officer from shooting a barking, unleashed, uncontrolled dog such as the Rottweiler which was killed–as there has not been in this jurisdiction or any others–how can the absence of such a right as postulated by the majority constitute a clearly established right so as to hold Eberly liable?”).

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 322 (3d Cir.2001) (“We conclude that the contours of defendants’ legal obligations under the Constitution were not sufficiently clear in 1995 that a reasonable prison official would understand that the non-consensual disclosure of a prisoner’s HIV status violates the Constitution.”).

Doe v. County of Centre, 242 F.3d 437, 454 (3d Cir. 2001) (“The Supreme Court has directed that the right in question should be defined in a particularized and relevant manner, rather than abstractly. . . .Therefore, we define the right in question as the right of HIV-positive individuals and related persons to be free from generalized discrimination when public agencies place HIV-negative individuals into their HIV-positive private homes. To defeat qualified immunity, this right must have been sufficiently clear such that a reasonable official would have known that enacting and applying the County’s policy would have violated the right. . . To the contrary, however, the placement of HIV-negative children into HIV-positive private homes presents a novel legal issue.”).

Sterling v. Borough of Minersville, 232 F.3d 190, 197, 198 (3d Cir. 2000) (“. . . Wilinsky testified that he did not include suspicion of homosexual activity in his police report because of the confidential nature of the information. Obviously, then, Wilinsky was aware that one’s sexual orientation is intrinsically personal and no compelling reason to disclose such information was warranted. Because the confidential and private nature of the information was obvious, and because the right to privacy is well-settled, the concomitant constitutional violation was apparent notwithstanding the fact that the very action in question had not previously been held to be unlawful.”).

Gruenke v. Seip, 225 F.3d 290, 300 (3d Cir. 2000) (“Merely because the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on whether a school official’s administration of a pregnancy test to a student violates her Fourth Amendment rights does not mean the right is not clearly established. Moreover, a review of current Fourth Amendment law in the public school context reveals not only that the right is clearly established, but also that Seip’s conduct as alleged was objectively unreasonable.”).

Bartholomew v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 221 F.3d 425, 429, 430 (3d Cir. 2000) (“[W]hile it was ‘clearly established’ that warrants must be particular, the narrower and more appropriate question, i.e. whether it was clearly established that one has a constitutional right to be free from a search pursuant to a warrant based upon a sealed list of items to be seized, has not heretofore been answered, at least in those terms. . . . It simply cannot be said, therefore, that ‘the contours of the right’—the precise right at issue here—were ‘sufficiently clear’ such that ‘a reasonable official would understand that what he[or she] is doing violates that right.’ . . . We now make clear what was heretofore not ‘sufficiently clear’ and hold that, generally speaking, where the list of items to be seized does not appear on the face of the warrant, sealing that list, even though it is ‘incorporated’ in the warrant, would violate the Fourth Amendment.”).

Assaf v. Fields, 178 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 1999) (“Given the nature of the inquiry in the Branti-Elrod cases, we reject appellees’ argument that qualified immunity is ‘well suited to cases where there is no “bright line” rule.’ . . . Were we to adopt this position, we would effectively eviscerate the constitutional imperative behind Branti-Elrod jurisprudence. Under the qualified immunity regime contemplated by appellees, liability in such areas could never attach because the lack of ‘bright line’ rules inherent in the doctrine would continually provide cover for violations of constitutional rights. In an earlier case in which we rejected the defendants’ qualified immunity claim, we explained that if we were to require ‘ “precise factual correspondence” between the case at issue and a previous case ... we would not be “faithful to the purposes of immunity by permitting ... officials one liability-free violation of a constitutional or statutory requirement.”’ Contrary to the District Court’s assertion, our cases have given guidance to government officials within our circuit. An employee may be terminated for political reasons only if ‘a difference in party affiliation [is] highly likely to cause an official to be ineffective in carrying out the duties and responsibilities of the office,’ . . . and that only if an employee’s duties make it possible to cause ‘serious political embarrassment,’ . . . will the position meet the narrow Branti-Elrod exception.”).

Gallo for the Estate of Gallo v. Weaver, No. 2:19-CV-01260-RJC, 2025 WL 563836, at *14, *20-27, *32-38 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 20, 2025) (“For the sake of simplicity, the Court provides the following overly general summaries of the three potential clearly established rights, relevant and potentially at issue, in this case: (1) The first is whether Anthony Gallo had a clearly established right to be free from the force used on him with respect to the first volley of five shots (assuming Defendant had not, through his own reckless and deliberate conduct, created any exigency which gave rise to the need for the use of deadly force). . . (2) The second is whether Anthony Gallo, under all of the circumstances, had a right to be free from the use of deadly force resulting from reckless and deliberate officer conduct that gave rise to any exigency that necessitated the use of deadly force in the form of all ten shots, and particularly the first five. (3) Finally, the Court will consider whether, under all the circumstances, Anthony Gallo had an independent clearly established right to be free from the second volley of five shots. Because the Court finds that the first potential clearly established right at issue in this case was not, at the time of the incident, in fact, clearly established, its analysis will only involve consideration of the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Because the Court finds that the second two potential clearly established rights were clearly established as of October 1, 2017, the Court will conduct a complete qualified immunity analysis as to those rights. . . . The first potential clearly established right at issue in this case is Anthony Gallo's right to be free from the use of deadly force where Gallo stood stationary at a distance of approximately two to three feet from Defendant, where Gallo is wielding a knife at his side, where he had failed to adhere to the Troopers' instructions to drop the weapon, where he had retreated into a confined space, i.e., a trailer, after the Troopers first confronted him, where he retreated further down the hall after the Troopers entered the trailer, and where the Troopers had received a report that Gallo had, prior to the Troopers' arrival, entered neighboring trailers without permission and was 'out of control.' The Court notes that 'there need not be a "precise factual correspondence between the case at issue and a previous case" for a right to be "clearly established."'. . . . Given the Supreme Court's holding in Kisela, Plaintiff is simply incorrect that it is per se unlawful for an officer to shoot someone who is in possession of a deadly weapon for disobeying police commands. If the suspect is close enough to pose a threat of serious physical injury or death, a subsequent affirmative step or move toward law enforcement or a bystander is simply not required under Kisela. Where the Supreme Court has definitively ruled on the issue, it is simply irrelevant that both expert witnesses in this case agreed with Plaintiff's point of view. The Court finds that it is unquestionable that Anthony Gallo posed a threat of death or serious physical injury to Defendant when the two were separated by two or three feet at the end of the trailer's hallway, and further finds that this case is simply not an 'obvious one.' . . .

Prior to the first volley of shots, Anthony Gallo was armed with a knife that was not pointed in Defendant's direction, was within striking distance of Defendant, was suspected of committing burglary, had retreated into a potentially occupied trailer, had ignored multiple commands to drop his weapon, and the entire situation unfolded in a matter of seconds. . . . Simply put, in the absence of reckless or deliberate conduct on Defendant's part that created the need for the use of deadly force, Anthony Gallo did not have a clearly established right of which a reasonable officer would have known to be free from the first volley of five shots. Kisela, a case that involved a May 2010 use of deadly force and that is factually analogous to the situation presented herein, makes clear that an officer can fire at an individual who disobeys police commands to drop a deadly weapon in circumstances materially similar to that presented herein. Defendant had probable cause to believe that Anthony Gallo posed a threat of serious bodily injury or death to Defendant when

Defendant fired the first volley of shots, and Plaintiff is incorrect that this is an ‘obvious case’ under Garner and Graham simply because Defendant fired at Anthony Gallo for not complying with Defendant’s commands under the circumstances presented herein and under Kisela. . . . As noted, the Court believes that it is also necessary, when considering the totality of the circumstances, to look to cases where the need to use deadly force resulted from potentially unreasonable actions on the part of officers, particularly given Defendant’s actions following his entry into the trailer. . . . This implicates another potential clearly established right, whether Anthony Gallo had a clearly established right to be free from reckless and deliberate police conduct (Defendant’s continued advancement on Anthony Gallo in Trailer 20 and Defendant’s failure to maintain a safe distance) that created the threat to the Troopers and thus the need for the use of deadly force, where Anthony Gallo had retreated into a trailer and the Troopers, (in this Court’s estimation) reasonably, pursued him into the trailer, where Gallo was armed with a knife, and where he disregarded police commands, but where he was also alone and cornered in a confined space with no visible means of escape, where he made no verbal threat of violence and made no move toward the officers, where the Troopers knew Gallo was in the midst of a mental health event, and where his ability to attack the officers with a three-to-four inch steak or paring knife was limited and only became possible when Defendant continuously advanced on Gallo in the trailer at a distance of two feet. . . . Defendant was at least on notice under both Johnson and Lamont that courts in the Third Circuit consider the totality of the circumstances, including officer conduct that occurs leading up to a seizure, in resolving excessive force claims. . . . There was testimony in this case that supports a finding that Defendant’s advancement toward Plaintiff once in the trailer, as opposed to simply maintaining his position or retreating and maintaining a perimeter around the trailer, was deliberate, dangerous, and reckless, and that it was inconsistent with Pennsylvania State Police guidance, not ‘good police work,’ and gave Defendant no option other than to shoot Anthony Gallo. . . . While Anthony Gallo’s failure to drop the knife in the trailer was certainly a cause of his injury in a manner similar to Lamont, the jury would be permitted to conclude, on this record, that it was Defendant’s own reckless and deliberate actions, and particularly his aggressive and unnecessary advancement on Anthony Gallo once inside the trailer, that were the proximate cause of the need for deadly force, and, thus, that the use of deadly force violated Anthony Gallo’s rights under the United States Constitution. The issue of proximate causation was one that was properly left for the jury to decide in this case. There are a number of other relevant decisions that discuss pre-seizure officer conduct and its role in the reasonableness inquiry that could support a finding of a clearly established right in this case. [collecting cases] With that background, the first question this Court must answer in determining whether Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity on the first five shots when taking into account Defendant’s own actions leading up to the shooting is whether Plaintiff introduced evidence that could establish a violation of Anthony Gallo’s Fourth Amendment rights. Because it is undisputed that a seizure occurred, the Court’s inquiry is limited to the reasonableness of Defendant’s use of force. The Court finds that the evidence presented at trial is sufficient to support a finding that Defendant violated Anthony Gallo’s constitutional rights by pursuing Gallo at a distance of two feet down a narrow hallway and by not retreating backward once it became clear that there was no one else in the trailer. The jury could conclude on this record that, in doing so, Defendant’s own reckless and deliberate conduct unreasonably created the need for the use of deadly force. In considering reasonableness under a totality of the circumstances analysis, the Court must look to what the record establishes about what Defendant knew immediately prior to and during the encounter at issue, as well as the facts and circumstances of the encounter itself, all while construing the evidence in a light most favorable to Plaintiff. While the Court's description of the facts above lays out the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court believes, given the importance of Defendant's knowledge to the qualified immunity analysis, it bears reiterating those facts respecting Defendant's background, the incident, and with special attention to what Defendant knew or reasonably should have known about the factual circumstances of the incident at issue The Troopers did not, at any point, warn Anthony Gallo that they would shoot if he did not comply with their commands. The Troopers did not utilize de-escalation techniques. From the time of their arrival, Anthony Gallo's acts were all passive, and he only ever retreated from the Troopers, moving at a controlled pace instead of running. He was cornered in a small, dark bedroom when Defendant fired the first volley of shots. While Defendant had heard over dispatch that Anthony Gallo was behaving erratically prior to Defendant's arrival at the scene, his behavior after the Troopers arrived at the scene, aside from the 'shoot me, shoot me' statement, was not described by any witness as erratic. The entire sequence, from the Troopers' arrival to the second volley of shots, unfolded in approximately twenty-five seconds. In this case, Defendant stormed a mobile home, shouted at Anthony Gallo, and repeatedly advanced on him until Gallo was essentially backed into a corner. Construing the facts in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendant was told that no one else was in the trailer. Upon entering the trailer, Defendant never shouted out to ask whether anyone else was in the trailer. Defendant did not attempt de-escalation techniques during an encounter that lasted less than one minute. He rushed Anthony Gallo, who was clearly in the midst of a mental health crisis and who had shouted 'shoot me, shoot me,' until Anthony Gallo reached the end of the trailer and turned to face the officers. At that time, Anthony Gallo possessed a weapon of short-range lethality, a steak or paring knife. While standing stationary and facing the Troopers, Anthony Gallo could not have further armed himself or harmed someone other than the Troopers without the Troopers having an adequate opportunity to respond. Indeed, Defendant repeatedly testified that he was only in fear for his own safety from a knife attack at that juncture. It is true that the distance between Anthony Gallo and Defendant established a risk of serious bodily injury or death to Defendant, but the Court believes that a jury would be warranted in finding that Defendant unreasonably created that risk. It is Defendant's advancement and escalation in spite of the twenty-one foot guidance, as well as his decision not to take steps back when it was plain that Anthony Gallo did not pose a threat to someone other than the heavily armed Troopers, that the Court finds would have justified the jury in finding that Defendant's objectively reckless and deliberate acts unreasonably created the need for deadly force, and that Defendant's use of force against Anthony Gallo on the day in question was unreasonable and, thus, excessive. . . . On the facts presented in this case, the jury would be permitted to find that Defendant's unreasonable actions once he entered the mobile home in advancing on Anthony Gallo at a constant distance of two feet created both the risk to the Troopers and the need for deadly force, and that his conduct was immediately connected to, and the proximate cause of, the threat of force posed by Anthony Gallo. In short, it is Defendant who unreasonably necessitated the use of deadly force with reckless and deliberate conduct. Defendant then fired a total of ten shots at Anthony Gallo in two five-shot volleys. Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiff introduced evidence sufficient to establish an unreasonable seizure, and thus introduced evidence sufficient to establish a violation of Anthony Gallo's Fourth Amendment rights on the day in question. Accordingly, the first prong necessary to defeat qualified immunity was satisfied in this case. The question turns to whether Anthony Gallo had a clearly established constitutional right as of October 1, 2017 to be free from police conduct that unreasonably created the need for the use of deadly force under the facts and circumstances presented herein. That is, did Anthony Gallo have a clearly established right to be free from reckless and deliberate police conduct (Defendant's continued advancement on him in Trailer 20 and Defendant's failure to maintain a larger, safe distance) that created the threat to the Troopers and thus the need for the use of deadly force, where Anthony Gallo had retreated into a trailer and the Troopers, (in this Court's estimation) reasonably, pursued him into the trailer, where Gallo was armed with a knife, where he was suspected of burglary, and where he disregarded police commands, but where he was also alone and cornered in a confined space with no visible means of escape, where he made no verbal threat of violence and made no move toward the officers, where the Troopers knew Gallo was in the midst of a mental health event, and where his ability to successfully attack the AR-15 armed officers with a three-to-four inch steak or paring knife was limited and only became possible when Defendant continuously advanced on Gallo in the trailer at a distance of two feet. Of course, the Court has defined this right with a high degree of specificity, and it has located no entirely analogous cases. The same, however, is not required. . . . To be clear, the Court does not believe or hold that there can never be a situation where an officer who has closely approached an individual armed with a knife can properly use deadly force. In this case, however, Defendant followed a suspect who possessed only a weapon of short-range lethality down a narrow hallway in a confined space at a distance of two feet, stopping only once Anthony Gallo had nowhere left to go in a (now) even more confined space, turned to face Defendant, stood stationary, and ignored three or four more commands. Defendant followed Anthony Gallo despite Pennsylvania State Police guidance that instructs that Defendant should have maintained a greater distance. He never took a step backward. The facts in this case are sufficiently factually analogous to those cases discussing reckless or deliberate officer conduct that necessitates the use of deadly force such that Anthony Gallo had a clearly established right to be free from Defendant's conduct in pursuing him at a distance of two feet and stopping only when Anthony Gallo was a distance of two or three away, thus unreasonably creating the need for deadly force. The Court finds that, under the facts and circumstances in this case, and following a thorough review of relevant case law, there existed a robust consensus of persuasive case law such that Defendant was on notice that his conduct in pursuing Anthony Gallo once inside the trailer and then shooting Anthony Gallo was unlawful on October 1, 2017. Accordingly, the Court finds that the jury's return of a finding in Plaintiff's favor on liability with respect to all ten shots is supported both factually and legally, and holds that Defendant was not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the issue of qualified immunity. . . . Notwithstanding the Court's holdings at the end of the preceding section, given the Third Circuit's holding in Lamont, the Court feels obliged to address the possibility of a third clearly established right, that is, whether Anthony Gallo had a clearly established right to be free from the second volley of five shots under the circumstances presented herein. Defendant fired those shots seconds after the first volley of five shots knocked Anthony Gallo onto a bed. At that time, Anthony Gallo had been shot five times in the chest, was on his back or side, and appeared incapacitated, but he still grasped a knife in spite of additional commands to drop the knife. Under Lamont, the Court believes that the facts surrounding the second volley of shots are unquestionably sufficient, regardless of the Court's analysis above, to support a finding of a violation of Anthony Gallo's clearly established constitutional right to be free from being shot five times, including three times in the back, when he no longer posed a threat to the Troopers. . . . A jury would be fully justified in finding in this case that Defendant improperly fired a second volley of five shots at a time where no reasonable officer could believe that Anthony Gallo posed any threat of serious bodily injury or death to the Troopers, i.e., after the threat had been eliminated. The Court believes that it is plain that Defendant is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity as to the second volley of shots, and the jury was free to find the second volley of five shots unreasonable and thus unconstitutional.")

Simonds v. Boyer, No. 2:21-CV-841, 2025 WL 475363, at *12 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 12, 2025) ("Officer Thimons frames the right as an individual's right to be 'free from having her hands pushed together, having her back pressed, and [being] pushed approximately one to two feet into a vehicle when being lawfully handcuffed.' . . Ms. Simonds criticizes Officer Thimons's framing as 'ignor[ing] the specific evidence in this case[.]' . . but she doesn't define the right herself. Officer Thimons's definition is both too narrow and fails to view the facts of the case in the light most favorable to Ms. Simonds, and so must be rejected. The Court instead frames the right as: an individual's right to be free from excessive force during an arrest, including having arms twisted, being pushed against a vehicle, and being placed in a police vehicle, in such a manner so as to cause pain, which was communicated to the officer during the arrest, while complying with an officer's commands, not resisting arrest, not attempting to escape, and posing no threat of harm. This framing 'define[s] the right...at the appropriate level of specificity' by 'consider[ing] the specific context of the case'—e.g., both Officer Thimons's actions, and the context—Ms. Simonds's behavior—surrounding them.")

Tatel v. Mt. Lebanon School District, 752 F.Supp.3d 512, ____ (W.D. Pa. 2024) ("The individual Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs' Equal Protection rights were clearly established and intertwined with Plaintiffs' Substantive Due Process and Free Exercise claims. The District had a published policy, District Policy I(F), and the de facto policy, which recognized parental notice and opt out rights. Reasonable school officials should have known that to allow notice and opt out rights on numerous topics, but deny them to parents who object to instructing their young children about transgender topics in a manner contrary to the Parents' religious and moral beliefs, would be a violation of their Equal Protection rights provided under the Constitution.")

Pena v. City of Lancaster, No. CV 21-590, 2023 WL 5807005, at *6, *8-9 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 7, 2023) ("Here, Ms. Peña argues that judgment on the pleadings is inappropriate considering differences between the facts alleged in her Complaint and those asserted by Defendants in their Answer. . . . As set forth below, the pleadings, when construed in favor of Ms. Peña, satisfy the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. To the extent that Defendants' Answer contradicts these allegations in a material way, those contradictions preclude judgment on the pleadings as to that first prong. But under current case law, there is no set of facts that Ms. Peña can prove that would satisfy the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Accordingly, Officer Arnold is entitled to such immunity as to the shooting of Mr. Muñoz, and the Court must dismiss Count I. . . .

For these reasons, the Court finds that the pleadings, when construed in favor of Ms. Peña, sufficiently allege that Officer Arnold acted unreasonably by approaching Ms. Peña's home, without waiting for backup, to confront a then-unarmed individual suffering from a mental health crisis. Defendants' allegations to the contrary represent material issues of fact that preclude judgment on the pleadings as to this element of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Defendants suggest that the 'clearly established' rule here is that 'deadly force is constitutionally permitted when a suspect is wielding a knife in a threatening manner.' . . . This framing does not comport with the U.S. Supreme Court's guidance to consider the specific context of the case and avoid general propositions. As explained above, a slew of circumstances preceding the shooting bear on the excessive force claim in this case. Ms. Peña, on the other hand, declines to identify a particular right . . . and instead rests on the fact that any context-specific right will require analysis of Officer Arnold's training and knowledge of the situation—circumstances that, as this Court explained above, are rife with material disputes between the parties. Third Circuit precedent, however, makes clear that even when the pleadings are construed in Ms. Peña's favor—i.e., Officer Arnold believed that Mr. Muñoz was unarmed; police policies counseled waiting for backup in such a scenario; and Officer Arnold's approach of Ms. Peña's house unreasonably escalated the situation to a point where deadly force became necessary—Officer Arnold did not violate any 'clearly established' right. In Abraham, the Third Circuit considered conflicting circuit court rulings concerning liability for officers 'based on their lapses in following police department procedures, even though those lapses may have contributed to the use of force.' . . . The Third Circuit expressly 'le[ft] for another day how these cases should be reconciled.' . . . A few years later, albeit in the context of jury instructions, the Third Circuit again acknowledged that it had not adopted the doctrine that 'an officer acts unreasonably if his improper conduct creates the situation making necessary the use of deadly force.' Grazier ex rel. White v. City of Philadelphia, 328 F.3d 120, 127 (3d Cir. 2003). Then, in Neuburger v. Thompson, the Third Circuit cited the Abraham court's ambivalence to conclude that the plaintiff had not 'allege[d] the violation of a clearly established constitutional right.' . . . Finally, the Third Circuit's guidance in Johnson, summarized above, counseled this Court to weigh Officer Arnold's decision to proceed without backup against factors such as 'the severity and immediacy of the threat and any potential risk to public safety posed by an officer's delayed action.' . . . The Johnson court further advised that '[i]t may also be appropriate for the officer to attempt to de-escalate an encounter to eliminate the need for force or to reduce the amount of force necessary to control an individual,' and that 'nothing we say today should discourage police departments and municipalities from devising and rigorously enforcing policies to make tragic events like this one less likely.' . . . Although this Court deployed these principles to find that the present pleadings, when construed in Ms. Peña's favor, sufficiently allege the violation of a constitutional right (or, at the very least, reflect material issues of fact that preclude judgment on the pleadings as to that prong), it does not follow from this general guidance that the Third Circuit in Johnson had clearly established a right not previously endorsed in Abraham, Grazier, or Neuburger. Indeed, because of the ‘exceptional circumstances’ presented by the facts in Johnson, the Third Circuit declined to apply its guidance to the very case before it. Accordingly, this Court cannot say that the Third Circuit has ‘clearly established’ that a police officer violates the constitutional rights of an individual experiencing a mental health crisis when that officer fails to wait for backup—potentially in contravention of police policies—and that decision contributes to the need for deadly force. . . . Notwithstanding this Court’s finding that Ms. Peña has sufficiently pleaded that Officer Arnold violated Mr. Muñoz’s constitutional rights, this Court cannot, on its own, decree those rights to be clearly established. For that reason, Officer Arnold is entitled to qualified immunity as to the shooting of Mr. Muñoz, and the Court must dismiss Count I.”)

Crosland v. City of Philadelphia, 676 F.Supp.3d 364, ____ (E.D. Pa. 2023) (“Crosland alleges that the individual officers deliberately concealed exculpatory evidence in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Philadelphia and Ansel argue that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because the right underlying it—to have exculpatory or impeachment evidence disclosed—was not clearly established until 2005, when the Third Circuit applied Brady v. Maryland to police officers in Gibson v. Superintendent of New Jersey Department of Law & Public Safety, 411 F.3d 427 (3d Cir. 2005). . . . This position mischaracterizes the relevant right. Long before Gibson or even Brady, a constitutional right not to be convicted ‘through perjured testimony and the deliberate suppression of evidence favorable to the accused’ was clearly established. . . . A claim goes beyond Brady and implicates this broader right when police ‘knowing[ly] use ... false testimony or other fabricated evidence or ... conceal[] evidence to create false testimony to secure a conviction.’ . . . Crosland’s SAC implicates this broader right. He alleges that Everett’s preliminary hearing statement, which was introduced into evidence at both the 1988 and 1991 trials, was false, that the officers knew or should have known it was false, and that they withheld evidence contradicting it from defense counsel, prosecutors, and the court.”)

Crosland v. City of Philadelphia, 676 F.Supp.3d 364, ____ (E.D. Pa. 2023) (“Though malicious prosecution is a state law tort, ‘a claim for malicious prosecution is actionable under [§ 1983].’ . . . At its core, ‘malicious prosecution ... remedies detention accompanied, not by absence of legal process, but by wrongful institution of legal process.’ . . . This is precisely what Crosland’s SAC alleges—that the individual officers initiated a prosecution against him maliciously and without probable cause. . . . The parties disagree, however, about which ‘constitutional peg’ Crosland can hang his malicious prosecution claim on. . . . Philadelphia and Ansel challenge the claim only to the extent that it relies on the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . They argue that the viability of a Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution remains unsettled today and that such a right therefore could not have been clearly established between 1987 and 1991, when Crosland was investigated, arrested, and tried. . . . The distinction between Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment theories could prove significant. The Fourth Amendment’s protections are limited in scope, ‘extend[ing] only until trial.’ . . . In this case, the Fourth Amendment’s limitations could affect both the conduct that Crosland’s malicious prosecution claim reaches and the harm it can redress. First, Crosland alleges that the officers’ misconduct extended beyond the pretrial phase, through two trials that happened more than two years apart. . . . Second, post-trial incarceration ‘does not qualify as a Fourth Amendment seizure,’ Torres v. McLaughlin, 163 F.3d 169, 174 (3d Cir. 1998), meaning that ‘damages for post-conviction injuries are not within the purview of the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Crosland was, of course, arrested in December 1987—a paradigmatic Fourth Amendment seizure. . . . But he also suffered a far greater deprivation of liberty: over thirty-three years of incarceration following his 1988 and 1991 trials. . . . Philadelphia and Ansel are right that, as of today, the status of a Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution is murky. This confusion traces back to the Supreme Court’s plurality opinion in Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266 (1994). In a fractured opinion, the plurality held that malicious prosecution claims could not be grounded in substantive due process. . . . The plurality instead suggested—but did not decide—that a malicious prosecution claim could be viable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . And it did not address whether such a claim could fall under the Fourteenth Amendment’s procedural due process protections because ‘the only deprivation of life, liberty or property [in the case], if any, consisted of petitioner’s pretrial arrest.’ The Albright decision upended settled law in this circuit. Before 1994, the Third Circuit entertained malicious prosecution claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . In the wake of Albright, courts in this circuit struggled to pinpoint how the plurality opinion altered the consensus that prevailed before 1994. . . . While uncertainty still prevails, then, the balance of the Third Circuit’s post-Albright caselaw indicates that a claim for malicious prosecution grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s procedural due process protections remains viable. . . . The Third Circuit has drawn a clear temporal line between the Fourth Amendment’s protection and the Fourteenth’s: while ‘the Fourth Amendment forbids a detention without probable cause ... this protection against unlawful seizures extends only until trial.’ . . . ‘The guarantee of due process of law, by contrast, is not so limited as it protects defendants during an entire criminal proceeding through and after trial.’ . . . Crosland’s allegations straddle this temporal line. He claims that the officers not only ‘influenced ... the decision to institute criminal proceedings’ by ‘conceal[ing] and misrepresent[ing] material facts to the district attorney,’ but also that they perpetuated those ill-begotten proceedings by threatening a witness and lying about her availability[.] . . . As these allegations make clear, a malicious prosecution—even one that includes an arrest or other Fourth Amendment seizure—does not always end there. . . . And when that prosecution extends beyond the pretrial phase, ‘constitutional analysis shifts to the Due Process Clause.’ . . . This crucial temporal distinction leads me to conclude that Crosland has adequately pled a constitutional claim. . . . That leaves the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether the officers’ conduct violated clearly established law. At first glance, the fog shrouding a Fourteenth Amendment malicious prosecution claim today appears to resolve the issue in the officers’ favor, as several of my colleagues have concluded. [citing cases] But when evaluating a qualified immunity defense, ‘[t]he state of the law must be considered at the time of the challenged action.’ . . . The relevant events in this case—Crosland’s 1987 arrest, the 1988 trial, and the 1991 trial—all took place before Albright, at a time when this circuit unequivocally recognized a right to be free from malicious prosecution grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process protections. During this period, the Third Circuit rejected qualified immunity defenses in cases where police officers initiated prosecutions without probable cause. . . And nothing in those pre-Albright cases restricted malicious prosecution claims to the Fourth Amendment's sphere of protection. At the time of the misconduct alleged in this case, therefore, it was clearly established that a malicious prosecution violated the Constitution, and that this right was not limited to the pretrial phase covered by the Fourth Amendment. The intervening change in the doctrinal landscape wrought by Albright does not alter the clearly established nature of the right from 1987 to 1991.”)

Tatel v. Mt. Lebanon School District, No. CV 22-837, 2023 WL 3740822, at *18–19 (W.D. Pa. May 31, 2023) (“In its initial motion to dismiss opinion, the court concluded that Supreme Court and Third Circuit Court of Appeals precedent put a reasonable defendant on notice that the conduct alleged in this case would – absent a compelling interest – plausibly infringe the Parents’ Substantive and Procedural Due Process and Free Exercise rights and denied qualified immunity without prejudice with respect to those claims. The parental rights at issue are fundamental, long-recognized and clearly established. Defendants had fair warning from numerous Supreme Court and Third Circuit Court of Appeals decisions and District Policy I(F) and practices that their alleged conduct violated parental interests of the greatest importance, i.e., forming the identity of their children. Bielewicz was on notice that Williams’ transgender agenda violated parental rights throughout the school year and the remaining individual Defendants adopted a de facto policy that violated the District’s own parental rights policy and practices. . . The Free Exercise claims are intertwined with the parental rights claims and were also clearly established such that qualified immunity should not be granted at this stage of the case. The court noted in its initial motion to dismiss opinion that the familial privacy claim was less clearly established (and to clarify that comment, the court recognized there were no decisions directly on point, see Mack, 63 F.4th at 234). There were, however, sufficient allegations to reasonably infer that Williams had fair warning that her alleged conduct (the intrusion of her transgender agenda into the values being taught by the family) violated familial privacy rights such that she is not entitled to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. . . Williams’ conduct in trying to keep her agenda a secret from the parents must be construed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs to show she knew her conduct violated the familial privacy claims, i.e., she was trying to influence the child’s gender identity and values contrary to those of the child’s family. . . . A reasonable teacher in Williams’ position would have known that where no notice or opt out rights are given, the alleged conduct would violate the Parents’ right to inculcate in their children their values about their own children’s gender and identity. The court adheres to its conclusion. With respect to the Equal Protection claim, this court recognized it was less clearly established because (as noted in the initial motion to dismiss opinion) the court did not find any published decisions recognizing an Equal Protection claim under similar facts. That recognition, though, is not determinative. . . Accepting the facts pled as true, the Complaint states a plausible claim that the disparate treatment in the de facto policy is based on the Parents’ fundamental rights and religious beliefs and the de facto policy was adopted in response to the Parents’ assertion of their fundamental rights. Steinhauer, Irvin and Wyland . . . are not entitled to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage because there were plausible allegations they had fair warning that their alleged conduct (adoption of a de facto policy to eliminate parental notice and opt out rights for Williams’ transgender agenda in violation of District Policy I(F) and the District’s practices of providing notice and opt out rights for sensitive secular topics) would violate Equal Protection.”) Ardo v. Pagan, No. CV 18-5217, 2023 WL 424271, at *10-13 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 26, 2023) (“Ultimately, the court finds the existence of clearly established law here. To begin, to appropriately define the right alleged in this case, the court borrows from a decision by the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit that dealt with remarkably analogous factual allegations. . . . Since the Tenth Circuit’s decision in Allen, courts have routinely cited to it when conducting qualified immunity analyses in cases similar to this one. . . . Given these similarities, this court defines the right in this case to be the same as that explored in Allen:

[A]n officer violates the Fourth Amendment when his or her reckless or deliberate conduct results in the need for lethal force or when the officers rely on lethal force unreasonably as a first resort in confronting an irrational suspect who is armed only with a weapon of short-range lethality and who has been confined on his own property. . . . The court finds this definition neither too general nor too specific, and quite applicable to Mr. Ardo’s scenario, given that he was behaving irrationally, had been confined to Ms. Monaghan’s property, and carried a weapon of ‘short-range lethality’ (to the extent that a firework can be defined as a weapon). The question then becomes whether this right had been ‘clearly established’ by May 20, 2017, the day of Mr. Ardo’s death. To determine this, the court first turns to ‘factually analogous Supreme Court precedent, as well as binding opinions from [the Third Circuit.]’ . . . If none exist, the court next examines ‘whether there exists a “robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals,”’ as well as ‘take[s] into account district court cases, from within the Third Circuit or elsewhere.’ . . . Here, the court finds no particularly analogous Supreme Court or Third Circuit precedent. Nevertheless, when looking to other circuit and district courts, there is, for one, the Allen decision, which has been cited and acknowledged in numerous qualified immunity decisions outside the Tenth Circuit between 1997 and 2017. [citing cases] Furthermore, other circuit courts and district courts within the Third Circuit have found that police officers can violate a person’s Fourth Amendment rights when their need to use deadly force arose from their own unreasonable behavior. [citing cases] While such cases may speak about Fourth Amendment rights in more general terms than the right this court defined above, they still appear comparable enough to reinforce the notion that the right alleged here had been clearly established in law by the time that the Troopers used deadly force against Mr. Ardo. Overall, there is enough support in the caselaw to demonstrate that, should the plaintiffs’ factual allegations be true, Troopers Pagan and Splain violated a clearly established Fourth Amendment right of Mr. Ardo. . . . Therefore, the court will deny the defendants’ qualified immunity defense against the plaintiffs’ excessive force claim relating to the initial eight shots. . . . After reviewing all relevant materials, the court finds that the plaintiffs have effectively alleged that Trooper Splain violated Mr. Ardo’s Fourth Amendment rights when he fired his final three shots. . . . After finding that the plaintiffs have shown a constitutional violation, the court must now inquire as to whether ‘the law was clearly established at the time of the violation.’ . . . The answer, nevertheless, is relatively straightforward in this instance. To begin, the court defines the right using the following words of the Third Circuit: ‘[A]n officer may not use deadly force against a suspect unless the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses a threat of serious bodily injury to the officer or others.’. . Next, the court finds that this right was clearly established and widely accepted by the Supreme Court, the Third Circuit, and other circuits throughout the nation at the time of Mr. Ardo’s death. . . Thus, with the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis met, Trooper Splain is not entitled to qualified immunity from the plaintiffs’ excessive force claim with regard to the three final shots he fired at Mr. Ardo. As a final note, the court does not deny qualified immunity in this case lightly. The court recognizes the great importance of the doctrine in ‘shield[ing] officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably.’. . Nor is it lost on the court that it is not the court’s role to second guess police officers’ decisions with the benefit of hindsight vision. Qualified immunity is not, however, absolute. There exists a limit, and that limit has been breached in this case. The plaintiffs may hence bring their excessive force claims before a jury.”)

Ogrod v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 21-2499, 2022 WL 1093128, at *8, *13 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2022) (“Defendants’ duty under the due process clause and Brady to disclose exculpatory evidence was not clearly established in 1996, when Ogrod was convicted of Barbara Jean’s murder. Accordingly, we hold that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Count II of the Complaint insofar as it rests on the withholding of material exculpatory evidence, and we grant Defendants’ Motions insofar as they seek dismissal of that aspect of Count II. . . . We are aware of no legal authority on which we could base a conclusion that the individual Defendants had a clearly established duty to intervene to prevent his false arrest, malicious prosecution, false imprisonment and deprivation of liberty. While Smith is clear that there is such a duty in connection with an excessive force violation, there is simply no clear authority that such a duty exists in other contexts. We therefore conclude that the individual Defendants did not violate a clearly established right by allegedly failing to intervene in their fellow officers’ actions in fabricating evidence and engaging in malicious prosecution. Consequently, we conclude that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Ogrod’s failure to intervene claims and we dismiss Count V on that basis”)

Remlinger v. Lebanon County, No. 1:18-CV-00984, 2020 WL 3104008, at *4 (M.D. Pa. June 11, 2020) (“Although Defendants are correct that issues of qualified immunity should be resolved ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation,’. . . this does not mean that qualified immunity must be resolved before the relevant facts have been developed. . . As the report and recommendation notes, ‘it is generally unwise to venture into a qualified immunity analysis at the pleading stage as it is necessary to develop the factual record in the vast majority of cases.’. . Here, the court agrees with the magistrate judge’s conclusion that additional factual development is necessary with regard to Defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity. The moving corrections Defendants’ argument that the right at issue was not clearly established also fails. Although Defendants argue that there is no binding precedent from the Supreme Court or the Third Circuit establishing the right, this does not automatically entitle them to qualified immunity. Where the existence of a right is ‘obvious,’ it may be ‘deemed clearly established even without materially similar cases.’. . In the report and recommendation, Judge Saporito concludes that the present case might present a situation where the right at issue is so obvious as to permit a finding that it is clearly established. . . The court finds no error in this conclusion and will accordingly overrule the Defendants’ objection.”)

Duvall on behalf of Sowell v. Hustler, No. CV 18-3278, 2020 WL 1357315, at *13–15 & n.214 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 19, 2020) (“Th[e] fact-specific approach set out by the Supreme Court is a particularly odd fit for cases like this one. The Court has advised that ‘[i]f the law did not put the officer on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate.’ . . . In this case, however, where credibility is an issue and most of the operative facts are therefore in dispute, it is a futile exercise to attempt to determine whether the officer’s ‘conduct,’ which is wholly undefined, violated clearly established law. Critical disputes leave the fatal encounter with essentially no factual content with which to make the fact-intensive comparisons that are the crux of the qualified immunity analysis.”²¹⁴ [fn. 214: See Curly v. Klem, 499 F.3d 199, 208 (3d Cir. 2007) (noting that the Supreme Court’s instruction that qualified immunity should ordinarily be decided well before trial “is well and good when there are no factual issues in a case,” but that “often the facts are intensely disputed, and our precedent makes clear that such disputes must be resolved by a jury after a trial”). Indeed, some Justices have aptly recognized that some, and perhaps all, excessive force cases are simply ‘not meet’ for the two-part qualified immunity inquiry. Saucier, 533 U.S. at 214 (Ginsburg, J., concurring, joined by Stevens & Breyer, JJ.).] There is a ghost at the center of this case, and there is little use in comparing its hazy outline with the fact patterns of other officer-involved shootings. Nevertheless, it is crystal clear that the Court is required to conduct both steps of the Saucier analysis—in this context, courts may not deny summary judgment simply because there are genuine disputes of material fact, . . . as Rule 56 would otherwise seem to require. . . . Even if there were no cases directly on point, the Court would conclude that the unreasonableness of the officers’ conduct in shooting Sowell—again, on the current record and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs—was so obvious that it meets the standard for clearly established law. There are cases in which, although the applicable constitutional rule is expressed in general terms, that general rule ‘appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.’ . . . As long as ‘the state of the law’ gives ‘fair warning’ of what is permitted and what is forbidden, ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . Indeed, the Third Circuit held, in a case with some similarities to this one, that the ‘immediate threat’ standard of Graham and Garner, although general, would have made it clear to reasonable officers that they could not shoot an ‘armed distraught man’ who was not fleeing and not threatening anyone but himself. . . . In this case, however, it is not necessary to rely on the obviousness of the constitutional violation. Published Third Circuit precedent put the officers on notice well before September 2016 that using deadly force in these circumstances was unreasonable. . . . Similarly, even if the initial use of force was reasonable, the unreasonableness of the officers’ continued use of deadly force was clearly established under published Third Circuit precedent. More than five years before these events, the Third Circuit had held that it was already clearly established that ‘[e]ven where an officer is initially justified in using force, he may not continue to use such force after it has become evident that the threat justifying the force has vanished.’ . . . Lamont would give any reasonable officer adequate notice that the use of deadly force is only permitted so long as an immediate threat persists. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to them, Plaintiffs have shown that the officers violated Sowell’s clearly established right to be free of unreasonable seizures. As a result, summary judgment will be denied and Plaintiffs’ excessive-force claim will proceed to trial.”)

Cuvo, on behalf of A.C. v. Pocono Mountain School District, No. 3:18-CV-01210, 2019 WL 7105560, at *6–8 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 23, 2019) (“As discussed above, we find the allegations of the second amended complaint sufficient to plausibly state a state-created danger claim at this, the pleadings stage. But the defendants may nevertheless prevail on this defense under the second prong of the Saucier analysis. . . . The claimed violation of A.C.’s constitutional rights occurred on December 18, 2017. We previously ruled that the plaintiffs failed to identify a controlling case or a robust consensus of cases that could be said to have clearly established the unconstitutionality of the defendants’ conduct. . . . Indeed, our own review of prior precedent reveals no cases where a state-created danger was established after a student-athlete was required to participate in tackle-football drills, or other obviously violent contact drills, without protective equipment or on a gymnasium floor covered with wrestling mats, which is the level of specificity that both controlling case law and a robust consensus of cases would appear to require us to apply in this analysis. . . . Nevertheless, the plaintiffs now argue that Hall v. Martin, Civ. Action No. 17-523, 2017 WL 3298316 (W.D. Pa. 2017), is controlling as it shows that the right at issue is clearly established and provided a fair warning to the defendants. . . In Hall, the plaintiff, a high school student, was instructed by the gym teacher, Martin, to play floor hockey ‘like regular hockey’ as a regular gym activity. The students were provided with floor hockey sticks, goalie nets, and a hockey net. They were not provided with eye or facial protection. During the game, Hall played goalie and was hit in the left eye by the floor hockey puck causing him to be permanently legally blind. Unlike the facts of our case, in Hall, the gym teacher was aware from past incidents that students who played goalie were injured after being hit by a floor hockey puck. Some of those incidents were reported to the school nurse who then notified the school district about the injuries. Under those facts, the court found that the plaintiff pled sufficient facts to state a viable § 1983 claim against the gym teacher, thereby defeating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. The court did not address the application of qualified immunity as the motion to dismiss did not raise it. Here, the plaintiffs define the constitutional right as prohibiting students from engaging in dangerous sports without protective equipment where it is foreseeable that an injury will occur. . . In response to the defendants’ position that Hall is distinguishable from the facts of this case because in Hall there was an awareness of prior injuries, the plaintiffs contend that the issue of prior injuries establishes the foreseeability element to the state-created danger theory. Further, the plaintiffs point out that we previously ruled that the foreseeability element was met in the first amended complaint without an allegation of prior injuries. . . . Under these circumstances, based on the facts alleged in the second amended complaint, we find that at the pleading stage it is premature determine whether the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the plaintiffs’ § 1983 state-created damages claim. We further find that it is necessary to develop a factual record on this issue.”)

Siehl v. City of Johnstown, No. CV 18-77J, 2019 WL 585226, at *11 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 13, 2019) (“Defendants argue that they are protected by qualified immunity because police officers were not subject to Brady. . . at the time of Plaintiff’s trial and conviction in 1991 and 1992. In addition, Defendants argue that they have been unable to locate a decision that would put Defendant Brant on notice that his alleged observations during the criminal defense expert’s (Bennett) forensic evaluation violated the Constitution. Plaintiff responds that both of Defendants’ arguments are incorrect. Plaintiff concedes that Brady did not apply to police officers at the time of Plaintiff’s trial and conviction. Plaintiff contends, however, that Brady is not the source of Plaintiff’s claims against Brant and Ermlick. Instead, Plaintiff argues that he relies on long established precedent establishing that the Due Process Clause prohibits officers from engaging in deliberate deception and suppression of evidence, citing Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103, 112 (1935) and Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213, 216 (1942). Plaintiff then directs the Court to Haley v. City of Boston, where the First Circuit Court of Appeals acknowledged the proscription originating from Mooney and Pyle, stating that ‘[d]eliberate concealment of material evidence by the police, designed to grease the skids for false testimony and encourage wrongful conviction, unarguably implicates a defendant’s due process rights.’. . . The Haley court concluded that the context of Pyle ‘makes it apparent that this holding encompasses the misconduct of police officers[,]’ and that further progeny clearly established the law regarding concealment by 1972. . . The Court must again deny qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. According to the Complaint, Brant knew that his conclusion regarding the showerhead fingerprint was false. Ermlick knew that his conclusions regarding the blood splatter and presumptive bloodstains on Plaintiff’s shoes were false, along with his mid-trial testing showing that the tennis shoes actually corroborated Plaintiff’s statement to police. Although Plaintiff invokes Brady in Count III, he also invokes his due process protections under the Fourteenth Amendment which is sufficient to state a claim pursuant to Mooney and its progeny. Therefore, Plaintiff’s allegations, if true, would constitute a violation of clearly established law that would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in 1991.”)

Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *14-15 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) (“Thus, the question presented here is whether a reasonable officer in Defendant Wheaten’s position would have understood that it violated the Fourth Amendment to use mechanical force against an individual who was pinned to the ground face down by five officers and was told ‘[w]e’re ok right now.’ Applying the evidence most favorably to Plaintiff, a reasonable officer, even arriving late to the scene and assuming the other officers followed proper procedures, could not have believed that immediately unleashing his K9, without warning or without assessing the situation, to attack a person who, under Plaintiff’s testimony, was not resisting arrest and restrained by five officers, was lawful. It would have been clear to a reasonable K9 officer approaching the scene that the unleashing of the K9 to attack the downed civilian was excessive and unconstitutional. Additionally, clearly establishing the existence of the right does ‘not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . The Supreme Court gave no indication that its decision in Pauly was intended to repudiate the proposition that ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S.

730, 741 (2002). Furthermore, Justice Ginsberg's concurrence in Pauly confirms that the per curiam opinion 'does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment' on qualified immunity where fact disputes exist on material issues. . . Accordingly, and in light of the previously identified disputed issues of material fact, Defendant Wheaten is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . While Plaintiff does not submit any factually-identical cases regarding the deployment of a police dog while five officers have already subdued a plaintiff, it was certainly clearly established in June 2013 that even if someone posed a threat at the time force was initiated on them, an officer cannot continue to apply serious force when the threat has subsided. . . .Regardless of what Defendant Wheaten knew as he arrived to the scene and when he initially deployed the dog, it was clearly established at the time that he could not continue holding the dog on Plaintiff for two additional minutes.”)

Igwe v. Skaggs, No. CV 16-1403, 2017 WL 395745, at *4-7 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 30, 2017) (“Citing this mid-level culpability standard, Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs was not involved in a high-speed chase the day of the accident and, having voluntarily undertaken the pursuit, had a reasonable three minute opportunity to deliberate. . .Mr. Igwe alleges Officer Skaggs, against Monroeville’s policy, voluntarily joined the pursuit of the suspect despite Officer Supancic’s dispatch as ‘secondary unit;’ failed to advise dispatch he intended to provide assistance until he approached the intersection where the accident occurred; failed to obtain approval from a pursuant supervisor before joining the pursuit in violation of Monroeville’s policy; failed to comply with Monroeville’s ‘Pursuit’ and ‘Emergency Response’ policies as well as Pennsylvania law on pursuits and emergency vehicles; drove his police car at a high rate of speed in the area of a retail shopping area; entered an intersection against a red traffic signal; and outran the Opticom safety system, all of which evidences Skaggs ‘consciously disregarded a substantial risk that great harm would result from his conduct.’ . . Taking Mr. Igwe’s allegations as true and applying the mid-level culpability standard, the allegations give rise to a plausible claim under a state-created danger theory. The thrust of Mr. Igwe’s allegations focuses on Officer Skaggs’ decision to voluntarily assume a role as a responding officer in violation of Monroeville policy, knew he could terminate his response at any time, and drove his police car in reckless disregard for the safety of the general public. While Mr. Igwe provides us with no authority, nor could we find any, where this alleged conduct shocks the conscience and thus requires we dismiss Officer Skaggs under qualified immunity, we cannot find Mr. Igwe’s allegations could never state a substantive due process claim at this preliminary stage. At this stage, we address only whether Mr. Igwe pleaded Officer Skaggs consciously disregarded a great risk of harm by voluntarily joining a police pursuit including over-running several red lights. Until we review the discovery, we defer to Mr. Igwe’s allegation of either no need to pursue or a limited emergency. Under this rubric, Officer Skaggs’ speeding through traffic lights in a voluntary pursuit of a suspect leaving his vehicle may shock the conscience. . . . Having found Mr. Igwe pleads a plausible substantive due process claim, we now must determine whether this substantive due process right was ‘clearly established’ when Officer Skaggs decided to join a police pursuit on December 8, 2014. . . .Earlier this month in White, the Supreme Court again reminded district courts we must identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances violated the Constitution to defeat qualified immunity. . . While our Court of Appeals defined the high standards in a hyperpressurized police pursuit, we are aware of no controlling precedent applying when an officer decides to join in a police pursuit and whether he has time to deliberate. . . A clearly established right is not defined by the state actors' internal guidelines and policies. . . . As conceded by the absence of authority in the parties' briefs, we are unaware of any existing precedent giving fair warning to Officer Skaggs deciding to join an ongoing high speed police pursuit as to his substantive due process liability. We have no guidelines in clearly established law. As in Taylor, we have a general standard with no clearly established law. We have general guidance from the Supreme Court in Lewis and our Court of Appeals in Sanford regarding the officer's potential mid-level culpability depending on the immediacy of the need for police action and generally directing a test focusing on whether he 'consciously disregarded a great risk of harm' in circumstances where there is less than a 'split-second' decision but more than an 'unhurried judgment.' But this general test does not define the procedures or conduct permissible when deciding to join a police pursuit. Officer Skaggs has no clearly established caselaw advising when he can decide to join a high speed police pursuit during the course of his police duties. As in the Fourth Amendment context in White, this case of an allegedly voluntary joinder into an ongoing police pursuit presents a unique set of facts and circumstances. . . Also, unlike the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit's decisions in Browder v. Casaus, . . . the parties do not dispute Officer Skaggs acted within the scope of his police duties and did not speed for personal purposes. Counsel has not shown, and we are not aware, of any clearly established federal constitutional right contravened by Officer Skaggs' deciding to join a police pursuit and, through violating state driving laws, causing fatal harm to Ms. Robinson. Absent a clearly established federal constitutional right, Mr. Igwe may seek damages under state law claims but Officer Skaggs is immune from civil rights liability.")

Kenneth v. Palmerton Area Sch. Dist. et al., No. 3:14-CV-00068, 2016 WL 3090404, at *7-8 (M.D. Pa. June 2, 2016) ("The viability of a state-created danger claim is well-settled. . . However, no published opinion of the Third Circuit has found that a state-created danger arises when coaches fail to take certain precautions in athletic practice or in any analogous situation. . . . Here, Plaintiffs allege that the relevant constitutional right is 'the student's right to freedom from school officials' deliberate indifference to, or affirmative acts that increase the danger of, serious injury from unjustified invasions of bodily integrity perpetrated by third parties in the school setting.' . . In support of this constitutional right, Plaintiffs rely on an opinion from the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Sciotto v. Marple Newtown Sch. Dist., 81 F. Supp. 2d 559, 568 (E.D. Pa. 1999). However, as explained by the Third Circuit in Hinterberger, which was decided in 2013, over a decade after Sciotto was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . In fact, the Third Circuit cited Sciotto in their opinion, yet still found that the right was not clearly established. . . Because Sheldon's alleged right was not clearly established at the time of his injury, Coach Walkowiak is entitled to qualified immunity. Judgment will be entered in favor of Coach Walkowiak on this claim.")

Rodriguez v. Panarello, 119 F. Supp. 3d 331, 342-43 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("The most compelling aspect of this case is the height at which Plaintiff was standing when the Taser was discharged.

The record does not reveal the precise height of the roof of the vehicle on which Mr. Rodriguez was standing at the time, but for purposes of analogy it is enough to note that the prevailing standard for fall protection in general industry workplaces is four feet. . . Despite that, the circuit court decision most analogous to this case is of no help to the plaintiff. In Harper v. Davis, an alcohol-fueled disturbance at a barbecue prompted an inebriated suspect to fire a rifle inside a home. . . He then hid in the woods with the weapon, perching on a tree branch eight feet above the ground. . . When found by officers, he was told both to descend the tree and show his hands. . . The suspect protested he could not do both, but identified for the officers the location of the gun down by his feet. . . Upon seeing the gun, even though the plaintiff was not holding it and had volunteered its location, an officer Tasered him, and the resulting fall caused paraplegia. . . The Court concluded that the officer's perception of risk was reasonable and warranted the precautionary use of force. . . In this case, the officers did not see a gun, but responded to radio calls that included a report of shots fired, and a man with a gun. Unlike the suspect in Harper, Plaintiff here resisted the officers' instructions, and most importantly he refused to show his hands. The law is clear that an officer need not be accurate in his perception of a risk in order to justify deadly force, but only that his perception of the threat and the corresponding need to use force is objectively reasonable under the conditions he faced. Moreover, to defeat a qualified immunity defense, the right allegedly violated must have been clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . As of 2012, several courts had found the use of a Taser to bring a resisting subject under control was reasonable. . . The parameters of the constitutional use of a Taser in circumstances like those Officer Panarello confronted would not have been sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have known his conduct was unlawful. . . Officer Panarello is thus protected by qualified immunity for his conduct using a Taser on Plaintiff.”)

Kingsmill v. Szewczak, 117 F. Supp. 3d 657 (E.D. Pa. 2015) (“Although the parties did not identify, and we were unable to locate, a case with a cognate claim and a constellation of factual averments, this is the type of case where the alleged conduct is outrageous enough, and the broad contours of the constitutional right sufficiently well-known, that Officer Szewczak was on notice that his conduct violated Kingsmill’s constitutional rights. Officer Szewczak lured Kingsmill away from a physical altercation, engaged him in conversation, and then watched as Brown hit Kingsmill in the face with a steel pipe. Officer Szewczak reacted by telling Brown to flee the scene, declining to make a police report, and refusing to render assistance to the injured Kingsmill. . . Qualified immunity protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . Although this particular scenario does not appear to have been considered by our Court of Appeals, the conduct alleged is not the type qualified immunity protects. Any reasonable officer at the time of this incident—February 9, 2014—would have known that he had a duty not to place an individual at greater risk of injury from a physical assault by hailing him away from the altercation and then declining to intervene. A reasonable officer would have known that he had a duty not to command such an individual to comply with a directive, so that compliance would increase the risk of harm to him. This is not a case where the ‘most that can be said of the state functionaries in this case is that they stood by and did nothing when ... circumstances dictated a more active role for them.’ . . . Officer Szewczak exercised his authority to command Kingsmill to disengage from a physical altercation, and, as a result of Kingsmill's compliance, Brown was able to attack him from behind. Officer Szewczak's failure to warn Kingsmill that Brown was approaching from behind might appear more akin to the inaction that prior courts have found insufficient to ground liability under a state-created danger theory. But Officer Szewczak did not just fail to warn: his initial hail and interference with the assault in this circumstance placed Kingsmill at risk of additional serious injury. After placing Kingsmill in greater danger than he had been before, the officer did not bother to warn him of Brown's oncoming assault. Nor is this a case where the exercise of a state actor's discretion did not increase the danger. . . To be sure, Officer Szewczak was not obligated to protect either Kingsmill or Brown, and his knowledge of their altercation was not sufficient to create an affirmative duty to act. But once Officer Szewczak chose to call Kingsmill to his patrol car, and chose to continue their conversation despite Brown's approach, pipe in hand, he put Kingsmill in greater danger of the assault from Brown. . . . Officer Szewczak may not have placed Kingsmill in the physical confrontation with Brown, but observing Kingsmill in such a snake pit, he made it worse by hailing him and commanding him to disengage, leaving him vulnerable to Brown's attack from behind. Such conduct is sufficiently outrageous that a reasonable officer would have known that doing so could violate Kingsmill's constitutional rights. We find that Kingsmill's right to be free from state-created danger in this particular factual circumstance was clearly established when this incident took place in February of 2014, when this incident took place. Officer Szewczak is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Biddle v. Parker, No. CV 13-343-RGA, 2015 WL 5190694, at *3 (D. Del. Sept. 4, 2015) ("Similar to the claim at issue in Taylor, Counts III and IV assert Plaintiff's right to the proper implementation of training, supervision, and policies for handling individuals who suffer from seizures. As of May 16, 2012-the date of the challenged conduct-there was no Supreme Court decision establishing such a right. Further, there was not a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' suggesting that such a right existed. Plaintiff fails to cite a single case suggesting the existence of an inmate's right to the implementation of adequate training and policies for handling inmates with seizures. . . As the Supreme Court held in Taylor, even if HRYCI's training and policies regarding seizures were as deficient as Counts III and IV allege, there was no precedent in May 2012 that would have made clear to Supervisor Defendants 'that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution.' Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2045. Thus, Counts III and IV do not allege a 'statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' Therefore, Supervisor Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Counts III and IV").

Gaymon v. Borough of Collingdale, No. CIV.A. 14-5454, 2015 WL 4389585, at *9-10 (E.D. Pa. July 17, 2015) ("Here, Mrs. Gaymon openly videotaped the officers, and the recording took place within the curtilage of her property and inside her home. No officer could credibly claim any expectation of privacy on Plaintiffs' property or inside their house. If anyone had an expectation of privacy under these circumstances, it was clearly the Gaymons. Unlike Kelly II, there are no allegations that Defendant White stopped and in good faith sought advice provided from a prosecuting authority. Moreover, in Kelly there was at least some basis on which a uniformed officer might be confused, because the recording there was ‘surreptitious,’ as opposed to Mrs. Gaymon’s open and obvious recording. Without a doubt, Mrs. Gaymon wanted the officer to know he was being recorded. This was not an ‘inherently dangerous situation,’ such as a traffic stop. . . . Rather, the officers responded during daylight to a non-violent complaint about a vehicle’s tire touching the curb in a residential neighborhood. . . . Killingsworth involved events in 2011. Even if I assume that there was still no clearly established First Amendment right to record officers by 2014, the lack of such a right would not transform a citizen’s act of recording on her own property to something criminal in nature justifying arrest. It is certainly clear that the absence of a First Amendment right to record from the confines of one’s own home would not amount to exigent or other circumstances that would justify entering the Plaintiffs’ home without a valid warrant or consent. . . . The Killingsworth plaintiffs were all citizens who came upon police activity on public streets and undertook the role of observers and recorders of events. The issues presented by cases of that nature, where the person inserts himself into a situation as the police are discharging their duties, bear little relevance to this case, where Mrs. Gaymon was either on or inside her private property at all times, the police had entered onto that property without permission, and in addition to herself, both her daughter and husband were directly affected by the actions of the police. Finally, Plaintiffs’ retaliatory arrest claim focuses on the Plaintiffs’ First Amendment right to ‘verbally express their disagreement with and challenge the authority’ of the Defendant officers. . . . ‘The Supreme Court has explicitly held that an individual has a viable claim against the government when he is able to prove that the government took action against him in retaliation for his exercise of First Amendment rights.’ . . . It is indisputable that ‘the First Amendment protects a significant amount of verbal criticism and challenge directed at police officers.’ . . . In fact, the Supreme Court has gone so far as to say that ‘[t]he freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation from a police state.’ . . . Here, a jury could reasonably conclude that the Defendant officers arrested Mrs. Gaymon and Ms. Purnell for voicing disagreement about the officers’ actions in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, a jury could find liability on every constitutional claim alleged without ever needing to confront the issue of whether recording an officer under these circumstances is protected by the First Amendment. . . . It is the combination of factors that make this case compelling to the Court on the facts alleged: the frivolous nature of the neighbor’s initial complaint; the absence of lurking risks inherent in other police activities, such as traffic stops; the alleged aggressiveness of the responding officers; the purported threat to deploy Tasers against a family on the premises of their own home; the overall disproportionate response of law enforcement; the protective instincts of a wife and mother seeking only to record what was occurring; the makeweight nature of the criminal charges brought; and finally, the contorted nature of the qualified immunity defense raised. Defendants have the right to contest, and may well disprove, these allegations at trial. But the contention that no reasonable officer would have understood that such conduct would palpably violate our Constitution is utterly lacking in merit. Therefore, qualified immunity is not a viable defense at this preliminary stage. Defendants’ Motion has been denied.”)

Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *11-12 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) (“[T]he clearly established right cannot be the broad First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for engaging in protected speech, although the specific right in this case differs from the one the Court defined in Reichle. Unlike Reichle, Fleck asserts the constitutional right to be free from an arrest that is not supported by probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for peacefully criticizing a government official. This right was clearly established at the time of Fleck’s arrest. . . . Under Fleck’s version of that day’s events, Nicholson and Doe thus violated clearly established law. Losch was decided many years before the incident here, and it involved a constitutional right that almost mirrors the right asserted by Fleck in this case: the right to be free from an arrest that lacked probable cause and was initiated in retaliation for the peaceful observation and criticism of a police officer. To be sure, the cases are not factually identical, but the rights invoked in both cases are close enough to establish that ‘existing precedent [has] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . [T]he right that Fleck asserts was clearly established because any reasonable officer would have known that arresting her in this manner and for this reason violated her constitutional rights.”)

Montgomery v. Killingsworth, No. 13CV256, 2015 WL 289934, at *13-15 & n.7 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 22, 2015) (“Although Montgomery and Loeb urge the court to follow the two-step Saucier procedure and first ‘reaffirm the existence of a First Amendment right to observe and record public police activities in public,’ it declines to do so and addresses only the second Saucier step. That is because, unlike Fleck’s case, these cases are ones ‘in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’. . . Under their version of the facts, which the court must adopt here, Montgomery and Loeb were arrested without probable cause while they were peacefully recording police officers performing their duties in public. . . The dispositive inquiry here is thus whether they had a clearly established constitutional right to peacefully record police officers performing their duties in public. . . . Existing precedent is not limited to Third Circuit case law; case law from other circuits is relevant in analyzing whether a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated the Constitution. . . . Importantly, this inquiry focuses only on the state of the law at the time of the arrests: January 23, 2011, for Montgomery, and July 14, 2011, for Loeb. . . Relying on case law from the First, Ninth, and Eleventh circuits, Montgomery and Loeb contend that this right was clearly established at the time of their arrests. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar, on the other hand, draw mostly on a Third Circuit case in arguing that the right to peacefully film police conduct was not clearly established at the time of the arrests. . . . Given this pre-existing and recent Third Circuit case law, Montgomery and Loeb did not have a clearly established right to record police officers while they were performing their duties in public. The case law at the time of their 2011 arrests did not establish a clear constitutional rule such that reasonable police officers would know that they were violating the constitutional rights of Montgomery and Loeb. . . . Killingsworth and Gaspar are thus entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment retaliation claims asserted against them by Montgomery and Loeb, respectively. . . . Whether the Third Circuit will eventually decide to follow what appears to be a growing trend in other circuits to recognize a First Amendment right to observe and record police activity is, of course, not for this court to decide, even if there are good policy reasons [to] adopt that change.”)

Hartman v. Gloucester Tp., No. 12–2085, 2014 WL 2773581, *10-*12 (D.N.J. June 19, 2014) (“Defendants argue that the right to be free from entry of a home under the community caretaking function was not clearly established in April, 2010. Ray v. Twp. Of Warren was decided on November 23, 2010 (after Hartman’s arrest) and held that:

The community caretaking doctrine cannot be used to justify warrantless searches of a home. Whether that exception can ever apply outside the context of an automobile search, we need not now decide. It is enough to say that, in the context of a search of a home, it does not override the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment or the carefully crafted and well-recognized exceptions to that requirement.

Ray, 626 F.3d at 177. Until Ray, the question of whether the community caretaking doctrine could justify a warrantless entry into a home was unanswered in our Circuit; on that basis the Ray police officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer that entry into Ray’s home on June 17, 2005 was a violation of the law. While Ray resolved the question of whether the community caretaking exception applied to searches of the home, it is not dispositive here. Although Belcher and the other officers may have had a mistaken belief as to whether or not they could enter the home under the community caretaking exception, application of the exception still requires an evaluation of the totality of the circumstances. And an assertion of a constitutional right to privacy cannot be evidence of wrongdoing or used as justification for warrantless entry. . . Thus, even if the police officers believed they could enter the home under the exception, because Hartman’s right was not clearly established, there are questions of facts related to whether the circumstances justified warrantless entry into Hartman’s residence pursuant to the community caretaking exception. . . As a result, the Court cannot evaluate whether the police officer’s actions were objectively reasonable under the present record, and Defendants’ Motion for Summary Judgment is denied on this basis.”)

Adams v. Springmeyer, 17 F.Supp.3d 478, 508-09 (W.D. Pa. 2014) (“Nine months after the raid at issue in this case, the Court of Appeals continued to question whether Payton had established a threshold lower than ‘probable cause’ to justify an entry into the residence of an individual named in an arrest warrant. . . If the applicable standard was unclear to members of the Court of Appeals after the raid, there is no way that it could have been clear to the Defendants at the time of the raid. In Deary, the Court of Appeals concluded that defendants sued under § 1983 could not establish their entitlement to qualified immunity as long as genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether their actions had been supported by probable cause. . . To the extent that Deary held that a defendant could never establish his or her entitlement to qualified immunity as a matter of law in the face of such a factual dispute, it is no longer good law. In Karnes v. Skrutski, 62 F.3d 485, 491, n. 3 (3d Cir.1995), the Court of Appeals recognized that Deary had been ‘supplanted by the Supreme Court's subsequent determination of the question' in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 107 S. Ct. 3034, 97 L.Ed.2d 523 (1987). In Anderson, the Supreme Court clarified that a law enforcement officer may be entitled to qualified immunity if he or she 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[s] that probable cause is present' and proceeds to conduct a search proscribed by the Fourth Amendment. . . . Although the meaning of the phrase 'reason to believe' appearing in Payton has been the subject of disagreement among courts, the Defendants cannot establish their entitlement to qualified immunity simply by demonstrating that 'courts ha[ve] not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.' . . . The relevant question is whether the 'state of the law' on March 3, 2011, gave the Defendants 'fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution.' . . . Regardless of how the applicable standard has been articulated, courts have generally agreed that an entry is permissible under Payton only where multiple facts support a belief that the individual named in an arrest warrant is both residing and present within a particular home at the time of entry. . . . Extensive surveillance of the Orchard Avenue residence conducted in February 2011 failed to yield a single observation of Hunter. . . . On the basis of the existing record, the Court is not convinced that objectively reasonable officials in the situation faced by the Defendants would have concluded that they had 'reason to believe' that Hunter was still residing and present within the home on the morning of March 3, 2011. . . . The Defendants' decision to move forward with the raid appears to have been heavily influenced by Whaley's alleged observation of Black at the Orchard Avenue residence on February 10, 2011. . . . In his email of February 25, 2011, Christman expressed a belief that Hunter and Black were living together. . . . At the time of Black's earlier arrest, however, it became known that he was a resident of Delaware. . . . This inconsistency in the Defendants' asserted beliefs about the location of Black's residence undermines their contention that they reasonably believed him to be living in the Plaintiffs' home. Reasonable officials in the position of the Defendants would have known that they needed a search warrant to 'legally search for the subject of an arrest warrant in the home of a third party.' . . . The entering officers sued in Ray were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of their actions, it had not been clear whether the 'community caretaking doctrine' could justify a warrantless search of a home in the absence of consent or exigent circumstances. . . . Ray was decided more than three months before the raid conducted at the Orchard Avenue residence. The evidentiary record, when viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, could support a finding that Springmeyer entered the Orchard Avenue residence after learning that Hunter and Black were not present. . . . At the time of Springmeyer's entry, it was clearly established law that, in the absence of a warrant, a law enforcement officer could enter a home without the consent of the owners only in the face of exigent circumstances. . . . Because the Defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity will turn on the existence of facts that have not yet been reduced to findings, the Defendants' motion for summary judgment will be denied with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims remaining in the case. The Defendants remain free to raise the defense of qualified immunity at trial.")

Caldwell v. Nodiff, No. 13-162, 2014 WL 641356, *9, *10 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 18, 2014) ("Notwithstanding the sometimes broad statements about the scope of the failure-to-intervene doctrine, however, the Court has not found a case applying the failure-to-intervene doctrine to a case analogous to this one where the alleged constitutional violation is an unreasonable search and seizure of a person's bodily fluids for the purposes of testing for substance abuse. Under these circumstances, the Court concludes that it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that his failure to intervene in what plaintiff avers was an unreasonable drug test was unlawful. Walker v. Jackson, No. 12-cv-10267, 2013 WL 3379685, at *5 (D.Mass. July 8, 2013) ("The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene."). Thus, the Court concludes that Sgt. Henry and Jane and/or John Does are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to plaintiff's Section 1983 claim insofar as it asserts liability against officers who failed to intervene with respect to the four drug tests.")

Fleck v. Trustees of University of Pennsylvania, 995 F.Supp.2d 390, 408 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("The plaintiffs were on a public street, not in a car, and initially recorded only their own activity. But when they ignored repeated police requests to move from the mosque doorway and lower their voices, the landscape changed. Marcavage refused to shift the camera away from the Penn officer's face, a refusal she took as a threat. That disregard led to their arrest and the video camera's seizure. Under such circumstances we hold that there was then no clearly-established First Amendment right in our Circuit to film police activity where, as here, the plaintiffs actively impeded efforts to restore public order.")

McAndrew v. Bucks Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 982 F. Supp. 2d 491, 499-503 (E.D. Pa. 2013) ("The Third Circuit has categorically found that testimony, even voluntary testimony, at a grand jury hearing is protected speech. . . . Therefore, plaintiff's grand jury testimony as alleged in paragraph 39 of his complaint is protected speech. The court further concludes that plaintiff's reporting of corruption and wrongdoing also implicate the First Amendment because, based on the limited information before the court, it appears that these statements were made in plaintiff's capacity as a citizen, not as a government employee. Plaintiff was a deputy at the Bucks County Sheriff's Office, and the complaint alleges that he complained to his superiors about rigged auto-repair bids, false gun-training certifications, the office's use-of-force policy, corruption, and retaliation for his whistleblowing activities. While the parties have provided only limited information from which the court may infer the boundaries of plaintiff's job responsibilities, the reporting of corruption and wrongdoing does not appear to fall within the ambit of the responsibilities of a deputy sheriff. Furthermore, it is not dispositive that plaintiff learned about the alleged wrongdoing by nature of his position with the Sheriff's Department; indeed 'courts have found that public officials are uniquely qualified to comment on issues of public concern, precisely because of the access to information their positions afford them.'. . . After carefully examining the allegations of the complaint and considering the inferences that flow therefrom, the court has determined that plaintiff has stated a plausible First Amendment claim for which relief can be granted, one which discovery may further substantiate. . . . Furthermore, the court believes that the Supreme Court's decision in Garcetti v. Ceballos as well as a long line of Third Circuit cases addressing the free speech rights of government employees have settled the issue of when a government employee's speech is entitled to First Amendment Protection. . . . While these cases may be somewhat distinguishable from the present matter, the Third Circuit has acknowledged that there need not be ‘previous precedent directly on point’ for a constitutional right to be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . Given the substantial precedent addressing the First Amendment rights of public employees, the court believes plaintiff’s rights were clearly established at the time he was discharged from employment. As such, defendants’ qualified immunity defense is without merit.”)

Ingram v. Township of Deptford, 858 F.Supp.2d 386, 399, 400 (D.N.J. 2012) (“A right is clearly established when ‘it would [have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . It is clearly established that the ‘[u]se of excessive force by a state official effectuating a search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment.’ . . Moreover, while the law surrounding excessive force is fact-dependent, this does not mean the law is not clearly established. Tofano v. Reidel, 61 F.Supp.2d 289, 299 (D.N.J.1999). At the time of this incident, it was clearly established law in the Third Circuit that the objective reasonableness standard articulated in Graham v. Connor, infra, and reiterated in Couden v. Duffy, infra, applied to alleged excessive force violations of the Fourth Amendment. . . While there was no case law in this circuit addressing the reasonableness of force used when removing a litigant from a courtroom pursuant to a judge’s directive, it would have been clear to a reasonable officer in Sergeant Taylor’s position that forcibly lifting a non-resisting senior citizen and carrying her out of the courtroom was excessive. Therefore, from the facts alleged in the Plaintiff’s complaint, Sergeant Taylor is not entitled to qualified immunity on the allegation that he used constitutionally excessive force in executing the judge’s directive. Accordingly, the Defendants’ motion to dismiss the claims against Sergeant Taylor will be denied.”)

Velius v. Township of Hamilton, No. 09-53 (JEI/JS), 2010 WL 4975979, at *5 (D.N.J. Dec. 7, 2010) (“[T]he Court concludes that in 2007, the law with respect to claims of excessive force by handcuffing, was clear: officers may violate a person’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force even in the absence of physical injury. Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hain v. DeLeo, No. 1:08-CV-2136, 2010 WL 4514315, at *5 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 2, 2010) (“Even now many questions remain as to the scope of the Second Amendment. As the Third Circuit has recently cautioned, ‘Second Amendment doctrine remains in its nascency, and lower courts must proceed deliberately when addressing regulations unmentioned by Heller.’ United States v. Marzzarella, 614 F.3d 85, 101 (3d Cir. 2010). Plaintiffs’ argument must therefore be rejected; there is no question that the clearly established legal rules confronting DeLeo would not have put him on notice that his conduct violated the Second Amendment. As a local official, it would not have been clear to him at the time that his actions implicated Plaintiff’s Second Amendment right, which was only just recently incorporated by the Supreme Court. Indeed, it was not and is still not clear that the Second Amendment right set out in Heller is implicated by the revocation of a license to carry concealed weapons in public. Even interpreting the complaint to allege that the revocation of Plaintiff’s permit in retaliation for Plaintiff’s exercise of her Second Amendment rights is a distinct Second Amendment violation, qualified immunity applies to Plaintiff's claims against Sheriff DeLeo. Accordingly, the Court finds that DeLeo is entitled to qualified immunity; the Defendants' motion to dismiss will be granted on this claim.")

Burke v. Twp. of Cheltenham, No. 10-1508, 2010 WL 3928524, at *15 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 5, 2010) ("Even though the strip search in question here occurred in April of 2008—well before our Circuit decided Florence—we cannot find that the right of an arrestee—even one charged with a minor offense—not to be strip searched while in a correctional facility was 'clearly established' twenty-eight months ago. Baskins is therefore entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Burke's unlawful search and seizure claims arising out of the strip search of Burke at the Cheltenham Township Police station. Regarding strip searches incident to arrest, however, Judge DuBois has recently noted that '[n]o Supreme Court case discusses the constitutionality of strip searches incident to arrest, which appear to fall between the "full searches" considered by Robinson and the "intrusions beyond the body's surface" considered by Schmerber.' . . . But the factors elucidated in Wolfish that must be considered before ruling on whether a strip search in prison is reasonable—the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted,' . . . all militate against the legality of the street strip search described in Burke's complaint. . . . [A] public strip search that fails the four-factor test of Wolfish would necessarily be unreasonable given that Wolfish explicitly dealt with strip searches in prisons. Applying Wolfish to Burke's version of the facts, then, we conclude on this limited record that the arresting officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched Burke on Fenton Road. While this satisfies only the first prong of Saucier, what little precedent there is dealing with public strip searches suggests that such searches violate clearly established rights under Saucier's second prong.")

Henry v. City of Philadelphia, No. 09-1584, 2010 WL 3927638, at *15, *16 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 30, 2010) ("Since Grazier, which was issued on May 9, 2003, and the Third Circuit's decision in Neuberger, which was issued on January 5, 2005 but was non-precedential, our Court of Appeals has not answered the question left open by Abraham v. Raso in 1999. As a result, we cannot say that, as of August 5, 2007, the notion that an officer violates an individual's constitutional rights if he engages in conduct that unreasonably or unnecessarily increased the likelihood that significant force would be applied against the individual was a constitutional right that was 'clearly established' by virtue of controlling case law in the Third Circuit. . . . Nor do we find that a consensus of cases of persuasive authority had embraced this notion as of the relevant date as to have had the effect of 'clearly establishing' it for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Having surveyed the case law, we are not persuaded that Henry had a clearly established right as of August 5, 2007 to be free of instructions by officers to drop his knives and come outside, where the officers sought to disarm and subdue him at a time when he was subject to arrest for his earlier assaults on officers and notwithstanding the fact that department policy instructed them to leave such tactics to colleagues in a specialized unit. . . . Because Plaintiffs have not established that any conduct of Officer Orth or Sergeants Schiavone or Bradshaw in directing Henry to emerge from the house violated a clearly established constitutional right, these officers are entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity”)

Beckinger v. Township of Elizabeth, No. 08-432, 2010 WL 1024644, at *17 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 17, 2010) (“As evident from Green, with respect to whether an employee has a clearly established First Amendment right to attend or testify at judicial proceedings, this court concludes that Garcetti called into question whether the testimony of a government employee at a judicial hearing in the course of the employee’s duties may constitute speech as a citizen entitled to First Amendment protection. This ambiguity after Garcetti lasted until Reilly was decided. While Reilly recognized that the right was clearly established prior to Garcetti, it noted that no precedential opinion was rendered after Garcetti until the court of appeals in Reilly addressed the issue. The relevant conduct in Reilly occurred prior to Garcetti at a time when the right was clearly established. Reilly did not address the situation where the conduct occurred in the period between Garcetti and Reilly when there was uncertainty about how broadly Garcetti would be applied. . . . The court finds that during the small window of time between May 30, 2006 when Garcetti was decided and July 1, 2008 when Reilly was decided, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that imposing discipline on a police officer for testifying on matters related to the officer’s official duties was unlawful.”)

Crawford v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. Civ.A. 1CV03-693, 2005 WL 2465863, at *10 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 6, 2005) (“The individual Defendants argue that because it was not clear at the time of Plaintiff’s prosecutions that police were obligated under Brady to disclose favorable evidence to the accused, they are entitled to qualified immunity. If this was the extent of the violation claimed by Plaintiff, Defendants argument might have some appeal. [citing Gibson]However, the right to be free from falsifying documents, fabricating evidence, giving misleading or perjured testimony, and malicious prosecution was clearly established. It strains credibility to think that police officers could participate in the conduct alleged here and not understand that their actions violate the accused’s rights. . . . It is up to Plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence at trial that the individuals did in fact conspire to alter the evidence in order to convict him and are responsible for his imprisonment. At summary judgment, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the individual Defendants have failed to meet their burden in demonstrating immunity for the violations claimed.”).

Maslow v. Evans, No. 01-CV-3636, 00-CV-5660, 00-CV-5805, 01-CV-1538, 01-CV-2166, 2003 WL 22594577, at *27, *28 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 7, 2003) (“It is beyond question that when Plaintiffs’ claim arose it was a clearly established principle of law that a state actor violates another’s constitutional rights when he sexually assaults that person in the course of an arrest, or transports a person to her house and then forcibly performs oral sex, or otherwise uses his authority as a state official to force himself sexually upon an unwilling victim. Even if no case had ever proclaimed it so, it would be manifestly clear to any reasonable officer that such conduct is unlawful. . . . Having addressed the law applicable to the subordinate, the Court must next determine whether the supervisory liability doctrine, as it applies to this context, was clearly established. . . As set forth above, Plaintiffs have adduced sufficient facts to make out a constitutional violation, thus satisfying the first step in the Saucier analysis. . . The Court concludes that it was clearly established by early 1999 that a supervisor who was deliberately indifferent in the face of an unreasonable risk of harm could be held liable under § 1983 if his inaction bore an affirmative causal link to the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . . Given the nature, quality and quantity of scandalous and troubling information known to these Defendants, the Court cannot conclude that their legal obligations could have been unclear. Each of these Defendants was aware that Evans had used his authority as a state trooper improperly and that the objects of his egregious misconduct were, on far too many occasions, women or young girls in the community. Defendants contend that it is only with the benefit of hindsight that the extent of Evans' depravity and risk to the community could be known and that these officials acted reasonably at the time. However, the Court is satisfied that the information known to these Defendants in early 1999 would compel a reasonable officer to intervene and take appropriate steps to prevent Evans from abusing his position of power for his own perverted sexual gratification. In these circumstances, no reasonable officer could believe that the Constitution demanded less. Accordingly, these Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Somers v. Devine, No. 24-1511, 2025 WL 889762, at *1,*7 (4th Cir. Mar. 24, 2025) ("The plaintiff here challenges the district court's grant of qualified immunity to a police officer on various First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendment claims arising out of plaintiff's arrest at a local school board meeting. An objectively reasonable officer could have found probable cause for the arrest after plaintiff refused to obey lawful orders designed to quell disruption of the meeting. We thus hold that defendant is entitled to qualified immunity with regard to plaintiff's retaliatory arrest, unlawful arrest, and malicious prosecution claims. Likewise, an objectively reasonable officer could have applied the force that the arresting officer did in the face of plaintiff's resistance. Defendant is accordingly entitled to qualified immunity with regard to plaintiff's excessive-force claims. We therefore affirm the judgment of the district court. . . . Our decision does not seek to define the exact point at which healthy protest becomes unacceptable disruption. We simply acknowledge that an officer who makes reasonable, content-neutral efforts to enable a school board to perform its critical democratic function is entitled to qualified immunity. Plaintiff suggests that Officer Devine's efforts to lower the volume of her disruptive expression are the sign of a 'police state.'. . This is nonsense. Police states do not request compliance with modest instructions delivered multiple times; they drag off the lawful without courtesy of comment. Police states do not tolerate the filing of suits against law-enforcement officers. Proof schemes and summary judgment presumptions are unknown to them. Somers had plenty of opportunity to either comply with Officer Devine's lawful order or voluntarily leave the premises. Her decision to instead resist brings with it necessary consequences, one being that the officer's actions here plainly entitle him to qualified immunity. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.")

Farabee v. Gardella, No. 21-7220, 2025 WL 759603, at *6 (4th Cir. Mar. 11, 2025) (“As to qualified immunity, Appellees contend that expert witness testimony would not have altered the court’s ruling ‘because an expert could not have shown that it was clearly established that not providing DBT [dialectical behavior therapy] for one month violated Farabee’s constitutional rights.’ . . . As Farabee notes, however, Appellees frame the qualified immunity question too narrowly. By framing the question around DBT specifically, Appellees attempt to cabin the Court’s analysis to whether DBT is a constitutionally mandated treatment generally. Similarly, Appellees’ reference to the short time period at issue in this case suggests that a due process violation for a limited time is acceptable. Both of those premises are flawed and posit that the appropriate qualified immunity question in this case is whether it was clearly established that not providing a patient with medical treatment necessary to treat his condition violated his constitutional rights. The Constitution does not provide a right to specific medication or preferred treatment. However, it does provide a right to those in government care to medical treatment necessary to treat their respective conditions. Farabee suffers from borderline personality disorder. The record indicates that several doctors, including some employed by the state, have confirmed his diagnosis and acknowledged his need for DBT. Yet, for some reason, Farabee has not yet been accorded that treatment despite his commitment to state custody for several years at a time. It may be the case that discovery will produce documentation indicating that the State’s decision not to offer Farabee DBT resulted from an exercise of professional judgment. If so, the decision would be reasonable and therefore shelter Appellees from liability on this issue. Whether Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity therefore depends on whether their decisions are justified under Youngberg and summary judgment on this basis is inappropriate absent resolution of that issue.”)

Wells v. Fuentes, 126 F.4th 882, 889-91 (4th Cir. 2025) (“What does it mean for the asserted right to be ‘clearly established?’ It must be the case that ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . Of course, the ‘reasonable official’—like the ‘reasonable man’ posited by some tort cases—is a fiction. Qualified immunity’s real bite lies in what this hypothetical is supposed to measure: The law is not ‘clearly established,’ or obvious to ‘any reasonable official,’ unless ‘existing precedent’ has ‘placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . It’s easier to show that a right was probably violated than inarguably violated, and so ‘[t]here are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . Thus, to avoid ‘substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources,’ we may take these two steps in either order—or, answering one in the negative, decline to answer the other. . . . If we choose to take the second, qualified-immunity inquiry first, we assume that the plaintiff has shown all the facts alleged. In other words, we assume that the plaintiff can carry his burden at step one. . . . Then we ask whether if what he says were true, this would amount to an inarguable breach of law. Because at step two the question must be beyond debate from the perspective of any reasonable officer, we often say that qualified immunity calls for an ‘objective’ test. . . . The Supreme Court has explained ‘that bare allegations of malice should not suffice to subject’ officers to the ‘burdens’ of suit. . . . This means we do not ask at step two whether the defendant officials subjectively knew they broke the law, or even did so deliberately. . . . Instead, we assume that the plaintiff can win at step one and then ask only whether what the officer allegedly did was undebatably wrong. . . Yet because the precise scope of ‘clearly established law’ depends on ‘existing precedent,’ the factual details of past cases matter a great deal. . . The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly’ admonished that we should not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Instead, to find a violation of clearly established law, we must be able to ‘ “identify a case” or a “body of relevant case law” where “an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Constitution.”’ . . If no prior case has announced a ‘rule’ that ‘obviously resolve[s]’ the rights claim at hand, then the right was not clearly established. . . This objective, fact-bound standard is ‘demanding.’ . . The ‘crucial question’ is whether every reasonable officer would know this action in this situation was unlawful. . . If even one reasonable officer could think that ‘existing precedent’ did not put the legality of the conduct at issue ‘beyond debate,’ then all officers are immune. . . . At the first layer (the Fourth Amendment one), we ask whether a reasonable officer could have done the challenged act—that is, whether his conduct was factually reasonable. This determines whether officers violated a constitutional right. And at the second layer (the qualified-immunity one), we ask whether the conduct was ‘legally []reasonable’—that is, whether any officer could have thought the act factually reasonable and thus lawful under the Fourth Amendment. . . This determines whether the asserted right was clearly established. All together, step-two asks in Fourth Amendment cases whether every reasonable officer would know that the challenged conduct was un-reasonable.”)

Wells v. Fuentes, 126 F.4th 882, 896-97 (4th Cir. 2025) (“Alongside his Fourth Amendment claims, Wells also alleges that officers violated his Second Amendment rights by taking his guns. But this claim runs into the same qualified-immunity problem. It may—may—be true that the officers’ acts might violate the Second Amendment if they repeated them today. But qualified immunity demands we look at the law’s content ‘at the time of the conduct in question.’ . . In 2020, existing precedent had not established that the Second Amendment protects a right to public carry. . . That recognition came from the Supreme Court years later. See New York State Rifle & Pistol Ass’n v. Bruen, 597 U.S. 1, 8, 142 S.Ct. 2111, 213 L.Ed.2d 387 (2022). Because Wells did not have a clearly established right in 2020, the police are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Quinn v. Zerkle, 111 F.4th 281, 294-95 (4th Cir. 2024) (“The Kanawha Deputies contend that even if this Court concludes that their understanding of consent was unsound, as we have, they are still entitled to qualified immunity. This is so, they say, because we have not addressed a factually analogous case sufficient to establish that entering a residence when a previously locked door opens in response to officers knocking, but no one comes to the door or interacts with the officers in anyway, violates the Fourth Amendment. The Kanawha Deputies’ contention overstates the facts and misapprehends the law. As to the facts, they maintain that the door opened in response to their knocking, but the record supports only the conclusion that it opened following the officers’ knocking. . . The former suggests a causal connection that we cannot infer at this stage of the litigation, while the latter merely states what happened. With respect to the law, the Kanawha Deputies seem to misunderstand what it means for a right to be ‘clearly established’ to prevent a qualified immunity defense. Contrary to their suggestion, we need not have recognized a right on identical facts for it to be deemed clearly established. . . Rather, we will deny a claim of qualified immunity where we determine that officers in the Fourth Circuit have been provided ‘fair warning, with sufficient specificity,’ that their actions would violate the Constitution. . . . As noted above, the right against warrantless searches and seizures has been a part of our nation’s values since its founding. . . . Given the importance of this right, it is enforced subject to very few exceptions, which must be adequately demonstrated on the record to justify any deviation from the general prohibition. . . . This Court has recognized implied consent only where it could be inferred based on conduct of the suspect or another occupant in the presence of the officer. Indeed, in each of the cases in which we have recognized implied consent, the officers’ understanding was premised on an interaction with a person presumed to have authority to consent. . . . And, as noted above, we have explicitly stated that the appropriate inquiry in this context is ‘what would the typical reasonable person have understood by the exchange between the officer and the suspect?’. . . . It was therefore well established in August 2019 that implied consent must be based on inferences an officer draws from the conduct of someone at least presumed to have the ability to authorize consent. It was also settled that consent is not voluntary where it is the product of duress. . . . Against that backdrop, a reasonable officer in the Kanawha Deputies’ position should not have concluded that a previously locked door opening toward them, without more, constituted implied consent to enter the home. The Kanawha Deputies are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Quinn v. Zerkle, 111 F.4th 281, 299 (4th Cir. 2024) (Wilkinson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“As an initial matter, we are all in agreement that the lethal shooting of Toon—who in that moment posed an imminent deadly threat to the officers—was justified. Toon attempted to evade officers by jumping out of his bedroom window, but not before grabbing his AR-15 rifle. As he tumbled out the eight-foot-high window, he fell to the ground and his rifle pointed up towards Corporal Whittington. We therefore agree with the district court that it is beyond dispute that Zerkle was entitled to use deadly force under these circumstances. Where my colleagues and I depart, however, is on the shooting of Quinn. Quinn and Toon were shot at the same time, in the same place, in the same manner, and with the same purpose. While this formulation is often used to judge the reasonableness of state regulation of expression, it seems useful here in judging the objective reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment of the application of excessive force. Zerkle shot Quinn when he shot Toon. The body camera footage, audio evidence, and expert testimony all make plain that all shots fired by officers on the scene—including the shots that killed Toon and injured Quinn—were fired within two seconds. It is not reasonable to project intent when the scenario unfolded before the officer in the blink of an eye. The shooting occurred in the same place, as Quinn had slipped out of the window immediately after she saw Toon go through it with his rifle. And all bullets were fired in the same manner, a single burst of fire, for the same purpose: to end the deadly threat posed by the suspect who was pointing his AR-15 towards Whittington. Because the shooting was a single event with a singular time, place, manner, and purpose, it was justifiable. Zerkle had no time to sort through the obvious threat the situation posed. Suddenly confronted with a suspect dropping from above with a high-powered rifle, Zerkle had to orient, decide, and act within a very compressed timeframe. It is quite unfair for our judicial system to spend months massaging the split-second decision that Zerkle made to protect his life and that of Corporal Whittington. When officers have the luxury of time, they may be held to higher standards. But we cannot require those whom society expects to confront danger on its behalf to make finely parsed distinctions in ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ situations with deadly consequences. . . Here, the officers acted instantaneously to protect their lives. It is wrong to second-guess their actions. What law is this that requires those who enforce the law to risk their very lives in the service of it?”)

Harris v. Town of Southern Pines, 110 F.4th 633, 644-45 (4th Cir. 2024) (“[I]t defies common sense to say that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity when the allegedly unconstitutional conduct is deliberately withholding exculpatory evidence from prosecutors until after a suspect is indicted. No ‘reasonable officer’ would have believed that he could constitutionally mislead and deceive prosecutors in this manner. As we have previously explained, ‘although we must avoid ambushing government officials with liability for good-faith mistakes made at the unsettled peripheries of the law, we need not—and should not—assume that government officials are incapable of drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense.’ . . Further, even if that alone were not enough, we previously held in Goodwin v. Metts that officers are liable for malicious prosecution if they deliberately withhold exculpatory information from prosecutors. . . Thus, because it was clearly established that officers cannot mislead prosecutors about the viability of charges by withholding exculpatory information until after the suspect was indicted, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. The district court erred in granting summary judgment to Officer Perry, Officer Lowery, and Lieutenant Marsh on the Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution claim. . . Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s decision as to that claim.”)

Johnson v. Robinette, 105 F.4th 99, 120-21 (4th Cir. 2024) (“Under this second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we examine whether the preexisting law was so clear that every reasonable official would understand that the strip searches, including those that involved a momentary grabbing or touching of an inmate’s genitals or buttocks during an otherwise penologically-justified strip search for contraband, rises to the level of a sexual assault within the meaning of the PREA and, consequently, a violation of the inmate’s Fourth Amendment rights. We hold that it was not. First, the controlling precedents in this circuit have all involved ‘touchings’ that unequivocally satisfied the PREA’s definitions of a sexual assault and that were far more egregious than the strip searches or touchings that Johnson has claimed that he was subjected to during some of them. [collecting cases] Johnson has also failed to present us with a ‘consensus of persuasive authority’ from other circuits that clearly establishes that the Officer Zimmerman’s actions were unconstitutional. . . Having surveyed the caselaw from the Supreme Court and this court, and considered the opinions of our sister circuits for a consensus of persuasive authority, we conclude that a reasonable corrections officer would not have known that any of the strip searches, including the two that involved the momentary touchings of Johnson’s genitalia, would rise to the level of an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment.”)

Nazario v. Gutierrez, 103 F.4th 213, 232-36 (4th Cir. 2024) (“Put simply, to point a firearm at a person is a threat with deadly force, and is therefore likely to instill fear, which could manifest into panic and a rash reaction. If unwarranted, the pointing of firearms in a traffic stop situation can needlessly escalate the stop, making it more dangerous for everyone involved. The Fourth Amendment, which is grounded in reasonableness, can be transgressed by an unwarranted threat of deadly force. Thus — although we may not have heretofore adopted the principle — we are satisfied that it can be unconstitutional to hold a person at prolonged gunpoint when he is compliant and presents no danger to the public or law enforcement officers. . . For nearly all of their stop of Lt. Nazario, he was compliant and presented no danger to the Policemen. . . . Of importance, the pointing of firearms at Lt. Nazario by the Policemen was unreasonably exacerbated by the verbal death threats made by Gutierrez. Gutierrez’s first explicit threat — telling Nazario that he was ‘fixing to ride the lightning’ — is a colloquial reference to death by the electric chair. . . And when Nazario said he was afraid to get out of his vehicle, Gutierrez promptly confirmed his fear, saying that Nazario ‘should be.’ . . And both those threats came after Nazario calmly asked the Policemen about the purpose of the stop. At no point was Gutierrez justified in either threatening or using deadly force. As a result, his threats were unwarranted and much more than could be justified. When these threats were made, the Policemen only had probable cause to stop a vehicle for a traffic infraction, and Nazario had not threatened them. In a light most favorable to Nazario, insofar as the threatening conduct prolonged the traffic stop, the seizure was unreasonable. . . On the second prong of qualified immunity, i.e., the clearly established issue, we agree with the district court that Crocker is entitled to qualified immunity because his conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. We do not agree, however, that Gutierrez is entitled to qualified immunity, in view of his death threats against the Army Lieutenant. Our Court has not addressed whether or when the simple act of a police officer pointing firearms at a person during a traffic stop is unconstitutional. Although our sister circuits have made rulings that provide some guidance, the law in this Circuit was not sufficiently developed at the time of Lt. Nazario’s encounter with the Policemen for them to reasonably know that pointing firearms at Nazario in these circumstances would violate the Fourth Amendment. In fact, our precedent provides that ‘[i]t is well established that officers performing a lawful stop are authorized to take such steps as are reasonably necessary to protect their personal safety thereafter.’ . . We have also acknowledged that ‘traffic stops alone are inherently dangerous for police officers.’ . . And an officer’s lawful use of a firearm is directly tied to whether safety concerns are present. . . Plus, the Fourth Amendment does not require a police officer ‘to wait until a gun is pointed at [him] before [he] is entitled to take action.’ . . Thus, in these circumstances — where the Policemen had stopped a darkly tinted and large vehicle at night that was slow in pulling over — our law is not sufficiently developed to make it obvious that pointing their firearms at Lt. Nazario unconstitutionally prolonged his seizure. Gutierrez’s conduct, combined with his death threats against Lt. Nazario, was a clear violation of the Fourth Amendment that lies outside the protection of qualified immunity. Again, those threats were unwarranted, and were well outside the tasks required to complete the mission of his traffic stop. Although we have not heretofore ruled that a police officer should not make unnecessary death threats during a traffic stop, ‘we need not ... assume that government officials are incapable of drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense.’ . . If police officers have been informed that they are not to extend a traffic stop beyond its primary mission of issuing a traffic ticket, it is obvious that they should not prolong the stop by making unwarranted death threats. In these circumstances, we will reverse the district court’s award of qualified immunity to Gutierrez and remand for further proceedings on Lt. Nazario’s unreasonable seizure claim in Count I. . . .As to Lt. Nazario’s claim for excessive force (Count II), the district court ruled that, in a light most favorable to Nazario, the Policemen contravened the Fourth Amendment by utilizing excessive force against Nazario. That is, the Policemen were not entitled to summary judgment on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis — that is, whether a constitutional violation occurred. The court, however, ruled that the Policemen were entitled to qualified immunity under its second prong, that is, the clearly established requirement. As discussed below, we agree that the Policemen are entitled to qualified immunity on Count II. . . . Looking at the four factors cumulatively, the Policemen’s use of force — including their pepper spraying of a calm person who had his hands visible in a prolonged sign of surrender and compliance — was very excessive. On these facts, evaluated in the light most favorable to him, Lt. Nazario has a triable claim under Count II for a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . We nevertheless affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity on the excessive force claim in Count II because the Policemen’s conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. On appeal, Lt. Nazario argues that an award of qualified immunity was error because when ‘the Graham factors strongly favor the plaintiff, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.’. . . Indeed, our Court has ruled that an award of qualified immunity is inappropriate when ‘the weakness of the Graham factors was so apparent that any reasonable officer would have realized that the force employed was excessive.’. . . As outlined above — despite the violation of a Fourth Amendment constitutional right — the Graham factors do not sufficiently weigh in favor of Nazario, and it is not so apparent that any reasonable officer would have realized that the force employed was excessive. Thus, Nazario’s assertion of error on Count II — the use of excessive force — must also fail. It is particularly illuminating that — under our precedent — the Policemen were not on notice that their use of pepper spray violated a clearly established right. . . . The situation here is more like Omeish, and our decision in Park would not have made it beyond debate that the Policemen’s conduct violated a constitutional right. The pepper spray was deployed during a traffic stop, at night, when the suspect was not handcuffed. Thus, the unconstitutionality of the Policemen’s conduct does not follow clearly from Park, entitling the Policemen to qualified immunity. Therefore, the district court did not err in its award of qualified immunity on Nazario’s excessive force claim (Count II).”)

Nazario v. Gutierrez, 103 F.4th 213, 240-41 (4th Cir. 2024) (Rushing, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) (“The majority concludes that Officer Crocker is entitled to qualified immunity on the unreasonable seizure claim, correctly reasoning that it was not clearly established that ‘the simple act of a police officer pointing firearms at a person during a traffic stop’ would be unconstitutional. . . . As the majority observes, our Court has never addressed that question. In fact, the majority cites no court that has ever held that pointing firearms at a person unreasonably prolonged a traffic stop. The cases the majority cites about ‘hold[ing] a person at prolonged gunpoint when he is compliant and presents no danger’ have nothing to do with extending a traffic stop beyond its lawful purposes; they all addressed excessive force claims. . . . Here, however, Nazario has expressly waived an excessive force claim based on the officers brandishing their firearms. See Oral Arg. 11:14–11:23 (Question: “So you’re not arguing that drawing their weapons was an excessive use of force?” Answer: “Not in this ... no, no, no your honor, I’m not.”). Officer Gutierrez is also entitled to summary judgment on Nazario’s unreasonable seizure claim, contrary to the majority’s conclusion. Like Officer Crocker, Officer Gutierrez drew his weapon on Nazario at the outset of the traffic stop and commanded him to step out of the vehicle. But the majority holds that Officer Gutierrez violated clearly established law because he made two unprofessional threats to Nazario after he had holstered his gun and drawn his taser: first, he told Nazario, ‘You’re fixin’ to ride the lightning, son,’ and second, he responded to Nazario’s protestation that he was afraid to step out of the car by saying, ‘You should be.’. . . In total, these comments took about four seconds. These threats may have been ‘outside the tasks required to complete the mission of [the] traffic stop.’. . . But they did not ‘ “measurably extend the duration of the stop,”’ which is an essential element of Nazario’s Fourth Amendment claim. . . . And the comments certainly did not constitute a Fourth Amendment violation so clearly established that ‘every reasonable official’ would know that what he is doing is unlawful. . . . Indeed, the majority admits there is no precedent holding that an officer’s comments during a traffic stop unreasonably prolonged the stop or otherwise violated a driver’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Because Officer Gutierrez’s comments did not prolong the traffic stop, I would affirm summary judgment in favor of Officer Gutierrez and Officer Crocker on Nazario’s Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim.”) Atkinson v. Godfrey, 100 F.4th 498, 501, 504-08 (4th Cir. 2024) (“The primary issue in this appeal is whether a law enforcement officer called to the scene of a private repossession of a vehicle is entitled to qualified immunity from a claim that the officer unreasonably seized the vehicle in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Neither the Supreme Court, our Court, the highest court of the state where the conduct occurred nor a consensus of other circuit courts of appeals have determined that conduct similar to that of the officer is unconstitutional. So, the right alleged to be violated was not clearly established. As a result, we reverse the district court’s denial of the officer’s motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity and remand with instructions to grant. . . . Exercising the analytical discretion permitted for considering qualified immunity, we begin with prong two. Under that prong, an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if, at the time of the challenged conduct, the law did not clearly establish that the officer’s conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Atkinson claims Godfrey violated her Fourth Amendment right, made applicable to the states under the Fourteenth Amendment, to be free from unreasonable seizures. She contends that, during Carolina Repo’s repossession efforts, Godfrey crossed the line from keeping the peace into actively participating. . . . Relying on Soldal, Atkinson claims the law clearly establishes that law enforcement officials violate the Fourth Amendment by actively participating in a repossession. But even if we assume, without deciding, that principle is clearly established as a general matter, we must decide whether it is specific enough to foreclose Godfrey’s qualified immunity defense on its second prong. . . . [F]or Atkinson’s right to be clearly established, there must be case law not just about the general principle that law enforcement officials violate the Fourth Amendment by actively participating in a wrongful repossession; the law must establish that conduct similar to Godfrey’s is unconstitutional. . . . Merely knowing that law enforcement officials can violate the Fourth Amendment by actively participating in a wrongful repossession would not put Godfrey on notice that his particular conduct was unconstitutional. To the contrary, it begs the critical question—what conduct crosses the line in a private repossession from peacekeeping to actively participating? To answer that question, we must see whether the law clearly established that conduct similar to that of Godfrey was unconstitutional. And for that inquiry, we consider decisions of the Supreme Court, this Court and the highest court of the state in which the case arose. . . . Because the facts in Soldal greatly differ from the facts here, that decision would not have provided fair warning to Godfrey that his conduct was unconstitutional. . . . With no Supreme Court authority, we would typically look to our Court’s precedent and to decisions of the Supreme Court of North Carolina. But the parties agree that neither we nor the Supreme Court of North Carolina have addressed the issue presented here. Absent decisions from the Supreme Court, our Court and the Supreme Court of North Carolina, we may look to a ‘ “consensus of cases of persuasive authority” from other jurisdictions, if such exists.’ . . . But none exists here. Other circuits that have addressed this question for the most part agree that ‘officers are not state actors during a private repossession if they act only to keep the peace, but they cross the line if they affirmatively intervene to aid the reposessor.’ . . . But there is no consensus on where to draw that line. As recognized by the Second Circuit, ‘no bright line has been drawn delineating the exact point at which an officer’s presence and activities at the scene of a repossession become state action in aid of the repossession.’ . . . In fact, decisions from other circuit courts are not consistent at all about when an officer’s conduct constitutes assistance in the repossession as opposed to peacekeeping. . . . Lastly, Atkinson argues that the combination of Soldal, Fuentes and North Carolina case law makes clear that the right she alleges was clearly established. But that is not how the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis works. We do not decide whether a right is clearly established like a customer in a buffet line selectively picking items and declining others to come up with the ideal meal. And the reason for this should be clear. The second prong of the qualified immunity analysis examines if the law fairly warned an officer that his conduct violated the Constitution. Mixing and matching parts of dissimilar decisions does not provide fair warning. To sum up our qualified immunity analysis, neither the Supreme Court, our Court nor North Carolina’s high court has provided fair warning that conduct like Godfrey’s was unconstitutional. Nor is there a consensus from other courts of appeals that would have provided fair warning to a reasonable officer standing in Godfrey’s shoes. Godfrey is, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Lewis v. Caraballo, 98 F.4th 521, 534-37 (4th Cir. 2024) (“The question before us is whether a non-dangerous, non-actively resistant, ‘at least partially subdued,’ arrestee’s right to be free from excessive force in the form of head strikes was clearly established by 2018. . . . The district court concluded that it was clearly established that ‘assaulting a subdued arrestee after officers have mitigated the immediate threat to themselves is objectively unreasonable.’ . . . We agree. . . . We think Valladares and Kane made plain enough, before 2018, the excessive nature of the force used here. Both Valladares and Kane found excessive force when officers continued to assault non-dangerous, controlled suspects. That is precisely the case here. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Lewis, Caraballo struck Lewis, a non-dangerous suspect, with his elbows, kneed him, and then swung his fists into the teenager’s head after he was already partially subdued and kneeling under the weight of the two larger officers. Our cases thus constituted ‘fair warning’ that Caraballo's use of force was excessive. . . . In sum, we hold the right of a suspect who was at the very least partially subdued and posed no immediate threat to be free from excessive force in the form of strikes to his head was clearly established at the time of the events of this case in 2018. We hence affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment to Caraballo based on Lewis's excessive-force claim under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.")

Lewis v. Caraballo, 98 F.4th 521, 538-40 (4th Cir. 2024) (Diaz, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The qualified immunity doctrine protects an officer who violates the law, so long as he wasn't on notice that his conduct was unlawful. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Cameron Lewis, as we do at this stage of the litigation, Officer Kevin Caraballo may have used excessive force when he punched Lewis (a teenage boy) five times in the head. But because I disagree with the majority that Lewis's rights were clearly established, I dissent in part. . . . Lewis's challenge fails at the second prong: he hasn't specified a clearly established right. The majority defines the right at issue as 'a non-dangerous, non-actively resistant, "at least partially subdued," arrestee's right to be free from excessive force in the form of head strikes.' . . . While I agree that a subdued arrestee has a clearly established right to be free from excessive force, that's not this case. To start, I question the premise that an arrestee may be merely 'partially subdued.' Either a suspect is subdued, or he's not. Otherwise, how is an officer to determine whether force is or isn't authorized? But most importantly, the cases the majority cites concern subdued arrestees, so I can't agree that they put Caraballo on notice that his use of force was excessive. . . . Neither Lewis nor the majority have identified a published case involving the use of force against a 'partially subdued' arrestee, nor pointed to any other 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' . . . So even if Caraballo's use of force was unreasonable, I can't agree that it violated Lewis's clearly established right.")

Amisi v. Brooks, 93 F.4th 659, 668-70 (4th Cir. 2024) ("Here, it was clearly established when Brooks strip searched Amisi (a prison employee) that she couldn't do so without individualized suspicion that Amisi possessed contraband. . . . Brooks claims that our cases are distinguishable because Amisi wasn't a 'known prison employee[]'; thus she wasn't on notice that searching Amisi would violate her rights. Appellants'. . . But that's immaterial because Brooks's mistake was unreasonable. . . . We must determine only whether a reasonable officer would have known that Amisi was an employee, not an inmate. As we've explained, a reasonable officer would. And a reasonable officer would have been on notice that strip searching Amisi, an employee, without individualized suspicion violated her Fourth Amendment rights. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Amisi, the record supports a finding that Brooks violated her clearly established rights. Accordingly, the district court properly denied Brooks qualified immunity. . . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Amisi, Townsend may also be liable for causing Amisi to be unreasonably searched. Section 1983 creates liability not just for a state actor who directly deprives a plaintiff of her rights, but one who 'causes' such a deprivation. . . . We've recognized this 'effective causation' liability theory in several cases. . . . Under this theory, an officer is liable if he 'is the effective cause of another's direct infliction of the constitutional injury.' . . . The 'requisite causal connection can be established ... by setting in motion a series of acts by others which the actors know or reasonably should know would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.’. We’ve previously said that this doctrine doesn’t apply in one context: excessive force. . . Townsend argues that Gandy also limits the effective causation theory in the broader Fourth Amendment context, but we can’t agree. In Gandy, we recognized that for excessive force claims, we look to the ‘moment’ the force is employed, where an officer’s actions to ‘set in motion’ the use of force beforehand wouldn’t be relevant. . . But that holding is unique to excessive force. For a suspicion-less search, unlike excessive force, the officers’ actions before the offending conduct are no doubt relevant. And were we to extend Gandy to the entire Fourth Amendment context, we would read the causation language out of § 1983. Turning back to the record, Townsend set Brooks’s unreasonable search in motion. As the district court found, Townsend pointed at Amisi and signaled to Brooks to take her into the locker room. And he knew that Brooks performed strip searches of incoming inmates in that locker room. Given these facts, a jury could find that Townsend either knew or ‘reasonably should’ have known that his actions would cause Brooks to unreasonably search Amisi. . . What’s more, Amisi’s right to be free from unreasonable strip searches was clearly established when Townsend set the search in motion. To repeat, we’ve recognized that an officer may subject a prison employee to a body cavity search if he has reasonable suspicion the employee possesses contraband, and it’s undisputed that Townsend had no such suspicion. . . And again, unlike in Turner, a jury could find that Townsend’s belief that Amisi was an inmate was unreasonable. In sum, because a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the strip search he caused would violate Amisi’s constitutional rights, Townsend isn’t entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jones v. Solomon, 90 F.4th 198, 209-13 (4th Cir. 2024) (“At the time Jones was placed in a dry cell in April 2015, it was clearly established that inmates were entitled to ‘decent and basically sanitary living conditions and ... the basic elements of hygiene.’. . . And it was clearly established that acute exposure to sewage and severe deprivations of articles of personal hygiene violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . But we are again mindful of the Supreme Court’s caution against defining the violation of a right at too high a level of generality. . . So, while it was clearly established in 2015 that the conditions present in McCray and Williams violated the Eighth Amendment, the question before us is whether ‘a reasonable officer in [Defendants’] position would have known that’ the conditions they inflicted on Jones were ‘unlawful at the time.’. . . And those conditions, while deplorable, were far less extreme than McCray and Williams in terms of the quantity of human waste to which Jones was exposed, and therefore the health risk the conditions imposed on him were lower. Furthermore, our case law in 2015 would have suggested to a reasonable officer that the Eighth Amendment does not require absolutely sterile, pristine prison environments. . . . Nor have we located any other Fourth Circuit or Supreme Court case that would have alerted a reasonable correctional officer that, in the specific facts of this case—which include a relatively short duration, access to toilet paper, an otherwise clean cell, the removal of the waste from the cell after each bowel movement, access to other necessities like a blanket, and the lack of any evidence of underlying medical conditions making Jones more susceptible to illness—depriving Jones of the means to clean his hands, arms, and clothing for about a day exposed him to a substantial risk of serious physical harm in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Additionally, there is no ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ showing that Jones’s rights were violated. . . Jones cites other circuit cases that, like McCray and Williams, involved much more extreme circumstances than those present here. . . . We recognize that, in addition to the general evidence of feces exposure, the record reveals that Cooper forced Jones to eat a meal with soiled hands. But it was not clearly established in April 2015 that giving a prisoner a single meal without utensils after they had defecated once and had access to toilet paper, but not soap or water, would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . In sum, it was not clearly established in April 2015 that the conditions Jones faced posed a substantial risk of serious harm in violation of the Eighth Amendment. To be clear, we are not holding that a case’s facts must reach the horrific levels of those in Taylor and the other extremely egregious cases discussed above in order to violate clearly established law. . . . That is, qualified immunity might not bar a claim relating to conditions only somewhat more severe than those presented here, or conditions akin to those here but persisting for only a slightly longer duration. Further, a court presented with more specific evidence about the health risks posed by particular conditions could well conclude that, in light of that evidence, a reasonable officer should have known that exposing the inmate to those risks violated clearly established law. Under binding case law, however, a defendant official is entitled to qualified immunity where his actions did not violate a clearly established right. And while it was clearly established in 2015 that prisoners were entitled to basically sanitary living conditions, it was not clearly established that conditions of the caliber set forth by the record here were so unsanitary as to alert Defendants that they had crossed the constitutional line. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s decision granting summary judgment to Defendants on Jones’s Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Jones v. Solomon, 90 F.4th 198, 216-17 (4th Cir. 2024) (King, J., concurring in the judgment) (“My friends in the majority have properly determined that Jones’s dry cell treatment — as revealed by this record — was ‘gross, degrading, and deeply concerning.’ . . Their fine opinion, however, does not answer the important question of whether such treatment contravenes the Eighth Amendment. I would conclude that it did. On this record, Jones was forced to eat and sleep in an alarmingly soiled state. Forcing a human being to eat his food using hands dirtied by fecal matter is well beyond contemporary standards of decency, and carries with it a substantial risk to personal health. As our former colleague Judge Wilkins once recognized, the ‘precepts of humanity and personal dignity animate the Eighth Amendment, [and] we are guided by contemporary standards of decency.’ . . I nevertheless agree with my good colleagues that an award of qualified immunity is appropriate with respect to Jones’s Eighth Amendment claim. When the constitutional violation that I would recognize occurred, the law of our Circuit did not clearly establish the scope of Jones’s constitutional right to basic elements of hygiene. I therefore concur in the judgment.”)

Omeish v. Kincaid, 86 F.4th 546, 557-59 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Our decision in Park . . . does not squarely govern the case before us. . . Unlike the officer in Park, Officer Patrick used pepper spray to take control of the arrestee, and he did not use it after placing Omeish in handcuffs. But while those distinctions are material and tend to support a conclusion that Patrick’s use of force was not excessive, other circumstances complicate the analysis. For example, Omeish insists that she was at most passively resisting, that her slight frame posed no physical threat to the larger officer, and that the pepper spray was unnecessary because, by the time it was deployed, she had offered Patrick her license numerous times. In light of these circumstances, we choose not to determine, as a matter of law, whether Officer Patrick's use of pepper spray violated vel non the Fourth Amendment. Rather than decide the qualified immunity issue under the first prong — whether Officer Patrick actually violated the Fourth Amendment — we elect to resolve it under the second prong — whether a violation was clearly established such that every officer in Officer Patrick's circumstances would have understood that he was violating the Fourth Amendment. . . For the following reasons, we conclude that in this case, the law was not clearly established. As noted, when assessing whether a right is clearly established, we look to Supreme Court and Fourth Circuit authority to 'consider whether officers within our jurisdiction have been provided fair warning, with sufficient specificity, that their actions would constitute a deprivation of an individual's constitutional rights.' . . When categorizing like cases, we must take care to carve at the joints. For, as noted, qualified immunity kicks in 'unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.' . . And careful comparisons are especially necessary in cases involving excessive force because highly variable and fast moving circumstances inform whether the force was excessive. . . In this case, the issue, defined by the circumstances, is whether Omeish had a clearly established constitutional right not to be pepper sprayed after repeatedly failing to comply with the officer's commands during a lawful roadside stop and resisting his attempts to arrest her in a location dangerous to the officer. Thus, the question is whether a reasonable officer in Officer Patrick's position would have had adequate notice that his use of pepper spray violated Omeish's right. The only case in our circuit that even addresses whether the use of pepper spray in connection with a Fourth Amendment seizure is reasonable is Park, but that decision does not sufficiently inform officers about the use of pepper spray in Officer Patrick's circumstances. Critically, in Park, the pepper spray was used after the woman was secured in handcuffs, and its use was not only unneeded, but it also violated governing police procedures. . . Those circumstances differ materially from those here, where the officer faced an escalating situation over the course of four minutes in which Omeish disobeyed his orders both to produce documentation and to exit the car and resisted his efforts to arrest her. The officer used the pepper spray only once with a burst at her forehead, while in the process of attempting to take control over her person. Moreover, the officer's use of pepper spray here complied with governing police procedures, as later found during a hearing held by the Chief of Police. Park thus does not inform officers in the circumstances facing Officer Patrick that the use of pepper spray was clearly unlawful — i.e., that it was 'beyond debate.' To argue that the law was clearly established in this circuit, Omeish relies primarily on our decision in Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Village of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892 (4th Cir. 2016). . . . We cannot conclude that the Armstrong holding would inform every officer — beyond debate — that it would be unlawful to use pepper spray during a traffic stop in the circumstances that Officer Patrick faced. Armstrong involved (1) tasers, (2) the seizure of a mentally ill man who had committed no crime, (3) the use of a taser after only 30 seconds, and (4) the use of a taser five times against someone passively resisting. While we did, in Armstrong, refer to our decision in Park as an example of excessive force, . . . we did not hold or even suggest that Park's holding clearly established that the use of tasers in Armstrong amounted to excessive force. . . . At bottom, we conclude that there was no clearly established legal precedent set by the Supreme Court, the Fourth Circuit, or the general consensus of persuasive authority governing the question presented here and so informed a reasonable officer. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's order dismissing Omeish's Fourth Amendment claim based on qualified immunity.)

Aleman v. City of Charlotte, 80 F.4th 264, 291-96 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Under the foregoing view of the facts — which, again, is necessarily in the light most favorable to the plaintiff — Galindo posed a threat to the safety of the responding officers at the moment he was shot, but a reasonable officer on the scene would not have had probable cause to believe that he posed an ‘immediate threat’ such that deadly force could constitutionally be used against him. . . Simply put, Officer Guerra fired at Galindo while Galindo was standing still in a position of surrender. Although Galindo was armed with a pistol, he did not threaten anyone with the pistol by ‘pointing, aiming, or firing his weapon.’ . . And although Galindo failed to obey the officers’ English commands to ‘drop the gun’ and ‘put it down,’ he made no ‘furtive or other threatening movement with the weapon’ that would have signaled an ‘inten[t] to use it in a way that imminently threaten[ed] the safety of [Guerra] or another person.’ . . . At bottom, a reasonable jury could review and interpret the video footage, consider the other evidence, and decide that Galindo did not pose an immediate threat to Officer Guerra or anyone else at the moment Guerra shot him. A reasonable jury could also find that Guerra fabricated his account of the fatal shooting because he knew that the real facts showed that the shooting was not justified. Or a reasonable jury could find that Guerra mistakenly perceived that Galindo posed an immediate threat, but that Guerra’s mistake was not reasonable. As such, it very well may be concluded that Guerra used excessive force in contravention of the Fourth Amendment, meaning that he is not presently entitled to qualified immunity under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . [T]he district court’s theory disregards our precedents that deadly force cannot be used simply because a suspect is armed and has ignored commands. To be sure, the decisions invoked by the district court — Anderson, Sigman, and Slattery — stand for the legal principle ‘that an officer does not have to wait until a gun is pointed at the officer before the officer is entitled to take action.’ . . But those and other decisions make clear that there must be some basis, other than a suspect’s mere possession of a weapon and failure to obey commands, for the officer to reasonably feel threatened. That is, the suspect must ‘make[] some sort of furtive or other threatening movement with the weapon, thereby signaling to the officer that the suspect intends to use it in a way that imminently threatens the safety of the officer or another person.’ . . Here, the allegation is that Galindo made such a furtive or threatening movement with his pistol only after taking the position of surrender. In these circumstances, the district court erred in concluding at the summary judgment stage that Officer Guerra’s use of deadly force was objectively reasonable, such that no Fourth Amendment violation occurred. Consequently, the court erred in awarding qualified immunity to Guerra under the first prong of the relevant analysis. . . . Here, the question is whether it was clearly established in September 2017 that an officer would contravene the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force against a suspect who is holding a firearm in his hand and ignoring commands to drop the weapon, but who is standing still in a position of surrender, is not firing the weapon or aiming it at any person, and is not otherwise making a furtive or threatening movement that would suggest he had an intent to use the weapon to harm the officer or anyone else. The answer is plainly ‘yes’ under our 2013 decision in Cooper, as well as our earlier decisions in Anderson (2001), Sigman (1998), Elliott (1996), McLenagan (1994), and Slattery (1991). . . . Notably, Officer Guerra — who bears the burden of proof under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, . . . does not argue that the aforementioned right did not become clearly established until we decided Hensley, two months after he fatally shot Galindo. And there is good reason for that, as it is not Hensley that clearly established the right. At best, Hensley simply made even clearer the right that was clearly established by Cooper, Anderson, Sigman, Elliott, McLenagan, and Slattery. Officer Guerra is thus left to assert that a different right is at issue in these proceedings — a right that has never been clearly established. Specifically, Guerra maintains that there is no precedent of this Court or the Supreme Court ruling that where an officer is ‘interacting with a subject who has a gun in his hand which the officer reasonably believes the subject is preparing to fire,’ and where ‘the officer has announced his presence and the subject has been commanded repeatedly to disarm,’ that officer ‘is not allowed to defend himself, his fellow officers and others with deadly force.’ . . . The critical problem for Guerra is that his argument assumes that he shot Galindo based on a reasonable belief that Galindo was about to fire his own pistol, but that is not what the plaintiff contends. Considering, as we must, the Fourth Amendment right that the plaintiff alleges was violated, we are readily satisfied that the right was clearly established at the time of the September 2017 fatal shooting. We therefore vacate the district court’s award of qualified immunity to Officer Guerra and reinstate the plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment claim for further proceedings.”)

Aleman v. City of Charlotte, 80 F.4th 264, 297-301 (4th Cir. 2023) (Richardson, J., dissenting) (“In its fifty-seven-page opinion, the majority devotes a mere three pages to whether Officer Guerra violated clearly established law. Its brevity is telling. While the law may be established now, we must consider the law as it stood when Galindo was shot in September 2017. And the law at that time did not clearly establish that Officer Guerra violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Even were one to accept its definition of the right, . . . the majority does not identify a single case published before this September 2017 shooting—let alone a ‘body of relevant case law’— ‘finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ . . . Its conclusory analysis instead relies on cases after the shooting and cases finding no violation. . . . Without Knibbs, Franklin, or Hensley, and looking only to the caselaw that existed in September 2017, . . . Officer Guerra is entitled to qualified immunity. The majority cites six pre-shooting cases: (1) Cooper v. Sheehan, 735 F.3d 153 (4th Cir. 2013); (2) Anderson v. Russell, 247 F.3d 125 (4th Cir. 2001); (3) Sigman v. Town of Chapel Hill, 161 F.3d 782 (4th Cir. 1998); (4) Elliott v. Leavitt, 99 F.3d 640 (4th Cir. 1996); (5) McLenagan v. Karnes, 27 F.3d 1002 (4th Cir. 1994); and (6) Slattery v. Rizzo, 939 F.2d 213 (4th Cir. 1991). But together or separately, none of these make it clear to ‘every reasonable official’ that the use of deadly force in this case was clearly unlawful. . . [dissent discusses cases] All told, the majority has ‘failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . It has not shown that—based on our caselaw in September 2017—a reasonable officer would have known that using deadly force in these circumstances was clearly unlawful, beyond debate. Officer Guerra’s conduct at least falls in the ‘hazy border’ between the unreasonable use of force in Cooper and the reasonable uses of force in Anderson, Sigman, Elliott, McLenagan, and Slattery. . . That means he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . ‘Qualified immunity is controversial, contested, and binding.’. . While many criticize the doctrine, lower court judges are duty-bound to faithfully apply it so long as it exists. The majority does not. It instead joins the lengthy list of courts of appeals to improperly deny qualified immunity in a Fourth Amendment case. . . I refuse to join that list and respectfully dissent.”)

Younger v. Crowder, 79 F.4th 373, 385-86 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Deliberate indifference is a multifaceted claim requiring significant risk, substantial harm, knowledge, and inaction. So we define each facet of Younger’s deliberate-indifference claim in the ‘specific context’ of this case when searching for clearly established law. . . Doing so frames the qualified immunity question as follows: Was it clearly established in 2013 that a warden violates an inmate’s Fourteenth Amendment rights when he knows—based on officers’ past behavior and warnings about officers’ excessive use of force—that his officers are likely to attack and seriously injure the inmate in retaliation for the inmate’s behavior, but does nothing to address that risk? It was. We held in 1984 that a warden was not entitled to qualified immunity when he was deliberately indifferent to his officers retaliating against inmates by beating them and spraying them with high-pressure fire hoses.”)

Garrett v. Clarke, 74 F.4th 579, 586-89 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Given Garrett’s diminished privacy interest, the minimal nature of the invasion, and VDOC’s proffered special needs in the corrections context, the question is whether Defendants could have reasonably believed they acted lawfully in subjecting Garrett—a VDOC IT employee who allegedly had casual and occasionally indirect contact with prisoners—to random drug testing. . . Stated differently, was it clearly established in June 2018 that, based on the facts as alleged in the complaint, VDOC’s proffered interests in prison security and a law-abiding corrections workforce were not substantial enough to override Garrett’s asserted privacy interest in avoiding a suspicionless drug test?. . . To decide this question, we turn to the caselaw. [court discusses cases] These cases do not clearly establish that applying VDOC’s drug-testing policy to Garrett was unconstitutional. None of these cases arose in the prison context or directly implicate concerns about prison contraband. In broad strokes, the relevant binding authority establishes that a suspicionless drug test calibrated to address a genuine safety risk may be reasonable. . . Garrett makes an argument of degree, claiming that he had less prisoner contact or that his position was more attenuated from prison safety than the corrections employees whose searches were upheld in these decisions. But Garrett’s argument gets qualified immunity backwards. The question is not whether the law clearly authorized Defendants’ actions; they are protected from personal liability unless the law clearly prohibited their conduct. . . . It is of course true, as the district court said, that the State cannot randomly drug test an employee without a special need important enough to override the individual’s privacy interest. But that rule is too general to eliminate immunity because ‘the unlawfulness of the [Defendants’] conduct does not follow immediately from the conclusion that the rule was firmly established.’. . The proper question, instead, is whether precedent clearly established that Defendants lacked a special need of such importance in these circumstances. As we have explained, it did not. We recognize there exists ‘the rare obvious case,’ where a general standard can clearly establish the answer. . . But this is not an obvious case. And ‘specificity is “especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,” where it is “sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.”’. . By baking into its analysis the absence of a sufficient special need, the district court glossed over the central question for immunity purposes: whether every reasonable official in Defendants’ position would understand that VDOC’s proffered interests were not substantial enough to override Garrett’s privacy interest. In view of existing law, the constitutionality of Defendants’ drug testing is simply not ‘beyond debate.’”)

Garrett v. Clarke, 74 F.4th 579, 590-91 (4th Cir. 2023) (Wilkinson, J., concurring) (“The majority opinion is correct that this claim can be dismissed on qualified immunity grounds. I readily concur in its opinion with appreciation for its fine analysis. I add the additional thought that the defendant’s random drug testing policy is also quite reasonable on its merits. . . . I find no problem with this prison policy under the Fourth Amendment. Whether the states wish to rule the policy unlawful or adopt some alternative is their prerogative, not ours. With that said, I happily join the fine qualified immunity analysis requiring dismissal of the claim.”)

Schoonover v. Clay County Sheriff’s Department, No. 20-1680, 2023 WL 4026091, at *4-6 (4th Cir. June 15, 2023) (not reported) (“The parties diverge in defining the constitutional right at issue here. Schoonover argues that non-threatening individuals have a clearly established right to have their known injuries considered by police officers during handcuffing. . . Appellees, on the other hand, argue that the district court correctly found that ‘the right not to be handcuffed wrist-to-ankle’ is not clearly established. . . The district court held that ‘handcuffing the plaintiff wrist-to-ankle under the circumstances in this case seems unreasonable, but there is no indication that the officers were or should have been on notice of a clearly established right not to handcuff one such as the plaintiff in this way.’ . . We find that the district court’s narrow recitation of the right at issue is defined ‘at an appropriate level of specificity.’ . . Accordingly, we must now determine whether Schoonover’s right not to be handcuffed wrist-to-ankle was clearly established. . . . Here, Appellees did not handcuff Schoonover in a manner likely to exacerbate a preexisting physical injury or condition. Although the condition of his left arm was clearly visible, Schoonover does not allege that he notified Appellees that he was experiencing pain or discomfort when he was handcuffed. Unlike the plaintiffs in Walton and Guite, Schoonover did not have a preexisting physical injury or condition that was clearly susceptible to aggravation or re-injury from handcuffing; indeed, Schoonover’s alleged injuries do not appear to stem from the site of his amputation. Given his amputated left arm, Appellees could not secure Schoonover in a traditional manner and in their attempt to handcuff him, caused new injuries to Schoonover’s back, ankle, and wrist. Thus, while Walton and Guite show there is some consensus around the right of arrestees to have their known, preexisting injuries considered during handcuffing, they do not constitute a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ that gave Appellees ‘fair warning that their conduct, under the circumstances, was wrongful[.]’ . . In sum, the cases cited by Schoonover do not amount to a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ that gave Appellees fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional. While Appellees’ actions appear inappropriate and callous in hindsight, we conclude that Schoonover’s right not to be handcuffed in the manner that he was—wrist-to-ankle—was not clearly established, and Morris and Holcomb are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Hulbert v. Pope, 70 F.4th 726, 733, 736-39 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Any ‘unlawfulness of [Pope’s] conduct’ with respect to the picketers’ First Amendment right to demonstrate was not ‘clearly established at the time,’ . . . or ‘beyond debate[.]’ . . . That is, a reasonable officer in Pope’s shoes could have believed that his orders were consistent with the picketers’ First Amendment rights. . . . In sum, the undisputed material facts establish Pope acted reasonably when he arrested the Hulbert brothers for disobeying clear orders. . . . Pope is thus entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs’ First Amendment right-to-demonstrate claim. . . . Pope’s order imposed a reasonable time, place, or manner restriction on Kevin’s filming: Kevin could continue to film but had to do so from off the sidewalk. This order did not violate Kevin’s clearly established rights. Neither this court, nor the Supreme Court, nor any other circuit has recognized an unlimited First Amendment right to film police free of otherwise reasonable limitations. In fact, the circuits that recognized a right to film explicitly noted that it ‘may be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.’ . . . So even assuming that there was some clearly established right to film police, that right would have been subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. ‘Viewing these circumstances as a whole, a reasonable officer could conclude’ that ordering Kevin to move back less than fifteen feet and film from off the sidewalk was a permissible time, place, and manner restriction. . . . The order ‘could reasonably have been thought consistent with’ any First Amendment right to film. . . . On the undisputed facts, the order was ‘content neutral’ because it had nothing to do with the content of what Kevin was filming. . . . It left open ‘ample alternative channels for communication’ because Kevin was allowed to continue filming from off the sidewalk, just a little farther away. . . . And a reasonable officer could have believed that moving Kevin and the other onlookers farther away, off the sidewalk and a greater distance from Pope and Jeff, was ‘narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest.’ . . . In sum, the caselaw on the right to film has explicitly recognized the permissibility of time, place, and manner restrictions and has not clearly delineated ‘the limits of this constitutional right.’ . . . And Pope reasonably could have believed that his order was a permissible time, place, or manner restriction given the general criteria governing such restrictions. . . . The right to film police, to the extent one existed, was not the right to a close-up. ‘[E]xisting law’ thus failed to “place[] the constitutionality of the officer’s conduct beyond debate’ because that law was not sufficiently particularized to ‘clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him.’ . . . Pope is therefore entitled to qualified immunity for ordering Kevin to move off the sidewalk while he was filming. Because Pope reasonably could have believed that his order was consistent with any First Amendment right to film, it was also reasonable for him to believe that arresting Kevin for disobeying that order was constitutional. . . . While the arrest effectively prevented Kevin from continuing to film, we are aware of no precedent suggesting that there is a First Amendment right to continue filming even after one has been formally arrested and subjected to custody. Pope is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Kevin Hulbert’s First Amendment right-to-film claim. . . . Not every time, place, or manner restriction will prove lawful. But to yank the leash on capitol police officers too tight would at this most delicate of moments prevent them from taking necessary measures out of an ‘undue apprehension of being sued.’. . . The upshot would be to discourage actions, even the most modest and incremental, that guard the sanctity of legislative proceedings and provide for the safety of the public. Hence the ‘breathing room’ that qualified immunity affords. . . Properly and carefully applied, the doctrine protects the reasonable judgments that help sustain our constitutional democracy. Pope’s conduct is an example of the ‘split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’—that those responsible for securing our capitols are regularly called to make. . . Because his ‘actions could reasonably have been thought consistent with’ the First and Fourth Amendments, Sergeant Pope is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hicks v. Ferreyra, 64 F.4th 156, 169-71 (4th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 555 (2024) (“The officers do not dispute that the Fourth Amendment protects individuals from unreasonable seizures of their person. Instead, the officers assert that the prolonged detention during the first stop to bring a supervisor to the scene was justified, and that no precedent placed them on notice that their conduct was unreasonable. The officers also maintain that given the ‘unusual circumstances’ involving an encounter between USPP officers and a Secret Service agent, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that it was unlawful to detain Hicks during the first stop for nearly an hour until a USPP supervisor arrived. With regard to the second stop by Officer Phillips, the officers merely rely on facts rejected by the jury in their answers to the special interrogatories. We disagree with the officers’ arguments. The jury’s findings in the special interrogatories, which the officers do not challenge, make plain the officers’ violation of Hicks’s Fourth Amendment rights. The first stop began when Officer Ferreyra conducted a ‘welfare check’ on the well-being of the driver, Hicks, in a car parked on the side of a highway. Even if we assume that Officer Ferreyra’s observation of the gun on the front passenger seat gave rise to an objectively reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, that justification ceased when Ferreyra confirmed that Hicks, as a Secret Service agent, was authorized to carry a firearm. . . Moreover, as the jury found, the USPP did not have a customary practice that a supervisor come to the scene before an officer could release an individual who had displayed a weapon. Thus, the prolonged first detention of nearly an hour after any justification ceased plainly violated Hicks’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . The jury’s special interrogatory responses likewise demonstrate that Officer Phillips violated Hicks’s Fourth Amendment rights by initiating the second stop. . . The jury found that Officer Phillips knew that Hicks was driving the car before initiating the stop, and rejected Phillips’s only proffered justifications for the stop, namely, that he had ‘observed a motorist driving erratically and talking on his mobile phone.’ Without a lawful basis to initiate the second stop, Officer Phillips violated Hicks’s right to be free from an unjustified detention. . . Because the evidence and jury findings showed that the officers’ conduct during the first and second stops violated Hicks’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful seizures, we turn to consider whether that right was clearly established when the seizures occurred. The inquiry into whether a constitutional right is ‘clearly established’ requires defining the right at issue. . . The Supreme Court has cautioned against defining a right with ‘a high level of generality,’ particularly in the context of a Fourth Amendment claim. . . .The ‘key inquiry’ is not whether a court has ‘considered identical factual circumstances and held that an officer’s conduct violated particular constitutional rights,’ but whether officers within our jurisdiction have been provided fair warning, with sufficient specificity, that their actions would qualify as a deprivation of an individual’s rights. . . With these principles in mind, the question before us is whether it was clearly established in July 2015 that, after a lawfully initiated traffic stop, an officer could continue to detain an individual, and detain that individual a second time, after the officer’s suspicion of a possible crime had been resolved in the detainee’s favor and the officer lacked any new basis to justify the detention. In light of the above-stated precedent establishing the Fourth Amendment violations, we have little trouble concluding that settled law provided fair warning to the officers that their actions would constitute a deprivation of Hicks’s rights during both the first and second stops. And, contrary to the officers’ contention, Hicks’s employment with the Secret Service did not alter this established law or bear in any way on Hicks’s right to be free from an unlawful seizure of his person. Additionally, as found by the jury in answering the special interrogatories, the officers were not following ‘a customary practice’ of the USPP by requesting a supervisor’s presence before releasing Hicks during the first stop. Accordingly, the officers’ emphasis on the ‘unusual circumstance[]’ of the encounter with a Secret Service agent was irrelevant to the ‘obvious clarity’ of the right at issue here. . . Indeed, the officers testified that they had received training and understood that they could not detain an individual without justification in violation of the Fourth Amendment. We therefore affirm the district court’s conclusion that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Bygum for the Estate of Young v. City of Montgomery, No. 21-2130, 2023 WL 2203591 (4th Cir. Feb. 24, 2023) (not reported) (“Here, ‘the question before us ... is whether it was clearly established [by February 11, 2019] that shooting an individual was an unconstitutional use of excessive force,’ . . . when (1) the suspect was 50 feet away from the officer; (2) the suspect was facing the officer; (3) the suspect was stationary, not charging at or running toward the officer; (4) the suspect was not wielding or known to be carrying a weapon; (5) the officer had probable cause to believe the suspect had committed non-violent misdemeanors; (6) the suspect had behaved erratically; (7) the suspect was non-compliant; (8) the suspect was attempting to evade arrest by flight; and (9) no other members of the public were present. As of February 2019, two Fourth Circuit decisions provided ‘fair warning’ that shooting a suspect under these circumstances ‘was unconstitutional.’ . . These cases did not ‘specifically adjudicate’ Young’s right not to be shot under the conditions here and differ factually. But they involve the court finding a suspect’s right to be free from deadly force clearly established when the suspect posed a greater threat to the officer than Young did to Officer King. Thus, Young’s right is ‘manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked’ in the findings of Fourth Amendment violations in these cases.”)

Sharpe v. Winterville Police Department, 59 F.4th 674, 682-85 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Having determined that the official-capacity claim against the Town must survive, we turn to the individual-capacity claim against Officer Helms. . . . The First Amendment right here is a passenger’s alleged right to livestream their own traffic stop. And there is no ‘controlling authority’ in this jurisdiction that establishes Sharpe had this right when his car was pulled over. . . .Nor is there any consensus of persuasive authority to establish this right. . . None of Sharpe’s out-of-jurisdiction case citations address a passenger livestreaming a police officer during their own traffic stop. Instead, they generally are about video recordings, not livestreams. . . And the people doing the recording tend to be bystanders, not the subjects of the stop itself. . . Here, those two distinctions make all the difference. The constitutionality of a speech restriction rests on balancing interests. A different balance is struck when an officer prevents a bystander from recording someone else’s traffic stop than when the officer prevents a passenger from livestreaming their own stop. . . Without a consensus of cases barring the latter, Sharpe cannot show that a reasonable official in Officer Helms’s shoes would understand that his actions violated the First Amendment. . . Qualified immunity protects Officer Helms unless it was clearly established at the time of the traffic stop that forbidding a passenger from livestreaming their own traffic stop violated the First Amendment. Here, no precedent in this Circuit nor consensus of authority from the other Circuits established that Officer Helms’s actions were unconstitutional. The district court was thus correct to dismiss the § 1983 claim against him in his individual capacity. . . . Plaintiffs seeking redress under § 1983 for a violation of their constitutional rights must walk through a narrow gate. The doctrines of qualified immunity and Monell liability for local governments substantially diminish their chances. Both doctrines are controversial. They have been criticized for being atextual, ahistorical, and driven by policy considerations. . . But they are also binding. Here, faithful application of the doctrines leads to divergent results. On the one hand, Sharpe’s official-capacity claim can proceed. He has sufficiently alleged that the Town has a policy barring livestreaming one’s own traffic stop that violates the First Amendment. He must now show this policy exists. And, if it does, the Town will have the chance to prove that it does not violate the First Amendment. On the other hand, although Officer Helms was allegedly acting under the policy that plausibly violates the First Amendment, Sharpe’s claim against him in his personal capacity fails. It was not clearly established that Officer Helms’s actions violated Sharpe’s First Amendment rights and so he is protected by qualified immunity.”) Sharpe v. Winterville Police Department, 59 F.4th 674, 685, 687-88 (4th Cir. 2023) (Niemeyer, J., concurring in the judgment) (“The issue . . . should be restated, I submit, to whether, during a lawful traffic stop, law enforcement officers may lawfully prohibit the person detained from conducting electronic communications with others. This is a nuanced, but meaningful, adjustment to the issue addressed in the majority opinion, which is whether restrictions on electronic communications of persons detained are justified under a traditional, free-standing First Amendment analysis. While the two analyses might, but need not, lead to the same conclusion, I believe that we should apply the reasonableness test of the Fourth Amendment because the restrictions about which the plaintiff complains were imposed as a part of a lawful Fourth Amendment seizure. . . . In this case, Officer Helms and Officer Ellis indeed invoked ‘officer safety’ as the reason why they sought, during the stop, to prohibit Sharpe from livestreaming while the stop was ongoing. Providing further explanation as to why it was reasonable for him to perceive officer safety as being implicated, Officer Helms asserts that livestreaming ‘add[s] additional hazards’ to traffic stops by ‘allow[ing] anyone watching’ — an unknown but potentially large number of people — ‘to know where an officer is and what he or she is doing in real time.’ In this manner, he contends, livestreaming via a platform like Facebook Live by someone inside a stopped vehicle has a unique capacity to ‘turn a routine traffic stop into a crowd-control operation, leaving the officer in an unsafe position.’ But what was not clearly known to Officer Helms was whether his efforts to prohibit livestreaming during a traffic stop for officer safety violated Sharpe’s First Amendment rights. Indeed, no one has cited any case that addresses such conduct — whether in the Fourth Amendment context or, for that matter, in the First Amendment context. In the absence of such law, Officer Helms was entitled to qualified immunity, as the majority opinion holds, albeit following a different analysis. The majority opinion applies a free-standing First Amendment analysis to the communication restriction, focusing on but a component of the seizure without addressing the seizure itself and its implication of the Fourth Amendment. Thus, with its narrower focus, the opinion states that ‘livestreaming a police traffic stop is speech protected by the First Amendment,’ such that the burden shifts to the police officer to show that he had ‘weighty enough interests at stake,’ the prohibition ‘furthers those interests,’ and the prohibition is ‘sufficiently tailored to furthering those interests.’. . That is a traditional, freestanding First Amendment analysis that fails to account for the fact that the communication restriction was but a component of a seizure. If the opinion were to recognize the Fourth Amendment context based on the overall activity involved, it would have articulated a Fourth Amendment analysis that would determine — somewhat different from the narrower First Amendment analysis — whether the restriction on livestreaming was ‘reasonable.’. . And this approach would be the traditional one taken. When, during a lawful seizure, an officer demands identification, or orders a passenger to get out of the vehicle and remain at a distance from the driver, or orders an occupant to hand over a firearm temporarily during the stop — arguably implicating the First and Second Amendments, respectively — courts traditionally conduct a Fourth Amendment analysis to determine whether the restrictions on otherwise protected conduct are reasonable. While the majority opinion’s free-standing First Amendment analysis might, but need not, ultimately lead to the same result, the Fourth Amendment analysis is grounded on a straightforward concept of reasonableness. . . And therefore in this case, the question would ultimately be whether prohibiting livestreaming by persons seized during traffic stops was reasonable, regardless of whether the restriction was imposed by individual officers or by town policy. In any event, Sharpe has not identified any caselaw that clearly establishes that such a communication restriction was unreasonable. Moreover, the question of whether such a restriction was Town of Winterville policy remains an open question. I therefore concur in the judgment.”)

Burns-Fisher v. Romero-Lehrer, 57 F.4th 421, 425-26 (4th Cir. 2023) (“Even if Appellee did sufficiently allege that her constitutional rights were violated, we conclude that reversal is still required because Appellee has not demonstrated that it was clearly established at the time of the incident that she had a constitutional right to be protected from a student who was known to have a violent history. ‘To determine whether a right was clearly established, we typically ask whether, when the defendant violated the right, there existed either controlling authority—such as a published opinion of this Court—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority, that would have given the defendants fair warning that their conduct was wrongful.’. . In Turner v. Thomas, 930 F.3d 640 (4th Cir. 2019) and Callahan v. N.C. Dep’t of Pub. Safety, 18 F.4th 142 (4th Cir. 2021), we emphasized that since Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1174 (4th Cir. 1995), ‘we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim.’ . . . Notably, while we acknowledged in Pinder that ‘[a]t some point on the spectrum between action and inaction, the state’s conduct may implicate it in the harm caused,’ . . . we nevertheless determined that the defendant was entitled to qualified immunity[.] . . . In doing so, we stated that at the time of the incident in question, it was not clearly established that the defendant police officer had an affirmative duty to protect citizens from the actions of a third party. . . . This case fits neatly within our jurisprudence on state-created danger claims. As in Pinder, Turner, and Callahan, the injury here was, at best, indirectly caused by Appellant’s failure to protect Appellee from TB. . . . And as in those cases, we had not made clear at the time of the incident in this case that a defendant’s failure to adequately respond to a potentially dangerous situation gives rise to an actionable constitutional claim under the state-created danger doctrine. Because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that a defendant’s failure to act gives rise to a state-created danger claim, we conclude that Appellant is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Pfaller v. Amonette, 55 F.4th 436, 452-56 (4th Cir. 2022) (“Based on the disputed issues of material fact here, we believe the appropriateness of Dr. Wang’s actions should be resolved by a jury. . . . Having concluded that Plaintiff raises a genuine issue of material fact as to an Eighth Amendment violation, we turn to the other prong of the qualified-immunity analysis—whether Pfaller’s right to treatment was clearly established. Of course, if Dr. Wang’s conduct sufficiently resembles that of the defendants in Thorpe, the analysis of the two prongs collapses into one, and we must find that Pfaller has made a showing sufficient to overcome qualified immunity at this stage. . . . But, while we believe the facts here more closely resemble Thorpe than Taylor, we need not expressly decide whether to collapse our qualified immunity inquiry as to Dr. Wang. That’s because, either way, we reach the same outcome: Dr. Wang was on notice that he was violating Pfaller’s constitutional rights. First, we must define the right. The district court held that the right at issue is ‘Pfaller’s Eighth Amendment right to receive adequate medical care and to be free from officials’ deliberate indifference to his known medical needs.’ . . . This, Dr. Wang argues, is far too general. Instead, he proffers that the proper inquiry is ‘whether it would have been clear to Dr. Wang that he was providing inadequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment by failing to schedule a specific type of follow-up test (fibrosan) for Pfaller until July 2018.’ . . . We disagree with Dr. Wang’s overly narrow articulation. First, his argument is premised almost entirely on direction from the Supreme Court regarding Fourth Amendment claims. But as we recognized in Thorpe, the Supreme Court has not demanded the same level of specificity in Eighth Amendment cases. . . . As Pfaller’s treating physician, Dr. Wang was on notice at all relevant times—late 2015 through 2018—that he could not choose to delay or withhold treatment from Pfaller when he knew it was medically necessary and was, in fact, mandated by the very Guidelines he operated under. . . . None of the above cases, of course, deal with the precise issue of hepatitis C treatment. But requiring such specificity in the case of a treatment provider’s decisions would allow a doctor limitless opportunity to deny medical care unless the precise required treatment for a specific underlying illness had been addressed by our Court. We decline to distort qualified immunity into such an absolute immunity. Likewise, Dr. Wang was on notice that providing some care—even if unreasonable or deficient—does not clear the constitutional bar. . . Thus, he was on notice that failing to adequately respond to Pfaller’s signs of severe liver disease in 2018 could also be constitutionally deficient. The district court was correct to deny qualified immunity to Dr. Wang at this stage. . . . But while the case law establishing that right sufficed to give Dr. Wang fair warning that he could not deny necessary medical treatment to Pfaller as his primary care provider, it was not enough to give Dr. Amonette fair warning that his system-wide treatment Guidelines for a new drug were constitutionally deficient. Those contexts differ. Like the defendants in Taylor, Dr. Amonette never ‘personally interacted with’ Pfaller. . . He only learned of Pfaller’s medical condition shortly before Pfaller’s cancer diagnosis. So Dr. Amonette’s conduct could have violated the Constitution only if the Guidelines themselves were inadequate. . . On this question, we must remember qualified immunity’s purpose: it ‘gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.’ . . And here, there was—and remains—an open question as to what kind of treatment protocol for administering direct-acting antivirals is constitutionally sufficient in a prison system. . . . Under these facts, we decline to hold that Dr. Amonette was clearly on notice that he should have ordered the Department’s primary care providers to prescribe this novel treatment rather than referring patients to specialists for treatment. Meanwhile, various Courts of Appeals opinions have cut different ways regarding whether similar treatment guidelines pass constitutional muster or violate clearly established law. [collecting cases] This varying case law shows the inherent gray area that Dr. Amonette was operating in. And ‘qualified immunity protects public officials from bad guesses in gray areas.’ . . Tasked with designing a treatment regimen for a novel drug, Dr. Amonette wasn’t given notice by our case law that his ultimate choice—a system that prioritized treatment with direct-acting antivirals for the sickest patients while offering monitoring for others—was (as we have assumed) deficient. And the record, as the district court interpreted it, doesn’t sufficiently show that Dr. Amonette knew that the Guidelines, while wanting, violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . That, of course, doesn’t mean that the novelty of a treatment regimen will always immunize an official’s bad guess. There are certainly situations where the risk of medical harm is obvious and a right to a specific treatment was clearly established. . . But we can’t say that’s the case here. A prisoner’s purported right not to be subjected to a treatment regimen that prioritized antiviral treatment to prisoners with the most advanced levels of fibrosis was not clearly established when Dr. Amonette designed the Guidelines in 2015.”) Tarashuk v. Givens, 53 F.4th 154, 163-66 (4th Cir. 2022) (“Here, the district court defined the right at issue as a pretrial detainee’s right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to their serious medical needs. We agree. Indeed, we have repeatedly found that this exact phrasing of the right at issue is sufficiently precise. Our decision in Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219 (4th Cir. 2016), is particularly instructive. In Scinto, prison staff ignored pleas from a diabetic prisoner for insulin despite knowing the inmate’s condition was life-threatening without insulin. . . Prison staff asked this court to ‘define the right at issue’ as whether it was ‘clearly established that a prison medical provider runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment when he does not give one single dose of insulin to a federal inmate, after the inmate becomes angry and hostile ... and the doctor implements a plan to monitor the inmate thereafter.’ . . We rejected this highly detailed framing and instead defined the right in question as ‘the right of prisoners to receive adequate medical care and to be free from officials’ deliberate indifference to their known medical needs.’ . . In reaching this definition, we noted, ‘[a] prisoner’s right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to medical needs has been clearly established by the Supreme Court and this Circuit since at least 1976 and, thus, was clearly established at the time of the events in question.’ . . Appellants argue that we should not adhere to our precedent in Scinto because that decision pre-dates the Supreme Court’s decisions in Kisela v. Hughes. . . and City of Escondido v. Emmons, . . . where the Court ‘admonished courts for continuing “to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.”’ . . But contrary to Appellants’ contention, Kisela and Escondido are not the only decisions in which the Supreme Court has ‘admonished’ lower courts for defining clearly established law too generally, most of which pre-date Scinto. . . Moreover, neither Kisela nor Escondido addresses the precise right at issue here -- a detainee’s right to adequate medical treatment. Rather, Kisela and Escondido were excessive force cases wherein the Court determined that defining the right in question as the ‘right to be free of excessive force’ was too general where the officers’ conduct did not constitute an ‘obvious case’ and the court below failed to sufficiently explain how case law prohibited the conduct in question. . . In contrast, the district court’s definition here has not only been explicitly endorsed by this court, but as we have recognized, this definition ‘accords with Supreme Court jurisprudence, which has long dictated that the Eighth Amendment confers a duty upon prison officials to ensure that prisoners “receive adequate ... medical care.”’ . . Accordingly, despite urging this court to desert its ruling in Scinto, Appellants concede ‘Scinto is good law.’ . . Nonetheless, Appellants challenge the district court’s characterization of the right in question and contend that the right should be defined as the ‘constitutional right to be transported by the Appellants to the hospital’ and the ‘constitutional right for Appellants to intervene and prevent law enforcement from taking custody or control of [Decedent].’ . . However, we have expressly declined to ‘define the rights at issue in accordance with the “very action[s] in question.”’ . . The constitutional right in question here is appropriately defined as a pretrial detainee’s right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. And, here, failing to transport Decedent to a hospital and failing to ensure law enforcement transported Decedent to a hospital or jail constitute the alleged ways in which Appellants violated that right. Therefore, we conclude that the district court properly defined the right at issue. . . . Here, we conclude that a reasonable official in Appellants’ position would have known that their conduct -- failing to properly assess and transport an unresponsive detainee with an altered mental state either to a hospital or to jail where the detainee could obtain adequate medical attention -- could give rise to a Fourteenth Amendment violation. As mentioned above, there are a number of pre-2018 Fourth Circuit opinions that underscore the point that the right at issue was clearly established at the time of Appellants’ interaction with Decedent. . . . While there is no controlling authority dealing with the precise facts at issue here, our Circuit’s case law gave Appellants ‘fair warning’ that disregarding a substantial risk of serious injury to the detainee or knowing of and ignoring a detainee’s serious need for medical care violates the due process clause. . . . Thus, the fact that we have not yet considered a case where EMTs or paramedics engaged in the exact same conduct as Appellants did here does not absolve Appellants of liability. A reasonable EMT or paramedic in Appellants’ position clearly would have known that a government official may be subject to a claim of deliberate indifference for failure to provide adequate medical care to a mentally ill detainee. Likewise, a reasonable EMT or paramedic in Appellants' position would have known that their conduct was not only unlawful but also created a substantial risk of serious harm to both the detainee and those he may have encountered. Therefore, we conclude that at the time of the alleged violation, it was clearly established that a pretrial detainee has a right to be free from deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and failing to ensure the detainee is transported to someplace where he can receive adequate medical care for those needs violates this constitutional right.”)

Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 223-26 (4th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 303 (2022) (“[T]he question is whether it was clearly established in April 2018 that an officer may not use deadly force against a homeowner who possesses a firearm inside his own home while investigating a nocturnal disturbance but does not aim the weapon at the officer or otherwise threaten him with imminent deadly harm. This is so even after the homeowner hears the officer announce himself—but cannot visually verify that to be true—and ignores commands to drop the weapon. We recognize that neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has considered a qualified immunity case with a fact pattern precisely identical to the instant one, but that does not preclude a finding that the right was clearly established. . . As explained below, our case law demonstrates that the contours of Knibbs’ constitutional right were clearly established in April 2018. Cooper and Hensley are clear regarding an individual’s right to arm himself in his own home without fear of being shot by police, so long as he does not threaten the officer with the weapon. . . . Deputy Momphard’s announcement of his presence is not dispositive when considered in the context of all of the Estate’s evidence. While that fact was absent in both Cooper and Hensley, a core principle of our holding in Cooper is present here. . . . Namely, given the lack of lighting on Knibbs’ porch and Deputy Momphard’s failure to activate the blue emergency light equipment on his patrol vehicle, a reasonable officer would not have believed Knibbs unquestionably knew a law enforcement officer was on his porch. . . . Further, if a jury accepts the Estate’s evidence, Knibbs’ decision to rack his shotgun also does not impact the totality of the circumstances. Given Cooper’s holding that a homeowner is entitled to possess a firearm during his investigation of a nocturnal disturbance on his premises, a reasonable officer would have logically inferred that a homeowner is entitled to load his firearm before conducting that investigation for his own protection without fear that an officer will use deadly force against him. . . . Nor are the two commands that Knibbs ignored legally significant at this point under the Estate’s proffered facts. Cooper, Hensley, Slattery, Anderson, Sigman, McLenagan, and Elliott together clearly establish that the failure to obey commands by a person in possession of, or suspected to be in possession of, a weapon only justifies the use of deadly force if that person makes some sort of furtive or other threatening movement with the weapon, thereby signaling to the officer that the suspect intends to use it in a way that imminently threatens the safety of the officer or another person. If a jury finds that Knibbs was not aiming or otherwise directing his gun at Deputy Momphard—the only fact that would have given him probable cause to fear for his life considering the totality of the Estate’s evidence—this case would fall squarely within the contours of those clearly established precedents. . . . Therefore, if a jury accepts the Estate’s version of the events, Deputy Momphard could be found to have violated Knibbs' clearly established Fourth Amendment right to possess a firearm in his own home in a non-threatening manner while investigating a nocturnal disturbance on his premises. Our dissenting colleague asserts that our analysis runs contrary to the Supreme Court's recent summary reversals in City of Tahlequah and Rivas-Villegas. Not so. In those cases, the lower courts relied on precedents that were 'dramatically different,' . . . and 'materially distinguishable' in 'several respects,' . . . to find a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. As the dissent would have it, Deputy Momphard would be held liable for his conduct only if one of our prior cases addressed the same facts presented here. But as noted, even the Supreme Court does not require as much. [citing Hope] In fact, even 'cases involving "fundamentally similar" or 'materially similar' facts are not prerequisites for concluding that a constitutional right is 'clearly established.' . . . As we have explained, assuming that the jury accepts the Estate's evidence, Cooper and Hensley are materially indistinguishable from what happened here. And for the few factual differences that do exist, it would not have taken more than Deputy Momphard 'drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense' from those two cases to realize that his use of deadly force against a homeowner possessing a firearm in a non-threatening manner in his own home while investigating a nocturnal disturbance was unconstitutional. . . . Under these circumstances, the contours of Knibbs' constitutional right were 'beyond debate' in April 2018. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's award of summary judgment to Deputy Momphard on the Estate's § 1983 claim against him in his individual capacity.")

Knibbs v. Momphard, 30 F.4th 200, 233, 236-39 (4th Cir. 2022) (Niemeyer, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 303 (2022) ("This case presents the unfortunately-too-frequent situation in which a law enforcement officer is faced with the risk of serious physical harm and, in face of that risk, makes a split-second decision to shoot the person who created the risk. . . . If that officer reasonably had 'probable cause to believe' that he was confronted with a risk to him of 'serious physical harm,' he cannot be held liable for addressing the risk with deadly force. . . . Based on the undisputed facts in this record, Deputy Momphard undoubtedly had probable cause to believe — as would any reasonable officer — that Knibbs knew that he was facing a law enforcement officer; that Knibbs had just loaded his gun in the presence of the law enforcement officer; that Knibbs had refused to drop his gun in response to the officer's commands; and that Knibbs refused to speak or ask questions to resolve any doubt. Yet, the majority's analysis fails to account for what a reasonable officer would have perceived in light of these undisputed facts about what Deputy Momphard saw and experienced, focusing instead on Knibbs's subjective beliefs. Moreover, to do so, the majority discounts Deputy Momphard's testimony as 'self-serving' and therefore turns to accept the 'Estate's proffered evidence' about what Deputy Momphard saw and experienced, even while recognizing that the Estate's only witness to the events was Knibbs. . . . It then concludes that Knibbs's Estate legitimately showed that '[Knibbs] was shot simply because he stood in his living room holding a shotgun.' . . . The only other fact that the majority identifies as disputed is whether Knibbs was actually pointing the gun at Deputy Momphard at the time Deputy Momphard passed the window and fired his shots. But that fact hardly dispels the risk that Deputy Momphard reasonably perceived, which must be the focus of the inquiry. . . . The issue is not whether Deputy Momphard was actually at risk of harm at that moment, but whether, in the totality of the circumstances, he reasonably believed that he was at risk of serious bodily injury. . . . Thus, whether the gun was actually pointing at Deputy Momphard at that point is irrelevant, because we have ‘consistently held that an officer does not have to wait until a gun is pointed at the officer before the officer is entitled to take action.’. . . [N]either party, nor the majority, has uncovered a case that would inform Deputy Momphard that he should have understood that firing his service pistol in the circumstances of this case violated clearly established law. As the majority recognizes, immunity depends on whether every reasonable officer in Deputy Momphard’s situation would have understood that his conduct was unlawful. . . . And despite that clear principle, the majority can only reason from general principles to argue, as a lawyer would, that Deputy Momphard should have known that he could not shoot, even in circumstances where he reasonably believed that he was subject to imminent serious physical harm. Indeed, the majority acknowledges, ‘We recognize that neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit has considered a qualified immunity case with a fact pattern precisely identical to the instant one.’. . . But it does not even come close to providing cases from which an officer such as Deputy Momphard would conclude that his particular conduct was unlawful. Rather, the majority identifies only two cases, which are clearly distinguishable, Cooper and Hensley, and argues over several pages how a reasonable officer would be able to deduce that he would be violating the law if he did what Deputy Momphard did — this without taking account of the numerous cases pointing the other way. Fundamentally, the majority fails to demonstrate that reasonable officers would know from clearly established law that what Deputy Momphard did was, beyond debate, unlawful in the circumstances. . . . In this case, Deputy Momphard knew that Knibbs was actually armed; that he had announced himself loudly and clearly as an officer; and that Knibbs had refused multiple commands to drop the gun, without providing any explanation or response to the officer. In such circumstances, it would not be clear to any reasonable officer, based on precedents from our court or the Supreme Court, that the use of deadly force was unlawful. Instead of recognizing this, the majority makes the same error as did the lower court in City of Tahlequah, namely ‘contravene[ing]’ settled principles of law and relying on cases that have ‘dramatically different’ facts in order to improperly find the officer is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Our officers in uniform deserve clearer guidance than this before they are held liable, especially when they, in good faith, believe that they are performing their jobs lawfully, albeit in a manner that results in tragic consequences. . . . Over the years, the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished courts of appeals to recognize police officers’ immunity. And only recently, perhaps in some exasperation, it again reminded courts of appeals of this fact. In City of Tahlequah, the Court reiterated that ‘qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law’ and noted that it has ‘repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality. It is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’. . . The Court determined that officers presented with a far less serious risk than was presented here were entitled to qualified immunity when the person they shot looked like he was going to throw a hammer at the officers after the officers told him to drop it. The Court also stated in Rivas-Villegas what is applicable here — that ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . Unfortunately, we continue to violate these repeated admonitions. I would affirm, concluding both that Deputy Momphard did not violate Knibbs’s constitutional rights and that, in any event, no existing precedent clearly placed that conclusion beyond doubt.”)

Sheppard v. Visitors of Virginia State University, 993 F.3d 230, 240 (4th Cir. 2021) (“[W]e conclude the right Sheppard asserts was not clearly established. The Supreme Court and this Court’s assumptions, without express recognition, hardly amount to a clearly established right. Sheppard, in fact, admits as much. . . Further, Sheppard’s additional arguments regarding an implied contract or general property interest in policies and procedures underscore the unestablished nature of any right. We agree with the district court that Debose is entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established right to continued enrollment in higher education, and, having so concluded, we need not evaluate whether or not Sheppard received procedural due process.”)

Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 300-03 & n.4, 305 (4th Cir. 2021) (“[E]ven though Mays’s claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment, we have traditionally looked to Eighth Amendment precedents in considering a Fourteenth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . . Mays now argues that the Supreme Court’s decision in Kingsley. . . altered this deliberate-indifference standard when applied to pretrial detainees. Kingsley, he claims, requires turning the subjective element into a purely objective one. . . We need not resolve this argument as that standard would make no difference here because of qualified immunity. . . . On the night of Mays’s death, it was clearly established that ‘a pretrial detainee ha[d] a right to be free from any form of punishment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.’ . . And that right required ‘that government officials not be deliberately indifferent to any serious medical needs of the detainee.’ . . At that time, our caselaw considered a deliberate-indifference claim to require both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by a prison official of both the ‘serious medical condition and the excessive risk posed by the official’s action or inaction.’ . . In the wake of Kingsley, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits adopted a completely objective standard for pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claims that requires showing that a reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee’s health. [citing cases] The Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits cabined Kingsley to its facts—pretrial-detainee-excessive-force claims—and continue to require subjective knowledge of the condition and risk for pretrial-detainee-deliberate-indifference claims. [citing cases] While we have not directly addressed the import of Kingsley, we did recently state that a pretrial detainee’s claim of inadequate medical care requires proof ‘(1) that the detainee had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the official subjectively knew of the need and disregarded it.’ Doe 4 ex rel. Lopez, 985 F.3d at 340. But there, neither party raised Kingsley and the discussion should not be read to resolve this issue. . . . The clearly established inquiry asks whether ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating’ then-existing law, including any then-existing objective or subjective elements. . . . We had not decided whether Kingsley’s excessive-force-claim rationale extended to deliberate-indifference claims by the time Mays died. And we still have not. Both before and after Mays's death, we said a pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claim required both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed from inaction. . . . So regardless of Kingsley, qualified immunity turns on whether 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating' that objective and subjective standard. . . . Without allegations that plausibly satisfy both the objective and subjective elements, the officers would have a right to dismissal based on qualified immunity. . . . Said another way, if the allegations show that the officers lacked the required subjective knowledge, then the officers would not have violated clearly established law. Only if the allegations plausibly show an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by the officers will Mays's claim clear the qualified-immunity hurdle. And by clearing the qualified-immunity hurdle, Mays would have also plausibly alleged a violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, whatever the standard. The officers' subjective knowledge necessarily establishes any post-Kingsley objective standard (that is, whether every reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee's health. . . . If the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component (and is thus unchanged by Kingsley), then the qualified-immunity finding satisfies the constitutional-violation standard as well. So no matter if the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component, the qualified-immunity determination resolves whether Mays's allegations establish a plausible claim. . . . So this appeal hinges on whether Mays pleaded sufficient facts to show both that he had an objectively serious medical condition and that the officers had subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed by inaction. . . . [W]e conclude that the complaint plausibly alleges that Mays had an objectively serious medical condition requiring medical attention and that the officers subjectively knew of that need and the excessive risk of their inaction. That is enough to overcome qualified immunity and survive a motion to dismiss.")

Halcomb v. Ravenell, 992 F.3d 316, 319-22 (4th Cir. 2021) ("Here, we conclude that even assuming a violation of Appellee's due process rights, Appellant is entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . We agree with the district court that the right is appropriately framed as the right to fair notice of a security detention hearing, rather than a specific right to 48 hours' notice. It is true that the right to fair notice is somewhat general, but it is also true that the right to fair notice is a specific subset within the more general right to due process. . . . Having defined the right at issue as the right to fair notice of a security detention hearing, we turn to the law surrounding Appellee's claimed right to fair notice to determine whether this right was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . We need not decide which merits argument wins the day on this point. Instead, we conclude only that Appellee's right to fair notice of a security detention hearing was not 'clearly established at the time of the alleged violation'; that is, it was not 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that [failing to provide prior notice of a security detention hearing] violates [the right to fair notice].")

Wingate v. Fulford, 987 F.3d 299, 310-12 (4th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 89 (2021) (“Read together, Brown and Hiibel illustrate that a valid investigatory stop, supported by Terry-level suspicion, is a constitutional prerequisite to enforcing stop and identify statutes. . . . Necessarily so. The prevailing seizure jurisprudence flows from the idea that, short of an investigatory stop, a person is ‘free to disregard the police and go about his business.’ . . . To be sure, officers may always request someone’s identification during a voluntary encounter. . . . But they may not compel it by threat of criminal sanction. Allowing a county to criminalize a person’s silence outside the confines of a valid seizure would press our conception of voluntary encounters beyond its logical limits. We therefore decline to do so here. As discussed, Deputy Fulford’s initial stop was not justified at its inception. The Officers do not argue, nor does the record suggest, that they acquired constitutionally adequate suspicion of criminal activity between the deputy’s initial stop and the Officers’ eventual arrest. . . . Accordingly the Officers’ enforced Stafford County’s stop and identify statute outside the context of a valid Terry stop, and arrested Mr. Wingate on that basis. The arrest was therefore unconstitutional. The district court erred in holding otherwise. . . . The question remains whether Deputy Fulford and Lt. Pinzon are entitled to qualified immunity for their violations of Mr. Wingate’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Deputy Fulford is not entitled to qualified immunity for his unconstitutional investigatory stop. As Mr. Wingate argues, the circumstances here are nearly indistinguishable from those in Slocumb, . . . a case where we found officers lacked the requisite suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop. . . . Deputy Fulford’s suspicion of criminal activity in this case is on par with that which we found insufficient in Slocumb, and pales in comparison to that which we found lacking in Massenburg. Because these cases placed Deputy Fulford on notice that suspicion of criminal activity must arise from conduct that is more suggestive of criminal involvement than Mr. Wingate’s was, he is not entitled to qualified immunity for his unlawful investigatory stop. The Officers are, however, entitled to qualified immunity for their unlawful arrest under Stafford County Ordinance § 17–7(c). Until today, no federal court has prescribed the constitutional limits of § 17–7(c)’s application. And although the proper reading of Brown encompasses Stafford County’s ordinance, it was not ‘plainly incompetent’ for the Officers to believe that § 17–7(c) fell outside the decision’s reach. . . . The law at issue in Brown criminalized a person’s refusal to identify himself to an ‘officer who ha[d] lawfully stopped him.’ . . . Because the Texas provision only applied in the context of lawful investigatory stops, the need to comply with Terry’s requirements was evident from the text of the statute. Stafford County’s ordinance, on the other hand, does not predicate enforcement upon the investigation of criminal activity. Rather, it criminalizes a person’s refusal to provide his identity upon an officer’s request ‘if the surrounding circumstances are such as to indicate to a reasonable man that the public safety requires such identification.’ . . . A reasonable officer could infer—albeit incorrectly—that Terry’s requirements did not apply to stop and identify statutes rooted in public safety rather than crime prevention. Deputy Fulford and Lt. Pinzon violated Mr. Wingate’s Fourth Amendment rights by enforcing § 17–7(c) outside the context of a valid Terry stop. But because this right was not clearly established at the time of the arrest, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

Wingate v. Fulford, 987 F.3d 299, 313 (4th Cir. 2021) (Richardson, J., concurring), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 89 (2021) (“I readily concur with the majority’s resolution of this case. But I have one reservation. The majority holds that constitutionally enforcing Stafford County Ordinance § 17-7(c) requires ‘a valid investigatory stop, supported by Terry-level suspicion.’. . . And in the circumstances this case presents, I agree that enforcing the ordinance required Terry-level suspicion. But I would be clear that we address only this case and not the constitutionality of applying an ordinance like this one outside the context of investigatory stops. Consider, for example, an officer requiring a driver’s identification at a constitutionally proper, but suspicionless, sobriety checkpoint. Or an officer at a border crossing or secure facility who asks for identification from someone seeking entry. In those instances (and others), the encounter might constitutionally permit enforcing a law requiring identification. Those circumstances were not addressed in Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 99 S.Ct. 2637, 61 L.Ed.2d 357 (1979) or Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177, 124 S.Ct. 2451, 159 L.Ed.2d 292 (2004). And I would make plain that we are not expanding their guidance here, where we are without briefing on those issues and those circumstances are not before us.”)

Dean v. Jones, 984 F.3d 295, 310-11 (4th Cir. 2021) (“The officers argue that because there is no published circuit precedent finding an Eighth Amendment violation where force is used shortly after an inmate has assaulted an officer, Dean’s right to be free from Officer Hobgood’s use of pepper spray or Sergeant Jones’s blows was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incidents in 2015. . . . For two reasons, we disagree. First, it was clearly established in 2015 – and for many years before that – that inmates have a right to be free from pain inflicted maliciously and in order to cause harm, rather than in a good-faith effort to protect officer safety or prison order. . . . And our case law long has made clear that correctional officers cross this line when they use force to punish an inmate for prior misconduct or intransigence. . . . So assuming – as we do, for purposes of this alternative argument – that the officers here acted with a wrongful and punitive motive, then they violated clearly established Eighth Amendment law. And as we have explained before, that clearly established Eighth Amendment principle was enough by itself to put reasonable officers on ‘fair notice’ that their use of force against Dean – assuming, again, that it was intended to retaliate against Dean for his head-butts and not to protect officer safety – would violate the Constitution. . . . In this ‘unusual’ qualified immunity context, we are ‘dealing with a constitutional violation that has “wrongful intent” as an element.’. . . The case law, in other words, is ‘intent-specific,’. . . which means that liability turns not on the particular factual circumstances under which the officer acted – which may change from case to case as the precedent develops – but on whether the officer acts with a culpable state of mind. And because an officer necessarily will be familiar with his own mental state, he ‘reasonably should know’ that he is violating the law if he acts with a prohibited motive. . . . Second, even if the officers were entitled to some additional notice, we had explained before 2015, ‘at the appropriate level of specificity,’. . . that a correctional officer uses excessive force if he maliciously uses force against an inmate who has been subdued, even if force might have been justified to control the inmate only moments before. . . . It was enough to put officers on clear notice, in 2015, that the use of pepper spray – or kicks and punches, see, e.g., McMillian, 503 U.S. at 4, 112 S.Ct. 995; Thompson, 878 F.3d at 102

(discussing cases) – against Dean after he had been fully subdued and no longer posed a risk to their safety could give rise to an inference of ‘wanton punishment’ in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even if force appropriately might have been used just a few seconds earlier. . . The officers insist that Iko is not sufficiently on point, because in that case, the initial justification for the use of force was the enforcement of prison rules and not, as here, the protection of officer safety after Dean’s two head-butts. But the point is precisely the same – once the justification for the use of force has expired, any additional force may be deemed ‘malicious’ and hence unconstitutional – and it applies with ‘obvious clarity’ whatever the original justification. . . And in any event, the rationale for force in Iko was not as singularly focused on prison discipline as the officers suggest. Instead, the purported need to compel compliance with prison rules was intertwined with concerns for officer safety: Iko’s refusal to obey orders to present his hands for cuffing posed a danger to the officers attempting to carry out a cell extraction. . . In sum, the officers here were on ‘fair notice’ of Dean’s right not to be subjected to force in the form of pepper spray or a beating if that force was deployed to retaliate against Dean after he was subdued, and not to protect officer safety. For that reason, the officers cannot prevail on their alternative argument that they are entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds even if they violated Dean’s Eighth Amendment rights.”)

Barrett v. Pae Gov’t Services, Inc., 975 F.3d 416, 432-33 (4th Cir. 2020) (“Because the undisputed evidence establishes that the Arlington County defendants had probable cause to detain Plaintiff, qualified immunity bars her § 1983 claim under the first prong of the qualified immunity test, and summary judgment was properly awarded. But even if we were to assume that probable cause to detain Plaintiff was lacking, the Arlington County defendants are also entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong because ‘the unlawfulness of their conduct was [not] clearly established at the time’ the decision was made. . . . [W]e reject Plaintiff’s argument that the law at the time of the officials’ conduct ‘was sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful,’ placing the unconstitutionality of the officials’ conduct ‘beyond debate.’. . On the contrary, ‘[r]easonable [officials], relying upon our decision[s] ... would have concluded that involuntarily detaining [Plaintiff] was not only reasonable, but prudent.’”)

Haze v. Harrison, 961 F.3d 654, 661 (4th Cir. 2020) (“Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Haze’s Fourth Amendment claim. Neither we nor the Supreme Court has previously considered the question of whether incarcerated persons have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their legal mail. Nor is there a consensus of persuasive authority on the matter — indeed, neither party identifies a single case, in any Circuit, where interference with an incarcerated person’s legal mail was held to be violative of the Fourth Amendment. Consequently, Defendants have met their burden to show that their actions did not violate clearly established law for purposes of Haze’s Fourth Amendment claim.”)

Livingston v. Kehagias, 803 F. App’x 673, ____ (4th Cir. 2020) (“The ultimate question, as the district court recognized, is whether under the Graham factors and in light of all the circumstances, the officers used proportionate force in what they allege was an effort to arrest Livingston for two misdemeanor offenses committed after they attempted to search his home in the middle of the night and without a warrant. On the record as it comes to us on this interlocutory appeal, the officers were faced with an individual who had committed, at most, minor offenses; did not attempt to attack the officers; was not and did not appear to be armed; and offered no resistance until after he was suddenly brought to the ground, and only passive resistance after that. The force the officers deployed against Livingston included elbowing him in the head, causing it to bleed; kneeling and kicking him; threatening to kill him with a gun to the head; and repeatedly pepper-spraying and using a taser against him. Like the district court, we think the mismatch here between provocation and response is great enough to render the officers' actions 'unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate' in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . We likewise agree with the district court that it would have been 'clear to a reasonable officer,' at the time and under the circumstances, that the non-deadly force used against Livingston was constitutionally excessive. . . As the officers stress and the district court recognized, '[w]hether a right was clearly established must be particularized to the facts of the case and may not be defined at a high level of generality.' . It is not enough, in other words, that it was clearly established in November of 2015 that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the use of excessive force generally; what matters is whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited this use of force under these circumstances. Like the district court, we think it was. Since at least 1994, when we decided Rowland v. Perry, 41 F.3d 167 (4th Cir.), it has been clear that serious physical force – there, a wrestling maneuver that cracked a suspect's knee – is constitutionally excessive when used against an individual suspected, at most, of a minor crime, who is unarmed, and who does not attempt to flee or physically attack the officer – even if the suspect offers passive resistance, struggling with the officer after an initial use of force against the suspect. . . . We relied and elaborated on Rowland in Smith v. Ray, decided in March of 2015, before the incident here. In that case, we held that it was clearly established in 2006 that the constitutional line had been crossed when an officer, confronted with an individual suspected only of a misdemeanor and who passively resisted by refusing to give up her hands, responded by throwing her to the ground, kneeling her, and twisting her arm. . . . We think Rowland and Smith made plain enough, in November of 2015, the excessive nature of the force used here. . . . In arguing that the excessiveness of the non-deadly force they used in an effort to arrest Livingston was not clearly established, the officers point to fine factual distinctions between this case and Rowland and Smith, as well as other cases relied upon by the Estate. But as the district court explained, we 'do not require a case directly on point' where existing authority puts a reasonable officer on notice of the relevant constitutional limits. . . And as we explained in Rowland and Smith, the Graham factors themselves, when they point clearly enough in one direction, can be enough to give an officer 'fair warning,' . . . that his conduct is unconstitutional. . . . [L]ike the district court, we are unpersuaded by the officers' argument that it was not until 2016 that we established in Armstrong that use of a taser against a non-violent resister violates the Fourth Amendment. . . This case involves more than use of a taser, and when we look at the force used as a whole – not element by element or moment by moment, see Rowland, 41 F.3d at 173 (rejecting "segmented view of the sequence of events" and considering the total force used "in full context") – it is clear, and would have been clear to a

Livingston v. Kehagias, 803 F. App’x 673, ____ (4th Cir. 2020) (“The officers appeal only the denial of summary judgment on Cardwell’s unreasonable seizure claim. Here, the officers have raised a legal argument that we may review in this interlocutory posture, contending that on the facts as viewed by the district court, they are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law: Either they did have probable cause to seize Cardwell for a mental health evaluation or, if they did not, then the lack of probable cause was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incident. We agree with the officers on their second point, and hold that they are entitled to summary judgment on their qualified immunity defense because it was not clearly established that they lacked probable cause for a mental health seizure. . . . In order to undertake a mental health seizure, ‘an officer must have probable cause to believe that the individual posed a danger to [him]self or others.’ . . . That much is clear. But what exactly counts as probable cause in this context, we have recognized, is less certain: There is a ‘distinct lack of clarity in the law governing seizures for psychological evaluations, compared with the painstaking definition of probable cause in the criminal arrest context.’ . . . We think this case falls somewhere between Bailey and Cloaninger, the cases most directly on point, so that a reasonable officer would be left without clear guidance as to whether probable cause existed. Some of the indicia on which we relied to find probable cause in Cloaninger are absent here: Cardwell did not refuse to respond to the officers when they arrived, and there was no knowledge of a prior suicide attempt or guns on the premises. But as the officers argue, Bailey, too, is distinguishable: Here, the call that gave rise to a suicide concern came not from a third party but from Cardwell himself, and when the officers arrived, instead of a person calmly eating lunch, they were confronted with an agitated Cardwell pacing his driveway at midnight, venting his frustrations, and throwing a beer can. We need not decide on what side of the probable-cause line this case falls. It is enough to say that it was not clearly established, at the time of the incident, that the officers lacked probable cause for a mental health seizure, and that they therefore are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.”)

Ray v. Roane, 948 F.3d 222, 228-30 (4th Cir. 2020) (“The problem with Roane’s argument, and thus with the district court’s decision adopting it, is that it requires us to ignore certain factual allegations in Ray’s complaint and to draw reasonable inferences against Ray on a motion to dismiss. . . . According to the complaint, Roane stopped backing away from Jax when the dog reached the end of the zip-lead, and then took a step toward the dog before firing his weapon. . . . These factual allegations yield the reasonable inference that Roane observed that the dog could no longer reach him, and, thus, could not have held a reasonable belief that the dog posed an imminent threat. Taking these factual allegations as true and drawing these reasonable inferences in Ray’s favor, Roane’s seizure of Jax was unreasonable because Jax no longer posed any threat to Roane. Tellingly, in reaching the opposite conclusion, the district court relied on cases that were all decided on summary judgment involving one or more dogs that, like here, were barking or advancing toward an officer but, unlike here, were unleashed or unrestrained and posed an immediate danger to the officer. . . . Accordingly, we conclude the district court erred in holding that the complaint failed to allege a violation of Ray's Fourth Amendment rights. We next turn to whether Roane is entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation. . . . The question of whether a right is clearly established is a question of law for the court to decide. . . . The question of whether a reasonable officer would have known that the conduct at issue violated that right, however, cannot be decided prior to trial if disputes of the facts exist. . . . Thus, 'while the purely legal question of whether the constitutional right at issue was clearly established is always capable of decision at the summary judgment stage [or on a motion to dismiss], a genuine question of material fact regarding [w]hether the conduct allegedly violative of the right actually occurred ... must be reserved for trial.' . . . In addition, to determine whether a right was clearly established, we first look to cases from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the state in which the action arose. . . . In the absence of 'directly on-point, binding authority,' courts may also consider whether 'the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority.' . . . The Supreme Court has ruled against defining a right at too high a level of generality and held that doing so fails to provide fair warning to officers that their conduct is unlawful outside an obvious case. . . . On appeal, Ray argues that since at least 2003, we have 'placed Roane on fair notice/warning that [she] had a clearly established right to enjoy her dog Jax, free from Roane using unreasonable deadly force against Jax,' particularly where her dog Jax was secured, controlled, and could no longer reach Roane. According to Ray, Roane's actions—killing a pet while that pet poses no immediate threat of harm to a law enforcement officer—are unreasonable and contravene well-recognized precedents. In response, Roane contends neither our precedents nor the body of case law involving police-dog shooting address the 'particularly unusual circumstances' Roane had faced at Ray's home. According to Roane, there is no authority involving 'a 150-pound dog that had advanced toward [an officer] to within a step, "alarmed" and barking'; a '25-foot zip-lead contraption'; or other relevant facts similar to the ones here. As a result, qualified immunity protects 'mistakes in judgment' and gives officers like Roane 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments.' Moreover, this Court should not engage in 'Monday morning quarterback[ing]' to find an officer, like Roane, 'could have or should have done something different.' We disagree with Roane's contentions with respect to qualified immunity, for the same reasons already set forth in our discussion of whether the complaint states a claim for a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Viewing all facts in the complaint and inferences arising therefrom in Ray's favor, it is clear that Roane shot Jax at a time when he could not have held a reasonable belief that the dog posed a threat to himself or others. Accepting these facts, we hold that a reasonable police officer would have understood that killing Jax under such circumstances would constitute an unreasonable seizure of Ray's property under the Fourth Amendment. We acknowledge that there is no 'directly on-point, binding authority' in this circuit that establishes the principle we adopt today. . . . Until now, we have never had the occasion to hold that it is unreasonable for a police officer to shoot a privately owned animal when it does not pose an immediate threat to the officer or others. Still, even without 'directly on-point, binding authority,' qualified immunity is inappropriate if 'the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority.' . . . This is such a case. . . . Based on this preexisting consensus of persuasive case law, together with the general principles we announced in Altman, we hold that a reasonable officer in Roane's position would have known that his alleged conduct was unlawful at the time of the shooting in this case. . . . Notably, Roane does not contest the legal principle we adopt today, namely, that it is unreasonable for an officer to shoot a privately owned dog when the dog poses no objective threat to the officer or others. Instead, Roane’s arguments exclusively focus on the underlying facts, and ultimately amount to the factual assertion that Roane reasonably perceived Jax as a threat at the time of the shooting. But this is an appeal from a motion to dismiss, which tests the sufficiency of the complaint, not its veracity. For the reasons discussed above, we cannot accept Roane’s version of the facts at this stage of the proceedings, in which we must grant all reasonable inferences in favor of Ray.”)

Calloway v. Lokey, 948 F.3d 194, 202-03 (4th Cir. 2020) (“[W]e now make clear that, as the parties agree, the standard under the Fourth Amendment for conducting a strip search of a prison visitor — an exceedingly personal invasion of privacy — is whether prison officials have a reasonable suspicion, based on particularized and individualized information, that such a search will uncover contraband on the visitor’s person on that occasion. . . . Sgt. Lokey and Unit Manager Brown, who together made the decision that Calloway be strip-searched, did so based on reasonable suspicion. The strip search of Calloway — though embarrassing and perhaps frightening — did not violate her Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Calloway v. Lokey, 948 F.3d 194, 206, 211 n.3 (4th Cir. 2020) (Wynn, J., dissenting) (“Upon viewing the evidence in this case—to determine whether Ms. Calloway’s rights were violated—under the appropriate legal standard, which is in a light most favorable to her, it is evident that a reasonable jury could conclude the intrusive search was not supported by reasonable suspicion based on individualized, particularized facts. With respect for my colleagues in the majority, I must dissent. . . . The majority wisely does not address the qualified immunity analysis beyond concluding the search was supported by reasonable suspicion. As discussed, I disagree with the majority’s conclusion that the information available to the decision-making officers amounted to reasonable suspicion. But even if the majority were to reach qualified immunity, I believe the right of prison visitors to be free from strip searches absent reasonable suspicion was clearly established at the time of this search. In determining ‘whether a right was clearly established, we first look to cases from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the highest court of the state in which the action arose.’ . . . Looking to ‘our sister circuits’ decisions applying the reasonable suspicion standard to searches of prison visitors,’ this Court has previously held ‘prison authorities generally may conduct a visual body cavity search when they possess a reasonable and individualized suspicion that an employee is hiding contraband on his or her person.’ . . . But even if Leverette and Johnson were somehow insufficient to put officials on notice that they may not strip search prison visitors without reasonable suspicion, cases from our sister circuits would surely suffice. ‘In the absence of “directly on-point, binding authority,” courts may also consider whether “the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority.”’ . . . The Second Circuit concluded it was clearly established in March 1989, ‘under the law of the United States Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, and the other circuit courts of appeals,’ that a search of prison visitors without reasonable suspicion

Betton v. Belue, 942 F.3d 184, 190-95 (4th Cir. 2019) (“We first consider whether the facts as alleged show that Officer Belue’s conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Officer Belue contends that his conduct of firing his weapon at Betton did not constitute the use of excessive force. Focusing on ‘the instant’ that he fired his weapon, Officer Belue argues that his use of deadly force was justified because Betton posed a serious threat by drawing his pistol. Officer Belue further submits that based on this threat, it is irrelevant whether Betton knew that the intruders were members of law enforcement. According to Officer Belue, the factual question whether the officers had announced their presence is relevant only to Betton’s separate claim of unlawful entry, which is not at issue in this appeal. We disagree with Officer Belue’s arguments. . . .[W]hile we focus our review of reasonableness on the ‘moment that force is employed,’ Waterman v. Batton, 393 F.3d 471, 477 (4th Cir. 2005), we view the facts and any reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Betton, the non-moving party. . . .Our analysis in Cooper is directly applicable here. Officer Belue shot Betton, who was holding a firearm ‘down,’ without first identifying himself as a member of law enforcement or giving any commands to Betton. We reject Officer Belue’s attempt to distinguish Cooper by arguing his own version of the evidence, namely, that Betton drew his pistol, in a direction ‘coming up’ from his waistband toward the officers. At its core, Officer Belue’s argument collapses because of his failure to accept the facts in the light most favorable to Betton as found by the district court. . . .Like the citizen in Cooper, Betton could not have known that members of law enforcement caused the noise that he heard on his property, because the officers had failed to announce their presence at any time before firing their weapons. And as in Cooper, neither Officer Belue nor the other officers on the scene issued any commands after entering Betton’s residence and observing him holding a gun at his side. If Officer Belue or another officer had identified themselves as members of law enforcement, Officer Belue reasonably may have believed that Betton’s presence while holding a firearm posed a deadly threat to the officers. . . And had Betton disobeyed a command given by the officers, such as to drop his weapon or to ‘come out’ with his hands raised, Officer Belue reasonably may have feared for his safety upon observing Betton holding a gun at his side. . . However, under our precedent, Officer Belue’s failure to employ any of these protective measures rendered his use of force unreasonable. Officer Belue claims, nevertheless, that we are precluded from considering the officers’ failure to identify themselves, because that failure relates to Betton’s distinct unlawful entry claim now pending in the district court. We find no merit in this argument. We are required to consider the relevant circumstances immediately preceding the moment that force was used. . . And, as of that time, the officers had not announced their presence in Betton’s home. Moreover, were we to ignore the officers’ failure to identify themselves or to give any verbal commands, we would be discounting the analysis in Cooper and other prior decisions in which we found such facts critical in determining whether excessive force was used. . . For these reasons, we agree with the district court that a jury reasonably could find that Officer Belue violated Betton’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . Having determined that Officer Belue’s actions in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment as a use of excessive force, we turn to consider the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether Officer Belue's conduct violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. The key inquiry in this regard is not whether one of these courts has considered identical factual circumstances and held that an officer's conduct violated particular constitutional rights. . . Instead, we consider whether officers within our jurisdiction have been provided fair warning, with sufficient specificity, that their actions would constitute a deprivation of an individual's constitutional rights. . . The officer's use of deadly force in Cooper occurred in 2007. Since issuing our decision in Cooper in 2013, the Supreme Court has emphasized that courts are 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' and that 'specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.' . . Defined at the level of specificity required by the Supreme Court, the question before us here is whether it was clearly established in April 2015 that shooting an individual was an unconstitutional use of excessive force after the officer: (1) came onto a suspect's property; (2) forcibly entered the suspect's home while failing to identify himself as a member of law enforcement; (3) observed inside the home an individual holding a firearm at his side; and (4) failed to give any verbal commands to that individual. The answer, as explained in our 2013 decision in Cooper, plainly is yes. As set forth above, the critical circumstances involving the use of deadly force in Cooper are present in the case before us. . . Thus, we conclude that Officer Belue's use of deadly force presents an 'obvious case' exhibiting a violation of a core Fourth Amendment right. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that Officer Belue's conduct of shooting Betton while Betton held a firearm by his side does not qualify as the type of 'bad guesses in gray areas' that qualified immunity is designed to protect. . . Thus, we hold under our established standard of review that Officer Belue's alleged conduct violated Betton's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force, a right that was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred.")

Gilliam v. Sealey, 932 F.3d 216, 235, 237, 241 (4th Cir. 2019) ("There can be no reasonable dispute that it was clearly established in 1983 that an arrest in the absence of probable cause was a violation of an individual's Fourth Amendment rights, and that a coerced confession could not form the basis of probable cause for an arrest. . . Further, existing precedent in 1983 would have made it clear to a reasonable officer that the police conduct at issue here, viewed in the light most favorable to Appellees, was coercive. . . . Therefore, the district court did not err by concluding that Appellees' right not to be arrested without probable cause based on a coerced and fabricated confession was clearly established in 1983, and the district court was correct to deny summary judgment to Appellants on the basis of qualified immunity in light of the numerous material disputes of fact. . . . It was beyond debate at the time of the events in this case that Appellees' constitutional rights not to be imprisoned and convicted based on coerced, falsified, and fabricated evidence or confessions, or to have material exculpatory evidence suppressed, were clearly established.")

Turner v. Thomas, 930 F.3d 640, 644-47 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Before us is Turner's claim that Thomas and Flaherty violated his substantive due process rights by ordering officers at the rally not to intervene in violence among protesters. In general, a defendant's mere failure to act does not give rise to liability for a due process violation. . . Turner seeks to avoid that rule by invoking the state-created danger exception, under which state actors may be liable for failing to protect injured parties from dangers which the state actors either created or enhanced. . . But it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that failing to intervene in violence among the protesters would violate any particular protester’s due process rights. Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity, and we affirm the dismissal of Turner’s complaint. . . . [W]e must determine whether, at the time of the rally, there existed legal authority giving Thomas and Flaherty fair warning that ordering officers not to intervene in violence among protesters would implicate the state-created danger doctrine and amount to a violation of protesters’ due process rights. . . . Following Pinder’s narrow reading of the state-created danger doctrine, we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim. Rather, our precedent on the issue has emphasized the doctrine’s limited reach and the exactingness of the affirmative-conduct standard. . . . Against this background, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that ordering officers not to intervene in private violence between protesters was an affirmative act within the meaning of the state-created danger doctrine. Our precedent sets an exactingly high bar for what constitutes affirmative conduct sufficient to invoke the state-created danger doctrine. Turner has put forth no facts suggesting that a stand-down order crosses the line from inaction to action when the state conduct in Pinder and Doe did not. Acting under Pinder’s teaching that state actors may not be held liable for ‘st[anding] by and d[oin]g nothing when suspicious circumstances dictated a more active role for them,’ Thomas and Flaherty could have reasonably concluded that a stand-down order violated no constitutional right. . . Accordingly, Turner has not alleged a violation of clearly established law, and Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 332-33 (4th Cir. 2019) (“[E]ven if the facts proven during discovery set out a constitutional violation, Lioi and Russell would still have been entitled to qualified immunity because that right was not clearly established. Once again, we note that our consideration of this legal question is governed by the changes in the facts developed during discovery as opposed to those that had been alleged in Robinson’s Complaint. We previously affirmed the denial of qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage because we accepted Robinson’s allegations concerning Lioi’s conduct, including the allegations that Lioi actively interfered with the execution of the warrant by lying about not being able to find it on the evening Williams attempted to self-surrender, feigned the BCPD’s efforts to arrest Williams, and conspired with him to remain free despite multiple opportunities to arrest him. Based on those allegations we concluded that in 2008, a reasonable police officer in Lioi’s position would have known that a law enforcement officer affirmatively acting in a conspiracy with a third party to avoid arrest on assault charges could give rise to a constitutional violation when the third party acts in furtherance of the conspiracy to injure another person.

Robinson, 536 F. App’x at 347.

As already described at length, the evidence does not allow for the conclusion that Lioi or Russell were lying about the warrant being missing or their inability to serve the warrant. Instead, the record shows that—at most—they agreed to allow a cooperating individual that posed no known immediate risk to self-surrender. And it was not clearly established in 2008 that a decision to allow self-surrender rather than aggressively serve a misdemeanor arrest warrant would serve as a basis of liability under the state-created danger doctrine. Indeed, no case then or now could be taken to stand for that proposition. . . . To be sure, DeShaney and other cases have acknowledged the existence of the state-created danger theory of liability to establish a due process violation. But in determining whether a right is clearly established, courts do not look at the right ‘at its most general or abstract level, but at the level of its application to the specific conduct being challenged.’. . . Although there does not need to be a case identical to the facts of a particular case for the right to be clearly established, there must be a reasonable correlation. . . . Put simply, a reasonable officer must have been able to ascertain the ‘apparent’ unlawfulness of his conduct ‘in light of the pre-existing law.’. . . Applying these principles here, while a reasonable officer in 2008 would have notice that the state-created danger theory existed in the abstract, no Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit case law would have described when its requirements had been met in any particular set of circumstances. Instead, officers would have recognized multiple cases setting forth the general framework that, to be held liable under this doctrine, an officer had to engage in conduct that created or increased ‘the dangerous situation that resulted in a victim’s injury’ such that the circumstances were ‘much more akin to an actor . . . directly causing harm to the injured party.’. . . But they would have encountered no cases discussing the state-created danger doctrine in the context of serving an arrest warrant. Nor would they have encountered any cases holding an officer liable under the doctrine for harm that arose from an officer’s decision to allow a party named on an arrest warrant to self-surrender. The absence of case law in this area coupled with the Supreme Court’s statements in Town of Castle Rock regarding police discretion executing a warrant means that Lioi and Russell did not have ‘fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional’ even if we were to conclude that a violation occurred in this case. . . . In sum, as the district court held, ‘[a] reasonable police officer in Lioi and Russell’s position could not have known that the failure to guarantee [Williams’] arrest on a misdemeanor warrant prior to [the date of his wife’s death] would violate [Mrs. Williams’] constitutional rights.’. . . Lioi and Russell are entitled to qualified immunity for this additional reason as well.”)

Graves v. Lioi, 930 F.3d 307, 348-49 (4th Cir. 2019) (Gregory, C.J., dissenting) (“In finding that it was not clearly established in 2008 that an officer’s ‘decision to allow self-surrender rather than aggressively serve a misdemeanor arrest warrant’ would be a constitutional violation, the majority again improperly construes the disputed facts of this case in the light most favorable to the wrong party. . . . As the Supreme Court has emphasized, it is critical that courts evaluating a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage construe disputed facts and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-movant, ‘even when, as here, a court decides only the clearly-established prong of the [qualified immunity] standard.’. . . By defining the right at issue in the way that it does—as nothing more than a right to be free from a police officer’s failure to aggressively serve an arrest warrant and to instead allow the subject of a warrant to self-surrender—the majority accepts Deputy Lioi and Major Russell’s construction of the record evidence, effectively ‘weigh[ing] the evidence and resolv[ing] disputed issues in favor of the moving party.’ . . . This is patently improper. . . . Moreover, the mere lack of binding precedent in 2008 regarding the application of the state-created-danger doctrine in this context is insufficient grounds to conclude that the right at issue was not clearly established. It is settled that an officer can be placed on notice that an action is unconstitutional even when ‘the very action in question’ has not previously been found unlawful. . . . As the majority concedes, the general right to be free from affirmative state conduct that creates or enhances the danger that a person faces at the hands of a private citizen was clearly established at the time of Deputy Lioi and Major Russell’s actions. And while there may have been no binding precedent addressing the specific circumstances of the case at hand, it requires little more than common sense to understand that a police officer could face liability when she acts to assist the subject of an arrest warrant in evading arrest until a date of his own choosing. . . . Such conduct is not the failure to act that DeShaney and Pinder had rejected as a basis for liability. Nor is it a simple exercise of police discretion in executing warrants that the Supreme Court spoke of in Town of Castle Rock. Rather, it is a ‘misuse of state authority,’ which before 2008 had been held to violate the Due Process Clause. . . . In short, this is not a case ‘in which an officer would be required to reason backward from case law “at a high level of generality” to determine whether his conduct violated a constitutional right.’ . . . I would find that Deputy Lioi and Major Russell are not entitled to qualified immunity.”) Billioni v. Bryant, 759 F. App’x 144, 149-51 & n.2 (4th Cir. 2019) (“Sheriff Bryant argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because in October 2013, it was not clearly established that Billioni’s speech was protected by the First Amendment. Specifically, Sheriff Bryant argues that it was not clearly established that Billioni’s interest in speaking on a matter of public concern outweighed any disruption that speech caused to the operation and mission of the YCSO. We hold that the district court applied the incorrect legal standard in determining whether Billioni’s speech was protected by the First Amendment, and remand for the district court to apply the correct legal standard as well as to make any further factual findings that may be warranted under that standard. . . . The district court found that a reasonable juror could conclude that Billioni’s statement to his wife about the surveillance video to be speech on a ‘matter of public concern,’ as it involved allegations of misconduct by public employees possibly causing, or contributing to the death of a man in their custody and control.’ . . . We agree. Billioni told his wife about a video that showed the role that an officer’s use-of-force played in a man’s in-custody death, directly contradicting the YCSO’s official statement on the incident. This speech relates to a ‘matter of political, social, or other concern to the community.’ . . . McVey’s second prong balances the plaintiff’s interest in the speech against the employer’s interest in avoid[ing] disruption of its internal operations.’ . . . The district court found that this prong was met because ‘Sheriff Bryant did not make any showing of disruption within the YCSO due to the statements made by [Billioni] to his wife’ and that ‘any disruption caused by the internal investigation that was conducted by the YCSO’ was ‘clearly outweighed by the public’s interest in the disclosure of misconduct or malfeasance.’ . . . However, in conducting this balancing the district court used the incorrect ‘actual disruption’ standard instead of the ‘reasonable apprehension of disruption’ standard. . . . By looking to whether Sheriff Bryant made a ‘showing of disruption within the YCSO’ instead of whether Sheriff Bryant made a showing that he reasonably apprehended a disruptive effect from Billioni’s speech, the district court committed legal error. Instead of conducting this fact-intensive balancing in the first instance, we remand to the district court to use the correct legal standard to determine whether the evidence permits a conclusion that a reasonable factfinder could find that Sheriff Bryant reasonably apprehended disruption within the YCSO as a result of Billioni telling his wife about the surveillance video that outweighs Billioni's interest in speaking out about the surveillance video. Sheriff Bryant contends that because the district court applied the incorrect legal standard for determining whether Billioni's speech was protected under the First Amendment, we should find that he is entitled to qualified immunity. We decline to do so, as we can only reach Sheriff Bryant's qualified immunity argument after a determination whether Billioni's speech is protected by the First Amendment. . . . Sheriff Bryant also argues that even if Billioni's speech should be accorded First Amendment protection, the district court erred in denying qualified immunity because at the time of Billioni's termination it was not 'clearly established law' that an employer could not terminate an employee for protected speech when that speech was a substantial but not exclusive factor in the termination decision. This argument fails under our precedent. We reiterate that given the procedural posture of this appeal, we must assume for purposes of appeal that Billioni's discussion of the existence and contents of the surveillance video with his wife was a substantial factor in Sheriff Bryant's decision to terminate him. The third prong of the McVey test asks whether the protected speech was a 'substantial factor' in the termination decision, . . . making it clear that the mere existence of a credible lawful motive for an employee's termination does not, on its own, shield the employer from liability. Our recent cases are consistent with this interpretation of McVey. . . Sheriff Bryant urges us to abandon our own precedent and instead follow the Eleventh Circuit in finding that where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes 'show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and preexisting law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Sherrod v. Johnson, 667 F.3d 1359, 1364 (11th Cir. 2012) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). We decline to do so. Such a rule has the practical effect of giving a veneer of legality to those supervisors who give pretextual reasons for termination so long as the record could also support a lawful reason for that termination. And, most saliently, it runs directly contrary to our decisions in Hunter and Durham. Of course, this does not mean that the presence of both lawful and unlawful motivations cannot be dispositive in the context of the second prong of the McVey test. In Cannon, . . . we considered a series of text messages sent between police officers that were alternately a matter of public concern and 'disruptive and insubordinate.' . . We concluded that this combination of messages meant that the officers' interest in First Amendment expression did not outweigh the police department's interest in maintaining order and discipline, such that we reversed the district court's determination that the department was not shielded by qualified immunity from the retaliation claims. . . Finally, Sheriff Bryant contends that to the extent that the Court is inclined to rely on the denial of qualified immunity in Hunter or in Durham, both cases were decided after October 2013 when Billioni was terminated. But what matters is not when the cases were decided, but that the events in both Hunter and Durham occurred before the events in this case. In both Hunter and Durham we held that it was 'clearly established in the law of this Circuit in September 2009 that an employee's speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, is protected.’. . Both cases acknowledge the existence of an already clearly established right.”)

Williamson v. Stirling, 912 F.3d 154, 186-89 (4th Cir. 2018) (“Williamson may be able to prove to a jury that Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll violated his substantive and procedural due process rights. That ruling, however, does not entirely resolve this appeal. Stirling and Carroll are entitled to qualified immunity from the trial itself and from liability on those claims if — as the district court ruled — ‘a reasonable person in [the defendants’] position could have failed to appreciate that his conduct would violate [Williamson’s] rights.’. . . With respect to Williamson’s substantive due process claim, it is clear that Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll are not entitled to qualified immunity. It has been clearly established since at least 1979 that pretrial detainees are not to be punished. . . . If a jury finds that Williamson’s prolonged conditions of solitary confinement constituted punishment within the meaning of Bell, Stirling and Carroll have violated that substantive due process right. The district court will therefore have erred, and qualified immunity was inappropriately awarded on that claim. . . . Turning to Williamson’s procedural due process claim, we must again distinguish between claims arising from disciplinary sanctions and claims arising from administrative restrictions. That distinction also turns on the nature of Williamson’s confinement, that is, the issue of whether his confinement was ‘disciplinary’ or ‘administrative.’ If the law regarding the level of process owed to pretrial detainees was not clearly established as to either situation, Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll would yet be entitled to qualified immunity on Williamson’s procedural due process claim. . . . Accordingly, we must assess whether, at the time of the defendants’ conduct, the law was clearly established on the level of process owed to a pretrial detainee who was subjected to disciplinary restrictions, or, in the alternative, to administrative restrictions. . . . If Williamson’s prolonged conditions of solitary confinement were imposed as a disciplinary measure, it was clearly established that he was entitled to the notice and hearing mandated by the Court’s 1974 decision in Wolff. We explicitly ruled as much two years ago in Dilworth (during Williamson’s solitary confinement). But we need not have spoken to the precise issue presented if the law already provided ‘fair warning’ that the challenged conduct was unconstitutional. . . . With respect to disciplinary restrictions, by November 2013, Williamson’s right to the procedural protections of Wolff was ‘manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principles’ at stake. . . . Specifically, the Wolff level of process owed to prisoners — notice, a hearing, and a written decision — provided a floor for the procedural rights due to Williamson as a pretrial detainee, as specified in the Bell decision. Moreover, every court of appeals to address the question had ruled that pretrial detainees are entitled to the Wolff level of process in connection with disciplinary restrictions. [collecting cases] Those decisions show a clear consensus of persuasive authority applying the rule derived from Wolff and Bell. . . . In short, when Williamson was placed in safekeeper status in 2013, no ‘reasonable official’ could have believed that a pretrial detainee could be disciplined absent the level of due process required by Wolff. . . . If Williamson’s prolonged period of solitary confinement was of an administrative nature, a separate question arises as to whether the level of process to which he was entitled was clearly established during such confinement. The combined force of Bell and Hewitt strongly suggests, however, that pretrial detainees subjected to administrative segregation merited at least the minimal level of process established by Hewitt in 1983. Moreover, in 2005, the Supreme Court ruled in its Wilkinson decision that convicted prisoners possessed a liberty interest in avoiding administrative assignment to a state ‘supermax’ prison, based in part on the extreme isolation imposed on inmates in such a facility, under conditions that resemble Williamson’s experience in several ways. . . . That said, a pretrial detainee’s liberty interest in avoiding administrative segregation — clearly defined today — conceivably remained within the realm of reasonable debate in 2013, given the lack of direct rulings on the issue, the somewhat conditional terms of the Hewitt decision, and the distinct factors at play in the Wilkinson decision. . . . Nevertheless, in our Incumaa decision in July 2015, Judge Thacker carefully explained that convicted prisoners possess a liberty interest in avoiding solitary confinement under conditions similar to those imposed on Williamson, even when those conditions are imposed for security reasons. . . . Like Williamson, Incumaa was confined to his prison cell for nearly every hour of every day and deprived of reading materials and most human contact. . . . The Incumaa record was also fuzzy as to whether the prisoner was accorded an opportunity to secure his release from those conditions (Incumaa had been confined for twenty years, rather than three). . . . Our panel ruled that Incumaa had ‘demonstrated a liberty interest in avoiding solitary confinement in security detention.’ . . . A triable issue was therefore presented as to whether the defendants had provided Incumaa with a sufficient level of process, as the record was ‘bereft of any evidence’ that Incumaa ‘ever received meaningful review,’ which would fall ‘short of satisfying Hewitt.’ . . . Because convicted prisoners such as Incumaa possess those procedural protections, Williamson, as a pretrial detainee, is also entitled to them. . . . Thus, the Incumaa decision gave clear notice to jail officials in 2015 that a long-term detention in solitary confinement — even when imposed for security reasons — justifies some level of procedural protection. Nevertheless, Williamson’s circumstances went unchanged for twenty-two months after the Incumaa decision. The responsible officials — Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll — could not be entitled to qualified immunity on the procedural due process claim during the nearly two-year period in which they ignored that controlling precedent. Accordingly, after the July 2015 Incumaa decision, Stirling and Carroll are not entitled to qualified immunity from trial or liability with respect to any renewals of Williamson’s solitary confinement conditions if they failed to provide him with the level of process that would at least satisfy Hewitt. . . . Because the legal principles controlling the level of process owed to pretrial detainees were — but for a narrow exception — clearly established at the time of the defendants’ relevant conduct, Stirling and Carroll are not presently entitled to qualified immunity on Williamson’s procedural due process claim. By way of further explanation, however, Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll could be entitled to qualified immunity with respect to liability for a procedural due process violation — if Williamson’s confinement was ‘administrative’ in nature — between November 2013 and July 2015. Whether that discrete exception might apply to liability depends on what a jury may find regarding the nature of Williamson’s solitary confinement during that period, that is, whether it was disciplinary or administrative. We therefore leave further analysis of that question for the remand proceedings. . . . We will therefore vacate the awards of qualified immunity made by the district court to Director Stirling and Sheriff Carroll on the procedural due process claim. We leave to the jury and the district court the issue of whether Williamson's solitary confinement was disciplinary or administrative. We also leave for the remand proceedings the determination of whether the level of process accorded to Williamson satisfies the legal requirements applicable to his procedural due process claim.")

Abbott v. Pastides, 900 F.3d 160, 174-75 (4th Cir. 2018) ("For the reasons laid out above, we agree with the district court that the plaintiffs have failed as a matter of law to establish that the University defendants violated their First Amendment rights in connection with the inquiry into the Free Speech Event. . . We note, however, that even if this were not the case, the defendants would be entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. . . [E]ven assuming, arguendo, that it were possible to find that the University's response to student complaints arising out of the Free Speech Event transgressed some First Amendment limit, the plaintiffs are unable to identify any precedent – and we have found none – that would put that result 'beyond debate.' As we and other courts have recognized, First Amendment parameters may be especially difficult to discern in the school context. . . And as we have noted, the plaintiffs' claim for damages relief in connection with a speech event that the University approved and for which they were never sanctioned presents some especially novel questions. At a minimum, the University defendants were not on clear notice that their response to student complaints regarding the Free Speech Event violated the First Amendment, and for that reason alone they are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 499-501 (4th Cir. 2018) ("Acknowledging that the fact-specific nature of the Pickering inquiry often leads courts to conclude that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity from a First Amendment retaliation claim, the district court nonetheless held that this Court's opinions in Cromer and Ridpath clearly established that the balance of interests weighed in the Officers' favor. [Court distinguishes both cases] [N]either Cromer nor Ridpath rendered it 'beyond debate,' . . . that the balance of interests weighs in the Officers' favor here. We therefore reverse the district court's determination that Peck and Mitchell were not shielded by qualified immunity from the Officers' First Amendment retaliation claims.")

Cannon v. Vill. of Bald Head Island, N. Carolina, 891 F.3d 489, 502, 506 (4th Cir. 2018) ("In the context of a claim that a governmental defendant violated a former employee's Fourteenth Amendment rights by publicly disclosing the reasons for the employee's discharge, as here, this Court has held that this opportunity to be heard 'must be granted at a meaningful time.' . . This is because, as we further held, '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not 'meaningful.' . . With this legal framework in mind, we now must determine (1) whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of a protected liberty interest and (2) if so, whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest without due process of law. . . . '[H]arassment,' 'sexual harassment,' and 'detrimental personal conduct' amount to 'significant character defects,' such as 'immorality,' . . . and therefore stigmatize the Officers' reputation in a constitutionally cognizable manner. Additionally, the Officers' evidence shows that after the Department released the relevant documents, each Officer either had difficulty securing a job or accepted a job with less significant responsibilities and lower pay, thereby creating a reasonable inference that the claims in the termination letters did, in fact, place a stigma on the Officers' reputations with prospective employers. . . . This Court decided Sciolino, Ledford, Ridpath, and the other cases cited above years before the Department discharged the Officers and disclosed the grounds for their termination. Accordingly, under our qualified immunity analysis, it was clearly established at the time of the disclosures that the disclosed allegations would place a constitutionally cognizable stigma on the Officers' reputations. . . . In sum, under our qualified immunity analysis, at the time of the disclosures this Court's precedent clearly established that the allegedly stigmatizing statements were made public by Peck. . . . In sum, we conclude that under clearly established precedent, Peck made public false and stigmatizing charges regarding the grounds for the Officers' termination. This satisfies Sciolino's four prongs, thus demonstrating deprivation of the Officers' constitutionally cognizable liberty interests under clearly established law. . . . Having concluded that this Court's decisions clearly established that Peck deprived the Officers of a liberty interest, we now must determine whether, under clearly established law, the Officers were deprived of that interest 'without due process of law.' . . . As explained above, when a governmental employer places an employee's reputation 'at stake' by publicly disclosing defamatory charges, the employee is entitled to a hearing 'to "clear [his] name" against [the] unfounded charges.' . . . Here, the Officers never received a name-clearing hearing. Accordingly, Peck has denied the Officers due process of law. Peck nonetheless asserts that the failure to afford the Officers a name-clearing hearing does not amount to a violation of clearly established law for two reasons: (1) he 'w[as] not required to provide [the Officers] with an adversarial pre-termination hearing,' . . . and (2) '[the Officers] had alternative processes to contest the contents of the termination letter[s][.]'. . . We disagree. . . . In Sciolino, this Court clearly established that '[a]n opportunity to clear your name after it has been ruined by dissemination of false, stigmatizing charges is not "meaningful."'. . . Accordingly, regardless whether the Fourteenth Amendment obliged Defendants to afford the Officers an adversarial, pre-termination name-clearing hearing, Sciolino established that the Fourteenth Amendment required Defendants to afford the Officers a constitutionally adequate name-clearing hearing before publicly disclosing false information regarding the basis for the Officers' termination that, in fact, restricted their ability to obtain new employment.")

Adams v. Ferguson, 884 F.3d 219, 226-30 (4th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court previously required courts to address the first prong before the second. . . In 2009, however, the Court held that judges 'should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . Thus, we now can 'skip ahead to the question whether the law clearly established that the officer's conduct was unlawful in the circumstances of the case.' . . We do so here. . . . Farmer, Iko, and Slakan. . . do not establish that failure to transfer an inmate from a prison to a state mental health facility creates 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,' . . . or, as Adams claims, a 'know[n] ... substantial risk' that an inmate will 'suffer[] serious harm[.]' . . . This is true even with respect to an inmate subject to a Competency Order or equivalent court order directing treatment of the inmate's mental health needs. Adams has not identified any case law that holds that mentally ill prisoners housed in state prisons, including those subject to Competency Orders or the like, must be transferred to state mental health hospitals to escape an excessive risk to their health. Nor have we found any. Virginia law requires prisons to provide mental health services to inmates. . . The Competency Order scheme presumes that inmates with serious mental health conditions are more likely to have their competency restored if they receive treatment at a state mental health hospital. . . But that does not mean that inmates with such conditions who remain in Virginia’s prison system are per se subject to an ‘excessive risk to inmate health or safety.’ . We are not blind to the fact that many prison systems offer inadequate mental health care. But we are unaware of any clearly established law (or indeed, any law at all) holding that prisons are, as a general rule, unfit to house mentally ill inmates. Instead, inmates regularly challenge, and judges regularly address, the provision of prison mental health services on a system-by-system, facility-by-facility, and prisoner-by-prisoner basis. . . Of course, in this case, the complaint alleges that prison officials affirmatively denied Mitchell his constitutional right to personal health and safety. It maintains that prison guards denied Mitchell food, turned off the water to his cell, and allowed him to live in a less-than-human state. Prison medical staff assertedly provided Mitchell little-to-no medication or treatment for severe mental and physical ailments. The complaint further alleges that guards forced Mitchell ‘to the ground, dragged, sprayed with mace, stood upon, punched and kicked’ him, and that after he died, ‘a correctional officer employee ... attempted to clean Mitchell’s cell’ to hide the evidence of this systemic mistreatment. Adams has brought suit against some forty-nine other defendants in an effort to hold them liable for this conduct. But these are not the claims alleged against Ferguson. In assessing whether she is entitled to qualified immunity, we must differentiate the claims made against other defendants from those asserted against her. The Tenth Circuit recently undertook a similar analysis in Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013), which concerned the treatment of a juvenile in a detention facility. The court, in an opinion by then-Judge Gorsuch, denied qualified immunity for defendants who allegedly ‘shackled’ the plaintiff to a restraining chair and allowed ‘a fully grown man ... to sit on the [plaintiff’s] chest’ ‘simply ... to punish him.’ . It also denied qualified immunity for prison officials who ‘were well aware of’ the plaintiff’s ‘grave mental health problems’ but ‘delayed or denied’ the plaintiff’s access to necessary medical care. . . But the Blackmon court rejected the claim that the director of the facility violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights by ‘failing to transfer him to’ a less restrictive facility pending trial. . . The court reasoned that the plaintiff had not shown ‘that his placement in the juvenile detention facility automatically and alone amounted to an “objectively excessive risk” to his health and safety.’ . . Said differently, it was not clear that, absent the use of excessive force or denial of access to medical care, placing the plaintiff in the detention center and denying him a transfer per se violated the Constitution. The court therefore granted the director qualified immunity. . . The same is true here. Adams has alleged conduct by many other defendants that, if true, clearly violates the Constitution. But her claim against Ferguson turns on ‘five words: “waiting lists and empty beds.”’ . . Our qualified immunity analysis must therefore focus on this conduct, and this claim, alone: that—in her own words—it is clearly established that ‘plausible allegations of “waiting lists and empty beds” state claims for relief’ under § 1983. . . We cannot hold that they do. Time and again, the Supreme Court has reiterated that for a right to be clearly established, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . No clearly established law dictates that housing mentally ill inmates in prisons, rather than transferring them to state mental health facilities, ‘automatically and alone amount[s] to an “objectively excessive risk” to [inmate] health and safety.’ . In light of repeated instruction from the Supreme Court, we must conclude that Ferguson is entitled to qualified immunity from suit on Adams’s § 1983 claims.”)

Thompson v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 878 F.3d 89, 101-10 (4th Cir. 2017) (“The excessive force analysis thus focuses on the maliciousness of the force used, not the severity of the injury that results from that force. . . Here, the momentum from the van was sufficient to cause a gash on Mr. Thompson’s forehead, bleeding from his hands and arms and bruising, not to mention significant emotional distress. The force alleged is therefore beyond de minimis for Eighth Amendment purposes. . . .Because Mr. Thompson has alleged facts from which a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Officer Cooper maliciously subjected him to a rough ride, he has sufficiently alleged an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim sufficient to survive summary judgment as to Cooper. . .We further hold that Mr. Thompson’s right was clearly established by April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, prisoners have a right not to be assaulted by their captors. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners have the right to be free from malicious or penologically unjustified infliction of pain and suffering. . . . After examining both controlling and persuasive authority, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that gratuitously giving an inmate a ‘rough ride’ for no reason other than to retaliate against him for filing lawsuits and grievances is unconstitutional. A reasonable officer would have known from Supreme Court precedent that the Eighth Amendment prohibits such malicious acts of violence or intentional endangerment. In McMillian, one of the seminal cases defining the scope of the right not to be subjected to excessive force, the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of an Eighth Amendment claim based on a correctional officer’s gratuitous punch of an inmate during transport. . . In Wilkins, a prison official, angered by the prisoner’s request for a grievance form, slammed the prisoner against the ground and physically beat him in response. . . The Supreme Court reversed the district court’s dismissal of the case for failure to state a claim and held that the prisoner would prevail if he proved that the official had in fact acted maliciously. . . As in Wilkins, if we credit Mr. Thompson’s account, the only reason Cooper used force against him was in retaliation for filing grievances. Accordingly, Wilkins and McMillian are sufficiently similar to Cooper’s alleged conduct that a reasonable officer would have known that a retaliatory “rough ride” is unconstitutional. To be sure, McMillian and Wilkins involved direct punches and kicks, rather than a ‘rough ride,’ but it makes no difference to the constitutional analysis whether Mr. Thompson was slammed against the side of the van by the officer’s hands or by the momentum maliciously created by the officer’s driving. . . The intentionally erratic driving was simply a different means of effectuating the same constitutional violation. To draw a line between these acts would encourage bad actors to invent creative and novel means of using unjustified force on prisoners. Although McMillian and Wilkins did not reach the qualified immunity question, their holdings provide officers with fair notice that malicious, unprovoked, unjustified force inflicted on inmates who are compliant and restrained, and violates the Eighth Amendment. In other words, the Eighth Amendment principle prohibiting such gratuitous violence applies with ‘obvious clarity’ to a malicious ‘rough ride,’ just as it does to a malicious direct blow. . . . Indeed, two Eighth Circuit cases have held that malicious ‘rough rides’ violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . Given the factual parallels, the Eighth Circuit cases are powerful indicators that the officers here had fair notice. . . . As is apparent from the case law of eleven federal courts of appeals, the Eighth Amendment protection against the malicious and sadistic infliction of pain and suffering applies in a diverse range of factual scenarios. That unifying thread provides fair notice to prison officials that they cannot, no matter their creativity, maliciously harm a prisoner on a whim or for reasons unrelated to the government’s interest in maintaining order. That principle applies with particular clarity to cases such as this one, where the victim is restrained, compliant, and incapable of resisting or protecting himself, and otherwise presents no physical threat in any way. The government argues, unpersuasively, that the law is not clearly established because courts have not found a constitutional violation in some failure-to-fasten-seatbelt cases, notwithstanding the Eighth Circuit precedent. However, with one exception, every other seatbelt case cited by the district court and the government involved mere negligence, rather than malice or even recklessness. . . . The government also argues, unpersuasively, that an official’s wrongful intent is never relevant to the qualified immunity analysis, even in the context of an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference or excessive force claim. . . . The government cites Crawford-El v. Britton for the sweeping proposition that, under Harlow v. Fitzgerald . . . ‘[e]vidence concerning the defendant’s subjective intent is simply irrelevant.’ . . . Crawford-El’s holding is much more limited and is not itself a decision on qualified immunity. . . . Read in context, the Court was merely referring to and reiterating Harlow’s holding that ‘ “bare allegations of malice” cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense.’ . . . Crawford-El and Harlow do not forbid us from considering evidence of intent in Mr. Thompson’s excessive force claim. Harlow did not involve an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim or a deliberate indifference claim. . . . As Crawford-El itself recognized, the significance of evidence of intent differs when it ‘is an essential component of the plaintiff’s affirmative case.’ . . . For claims where intent is an element, an official’s state of mind is a reference point by which she can reasonably assess conformity to the law because the case law is intent-specific. Considering evidence of intent in this manner is not foreclosed by Crawford-El, as the Supreme Court itself has applied the clearly established prong in reference to retaliatory intent. See Ortiz v. Jordan, 562 U.S. 180, 189–91, 131 S.Ct. 884, 178 L.Ed.2d 703 (2011) (holding that law was clearly established that prison guard cannot retaliate against inmate by putting her in solitary confinement) (citing Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 592, 118 S.Ct. 1584). Thus, in light of the Supreme Court precedent in McMillian and Wilkins, case law on ‘rough rides’ from our sister circuit, and the overwhelming consensus on the prisoner’s right to be free from assault, i.e., malicious infliction of pain and suffering, we conclude that Officer Cooper had fair warning that his actions were unconstitutional and that Mr. Thompson’s right was therefore clearly established. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s determination that Officer Cooper is entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. . . . Unlike Cooper, who drove the van, Diming did not use unlawful force against Mr. Thompson—rather, he failed to do anything to stop it. Accordingly, the claim against Diming is functionally the same as claims in failure-to-protect or conditions-of-confinement cases, which are evaluated under the deliberate indifference standard. . . .In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Thompson, he has alleged sufficient facts to satisfy both prongs of the deliberate indifference test. He adequately asserts that he was exposed to the substantial risk of harm of being physically tossed about in an erratic vehicle and that Diming was aware of that risk and disregarded it by failing to take any preventative measures. . . .The only remaining question is whether Mr. Thompson’s right to reasonable protection from a known threat was clearly established as of April 8, 2010, the date of the incident. . . .We conclude that Mr. Thompson’s right was clearly established. Odom held that, by June 2000, it was clearly established in the Fourth Circuit that ‘a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate.’ . . . Reasonable officials would understand Odom to mean that inmates have an Eighth Amendment right to be protected from malicious attacks, not just by other inmates, but also from the very officials tasked with ensuring their security. . . . Because controlling authority clearly establishes an inmate’s right to reasonable protection from malicious assault, we look no further and conclude that Mr. Thompson’s right was clearly established in this case. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Officer Diming.”) Humbert v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546, 560-62 (4th Cir. 2017) (“All of [the] facts taken together are not ‘sufficient to warrant a prudent person, or one of reasonable caution, in believing, in the circumstances shown,’ that Humbert engaged in criminal activity. . . . Much like with the corrected warrant application, we simply cannot see how, under the circumstances of this case, the Officers could have reasonably concluded that they had probable cause to arrest Humbert. At most, the circumstances would have given the Officers only reasonable suspicion to investigate Humbert further. We therefore conclude that Humbert’s arrest was not supported by probable cause. Similarly, the legal process instituted against Humbert and his resulting pretrial detention were unsupported by probable cause. The evidence shows that the court commissioner made his probable cause determination by relying on a materially false and misleading warrant application. And during Humbert’s fifteen-month detention, the Officers never obtained any evidence of his criminality before or after his arraignment. To the contrary, the victim continuously informed them that she could not identify Humbert. What is more, the Officers received reports excluding Humbert as a source of the DNA found on the victim and her clothing—the first report on June 2, 2008, and the last report on December 15, 2008. Yet, they did not give the reports to Assistant State’s Attorney Tan until May 11, 2009, despite receiving a memorandum from Tan a year earlier on May 12, 2008, expressly demanding that any and all information received by the BPD in connection with the case be immediately delivered to his office. Drawing all inferences in Humbert’s favor, the Officers failed to promptly give the reports to Tan because the victim only agreed to testify against Humbert based on their assurances that DNA evidence supported Humbert’s guilt. Further, they never notified Tan of the victim’s inability to identify Humbert. It was only after Tan received the reports that he learned from the victim herself that she could not identify Humbert and she refused to testify. Because the Officers withheld such substantial information from Tan, he maintained the criminal proceedings against Humbert without any proper basis. To be sure, once Tan finally possessed this information, he entered a nolle prosequi. Viewing these facts in the light most favorable to Humbert, his criminal proceedings and pretrial detention also violated his Fourth Amendment rights. Put differently, the Officers caused legal process to be instituted and maintained against him without probable cause to believe that he committed a crime. See Manuel v. City of Joliet, —U.S. —, 137 S. Ct. 911, 918 (2017) (holding that pretrial detention resulting from legal process unsupported by probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment). We therefore conclude that the evidence reasonably supports the jury’s verdict in favor of Humbert’s § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. . . . Because we have determined that the Officers lacked probable cause to seize Humbert, we must next examine whether instituting criminal process against him violated a clearly established rule. The Officers argue that a reasonable person in the Officers’ positions would not have known that his or her actions violated a clearly established right. Certainly, the Fourth Amendment right to be seized only on probable cause was clearly established at the time of the events at issue here. . . . The law made clear that arresting and initiating legal process against a person without probable cause amounts to a seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Additionally, it was clearly established ‘that the Constitution did not permit a police officer deliberately, or with reckless disregard for the truth, to make material misrepresentations or omissions to seek a warrant that would otherwise be without probable cause.’. . . The objective standard for qualified immunity accommodates the allegation of falsity or material omissions ‘because a reasonable officer cannot believe a warrant is supported by probable cause if the magistrate is misled by [stated or omitted facts] that the officer knows or should know are false [or would negate probable cause].’”)

Bounds v. Parsons, 700 F. App’x 217, ___ (4th Cir. 2017) (“[I]n 2013, when Bounds was arrested, relevant precedent did not clearly prohibit an officer from using force, including a taser, in order to effectuate an arrest of a suspect who physically resists. It was not until 2016, in Armstrong, that we made clear that a taser ‘may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk,’ and not ‘in the face of stationary and non-violent resistance to being handcuffed.’. . . Nor does Meyers v. Baltimore Cty., Md., 713 F.3d 723 (4th Cir. 2013), decided before Bounds’s arrest, clearly establish any limit on the use of force to restrain a suspect who is resisting: At the time excessive force was applied in Meyers, the suspect ‘was not actively resisting arrest,’ . . . whereas Bounds resisted arrest throughout, starting with his efforts to turn and face Parsons while being handcuffed and continuing through the officers’ multiple efforts to secure Bounds in the police car. . . . At the time of Bounds’s arrest, neither Meyers nor any other precedent would have made clear to ‘every reasonable official,’. . . that they were precluded from using force to effectuate the arrest of a physically resistant and noncompliant suspect. The officers are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 246-48 (4th Cir. 2017) (“Here the complaint presupposes an altogether novel duty: after a magistrate issued the arrest warrants based on probable cause, Rodriguez had the duty to take steps to withdraw the warrants upon learning that the charges were meritless. By no means do we diminish the dreadful ordeal that Rodriguez might have averted by seeking to retract the warrants. But that is a different matter from holding that Rodriguez had an affirmative duty in law to do so. We need not decide whether such a duty exists: the critical point is that the proposed duty was certainly not clearly established. Tellingly, plaintiffs fail to note what exactly the duty was or where in the law the obligation was to be found. They do not sketch out the procedures officer Rodriguez was supposed to follow, identify the point in the criminal process when such steps should have been taken, or explain why it was her responsibility to have the warrants revoked. Moreover, a Virginia police officer does not ‘ha[ve] the authority to unilaterally withdraw or dismiss a lawfully issued arrest warrant.’ . . . Only an attorney for the Commonwealth may move the court for dismissal. . . . And while Rodriguez might have raised the issue with a supervisor or relayed her concerns to a prosecutor, we are unaware of a nebulous duty requiring police officers to follow some undefined procedure whenever they come across further information that casts doubt on an active arrest warrant. After all, ‘in a situation in which a warrant has issued upon probable cause, a police officer is not called upon either to exercise discretion or to weigh the proof.’ Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 112 (1st Cir. 1999); see also id. at 111 (“[I]t is the magistrate and not the policeman who should decide whether probable cause has dissipated to such an extent following arrest that the suspect should be released.”). This is no abstract point. Although plaintiffs assure us that this is an exceptional circumstance where probable cause had completely dissipated, we must be careful not to make bad law out of an ostensibly ‘easy’ case. . . . To say that an affirmative duty attached here fails to emphasize the limits of such an obligation and how it might function in practice. Probable cause is fluid; after an arrest warrant is sworn out there often comes to light additional evidence that may be more or less exculpatory. Sometimes a victim may recant, as Costco did here. Or perhaps a complaining witness offers new or conflicting testimony. In either case, an officer is forced to make a discretionary call about whether the subsequent information undermines a magistrate’s finding of probable cause and, if so, how best to proceed. Given the vagaries of these evidentiary judgments, courts should not lightly enter the business of micromanaging police investigations and impose a categorical duty on officers governing the termination of allegedly stale arrest warrants. Indeed, if every failure of a police officer to act in some unspecified way on the basis of new information gave rise to liability, we would invite a legion of cases urging us to second-guess an officer’s decision about whether to second-guess a magistrate’s finding of probable cause. In any event, to the extent that plaintiffs struggle to define a Fourth Amendment right, they face an even bigger obstacle demonstrating that such a duty was clearly established. Plaintiffs frame the constitutional right at the highest level of generality, asserting that centuries of ‘Anglo-American law’ forbid a state official from ‘knowingly caus[ing] or permit[ting] the arrest of an innocent citizen.’ . . . That is certainly true, as far as it goes. But what plaintiffs fail to do is ‘identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’ White, 137 S. Ct. at 552. The absence of controlling cases suggests that Rodriguez did not have a clearly established affirmative duty to take steps to revoke the arrests warrants. In fact, all the indications from our case law point to the opposite conclusion. . . . We do not require that a prior case be identical to the case at bar to advance a civil suit. . . . But despite their assertions to the contrary, plaintiffs cannot marshal a ‘settled Fourth Amendment principle’ that would have put Rodriguez on notice that she was violating the Constitution. . . . Given the absence of an established duty to act, we award qualified immunity to Rodriguez on the § 1983 claims.”)

Safar v. Tingle, 859 F.3d 241, 252-55 (4th Cir. 2017) (Floyd, J., concurring) (“The seizures that occurred when Plaintiffs Jan Eshow and Fadwa Safar were arrested strike me as manifestly unreasonable. The affiant for their warrants, Officer Rodriguez, was aware that probable cause for their arrests had entirely dissipated. . . Yet, she did nothing to initiate any recall of the arrest warrants or to inform the Commonwealth’s Attorney’s Office that the information on which she relied to obtain the warrants was entirely undermined. I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates that when probable cause for an outstanding arrest warrant wholly disappears and the affiant is aware, the affiant has a duty to take steps to rescind the warrant. My belief that a seizure pursuant to a warrant for which probable cause has entirely dissipated is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment is not novel. Multiple justices of the Supreme Court have recognized this point, albeit in opinions that have no binding force of law, as have several of our sister circuits. . . . The duty I envision would be limited to those extreme cases where probable cause has completely dissipated, a question we ask police officers to evaluate every day in the context of warrantless arrests. . . . Thus, it would not be a departure to require an officer, having sworn under oath to facts in support of a warrant application, to have a responsibility to inform the court when the facts have so drastically changed as to eliminate all probable cause prior to the execution of the warrant the officer sought. . . . Although I believe that the Fourth Amendment mandates such a duty, I recognize that announcing such a duty in this case would stand in tension with our decisions in Taylor v. Waters, 81 F.3d 429 (4th Cir. 1996) and Brooks v. City of Winston-Salem, N.C., 85 F.3d 178 (4th Cir. 1996), as the majority notes. . . . I fear that the holdings in these cases are overbroad, and ultimately stray too far from their facts in appearing to establish a bright line rule that all potential liability for an officer cuts off at the moment of a warrant being issued, absent a materially false statement or material omission in the warrant application. . . . If we adhere to the idea of reasonableness in understanding the Fourth Amendment, as we must, then the holdings of Taylor and Brooks appear to be in tension with that idea. Thus, I write separately to note this problem in the hopes that a future en banc court may have the chance to consider the impact of Taylor and Brooks and considerably narrow the scope of their holdings.”)

Martin v. Duffy, 858 F.3d 239, 251 (4th Cir. 2017) (“In Booker, this Court held that an inmate’s ‘right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment’ at least as far back in time as 2010—the year in which the defendant’s conduct in Booker took place. . . . Because Martin’s First Amendment right to be free from retaliation by prison officials for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, . . . Duffy—whose alleged conduct took place in 2014—is not entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Martin’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Liverman v. City of Petersburg, 844 F.3d 400, 407-12 (4th Cir. 2016) (“The threshold question in this case is whether the Department’s policy regulates officers’ rights to speak on matters of public concern. There can be no doubt that it does: the restraint is a virtual blanket prohibition on all speech critical of the government employer. The explicit terms of the Negative Comments Provision prevent plaintiffs and any other officer from making unfavorable comments on the operations and policies of the Department, arguably the ‘paradigmatic’ matter of public concern. .

. . If the Department wishes to pursue a narrower social media policy, then it can craft a regulation that does not have the chilling effects on speech that the Supreme Court deplored. We cannot, however, allow the current policy to survive as a management and disciplinary mechanism. . . . In light of the First Amendment protection accorded to the officers' posts, we conclude that the discipline they received pursuant to the social networking policy was unconstitutional. . . . Having found that Dixon violated the officers' First Amendment rights, we must consider whether such rights were 'clearly established' at the time of the events at issue. . . . [T]his case does not involve gray areas: the right against such a sweeping prior restraint on speech was clearly established and then some. Indeed, it is axiomatic that the government may not ban speech on the ground that it expresses an objecting viewpoint. . . . Accordingly, there can be no doubt that prohibiting any '[n]egative comments on the internal operations of the Bureau, or specific conduct of supervisors or peers' — even comments of great public concern — violates the First Amendment. . . . Dixon also asserts that the disciplinary actions taken pursuant to the policy were reasonable in light of the vague boundaries distinguishing public and private speech. Given the patent unconstitutionality of the social networking policy, however, efforts to enforce the policy are similarly suspect. After all, the core of the policy was a prohibition on legitimate speech and, as detailed above, we have little difficulty locating the officers' speech within this protected sphere. Plaintiffs raised serious concerns regarding the Department's training programs and the promotion of inexperienced supervisors, both of which are matters of public concern. As this court has held time and again, it was clearly established law that such speech is protected by the First Amendment. . . . We appreciate the need for order and discipline in the ranks. . . . At the same time, we cannot countenance an arm of government with such enormous powers being removed to this extent from public scrutiny. This is not an all- or-nothing matter; there is a balance to be struck. But the Department's social networking policy, and the disciplinary actions taken to enforce it, lean too far to one side. We therefore hold that Chief Dixon is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Jackson v. Holley, 666 F. App'x 242, ____ & n.* (4th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, Jackson alleges only that Holley: (1) sent him one 'sexually explicit and lurid' letter; (2) 'posed up seductively before [Jackson] and whispered sexually explicit words to [him;]' and (3) 'plant[ed] her groin area in [Jackson's] face while [he] was seated for [his] haircut in the barber's chair.' We conclude that the conduct about which Jackson complains does not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . Given the lack of circuit authority regarding whether sexual harassment by prison officials amounts to a constitutional violation, we also find that it was not unreasonable for Holley to have 'failed to appreciate that h[er] conduct would violate [Jackson's] rights.' Meyers v. Baltimore Cnty., 713 F.3d 723, 731 (4th Cir. 2013) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, even if the conduct about which Jackson complains is sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment violation, Holley is entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry.")

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 235-36 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that his constitutional rights were violated when Dr. Phillip denied Plaintiff his prescribed insulin and when Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock failed to aid Plaintiff during a medical emergency. . . Although a jury may ultimately decide that Defendants' version of events is more credible, we are barred from making such a determination when deciding whether to grant summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . To determine whether the right was clearly established, we first must define the right at issue. . . Dr. Phillip maintains that we should frame our analysis of qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's insulin claim as whether it is 'clearly established that a prison medical provider runs afoul of the Eighth Amendment when he does not give one single dose of insulin to a federal inmate, after the inmate becomes angry and hostile ..., and the doctor implements a plan to monitor the inmate thereafter.' . Similarly, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock assert that we should consider their qualified immunity as to Plaintiff's medical emergency claim based on whether a reasonable official would have known it violated a clearly established constitutional right to follow protocol by placing an inmate in administrative detention after he receives an incident report. But '[f]or a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours "must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."' . There is no requirement that the 'very action in question [must have] previously been held unlawful' for a reasonable official to have notice that his conduct violated that right. . . Accordingly, we reject Dr. Phillip's and Administrator McClintock's invitations to define the rights at issue in accordance with the 'very action[s] in question.' . Rather, we define the right in question as the right of prisoners to receive adequate medical care and to be free from officials' deliberate indifference to their known medical needs. This definition is consistent with previous deliberate indifference cases from this Circuit. For example, in Iko v. Shreve--a case in which a prisoner alleged government officials failed to conduct a medical evaluation after pepper-spraying him to compel compliance during a cell removal--this Court defined the right at issue as 'the right to adequate medical care.' . This definition also accords with Supreme Court jurisprudence, which has long dictated that the Eighth Amendment confers a duty upon prison officials to ensure that prisoners 'receive adequate ... medical care.' . A prisoner's right to adequate medical care and freedom from deliberate indifference to medical needs has been clearly established by the Supreme Court and this Circuit since at least 1976 and, thus, was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . Because we conclude that there is sufficient evidence that Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care and freedom from officials' deliberate indifference to his medical needs was violated and that the right was clearly established, Dr. Phillip and Administrator McClintock are not entitled to qualified immunity.") Lane v. Anderson, 660 F. App'x 185, ____ (4th Cir. 2016) ("With respect to the first McVey prong, we cannot agree with Sheriff Anderson that Appellant stated his concerns merely as a self-serving complaint. Rather, Appellant, as a private citizen, spoke on a matter of public concern when he questioned a police shooting, which resulted in a fatality, and the subsequent investigation. When Appellant communicated with the media, he was acting outside the scope of his duties as a deputy sheriff. Although Appellant's 'expressions related to [his] job,' the First Amendment affords him protection when he conveys these views as a private citizen. . . . The content of Appellant's speech here was undeniably a matter of public concern. He questioned a shooting in which a suspect was killed (and Appellant himself injured). He questioned an allegedly botched investigation, which he suspected was cloaked in a police cover-up. And he ultimately questioned whether friendly fire occurred, as opposed to the Suspect having allegedly shot him, which resulted in the Suspect's death. . . . Having concluded that Appellant's speech should be accorded First Amendment protection, we now turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether every reasonable official would have known that terminating Appellant for speaking out would be in violation of his First Amendment rights. . . . Appellees maintain that Maryland state law, specifically the Law Enforcement Officers' Bill of Rights, expressly provides that the law enforcement agency's chief -- here, Sheriff Anderson -- is permitted to punish Appellant for 'divulg[ing] information' that is contrary to the department's policy. . . . If Sheriff Anderson complied with this express statutory right, Appellees' argument goes, 'he had no reason to doubt the constitutionality of the policies.' . . . But, the position urged by Appellees, and adopted by the district court, that the Sheriff was acting within his legal authority because he was acting pursuant to Maryland law, ignores clearly established precedent. . . . Sheriff Anderson's adherence to state law is not helpful here. An independent basis for sanctions does not provide a shield from liability when the speech is constitutionally protected. . . . [W]hen Sheriff Anderson terminated Appellant in 2012, the law was not in any 'gray area[]' . . . Rather, the law was clearly established. After our decisions in Andrew and Durham, no reasonable official could have believed that a law enforcement officer's statements to media outlets regarding misconduct and corruption surrounding a police-involved shooting lacked First Amendment protection. Therefore, we hold that Sheriff Anderson is not entitled to qualified immunity, and Appellant can continue to press the damages claim brought against Sheriff Anderson in his individual capacity."

Brickey v. Hall, 828 F.3d 298, 303-08 (4th Cir. 2016) ("On appeal, Hall does not challenge the district court's holding that Brickey has properly alleged a constitutional violation—the first qualified-immunity prong. Instead, Hall contends that the right Brickey asserts was not clearly established in 2012 when Brickey was terminated. Our review, therefore, is confined to the question of what law was clearly established—we do not reach the merits of Brickey's constitutional claim. . . . Because we hold that the law was not clearly established as to the second question—the balancing of the employee's and employer's interests—Hall is entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, we need not reach the question of whether it was clearly established that Brickey spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern. . . . It was clearly established in 2012 that police officials are entitled to impose more restrictions on speech than other public employers because a police force is ' "paramilitary"—discipline is demanded, and freedom must be correspondingly denied.' . . . Because of this heightened need for discipline, police officials have 'greater latitude ... in dealing with dissension in their ranks.' . . . In sum, the parties have not directed us to any case that would have clearly warned Hall that terminating Brickey for his comments about the D.A.R.E. funds would violate his First Amendment rights. On the contrary, our case law had stressed the broad discretion granted police officials to limit speech when discipline is at stake. As a result, we cannot say that it was beyond debate that Brickey's interests outweighed Hall's. . . . We hold that it was not clearly established on the date of Brickey's termination that his speech interests as a citizen outweighed Hall's interests as an employer. Hall is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lawson v. Union Cty. Clerk of Court, 828 F.3d 239, 250 (4th Cir. 2016) (“In an effort to demonstrate that the law in this area is muddled, Gault cites a 1996 decision in which we held, in an unpublished opinion, that qualified immunity shielded a clerk of court who fired his chief deputy for disloyalty. . . This does not advance Gault’s argument, however, because the fact that the law was unsettled in 1996 tells us nothing about the state of the law nearly sixteen years later. As we have explained, the state of the law in 2012 would have put Gault on notice that political affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for administrative employees. Thus, we conclude that Gault has not established the defense of qualified immunity, and we cannot affirm the district court’s judgment on that basis.”)

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 239 (4th Cir. 2016) (“On the record as we may view it here, we find that the district court correctly concluded that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. It has long been established that jail officials have a duty to protect inmates from a substantial and known risk of harm, including harm inflicted by other prisoners. . . Moreover, by 2011, we had made it clear that ‘a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention.’ . . Here, Cox repeatedly informed the appellants that he was being threatened and robbed and that he feared for his safety, and his concerns were corroborated by other inmates. But the only action the correctional officers took in response to this information — despite the instructions of their sergeant — was to do the one thing Cox specifically warned them would increase the risk to his safety. And when confronted with Cox’s concerns again, Miles just threw up his hands and walked away. Under the law of this Circuit, an objectively reasonable correctional officer — certified or uncertified — would have known that these actions were unreasonable, ran afoul of clearly established law, and violated rights “manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle” articulated in Farmer. . . Accordingly, the correctional officers are not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

King v. Rubenstein, 825 F.3d 206, 222 n.3 (4th Cir. 2016) (“The defendants argued that they are entitled to qualified immunity, as any constitutional violations were not clearly established. The district court did not consider this argument, presumably because it concluded that King failed to allege a violation. As we may affirm a dismissal on any grounds supported by the record, . . . we briefly consider the argument here. Even where a plaintiff suffers a constitutional violation, an officer is only liable if ‘the right was clearly established at the time the violation occurred such that a reasonable person would have known that his conduct was unconstitutional.’ . . We decline to affirm the dismissal on qualified-immunity grounds at this stage: we cannot conclude that a right to be free from an egregiously sexually invasive, unjustified, compelled surgery was not clearly established under the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments.”)

Goines v. Valley Cmty. Servs. Bd., 822 F.3d 159, 170 (4th Cir. 2016) (“Accepting the allegations of the complaint as true, Goines, though having speech and other physical difficulties, exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats to harm himself or others, but instead sought the help of the police to avoid a confrontation and potential fight with a neighbor who had spliced into Goines' cable line. Under these facts, the Officers lacked probable cause for an emergency mental-health detention, and Goines' complaint therefore alleges a constitutional violation. . . And again accepting Goines' allegations as true, the constitutional violation alleged is one for which the Officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he facts as alleged by Goines—the involuntary detention of a man with physical disabilities who exhibited no signs of mental illness and made no threats of harm—are sufficiently beyond the realm of probable cause that no reasonable police officer would find them adequate. . . . Because Goines' complaint plausibly alleges facts that no reasonable officer would have found sufficient to justify an emergency mental-health detention, the complaint states a constitutional violation by the Officers for which they would not be entitled to qualified immunity.”) Yates v. Terry, 817 F.3d 877, 886-88 (4th Cir. 2016) (“Our analysis of the Graham factors when measured against the level of force used by Terry against Yates leads us to conclude that such force was not objectively reasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances in this case. Terry was ordered out of his car and subsequently tased three times over not having his driver's license. We have explained that ‘[d]eploying a taser is a serious use of force,’ that is designed to ‘inflict[] a painful and frightening blow.’ . . For these reasons, it ‘may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk and that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the taser.’ . . As we held in Estate of Armstrong, ‘[t]he subject of a seizure does not create such a risk simply because he is doing something that can be characterized as resistance—even when that resistance includes physically preventing an officer's manipulations of his body.’ . . The objective facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Yates, as we must do at this point in the proceedings, show that he was neither a dangerous felon, a flight risk, nor an immediate threat to Terry or anyone else. Yates has thus established that Terry's use of his taser constituted excessive force in violation of Yates' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Having concluded that Yates' constitutional rights were violated, we must determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time of Terry's conduct. . . . In this case, it was clearly established in 2008 that a police officer was not entitled to use unnecessary, gratuitous, or disproportionate force by repeatedly tasing a nonviolent misdemeanor who presented no threat to the safety of the officer or the public and who was compliant and not actively resisting arrest or fleeing. . . Although our decisions in Meyers, Bailey, and Jones dealt with individuals who were secured when they were subjected to excessive force, our precedent nonetheless provided Terry with fair notice that the force he used against Yates under the facts of this case was unconstitutionally excessive. . . . Even though Yates was not handcuffed, our precedent makes clear that a nonviolent misdemeanor who is compliant, is not actively resisting arrest, and poses no threat to the safety of the officer or others should not be subjected to ‘unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force.’ . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Yates, no reasonable officer would have believed that Terry's use of the taser was justifiable at all and certainly not on three occasions. We reject Terry's argument that the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established because he was faced with a dual-sided threat. Drawing reasonable inferences in Yates' favor, there was no threat to safety, dual-sided or otherwise. Rather, there was a commotion attributable to Terry's excessive and unjustifiable use of force, which unnecessarily escalated tension during what can at best be described as a routine traffic stop. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that based on the totality of the circumstances and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, Terry is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. We therefore affirm the district court's denial of Terry's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Smith v. Murphy, 634 F. App'x 914, 917 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend, the fact that Smith suffered only de minimis injuries absolves them from liability under the clearly established law at the time of the incident. Prior to Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), this court 'consistently held that a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim [under the Eighth Amendment] absent the most extraordinary circumstances, if he had not suffered more than a de minimis injury.' . . . For Fourth Amendment excessive force claims, however, the severity of injury resulting from the force used has always been but one 'consideration in determining whether force was excessive.' . . . The cases cited by Defendants do not suggest otherwise. All but one of the cases involves either prisoners or pretrial detainees, therefore implicating either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Fourth Amendment. And Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 219 n.3 (4th Cir.1999), the free citizen case, does not demonstrate that the de minimis injury rule applies to Fourth Amendment claims; rather, it merely suggests, in passing, that the plaintiff's claim failed because she offered 'minimal evidence' to support it. . . . Finding no support for Defendants' contention that suffering only de minimis injuries bars one from asserting a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, we conclude that the district court appropriately denied Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to this claim.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 399-402 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Nothing before us suggests that Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities,' . . . included calling the Governor's Office for any purpose, much less to express concerns about the Mocksville PD. Nothing suggests that Plaintiffs' request that the Governor's Office look into suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD was 'ordinarily within the scope of [Plaintiffs'] duties.' . . . Indeed, a 'practical' inquiry into Plaintiffs' day-to-day duties, . . . manifestly does not lead to the conclusion that those included reaching out to the Governor's Office about anything at all. Instead, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs illustrates that Plaintiffs acted as private citizens. . . . Defendants counter that Plaintiffs acted pursuant to their official duties because all sworn police officers have a duty to enforce criminal laws, and Plaintiffs, police officers, suspected criminal conduct. While some of the suspected corruption and misconduct at issue here, such as misusing public funds for personal gain, might qualify as criminal, other misconduct, such as racial discrimination within the Mocksville PD, might not. Moreover, and more importantly, a general duty to enforce criminal laws in the community does not morph calling the Governor's Office because the chief of police himself is engaging in misconduct into part of an officer's daily duties. . . . In sum, privately reaching out to the Governor's Office about suspected corruption and misconduct at the Mocksville PD, at the hands of the chief of police, cannot fairly or accurately be portrayed as simply part of Plaintiffs' 'daily professional activities.' . . . In reaching out to the Governor's Office, Plaintiffs were not 'just doing [their] job'. . . Rather, Plaintiffs spoke as citizens, on a matter of undisputedly public concern. . . and no countervailing government interest has even been suggested. Accordingly, the district court rightly rejected Defendants' motion for summary judgment on this basis. . . .With their final argument on appeal, Defendants contend that even if Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights were violated, those rights were not clearly established at the time, i.e., in December 2011. Accordingly, Cook and Bralley argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity protecting them from suit. . . . Andrew and Durham clearly established that, long before the December 2011 speech and retaliation at issue here, 'speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, is protected.' . . . Defendants attempt to make much of the fact that, in both Andrew and Durham, the plaintiffs had reached out to the news media (though in Durham, the plaintiff also reached out to others, including the Governor's Office). That may be. But nothing in this Court's reasoning or broadly-worded holdings in either Andrew or Durham suggests that that fact was somehow dispositive. Nothing in either Andrew or Durham stands for the proposition that only speech to a media organization can qualify for First Amendment protection. And we agree with Justice Stevens that it would be 'perverse to fashion a new rule that provides employees with an incentive to voice their concerns publicly,' . . . which is precisely what we would be doing, were we to adopt Defendants' position that exposing serious government misconduct to the news media is protected, but exposing that same misconduct to the Governor's Office, as in this case, by definition is not. In sum, 'it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit' in December 2011 that speech about 'serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency[] is protected.' . . . The district court therefore did not err in denying qualified immunity to Cook and Bralley on this basis.")

Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N.C., 789 F.3d 389, 403-07 (4th Cir. 2015) (Niemeyer, J., dissenting) ("I would grant qualified immunity to Police Chief Robert Cook and Town Manager Christine Bralley because it was not clearly established at the time that Chief Cook fired the plaintiff-officers that the officers had complained to the North Carolina Governor's Office as citizens, rather than as employees. If the officers had complained as employees, 'the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.' . . . [T]he majority fails to identify any controlling precedent that would have informed Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley that they were acting unlawfully in firing the officers for going over their heads to the Governor's Office to complain about departmental misconduct. The question of whether police officers speak as employees or as citizens when complaining to the Governor's Office about departmental corruption and misconduct was undecided in this circuit—and has remained so before today—and the proper application of relevant principles is murky at best. Therefore, the relevant case law was not clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. In such circumstances, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley are entitled to qualified immunity, which shields government officials from suits for damages when acting in their personal capacity unless (1) they violate a statutory or constitutional right (2) that was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . . I agree with the defendants that, as of December 2011, the law was not clearly established—nor, indeed, has it been at any time before now—that a police officer complaining to the Governor's Office of departmental corruption involving his police chief speaks as a citizen. Given the lack of relevant authority, it was entirely reasonable for Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley to have concluded that the officers were complaining as employees in the course of their official duties when making their complaints. In deciding otherwise, the majority relies on two decisions—Andrew v. Clark, 561 F.3d 261 (4th Cir.2009), and Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291 (4th Cir.2013). But those cases only go so far as to conclude unremarkably that exposing corruption within a police department is a matter of public concern—a proposition with which Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley agree. Neither case addresses the independent inquiry of whether the officers were speaking as citizens when reporting departmental corruption for investigation. . . . Not only did Andrew and Durham not address whether police officers speak as citizens when reporting corruption to a state agency, but the facts of those cases also render them decidedly distinguishable from the case before us. Whereas the terminated officers in those cases had leaked information to members of the media, either exclusively (Andrew) or in tandem with a distribution to a broad spectrum of public officials (Durham), the terminated officers in this case reported the corruption exclusively to a single governmental agency that could have been thought to have supervisory or investigatory responsibility over the Police Chief and the Town Manager. In light of this factual distinction, it can hardly be said that existing precedent ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate[.]’ . . . To the extent that our prior case law suggested that a law-enforcement officer speaks as a citizen when reporting corruption and misconduct to the media for publication, it would not necessarily have been apparent to a reasonable official that such an officer speaks as a citizen when making such a report to a governmental agency for investigation. . . ‘Officials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.’ . . Here, not only was there no authority in this circuit holding that the defendants’ conduct was unlawful, but also there was no precedent regarding when a police officer speaks as a citizen rather than as an employee. Thus, Chief Cook and Town Manager Bralley were left to speculate about and guess whether terminating the employment of Officers Hunter, Donathan, and Medlin would violate their First Amendment rights. Because those public officials are not liable for incorrect guesses, I would grant them qualified immunity and reverse the district court’s ruling denying that immunity.”) Ussery v. Mansfield, 786 F.3d 332, 335-36, 338 (4th Cir. 2015) (“As the parties agree, the law clearly established at the time of the extraction governs the entitlement to qualified immunity here. Further, they agree that Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), provides the legal framework for determination of that question. In Norman, this court held that ‘absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.’ . . The Supreme Court expressly abrogated Norman in Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34, 38–39 (2010). . . . We have subsequently concluded, however, that where the alleged use of force occurred prior to Wilkins, a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity turns on whether that force ‘was objectively reasonable in view of the clearly established law at the time of the alleged event’—i.e., the law as set forth in Norman. See Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 321, 322 (4th Cir.2013). To prevail, then, an inmate like Ussery, seeking relief for excessive force deployed before the issuance of Wilkins in 2010, must establish either that he sustained more than de minimis injuries or that the defendants’ use of force was ‘of a sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind and thus expressly outside the de minimis force exception.’ . . With this standard in mind, we turn to the case at hand. . . . [O]n numerous occasions, applying the Norman standard, we have concluded that injuries comparable to—and arguably less severe than—those USSery maintains he suffered were not de minimis.”)

Smith v. Ray, 781 F.3d 95, 104 (4th Cir. 2015) (“In arguing that the unconstitutionality of his conduct was not clearly established on the day in question, Ray attempts to draw fine distinctions between the facts of the present case and those of Rowland. However, our determination that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity in Rowland was not based on any case that was factually on all fours. Rather, it was based on the simple fact that the officer took a situation where there obviously was no need for the use of any significant force and yet took an unreasonably aggressive tack that quickly escalated it to a violent exchange when the suspect instinctively attempted to defend himself.”)

Covey v. Assessor of Ohio Cnty., 777 F.3d 186, 196 (4th Cir. 2015) (“At this stage, we cannot conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. As to the police officers, the Supreme Court has held that no reasonable officer can ‘claim to be unaware of the basic rule, well established by our cases, that, absent consent or exigency, a warrantless search of the home is presumptively unconstitutional.’ . . As we have recognized for over a decade, ‘the curtilage is entitled to the same level of Fourth Amendment protection extended to the home.’ . . As alleged in the complaint, the officers violated clearly established law by proceeding directly to where they suspected marijuana would be found and without any reason to believe that they would find Mr. Covey there. Thus, they are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. The tax assessor’s claim to qualified immunity is a closer call. On one hand, ‘an official who performs an act clearly established to be beyond the scope of his discretionary authority is not entitled to claim qualified immunity under § 1983,’ and the Supreme Court has ‘made clear that determination of the scope of an official’s authority depends upon an analysis of the statutes or regulations controlling the official’s duties.’ . . . Arguably, by entering into the curtilage and house despite the presence of ‘No Trespassing’ signs and a regulation’s explicit directive to leave, the tax assessor exceeded his discretionary authority and therefore should not be entitled to qualified immunity. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed that we should not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . The parties have failed to offer any caselaw involving facts substantially similar to this case. Thus, it may be unwarranted to deny qualified immunity on the basis that ‘a reasonable [civil servant] would have known’ that merely entering into the curtilage, in contravention to a regulatory directive, violated a clearly established right under the Constitution. . . . As already stated, however, the exact manner in which Crews searched the property is unknown and should be developed through discovery. Therefore, at this stage, Crews is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

M.C. ex rel. Crawford v. Amrhein, 598 F. App’x 143, 147-50 (4th Cir. 2015) (“The ‘salient question’ before us is ‘whether the state of the law in [2006] gave [the defendants] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [M.C.] was unconstitutional.’ . . . Because we find that the alleged rights at issue in this case were not clearly established at the time of M.C.'s 2006 sex assignment surgery, we need not reach the question of whether M.C. alleged sufficient facts to show that the surgery violated his constitutional rights. . . We first consider M.C.'s contention, accepted by the district court, that the defendants had fair warning that the sex assignment surgery violated his constitutional right to reproduction. In support of this proposition, M.C. draws our attention to three cases: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); and Avery v. County of Burke, 660 F.2d 111 (4th Cir.1981). Although we acknowledge the broad statements in these cases about reproductive rights, we cannot say that a reasonable official would understand them as clearly establishing an infant's constitutional right to delay sex assignment surgery. . . .Relying on the principles gleaned from these cases, the district court concluded that the defendants violated M.C.'s clearly established 'right to procreation.' . . We think, however, that this frames the right too broadly for purposes of assessing the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. . . .In our view, the alleged right at issue is that of an infant to delay medically unnecessary sex assignment surgery. By 'medically unnecessary,' we mean that no imminent threat to M.C.'s health or life required state officials to consent to the surgery, or doctors to perform it. Viewed in that light, we do not think that Casey, Skinner, or Avery put reasonable officials on notice that they were violating M.C.'s constitutional rights. As we have repeatedly emphasized, '[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.' . . We hold that the defendants did not transgress such a bright line in this case. . . . Our core inquiry is whether a reasonable official in 2006 would have fair warning from then-existing precedent that performing sex assignment surgery on sixteen-month-old M.C. violated a clearly established constitutional right. In concluding that these officials did not have fair warning, we do not mean to diminish the severe harm that M.C. claims to have suffered. While M.C. may well have a remedy under state law, . . . we hold that qualified immunity bars his federal constitutional claims because the defendants did not violate M.C.'s clearly established rights.")

Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 396-401(4th Cir. 2014) ("A qualified immunity defense can be presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, but, as the Second Circuit has noted, when asserted at this early stage in the proceedings, 'the defense faces a formidable hurdle' and 'is usually not successful.' . . This is so because dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate only if a plaintiff fails to state a claim that is plausible on its face. . . A claim has 'facial plausibility when the pleaded factual content allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.' . . To satisfy the standard, a plaintiff must do more than allege facts that show the 'sheer possibility' of wrongdoing. . . The plaintiff's complaint will not be dismissed as long as he provides sufficient detail about his claim to show that he has a more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits. . . . We have little difficulty concluding that Owens's allegations state a plausible § 1983 claim. First, the information Officers Pelligrini, Dunnigan, and Landsman assertedly withheld from ASA Brave was favorable to Owens. Had the Officers properly disclosed Thompson's statements, his inconsistencies would have lent support to the contention advanced by Owens's defense that Thompson, not Owens, had raped and murdered Ms. Williar. At a minimum, the inconsistencies would have aided Owens in his attempt to discredit Thompson's testimony and sow reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors. . . . Second, Owens has offered specific allegations as to the Officers' bad faith. He asserts that these experienced police officers willfully, consciously, and in bad faith 'chose not to disclose' the multiple revisions to Thompson's statement that they elicited from him during their hours-long interrogation. Further, he alleges that the Officers told ASA Brave about the final version of the story almost as soon as the witness had said it. The temporal proximity between Thompson's succession of narratives and the Officers' report to the prosecutor lends support to the contention that Thompson's inconsistent narratives were fresh in the Officers' minds, and thus, the Officers' omissions were not accidental, but intentional and malicious. Finally, Owens's allegations satisfy Brady's materiality requirement. Owens asserts that Thompson was the State's 'star witness,' and that in post-trial proceedings, ASA Brave admitted that without Thompson, 'the case could not have gone forward.' Certainly, it is plausible that impeachment of such a key witness could have altered the outcome at trial. We emphasize that Brady does not require that disclosure probably would have modified a trial's result. . . . On the contrary, it is enough that the suppression of evidence cast serious doubt on the proceedings' integrity. . . . If Owens can prove his allegations, they would certainly satisfy this requirement. . . . [T]o be clearly established, a right need not be one with respect to which all judges on all courts agree. Rather, '[i]f the unlawfulness is apparent, the fact that some court may have reached an incorrect result will not shield a defendant's violation of a clearly established right.' . . . Thus, although judicial disagreement about the existence of a right is certainly a factor we consider in determining whether a right has been clearly established, . . . disagreement alone does not defeat a plaintiff's claim in every instance. The Supreme Court has never sanctioned such a rule, see, e.g., Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46 (holding a right was clearly established and rejecting a qualified-immunity defense notwithstanding the contrary views of three dissenting justices and the court of appeals), and neither have we, see, e.g., Henry v. Purnell, 652 F.3d 524, 536–37 (4th Cir.2011) (en banc) (rejecting a qualified-immunity defense over a three-judge dissent). With these principles in mind, we consider whether the constitutional rights Owens asserts were clearly established as of February and March 1988, the time of the alleged violations. . . . The partial dissent offers a different view. It maintains that the law was not clearly established in 1988 because the cases decided before that date—Barbee, Sutton, and Boone—imposed no independent obligation on police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. The dissent insists that Barbee, Sutton, and Boone stand only for the proposition that 'a police officer's knowledge of exculpatory evidence will be imputed to the prosecutor for Brady purposes.' This holding, the dissent contends, fails to notify police officers of their susceptibility to suit, and thus, the Officers in the case at hand enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot agree. Qualified immunity exists to ensure that 'public officials performing discretionary functions [are] free to act without fear of retributive suits ... except when they should have understood that particular conduct was unlawful.' Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44 (1st Cir.2004). Ever since it first articulated the contours of modern qualified-immunity doctrine, the Supreme Court has emphasized that qualified immunity assesses the apparent unlawfulness of conduct. . . . Barbee, Sutton, and Boone each held that certain conduct by police officers—the suppression of material exculpatory evidence—results in the violation of criminal defendants' rights. Whether or not an officer's knowledge is "imputed" to the prosecutor does not affect the lawfulness of the officer's own conduct. See Limone, 372 F.3d at 47 (rejecting police officers' argument that law was not clearly established because cases announcing plaintiff's constitutional right referenced "the State's" obligations, not those of police officers). Barbee, Sutton, and Boone taught police officers how to conform their conduct to the law. These cases each held that if a police officer suppresses material exculpatory evidence, courts will invalidate a defendant's criminal sentence as unconstitutional. A police officer acting after the issuance of these decisions, like each of the Officers here, could not have thought that the suppression of material exculpatory evidence would pass constitutional muster. . . . Goodwin recognized this reality, and held in light of Barbee, Sutton, and Boone that a police officer's obligation to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established by 1983, five years prior to the Brady violations alleged in this case. Yet the dissent suggests that our reliance on Goodwin retroactively subjects the Officers to liability. Not so. For although Goodwin issued after the Officers in this case acted, Goodwin announced no new rule of constitutional law. Rather, it merely held, in light of the constitutional rule already established by Barbee, Sutton, and Boone, that a police officer's duty to disclose material exculpatory evidence was clearly established in 1983. If a right was clearly established in 1983 (as Goodwin held), it must have been clearly established in 1988 (when the Officers acted). To hold to the contrary would directly conflict with Goodwin. . . . Indeed, if the dissent is correct and Barbee, Sutton, and Boone announced no rule of constitutional law applicable to police officers, then Goodwin was wrongly decided. For according to the dissent's view, Goodwin acted in the absence of any prior circuit precedent to hold that a constitutional right was clearly established and so a police officer did not enjoy qualified immunity. We cannot endorse such an extraordinary view of our precedent. In sum, our precedent unmistakably provides that, by 1988, a police officer violates clearly established constitutional law when he suppresses material exculpatory evidence in bad faith. Accordingly, we hold that the Officers were clearly on notice of the impermissibility of their conduct in 1988, the time of the alleged violations.")

Smith v. Gilchrist, 749 F.3d 302, 312, 313 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Gilchrist argues to us. . . as he did to the district court, that even assuming that Smith's interests actually (and completely) outweighed the government's, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in Gilchrist's position that Smith's interests outweighed the government's. . . . In this regard, Gilchrist emphasizes that balancing the government's interests against the employee's is a subtle process. He also maintains that because of the significant role that the defensive-driving course played in reducing the DA's office caseload and freeing resources for other matters, a reasonable DA in his position could have believed that any public criticism of that course undermined the operation and mission of the DA's office. Gilchrist contends that, under this theory, a reasonable DA might have believed he was justified in firing Smith for publicly making the statements in question. This argument need not detain us long. For purposes of determining whether Smith's right to speak without recrimination was clearly established, we conclude that the right at issue, described at the appropriate level of specificity, is as follows: it is the right of an ADA running for public office not to be fired for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. Any reasonable official in Gilchrist's position would have been aware of that right on the day of Smith's termination. . . The notion that programs that reduce a government agency's workload are somehow off limits from criticism by government employees even when there is no reason to expect that the criticism will actually hamper the government office's efficiency finds no basis whatsoever in the law. At the time of Smith's firing, it was well established that a government employee's speech made as a private citizen on a matter of public concern is balanced against the adverse effect that the government reasonably anticipates the speech will have on its ability to operate efficiently. See Maciariello, 973 F.2d at 300. In this case, there was no evidence forecasted in the summary judgment record that Smith's speech was expected to have any particular effect, as Gilchrist's concession in the district court reflected. Thus, although Gilchrist is certainly correct that the process of balancing the employer's interests against the employee's is a subtle one, the general complexity of the balancing test is of no consequence in this case since there is nothing on the employer's side of the ledger to weigh. . . . In sum, a reasonable DA in Gilchrist's position would have known that he could not fire an ADA running for public office for speaking publicly in his capacity as a candidate on matters of public concern when the speech is critical of a program that substantially reduces the DA's office's caseload but there is no reason to believe the speech will negatively impact the DA's office's efficiency. We therefore hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Gilchrist on the First Amendment claim on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Wall v. Wade, 741 F.3d 492, 502, 503 (4th Cir. 2014) ("As noted, we have previously held that under 'the Free Exercise Clause ... a prisoner has a clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples, including proper food during Ramadan.' . . Further, '[a] prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet.' . . We take these statements to mean quite exactly what they say: that Wall's right to participate in Ramadan was clearly established, and when the defendants abridged this right without first satisfying Turner's reasonableness test, they subjected themselves to the potential for liability. As expressed above, the defendants' application of their policy to Wall was unnecessarily strict. They overlooked (at best) significant evidence that Wall was, in fact, a practicing Muslim who was entitled to participate in Ramadan. We cannot conclude that a reasonable official in the defendants' position, giving proper consideration to our statement in Lovelace that the right is clearly established, and to Turner's objective reasonableness test, would have felt it permissible to apply the policy in so strict a fashion. The defendants attempt to avoid this rather straightforward result by arguing that there is a lack of case law elucidating exactly how prisons may utilize sincerity tests in determining eligibility for religious accommodations. While it may be true that we have never specifically evaluated a sincerity test, . . . this argument overlooks the broader right at issue: that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations absent a legitimate reason to the contrary. As we have previously stated, clearly established 'includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.' . . In light of our unequivocal statement in Lovelace that inmates are entitled to religious dietary accommodations, we need not to have previously passed judgment on the appropriateness of particular sincerity tests in order to demand that prison officials act reasonably in administering that right. An expectation of reasonableness in this context is not a high bar, and does not punish officials for ‘bad guesses in gray areas.’ . . . To the contrary, it offers only a minimal level of protection to inmates seeking to exercise their constitutionally protected rights.”)

Williams v. Calton, 551 F. App’x 50, 51 (4th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) (“Viewed in the evidence most favorable to Williams, the evidence showed that when Williams, who was being escorted in restraints, resisted entering a cell, Calton slammed his head into the cell door and then shoved him to the floor. Williams sustained a “minor” and “superficial” 1.5 inch scalp laceration requiring six staples. . . . In Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994) (en banc), this court held that, ‘absent the most extraordinary circumstances, a plaintiff cannot prevail on an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim if his injury is de minimis.’ . . . Three days after Williams filed his initial complaint, however, the Supreme Court handed down Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010), abrogating Norman and stating that there was no injury threshold for excessive force claims. However, because ‘Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit’ when the incident in this case occurred, Williams’ excessive force claim and Calton’s qualified immunity defense must be analyzed under the standards established by those cases. Hill, 727 F.3d at 322. We conclude that, under the legal standards in place when the incident occurred, a reasonable officer in Calton’s position would not have understood his actions to have violated Williams’ constitutional rights. . . . Consequently, Calton is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Occupy Columbia v. Haley, 738 F.3d 107, 121, 122, 124, 125 (4th Cir. 2013) (“Stated at the appropriate level of particularity, the right allegedly violated by Appellants is the right to be present and protest on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. Therefore, the qualified immunity analysis must begin with this alleged constitutional violation in mind, and we must simply determine ‘whether [Occupy Columbia’s] allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation.’ . . . Occupy Columbia’s Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that its members were engaged in protected speech at the time they were arrested. Specifically, the complaint alleges Occupy Columbia’s members were assembled on State House grounds (a public forum) and were ‘protesting and petitioning our government.’ . . . Occupy Columbia’s allegations thus satisfy the standards to qualify as protected speech. . . . Therefore, in the absence of a valid time, place, and manner restriction, Occupy Columbia had a First Amendment right to assemble on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m., and its Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges that this right was violated. . . . Having concluded that Occupy Columbia’s complaint sufficiently alleges that arresting its members for their presence and protests on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. constituted a violation of their First Amendment rights, we must turn to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . At this stage, we must assess whether the First Amendment right allegedly violated by Appellants was a ‘clearly established’ right ‘of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . It is not disputed that South Carolina and its state officials could have restricted the time when the State House grounds are open to the public with a valid time, place, and manner restriction. However, as explained above, at the time of Occupy Columbia’s arrest, no such restrictions existed. In light of the case law from this circuit and from the Supreme Court, it was clearly established on November 16, 2011, that arresting Occupy Columbia for protesting on State House grounds after 6:00 p.m. was a First Amendment violation. Accordingly, at this stage, Appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity for damages arising out of Occupy Columbia's arrest on November 16, 2011. . . .In sum, we hold that the Occupy Columbia protesters have stated a viable claim that Appellants violated their First Amendment rights to assemble and protest peacefully on the grounds of the South Carolina State House in the absence of a valid time, place, or manner regulation. Condition 8 did not constitute a valid regulation because on its face it imposed no limit on when the State House grounds were open to the public and, even if it had restricted the time during which protesters could assemble, it did not contain any standards to guide the official's decision regarding when to grant special permission to continue such activities beyond closing time. Furthermore, at this point in the proceedings, we cannot say as a matter of law that the state statutes upon which Appellants rely are valid applicable time, place, and manner restrictions. For purposes of this motion, we must accept as true Occupy Columbia's assertion that its members gathered in a peaceful and lawful manner and conclude that the protesters were not violating any law. Based on the complaint, there were no existing time, place, and manner restrictions on the protesters' First Amendment activities on the State House grounds. Therefore, Appellants violated these rights by removing the protesters from the grounds. We also hold that the right of the protesters to assemble and speak out against the government on the State House grounds in the absence of valid time, place, and manner restrictions has been clearly established since Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 235 (1963).")

Durham v. Jones, 737 F.3d 291, 303, 304 (4th Cir. 2013) ("We have been clear that where public employees are speaking out on government misconduct, their speech warrants protection. . . .The incidents at issue here rise far above an ordinary workplace dispute. Durham accused several high-ranking law enforcement officials, in positions of authority within the SCSO, of falsifying law enforcement reports and with authorizing aggressive threats against a member of their own agency if he persisted in his opposition to such a practice. As we have indicated above, Durham's honest belief, even if it was a mistaken belief, that his use of force was both justified to assist in the apprehension of the suspect, but (at the same time) did not arise out of any contemporaneous criminal act by the suspect, might call for retraining or some other response from his supervisors. That is their call. But the use of coercion and threats against him as shown in this record and accepted as accurate by the jury goes far beyond such permissible bounds. Durham was being coerced to lie under oath insofar as they demanded that he revise his reports in a way contrary to his honestly-held beliefs; he testified that, as when any law enforcement officer signs a police report, 'you're swearing under oath and swearing to God that that's the truth, that's the facts of the case.' . . . This is especially important to the function of law enforcement, as such reports 'become a piece of evidence that could later on be used in court to prosecute somebody, to possible even send them to jail, so it has to be truthful and accurate of the facts.' . In short, it was clearly established in the law of this Circuit in September 2009 that an employee's speech about serious governmental misconduct, and certainly not least of all serious misconduct in a law enforcement agency, . . . is protected. The mere fact that Jones may have had an independent basis to impose some lesser disciplinary sanction on Durham short of outright termination, such as a short suspension from duty, does not muddle the clarity of that legal principle.")

Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 391-94 (4th Cir. 2013) (“We conclude that the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity concerning Carter’s, McCoy’s, and Dixon’s claims because in December 2009 a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons, including speech indicating the deputies’ support for the Sheriff’s political opponent. Simply put, Jenkins sent very mixed signals. Although we conclude today for the reasons discussed earlier that Jenkins is best read as analyzing the duties of the particular deputies before the court, much of the opinion’s language seemed to indicate that a North Carolina sheriff could terminate his deputies for political reasons regardless of the duties of their particular positions. Truthfully, the Jenkins majority opinion reads almost like two separate opinions that are in tension with one another. All of the majority’s analysis up to the opinion’s final page concerns deputies generally or North Carolina deputies, and references particular duties of deputies without indicating that the plaintiffs had those duties. . . . This analysis leads up to the broad conclusion that ‘North Carolina deputy sheriffs may be lawfully terminated for political reasons under the Elrod–Branti exception to prohibited political terminations.’. . . As if this language were not already strong support for a broader reading of Jenkins, as we have pointed out, the dissent in Jenkins read it that way as well, accusing the majority of ‘hold[ing] that all deputy sheriffs in North Carolina—regardless of their actual duties—are policymaking officials.’. . . Additionally, Knight v. Vernon, while important to our decision regarding the merits of Carter’s, McCoy’s, and Dixon’s constitutional claims, did not clearly establish that the broader reading of Jenkins was incorrect. . . . A sheriff reasonably reading Jenkins as painting all deputies with a broad brush could well have viewed Knight as doing the same, or, at the very least, not weighing in on the issue. . . . The broader reading of Jenkins is also in line with a statement from another of our opinions, which was issued after Knight. In Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182 (4th Cir.2002), we held that, on a claim that a sheriff terminated a dispatcher for political affiliation reasons, the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because in December 1999 it was not clearly established that a sheriff in Virginia could not lawfully terminate, for political affiliation reasons, a dispatcher who was privy to confidential information. . . . For the reasons we explained in reviewing the merits of the Elrod–Branti issue, we believe that this language, while consistent with the Jenkins dissent’s characterization of Jenkins’s reasoning, is an overstatement in light of the Jenkins majority’s specific rejection of the dissent’s characterization of its analysis. Nevertheless, considering the conflicting signals that Jenkins and Pike sent, we conclude that a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 could have believed that he was authorized to terminate any of his deputies for political reasons. . . . If we were deciding what the law was in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons, we would agree with our colleague in dissent that the law was that a sheriff could not fire for political reasons a deputy sheriff with the limited duties of a jailer. Where we believe we differ in our assessment of this case is in whether that law was clearly established and would have been so recognized not by a judge trained in the law, but by a reasonable sheriff. For the reasons stated previously, we believe we have sent mixed signals as to when a sheriff could fire a deputy for political reasons and we have been unclear as to when he could and when he could not. Some parts of our en banc decision in Jenkins indicate he could do so and other parts would prohibit it. The dissent in Jenkins expressed its own confusion as to what the holding of Jenkins was and language in our cases since, as well as those from other courts, have interpreted the holding in Jenkins broadly and consistent with the Sheriff's. In short, we understand why a sheriff would not find the law in this situation clear, particularly given that he is a lay person. We do not expect sheriffs to be judges and to have the training to sort through every intricacy of case law that is hardly a model of clarity. . . Rather, in considering whether constitutional rights were clearly established for qualified-immunity purposes, we view the issue from 'the layman's perspective,' . . . recognizing that '[p]articularly with regard to legal conclusions, lay officers obviously cannot be expected to perform at the level achievable by those trained in the law. . . . We note that in cases in which the Elrod-Branti exception applies, and an employer therefore does not violate his employee's association rights by terminating him for political disloyalty, the employer also does not violate his employee's free speech rights by terminating him for speech displaying that political disloyalty. . . Thus, a reasonable sheriff in December 2009 who believed that the Elrod-Branti exception applied to his deputies could have also reasonably believed that he could choose not to reappoint them for their speech indicating their political disloyalty to him. And Carter's and McCoy's Facebook activity and Dixon's bumper sticker and polling-place comment certainly fall into that category. For this reason, we conclude that the Sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity concerning the claims of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.") Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 395, 401, 402 (4th Cir. 2013) (Hollander, District Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in Chief Judge Traxler's excellent opinion, with one exception. The majority concludes that, at the relevant time, 'a reasonable sheriff could have believed he had the right to choose not to reappoint his sworn deputies for political reasons,' . . . and, on this basis, it determines that Sheriff Roberts is protected by qualified immunity with respect to his discharge of Carter, Dixon, and McCoy. In my view, when these deputies were discharged in December 2009, the law was clearly established that a sheriff's deputy with the job duties of a jailer could not be fired on the basis of political affiliation. Therefore, I respectfully disagree with the majority's ruling as to qualified immunity. . . . The salient facts of this case are so close to the facts in Knight that any reasonable sheriff would have predicted that both cases would yield the same result. To the extent that there is any distinction between Knight and this case, it concerns only the title of the positions held by the employees. Yet, it was clearly established that the title itself is of no legal significance. Therefore, Sheriff Roberts should have known that he could not discharge his jailers on the basis of their political affiliation. The majority is correct in stating that, in considering whether the law was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, we look to the perspective of a layperson, not a lawyer. . . . In 1997, this court delivered an unequivocally clear message to lay sheriffs. Directly addressing sheriffs, the Jenkins Court announced: 'We ... caution sheriffs that courts examine the job duties of the position, and not merely the title, of those dismissed.' . . . Any person capable of serving as a sheriff surely would have understood that directive, which was subsequently reiterated in Knight, and would have grasped what all the members of this panel agree was 'the law ... in December 2009 regarding the legality of a sheriff firing a deputy for political reasons.' . . . In sum, Sheriff Roberts' dismissal of Carter, McCoy, and Dixon on the basis of their political allegiance, if ultimately proven, cannot be excused on the basis of qualified immunity. Therefore, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion that upholds the finding of qualified immunity for Sheriff Roberts with respect to the First Amendment claims lodged by Carter, McCoy, and Dixon.”)

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 320-24 (4th Cir. 2013) (“The threshold requirement that a plaintiff suffer more than a de minimis injury to state an excessive force claim was thus settled law in this circuit until 2010, when the Supreme Court in Wilkins abrogated Norman, Riley, and Taylor. . . The Wilkins Court clarified that the nature of the force, rather than the extent of the injury, is the relevant inquiry. . . Thus, it is clear that the de minimis injury threshold that this Court (and the district courts within this circuit) had relied upon in considering excessive force claims is no longer the appropriate test. The question, however, is whether Crum’s alleged conduct which took place prior to the Supreme Court’s Wilkins decision, is covered by qualified immunity. . . . Crum does not dispute the first prong, that there is a constitutional right to be free of excessive force. His argument is that he is entitled to qualified immunity because Hill’s claimed constitutional violation was not clearly established at the time of the assault. Under the clearly established law of the Fourth Circuit on November 1, 2007, we must agree with Crum. . . . At the time of the alleged assault on Hill, Norman and its progeny were controlling in the Fourth Circuit and had been since 1994. Although Wilkins abrogated Norman in 2010, Wilkins can only be applied prospectively in the context of a qualified immunity analysis. . . In other words, the 2010 holding in Wilkins cannot be imputed retroactively to an officer in this circuit whose allegedly tortious conduct predated the Wilkins decision. The applicable law for qualified immunity purposes would be that in existence in 2007, the time of the alleged assault. In 2007 under Norman, a reasonable correctional officer would have objectively believed that the law in this circuit was what the Fourth Circuit said it was; that is, a plaintiff could not prevail on an excessive force claim ‘absent the most extraordinary circumstances,’ if he had suffered only de minimis injury. . . Although Wilkins established that the Fourth Circuit had been applying the incorrect standard, the inquiry—for qualified immunity purposes—is not whether the officer correctly interpreted the law as it would be changed in later years, but rather, whether the conduct at issue was reasonable based on the officer’s imputed knowledge of the law at the time. Crum’s reliance on Norman satisfies this standard. . . . In no sense do we suggest that Crum’s alleged conduct was appropriate for a correctional officer, but it fails to cross the very high threshold for extraordinary circumstances that permit an excessive force claim to advance in the absence of more than de minimis injury for purposes of a pre- Wilkins qualified immunity analysis.”)

Hill v. Crum, 727 F.3d 312, 325-29 (4th Cir. 2013) (Thacker, J., dissenting) (“With all due respect to the majority, I must dissent. Under prevailing Supreme Court precedent available at the time of the assault in this case, it was clearly established that an officer could not maliciously or sadistically impose harm on a custodial, handcuffed, and completely non-resistant inmate without violating the inmate’s Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment—and any reasonable officer would have known as much. . . . Appellant Crum claims that he was entitled to assault Mr. Hill unabated for over two minutes so long as any resulting injury was de minimis. . . Not so. Under controlling Supreme Court precedent at the time— not to mention applying pure common sense—no reasonable officer could have believed such abuse was lawful.

. . On November 1, 2007, the controlling Supreme Court authority for excessive force cases in the Eighth Amendment context was Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992). One need only read the first paragraph of Hudson to realize the right at issue was clearly established:

This case requires us to decide whether the use of excessive physical force against a prisoner may constitute cruel and unusual punishment when the inmate does not suffer serious injury. We answer that question in the affirmative.

The Supreme Court went on to emphasize as follows:

When prison officials maliciously and sadistically use force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency always are violated. This is true whether or not significant injury is evident. Otherwise, the Eighth Amendment would permit any physical punishment, no matter how diabolic or inhuman, inflicting less than some arbitrary quantity of injury.

At the time of the incident in this case, Hudson had been controlling Supreme Court precedent for 15 years. In fact, this was the controlling law even before Hudson. The Hudson Court merely extended its prior holding in Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986) (regarding the legal standard for an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim arising out of a prison riot), to standard claims by inmates against prison officials for the use of excessive force. . . Under Whitley and Hudson, “‘the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain ... constitutes cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment.’”. . The Court explained that ‘the core judicial inquiry’ in excessive force cases is not whether a certain quantum of injury was sustained, but rather ‘whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.’. . Thus, although this circuit misinterpreted Hudson in Norman v. Taylor, 25 F.3d 1259 (4th Cir.1994), the fact remains that Hudson and Whitley set forth the long standing and clearly established controlling precedent at the time of this incident. . . The law was, and is, clear; the proper focus is on the force used, not on the resulting injury. . . . Even if we assume Hill’s injuries were minor—which he does not concede—analysis of the other factors make clear Crum’s alleged use of force could be deemed excessive. . . . A lone cooperative inmate, handcuffed and hunched over a desk could not pose a reasonable threat to a prison officer sufficient to justify the use of force. Moreover, Appellant Crum did not temper the severity of the force employed, but, rather, allegedly continued beating Hill for a total of two minutes. These factors indicate that Crum exercised force, not in a good-faith effort to restore order, but, rather, maliciously and sadistically simply to cause harm. . . . Ultimately, whatever erroneous interpretive gloss Norman placed on Hudson, see Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34 (2010) (abrogating Norman), on November 1, 2007, it would have been readily apparent to a reasonable officer that where a disturbance had already been abated, he could not assault a restrained, compliant, and cooperative inmate for ‘a good solid two minutes,’. . . punching and elbowing him repeatedly in the abdomen and head, without applying excessive force in violation of the inmate’s Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Accordingly, I would hold Appellant Crum is not entitled to qualified immunity, and affirm the decision of the district court.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 391 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2013) (“Taken together, it is crystal clear that the First Amendment protects peaceful nondisruptive speech in an airport, and that such speech cannot be suppressed solely because the government disagrees with it. Thus, Mr. Tobey’s right to display a peaceful non-disruptive message in protest of a government policy without recourse was clearly established at the time of his arrest. . . .[E]ven though the dissent purports to understand factually analogous precedent is not a prerequisite for finding that a right is clearly established, the entire dissent seemingly hinges on this very premise. Moreover, the unequivocal constitutional precedent provided Appellants with more than adequate notice that they cannot retaliate against Mr. Tobey for exercising his First Amendment rights. This is not an abstract principle but an irrefutable precept. . . . Appellants argue that because there is no case on-point detailing what is a reasonable restriction on speech in an airport screening area, Mr. Tobey’s constitutional rights cannot be said to have been clearly established. . . . While reasonableness in and of itself may be an ineffective guide as to whether a right is ‘clearly established,’ in this case there are clear constitutional parameters. It may be unclear as to what reasonableness entails in the abstract, but at a minimum, given well-established precedent, we know that it is unreasonable to effect an arrest without probable cause for displaying a silent, nondisruptive message of protest—which is what allegedly occurred here. Appellants even conceded at oral argument that it would have clearly been unlawful for them to seize Mr. Tobey if the text of the Fourth Amendment was printed on his t-shirt. We see no reason why the same clear principle should not apply here, as Mr. Tobey’s allegations amount to the factual equivalent. Appellants cite Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088 (2012) as supporting their argument that Mr. Tobey’s constitutional rights were not clearly established, but in doing so, miss the mark completely. In Reichle, an appeal from summary judgment, the Supreme Court found that it was not clearly established that a plaintiff could make out a cognizable First Amendment claim for an arrest that was supported by probable cause. . . . Reichle does not apply here because Mr. Tobey specifically alleges that his arrest was not supported by probable cause, and ‘probable cause or its absence will be at least an evidentiary issue in practically all [] cases.’ Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265 (2006). At this stage in the litigation, of course, we must credit Mr. Tobey’s allegation that Appellants arrested or caused him to be arrested without probable cause. He has, therefore, satisfied the requirement in Hartman and Reichle to plead an absence of probable cause.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 392 (4th Cir. 2013) (“Given that peaceful, silent, nondisruptive protest is protected in a nonpublic forum, like an airport; that it is unequivocally clear that the government cannot effectuate an arrest for the display of a message of peaceful protest; and that Mr. Tobey’s arrest in this instance was allegedly not supported by probable cause—we find that Mr. Tobey’s rights at the time of his arrest were clearly established by decades-old precedent. . . . Here, Mr. Tobey engaged in a silent, peaceful protest using the text of our Constitution—he was well within the ambit of First Amendment protections. And while it is tempting to hold that First Amendment rights should acquiesce to national security in this instance, our Forefather Benjamin Franklin warned against such a temptation by opining that those ‘who can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety.’ We take heed of his warning and are therefore unwilling to relinquish our First Amendment protections—even in an airport.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 394-97 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) (“I cannot join the majority’s decision permitting a damages action to proceed against Transportation Security Administration (“TSA”) agents who were faithfully performing one of the most essential functions in our post-9/11 age: protecting air passengers from the threat of air terrorism. We now view these events in the comfort of hindsight. But while some may consider plaintiff Aaron Tobey’s conduct to be cute or even funny in retrospect, it was no laughing matter at the time. . . . One would think the Supreme Court’s admonitions on the need for some modicum of specificity in notice to defendants might actually mean something. . . . And yet, by allowing Tobey’s suit to proceed by enunciating legal principles at the highest and most nebulous level of generality, the majority deprives the doctrine of its value. . . . I regret that a doctrine so essential to the performance of public functions has been reduced to hollow and formulaic recitations that signal only its demise. . . . General propositions stripped of all sense of context may seem useful to my fine appellate colleagues, . . . but they are of no use at all to people who must confront specific and difficult real-life situations. Neither Tobey nor the majority points to a single court decision addressing a situation even remotely similar in time, place, or manner to the one that occurred here, let alone a decision that would have made the unlawfulness of defendants’ actions ‘apparent.’ They cite no decision involving the period before scores of passengers board airplanes, no decision involving the security-screening area of an airport, and no decision involving distracting conduct that poses a potential security threat. . . . The complete dearth of pertinent precedent should be dispositive of the question whether it was clearly established that defendants’ conduct was unreasonable: it was not.”)

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 400, 401 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) (“Tobey’s complaint. . . alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment as well as the First, and for many of the reasons noted above, the district court rightly dismissed Tobey’s Fourth Amendment claim, describing defendants’ decision to summon local law enforcement as ‘eminently reasonable.’. . . This conclusion should have led it to dispose of Tobey’s First Amendment claim as well. For just last Term, the Supreme Court held that, notwithstanding the First Amendment’s general prohibition against retaliatory arrests, ‘the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause’ is not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, reasoning that any inference of impermissible causation is severely undermined by the existence of probable cause. . . . The same conclusion applies here: the causation element of Tobey’s First Amendment claim is undermined, if not vitiated, by the fact that defendants’ actions were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In light of Reichle, then, it was not clearly established that these same actions violated the First Amendment. The majority responds by pointing to Tobey’s allegation that defendants’ actions were not supported by ‘probable cause.’. . . The problem with this argument is that neither Tobey nor the majority cites a single case holding that probable cause is the relevant standard governing the decision by an official who does not have arresting authority, such as a TSA agent, to refer someone to another official who does. And any confusion regarding the appropriate Fourth Amendment standard only bolsters the conclusion that defendants' alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established. For the majority to hold otherwise, it must ignore conflicting precedents and expect lay TSA agents to have imposed on the spot a degree of coherence on First and Fourth Amendment jurisprudence that has eluded serious students of constitutional law. Qualified immunity exists to forestall precisely this result.")

Cilman v. Reeves, Nos. 09-1887, 09-1920, 2011 WL 5252646, at *3 (4th Cir. Nov. 4, 2011) (unpublished) ("No controlling Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit precedent speaks to a person's right to be free from a warrantless entry into his home in circumstances like those in the case at hand. Numerous out-of-circuit cases do address this issue, but courts have divided on this question. Some hold that commission of a misdemeanor drunk driving offense subject to a possible jail term does not justify a warrantless home arrest. [collecting cases] Others, however, hold to the contrary. [collecting cases] In light of the divergence in these holdings, we can only conclude that Officer Reeves was entitled to qualified immunity. . . Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Cilman on liability as to the § 1983 and Va.Code Ann. § 19.2-59 claims.")

H.H. ex rel. H.F. v. Moffett, No. 08-1009, 2009 WL 1931203, at *7 (4th Cir. July 7, 2009) ("We have little difficulty finding that a reasonable teacher would know that maliciously restraining [disabled] child in her [wheel]chair for hours at a time interferes with that child's constitutional liberty interests.").

Fields v. Prater, 566 F.3d 381, 389, 390(4th Cir. 2009) ("It is true that defendants knew or should have known that consideration of political affiliation when hiring a local director was forbidden by the State Board's regulations. However, 'an official's clear violation of a state administrative regulation does not allow a § 1983 plaintiff to overcome the official's qualified immunity.' . . The law requires something more, namely that it be clear to a reasonable official at the time of the decision that selecting a local director on the basis of political affiliation contravened the First Amendment. We conclude that at the time of the hiring decision the law had not achieved that level of constitutional clarity that would allow us to hold defendants liable. . . . Because application of the principles of Branti and Jenkins to new situations invariably requires particularized inquiries into specific positions in the context of specific systems, it is not always easy to say that there is a clearly drawn line between those positions for which consideration of political affiliation is allowed and those for which it is not. . . . Undisputed evidence in the record, including an affidavit from a state official familiar with the system and the job application itself, show that political affiliation was not 'an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved.' . . But to say that the rule in the Commonwealth is now clear going forward is a different matter from the retrospective imposition of monetary consequence. Both Nader and this case concerned management positions in local services agencies. In both cases, resolving the constitutional issue required a fact-intensive inquiry into the particular responsibilities of the positions and their role in their respective state systems. There was thus no 'bright line[]' rule in this context. . . .We find no fault with the able district judge, who concluded that the constitutional rights at issue were clearly established; this was a close question. But because we cannot unequivocally say that defendants knew or should have known they were violating Fields's constitutional rights when they refused to hire her, they are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Iko v. Shreve, 535 F.3d 225, 240 (4th Cir. 2008) (“We held over a decade ago that ‘[i]t is generally recognized that it is a violation of the Eighth Amendment for prison officials to use mace, tear gas or other chemical agents in quantities greater than necessary or for the sole purpose of infliction of pain.’ . . . Notwithstanding this clear pronouncement, Lt. Shreve attempts to distinguish Williams on the grounds that it involved the use of mace, not pepper spray. Williams’s use of ‘or other chemical agents,’ . . . plainly reaches the use of pepper spray, and evinces the principle that “[c]learly established” . . . includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.’ . . . Because Lt. Shreve had “‘fair warning” that [his] conduct was unconstitutional,’ . . . we hold that Iko’s right to be free from excessive use of pepper spray was clearly established, preventing an award of qualified immunity to Lt. Shreve on the facts before us.”).

Campbell v. Galloway, 483 F.3d 258, 271 (4th Cir. 2007) (“There is no doubt that the broad legal principle governing this case— that public employees may not be fired on a basis that infringes on their First Amendment rights—was clearly established at the time of Campbell’s termination. At this stage of our analysis, however, our focus must be narrower, as the determination of whether a given right was clearly established requires us to define that right ‘at a high level of particularity.’ . . . When the right is defined at the proper level of particularity and the analysis is directed to what is disputed in this case, the question becomes whether a reasonable officer would have known that Campbell’s rambling thirteen-page memo to Chief Galloway, which focused overwhelmingly on personal grievances and vague gripes about fellow officers not being very nice to her, touched on a matter of public concern, thus entitling Campbell to the protection of the First Amendment. We answer that question in the negative. . . . As discussed above, this circuit has provided limited guidance on when complaints about sexual harassment will amount to matters of public concern. . . . Our fact-specific resolution of individual cases has done little to sharpen the line between cases where the complaints about discrimination are matters of public concern and those where such complaints are not matters of public concern. In our view, the speech at issue in this case falls within the gray area between speech that clearly is a matter of public concern and speech that clearly is not a matter of public concern. . . . Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the defendants unreasonably viewed Campbell’s letter as involving personal grievances only, particularly given the state of the law in other circuits.”).

Miller v. Prince George’s County, 475 F.3d 621, 632, 633 (4th Cir. 2007) (“ . . . Det. Dougans. . . seems to claim entitlement to qualified immunity on the theory that the magistrate found that his affidavit provided probable cause to issue the warrant. . . . In sum, well before the events at issue in this case, it was clearly established that a police officer could not lawfully make intentionally or recklessly false material statements or omissions in order to obtain a warrant.

Accordingly, Det. Dougans is not entitled to qualified immunity, as a matter of law, on the present record.”)

Lovelace v. Lee, 472 F.3d 174, 196-99 (4th Cir. 2006) (“Here, the district court erroneously granted Lester qualified immunity on the premise that there was uncertainty about RLUIPA’s constitutionality at the time of the alleged violation. We apply a two-step analysis in assessing whether qualified immunity is available. . . We first consider whether the facts alleged, taken in the light most favorable to Lovelace, show that Lester violated Lovelace’s statutory rights under RLUIPA. Lovelace satisfies this part of the test, as our earlier discussion establishes. Second, we consider whether these statutory rights were clearly established at the time of the claimed violation. . . .Chronology and the origins of RLUIPA inform our analysis of whether the rights in question were clearly established at the time Lovelace was removed from the Ramadan pass list. RLUIPA was enacted in September 2000; the alleged violation occurred more than two years later, November and December 2002. . . . Section 3 of RLUIPA. . . encountered some hurdles before the Supreme Court declared it constitutional under the Establishment Clause in Cutter v. Wilkinson, 544 U.S. at 719-26. Prior to that decision, the Fourth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits had upheld the provision under the Establishment Clause while the Sixth Circuit had invalidated it. . . . The question still remains whether a reasonable prison guard should have known that the conduct attributed to Lester violated Lovelace’s free exercise rights under RLUIPA. . . . Because the facts support an inference that Lester acted intentionally in depriving Lovelace of his free exercise rights, Lester is not entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. Although the outer boundaries of RLUIPA may have been uncharted at the time, its core protections were not. As explained earlier, RLUIPA incorporates and exceeds the Constitution’s basic protections of religious exercise. . . Under both the Free Exercise Clause and RLUIPA in its most elemental form, a prisoner has a ‘clearly established ... right to a diet consistent with his ... religious scruples,’ including proper food during Ramadan. . . A prison official violates this clearly established right if he intentionally and without sufficient justification denies an inmate his religiously mandated diet. . . Thus, under both the First Amendment and any straightforward interpretation of RLUIPA, the unlawfulness of intentional and unjustified deprivations of Ramadan meals was apparent at the time of the incident. Lester’s state of mind is therefore critical to determining whether a reasonable person in his position would have understood that his conduct violated clearly established rights. If Lovelace succeeds in showing that Lester intentionally blocked his observance of Ramadan in violation of RLUIPA’s basic protections, then Lester would not be entitled to qualified immunity. Because there is on this record a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Lester intentionally and purposefully infringed Lovelace’s free exercise rights—rights clearly established at the time under RLUIPA and the First Amendment—Lester is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage on the RLUIPA claim.”)

Blankenship v. Manchin, 471 F.3d 523, 533 (4th Cir. 2006) (“In sum, the general proposition that a government official may not retaliate against a citizen for the exercise of a constitutional right is clearly established law, per Trulock. The specific right at issue here, the right to be free of threats

Ridpath v. Bd. of Governors of Marshall University, 447 F.3d 292, 314, 315, 321 (4th Cir. 2006)(“We have provided, in several decisions, concrete examples of the types of public statements implying the existence of serious character defects such as dishonesty and immorality. . . Of course, none of these decisions involved the use of the ‘corrective action’ label in the course of an NCAA investigation. However, there is no logical distinction between, for instance, linking an employee’s discharge to an investigation of financial irregularities . . . and tying Ridpath’s reassignment from the Department of Athletics to the University’s serious NCAA rules violations (as the ‘corrective action’ label served to do). In each of these scenarios, the charge at issue can be understood to insinuate dishonesty and other serious character defects. Thus, our precedent gave the Administrators fair warning that the ‘corrective action’ label was just the type of charge that implicates a protected liberty interest. . . Similarly, we have specified that a public employer’s stigmatizing remarks may infringe on an employee’s liberty interest if such remarks are ‘made in the course of a discharge or significant demotion.’ . . . The Administrators therefore were provided with fair and clear warning that, by banishing Ridpath from the Department of Athletics, they were unlawfully subjecting him to a ‘significant demotion’ within the meaning of Stone and authorities relied on therein. . . Finally, because it is undisputed that Ridpath was not provided any procedural safeguards with respect to the labeling of his reassignment as a ‘corrective action,’ it cannot be questioned that the Administrators contravened Roth’s requirement for ‘notice and an opportunity to be heard.’ . . Accordingly, accepting the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, the Administrators contravened a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process right of which a reasonable person would have known. They therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of these proceedings on Ridpath’s due process claim. . . . While further factual development in this case may present a murky picture of why Ridpath was relieved of his teaching position, the content and context of his statements, and any negative impact his remarks had on the efficiency of his workplace, the scene painted by the Amended Complaint is crystal clear. Read in the proper light, it alleges that the Administrators retaliated against Ridpath for making protected statements that they did not like. Such activity does not merely implicate the gray edges of the right Ridpath asserts; it goes to its very core. And taking the allegations of the Amended Complaint as true, a clearer violation of constitutionally protected free speech would be difficult to fathom. Therefore, Ridpath’s retaliation claim alleges a violation of clearly established law of which a reasonable person would have known.”).

Short v. Smoot, 436 F.3d 422, 427-30 (4th Cir. 2006) (“ The right in question here, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is the right of a detainee, whose jailers know that he is suicidal, to have his jailers take precautions against his suicide beyond merely placing him in a cell under video surveillance. We hold that Brown v. Harris, 240 F.3d 383 (4th Cir.2001), demonstrates that no such right derives from the Eighth Amendment. . . . Importantly, a prison official ‘who actually [knows] of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety may be found free from liability if [he] responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately was not averted.’ . . . Brown demonstrates that the first-shift officers' response to Short's risk of suicide was objectively reasonable and therefore sufficient to prevent liability under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Here, the first-shift officers' response to the risk that Short would kill himself was the same as Ogden's response in Brown: they placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance. Thus, under Brown, this response was sufficient under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause regardless of whether additional precautions might also have been advisable. . . . The critical point is that despite the actual failure of the officers' measures to prevent the detainees' suicides, and despite possible inattentiveness of the officers whose duty it was at the time of the suicides to watch the monitors, in both Brown and the present case the officers placed their detainees in video-monitored cells, knowing that someone would be responsible for watching the monitors. . . . Appellants do not dispute that it was clearly established on the day of Short's death that the conscious failure by a jailer to make any attempt to stop an ongoing suicide attempt by one of his detainees would constitute deliberate indifference.”).

Meeker v. Edmundson, 415 F.3d 317, 323 (4th Cir. 2005) (“Having concluded that Meeker has alleged the violation of a constitutional right, we turn to the second step of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis to determine whether Coach Edmundson is nonetheless entitled to immunity from suit. . . . [H]ere we ask whether in November 2000 a reasonable educator could have believed that repeatedly instituting the unprovoked and painful beatings of one of his students was lawful, in light of clearly established law. By November 2000, the law provided clear guidance: No school official could, consistent with constitutional principles, cause a student to be subjected to such beatings.”).

Washington v. Wilmore, 407 F.3d 274, 283, 284 (4th Cir. 2005) (“We therefore conclude that the facts stated by Washington allege the violation of his constitutional right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by an investigating officer. Moreover, this right was clearly established in 1983, when the events relevant to this litigation took place. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the denial of qualified immunity.”).

Kirby v. City of Elizabeth City, 388 F.3d 440, 448, 450, 451 (4th Cir. 2004) (“It would violate the principles articulated in McDonald and Thorne to extend constitutional protection of public employees' petitions for redress beyond the protections afforded to public employee speech. In fact, it would allow the anomalous result that a private employment dispute could ‘be constitutionalized merely by filing a legal action.’ . . . We therefore join the majority of circuits to have addressed the question in holding that a public employee's petition, like his speech, is constitutionally protected only when it addresses a matter of public concern. . . . Although we hold that Kirby's petitions implicated a matter of public concern, we affirm the judgment in favor of Appellees on other grounds. . . . Here, the petition rights that Kirby alleges that Chief Hampton and Lieutenant Koch violated were anything but clear. As is apparent from our analysis of the petition claim, the legal viability of the claim presents a close and novel issue, and even assuming that Kirby's allegations are true, Hampton and Koch cannot be held liable for what would amount to ‘bad guesses in [a] gray area [].’”).

Mom's Inc. v. Willman, 109 F. App'x 629, 2004 WL 2179166, at *5, *6 (4th Cir. Sept. 29, 2004) ("The remaining question is whether Colaprete's Fourth Amendment right against having his property converted following a search was clearly established when the alleged conversion occurred. The Seventh Circuit has held that the existence of this right is '[s]o obvious ... that we do not think the absence of case law can establish a defense of immunity.' . . . We respectfully disagree. This court has never applied the Fourth Amendment in this manner, and Supreme Court precedent tilts slightly against the existence of any constitutional right against theft during the course of a search. . . . If either Appellant stole Colaprete's watch, he or she should have recognized that this was a tort, a crime, and even a sin, but he had no clear notice that this action violated the United States Constitution. Accordingly, the district court erred in denying summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.").

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 784 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Thus, by 1997 it was clearly established that Love-Lane's speech about race discrimination at Lewisville involved a matter of public concern. We have said on many occasions, however, that 'only infrequently will it be "clearly established" that a public employee's speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a "particularized balancing" [under Pickering] that is subtle, difficult to apply, and not yet well-defined.' . . . But we have never said 'that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . . In light of this earlier discussion, we are persuaded that the interests to be balanced under Pickering weigh so heavily in Love-Lane's favor that her right to speak about race discrimination in a public school was clearly established well before 1997 and 1998. . . . Because case law had confirmed Love-Lane's right to speak and because the Pickering balancing test tips decidedly in her favor, we hold that any reasonable school superintendent in Martin's position in 1997 and 1998 would have realized that he would violate the Constitution if he, in fact, took adverse employment action against Love-Lane for speaking out about race discrimination at Lewisville Elementary School.").

Love-Lane v. Martin, 355 F.3d 766, 801 (4th Cir. 2004) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("In the final analysis, even if we disagree with Martin's personnel actions, his educational philosophy, his view of school discipline, or his feelings about the need for cooperative relations at the head of a school within his district, that is a far cry from saying that he violated clearly established federal law. In holding that he did, my fine colleagues have made a serious mistake. . . . To eviscerate the doctrine of qualified immunity, as the majority has done here, is to subject public schools uniquely to the omnipresent spectre of litigation, to the detriment of the children and communities they were intended to serve.").

Odom v. South Carolina Dep't of Corrections, 349 F.3d 765, 773, 774 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In June 2000, it was clearly established in this circuit that correctional officers who are present when a violent altercation involving an armed inmate erupts and fail to intervene immediately do not violate the Eighth Amendment if the officers are unarmed, unaware of a risk of harm prior to the altercation, and take reasonable steps to intervene safely. . . . By the same token, we had also determined, well before the time of this attack, that a correctional officer who stands by as a passive observer and takes no action whatsoever to intervene during an assault violates the rights of the victim inmate. . . . Other circuit courts of appeal, at the time of the attack, had concluded that a prison official acts with deliberate indifference when he ignores repeated requests from a vulnerable inmate to be separated from a fellow inmate who has issued violent threats which the aggressor will likely carry out in the absence of official intervention. . . . We conclude that, at the time of the attack on Odom, the state of pre-existing law was such that reasonable prison guards in the defendants' position would have understood that doing nothing in response to Odom's requests in light of the circumstances of this case violated Odom's rights.").

Bailey v. Kennedy, 349 F.3d 731, 741 (4th Cir.2003) ("Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kennedy and Whitley's actions on May 27, 1998, it was clearly established that a police officer may not detain someone for an emergency mental evaluation based only on a 911 report that the person was suicidal, where the officers were able to observe the person alleged to be suicidal and observed nothing indicating that the person might have been a danger to himself. We conclude that it was clearly established that probable cause was lacking in such a situation."), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 360 F.3d 470 (4th Cir. 2004).

Martin v. St. Mary's Dep't of Social Services, 346 F.3d 502, 506(4th Cir. 2003) ("Because of the complicated balance between parents' rights to raise their children and a State's interest in protecting its minor citizens, the right to familial integrity is 'amorphous' in many cases. . . . The contours of the right to familial integrity may not be 'sufficiently clear' in certain situations, to be deemed 'clearly established' as required. . . . A public official must decipher what conduct violates protected rights, but an official will not be held liable for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'").

Wilson v. Kittoe, 337 F.3d 392, 403 (4th Cir. 2003) ("In deciding whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established, the right must be defined 'at a high level of particularity.' . . . Defining the right at issue with the requisite level of particularity, we agree with the district court that the appropriate question is whether, at the time of Kittoe's actions on April 14, 1999, it was clearly established that a police officer may not arrest a third party for criticizing the officer's conduct and refusing to leave the scene of an arrest. We conclude that that right was clearly established at the time of Wilson's arrest: a reasonable Virginia police officer in Kittoe's position would have understood that, as 'obstruction' has long been circumscribed in Virginia law, the four Conversations and the three Refusals to Obey could not generate probable cause for arrest under the Obstruction Statute.").

Altman v. City of High Point, 330 F.3d 194, 210, 211 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The dissent's effort to adduce relevant legal authority is ineffective. At the time Officers Moxley and Perdue acted, neither the Supreme Court nor the Fourth Circuit had held that dogs were 'effects' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Nor had either court issued any opinion as to the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standards governing seizure of dogs. . . . Perhaps sensing this weakness, the dissent seeks to marshal a consensus of cases from other circuits, but no such consensus existed at the time of the actions at issue here. . . . There is one remaining avenue open to the dissent. Qualified immunity is also inappropriate when the action at issue was so obviously unconstitutional that, even though no precedent was factually similar, any reasonable officer would have known from the general contours of the law that his action was in violation thereof. . . . This is a difficult standard to satisfy . . . and it has been rendered even more so in this circuit by the Robles decision. For, if binding a man to a pole in the middle of a deserted parking lot at three in the morning and abandoning him all for no legitimate law enforcement purpose was not clearly unconstitutional, then few things will be. Indeed, it follows a fortiori from the fact that it was far from obvious, even to a court of law, that dogs are ‘effects’ protected by the Fourth Amendment, that the officer on the beat could not reasonably be expected to know that his seizure of a dog might violate the Fourth Amendment.”).

Mills v. Steger, 64 F. App’x 864, 2003 WL 21089092, at *8, *9 (4th Cir. May 14, 2003) (unpublished) (“Although plaintiffs have prevailed in some First Amendment retaliation cases, . . . most do not, simply because the individualized assessment required by the Pickering balancing test means we can rarely say that the law was clearly established and that reasonable officials would have been aware of the law. . . Here, as with most cases, we cannot say that the defendants should have known that transferring or terminating Mills because of his speech would be a violation of his First Amendment rights. Given the fine line drawing required to determine whether someone in Mills’s position is entitled to First Amendment protection under the Pickering test, we cannot say that the law with respect to Mills’s First Amendment rights was clearly established. We also cannot say that a reasonable official should have known what the outcome of our First Amendment analysis would be. We therefore conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Mills’s First Amendment claim.”).

Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 532 (4th Cir. 2003) (“Both before and after November 1999, courts have consistently applied the Graham holding and have consistently held that officers using unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force to seize a secured, unarmed citizen, do not act in an objectively reasonable manner and, thus, are not entitled to qualified immunity. So it is here. Jones has proffered evidence that Deputy Keller severely injured him by knocking him to the floor and jumping on him, even though Jones, although drunk and using foul language, was unarmed, handcuffed, and alone in a secured room in the sheriff’s headquarters, having come there voluntarily and not under arrest or suspected of any crime. In reported cases prior to November 1999 and involving conduct that took place well before then, we and other courts have repeatedly denied qualified immunity to law enforcement officers in similar circumstances.”).

Batten v. Gomez, 324 F.3d 288, 296 (4th Cir. 2003) (“The gist of Batten’s argument is that it was clearly established that due process required notice and an opportunity to be heard before a state official could interfere with a mother’s liberty interest in her child. The statement of the right at this level of generality, however, is of little help in determining the reasonableness of Shuster and Gomez's conduct. . . As the court in Morrell explained, '[t]he appropriate question is whether it would be clear to reasonable officials in the defendants' position that enforcing the [out-of-state] order without prior notice or an opportunity to be heard in [the home state] was unconstitutional.' . . . In this case, aside from Morrell, we have been unable to find any authoritative cases considering analogous circumstances that hold that pre- deprivation notice and an opportunity to be heard is required as a matter of constitutional due process before a state may enforce another state's order directing that a child be brought before the out-of-state court. Because Morrell was decided after Shuster and Gomez's actions in this case, Shuster and Gomez, like the defendants in Morrell, are immune from suit under the law of qualified immunity.")

Mansoor v. Trank, 319 F.3d 133, 139, 140 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Appellants' principal . . . argument is that in cases involving qualified immunity and the Pickering balancing test, the outcome of the balancing test can 'only infrequently' be said to be 'clearly established.' [citing DiMeglio] Although this is so, 'we did not say [in DiMeglio] that a public employee's right to speak on matters of public concern could never be clearly established.' . . . In this case, as discussed earlier, Appellants have conceded that they had no interest in restricting the clearly protected speech covered by the Plan (i.e., Mansoor's right to speak about matters of public concern as a private citizen). Given this concession, we have no difficulty concluding that the district court did not err in denying them qualified immunity.").

Robles v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 439, 440 (4th Cir. 2002) (denying rehearing en banc) ("In reasoning as it did, the panel followed the two-step analysis in [Siebert and Wilson]. Under step one of that analysis, if a constitutional violation is found then it will nearly always be a 'bad act.' In fact the constitutional violation in Wilson could be argued to be a far more invasive act than the incident the panel confronted here. If every bad act under step one of the Wilson analysis sufficed by itself to answer the step two qualified immunity inquiry, there would simply be no qualified immunity defense. The district court felt strongly that the officers had not been placed on notice that their behavior, however dumb, violated a clearly established constitutional right. My dissenting brother quotes at length from the majority's analysis under the first step of Wilson. The panel naturally relied on general language in Bell v. Wolfish to find a constitutional violation on these specific facts. The dissent indicates that the language of the step one analysis detailing the unconstitutionality of the officers' actions also suffices to satisfy the second prong of Wilson. However, the pitfalls of this approach should be apparent. If a court's general explanation of why an act is unconstitutional also suffices to supplant the need for specific notice, then there will be no independent force to the qualified immunity inquiry at all. The two steps of an analysis which the Supreme Court clearly intended to be sequential and distinct will simply collapse. The concept of notice is rooted in case law. The panel emphatically did not require the plaintiff to come forward with a case on all fours with the present one in order to abrogate the qualified immunity defense. . . . It pressed for even one case that would put the officers on fair notice of a constitutional infraction, but all the cases plaintiff advanced involved much more egregious or far different circumstances than those present here. The plaintiff was unable to provide a single decision to illustrate even the general point that a fleeting or misguided prank rose to the level of a constitutional violation. Wilson requires that a plaintiff point to at least some pertinent authority. . . . Plaintiff provided none at all. . . . While Hope certainly did not require prior cases to have fundamentally similar facts, neither did it take leave of the need to inquire into the case law to give at least a semblance of specificity to what would otherwise be general and abstract constitutional principles. These basic, simple principles worked well here. The officers did not go unpunished. In finding a constitutional violation, the panel allowed the plaintiff to proceed before a jury on his state due process claim for which Maryland provides no qualified immunity defense. . . . It makes good sense to allow state law to hold officers to strict account while the parameters of federal violations are fairly defined. Moreover, the proper precedent has been established for the future. Police officers have been put on the clearest notice in this circuit that even brief episodes of foolishness implicate due process guarantees.”)

Robles v. Prince George’s County, Maryland, 308 F.3d 437, 441, 445 (4th Cir. 2002) (Luttig, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (“Irrespective of any larger doctrinal implications, it is significant when a court of appeals holds, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers today could not reasonably have known that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a pole in a deserted shopping center, and abandoning him there in the middle of the night, admittedly for no law enforcement purpose whatsoever, would violate his rights under the Constitution. I think it clear that the constitutional impermissibility, not to mention the inherent danger of such, is sufficiently self-evident to require the denial of qualified immunity to the defendant officers. . . . It should be apparent that I do not believe that a decided case is necessary in order for officers to be on fair notice that conduct like that by the officers here is violative of the Constitution. . . . And I would like to have thought that at this point in our history no court would hold, as did this panel, that law enforcement officers need an opinion from this court in order for them to be on notice that handcuffing a pretrial detainee to a metal pole in a deserted shopping center at 3:00 a.m. in the morning, and abandoning him there, for no law enforcement purpose at all, is unconstitutional. The sheer danger, not even to mention the constitutional irresponsibility, of such conduct is manifest as a simple matter of common sense, and is made all the more evident by events such as the recent spree of unpredictable sniper killings in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area, which have even reached to the identical shopping center in which appellant was handcuffed. Such a holding as that of the panel analytically completes the transformation of qualified immunity into absolute immunity and goes a long way toward the dilution of section 1983 itself.”).

McVey v. Virginia Highlands Airport Commission, No. 01-2466, 2002 WL 1869992, at * (4th Cir. Aug. 15, 2002) (unpublished) (“Because we conclude that McVey has failed to demonstrate at least two of the necessary elements for establishing a First Amendment claim, we need not reach the second inquiry under qualified immunity—whether her constitutional right was ‘clearly established.’ But we note in passing that in Cromer v. Brown, 88 F.3d 1315, 1326 (4th Cir.1996), we explained that ‘only infrequently will it be “clearly established” that a public employee’s speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected, because the relevant inquiry requires a “particularized balancing” that is subtle, difficult to apply and not yet well- defined.”).

Pike v. Osborne, 301 F.3d 182, 186 (4th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton, J., concurring in the judgment) (“Jenkins is confusing, at best, on the point of whether sheriffs in Virginia can lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons dispatchers with privity to confidential information. Accordingly, because the law was not clearly established in December 1999 that a sheriff could not lawfully terminate for political affiliation reasons a dispatcher with privity to confidential information, Sheriff Osborne was entitled to qualified immunity”).

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 391, 403, 404 (4th Cir. 2001) (“Trulock had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the password-protected computer files and Conrad’s authority to consent to the search did not extend to them. Trulock, therefore, has alleged a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, the Defendants are entitled to immunity because a reasonable officer in their position would not have known that the search would violate clearly established law. [footnote omitted] At the time of the search, at least one published case, although from a district court outside this circuit, held that a third party may consent to the search of a shared computer when the third party has complete access to the computer. . . . Conversely, we are aware of no reported cases answering whether an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy in password-protected files stored in a shared computer. Trulock, though conceding the absence of computer specific caselaw, urges us to recognize a clearly established right based upon Block and other similar cases. We decline to do this. Although cases involving computers are not sui generis, the law of computers is fast evolving, and we are reluctant to recognize a retroactive right based on cases involving footlockers and other dissimilar objects. Thus, a reasonable officer in the Defendants’ position would not have known that Conrad’s consent did not authorize them to search Trulock’s files; the Defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Trulock v. Freeh, 275 F.3d 406, 407, 409 (4th Cir. 2001) (Michael, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority holds that Conrad lacked the authority to consent to a search of Trulock’s password-protected computer files. . . I agree. I also agree with the majority’s conclusion. . . that Trulock’s computer files are analogous to the locked footlocker in United States v. Block, 590 F.2d 535, 540-42 (4th Cir.1978) (holding that a mother’s consent to the search of her son’s room did not extend to his locked footlocker). I respectfully disagree, however, with the majority’s view that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law saying that one co-user’s consent to search a computer does not extend to the password-protected files of another co-user when the consenting co-user does not know the other’s passwords. I would reject the defendants’ qualified immunity defense because the unlawfulness of searching Trulock’s password-protected files was readily apparent in light of the principles established in Matlock and reiterated in Block. . . . The central question here is whether in the light of pre-existing law it would have been apparent to a reasonable FBI agent that Conrad’s general consent to search the computer she shared with Trulock did not authorize the search of Trulock’s password-protected files stored in that computer. In answering this question, we look to Supreme Court cases, ‘Acases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction,’ [and] the Aconsensus of cases of persuasive authority” from other jurisdictions’ as sources of clearly established law. Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 363 (4th Cir.2001) (quoting Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617). No court has decided a case involving third-party consent to the search of password-protected computer files. Nevertheless, we have clearly established law that is applicable: it comes from Matlock and Block. . . . Whatever the physical differences between locked footlockers and password-protected computer files, the question here must be whether a reasonable officer would believe that there is a legal difference for Fourth Amendment purposes. In other words, is there any reason why a reasonable FBI agent fully apprised of the principles in Block would believe that he could lawfully search Trulock's password-protected files on the basis of Conrad's general consent to search the computer? If there is no such reason, the unlawfulness of the agents' conduct in this case is 'apparent,' Wilson, 526 U.S. at 615, and qualified immunity does not apply. Any reasonable officer should have recognized that the privacy expectations attaching to a password-protected computer file are essentially the same as those attaching to a locked footlocker. A computer file is a repository for information and images in electronic form, just as a footlocker is a repository for more tangible items such as papers and other personal effects. Once password protection attaches to a computer file, that protection is the electronic equivalent of the lock on a footlocker containing items that are intended to remain private. The password is an electronic key. While the medium for ensuring privacy is different, the result—a clear signal that privacy is expected against all those who lack the key (or the password)—is the same. There is simply no reason why a reasonable officer who understood that a locked footlocker signals a discrete expectation of privacy would believe that a password-protected computer file does not. The physical differences between the two repositories have no legal significance.”).

Knussman v. Maryland, 272 F.3d 625, 638 & n.9 (4th Cir. 2001) (Knussman IV) (“Here, the concurring opinion departs and would, like the district court, define the right in fairly broad terms: whether ‘a person’s right not to have a gender neutral statute applied in a discriminatory manner’ was clearly established in 1994. Such a broad definition is not faithful to the particularity principle which ‘mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established.’[citing Amaechi v. West] In our view, defining the right so broadly is not too far removed from framing the issue as whether it was clearly established that a person had the right not to be discriminated against based on gender. Such a definition is too general to provide state officials with adequate guidance on the constitutional limits to their conduct. . . . We view the relevant constitutional question as follows: was the law clearly established in December 1994 that the equal protection clause prohibited a state agency from permitting only mothers, never fathers, to take child-nurturing leave benefits available to the primary care giver for a newborn? We think the decisions outlined above demonstrate that it was.”).

Amaechi v. West, 237 F.3d 356, 362, 363 (4th Cir. 2001) (“West conceded at oral argument that a strip search or a body cavity search conducted in public violates an arrestee’s Fourth Amendment right to a reasonable search, but he argues that relevant precedent does not define his conduct as unlawful because no case holds that the ‘swiping’ and ‘slight’ penetration of an arrestee’s genitalia pursuant to a search incident to an arrest violates the Fourth Amendment. Contrary to West’s argument, the exact conduct at issue need not have been held unlawful for the law governing an officer's actions to be clearly established. . . . Such precise precedent is not what the particularity principle mandates. Rather, the particularity principle mandates that courts refer to concrete applications of abstract concepts to determine whether the right is clearly established. . . . Accordingly, we must determine whether the contours of the right to be free from an unreasonable search have been identified in such a way as to afford West adequate notice that his search of Amaechi transgressed the Fourth Amendment. In doing so, we look to 'cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction,' as well as the 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions. [citing Wilson]").

Doe v. Broderick, 225 F.3d 440, 455 (4th Cir. 2000) ("In August 1998, clearly established Fourth Amendment principles prohibited officers from searching private areas within commercial or business premises, or even private areas within public places, without probable cause. We believe it would have been apparent to a reasonable officer that these limitations encompassed a locked, patient-records room within a methadone clinic that contained confidential patient files, and that, if nothing else, Detective Broderick knew (or should have known) that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment rights of every person who had an expectation of privacy in the records room or the records contained there.").

Norwood v. Bain, 166 F.3d 243, 252, 253 (4th Cir. 1999) (en banc) (per curiam) (Wilkins, J., writing separately, and joined in this part of his opinion by Wilkinson, C.J., and JJ. Widener, Luttig, Niemeyer, Williams, Traxler) ("The constitutional right that Plaintiffs claim was violated, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is their Fourth Amendment right to avoid individualized searches of their motorcycle saddlebags and unworn clothing performed prior to entering the rally for the purpose of detecting weapons when reliable information indicated that a real and imminent danger existed that armed members of warring motorcycle gangs planned to attend the rally and when Plaintiffs were informed that they would not be searched unless they chose to enter the fairgrounds on their motorcycles. The qualified immunity question presented, then, is whether in September 1994 this right was clearly established and whether a reasonable officer would have understood that the conduct at issue violated it. . . . But, it is undisputed that when this incident took place there was no clear law from the Supreme Court, this court, or the South Carolina Supreme Court holding that a search fails to pass constitutional muster under the Fourth Amendment as a special needs search when officers conduct a search at a checkpoint without individualized suspicion or a warrant—and a grave matter of public interest is at stake, an effective means of preventing that harm is available, and the searching technique employed is relatively unintrusive.").

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 270-71 (4th Cir. 1998) ("The parties agree, then, that the following was clearly established law in October 1992: the officers were required by the Fourth Amendment to knock and announce their presence, and wait a reasonable time for a response, prior to entering Gould's home; and, this requirement could only be excused if exigent circumstances justified immediate entry. With this background in mind, we turn now to the officers' basic argument in this court—that the exigent circumstances doctrine was not sufficiently defined in 1992 so that a reasonable officer would know he was violating clearly established law in seeking and executing a no-knock warrant under the circumstances of this case. . . . We believe it would have been ‘sufficiently clear’ and ‘apparent’ to a reasonable officer in October 1992 that failure to knock and announce prior to entering Gould’s home could only be justified by a fear for officer safety or a fear that the evidence sought in the warrant could be easily destroyed.”).

Gould v. Davis, 165 F.3d 265, 274 (4th Cir. 1998) (Williams, J., dissenting) (“Although the majority contends that the unlawfulness of the officers’ actions was apparent in 1992, it was only last year, 1997, that the Supreme Court stated that the officer safety exception would not justify a ‘no-knock’ search ‘at a time when the only individuals present in a residence ha[d] no connection with the [criminal] activity.’ Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 117 S.Ct. 1416, 1421, 137 L.Ed.2d 615 (1997). Thus, although it is now clearly established that the officers’ conduct—as portrayed by the majority—violated the ‘knock and announce’ requirement, it was not clearly established that their conduct violated the ‘knock and announce’ requirement in October 1992.”).

Vathekan v. Prince George’s County, 154 F.3d 173, 175 (4th Cir. 1998) (“We hold that it was clearly established in 1995 that it is objectively unreasonable for a police officer to fail to give a verbal warning before releasing a police dog to seize someone. We conclude that there is a factual dispute about whether Simms failed to give a warning before sending his dog into the house where Vathekan lived. This unresolved factual issue makes it impossible to grant summary judgment to Simms on qualified immunity grounds.”).

Osborne v. Rose, Nos. 97-1259, 97-1264, 1998 WL 17044, *4 (4th Cir. Jan. 20, 1998) (unpublished) (“The Osbornes accept that Albright foreclosed malicious prosecution claims based on the Fourteenth Amendment but contend that Albright recognized such claims brought under the Fourth Amendment. It is true that Albright left open this question, and, prior to November 1994, some courts read Albright in conjunction with earlier Supreme Court cases to permit malicious prosecution claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . . We do not believe, however, that the mere possibility that such claims might survive after Albright demonstrates that a constitutional right had reached the status of being clearly established.”).

S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 265-67 (4th Cir. 1998) (“Peller asserts that the clearly established right that the officers violated was her Fourth Amendment right to be free from seizure for the purpose of medical treatment absent probable cause to believe that she suffered from a mental disorder, posed a danger of serious harm to herself, and that there was no less restrictive alternative available consistent with her welfare. Because we conclude that the contours of such a right were not clearly established so as to make the unlawfulness of these officers’ actions apparent, we affirm the district court’s order granting the officers qualified immunity and dismissing her claim. . . . Reasonable officers, relying upon our decision in Gooden and the other circuit court decisions addressing similar situations, would have concluded that involuntarily detaining Peller was not only reasonable, but prudent.”).

White v. Chambliss, 112 F.3d 731, 736, 737 (4th Cir. 1997) (“If section 1983 liability attaches too readily to removal and placement decisions, the course of public agencies would invariably become one of inaction, thus leaving children in abusive environments. The facts presented by White reveal that the DSS defendants violated no ‘clearly established’ law in removing White’s children from her custody. Therefore, qualified immunity must lie.”).

Winfield v. Bass, 106 F.3d 525, 531 (4th Cir. 1997) (en banc) (“The district court ruled that the right to personal security protected by the Eighth Amendment was well established at the time the events underlying this appeal transpired. But, it is axiomatic that defining the applicable right at that degree of abstraction is inappropriate. . . . Thus, we must inquire whether the established contours of the Eighth Amendment were sufficiently clear at the time of the attack to make it plain to reasonable officers that their actions under these particular circumstances violated Winfield’s rights. In the context of this case, we ultimately are called upon to decide whether it was clearly established in February 1993 that an unarmed prison official would be deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s need for safety if, during an attack by a prisoner armed with a dangerous weapon upon another prisoner, the official instantly mobilized to take control of the situation but failed to intervene immediately. We conclude that it was not.”).

Conner v. McGraw, 104 F.3d 358 (Table), 1996 WL 741132, 5-7 (4th Cir. Dec. 30, 1996) (“While no one disagrees with a general statement of the principles of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the jurisprudence of what offices are legally subject to political patronage terminations has been a burning and unresolved issue that has not been resolved even yet in this circuit, or indeed elsewhere. Less than a year before McGraw terminated Conner, we conducted a survey in the Fourth Circuit as well as in other jurisdictions to determine which positions could require political patronage. See Stott v. Haworth, 916 F.2d 134, 143-144 (4th Cir.1990) We hold that just as in the area of the Elrod/Branti line of cases, the Pickering/Connick line of cases was, and today is, not much clearer when applied to particularities. . . . The area of discharge for the exercise of First Amendment rights . . . is one of the most complex that we have to apply. When the courts have applied it inconsistently to justify dismissals of some employees and not others, it is simply expecting far too much of an objectively reasonable elected chief clerk to conclude that he is not entitled to fire his chief deputy clerk when he takes office in order to have his own administration carry out the policies of his campaign.”).

Hogan v. Carter, 85 F.3d 1113, 1116 (4th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (“[A]lthough [Washington v. Harper [494 U.S. 210 (1990)]] had clearly established by the time that Dr. Carter ordered administration of the single emergency dose of Thorazine to Hogan that an inmate possesses a liberty interest in avoiding the administration of psychotropic drugs by prison officials, Harper had not established, let alone clearly established, the particular process that must precede the one-time administration of an antipsychotic drug in an emergency circumstance such as that confronted by Dr. Carter. Contrary to Hogan’s contention, and to the holdings of the district court and panel, Harper does not, therefore, constitute clearly established law of which Dr. Carter could have been in violation.”)

Price v. Sasser, 65 F.3d 342, 347 (4th Cir. 1995) (“While Farmer established that a risk of danger particular to the individual was not required, . . . that was not clearly the law, at least in this circuit, at the time of the attack on Price. . . . Because Tadlock could not reasonably have known that his behavior violated Price’s clearly established rights at the time he was assaulted, Tadlock is entitled to qualified immunity . . .”).

Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1176 (4th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (“Given the principles laid down by DeShaney, it can hardly be said that Johnson was faced with a clearly established duty to protect Pinder or her children in March of 1989. Indeed, it can be argued that DeShaney established exactly the opposite, i.e., that no such affirmative duty existed because neither Pinder nor her children were confined by the state.”).

Hodge v. Jones, 31 F.3d 157, 167-68 (4th Cir. 1994) (“[W]e feel compelled to address a matter raised in the district court’s opinion with which we find a fundamental error, namely the court’s generalized formulation of a constitutional right which prevents reasonable government officials from knowing just what conduct is actually prohibited by the broad concept of family inviolability. [cite omitted] We commend the district court’s thoughtful consideration of the familial privacy right, but note that it is this very need for such complex legal analysis that renders a denial of qualified immunity inappropriate in this case. Absent our conclusion that Defendants violated no constitutional rights, this would be a proper case for the application of qualified immunity because ‘[o]fficials are not liable for bad guesses in gray areas; they are liable for transgressing bright lines.’... To expect Defendants to resolve what reasonable jurists have long debated—namely the precise strictures of the penumbral right of familial privacy . . . is to impose burdens and expectations well beyond their reasonable capacities ... On the facts of this case and in light of preexisting law, we cannot say that the purported unlawfulness of retaining records of unsubstantiated child abuse charges should have been apparent to Defendants.”).

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 314 (4th Cir.1992) (“[T]he fact that an exact right allegedly violated has not earlier been specifically recognized by any court does not prevent a determination that it was nevertheless ‘clearly established’ for qualified immunity purposes. [cite omitted] ‘Clearly established’ in this context includes not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle involved.”).

Rhoads v. S. Health Partners, No. 8:22-CV-1409-SAL, 2024 WL 3873760, at *10–11 (D.S.C. Aug. 20, 2024) (“In her objections, Plaintiff offers that she has sufficiently shown that Defendants Riddell and Whitaker violated her Fourteenth Amendment rights, and, thus, they are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Indeed, under Fourth Circuit precedent for deliberate indifference claims, the violation of a constitutional right and the denial of qualified immunity usually go hand-in-hand. 87 F.4th at 615 (explaining that ‘under [Fourth Circuit] precedent, qualified immunity is generally not available at all for deliberate indifference claims’ since the Fourth Circuit has held

“when plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to demonstrate an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment, they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity” . . .). However, as already discussed above, here, Plaintiff has not demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Defendants Riddell and Whitaker were deliberately indifferent. Consequently, they are entitled to qualified immunity. In their response to Plaintiff’s objections, the ACDC Defendants also point out that, at the time of Defendants’ conduct, the Short test for deliberate indifference did not exist. And the qualified immunity analysis ‘requires looking to the law at the time of the conduct in question.’ Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 301 (4th Cir. 2021) (emphasis in original). In 2019, ‘[a]n official [was] deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s serious medical needs only when he or she subjectively knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.’ Jackson v. Lightsey, 775 F.3d 170, 178 (4th Cir. 2014). Other courts in this Circuit have found that, for activity that pre-dates Short, officials are entitled to qualified immunity absent an adequate showing on the subjective prong of the prior test-- ‘b]ecause ... plaintiff fails to show any individual defendant acted with a culpable state of mind, reasonable officers in defendants’ positions would not have recognized that their actions violated plaintiff’s clearly established constitutional rights.’ Wright v. Granville Cnty., No. 5:20-CT-03362-M, 2024 WL 1376486 at *21 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 29, 2024); see also Patterson v. Stanly Cnty. Det. Ctr., 2024 WL 1936499 at *10–11 (M.D.N.C. May 2, 2024) (find that to preclude qualified immunity pre-Short it was not enough that a defendant ‘should have recognized their actions were inappropriate; they actually must have recognized their actions were insufficient’ and their response ‘must be more than merely negligent or simply unreasonable’). The court finds persuasive that reasoning and concludes, when looking at the facts of this case in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the absence of evidence on the subjective prong of the pre-Short deliberate indifference test entitles Defendants Riddell and Whitaker to a qualified immunity, as well.”)

Myers v. Town of Elkton, No. 22-CV-803-ABA, 2024 WL 3856755, at *10–11 (D. Md. Aug. 16, 2024) (“[T]he question for qualified immunity purposes as to Plaintiff’s constitutional search claims is this: would a reasonable officer in these or similar circumstances have known that the knock-and-talk exception did not apply to the Myers’ property, such that the law clearly established that entering the Myers’ yard would constitute an unconstitutional search? The answer is no. For starters, the Supreme Court in Jardines made clear in 2013, six years before the events at issue here, that ‘typically’ at least, visitors to a home have an ‘implicit license ... to approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.’ . . . Although that reference specifically envisioned a situation where the home at issue had a ‘knocker on the front door,’ . . . the reasoning was not limited to that specific circumstance. Moreover, ‘[c]omplying with the terms of that traditional invitation does not require fine-grained legal knowledge; it is generally managed without incident by the Nation’s Girl Scouts and trick-or-treaters.’ . . . Both parties argue that Edens, an unpublished Fourth Circuit case from 2004, supports their views that the Officer Defendants’ actions either did or did not violate clearly established law. Edens concerned a rural property that was surrounded by a fence on three sides, and a ‘densely wooded’ lot on the fourth side. . . . Where the fence crossed a driveway, there was a gate that was ‘kept locked,’ and was locked on the day at issue. . . . The issue in Edens was whether an officer could constitutionally enter the property for a ‘knock-and-talk.’. While Edens is on point, it is also both unpublished and predates Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1’s relaxation of the use of unpublished opinions. Thus, it cannot be considered in determining whether a constitutional right was clearly established. . . The parties cite no other relevant United States Supreme Court, Maryland Supreme Court, or Fourth Circuit precedent, and this Court has found none, describing what conditions clearly indicate that an individual has revoked ‘an implicit license ... to approach’ a private dwelling in connection with a constitutional claim. . . Given the longstanding right to knock and talk, and the lack of clearly established limitations that would have led reasonable officers to believe they were prohibited from opening the Myers’ (unlocked) gate and approaching the front door, the Court concludes that even with all reasonable factual inferences from the record drawn in Plaintiff’s favor, the Officer Defendants’ actions did not violate clearly established law and they are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.”)

Wright v. Granville County, No. 5:20-CT-03362-M, 2024 WL 1376486, at *21 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 29, 2024) (“In sum after reviewing the evidence and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to plaintiff, . . . defendants have met their burden of showing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact as to plaintiff’s claims against the individual defendants, . . . but plaintiff fails to ‘come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial[.]’ . . Thus, the individual defendants are entitled to summary judgment. . . Alternatively, as government officials, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from civil damages if their ‘conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . In other words, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity when (1) the plaintiff has not demonstrated a violation of a constitutional right, or (2) the court concludes that the right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the official’s alleged misconduct. . . As noted above, Short announces a new standard for pretrial detainee claims of deliberate indifference in the Fourth Circuit. At the time the events in question occurred, such claims, like those of convicted prisoners, required a subjective showing that the official acted with a ‘sufficiently culpable state of mind,’ . . such that the Short standard was not ‘clearly established[.]’ . . Because, as noted above, plaintiff fails to show any individual defendant acted with a culpable state of mind, reasonable officers in defendants’ positions would not have recognized that their actions violated plaintiff’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . Thus, the individual defendants also are entitled to a finding of qualified immunity.”)

Estate of Brower by O’Brien v. Charleston County, No. 2:23-CV-0216, 2023 WL 5960098, at *4-6 (D.S.C. Sept. 13, 2023) (“The specific question before the Court is whether a reasonable officer in Defendant Kendall’s position would have believed that driving a police vehicle driving at excessive speeds responding to a completely benign 911 call with no threats of violence or harm was permissible under established legal standards. . . . [I]n Browder and in Dean, the Tenth and Fourth Circuits, respectively, concluded that the conduct of an officer traveling at a high rate of speed even though he was not in pursuit of a suspect or responding to an emergency should be assessed under a deliberate indifference standard. . . The fact that there is relatively scant caselaw imposing liability in these specific circumstances does not deprive officers of ‘fair warning that their conduct ... was wrongful.’ . . . Indeed, ‘some things are so obviously unlawful that they don’t require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing.’ . . . The Court concludes, therefore, that in January 2021, it was clearly established that an officer driving at excessive speeds, up to 130 mph, responding to a nonviolent incident could be subject to liability under the Fourteenth Amendment for deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to those around him. A reasonable officer in Defendant Kendall’s position would have realized such conduct was unlawful. Therefore, Defendant Kendall is not entitled to qualified immunity.”) and Eisner on behalf of Estate of Eisner v. Charleston County, No. 2:23-CV-0217, 2023 WL 5960353, at *4-6 (D.S.C. Sept. 13, 2023) (same)

Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *6–8 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) (“Recognizing this poor fit under similar facts, the Sixth Circuit in Estate of Hill v. Miracle ‘suggest[ed] that a more tailored set of factors [than the Graham factors] be considered in the medical-emergency context,’ including whether the person experiencing the emergency could think clearly, whether the person posed an immediate threat of serious harm to himself or others, and, if so, whether some degree of force was necessary to ameliorate that threat. . . . Keeping in mind the ultimate goal of resolving ‘whether the officers’ actions are objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them,’ . . . this Court sees no harm in likewise tailoring its considerations—especially since applying both the Graham and Miracle factors at this stage yields the same result. Accepting the complaint’s factual allegations as true, the three Graham factors weigh heavily in Plaintiffs’ favor. First, the ‘severity’ of any purported crime was low. As discussed above, the allegations portray the incident as primarily a medical emergency—the complaint’s only reference to criminal behavior is a citation to Smith’s autopsy report, which lists two illicit drugs, ‘n-ethylpentalone [and] cocaine,’ as among the causes of death. . . . Second, while Plaintiffs allege that Smith was ‘agitated, afraid, and in the throes of a mental health crisis,’ . . . the complaint does not readily support an inference that Smith ‘pose[d] an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others[.]’ . . . [T]he complaint repeatedly states that Smith was unarmed, nonviolent, and nonthreatening, such that the cadre of eight Officers had no trouble restraining him. . . . Third, although Smith was ‘grunting and groaning and moving his body’ as the Officers applied the hobble, he nonetheless ‘was not actively resisting the Defendants’ or attempting to flee. . . . Thus, under the Graham framework, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers’ behavior was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. What the Graham analysis fails to capture, however, is the urgency of Smith’s medical need, and the potential that some force would become necessary in light of that need. . . . Plaintiffs do not directly dispute the idea that some measure of restraint may have been warranted under the circumstances. Nonetheless, they maintain that the manner in which Smith was restrained—holding him prone on the ground, ‘bending his knees ... until his feet were touching his handcuffed hands at the small of his back,’ while ‘tightening the [hobble] so tight’ that he asphyxiated—was excessive. . . . Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Court agrees. . . . It is plausible that this behavior was unreasonable; even if some use of a restraint was warranted under the circumstances, there was no need to ratchet up the tension on the hobble once Smith—who was not actively resisting in the first place—had been clearly subdued. Thus, even under an analysis more appropriately tailored to the medical-emergency context, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers violated Smith’s right to be free from excessive force. . . . Given the somewhat atypical facts here, the Court cannot locate—and Plaintiffs have not provided—a Fourth Circuit case which is precisely on point. However, the “‘exact conduct at issue need not’” previously have been deemed unlawful for the law governing an officer’s actions to be clearly established.’ . . . That is because ‘[p]recedent involving similar facts can help move a case beyond the otherwise “hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.”’ . . . With that principle in mind, the Court finds that a long line of precedent supports Plaintiffs’ contention that the Officers were on notice that their conduct was unlawful. At the time the allegedly excessive force was deployed against Smith—ratchetting up the tension on the hobble well beyond what was necessary to subdue him—he was secured, unarmed, and nonresistant. . . . As numerous reported cases in this circuit confirm, it is clearly established that the use of ‘unnecessary, gratuitous, and disproportionate force’ against an incapacitated citizen who poses no active threat violates the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases] Defendants argue that the use of a hobble in this case, as opposed to some more familiar weapon or device, meaningfully distinguishes it from the precedent cited above. . . . However, the Fourth Circuit has made it clear that the use of gratuitous force against an unarmed and secured individual is unconstitutional ‘whether arising from a gun, a baton, a taser, or other weapon.’ . . . As alleged in the complaint, the Officers did more than use the hobble to restrain Smith; they ‘violently push[ed] [his] feet toward his back’ and ‘tightened the strap ... so tight’ that he could no longer breathe. . . . The fact that force was exerted through the hobble, rather than a more conventional mechanism, is simply ‘not dispositive.’ . . . In sum, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Officers violated Smith’s clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. At the time of the incident, it was well established that ‘serious physical force... is constitutionally excessive when used against an individual suspected, at most, of a minor crime, who is unarmed, and who does not attempt to flee or physically attack the officer.’ . . . Accordingly, the Officers have not demonstrated that they are entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.”)

Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *16-17 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) (“Having determined that the custody exception has been sufficiently alleged here, the Court must now consider whether, as alleged in the complaint, the Paramedics exhibited deliberate indifference towards Smith’s serious medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Though it is a close question, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged deliberate indifference on the part of the Paramedics. According to the complaint, both Paramedics stood near Smith as he gasped for air. . . . Even after they ‘knew [Smith] was unconscious, unresponsive[,] and not breathing,’ the Paramedics waited more than two minutes before trying to resuscitate him. . . . Any medical professional in the Paramedics’ position should have appreciated the urgency of the situation; with Smith not breathing, time was of the essence. . . . However, as Smith lay there, the Paramedics sat idly by. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, these facts plausibly support the allegation that the Paramedics disregarded a substantial risk of danger to Smith by delaying their resuscitative efforts for more than two minutes after learning that he was unconscious and not breathing. . . . The Paramedics contend that, even if their failure to provide timely aid violated Smith’s rights, they are still entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that their behavior ran contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Once again, Plaintiffs have not identified, nor has the Court been able to locate, a Fourth Circuit case with facts directly on point. However, that does not mean that it would not have been ‘apparent’ to the Paramedics that their behavior was unlawful. The general standard governing liability for the failure to provide medical care in the custodial context—deliberate indifference—has been established for decades. . . . Over time, a wide array of cases have applied the deliberate indifference standard to facts similar to those here. [collecting cases] What these cases and others make clear is that governmental officials responsible for the medical care of a person in their custody may act with deliberate indifference when they (a) recognize that the person is unconscious or not breathing, but (b) allow critical minutes to pass before seeking or rendering aid. . . . In light of the foregoing, it would have been sufficiently clear to government medical personnel in the Paramedics’ position that delaying efforts to resuscitate Smith—for more than two minutes after recognizing that he was unconscious and not breathing—could amount to deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. Accordingly, the Paramedics have not established that they are entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.”) Newhard v. Borders, 649 F.Supp.2d 440, 448, 449 (W.D. Va. 2009) (“First, the Unnamed Officer who allegedly searched through Newhard’s phone after the arrest is entitled to qualified immunity because Newhard’s constitutional right to be free from such a search under the Fourth Amendment was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged misconduct. As an initial matter, it is well established that, subsequent to an arrest, an officer may conduct a warrantless search of an arrestee’s person and the area ‘within his immediate control’ ‘in order to remove any weapons that the [arrestee] might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape,’ or to prevent the concealment and destruction of evidence, without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment. Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 763, 89 S.Ct. 2034, 23 L.Ed.2d 685 (1969). Furthermore, a post-arrest, pre-incarceration inventory search is another ‘well-defined exception to the warrant requirement.’ Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640, 644, 103 S.Ct. 2605, 77 L.Ed.2d 65 (1983). In the Internet age, the extent to which the Fourth Amendment provides protection for the contents of electronic communications (such as images stored on a cell phone) in a search incident to arrest or inventory search is an open question. . . . The Fourth Circuit has held that ‘officers may retrieve text messages and other information from cell phones and pagers seized incident to an arrest’ in order to preserve evidence, see United States v. Murphy, 552 F.3d 405, 411 (4th Cir.2009), and other courts have reached similar conclusions. See, e.g., United States v. Finley, 477 F.3d 250, 259-60 (5th Cir.2007); United States v. Santillan, 571 F.Supp.2d 1093, 1102 (D.Ariz.2008); United States v. Deans, 549 F.Supp.2d 1085, 1093-94 (D.Minn.2008). Under different circumstances, however, other courts have invalidated warrantless searches of cell phones incident to arrest. See, e.g., United States v. McGhee, 2009 WL 2424104, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62427 (D.Neb. July 21, 2009); United States v. Quintana, 594 F.Supp.2d 1291, 1301 (M.D.Fla.2009). But given the Fourth Circuit’s approval of the retrieval of text messages and other information from a cell phone seized incident to an arrest in Murphy and the lack of a clear rule from the Supreme Court or other lower courts regarding with the permissible scope of a search of a cell phone incident to arrest, I cannot conclude that the search conducted by the Unnamed Officer in this case violated any ‘clearly established’ Fourth Amendment right of Newhard’s, or that the purported illegality of the search ‘would have been evident to a reasonable officer based on existing caselaw.’..Under the circumstances alleged in the Amended Complaint, a reasonable officer could have believed that the Unnamed Officer’s search of the cell phone after Newhard’s arrest ‘comported with the Fourth Amendment’ as either a valid search incident to arrest or inventory search.”).

Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615, 649-51 (E.D. Va. 2004) (“Mitchell contends that, because Brown is unable to cite to a case presenting the specific fact pattern in this case, qualified immunity attaches. Thus, according to Mitchell, because there is no precedent finding a sheriff, who runs a jail facility owned by a separate political entity and who has tried to get this separate political entity to improve the facility, liable for an inmate’s death caused by a disease, of a type that the facility has never before experienced, she is entitled to qualified immunity. Mitchell’s argument proves too much. Indeed, to ascertain whether a right is ‘clearly established’ as posited by Mitchell would mean that, until a particular fact pattern (or an almost identical fact pattern) had been judicially determined to infringe a constitutional right and, thereafter, repeated itself, officials would remain immune from Section 1983 liability. [footnote omitted] Contrary, however, to Mitchell’s argument, the nonexistence of controlling authority holding that the defendant’s identical (or virtually identical) conduct is unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity. . . ‘Clearly established’ does not mean that the very actions in question have previously been held unlawful; rather, it merely means that, in light of preexisting law, the unlawfulness of the official’s conduct was reasonably and objectively apparent. . . Qualified immunity is not intended to relieve government officials from the responsibility of applying settled legal principles to new, but reasonably analogous, situations; there need not exist a case on ‘all fours’ with the fact pattern presented by the case under review before Section 1983 liability can attach. . .[footnote omitted] Mitchell’s argument, unfortunately, has come into vogue in this district. Counsel all too often look to, and cite (often out of context), snippets of qualified immunity decisions and not the doctrine of qualified immunity reflected in Fourth Circuit jurisprudence as a whole. That is precisely what Mitchell has done here. As the Court of Appeals recently explained in Parrish, however, the Fourth Circuit rule does not instruct district courts to define the implicated right in terms of decided cases on all fours with the one at issue. And, none of the decisions cited by Mitchell follow the approach that Mitchell urges here. . . . It is undisputed that here, Mitchell knew that the overcrowded conditions at the Jail presented an unacceptably high risk of the spread of contagious disease. A reasonable official, armed with this knowledge, would have realized that housing inmates under such conditions was violative of their rights. And, as explained above, the absence of decisional law containing Mitchell’s precisely posited facts (e.g., a jail facility owned by a separate political entity, a inmate who dies from a disease that the facility has never before experienced, a jailor who has asked the jail owners to fix the facility’s problems) does not entitle her to qualified immunity. Rather, because the applicability of the complained of right on the facts presented here is manifestly apparent from the core constitutional principle, the absence of a case presenting a virtually identical fact pattern to this one is not dispositive. Simply stated, in light of the clearly established legal authority respecting inmates' rights to be housed in prison conditions that meet their basic human needs, a reasonable official in Mitchell's position would have realized that it was a violation of the Constitution to continue to house inmates in a jail that was so grossly overcrowded that it presented an unacceptably high risk of spreading contagious diseases.”).

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Martinez v. Harris County, Texas, No. 24-20194, 2025 WL 914309, at *3 (5th Cir. Mar. 26, 2025) (not reported) (“Martinez’s malicious prosecution claim fails because he cannot demonstrate that Ybarra violated any clearly established law. The Supreme Court first recognized the federal right to be free from malicious prosecution in 2022. Thompson v. Clark, 596 U.S. 36 (2022). The underlying incident in the instant case occurred in 2020. Because this federal right was not recognized until two years later, we hold that Ybarra is entitled to qualified immunity and affirm the district court’s dismissal of Martinez’s malicious prosecution claim.”)

Green v. Thomas, 129 F.4th 877, 884-86, 889-90 (5th Cir. 2025) (“Start with false arrest under the Fourth Amendment. Our precedents make this one simple: ‘There can be no doubt that the right not to be arrested absent probable cause was clearly established at the time of [Green’s] arrest.’ . . . And the requirement of probable cause prior to seizure is so foundational it is in the Fourth Amendment itself. . . . It is hard to imagine a right more clearly established. Next, take due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We have clearly established the right to be free from officers’ witness interference and concealment of exculpatory evidence which results in unlawful arrest, detention, or conviction. . . . An officer ‘cannot avail himself of a qualified immunity defense if he procures false identification by unlawful means or deliberately conceals exculpatory evidence, for such activity violates clearly established constitutional principles.’ . . . And such ‘unlawful means’ include suggestive photo lineups, like ‘prodding the witness[] to select another picture when they had chosen incorrectly.’ . . . Finally, we look at malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. In finding clearly established law, the district court overlooked Espinal v. City of Houston, in which a plaintiff sued officers under § 1983 for malicious prosecution under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . There, the plaintiff ‘was arrested and indicted in 2020,’ like Green, ‘when the constitutional prosecution tort did not exist in our circuit,’ though such a claim now exists. . . . Accordingly, we held, “‘he officers could not possibly have violated clearly established law at the time.’ . . . Our circuit previously suggested ‘[t]he initiation of criminal charges without probable cause may set in force events that run afoul of explicit constitutional protection—the Fourth Amendment if the accused is seized and arrested, for example.’ . . . Seeing no direct conflict between this holding and that of Espinal, the rule of orderliness requires that we follow our circuit’s precedent. . . . We do so here. For Green’s malicious prosecution claim only, Detective Thomas did not violate clearly established law, and she is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Though Detective Thomas contests factual distinctions in the caselaw used by Green, we are not beholden to the cases cited by a plaintiff, . . . and ‘[t]he law can be clearly established “despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court, so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.” . . . Our precedents—regardless of whether they were cited by Green—gave Detective Thomas ‘fair warning’ of Green’s right to be free from false arrest under the Fourth Amendment and his due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We now must determine whether Green sufficiently pleaded that Detective Thomas violated his clearly established rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court found Green’s complaint was sufficient, . . . and we agree. . . . Finally, we turn to Green’s argument that qualified immunity is unlawful. Though recognizing the uphill battle, Green preserves his argument that qualified immunity rests on an erroneous interpretation of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 and is ‘unsound law.’ The district court, agreeing with Green, provided significant background on the doctrine’s faulty underpinnings and effects. . . . But given our role as ‘middle-management circuit judges, we must follow binding precedent.’ . . . The district court is ‘not free to overturn’ our circuit’s precedent, . . . nor are we permitted to overturn the Supreme Court’s. We readily acknowledge the legal, social, and practical defects of the judicially contrived qualified-immunity doctrine, but we are powerless to scrap it. . . . Qualified immunity does not protect government officials ‘who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . Based on the allegations in the complaint, Detective Thomas falls into that camp. Because Green has sufficiently alleged violations of his clearly established Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights—and the independent-intermediary doctrine doesn’t apply—Detective Thomas is not entitled to qualified immunity. However, because a constitutional malicious-prosecution claim did not exist in our circuit at the time of Green’s arrest, Detective Thomas gets qualified immunity for that claim only. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the district court’s denial of qualified immunity for Green’s false arrest and due process claims under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments and REVERSE its denial of qualified immunity for Green’s Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim.”) Bakutis v. Dean, 129 F.4th 299, 307, 309-14 (5th Cir. 2025) (Douglas, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I agree that Dean’s actions, as alleged, constituted an unconstitutional seizure by deadly force. However, the allegations also demonstrate that after failing to corroborate that an armed burglary was in progress, and in fact seeing no signs of a forced entry, Dean illegally entered the curtilage of Jefferson’s home in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Because his actions, as alleged, are not protected by qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent in part. . . . The majority errs by extending the community caretaking doctrine beyond the bounds of precedent. In Caniglia, the Court’s majority opinion suggested only that community caretaking includes ‘providing aid to motorists.’ . . . But the majority avoids this precedent and, in doing so, reaches a circular conclusion. . . . It states that ‘even if the officers suspected criminal activity such as a burglary, the police were not searching Jefferson’s property or home to find evidence of a crime committed by its residents’ because a resident cannot burglarize themselves. . . . Therefore, the argument goes, this must be community caretaking. . . . Even assuming arguendo that this search did fall within the community caretaking exception, . . . this exception is still subject to a typical Fourth Amendment analysis. Indeed, ‘these “caretaking” duties [do not] create[] a standalone doctrine that justifies warrantless searches and seizures in the home.’ . . . Instead, the Court actively limited the exception, opining that even if the exception is proper for vehicles, the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly “declined to expand the scope of ... exceptions to the warrant requirement to permit warrantless entry into the home.”. . . Yet here the majority does exactly that. Accordingly, a Fourth Amendment inquiry would still be necessary. . . . Dean has provided no evidence that an exception to the warrant requirement applies. Without such a showing, Dean cannot defeat the presumption that his conduct violates the Fourth Amendment. . . .The second prong of the qualified immunity analysis requires Bakutis to demonstrate that the law was ‘clearly established at the time of the defendant’s actions.’. . . The majority improperly focuses on the lack of precedent surrounding ‘open structure’ calls. It is true that ‘open structure’ calls are not commonly found in our caselaw. But that, on its own, does not preclude a finding that the constitutional violation was clearly established, especially in light of the police department’s policy to treat such calls as burglaries. . . . Both the majority and Dean argue that, while it is Bakutis’s burden to allege the clearly established prong, the district court reversed the burden, instead ‘reasoning that because the defendant does not cite binding, precedential caselaw that responding to a suspected burglary alone allows an officer to enter the curtilage of a home, that qualified immunity was not warranted.’. . . It is true that the district court stated that ‘Defendant cites no binding authority suggesting that responding to a suspected-burglary-in-process call alone allows an officer to enter the home’s curtilage. Defendant’s reply merely repeats citations to these cases in which other courts have concluded that burglar alarms are sufficient exigencies to justify the warrantless search of a residence.’ But this statement is not what the majority or Dean makes it out to be. A review of the order and its underlying briefing demonstrates that the district court was referring to Dean’s failure to prove that exigent circumstances permitted such an entry. . . . Granted, the district court did not provide much caselaw in support of its finding that a constitutional violation occurred, rather noting that ‘[Bakutis] adequately alleges that [Dean] searched the home’s curtilage without a warrant or justifying exigency.’ The court cited law, some of which was non-binding, supporting the proposition that a warrantless entry onto curtilage violates the Constitution. But the mere fact that the district court did not fully show its work, especially when Bakutis clearly provided binding precedent supporting his position, should not demand a reversal on the merits. Indeed, the district court was presented with caselaw in support of Bakutis’s position. And a review of this caselaw demonstrates that the violation is very much clearly established. . . . Faced with a well-pleaded complaint, the allegations of which we are compelled to accept as fact, the majority looks past Supreme Court precedent to expand the community caretaking exception and reframe it with standards below those applied to criminal defendants. I see no reason to splinter the Fourth Amendment into two analyses—one in criminal contexts and another in community caretaking—in contradiction of established law. Because Dean searched Jefferson’s property without a warrant, and without satisfying any exception to the warrant requirement, Dean is not entitled to qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent.”)

Bailey v. Ramos, 125 F.4th 667, 677-78, 681-84 (5th Cir. 2025) (“[T]he Supreme Court instructs that police officers who ‘reasonably but mistakenly conclude that probable cause is present’ are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . There must ‘not even arguably be probable cause for the ... arrest for the immunity to be lost.’. . . A plaintiff must clear this ‘significant hurdle’ in order to defeat qualified immunity. . . .The district court did not address whether Ramos could have reasonably, although mistakenly, believed that he had probable cause. . . . Assuming that Ramos lacked probable cause, we must still ask whether Ramos ‘could have reasonably thought his actions were lawful,’ even if he was mistaken. . . . [W]hen Bailey continued to talk over the officers’ commands, did not start moving at the same time as Miller, and turned back toward Ramos, an officer in Ramos’s position could have reasonably thought that Bailey was not complying with the order to move behind the line and thus that there was probable cause to believe that Bailey was interfering with a public duty. . . . [W]hen Bailey didn’t immediately move away with Miller, Ramos could reasonably have believed that Bailey, like the plaintiffs in Haggerty and Eisenbach, was ignoring officer instructions to stay away from the crime scene. . . . Because we conclude that Ramos could have reasonably, even if mistakenly, believed that he had probable cause to arrest Bailey for interference with a public duty, he is entitled to qualified immunity as to the unlawful arrest claim. . . . But even if there is a genuine and material fact dispute as to whether the takedown procedure did amount to excessive force, Ramos is still entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of his conduct was not clearly established at the time it occurred. . . . [W]e have ‘frequently held’ that takedown procedures like pushing a suspect and bringing him to the ground are lawful ways to gain control of and arrest a suspect before he has been handcuffed and subdued. . . . Bush does not clearly establish that use of takedown procedures is unlawful when law enforcement hasn’t yet gained control of the suspect. So, even if Bailey wasn’t resisting arrest, as determined above, a reasonable officer could have believed he was refusing to follow instructions and thus needed to be subdued using such measures. . . . [A]lthough Bailey was not actively resisting arrest, he had not given officers an obvious indication that he was subdued, such as kneeling with his hands in the air or lying in the fetal position. Instead, he was on his feet, shouting over officer instructions, and obstructing an active crime scene. Bailey hasn’t pointed to any case saying that officers may not use some force to subdue an arrestee in this situation. . . . [E]ven taking the facts in the light most favorable to Bailey, Ramos pushed Bailey, shoved him to the ground, then stopped the force immediately after Bailey was handcuffed. Bailey cannot point to any case saying that this amount of force was not reasonably necessary to subdue Bailey under the circumstances. We thus cannot say that Ramos’s actions were ‘plainly in conflict with our caselaw at the time of the alleged misconduct.’. Bailey has thus failed to meet his burden to show that it was clearly established at the time of his arrest that Ramos’s takedown maneuver was an unlawful use of force. Accordingly, Ramos is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”) Bailey v. Ramos, 125 F.4th 667, 686-88 (5th Cir. 2025) (Elrod, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I agree with the majority opinion as to all of Bailey’s claims except for the excessive-force claim based on Ramos pushing Bailey, grabbing him around the upper neck and back, and taking him to the ground. In my view, there are genuine disputes of material fact that preclude summary judgment on that excessive-force claim and require us to dismiss that portion of the appeal for lack of jurisdiction. I believe that the majority opinion errs because it does not view these factual disputes in the light most favorable to Bailey. . . . When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Bailey, Ramos’s takedown of Bailey could have violated clearly established law. . . . The majority opinion asserts that Ramos could have reasonably believed that Bailey was not complying with orders and that Ramos’s use of force was thus necessary to gain control of Bailey. However, Bailey’s compliance is in dispute, and ‘[w]e have no more ability to review these factual disputes as to clearly established law than we did as to the constitutional merits—which is to say, none.’ . . Further, disobeying orders generally does not constitute active resistance. . . If Bailey was not dangerous, was not disobeying orders, and was not resisting arrest, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would know that the amount of force used to subdue Bailey was excessive. . . . Simply put, the interlocutory appeal of the excessive-force claim based on Ramos’s takedown maneuver should have been dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. . . Genuine disputes of material fact preclude our jurisdiction over the appeal of this claim and make granting qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage improper. When the facts are properly viewed in the light most favorable to Bailey, a reasonable jury could find that Ramos’s use of force in these circumstances violated clearly established law. I respectfully dissent in part.”)

Stapleton v. Lozano, 125 F.4th 743, 752-53 (5th Cir. 2025) (“The Stapletons’ failure to allege a constitutional violation—the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis—forecloses their ability to succeed on their deliberate-indifference claims against the officers. Even though this alone is enough to reverse the district court’s holding, we also assess whether the constitutional right at issue was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation. . . . The Stapletons attempted to meet this burden in pointing to cases establishing that pretrial detainees have a Fourteenth Amendment right to not have their serious medical needs met with deliberate indifference. . . They also refer to cases holding that a plaintiff can demonstrate a violation of his constitutional rights by showing that the officials refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in any similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for any serious medical needs. . . Broad general propositions, however, are not enough to show that the constitutional right at issue was ‘clearly established.’ . . The Stapletons were required to identify a case in which an officer who did not obtain medical treatment for a detainee exhibiting symptoms consistent with significant intoxication was held to have violated the Constitution. Their failure to provide a factually comparable case forecloses the Stapleton’s ability to overcome the officers’ qualified immunity.”)

Sauceda v. Lopez, 125 F.4th 634, 637-39 (5th Cir. 2025) (“Sauceda contends that qualified immunity should not apply because ‘[t]he law was clearly established ... that entry of the curtilage ... to conduct a warrantless arrest without a valid exception was a violation.’ But Saucedo oversimplifies the relevant question, which is whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment forbade Lopez from opening the unlocked gate, stepping onto the property, and reaching out to arrest Saucedo, who had stood in plain view and argued with Lopez in close proximity to the street. . . . The district court explained that summary judgment is warranted because Saucedo failed to identify any precedent clearly establishing that Lopez arrested him within the curtilage of his home when he stood on his front lawn, behind a chain-link fence, and near the road. Saucedo disputes this deficiency. . . . The previous panel determined that an enclosed area is within the curtilage of a home if it cannot be accessed through an open gate. . . But it just as easily could have concluded that the presence of a gate—whether open or closed—is enough to eliminate any reasonable expectation of privacy. Circuit precedent applying the curtilage factors is ‘sparse,’ and no case was directly analogous. . . In sum, until this litigation, it remained unresolved in this court whether the Fourth Amendment allows law enforcement officers to forego the warrant requirement and arrest a person standing outside of their home, on private property, and on the opposite side of a chain-link fence. A previous panel of this court reversed the district court, which had itself reasonably concluded after closely analyzing the issue that Lopez acted consistent with the Constitution. This is not a case in which ‘every reasonable officer’ would have recognized that his actions violated the Constitution. . . Nor is it an example of ‘plai[n] incompeten[ce].’ . . And there is no argument that Lopez ‘knowingly violate[d] the law.’ . . This is more aptly characterized as a case in which competent, reasonable legal thinkers could (and did) disagree about how to properly apply inconclusive case law.”)

Diaz v. Cantu, 123 F.4th 736, 750 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Diaz argues (1) the right against false imprisonment is clearly established; (2) the contempt statute’s plain text put the commissioners on notice that English Cantu acted without authority; and (3) bystander liability extends to all government officials, not just law-enforcement officers. The law, however, is not clearly established on the third point. Although we have generally used the term ‘officer’ and not ‘law-enforcement officer,’ past by-stander liability cases have dealt exclusively with law-enforcement officers. . . True, we have stated that bystander liability may apply beyond ‘the context of excessive force claims,’ but we interpret that language to refer to the kind of constitutional violations that qualify, not the officials who have a duty to intervene. . . The parties have not identified any bystander liability cases dealing with officials other than law-enforcement officers. At oral argument, Diaz’s counsel all but conceded that we would have to ‘extend’ existing case law to reach the commissioners. Accordingly, these officials were not on notice that they had a duty to intervene even if they might have had clear notice (which we are not holding) that Diaz’s rights were being violated. . . The district court erred in denying qualified immunity based on a supposed duty to intervene.”)

Degenhardt v. Bintliff, 117 F.4th 747, 757-60 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Bintliff and Cisneros simply contend that because they had probable cause to arrest the Degenhardts for possessing alcohol underage, they were free to impound the vehicle without a warrant. But given that the officers did not actually arrest the Degenhardts, probable cause alone was not enough under the community caretaker exception. Because we conclude that Bintliff and Cisneros failed to articulate a lawful justification to seize the vehicle, the Degenhardts have at least stated a claim for a violation of their Fourth Amendment right on this point. The question, then, is whether such right is sufficiently established to defeat qualified immunity. . . We conclude that the answer is ‘no.’ The Degenhardts fail to show that it is clearly established that impounding a vehicle when the available drivers were cited for a crime for which they could be arrested but were not amounted to an unconstitutional seizure. The Degenhardts cite only to caselaw standing for the proposition that an unreasonable seizure is generally unlawful. Such precedent is too general for purposes of qualified immunity. . . Bintliff and Cisneros are therefore entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. . . . As discussed above, Bintliff and Cisneros have failed to articulate a lawful basis to seize the Challenger. The question, then, is whether the probable cause to arrest was nonetheless a non-retaliatory ground sufficient to provoke the officers’ decision to impound the vehicle. It was not, but Bintliff and Cisneros are entitled to a qualified-immunity defense because existing precedent had not ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Most of the caselaw on retaliatory searches and seizures concerns arrests and prosecutions, not retaliatory seizures of property. Indeed, it was only recently that the Supreme Court clarified that ‘probable cause to make an arrest defeats a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for speech protected by the First Amendment.’ . . . Thus, it is not surprising that the Degenhardts only point to caselaw that generally stands for the proposition that an arrest unsupported by probable cause violates the First Amendment. . . . Although our court has indicated that reasonable suspicion is generally also sufficient to defeat retaliatory seizure claims where only a reasonable suspicion is required to lawfully initiate a seizure, . . . we had not clearly addressed whether probable cause to initiate an arrest (i.e., a seizure of a person) is a sufficient reason to seize property in that person’s possession. For the reasons set forth in Section IV, supra, it is not. To defeat a retaliatory seizure claim, the officer must, at the very least, have had a lawful justification to seize the property. . . . Nonetheless, Bintliff and Cisneros are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Degenhardt v. Bintliff, 117 F.4th 747, 760-62 (5th Cir. 2024) (Graves, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I agree with most of the majority’s opinion. But I disagree that Bintliff and Cisneros are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the First Amendment retaliation claim involving the impoundment of the Degenhardts’ vehicle. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from that portion of the opinion. . . . The majority recognizes that the Degenhardts have adequately alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim, and correctly concludes that Bintliff and Cisneros ‘failed to articulate a lawful basis to seize’ the brothers’ vehicle and lacked a ‘non-retaliatory ground sufficient’ to justify its impoundment. . . . But it then charts a different course, concluding that recent caselaw—specifically, Allen v. Cisneros, 815 F.3d 239 (5th Cir. 2016) and Nieves v. Bartlett, 587 U.S. 391, 139 S.Ct. 1715, 204 L.Ed.2d 1 (2019)—cast sufficient uncertainty over whether the seizure of personal property is permissible when probable cause to arrest an individual is present. To be sure, uncertainty in the state of the law can affect the qualified immunity analysis. . . . But neither Nieves nor Allen has any bearing on the unconstitutional nature of Bintliff and Cisneros’s alleged retaliation. Tellingly, neither case offers any insight toward the general context we are confronted with: the seizure of personal property when probable cause is present. Nieves provides that probable cause for an arrest defeats a claim that the arrest was effectuated in retaliation for protected conduct. . . . Allen allows an officer with reasonable suspicion of criminal activity to briefly detain an individual, even if the detainment appears to have been motivated by the individual’s First Amendment activities. . . . The logic underpinning these holdings is straightforward: if there exists an objective justification to detain or arrest an individual, that justification is sufficient to defeat an allegation that the individual’s seizure was retaliatory. But those cases do not suggest that when a lawful justification for seizing an individual is present, a lawful justification for seizing that individual’s personal property simultaneously exists. Nor is that a logical conclusion to reach—especially in the instant case, where the only cognizable justification for seizing the Degenhardts’ vehicle was an unconstitutional one: to punish the brothers for their disrespectful speech. . . . That justification is plainly unconstitutional, and no reasonable officer would find it permissible. . . . Though not dispositive to the above analysis, it is also striking that the unlawful acts that provided probable cause to arrest the Degenhardts—underage possession of alcohol and illegal possession of a vaping device—have scant relation to the property seized—the brothers’ Dodge Challenger. This disconnect makes the vehicle’s seizure all the more egregious, the retaliatory nature of the officers’ alleged actions all the more apparent, and the illegality of the impoundment all the more plain. Simply stated, while probable cause allows police to arrest an individual, it does not, on its own, provide free rein to seize that individual’s personal property. At this early stage, the Degenhardts have adequately stated a claim for a violation of their First Amendment rights as a result of their vehicle’s seizure and impoundment. The recent caselaw that the majority identifies does not cast any uncertainty over the unconstitutionality of the officers’ alleged actions. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from that portion of the majority’s opinion.”)

Ambler v. Nissen, 116 F.4th 351, 363-64 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Although the law can be clearly established ‘despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court,’ . . . relying on generalized principles is not enough: The pertinent decisions must give ‘reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights[.]’ . . . We first address excessive force. Citing Darden v. City of Fort Worth, 880 F.3d at 733–34, the district court held that Nissen violated clearly established law. In Darden, officers performed a no-knock raid to execute a narcotics warrant inside a residence. During his subsequent arrest, arrestee Darden was thrown to the ground, tased, choked, and punched. He was ‘obese’ and died from a ‘heart attack’ during the encounter. . . . Throughout Darden’s arrest ‘other people in the residence were repeatedly yelling that Darden could not breathe.’ . . . A unanimous panel of this court held it clearly established that ‘the degree of force an officer can reasonably employ is reduced when an arrestee is not actively resisting.’ . . . Because Darden was issued years before the relevant encounter here, the district court held that it applied to this case; Nissen, according to the district court, was therefore on notice that it was unlawful to use excessive force against a person who was on the ground, not resisting, and possibly unable to breathe. . . . As explained above, there is a fact dispute about whether Ambler was subdued when Nissen arrived on the scene. If Ambler was indeed compliant and not resisting arrest, then the continued use of force, particularly after Ambler said he had congestive heart failure and could not breathe, necessarily would be excessive. . . . To that end, such a circumstance would, as the district court found, parallel Darden. On that basis, the district court did not commit legal error. . . . Turning last to Plaintiffs’ § 1983 bystander claim on QI’s second prong, the district court held that an officer violates clearly established law in excessive force cases if the officer ‘knew a constitutional violation was taking place and had a reasonable opportunity to prevent the harm.’ . . . In this context, the district court concluded that tasing someone who is subdued and does not pose a threat can constitute excessive force. . . . On appeal, Nissen again points to Ambler’s decision to flee from police by motor vehicle. He contends that no clearly established case put Officer Nissen on notice that the deputies—in subjecting Ambler to a taser and prone restraint after a high-speed chase—violated Ambler’s constitutional rights. But, again, the district court identified a fact dispute about whether Ambler was visibly undergoing a medical emergency when Nissen arrived at the active arrest. It also found a dispute about whether Nissen had time to decide that force was not necessary and try to stop it. . . . If Plaintiffs’ view of the encounter prevails at trial, Nissen had fair notice that participating in another officers’ use of excessive force gives rise to liability. . . The district court did not legally err in reaching that conclusion.”)

Ambler v. Nissen, 116 F.4th 351, 365-67, 369-71, 373 (5th Cir. 2024) (Smith, J., dissenting) (“The majority, albeit with the most wholesome of intentions, preaches that qualified immunity is ‘a defense that shields state officials from being held accountable for their misconduct.’ . . Given that opening, what follows is no surprise. In the wake of a high-speed chase involving three crashes and triple digit speeds, Officer Michael Nissen used a modicum of force to restrain Javier Ambler. Nissen spent about a minute controlling Ambler’s hand—without touching any other part of his body—and then no more than 20 seconds applying pressure to Ambler’s upper back and head. That is hardly anything out of the ordinary, especially in the immediate aftermath of Ambler’s extended and reckless flight from justice that endangered the public, the officers, and Ambler himself. Indeed, that is precisely the type of controlled and measured response we expect from police reacting to a manifestly dangerous suspect. Tragically, in part because of an imperceptible medical condition, Ambler died during the arrest as a result of the restraint. Qualified immunity exists for just this sort of a case. A police officer made an appropriate, split-second judgment about reasonable force in light of the gravity of the situation and is now tied up in a federal lawsuit, facing possible civil damages, because of it. Yet the majority jettisons QI for officers who do just that. Because the majority makes it impossible for officers to receive qualified immunity in cases of accidental death, no matter how reasonable their use of force was in context, I respectfully dissent. . . .If we accept the basic rationale behind qualified immunity, this sort of an accidental-death case is squarely within its heartland. But instead, the majority’s rationale categorically eliminates QI from this set of cases. . . . Nissen should receive qualified immunity from both claims at both prongs of the standard QI analysis. . . Nissen did not use constitutionally excessive force. . . . The majority suggests that there is a genuine dispute of material fact ‘whether a reasonable officer would believe that [Ambler] ... was subdued [or] an immediate threat to safety when Nissen began helping handcuff him.’ . . But this factor—which may or may not be the most important in this context. . . ‘is a question of law left to the court.’ . . And with the benefit of two videos of Ambler’s arrest, this factor readily resolves in favor of Nissen. . . . Because all three Graham factors support Nissen, Ambler’s excessive-force claim fails on the first prong of qualified immunity. . . .The majority separately treats plaintiffs’ claims of deadly force. That methodology is error as a matter of law. Though ‘[c]laims that law enforcement unreasonably utilized deadly force are treated as a special subset of excessive force claims,’ . . . the constitutional inquiry is still governed by the Graham factors. . . .The majority relied on the important decision in Tennessee v. Garner . . . to obscure the relevant analysis. In particular, the majority reads Garner to establish some sort of threshold inquiry in deadly-force cases: ‘Deadly force is objectively unreasonable “unless it is necessary to prevent [a suspect’s] escape and the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.”’ . . That is error twice over. First, the Supreme Court has flatly rejected this errant reading of Garner. . . . Having already applied the Graham factors and found that each one favors Nissen, that ends our inquiry. . . . Whether Nissen heard Ambler does not matter because Nissen could reasonably disregard Ambler’s complaints in the context of his flight. Whether Nissen’s actions did or did not in fact lead to Ambler’s death, as the medical examiner suggested, doesn’t matter because it does not cast doubt on the reasonableness of Nissen’s split-second decisions at the time of the accident. Even Nissen’s admission about the risks of the prone position in the abstract does not matter because of the negligible amount of time Nissen forced Ambler to be quasi-prone in this case. That such a position ‘could be’ dangerous to ‘some people’ ‘depending on the situation’ is not enough to send this case to trial. . . . We should also extend qualified immunity because the law is not clearly established. The majority only gets to ‘clearly established’ by stringing together several cases—none of which contains all the major facts in this case—at an inappropriately high level of generality. But applying the appropriate level of generality is central to this part of the QI inquiry. . . . Recall the high bar required to deny QI: ‘Qualified immunity is justified unless no reasonable officer could have acted as Officer [Nissen] did here, or every reasonable officer faced with the same facts would’ have acted differently. . . . The law is not clearly established because there is no case that is factually similar, even at a low level of generality. The majority fails to identify a single decision that found an excessive-force violation based on (1) controlling a subject in the aftermath of a high-octane chase; (2) let alone an unhandcuffed subject in the aftermath of a high-octane chase; (3) and a subject who crashed and resumed his attempt at escape several times; (4) and whose car had not yet been searched; (5) and who was an exceedingly large individual (6) who’d been able to avoid being handcuffed despite the efforts of multiple able-bodied police officers. Keep in mind this was all over a busted light. Ambler’s desperate attempt to escape suggests any number of additional facts that justify Nissen’s actions. . . . The majority’s opinion serves nobody but this plaintiff. Police will be unduly subject to litigation because of circumstances completely beyond their control. Suspects face greater danger because police now have an incentive to use deadly force instead of de-escalating. Because Officer Nissen acted as would any reasonable officer in this tricky, high-stakes, split-second situation, I respectfully dissent.”)

Terrell v. Allgrunn, 114 F.4th 428, 439 (5th Cir. 2024) (“The district court denied Allgrunn summary judgment on the Terrells’ malicious prosecution claims. . . . We reverse and render judgment in favor of Allgrunn. Fifth Circuit case law between 2003 ... and 2021 ... explicitly denied the possibility of a constitutional malicious prosecution claim. When evaluating whether [Allgrunn] violated clearly established law for purposes of our qualified immunity analysis, we consider whether the law was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct. . . . Since the events here occurred in 2019, the law putatively supporting the Terrells’ claims was not clearly established at the time. Plaintiffs maintain that Bledsoe v. Willis, No. 23-30238, 2023 U.S. App. LEXIS 31326, 2023 WL 8184814 (5th Cir. Nov. 27, 2023) (per curiam) (unpublished), distinguishes Guerra. And indeed, it purports to. But Bledsoe’s attempt to convince us that Guerra does not say what it unambiguously does say is unconvincing. Bledsoe is unpublished and therefore not binding precedent. We decline to follow it, and, instead, we reverse and render judgment for Allgrunn.”)

Stevenson v. Tocé, 113 F.4th 494, 503-05 (5th Cir. 2024) (“The Defendants argue that Stevenson failed to identify any ‘cases that require [a prisoner] to be referred to an outside surgeon rather than the orthopedic specialist’ or that entitle a prisoner to ‘the duty status [he] prefers.’ The Supreme Court has instructed courts to not ‘define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . . Rather, precedent must speak to ‘the violative nature of [the] particular conduct’ and ‘the specific context of the case.’ . . . That means plaintiffs must point to ‘similar circumstances’ rather than ‘generalized proposition[s]’ to show that caselaw established particular conduct as unlawful. . . . Still, the Defendants’ framing is too narrow. A plaintiff need not show that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . . . The test is whether every reasonable official would know that their actions are unconstitutional. . . . At the end of the day, ‘[t]he sine qua non of the clearly-established inquiry is “fair warning.”’ . . . To require Stevenson to produce cases about broken surgical screws or orthopedic surgeons is more than necessary for fair warning. There are cases enough establishing the Defendants’ alleged acts as clearly unconstitutional. . . . These cases gave the Defendants fair warning. They should have known from Easter that they had a duty to try to provide effective treatment for the broken screws. They should have known from Carlucci that they could not ignore a medical recommendation or rely on a temporary solution that is clearly insufficient to meet their patient’s need. The Defendants say these cases do not tell them ‘what measures [they] were required to take once they learned of the broken screws.’ We disagree. The cases provide an answer that should have been obvious: fix the screws. As for Stevenson’s duty status claim, we look to Jackson v. Cain. There, a prisoner brought an Eighth Amendment claim based on work duties he claimed were ‘inappropriate to his medical condition.’ . . . He specifically alleged that officials knew he suffered from syphilis and knew that exposure to sunlight would hinder his treatment but still forced him to work in the sun. . . . We concluded that those allegations amounted to deliberate indifference. Stevenson’s medical condition is different, but his circumstances are essentially the same. He alleges that the Defendants knew of the broken screws and knew that field labor was likely to worsen his condition and cause him severe pain but still forced him to do it. Jackson clearly established that such circumstances, if proven true, violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . Consequently, Stevenson has sufficiently alleged that the Defendants violated his Eighth Amendment rights through actions that, at the time, were clearly established as unconstitutional.”)

Ramirez v. Killian, 113 F.4th 415, 423-26 (5th Cir. 2024) (“We need not reach the more difficult question, reading the evidence in the light most favorable to Ramirez and Gonzales, whether exigent circumstances had in fact dissipated. . . . That is because, regardless, the putative legal rule that Ramirez and Gonzales urge—that dissipation can occur mere minutes after the sounds of an emergency are last heard—was not clearly established at the time. The cases that Ramirez and Gonzales cite where courts have found that exigent circumstances had dissipated are readily distinguishable. . . . None of these opinions would have put a reasonable officer on notice that entering a home after a few minutes of silence following the sounds of a fight, which corroborated an earlier tip, violated the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, the district court correctly held that Killian was entitled to qualified immunity on the warrantless-entry claim at summary judgment. . . . The use of force that Ramirez and Gonzales allege that Killian engaged in here was unlawful under clearly established law. . . The excessive-force claims should not have been dismissed at summary judgment. They should have gone to trial.”)

Hankins v. Wheeler, 109 F.4th 839, 851-52 (5th Cir. 2024) (“We do not otherwise see salient features of the cases we have identified as setting out clearly established law that would favor defendants but, to the extent there are any, they would be outweighed by two features of this case. First, the undisputed fact that Hankins approached Wheeler to ask for help finding a lost chihuahua. In the Hill and Alexander cases cited by Hankins, there were—unlike an affirmative approach for assistance here—elements of evasion such as quickly exiting a car upon observing police (Hill) and looking around, seeing police, and driving away (Alexander). That we concluded there was no reasonable suspicion in those cases despite what could be considered furtive evasiveness makes the impermissibility of a stop based on the factors here even more stark. Second, Hankins’ disputed testimony that Officer Wheeler said the group was stopped because they were ‘three young men, in a nice car, in this neighborhood.’ In the cases cited by Hankins, we concluded there was no reasonable suspicion even without a contemporaneous explanation from the officer performing the stop that amounted to no more than an impermissible hunch. And the throughline—the quintessential clearly established law—of our highly fact-intensive jurisprudence is that such stops, based on ‘inchoate and unparticularized suspicion,’ are unlawful.”)

Bevill v. Wheeler, 103 F.4th 363, 379-80 (5th Cir. 2024) (“On this instant record, Bevill has borne his summary judgment burden relative to establishing that he suffered a deprivation of his First Amendment rights. We next turn to the second step of our qualified immunity analysis, and ask whether it would have been apparent to reasonable officials holding Defendants-Appellants’ positions at the time of the alleged violation that Defendants-Appellants’ conduct violated the First Amendment. . . . In this appeal, Mayor Dobbs argues that the district court erred in determining that, at the time of Bevill’s termination, there was clearly established law indicating that terminating the employment of a similarly situated individual acting under similar circumstances would violate that individual’s First Amendment rights. According to Dobbs, the relevant circumstances involve a police captain knowingly violating a departmental procedure—by voluntarily signing an affidavit without regard for the truthfulness of the sworn statements contained therein—to assist a friend in obtaining a continuance of a criminal trial date. We agree with the district court that Bevill is not required to point to a case with such rigid factual analogies, and that existing precedent provided sufficient notice to Dobbs that a public employee’s opinion testimony alleging governmental misconduct, made as a citizen in a judicial proceeding, is protected speech. As the district court explained, this court held in Kinney that it was clearly established that ‘[t]estimony in judicial proceedings is inherently of public concern.’. . . We further noted, in Kinney, that ‘it is well-established in the jurisprudence of both the Supreme Court and this court that official misconduct is of great First Amendment significance.’. . . Considering these principles, plus our prior holding in Bevill I that Kinney is sufficiently factually similar to the case at bar to clearly establish Bevill’s First Amendment rights, we find that Mayor Dobbs had ‘fair warning’ that terminating Bevill for providing opinion testimony alleging official misconduct in a judicial proceeding would violate Bevill’s First Amendment rights. . . Turning to Bevill’s conspiracy claim, which applies to all Defendants-Appellants in this appeal, we note that in Bevill I, we addressed Bevill’s conspiracy claim against Judge Fletcher, Sheriff Castloo, and DA Wheeler, and, in affirming the denial of their motions to dismiss, held that Kinney ‘clearly establishes the right of a plaintiff to be free from governmental officials’ exerting their power or influence over a third-party employer to cause the plaintiff to be terminated for exercising his First Amendment rights.’ . . In its subsequent order denying Defendants-Appellants’ motions for summary judgment, the district court, considering the evidence in the light most favorable to Bevill, concluded that sufficient evidence exists for a jury to conclude that Defendants-Appellants did, in fact, influence Bevill’s employer—QPD—to terminate him. As discussed above, we lack jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal to review this sufficiency-of-the-evidence assessment. Considering that (1) this court already substantively addressed whether an agreement to terminate Bevill would constitute a violation of his clearly established constitutional rights, and (2) the district court determined that there is a genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether such an agreement, in fact, existed, we reaffirm our holding in Bevill I that Defendants-Appellants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Bevill’s conspiracy claim.”)

Espinal v. City of Houston, 96 F.4th 741, 748-49 (5th Cir. 2024) (“From 2003 to 2021, our court ‘explicitly denied the possibility of a constitutional malicious prosecution claim.’ . . Times have changed. In 2022, the Supreme Court ‘held that litigants may bring a Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution claim under § 1983.’ [citing Thompson] We have since acknowledged that the Court’s ‘clear recognition of the constitutional tort of malicious prosecution’ overruled our precedent to the contrary. . . . Espinal fails on the second prong of qualified immunity. At that step, we ask whether the defendants violated law that was clearly established at the time of their actions. . . Subsequent legal developments are immaterial. . . Espinal was arrested and indicted in 2020, when the constitutional malicious prosecution tort did not exist in our circuit. . . So, the officers could not possibly have violated clearly established law at the time. . . Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity as to Espinal’s malicious prosecution claim.”)

Jimerson v. Lewis, 94 F.4th 423, 428-30 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Lewis does not challenge the district court’s analysis of whether defendants violated the plaintiffs’ rights under federal law. . . . The Supreme Court has held that officers must make ‘reasonable effort[s] to ascertain and identify the place intended to be searched’ in order to comply with the Fourth Amendment. . . To be clear about an occasional irrelevant addition to the proper analysis, we do not consider whether the officer’s actions were ‘objectively unreasonable.’ That quoted standard is a ‘vestige of older caselaw that predates the Supreme Court’s current test.’ Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400, 406 n.1 (5th Cir. 2023). In another precedential rejection of an ‘objectively unreasonable’ component of qualified immunity, we held there is no ‘standalone “objective reasonableness” element to the Supreme Court’s two-pronged test for qualified immunity.’ Baker v. Coburn, 68 F.4th 240, 251 n.10 (5th Cir. 2023). We evaluate the reasonableness of Lewis’s actions because the plaintiffs’ claims arise under the Fourth Amendment. The district court denied qualified immunity because the court found a ‘genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether [Lewis] made the necessary reasonable efforts to identify the correct residence.’ As we stated earlier, we cannot review a district court’s determination that a factual dispute is genuine. . . We are to decide, though, legal significance, i.e., whether disputed facts are material to resolution of the case. . . The district court did not find evidentiary disputes about what Lewis and others did before entering the incorrect house. The court stated that the central dispute was whether those actions constituted ‘necessary reasonable efforts.’ Certainly, unlike here, exactly what an officer did may sometimes be factually unclear. A court’s determination of reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment, though, “‘is predominantly an objective inquiry.’” . . The circumstances are to be ‘viewed objectively’ and a determination made of whether they ‘justify’ the search. . . Consequently, as a legal issue for our de novo review, we consider whether Lewis’s conduct violated clearly established law. . . Clearly established law is determined by reference to ‘controlling authority[,] or a robust consensus of persuasive authority.’ . . The keystone in this analysis is fair warning. . . To overcome qualified immunity, plaintiffs must cite ‘a body of relevant case law [] in which an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated’ a defendant’s constitutional rights. . . . Compliance with the Fourth Amendment requires a law enforcement officer’s ‘reasonable effort[s] to ascertain and identify the place intended to be searched.’ . . In applying that general principle, the district court relied on two opinions. One was a nonprecedential opinion of this court. Rogers v. Hooper, 271 F. App’x 431 (5th Cir. 2008). The other was nonprecedential in the Fifth Circuit because it was issued by a different circuit court of appeals. Hartsfield v. Lemacks, 50 F.3d 950 (11th Cir. 1995). . . The plaintiffs do not cite any other authority. . . . The dissent argues Hartsfield and Rogers constitute clearly established law that distinguishes Lewis’s actions as objectively unreasonable under the fair warning analysis. Even if these two nonprecedential opinions were indicative of clearly established law, they would not support that Lewis violated that law. Lewis erred, but he made significant efforts to identify the correct residence. . . . Here, the plaintiffs have not cited authority demonstrating that Lewis’s conduct violated clearly established law.”)

Jimerson v. Lewis, 94 F.4th 423, 430-34 & n.1 (5th Cir. 2024) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent from the majority opinion. The district court properly denied qualified immunity to Lieutenant Mike Lewis, commander of the Waxahachie Police Department (WPD) SWAT team. The Jimersons’ Fourth Amendment claim against Lewis is based on his failure to take sufficient steps to ensure that his team executed a no-knock warrant at the correct address. The district court found that factual disputes as to the reasonableness of Lewis’ efforts to identify the target house precluded granting qualified immunity to Lewis. While I agree with the majority’s finding that there are no factual disputes as to Lewis’ actions in leading the SWAT team to the wrong residence, I disagree that Lewis is entitled to qualified immunity¹ under clearly established law. [fn. 1: It’s worth noting that one of our colleagues recently suggested that ‘the Supreme Court’s original justification for qualified immunity—that Congress wouldn’t have abrogated common-law immunities absent explicit language—is faulty because the 1871 Civil Rights Act expressly included such language.’ Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 980 (5th Cir. 2023) (Willett, J., concurring); see also Alexander A. Reinert, Qualified Immunity’s Flawed Foundation, 111 Cal. L. Rev. 201, 207–08 (2023) (arguing that ‘the problem with current qualified immunity doctrine is not just that it departs from the common law immunity that existed when Section 1983 was enacted,’ but also that ‘no qualified immunity doctrine at all should apply in Section 1983 actions, if courts stay true to the text adopted by the enacting Congress and other evidence of legislative intent.’.)]. . . Though it is undisputed that Lewis violated the Jimersons’ Fourth Amendment rights in executing a SWAT-style entry into their home without a warrant, the majority finds that the Jimersons’ claim fails because the unlawfulness of Lewis’ actions were not clearly established law. . . Specifically, the majority concludes that there is not enough legal authority supporting the Jimersons’ contention that Lewis’ efforts to locate the target residence were constitutionally deficient. While the majority is certainly correct that ‘[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right,’ . . . they nonetheless unfairly limit the legal authority the Jimersons may rely on in rebutting Lewis’ assertion of qualified immunity. The ‘focus’ of the qualified immunity analysis is whether the officer had ‘fair notice’ that his conduct was unlawful, and here the clearly established law gave Lewis ample warning of the constitutionally sufficient efforts required to ensure he directed the SWAT team to the correct residence. . . In light of the efforts identified as adequate by the Supreme Court in Garrison and elaborated on by circuit courts, Lewis had ‘fair notice’ of the minimum efforts required to comply with the Fourth Amendment when identifying a house for the purposes of executing a search warrant. . . In light of clearly established law, as announced in Garrison and elucidated in Rogers and Hartsfield, it is ‘beyond debate’ that Lewis’ efforts to identify the target house were constitutionally deficient. . . The panel should affirm the district court’s denial of Lewis’ assertion of qualified immunity.”) Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 94 F.4th 374, 395-96 (5th Cir. 2024) (en banc), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663 (2024) (per curiam) (“Villarreal cites no case, nor are we aware of one, where the Supreme Court, or any other court, has held that it is unconstitutional to arrest a person, even a journalist, upon probable cause for violating a statute that prohibits solicitation and receipt of nonpublic information from the government for personal benefit. Under the normal standards of qualified immunity, no ‘clearly established law’ placed the officers on notice of Villarreal’s First Amendment right not to be arrested. Villarreal, however, relies on Eighth Amendment cases where the Supreme Court denied qualified immunity for deliberate indifference to unconstitutional prison conditions and declined to scrutinize the cases fact-specifically. [citing Hope, Taylor, and McCoy] Hope and its progeny express a general, but decidedly narrow, obviousness exception to the requirement that ‘clearly established law’ be founded on materially identical facts. In any event, those cases are inappropriate templates for describing ‘clearly established’ law in this context. In Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 373 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc), a case involving First Amendment free exercise rights, this court noted that Hope does not stand for the broad proposition that plaintiffs need not offer any similar cases to prove that an officer should have been on notice that his conduct violated the Constitution. Hope does not excuse plaintiffs from proving that every reasonable official would know the conduct at issue violates the Constitution. And Sause, if anything, also strongly implies that an individual’s claimed First Amendment rights must be closely analyzed when the question involves probable cause for an arrest, or an officer’s qualified immunity. . . Consequently, we adhere to the general rule that for an asserted right to be clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, it must ‘have a sufficiently clear foundation in then-existing precedent’ that it is ‘settled law.’ . . . The law is not clearly established if referenced cases are ‘materially distinguishable and thus do[] not govern the facts of this case.’ . . . Villarreal identifies a general First Amendment principle—that a third party may publish sensitive government information already in the public domain—as evidence that the officer defendants violated clearly established law by arresting her with a warrant upon probable cause for violating section 39.06. But the alleged unlawfulness of the defendants’ conduct here ‘does not follow immediately,’ or even secondarily, from the cases Villarreal cites.”)

Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 94 F.4th 374, 412-14 (5th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Ho, J. joined by Elrod, Graves, Higginson, Willett, and Douglas, JJ., dissenting), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663 (2024) (per curiam) (“This should’ve been an easy case for denying qualified immunity. The First Amendment obviously protects the freedom of speech. That protection has long been incorporated against state and local governments under the Due Process Clause. And it should go without saying that the freedom of speech includes not only the right to speak, but also the right to criticize as well as the right to ask questions. Indeed, the First Amendment expressly protects not only ‘the freedom of speech’ but also ‘the right ... to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.’ . . . It would make no sense for the First Amendment to protect the right to speak, but not to ask questions—or the right to petition the government for a redress of grievances, but not for information. It should be obvious, then, that citizens have the right to ask questions and seek information. . . . The fact that the question or request for information happens to be directed to a police officer does not change the equation. . . . It should have been obvious to Defendants, then, that they were violating Villarreal’s First Amendment rights when they arrested and jailed her for asking a police officer for information. And that should be devastating to their claim of qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has made clear that public officials who commit obvious constitutional violations are not entitled to qualified immunity. In fact, the Court has repeatedly reversed circuits, including ours, for granting qualified immunity for obvious violations of constitutional rights. See, e.g., Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002); Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. 7, 9, 141 S.Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020). The majority responds that the standard articulated in Hope and Taylor doesn’t apply here, because those cases arose under the Eighth Amendment, not the First Amendment. . . . But that would treat the First Amendment as a second-class right. Nothing in § 1983 suggests that courts should favor the Eighth Amendment rights of convicted criminals over the First Amendment rights of law-abiding citizens. Nothing in Hope or Taylor indicates that those decisions apply only to prison conditions. And no other circuit takes the approach urged by our colleagues in the majority. To the contrary, nine circuits have indicated that the standards articulated in Hope apply specifically in the First Amendment context. [collecting cases] So I would apply Hope and Taylor in the First Amendment context.”)

McNeal v. LeBlanc, 90 F.4th 425, 433 (5th Cir. 2024), reh’g and reh’g en banc denied, 93 F.4th 840 (5th Cir., 2024), cert. denied, No. 24-19 (U.S. Oct. 7, 2024) (“We held in Parker that by the fall of 2017 our law was ‘clear that a jailer like LeBlanc ha[d] a duty to ensure inmates [were] timely released from prison.’ . . . At the time of the overdetention in Parker, there was ‘sufficient clearly established law regarding the constitutional right to a timely release from prison.’ . . . LeBlanc therefore had ‘fair warning that his failure to address’ overdetention at the DPSC ‘would deny prisoners ... their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction.’ . . . LeBlanc’s alleged deliberate indifference thus violated the prisoner’s clearly established right to a timely release. . . . Parker constrains us to reach the same result in this case. McNeal’s alleged overdetention occurred in the fall of 2017, the same period the overdetention occurred in Parker. As in Parker, LeBlanc at that point had ‘fair warning that his failure to address’ rampant overdetention in the DPSC ‘would deny prisoners like [McNeal] their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction.’ . . . Therefore, we are bound to follow that panel’s decision at prong two of qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, under our precedents, the district court did not err in denying LeBlanc qualified immunity at this stage.”)

Banks v. Herbrich, 90 F.4th 407, 415-17 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Our precedent clearly establishes that removal of a child without parental consent, court order, or exigent circumstances violates the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . Contrary to DFPS’s claim, our precedent does not require that the district court identify caselaw holding that an emergency child removal was specifically unconstitutional under similar circumstances, nor does it require a case directly on point. . . . Accordingly, this argument lacks merit. . . . Here, there is no question, based on the ample precedent before us, that the constitutional rights of a child and his parents are violated when the government seizes the child absent consent, court order, and exigent circumstances. Moreover, exigent circumstances have been clearly defined at least since Gates in 2008 to require imminent danger of physical or sexual abuse. . . . That evidence is entirely absent here. . . . Turning to the district court’s reliance on the internal policies of DFPS, specifically the Gates Memo, we find no error. . . . The district court permissibly consulted the Gates Memo in the context of notice and found that DFPS’s conduct contradicts it. . . . Under our current caselaw, violations of internal procedures or policies are insufficient to give rise to constitutional violations. . . . But when properly supported by precedent, these internal procedures bolster a finding that defendants had ‘fair and clear warning’ of the clearly established right at issue. . . . Thus, the district court properly concluded that the Gates Memo undercut DFPS’s argument that exigent circumstances existed warranting removal. . . . In sum, relying on our ample precedent outlining the contours of the constitutional rights at issue, bolstered by DFPS’s own internal memo to its employees clarifying the higher burden for emergency removals following Gates, we conclude that DFPS’s conduct violated the clearly established rights of R.B. and Banks. This precludes the defense of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage as to Herbrich and Williams.”)

Bledsoe v. Willis, No. 23-30238, 2023 WL 8184814, at *6–7 (5th Cir. Nov. 27, 2023) (not reported) (“[W]e address whether Willis and McClure are entitled to qualified immunity based on clearly established law.⁴ [fn. 4: Bledsoe claims, pursuant to § 1983, that Willis and McClure violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Willis and McClure moved for dismissal before the Supreme Court issued Thompson v. Clark and did not seek to revise their motion once that opinion was issued. Furthermore, on appeal, Willis and McClure do not discuss whether a Fourth Amendment claim for malicious prosecution under §

1983 is clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity.] As we must, we acknowledge this court's recent decision in Guerra, 82 F.4th 278, that was issued after the district court's decision. In Guerra, this court affirmed a district court's 12(b)(6) dismissal of a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim 'because this court's caselaw explicitly disclaimed the existence of a constitutional claim for malicious prosecution at the time of [plaintiff's] alleged conduct in 2018 and 2019 [i.e., before Thompson v. Clark, 596 U.S. 36 (2022)].' . . . Nonetheless, as Guerra explained, this court has stated repeatedly that the 'Fourth Amendment right to be free from arrest without probable cause is clearly established.' . . . Indeed, this court has found that an officer was 'not entitled to qualified immunity' because the plaintiff alleged that the officer 'violated the Fourth Amendment by signing objectively unreasonable arrest-warrant affidavits.' . . . Long before the conduct at issue in this case, it was 'clearly established that a defendant's Fourth Amendment rights are violated if (1) the affiant, in support of the warrant, includes "a false statement knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth" and (2) "the allegedly false statement is necessary to the finding of probable cause."' . . . Accepting Bledsoe's complaint as true, and determining that Willis and McClure are not shielded by qualified immunity, the district court found the following:

[T]he crux of Bledsoe's claim is that the trial court judge was not privy to the full scope of information available during the criminal investigation and that this incomplete information was the direct result of Willis and McClure's recklessness and failure to disclose material information. Bledsoe plausibly alleges that an arrest warrant would not have been issued but for the reckless investigation that omitted exculpatory evidence regarding the source of the blood and Bledsoe's contract with Port City Realty.

We agree with the district court based on the prevailing precedent in the Supreme Court and this circuit. Although this court did not recognize a 'freestanding constitutional right to be free from malicious prosecution' at the time of Willis's and McClure's investigation, we must recognize that ' "the initiation of criminal charges without probable cause may set in force events that run afoul of explicit constitutional protection—the Fourth Amendment if the accused is seized and arrested, for example." ' .⁵ [fn. 5: See, also e.g., Caskey v. Fenton, No. 22-3100, 2022 WL 16964963, at *11 (6th Cir. Nov. 16, 2022) (rejecting the qualified immunity defense regarding clearly established law for § 1983 malicious prosecution claims); Crider v. Williams, No. 21-13797, 2022 WL 3867541, at *8 (11th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) (same).] Even before Thompson, the Supreme Court considered whether a plaintiff had plausibly stated a Fourth Amendment claim when he was arrested and charged with unlawful possession of a controlled substance based on false reports written by a police officer and an evidence technician. See, e.g., Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 580 U.S. 357, 360 (2017). There, the Court said the plaintiff's 'claim fits the Fourth Amendment, and the Fourth Amendment fits [the plaintiff's] claim, as hand in glove.' . . . And the Court held 'that the Fourth Amendment governs a claim for unlawful pretrial detention even beyond the start of legal process.' . . . Here, Bledsoe's claim turns on the Fourth Amendment because he alleges that Willis and McClure 'caused the arrest and commencement of criminal proceedings against [him] without sufficient probable cause based on a clearly deficient investigation.' Thus, the Supreme Court's and our court's precedent clearly establish Bledsoe's alleged constitutional violation for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Bledsoe plausibly alleges federal and state claims of malicious prosecution against Willis and McClure, and that at the motion to dismiss stage, Bledsoe overcomes the qualified immunity defense.”)

Bailey v. Iles, 87 F.4th 275, 287-90 (5th Cir. 2023) (on denial of pet. for rehearing and rehearing en banc) [case involved arrest of Bailey for Facebook post joking that sheriff’s office had issued order to shoot anyone infected with Covid-19] (“Iles is ‘entitled to qualified immunity unless there was no actual probable cause for the arrest’ and he was ‘objectively unreasonable in believing there was probable cause for the arrest.’ . . . Having determined that there was no actual probable cause for the arrest, we hold that Iles is not entitled to qualified immunity because he was ‘objectively unreasonable’ in believing otherwise. In other words, Iles is not entitled to qualified immunity because no reasonable officer could have found probable cause to arrest Bailey for violating the Louisiana terrorizing statute in light of the facts, the text of the statute, and the state case law interpreting it. Iles appears to argue that the law was not clearly established, and that he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity, because there is no Fifth Circuit precedent addressing warrantless arrests pursuant to the Louisiana terrorizing statute. But Bailey does not have to identify such a case to defeat qualified immunity. First, it is beyond debate that ‘[a] warrantless arrest without probable cause violates clearly established law defining an individual’s rights under the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Second, whether it was ‘objectively reasonable’ for Iles to believe there was probable cause is ‘assessed in light of legal rules clearly established at the time of the incident,’ which includes the statute’s text and state case law interpreting it. . . . As explained above, at the time of the incident the text of the terrorizing statute and state case law interpreting it made it clear that there was no probable cause here. Tellingly, while Bailey cites to multiple Louisiana cases supporting his interpretation of the statute, Iles cites to no Louisiana case law interpreting the statute otherwise. . . . Further, Bailey has shown that Iles is not entitled to qualified immunity as to the First Amendment claim. Based on decades of Supreme Court precedent, it was clearly established that Bailey’s Facebook post did not fit within one of the narrow categories of unprotected speech, like incitement or true threats. . . . Thus, when Iles arrested Bailey, he violated Bailey’s clearly established First Amendment right to engage in speech even when some listeners consider the speech offensive, upsetting, immature, in poor taste, or even dangerous. . . . The district court erred in concluding otherwise.”)

Hicks v. LeBlanc, 81 F.4th 497, 504 (5th Cir. 2023) (“[I]t is clearly established that inmates have the right to timely release from prison consistent with the terms of their sentences, a holding we have long-held and repeatedly reaffirmed. . . . Relevant here, the right to timely release was clearly established well before 2017. . . . And, Hicks’ right to timely release was clearly established under these particular circumstances because governing law required DPSC to follow the state court’s orders requiring them to credit the Arkansas time.”)

Babinski v. Sosnowsky, 79 F.4th 515, 521-24 (5th Cir. 2023) (“Traditionally, a student’s procedural due process claim falls within one of two arenas—academic deficiencies or disciplinary misconduct. . . . The unique factual scenario here does not fit squarely into either category. In his complaint, Babinski alleges that his de facto expulsion is more tantamount to a disciplinary decision, and the district court construed his claims as such. To be sure, the chain of events certainly begins with an academic exercise, including his completion of a paper, obtaining a grade, and disputing the grade. His federal lawsuit, however, does not challenge or focus on the grade he received, nor does he allege that it was the crux of his de facto expulsion. He instead pleads that his de facto expulsion derives from the views that he expressed in his paper. Specifically, he takes issue with the Professors' conduct in response to his paper, such as their actions after issuing his failing grade that effectively froze him out of his chosen discipline. These actions include the secret meeting at which they refused to teach him in the theatre program and their individual and collective efforts to intentionally withhold information from him to ensure his departure from the program. Given these facts and accepting Babinski's de facto expulsion allegations as true, as we must at this stage, we assume, without deciding, that Babinski has pleaded a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment due process protections. . . But our inquiry does not end here. To defeat qualified immunity, Babinski must satisfy the clearly established prong of the analysis. . . As we will explain, he fails to satisfy his burden by misconstruing caselaw at too high a level of generality. . . . Both Goss and Plummer solidify that students, like Babinski, have a Fourteenth Amendment right to some degree of procedural due process before or shortly after university officials take certain adverse actions against them. . . But both of Babinski's proffered cases miss the mark by failing to address conduct like the Professors' in this case. Absent an appropriately analogous case of greater specificity, we cannot uphold the district court's denial of qualified immunity. . . . Babinski is asking us to do precisely what the Walsh panel refused to do: hold that his right to a meaningful opportunity to be heard put the Professors on notice that their conduct in this case was unconstitutional. Id. at 487 ("Nor can we hold, as Walsh contends, that a meaningful opportunity to be heard should have put Defendants on notice that their actions were unlawful." (internal quotation omitted)). Babinski's argument gains no more traction here than Walsh's did there for precisely the same reason: he cannot point to any controlling caselaw that would have put the Professors on notice that his due process rights were violated in a similar procedural context. In other words, against the Rule 12(b)(6) backdrop, Babinski concedes that he was never expressly expelled from the university. His pleadings likewise acknowledge that, after he alleges that he was de facto expelled, he continued to enroll in courses and ultimately obtained his degree from the university. But we have no caselaw 'that speaks directly to the procedures necessary' to protect a student who claims he was de facto expelled from a university, yet continued to enroll in classes and receive a degree from the same university after the point in time that he alleges he was de facto expelled. . . As the Walsh panel explained, the clearly established standard requires more than that—there must be a 'high degree of specificity' between the alleged misconduct and the caselaw purporting to clearly establish the violation. . . Without it, the requisite 'fair warning' required under the clearly established inquiry is absent. . . For these reasons, we hold that the Professors lacked adequate notice that their conduct was violative of Babinski's constitutional rights and because they did not have this notice, they are entitled to qualified immunity.") interests in her speech. . . Not only would a public Facebook post about running over Black Lives Matter protestors pose a threat to amicable workplace relationships, it strikes a blow against the Twenty-First Judicial District by undermining its efforts to stay true to the fact and image of a court whose ‘paramount purpose [is] providing a fair and impartial open forum in which the public may resolve its disputes.’. . Adding Chief Judge Morrison’s substantial interest in maintaining workplace trust and efficiency and responding to threats to office morale, the balance weighs against McLin. In other words, McLin did not show that Chief Judge Morrison violated a clearly established constitutional right. For at the very least, the law is sufficiently uncertain so as to support Chief Judge Morrison’s defense of qualified immunity. . . This public servant cannot be held personally liable in money damages for the difficult choice he was called upon to make and that is the issue before this court. The district court did not err in granting Chief Judge Morrison’s qualified immunity defense against McLin’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”) Boyd v. McNamara, 74 F.4th 662, 668-71 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub. nom. Johnson v. Boyd, 144 S. Ct. 562 (2024) (“These three cases put Johnson on notice that he could not constitutionally fire a taser at a non-threatening, compliant subject. They likewise show that Boyd’s act of jerking his hand away from Johnson, yelling in apparent pain, and turning his head did not, standing alone, constitute the kind of threatening behavior or belligerence that justifies the use of force. . . Defendants respond by attempting to distinguish these cases from the facts here, relying on the rule that precedent does not clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes unless its facts are sufficiently similar to the facts at hand. . . With respect to Ramirez, Defendants argue that the circumstances of that case did not involve the unique security risks that arise in the prison context. Hanks and Trammel, they say, suffer from the same deficiency, but are further distinguishable by the fact that they do not involve the use of a taser. These distinctions generate no uncertainty about the unconstitutionality of Johnson’s actions. We have often explained that ‘[t]he law can be clearly established “despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court, so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.”’. . The touchstone of the inquiry is ‘fair notice.’. . Here, a jury could rationally conclude that the situation was not tense, and that Johnson had ample time to decide whether it was necessary to use force against Boyd. It could also conclude that there was no threat to prison order that could have justified Johnson’s decision to tase Boyd. Neither are Hanks and Trammel rendered inapplicable simply because they did not involve the use of a taser. We have previously rejected the argument that prior precedent does not clearly establish law in a taser case simply because that precedent did not involve a taser, explaining that ‘[l]awfulness of force ... does not depend on the precise instrument used to apply it,’ and ‘[q]ualified immunity will not protect officers who apply excessive and unreasonable force merely because their means of applying it are novel.’. . Finally, we flatly reject counsel’s contention at oral argument that we are bound by the district court’s determination that no constitutional violation occurred. The fact that ‘other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear’ if this circuit has been clear. Safford Unif. Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 378, 129 S.Ct. 2633, 174 L.Ed.2d 354 (2009). In conclusion, we hold that a rational jury could find that Johnson’s decision to tase Boyd was not justified by any exigency, in which case Johnson’s qualified immunity defense would not shield him from liability because our precedents clearly establish that resort to force in such circumstances is unconstitutional.”)

Austin v. City of Pasadena, Texas, 74 F.4th 312, 322, 326-27 (5th Cir. 2023) (“The district court granted qualified immunity for the individual Defendant-Officers as to the excessive force claim because Plaintiffs failed to ‘identify ... case law on point’ that established it is unconstitutional repeatedly to tase someone experiencing a medical seizure. Defendants maintain that the caselaw at the time of Shaw’s incarceration does not clearly establish the officers’ actions were unlawful. They allege no opinion was discovered ‘where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.’. . . Plaintiffs insist it is well established in precedents that using force on a subject who is not resisting is unconstitutional. Because we may begin our analysis under either qualified immunity factor, we start with the merits of the excessive force claim. . . . [V]iewing the record in the light favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would have concluded that Shaw was continuing to experience a seizure or was in a postictal state, not actively resisting the officers, and that the physical restraint used here — particularly tasing Shaw multiple times — constituted excessive force in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . .’Ultimately, it is the job of the factfinder, not of this court, to resolve those factual disputes for itself. A jury’s interpretation ensures that legal judgments of reasonableness hew closely to widely shared expectations of the use of force by our police officers.’. . . [T]he district court determined Plaintiffs had not identified on-point authority establishing that repeatedly tasing someone who is experiencing a seizure is unconstitutional. . . . We recently held that in this circuit, ‘the law has long been clearly established that an officer’s continued use of force on a restrained and subdued subject is objectively unreasonable.’ Timpa, 20 F.4th at 1034 (collecting cases). [Court discusses other cases] These cases clearly established the alleged unreasonableness of the Defendant-Officers’ continued tasing and use of force to restrain Shaw after he was subdued and restrained and when he was not actively resisting due to a medical emergency. Genuine fact disputes exist as to whether the Defendant-Officers restrained and subdued Shaw before they continued to tase him, hold him in prone position on his chest with an officer’s knee pressed to his back, and handcuff him in a restraint chair. Similarly, factual disputes remain regarding whether Shaw was actively resisting restraint or was merely passively/involuntarily resisting due to the effects of his seizure. . . . Because at the time of this incident it was clearly established that the continued use of force, particularly tasing, against a restrained and subdued subject who was not actively resisting due to a medical emergency violates the Fourteenth Amendment, the Defendant-Officers are not entitled to qualified immunity, as fact issues remain.”)

Austin v. City of Pasadena, Texas, 74 F.4th 312, 330 (5th Cir. 2023) (“Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we find that a jury could decide it should have been obvious to each Defendant-Officer that Shaw was in need of immediate emergency treatment; that a different medical emergency existed than when EMS was called for the seizure; and that Shaw’s breathing and heart had been compromised from being held in stress positions and tased. A jury could determine that, by improperly delaying emergency medical treatment, the Defendant-Officers increased Shaw's pain and likelihood of death and were therefore deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. . . A genuine dispute of material fact exists as to whether the officers intentionally treated Shaw incorrectly in responding to his seizure and whether the officers' actions constituted a harmful delay in Shaw's accessing emergency medical care. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity for the individual Defendant-Officers as to the claims of excessive force and improper/delayed medical treatment.")

Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400, 408 (5th Cir. 2023) ("We agree that there is sufficient clearly established law regarding the constitutional right to a timely release from prison and that Parker has sufficiently argued a violation of the right. Finally, as he does with the question of supervisory liability, LeBlanc contends that defining the clearly established right as 'timely release from prison' is overbroad. We have already rejected that argument above in the supervisory liability context, and we do so here as well. In Crittendon, we held that the defendants had "'fair warning" that their failure to address this delay would deny prisoners like Plaintiffs their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction' because the defendants knew of the delays in prisoners' timely releases. . . Parker's Third Amended Complaint cured the deficiency of his Second Amended Complaint in that he alleged on information and belief that LeBlanc was aware of DPSC employees' testimonies in Chowns v. LeBlanc regarding the regular pattern of over-detentions, and that LeBlanc was aware of Attorney General Jeff Landry's op-ed and the Legislative Auditor report regarding the DPSC's problem in not knowing inmates' proper release date. Parker's complaint sufficiently alleges that LeBlanc violated a right that was clearly established. Construing these allegations in the light most favorable to Parker, we agree they are sufficient to support the argument that LeBlanc had "'fair warning" that [his] failure to address this delay would deny prisoners like [Parker] their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction.' . . We close with a reminder. This appeal is from the denial of a motion to dismiss solely on the pleadings. LaBlanc's defense is yet to be stated. It remains to be seen what an evidentiary record will show as to LeBlanc's efforts to deal with the widespread problems in determining and enforcing release dates.")

Smith v. Lee, 73 F.4th 376, 387 (5th Cir. 2023) ("In sum, except as in Cooper, including the significant fact that the dog was deployed as a wholly duplicative means of detention, no precedent establishes under analogous circumstances how long a bite is too long. Thus, a jury could not find that every reasonable officer would have known that a K9-trained dog had to be released more quickly. Even if Officer Lee mistakenly permitted Dice to bite Stewart for a minute, qualified immunity shields him from suit as well as liability.")

Smith v. Lee, 73 F.4th 376, 387, 389-90 (5th Cir. 2023) (Graves, J., dissenting in part) ("Because I would find that Lee is not entitled to qualified immunity from Stewart's excessive force claim based on the duration of the bite, I dissent from the majority's analysis and conclusion in part IV.b.ii. . . . We do not know what amount of time transpired between the moment Dice first bit

Stewart, the moment Lee appeared in the doorway, and the moment Lee realized Stewart was not Combs. Assuming the bite lasted longer than a minute as we must, a material factual dispute remains as to whether Lee permitted Dice to continue biting Stewart for a lengthy period after realizing he was not Combs. For these reasons, I would find that Lee is not entitled to qualified immunity because Cooper gave him fair warning that subjecting a compliant and non-resisting subject to a lengthy dog attack is a violation of clearly established law.”)

Cobbins v. Sollie, No. 22-30692, 2023 WL 4015303, at *4 (5th Cir. June 14, 2023) (not reported) (“Sollie does not challenge the district court’s finding that genuine fact disputes exist as to the first factor for qualified immunity — did Sollie’s conduct violate Cobbins’s constitutional rights? We therefore focus our analysis only on the second factor — was the alleged right that Cobbins argues was violated clearly established? The district court determined, ‘[i]t is clearly established that use of a taser against an arrestee who (1) was stopped for a minor traffic violation; (2) was not an immediate threat or flight risk; and (3) displayed only passive[] resistance, including asking what he had done wrong, is excessive force.’ We examine the two precedents in which this clarity was found. . . . This precedent makes it clear to all reasonable officers that tasing a subject who is suspected of no more than a misdemeanor, is pinned to the ground, is surrounded by law enforcement officers and unable to escape, is unarmed, and is offering no more than passive resistance, amounts to excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court did not err in denying qualified immunity as to the excessive force claim.”)

Allen v. Hays, 65 F.4th 736, 747-48 (5th Cir. 2023), on denial of pet. for reh’g (“Taking as true that Hayes had no reason to believe Allen was armed and that Hayes knew Allen was seriously injured and likely could not move, a police officer would know, under these precedents, that to handcuff Allen was an arrest without probable cause under clearly established law. Accordingly, we vacate and remand the dismissal of that claim. . . . Plaintiffs alleged that after Allen was shot five times at point-blank range and crashed into a tree, Hayes waited six minutes after the shooting to call for medical care, dragged Allen out of the truck, handcuffed him on the ground, and never attempted to provide CPR, oxygen, chest compressions, or any other life-saving measures. The most on-point factual comparator is Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198 (5th Cir. 2021), cert denied, — U.S. —, 142 S.Ct. 2573, 213 L.Ed.2d 1123 (2022). A jailer ‘watch[ed] an inmate attempt suicide and fail[ed] to call for emergency medical assistance.’. . . Instead, the jailer called his supervisor, who arrived at the jail approximately 10 minutes after receiving the jailer’s call and then called 911. . . The court held that even though the jailer immediately called his supervisor, he should have known to call emergency assistance. The court stated, ‘W]e now make clear that promptly failing to call for emergency assistance when a detainee faces a known, serious medical emergency ... constitutes unconstitutional conduct.’. . . There are differences between that case and ours. First, Hayes was not a jailer but a police officer on duty. Second, unlike the jailer, Hayes eventually did call 911, albeit six minutes later. Those differences, however, are not distinct enough to render Hayes’s actions so different from the Cope defendant’s unconstitutional conduct. Hayes knew that he had shot Allen five times. He called for backup but waited six minutes before calling for medical aid. The risk would have been apparent. Plaintiffs must also show that the constitutional violation was clearly established at the time of Hayes's actions. Cope was decided after Hayes pulled Allen over and could not establish the law for Hayes. The Cope court, in a summary judgment posture, held that '[e]xisting case law ... was not so clearly on point as to "place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate."' . 'Until today, we have not spoken directly on whether failing to call for emergency assistance in response to a serious threat to an inmate's life constitutes deliberate indifference.' . Still, the Cope court noted that Dyer had previously held 'existing precedent showed that officers who, "despite being aware of the detainee's dire condition[,] ... did nothing to secure medical help" at all were on "fair warning" that their behavior was deliberately indifferent.' . Hayes's conduct was significantly more severe than that of the Cope defendant—unlike in Cope, where the jailer did not necessarily know the extent of the victim's injuries, Hayes knew he had shot Allen. Plaintiffs have therefore pleaded sufficient facts to make it at least plausible that Hayes's actions were a violation of clearly established law. As alleged, Hayes stood by for six minutes without performing any medical care or calling for medical backup, aware that he had shot Allen several times and witnessed him crash into a tree, and after he had radioed for police backup for himself. In this posture, that is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. The claim is thus vacated and remanded.")

Wallace v. Taylor, No. 22-20342, 2023 WL 2964418, at *6 (5th Cir. Apr. 14, 2023) (not reported) ("When Wallace filed his first amended complaint on March 16, 2022, this court did not recognize a freestanding federal claim for malicious prosecution. Castellano v. Fragozo, 352 F.3d 939, 942 (5th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (holding that " 'malicious prosecution' standing alone is no violation of the United States Constitution.")). However, the Supreme Court later held that litigants may bring Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution claims under § 1983. Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1337 (2022). Accordingly, we recently recognized that Thompson overruled Castellano and reinstated our prior six-element malicious prosecution claim from Gordy:

(1) the commencement or continuance of an original criminal proceeding; (2) its legal causation by the present defendant against plaintiff who was defendant in the original proceeding; (3) its bona fide termination in favor of the present plaintiff; (4) the absence of probable cause for such proceeding; (5) malice; and (6) damages.

Armstrong v. Ashley, 60 F.4th 262, 279 (5th Cir. 2023) . . . In addition to proving each of these elements, plaintiffs must also prove 'the threshold element of an unlawful Fourth Amendment seizure.' . . . When there is a change in law during the pendency of an appeal, this court will generally remand to give the parties and the district court an opportunity to address the new standard. . . . However, in order to overcome Taylor's assertion of qualified immunity, Wallace must ultimately show that his Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution 'was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.' . . . This court did not recognize a federal malicious prosecution claim at the time Wallace was charged with evading arrest, and '[a] claim that we ha[d] expressly not recognized is the antithesis of a clearly established one.' . . . While the Fourth Amendment right to be free from arrest absent probable cause has been clearly established for some time, there was no clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution at the time of Wallace's arrest. Therefore, Taylor is entitled to qualified immunity from Wallace's malicious prosecution claim.") Ducksworth v. Landrum, 62 F.4th 209, 218-19 (5th Cir. 2023) (Oldham, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The videos show a plain violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Supreme Court has made clear that plaintiffs ‘generally recover damages that are proximately caused by any Fourth Amendment violation.’ . . . That means Ducksworth can seek damages for his injuries unless the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . They’re not. Qualified immunity protects a law enforcement officer from personal liability in a lawsuit unless a plaintiff shows that the officer’s conduct violates a clearly established constitutional right. As I recently explained, here’s how I understand the relevant inquiry: Clearly established law is all about fair notice. For there to be fair notice, the clearly-established-law standard requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him. That is, the rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. There are generally two different paths to show this: (1) an on-point case and (2) the obvious-case exception. McMurry v. Brunner, No. 21-50888, 2022 WL 17493708, at *7 (5th Cir. Dec. 7, 2022) (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) (quotation omitted). ‘The Supreme Court recently made clear that for the obvious-case exception, there are two necessary conditions: (1) particularly egregious facts and (2) no evidence that the official’s actions were compelled by necessity or exigency.’ Id. at *8 (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) (quotation omitted). Ducksworth made both showings for the obvious-case exception. First, these circumstances were particularly egregious so that ‘any reasonable officer should have realized’ that this arrest was unconstitutional. Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52, 54 (2020). Supreme Court cases clearly establish that arresting someone without probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . That’s the end of this case: The officers not only lacked probable cause; they had no cause whatsoever to arrest Ducksworth. Ducksworth was at a private business. He was a paying customer. The car wash manager told the officers he could stay. Any argument between Ducksworth and the manager was over before the officers arrived. He wasn’t causing a disturbance. The officers had no reason to approach him in the first place. Ducksworth remained calm and even cheerful. Nonetheless, the officers gave him unlawful orders to leave, shot him with a taser, and then complained that Ducksworth resisted their obviously unlawful commands and arrest. These facts are egregious. Second, no exigency or necessity justified the unlawful arrest. There’s no indication that Ducksworth was violent or threatening. He did not escalate the situation. The police did. They surrounded and purported to ban him from the premises. They commanded him to put his hands behind his back. If there was an exigency, it was police-created. And police-created exigencies receive no deference under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The purpose of the qualified immunity doctrine is to prevent litigants and courts from using 20/20 hindsight to second-guess law-enforcement decisions made in exigent circumstances and in the fog of uncertainty. The doctrine encourages officers to vigorously protect the public (and themselves) by eliminating personal liability for reasonable efforts and even mistakes. But the doctrine has never protected ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . This case falls comfortably outside the ambit of qualified immunity. . . . Ducksworth’s excessive force claim is related to, but analytically distinct from, his false arrest claim. Even if the police had probable cause to arrest Ducksworth—a premise refuted in Part III, supra—it does not follow that they could reasonably tase Ducksworth to effectuate that arrest. In my view, (A) Welch’s decision to tase Ducksworth was plainly unreasonable under any reasonable viewing of the bodycam videos. And (B), Welch is not entitled to qualified immunity.”) McMurry v. Brunner, No. 21-50888, 2022 WL 17493708, at *7–12 (5th Cir. Dec. 7, 2022) (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) (not reported) (“Clearly established law is all about fair notice. . . For there to be fair notice, the clearly-established-law standard ‘requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him.’ . . That is, the ‘rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . There are generally two different paths to show this: (1) an on-point case and (2) the obvious-case exception. . .Start with the on-point-case requirement. To show that the law is clearly established, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court decision before the time of the alleged misconduct that held there was a constitutional violation on fundamentally or materially similar facts. There’s a lot packed in there. So let’s break that down. First, the on-point case must be a Supreme Court decision issued before the alleged misconduct. . . The Supreme Court has never held that circuit precedent can clearly establish the law. . . Until they do, I would not rely on circuit precedent to deny qualified immunity. Second, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court case with fundamentally or materially similar facts. . . Identification of such a case ensures that the rule has been defined with specificity. Third, the ‘decision must at least hold there was some violation of the [relevant] Amendment.’ . . It also makes sense for that holding to be a constitutional violation. That’s because the best way for a reasonable officer to understand a constitutional rule’s contours is when it’s applied to materially/fundamentally similar facts that result in a holding of a violation. It’d be difficult to say that facts are materially or fundamentally similar if the result in case X is no violation but the result in case Y is a violation. The difference in outcome shows that the facts are fundamentally/materially different, not similar. In sum, to show that the law is clearly established, the plaintiff must identify a Supreme Court decision issued before the time of the alleged misconduct that held there was a constitutional violation on fundamentally or materially similar facts. . . The other path is the obvious-case exception. This exception has benefits but often-insurmountable burdens. Benefits first. As best I understand it, the obvious-case exception excuses the on-point-case requirement. In other words, a plaintiff always must point to a Supreme Court decision issued before the time of the alleged misconduct holding a violation of the constitutional right with fundamentally or materially similar facts unless he satisfies the obvious-case exception. . . The plaintiff may instead rely on ‘general statements of the law’ from a Supreme Court decision to show that the officer had ‘fair and clear warning.’ . . Put another way, the plaintiff may rely on general statements to show that ‘the statutory or constitutional question [is] beyond debate.’ . . But to get that benefit, the plaintiff must meet a heavy burden. The Supreme Court recently made clear that for the obvious-case exception, there are two necessary conditions: (1) ‘particularly egregious facts’ and (2) ‘no evidence’ that the official’s actions ‘were compelled by necessity or exigency.’ . . Under the above framework, the McMurrays have shown that (1) Brunner violated their procedural-due-process rights and (2) this is such an obvious case, on egregious facts, involving no exigency beyond the one Brunner himself created, that Brunner had ample fair notice of his personal liability. . . Start with the violation. The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no State may ‘deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.’ . . . The McMurrays obviously have a fundamental liberty interest. It’s well-established that parents have a ‘fundamental right ... to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of their children.’ . . . Officer Brunner obviously deprived the McMurrays of their liberty interest. JM’s parents ordered JM to continue her homeschooling (via online instruction) on October 26 (a weekday) while Mrs. McMurry was in Kuwait. By staying in the McMurrays’ apartment during school hours, JM was following her parents’ instruction. And while JM was in her parents’ apartment acting lawfully, she was in her parents’ custody. By removing JM from the apartment, Brunner forced JM to violate her parents’ entirely lawful instruction and thus deprived the parents of their right to custody and control of their daughter. Even more, Brunner stopped JM’s father from further directing his daughter when Brunner prevented JM from answering his calls for no conceivable reason. Prong one is thus easily satisfied. . . The McMurrays also did not receive the process they were due. In fact, they received no process whatsoever. No ex parte court order, no warrant, no notice, no hearing. Nothing. Surely, the McMurrays had a right to at least some predeprivation process before their child was snatched from their home. . . . If predeprivation process is required for property unless there is an exigency, then the liberty interest here requires at least the same, if not more. . . . Therefore, unless Brunner establishes an exigency, the McMurrays’ procedural-due-process rights were violated. Brunner cannot come close to establishing such an exigency. . . . In short, Brunner did precisely what the Supreme Court has forbade: ‘[T]he Due Process Clause does not permit a State [or one of its officers] to infringe on the fundamental right of parents to make child rearing decisions simply because a state judge [or officer] believes a better decision could be made.’. . . Prong two is thus met. . . Next, clearly established law. The Supreme Court has not decided many cases on parents’ rights to procedural due process. And I see none finding a violation on materially similar facts. So the McMurrays must show that this is an obvious case to pass prong two. They do. First, as explained above, there’s no evidence of necessity or exigency compelling Brunner to make a split-second reaction. . . No officer could reasonably have believed that JM was at risk of serious injury any time in the near future. And obviously, neither Brunner himself nor any member of the public faced any danger whatsoever. Second, the facts here are particularly egregious. Weaver performed an illegal search in front of her supervisor (Brunner). And instead of settling for one constitutional violation (the search), Brunner went on to commit two more (unlawfully seizing JM and violating the McMurrays’ due-process rights). And after taking custody of JM, Brunner prevented JM from talking to her father and the Vallejos for a significant amount of time. All while JM was crying and confused. Then CPS told Brunner that his safety concerns were baseless. And still, inexplicably, Brunner persisted and pushed for criminal charges against Mrs. McMurry. Like CPS, a jury of Mrs. McMurry’s peers squarely rejected Brunner’s charges. But the damage was already done: Mrs. McMurry was already fired, was already prevented from teaching again, and had already spent 19 hours in jail. Finally, the constitutional question is beyond debate. The Supreme Court has clearly held that for property, the Due Process Clause requires predeprivation process unless there is an exigency. The Court has also clearly held that a parent’s liberty interest is far greater than any ordinary property interest. There was no exigency beyond the one Brunner created on his own. So it's beyond debate that the Due Process Clause required some predeprivation process here, and the McMurrays got none. . . Finally, JM's Fourth Amendment claim. The Fourth Amendment protects '[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.' . . Under clearly established law, Brunner violated JM's Fourth Amendment rights. On appeal, all agree that Brunner seized JM the moment she opened the door. That's when Brunner ordered JM to put on warmer clothes, Brunner declared that he was going to take her elsewhere for questioning, and JM began complying with Brunner's order. And all agree that unless there were exigent circumstances, that seizure was unreasonable. There's no evidence of exigent circumstances to justify Brunner's seizure of JM. . . . The law is also clearly established under the obvious-case exception. There's no evidence of exigency, the facts are particularly egregious, and the law is beyond debate. . . For these reasons, I concur in the judgment rejecting Brunner's qualified-immunity defense.") Escobarrivera v. Whitaker, No. 21-30147, 2022 WL 17352178, at *4–5 (5th Cir. Dec. 1, 2022) (not reported) (“We conclude Escobarrivera has failed to create a fact issue that his confinement as of the date of final judgment in the district court rises to the level of severity articulated in Wilkinson and Bailey. We recognize that Escobarrivera is confined for twenty-three hours (or at least twenty-two hours) a day in a cell by himself, eats his meals alone, is prevented from attending church services, and his confinement is allegedly ‘indefinite.’ But important to the Court in Wilkinson was the ‘depriv[ation] of almost any environmental or sensory stimuli and of almost all human contact.’ . . Escobarrivera’s confinement does not amount to such a deprivation. Escobarrivera’s cell has bars as opposed to a steel door, allowing him the opportunity to communicate with other inmates. He can roam the hall and interact with others during his hour of release; he receives three additional one-hour sessions a week outside; and he has access to visitation twice a month. Accordingly, taking his facts as alleged as true, we cannot conclude that Escobarrivera’s conditions of confinement alone are ‘atypical and significant.’ . . We now turn to the duration of Escobarrivera’s confinement. Confinement in less severe conditions may still give rise to a protected liberty interest if the confinement’s duration is excessive. . . In Wilkerson, for example, we considered a thirty-nine-year confinement and concluded that such an ‘extraordinary duration’ diluted the materiality of the less severe confinement conditions. . . The duration of Escobarrivera’s confinement—which was three years and three months when the district court entered summary judgment and is now four years and six months—is significantly shorter than the duration at issue in Wilkerson. Therefore, Escobarrivera’s length of confinement does not, at least at this point, tip the scale towards severity. Moreover, we have noted that a period of eight years in solitary confinement with no prospect of immediate release in the near future is sufficient to give rise to a liberty interest, but a period of two and one-half years in confinement is not. . . Escobarrivera’s confinement duration is closer to the two-and-a-half-year mark than we have deemed insufficient to establish a liberty interest than it is to the eight-year mark we have deemed sufficient. Therefore, Escobarrivera’s duration of confinement is also not atypical. . . In sum, considering the conditions of Escobarrivera’s confinement coupled with its duration, we conclude that Escobarrivera has not articulated a clearly established due process liberty interest at this point. Because Escobarrivera’s due process rights in these circumstances were not ‘so well defined’ that a ‘reasonable officer’ would understand his conduct to be unlawful, . . . we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of Defendants as to the claims asserted against them in their individual capacities as of the date of the final judgment in the district court. That said, this summary judgment affirmance does not preclude what Escobarrivera may be able to assert as time continues.”)

Escobarrivera v. Whitaker, No. 21-30147, 2022 WL 17352178, at *4–5 (5th Cir. Dec. 1, 2022) (not reported) (Elrod, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Analyzed under the proper test articulated in Wilkinson and Wilkerson, and employed by our sister circuits, Mr. Escobarrivera’s conditions plainly implicate a clearly established liberty interest. In Wilkerson we zeroed-in on the combination of the plaintiff’s ‘23-hour-a-day in-cell confinement, limited physical exercise, limited human contact, and effectively indefinite placement’ to determine that a clearly established liberty interest was implicated. . . It is undisputed that all of these factors are present here. The district court’s contrary conclusion follows from its error in treating the ‘lack of clear guidance regarding terms equivalent to Plaintiff’s term’ as the beginning and the end of the qualified immunity analysis. . . As we held in Wilkerson, a liberty interest can be clearly established despite ‘some distinctions between the conditions’ that have been held to implicate a liberty interest in previous cases. . . Thus, the district court was obliged to fully consider all of Mr. Escobarrivera’s conditions of confinement to determine whether there were ‘material and substantial similarities’ with conditions that have previously been found to implicate a liberty interest. . . A difference in duration alone does not preclude a finding of clearly established law. . . Moreover, even assuming arguendo that claims like Mr. Escobarrivera’s cannot be brought until a prisoner has spent a minimum period in solitary confinement, Mr. Escobarrivera has satisfied that prerequisite. As noted, the majority opinion identifies eight years with no prospect of immediate release as ‘sufficient,’ but two and a half years as ‘not.’. . Mr. Escobarrivera is now approaching five years in solitary confinement with no indication of when or how he may ever be released. I would hold that five years is enough, as foreshadowed by our decision in Bailey v. Fisher, 647 F. App’x 472 (5th Cir. 2016).”)

Bey v. Prator, 53 F.4th 854, 858-59 (5th Cir. 2022) (“[I]t was not clearly established that once plaintiffs had been arrested, the officers were not allowed to search their headgear solely because it had religious significance. ‘When an arrest is made, it is reasonable for the arresting officer to search the person arrested.’. . Moreover, plaintiffs have pointed to no precedent that abrogates the general search incident to arrest’ rule when religious head-wear is involved. Accordingly, the district court correctly granted summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.”)

Henderson v. Harris County, Texas, 51 F.4th 125, 132-35 (5th Cir. 2022) (“To prevail, Henderson must overcome Garduno’s qualified immunity defense, which ‘includes two inquiries. The first question is whether the officer violated a constitutional right. The second question is whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct.’. . ‘We can decide one question or both.’. . Here, we only answer the second. To show clearly established law, Henderson has two paths: (A) she can identify an on-point case, or (B) she can satisfy the obvious-case exception. . . Henderson does neither. . . . The Supreme Court recently underscored the importance of specificity in the clearly-established-law inquiry when it reminded lower courts ‘not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.’. . . Rather, courts must determine that existing precedent has rendered the right ‘beyond debate.’. . . The hurdle is even higher when the plaintiff alleges a Fourth Amendment violation. As we have said elsewhere, in excessive-force cases requiring split-second judgments, it is ‘especially difficult’ to overcome qualified immunity. . . . That is because in the Fourth Amendment excessive-force context, ‘it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’. . . Thus, Henderson must demonstrate that the law is ‘so clearly established that—in the blink of an eye, in the middle of a high-speed chase—every reasonable officer would know it immediately.’. . . Henderson points to a slew of cases. But many of the cases she relies on are irrelevant to the clearly-established-law inquiry—either because they issued too late or because they do not bind us (and hence do not give officers in our circuit fair notice of the law). And the cases she cites that could clearly establish law do not do so with the requisite specificity. . . . In short, Newman and Darden are nothing like this case. Both involved ‘far more force than was deployed here.’. . . And neither involved a suspect fleeing from police. Even on Henderson’s own version of the facts, this case is radically different: Henderson concededly ran from police, then stopped suddenly and turned toward the pursuing officer. Thus, neither Newman nor Darden involves materially similar facts and hence cannot clearly establish the law. . . . Finally, the obvious-case exception. Henderson cites Hope v. Pelzer and Taylor v. Riojas for the proposition that there can be ‘notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on ... so long as the prior decision gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.’. . . Hope and Taylor are Eighth Amendment cases that predated City of Tahlequah. So it is unclear how much if any weight we should place on obvious Eighth Amendment cases in the face of Supreme Court direction in Fourth Amendment cases ‘not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.’. . . And even if Hope and Taylor could apply here, ‘obvious’ cases are exceedingly ‘rare.’. . . Even accepting Henderson’s versions of the facts, this case is not obvious. Garduno made the split-second decision to deploy his taser after Henderson had led him on a long chase by car and by foot and was still unrestrained. Henderson admits he suddenly stopped running, turned toward Garduno, and moved his arms in a manner that suggested to Garduno that Henderson was reaching for a weapon. This is a far cry from the handful of instances where we have recognized an ‘obvious case.’ If anything, the obviousness of this case points in the other direction: As illustrated in Escobar v. Montee, 895 F.3d 387 (5th Cir. 2018), and as we explained in Salazar, ‘a suspect cannot refuse to surrender and instead lead police on a dangerous hot pursuit—and then turn around, appear to surrender, and receive the same Fourth Amendment protection from intermediate force he would have received had he promptly surrendered in the first place.’”)

Smith v. Linthicum, No. 21-20232, 2022 WL 7284285, at *5-6 & nn. 5,6 (5th Cir. Oct. 12, 2022) (not reported), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 70 (2023) (“We hold here that one particular decision of our court⁵ [fn. 5: Although the Supreme Court has explicitly left open the question of whether Circuit law alone can clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes, . . . we’ve established a prior practice of assigning our own decisions such legal weight[.] reiterated and strengthened existing law such that the defendants had reasonable warning that any policy of categorically denying SCS [spinal cord stimulator] replacements without regard to an inmate's serious medical need constitutes Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference: Delaughter v. Woodall, 909 F.3d 130, 137–39 (5th Cir. 2018).⁶ [fn. 6: It is of course notable that Delaughter was decided more than a year after Talley's latest-recorded rejection of Smith's requests for an SCS replacement. But we are nonetheless satisfied of its capacity to give 'reasonable warning' here for two reasons. First, as we discuss below, because Delaughter codified legal developments that were already long in motion when Talley categorically denied Smith's requests in 2016. . . . And, second, because of the ongoing nature of the harm Smith claims in this case; Talley could have stopped withholding Smith's needed medical procedure for nonmedical reasons in 2018—when this court handed Delaughter down—but never chose to do so. This case is accordingly a far cry from the typical § 1983 case (like, say, a shooting, an excessively forceful takedown, an illegal search). The defendants here received reasonable warning that their ongoing treatment of the plaintiff might be unconstitutional but never reconsidered the issue.] There, we denied prison medical officials qualified immunity from an inmate's claim that an unjustified delay in a surgery he needed was motivated not by medical disagreement on the prison's part but instead by financially motivated deliberate indifference. . . . The prison officials in Delaughter delayed the inmate plaintiff's surgery because they didn't want to pay for it, not because they disagreed with the plaintiff as to whether the surgery was medically necessary or whether an alternative treatment was equally viable. . . . That kind of delay for a reason other than genuine medical judgment, the panel mused, 'could under certain circumstances evince a wanton disregard for a serious medical need.' . . . As the panel further observed, the Fifth Circuit had 'previously suggested,' albeit in an unpublished case, 'that a non-medical reason for delay in treatment constitutes deliberate indifference, and several of our sister circuits [had] held so explicitly.' . . . More significantly, Delaughter merely reiterated and solidified what has long been the law in this circuit: that a prison medical official's decision to deprive an inmate of a medically needed surgery like Smith's forbidden SCS replacement here must be the product of a genuine and considered medical judgment, not a nonmedical reason like a refusal to pay (as in Delaughter) or a blanket and non-medically considered. . . . policy against the procedure (as the district court found could genuinely be the case here). . . . The district court found that summary-judgment evidence in this case raised genuine issues of fact regarding whether a dire medical need of the plaintiff is going uncorrected for no reason more than a prison system's blanket policy against allowing a surgery that third-party physicians have recommended to address such need. Without jurisdiction to consider the genuineness of that fact dispute, we deem it legally material to the defendants' ability to successfully invoke their qualified immunity defense at the summary judgment stage because such a categorical and non-medically considered policy would indeed violate our Circuit's clearly established law on the Eighth Amendment if proved at trial. This holding has no effect on the defendants' ability to reassert their qualified immunity defense at trial, where a jury can determine whether the facts of this case indeed demonstrate the defendants' implementation of an unconstitutional policy. . . . That question is not for this panel to decide on interlocutory review.”)

Smith v. Linthicum, No. 21-20232, 2022 WL 7284285, at *7-8 (5th Cir. Oct. 12, 2022) (Duncan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not reported), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 70 (2023) (“I agree that the genuine factual disputes identified by the district court deprive us of jurisdiction to decide the merits of Smith’s Eighth Amendment claim. . . If Smith can prove that claim at trial, he may be entitled to injunctive relief. . . But the majority errs by concluding the officials violated clearly established law. The majority relies on ‘one particular decision of our court’ to clearly establish the unreasonableness of the officials’ conduct—Delaughter v. Woodall, 909 F.3d 130 (5th Cir. 2018). . . Even assuming³ one circuit decision can clearly establish the law, Delaughter is quite different from this case. . . Trying to tailor Delaughter to this case, the majority stretches it beyond its facts. It says Delaughter ‘clearly established’ that a prison’s decision not to provide surgery ‘must be the product of a genuine and considered medical judgment, not a nonmedical reason like a refusal to pay ... or a blanket and non-medically considered policy against the procedure[.]’ . . Delaughter isn’t that broad. As discussed, Delaughter addressed a prison’s cost-driven decision to deny necessary surgery, not a failure to use its ‘genuine and considered medical judgment.’ The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Unfortunately, that’s what the majority does here. Telling prison doctors they must use ‘genuine and considered medical judgment’ wouldn’t have notified these defendants that the SRS policy violated the Constitution.”)

Crane v. City of Arlington, Texas, 50 F.4th 453, 457-58 & nn. 2, 3, 4, 466-67 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 342 (2023) (“In 1996, the Supreme Court approved the use of pretextual stops in Whren v. United States. . . Since then, pretextual stops have become a cornerstone of law enforcement practice.² [fn. 2: David D. Kirkpatrick, Steven Eder & Kim Barker, Cities Try to Turn the Tide on Police Traffic Stops, N.Y. TIMES (Apr. 15, 2022), <https://www.nytimes.com/2022/04/15/us/police-traffic-stops.html>] Police officers follow a suspicious person until they identify a traffic violation to make a lawful stop, even though the officer intends to use the stop to investigate a hunch that, by itself, would not amount to reasonable suspicion or probable cause.³ [fn. 3: Stephen Rushin & Griffin Edwards, An Empirical Assessment of Pretextual Stops and Racial Profiling, 73 Stan. L. Rev. 637, 640 (2021).] Often pulled over for minor traffic violations, these stops create grounds for violent—and often deadly—encounters that disproportionately harm people of color.⁴ [fn. 4: See Sam Levin, US Police Have Killed Nearly 600 People in Traffic Stops Since 2017, Data Shows, GUARDIAN (Apr. 21, 2022), <https://www.theguardian.com/us-news/2022/apr/21/us-police-violence-traffic-stop-data> (“Black drivers make up 28% of those killed in traffic stops, while accounting for only 13% of the population. Research has consistently found that Black and brown drivers are more likely to be stopped, searched and subjected to force.”).] When Whren was decided, the Court did not have what we have now—twenty-five years of data on the effects of pretextual stops. . . Indeed, the Whren Court differentiated pretextual stops from ‘extreme practices’ like the use of deadly force. . . Today, traffic stops and the use of deadly force are too often one and the same—with Black and Latino drivers overrepresented among those killed—and have been sanctioned by numerous counties and major police departments. . . While several major cities have restricted the practice, . . . in much of America, police traffic stops still seine for warrants despite the shadows of Monell v. Department of Social Services, . . . where a § 1983 claim can succeed against a city with a showing that city policy was the moving force behind a constitutional injury, and was implemented with deliberate indifference to the known or obvious consequence that constitutional violations would result. . . The potential liability attending a policy of pretextual stops aside, their empirical consequences are clear: they lead to the unnecessary and tragic ending of human life. Here, a child threw a candy cane out the window. Twenty-five minutes later, the driver, her father, was dead. . . Crane argues, notwithstanding the Graham factors, that Roper created the situation by escalating the confrontation—entering the car and grabbing Crane. But our precedent dictates that the threat be examined only at the moment deadly force is used and that an officer’s conduct leading to that point is not considered. . . Roper’s actions prior to the moment he used deadly force, escalatory as they were, cannot be considered. The issue is not whether Roper created the need for deadly force, the issue is whether there was a reasonable need for deadly force. Under the Graham factors, Roper’s use of deadly force was unreasonable. Because Roper’s use of force in this situation was unreasonable, violating Crane’s Fourth Amendment right, we now turn to the clearly established prong. . . . We note that the Supreme Court and this court decline to apply Garner with a high-level of generality. . . While ‘[w]e do not require a case directly on point, . . . existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . The central concept is that of ‘fair warning,’ . . in which ‘the contours of the right in question are “sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.”’ . . Here, precedent provided Roper with fair notice that using deadly force on an unarmed, albeit non-compliant, driver held in a chokehold in a parked car was a constitutional violation beyond debate. . . Here, under Crane’s account, Crane was shot while he was held in a chokehold in a parked car while evading arrest for several confirmed misdemeanors and an unconfirmed felony parole violation. Roper was on notice that the use of deadly force is objectively reasonable except in only one circumstance, where an officer has ‘a reasonable belief that he or the public was in imminent danger.’ . . As previously discussed, Roper’s alleged belief that Crane had a gun was not reasonable, nor was his belief that a parked car posed a danger to himself, the passengers, or the other officers standing on the side of the car. When we accept the facts as we must, this case is an obvious one. . . While the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness test is ‘not capable of precise definition or mechanical application,’ . . the test is clear enough that Roper should have known he could not use deadly force on an unarmed man in a parked car. Because the facts seen in the light most favorable to Crane indicate a violation of a clearly established right and material facts are in dispute, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Roper and perforce dismissing the City.”)

See also Crane v. City of Arlington, Texas, 60 F.4th 976, 978 (5th Cir. 2023) (Ho, J., concurring in denial of rehearing en banc) (“In short, ‘we grant immunity when we should deny—and we deny immunity when we should grant.’ . . It’s a disturbing and dangerous pattern. And it’s confusing to citizens and police officers in our circuit. As the dissent here rightly observes, ‘we sow the seeds of uncertainty in our precedents—which grow into a briar patch of conflicting rules, ensnaring district courts and litigants alike.’ . . The dissent expresses further exasperation because this should've been a straightforward case—after all, '[i]t's all on video. And if a picture is worth 1,000 words, query how much this video is worth.' . . . I agree. In fact, I would say (and I did say) the exact same things last year in Edwards v. Oliver, 31 F.4th 925 (5th Cir. 2022). Like this case, Edwards involved a police officer shooting at a driver in an effort to prevent serious or fatal injury to innocent bystanders. In my panel dissent in Edwards, I explained that that case was factually indistinguishable from an earlier case that our court had just decided the previous year. I noted that video evidence in the two cases confirmed the similarities in the two police actions. The officers in the two cases took similar action in response to a similar threat. A panel of our court granted immunity to the officer in the earlier case. Yet the panel majority denied immunity to the officer in Edwards. So Edwards presented the exact same problems of 'uncertainty' and 'conflicting rules' that rightly concern the dissent today. Yet our court denied the officer's petition for rehearing en banc in Edwards—no doubt making the same judgment call about the futility of rehearing en banc in that case that I do in this case. . . . I have no desire to tilt at windmills. En banc rehearing can be taxing on our court, but well worth the effort—so long as there's a genuine opportunity to advance the rule of law. But I see no hope of advancing the cause here. Rehearing this case en banc would be futile. See, e.g., Cole, 935 F.3d 444 (en banc majority reaching same result as panel majority). It doesn't matter that I fully agree with the dissent. Seven votes (the six dissenters and me) do not a majority make on our en banc court. We had seven votes in Cole, too—and it wasn't enough there, either. . . . I share the frustration of my dissenting colleagues today—as well as my dissenting colleagues in Cole and Winzer, those who voted (in the minority) for rehearing en banc in Gonzalez, and my colleagues in futility in still other cases. That frustration is what leads me to vote to deny rehearing en banc today.”)

Crane v. City of Arlington, Texas, 60 F.4th 976, 978-79 (5th Cir. 2023) (Oldham, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Duncan, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) (“Our refusal to take this case en banc is revelatory of a general reluctance (at best) or refusal (at worst) to devote the full court's resources to qualified-immunity cases. That's imprudent. Officer Roper made a split-second decision to shoot a noncompliant driver (Crane) in the heat of a wrestling match just before Crane twice ran over another officer with his car. For several minutes, Crane (who had five outstanding warrants) repeatedly ignored commands to turn off and exit the car. Crane then pressed the accelerator causing the tires to spin and smoke and the engine to rev. At this point, Officer Roper sensibly concluded that Crane was going to kill or seriously injure someone using a three-ton projectile—so he shot Crane. It's all on video. And if a picture is worth 1,000 words, query how much this video is worth. So why did the panel deny qualified immunity? The opinion begins by explaining why (in its view) Whren v. United States . . . was wrongly decided. Never mind that Whren is a unanimous, landmark Supreme Court decision that has nothing to do with excessive force. Then the panel holds that the obvious-case exception vitiates the officer's qualified immunity. Never mind that neither our court nor the Supreme Court has applied that exception in a split-second excessive-force case. And never mind that the panel's theory of events—that Crane was shot in the chest at point-blank range and only then somehow managed to drive over a police officer twice—is belied by the video and common sense. In split-second excessive-force cases, it's 'especially important' to define clearly established law with specificity and not at a ‘high level of generality.’. . . The panel decision instead uses the obvious-case exception to swallow the Mullenix rule. . . So why did we deny rehearing en banc? True, qualified-immunity cases are fact-dependent. But so are, say, criminal-procedure cases. That doesn’t make either unimportant—as evidenced by the fact that the Supreme Court takes at least one case from one or both categories every Term. If fact-sensitive cases like these warrant the Supreme Court’s discretionary jurisdiction, they certainly warrant ours. And by refusing to rehear this case and others like it, we sow the seeds of uncertainty in our precedents—which grow into a briar patch of conflicting rules, ensnaring district courts and litigants alike. To paraphrase Justice Thomas’s view in a different context, some judges’ disagreement with qualified immunity ‘has found its natural complement in other judges’ distaste for correcting errors en banc, no matter how blatant, repetitive, or corrosive of circuit law.’ Shoop v. Cunningham, — U.S. —, 143 S. Ct. 37, 44–45, 214 L.Ed.2d 241 (2022) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari). I respectfully dissent.”)

Craig v. Martin, 49 F.4th 404, 417-20 (5th Cir. 2022) (superseding opinion on denial of reh’g en banc) (“In sum, Martin’s conduct in this case was not objectively unreasonable and did not violate Hymond’s or any of the other plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights. On this basis alone, Martin is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Even assuming the plaintiffs could show that Martin committed a constitutional violation, Martin is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The plaintiffs have failed to provide any controlling precedent showing that Martin’s particular conduct violated a clearly established right. . . . Instead, they have pointed to several cases that discuss the excessive force issue at a ‘high level of generality’—precisely what the Supreme Court has repeatedly advised courts they cannot do in analyzing qualified immunity claims. . . . [T]he decisions in Sam, Darden, and Joseph would not have provided fair notice because the plaintiffs in each case were not resisting arrest when the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. In all three cases, the plaintiffs had either signaled their surrender by placing their hands in the air and ceasing further movements or were lying on the ground before the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. In contrast, the plaintiffs in this case—except for Craig—were still resisting when the alleged unlawful conduct occurred. . . . Although the plaintiffs need not point to a factually identical case to demonstrate that the law is clearly established, they nonetheless must provide some controlling precedent that ‘squarely governs the specific facts at issue.’. . . The plaintiffs have not provided such precedent here and thus fail to show that the law clearly established that Martin’s particular conduct was unlawful at the time of the incident. Moreover, as we have noted before, the plaintiffs’ reliance on the cases above ‘requires us to assume that Fifth Circuit precedent alone can clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes, something the Supreme Court has left open.’ Regardless, the plaintiffs have not overcome Martin’s qualified immunity defense.”)

Harris v. Clay County, Mississippi, 47 F.4th 251, 279 (5th Cir. 2022) (“The commit-or-release rule is fifty years old. The rule has no wiggle room; its line is as bright as they come: An incompetent defendant who has no reasonable expectation of restored competency must be civilly committed or released. . . . It is also clear as day that Harris’s detention after the October 2010 dismissal of his civil proceeding violated Jackson's rule. And it has long been the law that sheriffs can be held responsible for unlawful detentions, especially when a court order tells them that the detainee should be released. . . That is the case here, as the circuit court's order informed the jailers that Harris should remain detained only so long as his commitment proceeding was pending. Detaining Harris for more than six years after he should have been released under Supreme Court precedent and a state court order is a violation of clearly established law. Qualified immunity thus does not protect Huffman and Scott.”)

Ramirez v. Escajeda, 44 F.4th 287, 293-94 (5th Cir. 2022) (“At the outset, we note that ‘[b]y citing no factually similar Supreme Court cases, [the plaintiffs] effectively concede[] that Supreme Court precedent offers [them] no help.’ . . Additionally, the plaintiffs’ argument requires us to assume that Fifth Circuit precedent alone can clearly establish the law for qualified immunity purposes, something the Supreme Court has left open. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, — U.S. —, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7, 211 L.Ed.2d 164 (2021) (per curiam) (“assuming” the proposition that “controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of § 1983”). . . Those caveats aside, the three circuit cases cited by the plaintiffs are not factually similar enough to the situation Escajeda faced to have placed the lawfulness of his taser use beyond debate. . . . These cases do not clearly establish Escajeda’s conduct was unlawful. All three involved plaintiffs already under police control (either handcuffed or submitting to a frisk) who were nevertheless subjected to gratuitous violence (face slammed into a car, beaten with batons, tased). Those cases are not this one. Contrary to the plaintiffs’ arguments, Escajeda did not have Daniel ‘subdued’ and under his control when he used the taser. To the contrary, Escajeda faced a ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ situation, . . . wholly unlike those faced by the officers in Bush, Newman, and Martinez. Escajeda used the taser precisely because Daniel was not in custody and Escajeda was unsure whether the strange scenario he faced posed a threat to his safety. Perhaps his fear that he might be walking into an ‘ambush’ was unfounded; in that event, the tasing could be excessive under prong one of the analysis. . . But even so, no authority cited by the plaintiffs remotely addresses the situation Escajeda faced. It follows, then, that Escajeda could not have been on notice that his single use of the taser was clearly unlawful. . . Furthermore, the district court did not ‘frame the constitutional question with specificity and granularity.’ . . The court asked about the proper use of tasers ‘against a subdued person.’ That is too general. It is one thing to ask whether police may tase someone after they have handcuffed him and put him face-down on the ground. . . It is quite another to ask whether an officer may tase someone who may be hanging himself, who may or may not have a weapon, who does not respond to the officer’s commands—all when the officer approaches him rapidly, alone, and in the dark. . . Even viewing the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, as we must, the unusual setting separates this case from routine pat-downs and arrests gone wrong where officers pointlessly or sadistically use force. Existing precedent did not put the lawfulness of Escajeda’s actions ‘beyond debate,’ . . and so his use of a taser under these unique circumstances did not violate clearly established law.”)

Macias v. Salazar, No. 21-51127, 2022 WL 3044654, at *3 (5th Cir. Aug. 2, 2022) (not reported) (“The district court held that the defendants violated Macias’s clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to his ‘basic human needs, including medical care and protection from harm.’. . . But that proposition is defined too generally to defeat the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity here. . . . As the defendants observe, neither the district court nor the plaintiffs identified any binding authority holding jailers liable for failing to provide medical care to a detainee who refused treatment. Instead, this court has held that it is not ‘clearly established that any jailer ... must either force a conscious, incompetent, but clearly refusing inmate to undergo medical treatment or seek a surrogate decision-maker for the same. Neither is there any statutory duty [under Texas law] to impose medical care or locate a surrogate in these or similar circumstances.’. . . Thus, plaintiffs have not alleged a violation of clearly established law. Despite this lack of clearly established law, this court must nonetheless consider whether the defendants’ ‘actions were objectively reasonable in light of that law that was then clearly established.’. . . We conclude that the defendants satisfied this standard. Again, we emphasize that pretrial detainees have a clearly established right ‘not to have their serious medical needs met with deliberate indifference on the part of the confining officials.’. . . But the plaintiffs do not allege that the defendants ignored Macias’s serious medical needs. Rather, they allege that Macias was admitted to the BCADC infirmary, where he was seen by multiple health care providers before he was twice admitted to the local hospital. These health care providers attempted to treat Macias, but he ‘refused his dialysis treatment and other daily needs.’ ‘Given the absence of even a single case constitutionally requiring the imposition of medical care ... in this or any similar context,’ it could not have been clear to every reasonable official that the defendants’ conduct would have violated Macias’s rights. . . . To be sure, the plaintiffs also allege that Macias did not receive mental health treatment during his detention. And mental health issues may qualify as a serious medical need that cannot be met with deliberate indifference. . . . But elsewhere in their complaint the plaintiffs acknowledge that the local hospital ‘provided medical and mental health care to Fernando Macias while he was incarcerated’ at BCADC. Macias was also listed for placement in the state mental health hospital. Although the plaintiffs allege that the defendants did not provide Macias with a psychiatrist or other mental health specialist while detained, they do not identify any precedent holding that doing so was constitutionally required where, as here, all agree that the detainee rejected most medical attention and nevertheless received some mental health treatment in jail while awaiting transfer to another facility for specialized care. Accordingly, the defendants’ conduct was objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law. They were thus entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court erred to the extent that it concluded otherwise.”) Tyson v. Sabine, 42 F.4th 508, ____ (5th Cir. 2022) (“Here, Deputy Boyd allegedly visited Tyson alone at her home under the pretense of a welfare check and coerced her to strip for his sexual gratification. He further ordered her to show him her clitoris while he masturbated to her exposed body. It is beyond dispute that no legitimate state interest can justify an officer’s use of coercion to compel the subject of a welfare check to expose her most private body parts for his sexual enjoyment. . . . Deputy Boyd’s alleged conduct was an outrageous abuse of power that shocks the conscience and violated Tyson’s right to bodily integrity. . . . Our holding that Deputy Boyd violated Tyson’s right to bodily integrity is not enough to defeat the defense of qualified immunity. Tyson must demonstrate that the right was clearly established when the challenged conduct occurred. . . .

. It is obvious that the right to bodily integrity forbids a law enforcement officer from sexually abusing a person by coercing them to perform nonconsensual physical sex acts for his enjoyment. As noted, we have long held that physical sexual abuse by a government official violates the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Regardless whether an officer uses physical or mental coercion, physical sexual abuse by a state official offends the Constitution. No reasonable officer could believe otherwise. We have little trouble finding that the constitutional offense was obvious because the physical sexual abuse alleged here is a ‘particularly egregious’ and ‘extreme circumstance[]’ of assault by a state official. . . . That Deputy Boyd’s alleged physical sexual abuse violated Tyson’s constitutional right to bodily integrity would have been obvious to any reasonable officer. . . . By their nature, cases addressing the most flagrant forms of unconstitutional conduct seldom rise to the court of appeals. . . . When they do, the obviousness exception ‘plays an important role in ... ensur[ing] vindication of the most egregious constitutional violations.’. . . No reasonable officer could believe that it was constitutionally permissible to use the pretense of legitimate police activity to sexually abuse a person by coercing her to perform physical sex acts for the officer’s sexual gratification. We hold that Tyson’s right against physical sexual abuse by a government official was clearly established.”)

Williams v. City of Yazoo, Mississippi, 41 F.4th 416, 426-27 (5th Cir. 2022) (“The defendants’ knowledge of Williams’s condition also means that the unlawfulness of their conduct was clearly established. To defeat the immunity defense, Williams’s survivors must show that his constitutional rights were clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . A right is clearly established if reasonable officials have notice that their actions are unlawful. . . . Caselaw must place the constitutional question ‘beyond debate,’ though it need not be ‘directly on point.’. . . Officers and jailers have long had notice that they cannot ignore a detainee’s serious medical needs. It is clearly established that an official who refuses to treat or ignores the complaints of a detainee violates their rights. . . . We are mindful that we must not define clearly established law ‘at too high a level of generality,’. . . . but we have seen cases like this before. . . . The facts of this case fit comfortably within Easter’s and Nerren’s teaching that law enforcement may not ignore reports that a detainee is suffering a serious medical emergency, particularly when those reports are backed by knowledge of a preexisting condition or trauma. Here, the reports came from numerous sources: Williams, his family, and his fellow detainees. At the time of Williams’s death, it was beyond debate that the defendants’ total failure to respond to his medical needs was unconstitutional. We do not know whether a jury will agree with Williams’s survivors’ and fellow detainees’ account of what happened the night of his death. But if they do, the defendants violated clearly established law by responding to Williams’s serious medical need with deliberate indifference. The district court correctly held that the federal denial-of-care claim can proceed to trial.”)

Fairchild v. Coryell County, Texas, 40 F.4th 359, 367-68 (5th Cir. 2022) (“The caselaw specificity required to overcome qualified immunity is lacking for the early parts of the fateful encounter. It is a close call whether it is clearly established that throwing Page to the ground was an excessive response to her tapping the hairbrush on the cell door. But given that the jailers did first seek compliance through verbal commands, we do not see the notice of unlawfulness that qualified immunity requires. And as we have noted, when Page took the handcuffs, it was not excessive for the jailers to try and overcome her resistance and subdue her. The knee strikes and punches may have crossed the line of excessiveness but—given the need to subdue Page at this juncture—not clearly so. The jailers thus cannot be liable for the early stage of the incident. But a jury’s finding that the jailers continued to apply pressure to Page’s neck, back, and legs for more than two minutes after she was subdued—Page at this point in the encounter was lying prone on her stomach with her hands handcuffed behind her back—would establish a violation of clearly established law. [citing cases] By the time of this October 2017 encounter, the law had thus ‘clearly established the unreasonableness of [Pelfrey’s and Lovelady’s] continued use of bodyweight force to hold [Page] in the prone restraint position after [she] was subdued and restrained.’”)

Salazar v. Molina, 37 F.4th 278, 282-88 (5th Cir. 2022) (“A reasonable officer will have little cause to doubt the apparent surrender of a compliant suspect who has not engaged in dangerous or evasive behavior. But when a suspect has put officers and bystanders in harm’s way to try to evade capture, it is reasonable for officers to question whether the now-cornered suspect’s purported surrender is a ploy. That’s especially true when a suspect is unrestrained, in close proximity to the officers, and potentially in possession of a weapon. . . . As Escobar [v. Montee, 895 F.3d 387 (5th Cir. 2018)] illustrates, a suspect cannot refuse to surrender and instead lead police on a dangerous hot pursuit—and then turn around, appear to surrender, and receive the same Fourth Amendment protection from intermediate force . . . he would have received had he promptly surrendered in the first place. Like Escobar, this case involves a fleeing felony suspect who eventually decided to surrender and was then temporarily subjected to intermediate force. . . . When Molina made the split-second decision to deploy his taser, Salazar had just committed a dangerous felony and was unrestrained at night in the open. Because of the preceding high-speed chase, Molina could reasonably be concerned about the sincerity of Salazar’s purported surrender. And the totality of the force deployed—a 10-second tasing—was comparatively modest and not grossly disproportionate to the threat Molina could have reasonably perceived. We hold that Molina’s conduct did not amount to an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . . On the undisputed facts before us, Salazar cannot show that Molina violated his Fourth Amendment rights. But even if he could, Molina would nonetheless be entitled to qualified immunity because Salazar can’t show a violation of clearly established law. . . . Salazar frames the applicable inquiry somewhat differently. He points to Hope v. Pelzer, . . . an Eighth Amendment case, as well as Fifth Circuit decisions that relied on Hope and predated City of Tahlequah and Rivas-Villegas. . . . It’s true Hope established that a plaintiff need not identify an on-point case to overcome qualified immunity when a violation is ‘obvious.’ . . . But Salazar does not argue that this case is obvious. Accordingly, Molina is ‘entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’ . . . By citing no factually similar Supreme Court cases, Salazar effectively concedes that Supreme Court precedent offers him no help. He turns instead to Fifth Circuit excessive-force cases. Even on the assumption that Fifth Circuit precedent can create clearly established law, see Rivas-Villegas, 142 S. Ct. at 7 (assuming the proposition), none of Salazar’s cases is a close enough fit. . . . To generalize a bit, all four of Salazar’s tasing-related cases share two characteristics that make them materially different from this case. First, they all involved far less-threatening circumstances than here—in none of them was the plaintiff suspected of a dangerous felony, and in two of them the plaintiff was suspected of no crime at all. Nor had the plaintiff just attempted to flee from officers. Second, all four involved far more force than was deployed here—so much force, in fact, that it killed two of the arrestees. Salazar points to no case where officers used a similar level of force in similarly threatening circumstances. And because this is an excessive-force case that required a split-second judgment, Salazar can only win if ‘the law [was] so clearly established that—in the blink of an eye, in the middle of a high-speed chase—every reasonable officer would know it immediately.’. . Salazar cannot meet that burden, so Molina is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 188 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 90 (2023) (“This Court has recognized the ‘clearly established right to timely release from prison.’. . Of course, ‘timely release’ is not the same as instantaneous release: it is reasonable for jailers to have some administrative delay in processing an inmate’s discharge. . . While courts have declined to define the amount of delay that is reasonable, . . . it is without question that holding without legal notice a prisoner for a month beyond the expiration of his sentence constitutes a denial of due process. . . Indeed, Defendants knew not just of delay, but that there was, on average, a month-long delay in receiving paperwork from the local jails. Therefore, they had ‘fair warning’ that their failure to address this delay would deny prisoners like Plaintiffs their immediate or near-immediate release upon conviction. . . We conclude that because a reasonable jury may find that Defendants’ inaction was objectively unreasonable in light of this clearly established law, they have failed to show they are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.”)

Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 198-203 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 90 (2023) (As in all qualified-immunity cases, our inquiry should start with the Constitution. It’s not immediately obvious which constitutional provision is implicated by plaintiffs’ ‘deliberate indifference on a failure-to-adopt-policies’ theory. It appears to be an amalgamation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. Neither the majority nor the parties pause to explain how either part of the Constitution, standing alone or combined with some other part, says anything to urge prison officials to adopt particular policies with particular alacrity. The majority and the parties likewise point to no Supreme Court precedent that requires any of the DPSC defendants to do anything at any time. Everyone instead points only to our precedent. . . Our precedent, in turn, requires two things. First, plaintiffs must show that defendants had ‘actual or constructive notice’ of a constitutional violation. Porter v. Epps, 659 F.3d 440, 447 (5th Cir. 2011). Second, there must be an ‘obvious’ causal link between the failure to adopt a particular policy and that same constitutional violation. . . . [T]he majority commits the tell-tale mistake that courts make when all else fails to deny qualified immunity: It lumps the defendants together. . . The law squarely prohibits such group pleading. . . What’s worse, the majority lumps the three DPSC defendants together with others—like the sheriffs—who are not before us. . . That’s the only way the majority can fault our three defendants for delays that were undisputedly caused by others. Our precedent squarely forecloses this entire enterprise to impose joint-and-several liability under § 1983. . . . [I]t’s absurd to charge Griffin and Stagg with 17 days of deliberate indifference. But let's say, for the sake of argument, that Griffin and Stagg knew their actions could cause 17 days of overdetention. Even still, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, because it is not clearly established that it violates the Constitution to hold a prisoner for 17 days while employing reasonable efforts to verify his sentence and calculate his release date. To show a violation of clearly established law, plaintiff must 'identify a case—usually, a body of relevant case law—in which an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Constitution.' . . . Whether the challenged conduct was unlawful must be obvious and without doubt. . . . It is not sufficient to define 'clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . The majority makes precisely that mistake, concluding 'there is a clearly established right to a timely release from prison.' . . . That general rule of law is undisputed—and gets us nowhere. What matters here is when release is sufficiently 'timely,' because as the majority concedes, "'timely release" is not the same as instantaneous release.' . . . That's why we held more than fifty years ago that a jailer's 'duty to his prisoner is not breached until the expiration of a reasonable time for the proper ascertainment of the authority upon which his prisoner is detained.' . . . So where's the line between timely (no constitutional violation) and untimely (constitutional violation)? Is 17 days reasonable or unreasonable? Courts have declined to draw a bright line. . . . Without a bright line, we're left to infer from precedent. And in considering that precedent, we can consider only holdings. . . . In the majority's only case, we held that detaining a prisoner for 'thirty days beyond the expiration of his sentence in the absence of a facially valid court order or warrant constitutes a deprivation of due process.' Douthit v. Jones, 619 F.2d 527, 532 (5th Cir. 1980). Just as a case regarding the unreasonableness of (say) ten taser strikes says nothing about the reasonableness of (say) one, so too does Douthit's 30-day holding say nothing about our 17-day case. Moreover, Douthit says nothing about DPSC's efforts during those 17 days to obtain plaintiffs' preclassification paperwork. Douthit is, in a word, irrelevant. But once again, all of this is beside the point because even if a precedent involving a 30-day overdetention somehow renders unconstitutional a 17-day overdetention, there is no conceivable basis for saying that result is 'obvious.' At very most, the majority can say that it wants to extend the 30-day case to give future plaintiffs the benefit of its new 17-day shot clock. But the whole point of qualified immunity is that, when courts change the law like that, it cannot fault the defendants before it with failing to predict the change. Section 1983 does not require officers to be Nostradamus. . . . A frequent criticism of our qualified-immunity doctrine is that it leaves some plaintiffs without a meaningful remedy for constitutional violations. That concern is irrelevant here. These plaintiffs had an obvious habeas remedy, as discussed in Part I. And even though the DPSC defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as discussed in Part II, the plaintiffs have viable claims against other defendants—namely the sheriffs. The district court denied the sheriffs' motions for summary judgment, and the sheriffs did not appeal. That means that regardless of what happens with the DPSC defendants here, these plaintiffs will get to go to trial and litigate their claims against officials at the Orleans Parish Sheriff's Office and the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office who actually caused their overdetention. That makes the majority's decision all the more inexplicable. I respectfully dissent.")

Sims v. Griffin, 35 F.4th 945, 949-52 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Under our caselaw, . . . Sims must also show that Qualls’s ‘rights were clearly established at the time of the violation.’ . . . A right is clearly established only once it is ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . Sims contends she has met that burden. She argues both that the law was sufficiently clear and that the officers’ conduct was obviously unconstitutional. . . . The officers disagree. As we agree with Sims that the law was clearly established, we need not decide whether the officers’ conduct was obviously unconstitutional. To show the law was sufficiently clear when the officers violated Qualls’s rights, Sims cannot define the ‘contours’ of Qualls’s rights too generally. Rather, Qualls’s rights must be defined ‘with a high degree of particularity.’ . . . That means Sims must ‘identify a case’ or ‘body of relevant case law’ holding that ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances . . . violated the [Constitution].’ . . . She did. The district court concluded, and Sims contends on appeal, that our decision in Easter v. Powell clearly established Qualls’s rights. In Easter, a case decided well before Qualls’s death, we explained that a prisoner can show his clearly established rights under the Eighth Amendment were violated if a prison official ‘refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in any similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for any serious medical needs.’ . . . Easter’s facts fit within that standard: ‘offer[ing] no treatment options to a patient with a history of cardiac problems who was experiencing severe chest pains.’ . . . The officers in this case acted similarly to the prison official in Easter. As recounted above, the district court found material fact disputes over whether all three officers acted deliberately indifferent towards Qualls. That means a reasonable jury could conclude on the evidence at this stage that each officer knew Qualls had swallowed a bag full of drugs, vomited multiple times, screamed for help, pleaded to go to the hospital, and had steadily deteriorated since his arrival at the jail. Further, a reasonable jury could conclude that no officer sought medical assistance for Qualls. In other words, a reasonable jury could find that the officers each refused to treat Qualls, ignored his cries for help, and overall evinced a wanton disregard for Qualls’s serious medical needs. The officers’ three counter arguments do not persuade us otherwise. First, the officers argue that the record does not support that they refused to treat Qualls. We disagree. As we already explained, the district court found a genuine fact dispute over whether each officer knew Qualls had asked to go to the hospital, and no officer took him or otherwise sought medical assistance for him. But even if it were true that the officers didn’t technically refuse to treat Qualls, it’s also of little consequence. Even if a jury merely finds that the officers ignored Qualls’s complaints or otherwise evinced a wanton disregard for his serious medical needs, then that would still be enough to support a violation of Qualls’s rights. . . . So whether the officers refused Qualls’s requests, or merely disregarded them, makes no difference on this record. Second, the officers argue that the district court and Sims identify ‘nothing more than the “broad general propositions” [we have] repeatedly held “are not enough to overcome qualified immunity.”’ But in the same breath the officers footnote their agreement that we have clearly established it violates a prisoner’s rights if officials ‘refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for serious medical need.’ That’s exactly what a reasonable jury could conclude on this record, and so this argument fails to persuade us. Third, the officers imply that Easter is distinguishable because the officers here monitored Qualls, provided him sustenance, spoke with him, cleaned him and his cell, and so on. But those facts aren't as helpful to the officers as they think. Prominently missing in this record are any facts suggesting the officers addressed Qualls's serious medical needs—what matters under Easter. . . More importantly, these facts capture in a nutshell why the officers aren't entitled to qualified immunity at this point. On this record and without considering genuineness, the officers had a front-row seat to Qualls's agonizing demise but did nothing to stop it. . . Our review at this stage is hemmed in. Perhaps the jury will discount Sims's evidence. . . Perhaps not. All we can say now is that (1) the fact disputes identified by the district court are material to Sims's deliberate indifference claims, and (2) our decision in Easter clearly established Qualls's rights before the officers allegedly violated them.”)

Solis v. Serrett, 31 F.4th 975, 986-88 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Since May 2019, we have decided numerous cases with facts even more like this case than Trammell or Hanks, and we have repeatedly found no constitutional violation. . . . Although Tucker, Craig, and Betts were decided after the incident at issue here, they demonstrate that as of May 2019 the constitutional question at issue here was far from ‘beyond debate.’. . . Moreover, it is telling that in none of these cases did the court find a ‘clearly established’ right. If the law was not sufficiently clear to deny qualified immunity in these factual similarly cases, it follows that no ‘clearly established’ right exists here.”)

Stokes v. Matranga, No. 21-30129, 2022 WL 1153125, at *3-4 (5th Cir. Apr. 19, 2022) (not reported) (“To overcome Sergeant Matranga’s qualified immunity defense, Betancourt must show that Sergeant Matranga’s conduct (1) violated a constitutional right and (2) that ‘the right at issue was “clearly established” at the time of [the] alleged misconduct.’. . . Courts may address either prong in the qualified immunity analysis or both. . . Here, we conclude that Sergeant Matranga is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions did not violate ‘clearly established’ law. . . . Even if an officer makes a warrantless arrest without probable cause, qualified immunity immunizes the officer from suit unless that ‘officer had fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.’. . . Betancourt has not shown that Sergeant Matranga violated clearly established law. Louisiana’s Terrorizing statute prohibits the (1) ‘intentional communication’ of (2) ‘information that the commission of a crime of violence is imminent’ with the (3) ‘intent of causing members of the general public to be in sustained fear for their safety; or causing evacuation of a building ...; or causing other serious disruption to the general public.’. . . At the time of the first arrest, Sergeant Matranga had seen a photo of Betancourt posing next to a caricature of himself labeled ‘Future School Shooter.’ Sergeant Matranga also knew that someone had posted the photo to social media and that parents of other students had called the school to express concerns or to ask about taking their kids out of school. Even assuming that Sergeant Matranga lacked actual probable cause, the court cannot conclude that every reasonable officer in his shoes would know that arresting Betancourt based on that information would violate the Fourth Amendment. So, too, with the second arrest. At that time, Sergeant Matranga had interviewed both Betancourt and the student who drew the caricature. In his interview, Betancourt told Sergeant Matranga about the circumstances of the photo and insisted that it was all just a joke. Betancourt argues that Sergeant Matranga had no evidence of criminal intent and therefore lacked probable cause. But even so, the court cannot conclude that every reasonable officer with that information would so conclude. More importantly, Betancourt does not even attempt to identify a single case where a court found that an officer violated the Fourth Amendment in similar circumstances. Nor has this court's research revealed any such case. It is not enough to merely invoke the general prohibition on arrests without probable cause. . . Thus, Betancourt has not satisfied his burden to overcome the qualified immunity defense. We AFFIRM.”)

Stokes v. Matranga, No. 21-30129, 2022 WL 1153125, at *4, *8 (5th Cir. Apr. 19, 2022) (not reported) (Duncan, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent. No reasonable officer, knowing what Sergeant Matranga knew, would have thought Lennon Betancourt was guilty of anything. Lennon’s arrest was based on an obviously satiric photo (1) that Lennon didn’t take, (2) that Lennon didn’t post online, and (3) that grew out of a classroom prank Lennon’s own teacher was in on. Matranga knew all that—and yet he arrested Lennon, clapped him in jail, and misled the district attorney into charging him with ‘terrorizing,’ a crime punishable by a $15,000 fine and 15 years in prison. Before these absurd charges were dropped, Lennon’s mother had to hire a lawyer and Lennon was expelled from school. Qualified immunity does not protect the officer who orchestrated this outrageous clown show. . . . Nothing in the statute or the caselaw justified Matranga’s belief that Lennon had committed terrorizing by allowing his photo to be taken in front a caricature of himself labeled ‘Future School Shooter,’ especially after he learned about the innocuous origins of the photo. . . In short, no reasonable officer would have concluded there was probable cause to arrest Lennon for terrorizing or for any other crime, especially after the officer learned facts dissipating any probable cause. I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority’s holding that Sergeant Matranga is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Templeton v. Jarmillo, 28 F.4th 618, 623 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Templeton alleges he experienced pain in his shoulder from tight handcuffing that occurred over a matter of minutes. This allegation is insufficient to raise an excessive force claim. Disagreeing at least with the implications of the district court’s analysis of Heitschmidt, we conclude it is no outlier. Far differently than the brief handcuffing in the present case, Heitschmidt was painfully handcuffed for over four hours, prevented from using the bathroom, and suffered ‘serious and permanent’ injury from the handcuffing. . . Those are not the allegations here. Facts matter in excessive force claims. Based on the alleged facts in the complaint, Templeton failed to state a claim that the officers violated his clearly established rights.”)

Buehler v. Dear, 27 F.4th 969, 992-93 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Buehler asserts that the officers arrested him in retaliation for filming the officers in a public setting, an activity protected by the First Amendment’s freedom-of-speech guarantee. The district court, relying on our 2017 decision in Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, . . . held that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity from Buehler’s retaliation claim, since it was not clearly established at the time of his arrest in August 2015 that the right to publicly film police was protected by the First Amendment. The district court properly dismissed Buehler’s First Amendment retaliation claim. Buehler is correct that the First Amendment guarantees, subject to reasonable limitations, a right to publicly film police. We are bound, however, by our holding in Turner (a published opinion) that the First Amendment right to film police was not clearly established in this circuit as of September 2015. . . . And it follows a fortiori from Turner's holding that neither was such a right clearly established a month earlier. Buehler's First Amendment claims against the Officers thus cannot proceed.”)

Bevill v. Fletcher, 26 F.4th 270, 279-81 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Defendants argue that the law was not clearly established that ‘any person other than the ultimate decision-maker could be liable for First Amendment retaliatory termination,’ until this court issued its opinion in Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2018). According to Defendants, because their purported unconstitutional conduct occurred a year before this court issued the Sims decision, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The district court determined that Sims settled a question distinct from the one posed here—namely, whether a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff can be held liable for influencing a final decisionmaker to terminate the plaintiff’s employment. The district court went on to explain that another case, Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc), clearly established that Defendants were not unfettered by the First Amendment, long before Defendants allegedly retaliated against Bevill. . . . We agree with the district court that Sims settled the question whether a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff can be held liable for First Amendment retaliation under § 1983 for influencing a final decisionmaker to terminate the plaintiff’s employment. That question is distinct from the one posed here—whether a governmental official, not a supervisor/coworker of the plaintiff, can be held liable for First Amendment retaliation under § 1983 for influencing the plaintiff’s employer to terminate the plaintiff’s employment. . . . [T]he district court concluded that Sims was inapplicable because it dealt with ‘retaliatory employment termination in the context of an employment relationship,’ i.e., all parties were employed by the same governmental agency. The district court determined that Kinney instead controlled because it ‘contemplated the situation in which a government [official], because of retaliatory animus, uses his or her position to influence a third-party employer to terminate one of its employees for exercising his or her First Amendment rights.’ Applying Kinney, the district court concluded that Defendants ‘had “fair warning” that allegedly using their respective government positions to violate Plaintiff’s First Amendment rights would be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law at the time.’ We agree with the district court that Kinney controls.”)

Bevill v. Fletcher, 26 F.4th 270, 284-85 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting) (“All agree that Terry Bevill must overcome qualified immunity to sue these defendants for First Amendment retaliation. . . . And all agree that Bevill cannot overcome qualified immunity unless ‘the court [can] point to controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’ . . . The majority finds the requisite authority in Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 347 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc). Yet it takes the majority seven pages of writing—plus one page of elegant geometric diagramming—to explain how Kinney clearly established the right the defendants allegedly violated. . . . And never mind that Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2018), which we decided shortly after the events giving rise to this case, described the law in this area as ‘confus[ed]’ and ‘unsettled’ before trying to ‘provide the overdue clarification.’. . . Whatever one might think about qualified immunity, I think we’re duty bound to say the law is not clearly established when it takes a full-page flow chart to hold otherwise. I respectfully dissent.”)

Harmon v. City of Arlington, Texas, 16 F.4th 1159, 1164-67 & n.7 (5th Cir. 2021) (“The reasonableness inquiry is inherently factbound, making the video of this ten-second event critical. . . While Tran was waiting with Terry and Harmon, Terry abruptly rolled up the windows and reached for his keys. Tran immediately shouted ‘hey, hey, hey, hey’ and ‘hey stop,’ grabbed onto the SUV’s passenger window, and stepped onto the running board (a narrow ledge at the base of the SUV doors designed to assist passengers climbing into the car). Ignoring Tran’s commands to stop what he was doing, Terry started the car, put it in gear, and started to drive off—with Tran hanging onto the passenger window, perched on the narrow running board. Before Terry accelerated, Tran kept his pistol holstered. But about a second after the car lurched forward, Tran drew his pistol and shot Terry four times. That brief interval—when Tran is clinging to the accelerating SUV and draws his pistol on the driver—is what the court must consider to determine whether Tran reasonably believed he was at risk of serious physical harm. . . That belief was reasonable. . . Indeed, what came next illustrates the danger Tran faced. Several seconds after Tran shot Terry, while the SUV was still moving, Tran fell off the running board and into the busy street. . . Common sense confirms that falling off a moving car onto the street can result in serious physical injuries. Moreover, as Tran tumbled across the asphalt, the car’s rear tires nearly overran his limbs. That this near miss occurred after Tran had shot Terry is of no moment; it confirms that Tran could reasonably perceive a serious threat of harm as Terry drove away with Tran holding onto the SUV. The plaintiffs attempt to refute that conclusion by arguing that being ‘at’ the side of a moving vehicle does not pose a threat of harm because ‘the existence of the threat generally turns on whether the person is in the vehicle’s path.’ But Tran faced a different threat altogether. The threat of falling from a vehicle in motion is unrelated to whether Tran was in the vehicle’s path. As a result, Terry’s analogy to cases where officers were ‘at’ the vehicle’s side, and not in its path, falls flat. The plaintiffs also contend that Tran could have simply stepped off the running board and let Terry drive away, the availability of that alternative, they argue, makes Tran’s use of deadly force unreasonable. But qualified immunity precedent forbids that sort of Monday morning quarterbacking; the threat of harm must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.’. . . Heeding the Supreme Court’s admonition, this court consistently rejects such arguments. . . .Significantly, the plaintiffs have cited no case in which a law enforcement officer, holding onto a suspect’s car as it drove away, has been held to have used unconstitutionally excessive force to restrain the driver. In sum, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and drawing every reasonable inference in plaintiff’s favor, Tran’s use of deadly force was not excessive under the circumstances because he could reasonably apprehend serious physical harm to himself as an unwilling passenger on the side of Terry’s fleeing vehicle. . . .Even if they could allege sufficient facts showing a constitutional violation, the plaintiffs do not show that Tran violated any ‘clearly established’ constitutional right. The burden here is heavy: A right is ‘clearly established’ only if preexisting precedent ‘ha[s] placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . And, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly admonished lower courts, we must define that constitutional question with specificity. . . . Indeed, ‘[t]he dispositive question is “whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.”’. . . The specificity requirement assumes special significance in excessive force cases, where officers must make split-second decisions to use force. . . . To overcome qualified immunity, the law must be so clearly established that every reasonable officer in this factual context—an officer holding onto the side of a fleeing car where the driver has ignored instructions to stop—would have known he could not use deadly force. The plaintiffs here attempt to identify relevant, ‘clearly established’ law in only two cases: Lytle v. Bexar County, 560 F.3d 404 (5th Cir. 2009) and Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 105 S. Ct. 1694 (1985). But neither case clearly establishes squarely governing precedent. . . . The plaintiffs also attempt to extract, from Lytle and several out-of-circuit cases, . . . the principle that ‘an officer lacks an objectively reasonable basis for believing his own safety is at risk—and therefore cannot use concerns about his own safety to justify deadly force—when he is not in the path of the vehicle.’ That Lytle and those other cases do ‘clearly establish’ such a principle is dubious.⁷ [fn. 7: The Supreme Court has repeatedly expressed uncertainty about whether circuit-level precedent is controlling for purposes of qualified immunity. See Dist. of Columbia v. Wesby, — U.S. —, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8 (2018); Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. 13, 17, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014); Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 665-66, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012).] Be that as it may, it has no bearing on this case. An officer standing at the side of a fleeing vehicle faces a different risk calculus than the officer clinging onto the side of a fleeing vehicle. Lytle and the other cases cannot put the constitutional question ‘beyond debate.’. . . At most, Garner prohibits using deadly force against an unarmed burglary suspect fleeing on foot who poses no immediate threat. Viewing Garner through that narrower lens, as we must, reveals that Garner does little to establish law so that every reasonable officer in Tran’s shoes would have known he could not use deadly force. Finally, the plaintiffs argue that this is an ‘obvious’ case under Garner, rendering it unnecessary to identify any particular case that puts the constitutional question beyond doubt. No doubt ‘obvious’ excessive force cases can arise. . . . But they are so rare that the Supreme Court has never identified one in the context of excessive force. Because this officer faced an all too ‘obvious’ threat of harm, further speculation based on Garner is out of line. The clearly established inquiry is demanding, especially in claims for excessive force. . . . Because the plaintiff must point to a case almost squarely on point, qualified immunity will protect ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. . . Here, the plaintiffs failed to identify any clearly established law that would place beyond doubt the constitutional question in this case, whether it is unreasonable for an officer to use deadly force when he has become an unwilling passenger on the side of a fleeing vehicle. As a result, their excessive force claims cannot succeed.”) Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 204-10 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) (“We are bound by the restrictive analysis of ‘clearly established’ set forth in numerous Supreme Court precedents. . . . Supreme Court cases have been repeated and consistent on this high standard at the second prong. . . . It might seem that things changed with the recent opinion in Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52 (2020) (per curiam). But, instead, that decision emphasizes the high standard.

In Taylor, the Supreme Court vacated our grant of qualified immunity to a group of corrections officers for an alleged Eighth Amendment violation. . . . But that was based upon the Supreme Court’s conclusion of how ‘particularly egregious’ and over the top the misconduct at issue was Accordingly, under Taylor, plaintiffs are only excused of their obligation to identify an analogous case in ‘extreme circumstances’ where the constitutional violation is ‘obvious.’ . . . The first issue we address is whether Laws’s failure to immediately intervene after Monroe strangled himself and decision to instead wait until another jailer arrived was constitutionally unlawful under clearly established law. Laws’s decision not to enter Monroe’s cell was in line with his training and the jail’s policy that jailers not enter the cell until back up arrives. . . . We conclude that Laws’s decision to wait for Brixey before entering the cell did not violate any clearly established constitutional right. Specifically, it would not be ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that’ waiting for a backup officer to arrive in accordance with prison policy ‘violates [a pretrial detainee’s] right.’ . . . Since our case law supports that jailers who follow policies aimed at protecting the jailer should not be considered deliberately indifferent to an inmate’s medical need, . . . Laws is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . But watching an inmate attempt suicide and failing to call for emergency medical assistance is not a reasonable response. This was especially true in the situation at hand, where jail policy did not permit Laws to personally enter the jail cell to assist Monroe until a second staff member arrived. Calling for emergency assistance was a precaution that Laws knew he should have taken, and failing to do so was both unreasonable and an effective disregard for the risk to Monroe’s life. . . . For these reasons, we now make clear that promptly failing to call for emergency assistance when a detainee faces a known, serious medical emergency—e.g., suffering from a suicide attempt—constitutes unconstitutional conduct. As explained above, in determining whether the law was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred, constitutional rights must not be defined at a high level of generality. . . . Until today, we have not spoken directly on whether failing to call for emergency assistance in response to a serious threat to an inmate’s life constitutes deliberate indifference. . . . Unlike the officers in Taylor, Laws did nothing so extreme or even close as forcing an inmate to sleep naked in raw sewage. . . . The failings of Laws are in a time of minutes and lack of complete action, not days and affirmative misconduct. . . . Accordingly, even though Laws fails on the first prong, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity.”) Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 210-12 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) (“Here, Brixey had placed Monroe on a temporary suicide watch, and Cogdill was aware that Monroe had attempted suicide by hanging the day before. However, the record does not suggest that any inmate had previously attempted suicide by strangulation with a phone cord; nor is there non-speculative evidence that Brixey and Cogdill were aware of this danger. . . . The danger posed by the phone cord was not as obvious as the dangers posed by bedding, which is a well-documented risk that has been frequently used in suicide attempts. . . . We therefore conclude, under these facts and circumstances, that Brixey’s and Cogdill’s holding of Monroe in a cell containing a phone cord did not violate a clearly established constitutional right.”¹² [fn.12 Recently, in Sanchez v. Oliver, we determined that summary judgment on the plaintiff’s deliberate indifference claim was inappropriate where the defendant had placed a suicidal inmate ‘in general population, with ready access to blankets, other potential ligatures, and tie-off points.’. . . Sanchez did not involve the possible dangers of phone cords; hence, whatever its import, Sanchez did not hold that, at the time relevant for this case, it was clearly established that a defendant violates the Constitution by placing a suicidal inmate in a cell containing a phone cord. In short, Sanchez is not contrary to our conclusion here.] . . . Cope also alleges that Brixey and Cogdill acted with deliberate indifference when they staffed the jail with just one jailer even though they knew both that Monroe was on suicide watch and that the jail’s policy did not allow for the jailer to intervene until backup arrived. Coleman County employs only one weekend jailer due to budgetary constraints. Our precedent suggests that municipalities, not individuals, should generally be held liable for city policies. . . Thus, at the time of the suicide, no clearly established precedent suggested that Brixey and Cogdill could be liable under an episodic-acts theory for staffing the jail in line with Coleman County’s budget and policies. Cope has cited no case law providing that jailers must deviate from the typical staffing procedures if they believe that a detainee is a suicide risk. We, therefore, hold that Brixey’s and Cogdill’s decision to staff only one weekend jailer did not violate any clearly established constitutional right.”) Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 212, 215-220, 226-29 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (“Monroe’s tragic death resulted not just from egregious acts and omissions by Coleman County Jail staff after he was taken into custody on September 29, 2017. The jail leadership’s decision to implement policies that they knew to be inadequate also contributed to Monroe’s avoidable suicide. In particular, the jail maintains only one jailer on duty during nights and weekends. But jail policy forbids a jailer from entering a cell without backup support. Thus, on nights and weekends, jail policy effectively prevents the lone jailer from rescuing a known suicidal detainee who is actively committing suicide inside a cell. . . . Detainee Monroe’s death by his own hand with a thirty-inch cord in plain sight of a jailer while emergency medical services were on duty only five minutes away is especially tragic. In this interlocutory appeal from the district court’s denial of qualified immunity, the legal questions for this court are (1) whether the acts and omissions of each of the defendants individually amounted to deliberate indifference and therefore violated Monroe’s constitutional rights and (2) if so, whether Monroe’s constitutional right to be free from each Defendants’ deliberate indifference was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . In this case, Defendants were all aware of Laws’s risk of suicide. Their responses to this known risk convince me that a reasonable jury could find that they each effectively disregarded the risk by acting in a manner that they knew or believed was likely inadequate in light of the circumstances. . . . [V]iewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and making all reasonable inferences in their favor—as we must in this appeal—the officers violated clearly established law. It should be for a jury to decide the factual question of whether Defendants ‘responded reasonably’ to the grave and urgent situation and thus were deliberately indifferent to the risk of suicide. . . . Departing from longstanding and binding precedent, the majority erroneously grants the officers’ qualified immunity defense by embracing an excessively narrow definition of the clearly established rights at issue and the risk of harm Monroe faced. Because I would follow our court’s deliberate-indifference caselaw and affirm the district court’s denial of qualified immunity on several of Plaintiffs’ claims, I respectfully dissent.

. . . Given that the focus of a deliberate-indifference claim is on the jailer's subjective knowledge and intent, it is apparent that, in the uniquely extreme and consequential circumstance where a jail official is aware of a prisoner's risk of suicide but 'effectively disregards' that risk, the jailer has violated clearly established law. . . Put another way, it is always clearly, objectively unreasonable for a jail official to intentionally disregard a known suicide risk. Therefore, in this context—deliberate indifference by a jailer who knows that a detainee in his custody and care is at risk of suicide—establishing prong one of the qualified-immunity test necessarily satisfies the demands of prong two. A showing that a jailer violated the Fourteenth Amendment by being deliberately indifferent to a known suicide risk is necessarily also a showing that the official's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.' . . Put simply, the two prongs of the qualified-immunity test merge in this specific situation. . . . There is no need for a prior case to put an officer on notice that a situation presents a risk of inmate suicide or that a particular sort of response is unreasonable because, by the very nature of a deliberate-indifference claim, the officer must actually know both of these things in order for a constitutional violation to occur. . . In sum, if an officer faced with the greatest possible risk—the loss of a human life that an officer is charged with protecting—intentionally disregards that known risk by either failing to act or acting in a manner that is so clearly inadequate as to permit the inference that the officer knew or believed that his 'response' was substantially likely to be ineffectual but did not care, the officer's conduct contravenes clearly established law. The majority asserts, however, that the determination that a jailer effectively disregarded a prisoner's known risk of suicide is not sufficient to satisfy the strictures of the qualified-immunity analysis. Their conclusion rests on two errors in the qualified-immunity analysis. First, the majority takes an incredibly narrow approach to defining the clearly established right at issue, claiming that the right must be defined much more specifically than simply the right of a suicidal detainee to be free from a deliberately indifferent response by officers charged with his supervision. Second, having defined the clearly established right in an overly narrow manner, the majority requires in effect that Plaintiffs point to a case with virtually identical facts to prove that this excessively narrow description of the right has been clearly established. . . Both of these propositions are contrary to what our precedent in the detainee-suicide context demands. . . . Though the majority cites Taylor, it fails to absorb and apply the case's lesson. In the majority's view, because the conduct of Defendants here was not as extreme as that of the guards in Taylor, the Supreme Court's decision is inapplicable. . . But this essentially repeats the very same analytical error this court made in Taylor and which the Supreme Court found necessary to correct. Rather than asking only whether the facts here are closely analogous to Taylor and thus if there exists an on-point precedent—which is essentially the majority's analysis—Taylor teaches that the proper qualified-immunity inquiry must also ask whether the violation was so obvious that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' their conduct 'offended the Constitution.' . . And because, as discussed above, deliberate indifference by an officer in the face of an inmate's known risk of suicide is always objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law, such a violation will necessarily be 'obvious' in that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' their conduct 'offended the Constitution.' . . Where the violation at issue is intentionally disregarding a known suicide risk, this standard is clearly met. In sum, in the deeply alarming circumstance where a detainee is known by jail officials to be at risk of suicide, a response by those officials that deliberately ‘effectively disregards’ that risk violates clearly established law in a manner that should be clear to all reasonable officers. . . Such facts would thus defeat qualified immunity if proven. . . For the reasons outlined below, a reasonable jury could infer that Laws was deliberately indifferent by failing promptly to contact emergency services once Monroe had begun actively choking himself and Cogdill and Brixey were likewise deliberately indifferent for housing Monroe by himself in a cell with a lengthy phone cord. . . . Cogdill and Brixey adhered to a policy of maintaining just one jailer on duty even when a suicidal detainee was in the jail’s custody, despite knowing that this policy was unsafe, and instead of transferring suicidal detainees to better equipped facilities or keeping a second jailer on duty—policies that they knew were available to them. A jury could determine that the supervisors’ were deliberately indifferent based on their ‘failure to adopt [] polic[ies]’ when they knew—as any reasonable jailer would know—that the consequence of not implementing these policies was likely to be an in-custody suicide. . . . To summarize, Cogdill and Brixey chose to house Monroe, who they knew was a suicide risk, alone in a cell with a thirty-inch long phone cord despite (1) their training, which generally advised against housing suicidal prisoners by themselves; (2) their knowledge that there were other, safer facilities to house Monroe and that they had a duty to relocate him if their jail could not adequately protect Monroe; (3) the risk posed by the lengthy cord, which was both obvious and a specific risk that a jury could infer that the officials were made aware of by the Texas Jail Commission. Considering this evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, a juror could conclude that Cogdill and Brixey knew or believed that their response to Monroe’s risk of suicide was deficient and therefore possessed a ‘state of mind more blameworthy than lack of due care.’ . . Put differently, one could conclude that the officers ‘effectively disregarded’ the risk of harm to Monroe. . . Plaintiffs have thus raised material questions as to whether each officer independently was deliberately indifferent and, as explained above, have therefore also established a violation of clearly established law. . . . Qualified immunity is not the judicial equivalent of the Armor of Achilles, an impenetrable shield that governmental actors can wield to insulate themselves from liability no matter how flagrant their conduct. As the Supreme Court has recently reminded this court, qualified immunity vanishes where an official’s action or inaction so obviously violates the Constitution that ‘any reasonable officer should have realized’ the unlawfulness of the conduct. . . And ‘any reasonable officer’ would know that it offends the Constitution to be deliberately indifferent to a detainee’s known risk of suicide. Taking the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a reasonable juror could conclude that the officers here responded with deliberate indifference to the risk that pretrial detainee Derrek Monroe would commit suicide, and therefore the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. It should be left to a jury to weigh the competing evidence and resolve the factual disputes, most particularly Defendants’ subjective states of mind. Instead, today’s majority ends all claims against all officers by erroneously granting them qualified immunity. Because the majority misapprehends decades of clearly established law and denies Plaintiffs the jury trial to which they are entitled, I respectfully dissent.”)

leave the school after engaging in disruptive behavior. The district court denied summary judgment based on its conclusion that the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, supported a finding of excessive force under a Fourth Amendment analysis. Although some of our cases have applied the Fourth Amendment to school official's use of force, other cases have held that such claims cannot be brought. That divide in our authority is the antithesis of clearly established law supporting the existence of Fourth Amendment claims in this context. As a result, the defendant prevails on his qualified immunity defense. . . . A plaintiff can overcome an official's qualified immunity if he can show '(1) that the official violated a statutory or constitutional right, and (2) that the right was "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . Courts can choose which of these elements to address first. . . We resolve this case on the second ground because our law does not clearly establish a student's Fourth Amendment claim against school officials. We start with an issue on which our law is quite clear even if it is at odds with the law in other circuits: students cannot assert substantive due process claims against school officials based on disciplinary actions. See Fee v. Herndon, 900 F.2d 804 (5th Cir. 1990). . . . Fee has been criticized, . . . but remains binding in our circuit, T.O. v. Fort Bend Ind. Sch. Dist., -- F.3d --, 2021 WL 2461233, at *2-3 (June 17, 2021). What about the Fourth Amendment right J.W. asserts? Perhaps the rejection of a substantive due process right does not also doom the more specific right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . . And the Fourth Amendment's companion right to be free from unreasonable searches applies in schools, though its protections are lessened to account for pedagogical interests. . . J.W. can find some support in our caselaw for his Fourth Amendment claim. In a case dealing with a student's claim of excessive detention (though not excessive force), we said that the Fourth Amendment 'right extends to seizures by or at the direction of school officials.' Hassan v. Lubbock Indep. Sch. Dist., 55 F.3d 1075, 1079 (5th Cir. 1995). . . . The problem for J.W. is that at least one decision from our court, albeit an unpublished one, rejected the notion of Fourth Amendment claims based on school discipline. We reasoned that allowing a Fourth Amendment challenge to a teacher's choking a student would 'eviscerate this circuit's rule against prohibiting substantive due process claims' based on the same conduct. Flores v. Sch. Bd. of DeSoto Par., 116 F. App'x 504, 510 (5th Cir. 2004) (unpublished). The even bigger obstacle to J.W.'s claim may be Fee's comment, though the case did not involve a Fourth Amendment claim, that 'the paddling of recalcitrant students does not constitute a [F]ourth [A]mendment search or seizure.' 900 F.2d at 810. The upshot is that our law is, at best for Paley, inconsistent on whether a student has a Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive disciplinary force applied by school officials. That does not make for either the 'controlling authority' or 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' needed to show a right is clearly established. . . The best case for J.W., and the one the district court understandably relied on, is Curran. Although that case did allow a Fourth Amendment claim against a school resource officer to get past summary judgment, the defendant had not argued that a student's Fourth Amendment claim was at odds with Fee. As qualified immunity is an affirmative defense, . . . the officer's failure to assert immunity on the grounds that students cannot bring Fourth Amendment excessive force claims meant the question was not squarely before the court. Citing many of the cases we have just discussed, our court recently held that a plaintiff could not identify a clearly established Fourth Amendment right against school officials' use of excessive force. See T.O.,

T.O. v. Fort Bend ISD, 2 F.4th 407, 415-16 (5th Cir. 2021) (“This court has not conclusively determined whether the momentary use of force by a teacher against a student constitutes a Fourth Amendment seizure. We have rejected Fourth Amendment claims brought by a student who was choked by a teacher on the basis that allowing such claims to proceed would ‘eviscerate this circuit’s rule against prohibiting substantive due process claims’ stemming from the same injuries. But we have also noted that the claims of excessive force and unlawful arrest against other school officials ‘are properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment.’ In light of this inconsistency in our caselaw, we cannot say that it was clearly established, at the time of the incident, that Abbott’s actions were illegal under the Fourth Amendment. Plaintiffs-Appellants unpersuasively attempt to avoid this outcome by suggesting that Fee has been abrogated by Knick v. Township of Scott and Kingsley v. Hendrickson. Not so. Knick concerns Fifth Amendment Takings claims, and Kingsley concerns excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees—circumstances markedly distinguishable from substantive due process claims brought in an educational context. In any event, Knick was decided after the offending incident in this case, and Kingsley has never been interpreted by this court as altering the law in the manner Plaintiffs-Appellants suggest. Even if these cases do call Fee’s validity into question, they would not have been sufficient to put Abbott on notice of the illegality of her conduct at the time of the incident. To defeat a claim of qualified immunity, the illegality of the conduct must be ‘clearly established’ at the time it took place. It is certainly true that ‘[b]y now, every school teacher ... must know that inflicting pain on a student ... violates that student’s constitutional right to bodily integrity.’ But, for more than thirty years, the law of this circuit has clearly protected disciplinary corporal punishment from constitutional scrutiny. Neither Knick nor Kingsley permits us to deviate from our established precedent in this regard.” footnotes omitted)

Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395, 411-21 (5th Cir. 2021) (“To summarize, the first Graham factor—the severity of any crime of which Aguirre was suspected—weighs in favor of it being unreasonable and excessive for the Officers to hold Aguirre in the dangerous maximal-restraint position for five and a half minutes, and there are at very least genuine disputes as to the second two Graham factors—whether Aguirre posed a safety threat to Officers or others or was resisting the Officer’s efforts to remove him from the highway and hold him safely until the police wagon arrived. These disputes as to material facts alone are enough to preclude a finding at summary judgment that the force used by the Officers in holding Aguirre in a hog-tie like position was constitutionally reasonable, for, under Graham and its progeny, it is unreasonable for an officer to use injurious force against a non-resisting, non-dangerous individual who is not suspected of a serious crime, which we must assume occurred here under Aguirre’s version of events. . . This is especially so when the force is applied after the suspect has been restrained and subdued, as may have been the case here. . . Indeed, several of our sister circuits have specifically applied these basic principles in cases involving maximal restraint techniques like the one the Officers employed against Aguirre. . . However, Plaintiffs also contend the Officers’ use of force was excessive for a second reason: it amounted to the unconstitutional use of deadly force. . . . Claims that law enforcement unreasonably utilized deadly force are treated as a special subset of excessive force claims. . . . The Supreme Court held in Scott that there is no ‘magical on/off switch that triggers rigid preconditions whenever an officer’s actions constitute “deadly force,”’ and such claims are broadly analyzed under the same general rubric of ‘reasonableness’ as other excessive force claims. . . . At bottom, the Court held, a Fourth Amendment challenge to deadly force still calls for a ‘balanc[ing of the] nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests against the importance of the governmental interests alleged to justify the intrusion.’ . . . Nevertheless, we have long held that the use of ‘deadly force’ is unreasonable where the officer does not have ‘probable cause to believe that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others,’ . . . and we know of no case that has departed from this basic principle. . . . And, although ‘[l]ower courts ... have struggled with whether to characterize various police tools and instruments as “deadly force,”’ this court defines deadly force as force that ‘creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury.’ . . . As discussed above, . . . the record at the very least reflects a genuine dispute of fact as to whether Aguirre was resisting or otherwise posed a threat of serious physical injury to the Officers or others so as to make the use of the prone maximal-restraint position necessary or potentially reasonable. These same factual disputes, relevant to whether the force was generally excessive to the situation, also preclude summary judgment under our case law’s ‘deadly force’ analysis. . . . These facts are material because, if a jury concludes that the Officers had reason to believe Aguirre was on drugs and that he posed no threat of serious bodily harm at the time the Officers used the maximal restraint position against him, the Plaintiffs will have established that the Officers violated Aguirre’s constitutional right to be free from the unreasonable use of deadly force. . . . In sum, facts material to whether the Officers violated Aguirre’s Fourth Amendment rights are genuinely disputed. The lack of visible resistance by Aguirre, the presence of numerous Officers surrounding him, and the fact that the Officers had already blocked off several lanes and caused traffic to slow significantly all weigh against the inference of any immediate safety threat or other need that would justify placing Aguirre in the prone maximal-restraint position. ‘[A] jury could conclude that no reasonable officer would have perceived [Aguirre] as posing an immediate threat to the officers’ [or his own or the public’s] safety,’ . . . meaning that the Officers’ use of what may have amounted to deadly force was necessarily excessive of any need to mitigate a public safety threat. Likewise, ‘a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer on the scene would have thought that [Aguirre] was resisting arrest,’ . . . meaning that the use of force far exceeded the amount necessary to effect Aguirre’s arrest or ensure his safety. Although the Officers presented their own version of events that included claims of Aguirre’s resistance—including, for example that he ‘was resisting and trying to pull away from’ the Officers while walking near the westbound side of the median, ‘was still resisting’ when placed on the hood of the car, and ‘continued to resist by shifting his body around and trying to break free’ while pinned against the hood of the patrol car—these averments in contravention of what the police dashcam videos show do no more than reinforce that genuine disputes as to material facts exist at this stage of the litigation. . . . As set out below, I conclude that this court’s precedents demonstrate that, if they indeed employed excessive and deadly force in the specific manner that Plaintiffs contend they did, the Officers had “‘fair warning” that their conduct was unconstitutional.’ . . . ‘[I]n an obvious case, the Graham excessive-force factors themselves can clearly establish the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . . It has long been clearly established that, when a suspect is not resisting, it is unreasonable for an officer to apply unnecessary, injurious force against a restrained individual, even if the person had previously not followed commands or initially resisted the seizure. . . . Indeed, at least five other circuits have held that, even in the absence of a previous case with similar facts, ‘it [is] clearly established . . . that exerting significant, continued force on a person’s back while that person is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.’ [collecting cases] As discussed, ‘a jury could conclude that no reasonable officer would have perceived [Aguirre] as posing an immediate threat to the [O]fficers’ safety or thought that he was resisting arrest.’ . . . Thus, if the Officers unnecessarily placed Aguirre in the maximal-restraint position when there was no reason to believe he had committed a serious crime, that he posed a continuing threat to the Officers or public safety, or that he was resisting the Officers’ seizure or holding of him, the Officers violated Aguirre’s clearly established constitutional rights. . . . But I need not rely solely on the Graham factors to find a violation of clearly established law. Plaintiffs’ claim that the Officers unconstitutionally employed deadly force in the absence of any threat of death or serious injury to the Officers or the public presents facts very similar to those found in Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441 (5th Cir. 1998). . . . As this court held in Gutierrez in 1998, it is clearly established that the use of hog-tie-like restraint may amount to deadly force ‘in a limited set of circumstances’—that is, when employed against an individual who a reasonable officer would have cause to know is ‘a drug-affected person in a state of excited delirium’—and there is a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of such deadly force when there is no probable cause to believe the force is necessary to ameliorate a threat of death or serious bodily injury. . . . I recognize that this court has distinguished Gutierrez in factual scenarios different from the case at bar. In Hill v. Carroll County, for example, this court stated that ‘Gutierrez does not hold four-point restraint a per se unconstitutionally excessive use of force, nor does it extend beyond its facts as a mirror of the then-unchallenged San Diego Study’ on which the Plaintiffs relied in Gutierrez. . . . Instead, according to this court in Hill, ‘neither the San Diego Study nor Gutierrez raises a triable fact issue in this case where there is no evidence of drug abuse or drug-induced psychosis.’ . . . But this goes not to the question of whether the law against the use of deadly force was clearly established, but rather to whether the use of a hog-tie under those circumstances constituted deadly force—an issue we have held is a question for the jury that is based on the evidence in the case. . . . Hill therefore simply addressed the plaintiffs’ failure to introduce evidence that a reasonable officer would have known that placing the individual in a hog-tie like position posed a risk of death or serious bodily injury, and it does not weigh against the conclusion that, when the evidence shows that the use of a hog-tie-like position does meet this test—and thus meets the constitutional standard for deadly force—the right to be free from such force when it is not reasonable or necessary is clearly established. Here, of course, unlike in Hill, the Plaintiffs point to evidence that Aguirre suffered from drug abuse and drug-induced psychosis and that a reasonable officer would have known this, including from his erratic conduct that actually lead the Officers to believe he was under the influence of drugs and from his blue lips and the fresh needle marks that the Officers noticed on his arms. . . And, as discussed in detail . . . the Plaintiffs introduced a wealth of evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the use of a hog-tie-like position in these circumstances was deadly force, including the opinion of a medical expert and a Department of Justice bulletin addressing the dangers of positional asphyxia when the maximally prone restraint position is used on detainees who suffer from ‘cocaine-induced excited delirium.’ Hill is therefore inapposite. . . . Though the facts here are not identical to Gutierrez, we need not find the facts to be precisely the same as a previous case to hold that the Officers would have had ‘fair warning’ that their handling of Aguirre was dangerous, unnecessary, and unconstitutional under the circumstances. . . . The central holding in Gutierrez remains intact: ‘hog-tying may present a substantial risk of death or serious bodily harm ... in a limited set of circumstances—i.e., when a drug-affected person in a state of excited delirium is hog-tied and placed face down in a prone position.’ . . . And, as already established, a reasonable jury could conclude that the maximal prone restraint position was tantamount to and as dangerous as a hog-tie. I therefore conclude Aguirre’s right to be free from this position under the facts we must accept here—where he was not resisting, posed no immediate safety threat, and was presenting reasons to believe he was on drugs and in a drug-induced psychosis—was clearly established at the time of the incident. Based on the foregoing, the Officers who participated in bringing Aguirre to the ground and restraining him in the prone maximal-restraint position—Officers Gonzales, Mendez, Morgan, and Arredondo—are not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity because genuine disputes exist regarding whether they violated Aguirre’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Notwithstanding the foregoing, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on the Plaintiffs’ deliberate indifference claims. Unlike our inquiry into whether officers used excessive force, which judges ‘[t]he “reasonableness of a particular use of force ... from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene,’ . . . and our qualified immunity analysis, which asks whether ‘[t]he contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right,’ . . . the Fourteenth Amendment’s deliberate indifference inquiry turns on law enforcement officials’ ‘subjective knowledge.’ . . . Law enforcement officials violate an arrestee’s Fourteenth Amendment due process rights when they have ‘subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to a pretrial detainee but respond[] with deliberate indifference to that risk.’ . . . Negligence or even gross negligence is not enough: the officials must have had actual knowledge of the substantial risk. . . . On appeal, Plaintiffs do not even claim, much less offer evidence to demonstrate, that any of the Officers were actually aware that Aguirre was losing consciousness or otherwise in danger. The Officers have consistently asserted, and the video evidence does not otherwise indicate, that none of them knew Aguirre was in medical distress until he became unresponsive. They stated that he continued to talk, yell, and move his head while on the ground, so they believed he was able to breathe. The Officers testified that they believed Aguirre’s groaning and discolored lips were due to heavy drug use, not asphyxiation, and Plaintiffs do not offer evidence to dispute these accounts. Even if these asserted beliefs were unreasonable and their actions contrary to what they should have known from their training, that can only at most establish gross negligence, not the required deliberate indifference. Because Plaintiffs do not cite to, and we have not identified, any evidence that the Defendant officers were aware that Aguirre was in danger until he became unresponsive, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on this claim. Once the Officers realized Aguirre was unresponsive, however, there was a delay of several minutes before effective CPR was administered. Plaintiffs claim that Defendants were deliberately indifferent to Aguirre's serious medical needs by delaying CPR once they assessed that he was not breathing. Plaintiffs' medical expert points out that '[t]here appears to be a delay of approximately 4 minutes and 30 seconds from the time the SAPD officers turn ... Aguirre on his back to when functional CPR started,' and that there was a mere 'half hearted attempt at a few chest compressions' within three minutes of turning Aguirre over and seeing he was unresponsive, but effective CPR was not started for four and a half minutes. Delay of medical care can result in liability where there has been deliberate indifference, in that the officers were subjectively aware of the risk of serious harm but disregarded it. . . . But Plaintiffs have not established that the Officers were deliberately indifferent to the risk to Aguirre's health after they discovered he was no longer breathing. This is not a case where the Officers elected to do nothing in response to a known health risk. . . . The videos illustrate, and Plaintiffs do not contest, that once the Officers discovered Aguirre was unresponsive, they flipped him over, unhandcuffed him, and Officer Juarez, the medic on the scene, went to retrieve his medical equipment. Juarez can be seen in the videos jogging to the trunk of his car to get medical equipment, returning just over a minute later. Approximately one minute after he returned, Officer Mendez performed a sternum rub, and approximately another minute thereafter, the Officers began full CPR, with continuous chest compressions until EMS arrived. While these measures may have been inadequate, Plaintiffs do not present any evidence that the Officers knew they were insufficient and intentionally failed to do more out of indifference to Aguirre's well-being. Plaintiffs point to the Officers demeanor in the dashcam video, arguing that their smiling and laughing suggests that they did not care about the obvious risk to Aguirre's health. However, the video depicts this behavior before Juarez's initial efforts to revive Aguirre were unsuccessful. The Officers quickly took on a sober aspect as Aguirre remained unresponsive, which suggests their initial manner was the result of subjective unawareness of the risk rather than knowledge of the risk and a deliberate choice not to take any precautions against the realization of the danger's fatal consequences. To be sure, we do not condone the Officers light-hearted attitudes, and it may well have been objectively unreasonable for them to have been ignorant of the serious threat to Aguirre's health. But gross negligence on the part of the Officers is not sufficient to establish the kind of subjective, deliberate indifference that must be demonstrated to establish a Due Process violation. . . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's finding of qualified immunity on these claims.")
