constitutional dicta is to my mind unavailing in the present case, especially since the majority failed to articulate any reason why Saucier should not apply. . . . In Ehrlich, we stated that ‘[w]e are, of course, bound to implement [Saucier], and fully expect to do so in the vast majority of qualified immunity cases that come before us.’ . . . The majority’s treatment of Saucier in this case demonstrates how far we have deviated from Ehrlich’s narrow language. Perhaps our responsibilities were less burdensome under Horne and other pre-Saucier cases, but I am troubled by a decision that seeks to avoid the difficult questions that the Supreme Court has obligated us to face. For whatever reason, New York’s courts have shown no inclination to hold that ‘ 240.30(1) violates the First Amendment insofar as it criminalizes speech that is merely annoying or alarming, and New York police continue to enforce the statute to the detriment of citizens’ core First Amendment rights. Accordingly, for the reasons stated, I concur with the majority’s resolution of the qualified immunity issue, but respectfully dissent from its refusal to reach the constitutional issue and, once and for all, hold ‘ 240.30(1) unconstitutional.’”)

Erlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48, 56-60 (2d Cir. 2003) (“In Saucier, the Supreme Court made plain that a sequential two-step analysis of qualified immunity claims is not simply recommended but required. We are, of course, bound to implement that decision, and fully expect to do so in the vast majority of qualified immunity cases that come before us. . . . But this does not mean that Horne’s principles are no longer relevant to qualified immunity analysis, in those situations in which one can conclude that the Supreme Court did not intend to make the Saucier sequence mandatory. . . . Moving directly to the immunity question will frequently be appropriate when the existence of a constitutional violation depends on the resolution of uncertain state law. That is the case here. Whether or not Ms. Ehrlich’s rights were violated depends, substantially, on how Connecticut defines the rights of a conservator vis-a-vis the property of his ward, and this question, as we have seen, is not settled in Connecticut. . . . we believe we are more faithful to the underlying aim of Saucier by declining to make a constitutional determination at the first stage of the inquiry—where that determination, based on an interpretation of ambiguous state law, is provisional only and subject to reversal as a result of subsequent state court rulings—than by following the Saucier sequence. Accordingly, this is the course we have chosen to take here.”)

African Trade & Information Center, Inc. v. Abromaitis, 294 F.3d 355, 359, 360 (2d Cir. 2002) (“We may, in an appropriate case, decline to rule on the question whether an asserted right exists where, as here, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the relevant time. This is such a case. As discussed below, it squarely raises an issue that was expressly reserved by the Supreme Court in Board of County Commissioners v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996): whether applicants for new government contracts who have no pre-existing commercial relationship with the government are protected by the First Amendment from retaliation based on speech. However, the merits of this issue are scarcely mentioned in the briefs on appeal, let alone adequately briefed. Plaintiffs’ brief, which devotes barely more than a page to the issue, simply assumes the point, and cites none of the various Supreme Court decisions on which the right they assert would be based. This cursory briefing would make it ‘all the more perilous’ for us to render an advisory opinion on the issue. . . . Moreover, the issue is not likely to evade judicial review if we do not address it now. . . . Indeed, if standing objections can be met, the issue might be addressed in this very case on remand, as plaintiffs seek injunctive relief as well, and qualified immunity is not a defense when such relief is sought. . . Accordingly, we think the more prudent approach in the circumstances of this case is to refrain from deciding whether the asserted right exists.”).

Koch v. Town of Brattleboro, 287 F.3d 162, 165-68 (2d Cir. 2002) (“When determining whether a public official is entitled to qualified immunity, we ordinarily begin with a two-step test. . . First, we determine whether a constitutional right was violated. . . Then, we determine whether that right was ‘clearly established.’ . . . Although we normally apply this two-step test, where we are convinced that the purported constitutional right violated is not ‘clearly established,’ we retain the discretion to refrain from determining whether, under the first step of the test, a constitutional right was violated at all. . . In such an instance, we may rely exclusively on qualified immunity to decide a case. . . This procedure avoids the undesirable practice of unnecessarily adjudicating constitutional matters. . . The principle concern directing us to decide the constitutional issue, however, is the ‘likelihood that the question will escape federal court review over a lengthy period’ because federal courts will repeatedly rely on qualified immunity to decide cases. . . Were this to happen, the right would never be ‘clearly established’ because courts would habitually avoid the question. . . Here, there is little chance that any unsettled constitutional issues raised will escape federal review for long. The facts of this case are not ones that only occur in § 1983 cases. More often, they will be litigated during a motion to suppress in a criminal trial. At such a time, the court will not be able to avoid deciding the constitutional questions raised in this case. Therefore, where appropriate, we refrain from determining whether Koch’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated. On such issues, summary judgment was appropriate for the Defendant-officers because Koch cannot point to the existence of a ‘clearly established’ right. . . . It is unsettled whether the Fourth Amendment allows the police to remain in a home over the objections of the primary occupant when they enter pursuant to the reasonable belief that a third party, whom the police know has lesser authority over the premises than the primary occupant, has consented to their entry. Therefore, Koch cannot point to a ‘clearly established right’ that was violated. As such, we find it unnecessary to decide, as the district court did, whether the officers violated Koch’s Fourth Amendment rights. Instead, we explain both arguments only to show the ambiguity in the law and affirm the grant of summary judgment because the officers were entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Vega v. Miller, 273 F.3d 460, 468, 471 (2d Cir. 2001) (“Since this episode occurred seven years ago and involves a highly unusual set of circumstances, unlikely to be repeated, we see no reason to rule definitively on whether the Defendants’ action was unlawful. For purposes of the pending appeal, we rule only that on the state of the law in 1994, the Defendants could reasonably believe that in disciplining Vega for not exercising professional judgment to terminate the episode, they were not violating his clearly established First Amendment academic freedom rights. . . . We do not decide whether termination of Vega’s employment was an appropriate response to his allowing the classroom exercise to get out of hand, or whether some lesser sanction might have been sufficient. The issue for us is whether, on the undisputed facts of what occurred, the defendants

Mollica v. Volker, 229 F.3d 366, 372 (2d Cir. 2000) (“The concerns we discussed in Horne counseling against the articulation of constitutional rights in dictum apply forcefully to the case before us. Determining the constitutionality of Volker’s checkpoint would require resolution of a complex constitutional question by balancing the factors determining the reasonableness of a checkpoint, where not all factors clearly point in the same direction. Traditional principles of restraint counsel against unnecessary adjudication of this complex constitutional question. . . . Given the scant record before us (as is common in appeals from summary judgment based on qualified immunity), we are faced with three possible courses of action: (1) reach out on an inadequate record to announce a view, in dictum, on a constitutional question whose resolution is unnecessary to decide the case, (2) remand to the district court and direct the district court to require the parties to participate in further proceedings that will have no bearing on the result of their case, or (3) decline to express a view on the underlying constitutional question since we lack adequate information to do so. We think it clear that the third option is the preferable one. We do not read the Supreme Court’s precedents as to the contrary. Without doubt there are circumstances that strongly favor the course of action suggested in footnote five of Sacramento. . . . But there are others that do not. We conclude that Volker is entitled to qualified immunity and do not reach out to answer whether Volker’s checkpoint was constitutional.”).

Charles W. v. Maul, 214 F.3d 350, 357, 358, 360 (2d Cir. 2000) (“We acknowledge that the Court should not determine the existence of the constitutional right alleged if the question could be decided in proceedings in which qualified immunity is not a defense. See Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 250 (2d Cir.1999). . . . We must decide whether this alleged due process right exists before reaching the issue of qualified immunity because McGhie’s due process claim presents a question that is unlikely to be reviewed in a proceeding in which qualified immunity is not a defense, such as an action for . . . [With respect to the equal protection claim,] [t]he district court decided the qualified immunity question before reaching the underlying constitutional issue. This approach was correct in light of Horne, 191 F.3d 244. Unlike McGhie’s due process claim, his equal protection claim could have been reviewed by way of a habeas corpus petition or an action for an injunction—proceedings in which qualified immunity is not a defense.”).

Sound Aircraft Services, Inc. v. Town of East Hampton, 192 F.3d 329, 334, 335 (2d Cir. 1999) (“If the district court deems it appropriate, it may first ‘determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.’ [citing Wilson v. Layne] If the threshold determination reveals a possible constitutional violation, the court should then assess whether the law violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. If the district court decides to proceed in this manner, it should insist on a full briefing of the constitutional issues by the parties.”).

Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 248-50 (2d Cir. 1999) (“We recognize that since Sacramento, the Supreme Court has twice stated that, where the defendant raises qualified immunity as a defense, a court ‘must first determine whether the plaintiff has alleged the deprivation of an actual constitutional right at all, and if so, proceed to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.’ [citing Wilson and Conn] However, Wilson and Conn both relied on Sacramento, and neither purported to abandon the measured position adopted in that decision. The opinions in Wilson and Conn were both also joined by Justice Breyer, who expressly stated in Sacramento that courts need not invariably decide the merits before reaching qualified immunity. And, as described below, both cases also provided sound reasons for reaching the merits. We do not understand Wilson and Conn, to have, intentionally but without explanation, abandoned the carefully modulated position taken in Sacramento and adopted instead a rigid rule requiring federal courts to express advisory constitutional opinions in every case governed by qualified immunity. . . . Because the constitutional question in this case is easily amenable to adjudication in a suit for injunctive relief by any adversely affected prisoner, and because this does not represent an instance of egregious, outrageous conduct, we reaffirm our decision to rely on the lack of clearly established law to dismiss Horne’s action on grounds of qualified immunity.”).

Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 251, 252, 254 (2d Cir. 1999) (Cardamone, J., dissenting) (“In sum, I understand footnote five in Sacramento to hold as follows: A federal court faced with a suit alleging the deprivation of a constitutional right under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 should ordinarily decide whether the constitutional right alleged by the plaintiff actually exists, even where the defense of qualified immunity might provide an alternative ground for decision. Although this principle need not govern in each and every case, it is undoubtedly the ‘[n]ormal[]’ rule and the ‘better approach’ to constitutional adjudication in § 1983 litigation. Moreover, neither the policy of avoidance of constitutional questions nor the remote possibility of clarifying the law in later suits for injunctive relief justifies a departure from this general principle. . . . I would defer to the Sacramento Court’s statement, reiterated by the Conn and Wilson Courts, that the better approach in § 1983 litigation is first to decide whether the asserted constitutional right exists and only then to determine whether the right was clearly established. While we need not resolve whether Conn and Wilson foreclose all exceptions to this principle, the Supreme Court’s formulation of the principle as a general rule couched in mandatory language requires, at the very least, that a court articulate some persuasive reason to justify its departure from this approach in a given case.”).

Wilkinson v. Russell, 182 F.3d 89, 110-13 (2d Cir. 1999) (Calabresi, J., concurring) (“I write separately because I am troubled by the court’s holding that we can, as a matter of law, say that Thomas Wilkinson’s constitutional rights were not violated by the SRS investigation. Since, however, the unreasonableness of a probe like the one conducted in this case was not clearly established when Wilkinson was falsely labeled a child abuser and deprived of his children, qualified immunity applies and suffices to support the court’s judgment. Relying on a line of recent Supreme Court decisions that stem from Footnote Five of County of Sacramento v. Lewis, . . . the majority argues that it is appropriate to separate the discussion of whether Wilkinson’s rights were violated from the question of whether those rights, even if infringed, were clearly established at the time the SRS investigation occurred. . . . To accomplish this feat, the majority necessarily engages in a ‘dual reasonableness’ analysis and considers first whether the conduct of the SRS officials was so unreasonable that it violated Wilkinson’s parental rights, and then whether, even if Wilkinson’s rights were infringed, the SRS officials could reasonably believe that they were not violating his rights and therefore still benefit from qualified immunity. I am skeptical that reasonableness can remain a coherent standard when it is piled layer upon layer in this fashion. On the other hand, I do believe that the majority’s effort to identify when a child abuse investigation goes beyond the constitutional pale is admirable, and so I would be inclined to adopt the majority’s framework despite my doubts as to whether this kind of analysis can be pulled off successfully. My reason for not joining the majority’s opinion derives instead from a different uncertainty, one based on the facts of the case. . . . I believe instead that the reasonableness of Adams’ reliance on the doctor’s conclusion was, on the facts before us, a jury question (or would have been but for the existence of qualified immunity). . . . [W]e are all in agreement that, whether or not a constitutional violation occurred, the defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity because the law in this area was not clearly established at the time the SRS investigation took place. In one sense, therefore, it does not matter whether the majority or I read the facts correctly, since the entire discussion of the scope of Wilkinson’s parental right is, necessarily, dicta. Indeed, all statements about constitutional rights made in the Sacramento framework (i.e., where qualified immunity exists notwithstanding the violation of a right since the right was not clearly established at the time the conduct allegedly occurred) are dicta . . . and hence provisional only. The significance of such Sacramento statements must rest, therefore, not in ultimately determining what are or are not constitutional rights The importance of defining rights provisionally in a Sacramento context lies elsewhere. Its function is to place government officials on notice that they ignore such ‘probable’ rights at their peril. The Supreme Court, moreover, said as much when it told the lower courts to issue dicta declaring that certain conduct violates a fundamental right in order to ‘promote[] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct.’ [citing Wilson] Footnote Five of Sacramento, as expounded in Wilson, stands for the proposition that lucid and unambiguous dicta concerning the existence of a constitutional right can without more make that right ‘clearly established’ for purposes of a qualified immunity analysis. . . . As the High Court has told us, the thrust of Sacramento is to keep the existence of qualified immunity from preventing the clarification of constitutional rights. By providing that the first statement about a given right will usually be in dicta that is explicit enough to put state actors on notice, . . . Sacramento creates a situation in which the next time that particular right is alleged, qualified immunity will not be a defense. On that occasion, the court will therefore face the ultimate questions about the existence and scope of the right that is being contested. The court may then decide to back down from the prior dicta about the right, or it may instead establish that right by turning the prior dicta into a holding. Either way, however, by permitting a subsequent court (and often a second panel of the same court of appeals) to take up a constitutional right in the absence of a qualified immunity defense, Sacramento increases the probability that the courts of appeals will receive full briefings and arguments before making final decisions on important constitutional issues. . . . It goes without saying that dicta from a prior panel concerning a constitutional right deserves respect. It certainly ranks with holdings from other circuits. Nevertheless, it is not binding, and therein lies its unusual significance in the constitutional scheme. The majority today finds no violation of a constitutional right. And yet in doing so it draws a line beyond which it means for state actors to operate at their peril. That line is, of course, asserted in dicta. But, in a Sacramento context, it is dicta that cannot casually be ignored.”).

Severino v. Negron, 996 F.2d 1439, 1441 (2d Cir. 1993) (“If we were to rule today on the due process question, we likely would hold that a violation has occurred We do not need to rule definitively on the constitutional question, however, because even if there were a violation of due process, the appellee officials would be protected by qualified immunity.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Egolf v. Witmer, 526 F.3d 104, 109-12 (3d Cir. 2008) (“Although Saucier requires that courts engage a two-tiered analysis that first examines whether a constitutional violation exists, we must approach this framework in a manner that is consistent with its purpose. As Saucier clearly explains, the underlying principle of first requiring constitutional analysis is to advance the elaboration of the law to give state actors better guidance on the parameters of constitutional violations. . . This principle guides our resolution of this case. Although the District Court thoroughly reviewed the First and Fourth Amendment claims, it found that the state law questions underlying the constitutional issues were ones of first impression for the state courts. . . Accordingly, in both claims of constitutional violations the District Court’s analysis relied upon its prediction of how the Pennsylvania courts would rule if this case was before them. . . We find such cases to be exceptions to the constitutional analysis requirement of Saucier, because the purpose of Saucier would be undermined. . . . In concluding that we will not analyze the First or Fourth Amendment issues in this case, we find a decision of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to be persuasive in reasoning that the underlying principle of law elaboration is not meaningfully advanced in situations, such as this, when the definition of constitutional rights depends on a federal court’s uncertain assumptions about state law. Ehrlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48, 55-58 (2d Cir.2003); See also Robinette v. Jones, 476 F.3d 585, 592 n. 8 (8th Cir.2007). We agree that, in cases such as this, federal courts do a disservice to state actors who would be induced to rely on a ruling that might change altogether upon subsequent review by the state court. . . Our position is bolstered by the fact that, even if we were to find constitutional rights violations we are convinced that such rights were not clearly established. . . . Here, even if we assume that the police violated the protesters’ rights under the First and Fourth Amendments by arresting them, we are mindful that the circumstances were quite unusual. . . . [T]he choice that the protesters made to portray this particular image [Abu Ghraib] generates a question that would have been difficult to assess on the scene: whether the depiction of an inherently sexually offensive image is any less shocking simply because people recreate it as a protest. While we can rationalize from our vantage point that the scene created by the protesters might be distinguishable from the original image, the objective on-the-scene perspective required of us in this qualified immunity review inexorably mires such contrasts. For these reasons, we conclude that there is ample evidence that this event was precisely the type of scene envisaged in Saucier, where an officer in the field must make ‘split second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain and rapidly evolving.’ . . . This situation demanded an instantaneous, finely calibrated judgment in response to a disturbance that arose amid circumstances that were undeniably unique, surprising, confusing and charged. It was plainly one in which the parameters of probable cause were confusing and the boundaries of free speech were quite muddled. . . . As a result, we cannot characterize the officers’ actions, for purposes of qualified immunity, as either incompetent or as willful violations of the law. For these reasons, we conclude that, even if the officers’ decision to arrest the protesters was mistaken, it was a reasonable mistake in the context in which it occurred. We do not find error in the District Court’s grant of qualified immunity to the police.”).

Egolf v. Witmer, 526 F.3d 104, 112-14 (3d Cir. 2008) (Smith, J., concurring) (“Like the majority, I conclude that we should affirm the District Court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of the State Troopers. I write separately, however, because I believe the constraints of Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), compel a different analytical path. . . . The majority acknowledges that ‘Saucier requires that courts engage a two-tiered analysis that first examines whether a constitutional violation exists.’ Yet, the majority declines to follow this mandate because it finds that doing so in this case would not accomplish Saucier’s purpose. It may be that the Supreme Court will return to its pre-Saucier jurisprudence, where determining first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right is considered only the ‘better approach.’ . . . For now, however, I regard the Saucier rule as mandatory and do not believe that inferior courts are free to depart from it. . . . Because I conclude that, on the facts alleged, the Troopers’ conduct did not violate the Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights, my analytical course would not require that we reach the question of qualified immunity.”).

Carswell v. Borough of Homestead, 381 F.3d 235, 240, 421 (3d Cir. 2004) (“Our appellate review of a Rule 50 ruling is plenary and is similar to that in a summary judgment appeal. We review the record as would a District Court. This scope of appellate review places us in the same position as the District Court with respect to the admonition in Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226 (1991) and Saucier to decide the constitutional issue before considering qualified immunity. . . . It is quite understandable that the trial judge was hesitant to rule that a constitutional violation had occurred on the facts in the record at that point when the qualified immunity issue offered a more sure-footed disposition of the Rule 50 motion. Here, unlike Saucier and Siegert, the case had already been in trial for a week. Consequently, Snyder had already lost much of the benefit of qualified immunity - freedom from trial. . . . It is preferable to resolve the qualified immunity issue at the summary judgment, or earlier, stage, but if this is not possible, it remains appropriate to consider the matter in a Rule 50(a) motion. . . . We believe that the circumstances here, however, are sufficiently unlike those in Saucier and Siegert that we may proceed directly to the qualified immunity issue without ruling preliminarily on the constitutional violation claim. . . . We are hesitant to hold that the jury could find excessive force based on the record here. It appears to us that without the testimony of Dr. McCauley, the plaintiff failed to establish a constitutional violation. . . . We have serious doubts about the admissibility of his opinion that Snyder should not have drawn his gun based on the expert's assumption that the officer knew the husband was unarmed. . . . Accordingly, we assume, but do not decide, that plaintiff established a Fourth Amendment constitutional violation and proceed to the immunity issue.”).

Acierno v. Cloutier, 40 F.3d 597, 606 n.7 (3d Cir. 1994) (en banc) (“The Supreme Court’s majority opinion in Siegert, when read as a whole, seems to suggest that where practicable or expedient an appellate court should first address whether the plaintiff has alleged a cognizable constitutional claim at all, before turning to the question of whether the constitutional right asserted was ‘clearly established’ at the time the defendant acted. [cite omitted] In fact, we have emphasized this aspect of the Siegert decision in a subsequent case where we decided to address all plaintiffs’ allegations of constitutional error as a predicate question to whether the constitutional rights were ‘clearly established’ at the time the defendant acted. . . . Nevertheless, concurring in the judgment in Siegert, Justice Kennedy recognized that in certain cases . . . it is an ‘altogether normal procedure’ for the court of appeals to decide the case ‘on the ground that appear[s] to offer the most direct and appropriate resolution,’ . . . which in difficult constitutional cases will sometimes be whether the constitutional right was ‘clearly established’ at the time the defendant acted. Furthermore, the majority opinion in Siegert does not state that courts of appeals must always as an initial inquiry address whether a constitutional violation has been alleged by the plaintiff. . . . In cases such as the present one, where the court would be required to undertake a detailed analysis of unreported and undeveloped state and county law issues in order to determine whether a cognizable constitutional claim was alleged at all, we believe a more prudent course is to first address whether the constitutional right asserted by the plaintiff was ‘clearly established’ at the time the defendant acted. We will follow such a course in this case because . . . the state and county law issues which we would need to decide in order to determine whether Acierno possessed a vested right to develop his commercial property before the rezoning ordinances were passed are particularly difficult and undeveloped.”).

Giuffre v. Bissell, 31 F.3d 1241, 1255 (3d Cir. 1994) (“Where appropriate, we may consider whether the constitutional rights asserted by Giuffre were ‘clearly established’ at the time the individual officials acted, without initially deciding whether a constitutional violation was alleged at all.” citing Acierno).

Kulwicki v. Dawson, 969 F.2d 1454, 1462 (3d Cir. 1992) (on review of denial of 12(b)(6) motion based on qualified immunity, “...we are concerned neither with the accuracy of the facts alleged nor the adequacy of [the] underlying claim, [cite omitted]; our only duty is to construe the facts in the manner most favorable to [plaintiff], in order to determine whether the official behavior he describes falls outside the cloak of official immunity.”).

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Pittman v. Nelms, 87 F.3d 116, 118-19 & n.2 (4th Cir. 1996) (“A qualified immunity case must develop through two primary levels. The first does not involve immunity at all, but focuses on the merits of the plaintiff's claim—whether the defendant's conduct violated a constitutional right of the plaintiff. It includes the factual issue of what actually happened . . . and the legal question of whether the defendant's actions were unconstitutional. . . Only if the defendant did act illegally must the case proceed to the second level to determine whether he is, nevertheless, immune from suit. . . . When a court addresses qualified immunity in the summary judgment context, it can condense its analysis. As with any motion for summary judgment, it must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmovant, so it need not make factual findings. Nor must it determine directly whether the plaintiff's evidence indicates a constitutional violation. Instead it can combine the second prong of the constitutional inquiry and the first prong of the immunity inquiry by asking whether the plaintiff has 'allege[d] the violation of a clearly established constitutional right.' . . The hybrid inquiry of whether the plaintiff has 'allege[d] the violation of a clearly established constitutional right,' . . is an easier question than whether there was a violation at all. It is useful, therefore, when a court is determining whether a defendant should be burdened by a trial, or when the law is unclear. But it invokes immunity prematurely if the facts indicate no constitutional violation, clearly established or otherwise.”).

Torcasio v. Murray, 57 F.3d 1340, 1352 (4th Cir. 1995) (“[W]e conclude that, although the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act were both in effect at the time of the alleged violations, it was not then clearly established that either statute applied to state prisons. We suspect that the district court reached the opposite, erroneous conclusion because of the order in which the court addressed the defenses raised by the VDOC officials. Rather than begin with the prison officials' claim that they were entitled to qualified immunity because the applicability of the acts to state prisons was not clearly established, the court first considered their defense that the acts do not apply to state prisoners. In a recent decision of this court, we reminded district courts that they are to consider as a threshold matter whether officials in a given case are entitled to qualified immunity, and move on to other issues only after concluding that the officials are not. [citing DiMeglio] This case illustrates the dangers of not adhering to this analytical sequence, for we cannot help but suspect that the court's conclusion that it was clearly established that the acts applied to prisons was heavily influenced by its earlier conclusion that the acts today apply to prisons.”).

Dimeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795-99 (4th Cir. 1995) (“Although the Supreme Court's decision in Siegert . . . has generated significant confusion, that case did not, contrary to the view of almost every court, effect a fundamental change in this analytical framework for deciding whether an official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Siegert did not mandate that courts determine, as a part of the qualified immunity analysis, whether the plaintiff has stated a claim upon which relief can be granted in a Rule 12(b)(6) sense. It did not direct courts to decide, independent of and prior to addressing a defendant's entitlement to qualified immunity, whether a plaintiff has stated a claim upon which relief can be granted. Nor did it require that courts decide the merits of the constitutional claim. . . . Siegert simply reaffirmed that a court reviewing a qualified immunity defense should assess, before anything else, whether the alleged conduct violated law clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. . . . That current law has no application to the specific question of qualified immunity is not to say that courts should be foreclosed from conducting a Rule 12(b)(6) or . . . a summary judgment inquiry, independent of the qualified immunity defense. In many cases where a defendant has asserted qualified immunity, dismissal or even an award of summary judgment may be obviously warranted, based upon existing law, without the court ever ruling on the qualified immunity question.”).

Hodge v. Jones, 31 F.3d 157, 169 (4th Cir. 1994) (Powell, Associate Justice, concurring in the judgment) (“Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from civil monetary damages if their conduct did not violate the [plaintiffs’] clearly established federal statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known ... In deciding this question, the Court may, in the exercise of its discretion, reach the merits of the underlying constitutional question at issue ... I prefer not to reach them [E]ven assuming that Defendants’ actions infringed a constitutionally protected liberty interest, such interest was not clearly established at the time of Defendants’ conduct.”).

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Wooley v. City of Baton Rouge, 211 F.3d 913, 923 (5th Cir. 2000) (“Wooley and Jordan contend that under the rubrics of the foregoing cases the emotional ties between a minor and an unrelated adult care giver can create a liberty interest vis-a-vis the child’s biological grandparents when the relationship is countenanced by the child’s natural mother. They thus contend that under the circumstances here presented Wooley and Jordan shared a fourteenth amendment protected expectation that the state would not interfere in their relationship. However persuasive this contention ultimately may be, we need not definitively resolve it here, for it is indisputable that, at the time of the events in question, no such fourteenth amendment right could be described as clearly established.”).

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Frierson v. Goetz, No. 02-6522, 2004 WL 1152172, at *5 (6th Cir. May 19, 2004) (unpublished) (“Because we have not been presented with enough facts in this case to decide this novel issue concerning privacy expectations in cordless phones, we can only conclude that plaintiff has attempted to allege a constitutional violation. We are unable to conclude, as a matter of law, that the interception of a cordless telephone, in the circumstances alleged, violated the Fourth Amendment. We find no cases that would, in such novel situations, require us to answer conclusively the constitutional question as a matter of law before proceeding to steps two and three [of the qualified immunity analysis]. The answer is clear, however, when we turn to the questions of whether the alleged constitutional violation was ‘clearly established’ at the time it occurred and whether a reasonable person in defendant’s position would have known that his actions violated clearly established rights. . . . The right to privacy in using a cordless phone is not ‘clearly established.’ As explained above, prior to the amendment to the Federal Wiretap Law in 1994 to cover cordless phones, courts uniformly held that cordless telephone users did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their phone conversations under the Fourth Amendment. . . .To date neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit has specifically addressed whether a reasonable expectation of privacy exists under the Fourth Amendment for cordless telephone communications. We therefore agree with the district court that the law is not ‘clearly established’ that users of cordless phones have a reasonable expectation of privacy under the Fourth Amendment.”).

Potts v. Hill, 77 F. App’x 330, 337 (6th Cir. 2003) (unpublished) (“Recognizing that there is a split among Ohio Courts of Appeals, we cannot predict whether the Ohio Supreme Court would hold that, as a matter of law, the first knife was or was not ‘concealed’ under Ohio Rev.Code 2923.12(“). . . . We do not decide this issue in the present case because, as explained in the next section, we believe that defendant acted as any reasonable officer would and that he did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Assuming arguendo that a constitutional violation did occur, we now examine whether defendant is entitled to a qualified immunity defense. . . .As discussed above, whether plaintiff’s constitutional rights were violated is an open question since the Ohio courts have simply failed to provide its police officers with adequate guidance in this area of law. . . .It does not appear that the State of Ohio had definitively resolved the question of partially concealed weapons even in the decisions made after the search here, let alone at the time of the arrest. Therefore, since plaintiff cannot even now prove that the narrower definition of ‘concealed’ weapons in Ohio is ‘clearly established,’ . . .it is beyond doubt that defendant is shielded from any liability by the theory of ‘qualified immunity’ for his conduct in 1996. He neither was ‘plainly incompetent,’ nor did he ‘knowingly violate the law.’”).

Cherrington v. Skeeter, 344 F.3d 631, 640 (6th Cir. 2003) (“[I]t ultimately is unnecessary for us to decide whether the individual Defendants did or did not heed the Fourth Amendment command of reasonableness in their conduct toward Daija King, because they are entitled to qualified immunity in any event. . . . As is evident from our foregoing discussion, the pre-existing law is silent on the lawfulness of keeping a young child with her mother while the latter is placed under arrest and held in custody at a location other than a traditional detention facility. If the Defendant officers had scoured the case law at the time (or even to this day), they could not have located a decision indicating that Daija King’s Fourth Amendment rights might be violated if she were taken with her mother to a hotel for about a 24-hour period while Mary Cherrington cooperated with the authorities by attempting to arrange drug purchases. Rather, the most closely analogous case, Matheny, leads to the opposite conclusion. Under these circumstances, the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, because the law did not (and still does not) ‘clearly proscribe[]’ the actions they took.”).

Virgili v. Gilbert, 272 F.3d 391, 394 (6th Cir. 2001) (“We need not, and do not, opine on the Fourth Amendment standard to be applied to strip-searches of prison employees. We conclude merely that the standard to be applied to such searches was not clearly established in this circuit in 1999. In conclusion, we note that ample opportunities exist to establish that standard via other means, for example through actions for declaratory or injunctive relief.”).

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1542 (6th Cir. 1994) (“We have resolved the qualified immunity issue without addressing whether there was actually a due process violation. We merely held that Williams could not recover monetary damages against defendants in their individual capacities because it was not clearly established at the time of Williams’ demotion that failing to provide predemotion notice and hearing would violate Williams’ due process rights. In this case, our holding on qualified immunity has nothing to do with the merits of the due process claim.”).

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991) (“We need not define in this case precisely what level of individualized suspicion is required in the context of prison visitor searches....The question before the court is not whether the proper standard should be reasonable suspicion...or probable cause...but whether the right to be free from a strip search absent probable cause was clearly established at the time of the conduct”).

Binkowski v. Family & Children’s Services Agency, 39 F. Supp.2d 882, 886 (W.D. Mich. 1998) (“This Court acknowledges that, as a general rule, it is best for courts to identify the ‘exact contours of the underlying right said to have been violated.’ . . . However, the reasons the Court cited in Lewis to support this proposition are more applicable to the Court of Appeals than to the District Court because, among other things, only the Court of Appeals establishes the ‘standards of official conduct’ under § 1983. . . . Furthermore, there is also a ‘policy of avoiding the unnecessary adjudication of constitutional questions,’ particularly those which are ‘both difficult and unresolved.’ Lewis, 118 S.Ct. at 1722-23 (Stevens, J., concurring) . . . Accordingly, the Court will resolve the § 1983 claim against Defendants under the doctrines of qualified immunity and Eleventh Amendment immunity, as well as on the particular facts under which certain defendants are being sued, thus avoiding the difficult and unresolved constitutional issue raised by Plaintiff’s claim.”).

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Forman v. Richmond Police Dep’t., 104 F.3d 950, 958 (7th Cir. 1997) (“In regard to Forman’s unreasonable search and seizure claim, it makes sense to initially analyze the second prong of the qualified immunity test—i.e., whether there were clearly established constitutional standards governing the warrantless search of the locked room—in order to avoid addressing the more difficult question of whether the warrantless search was in fact unconstitutional.”).

Supreme Video, Inc. v. Schauz, 15 F.3d 1435, 1442 n.9 (7th Cir. 1994) (“Supreme Video argues that the district court erred by following the same decisional process we followed in this opinion, namely by deciding the qualified immunity issue without deciding whether Schauz actually violated a constitutionally guaranteed right. The cases Supreme Video cites, such as Siegert . . . do not hold that courts must address the question of a right before speaking to whether that right was clearly established. Rather, Siegert held only that both issues are necessary for a successful Section 1983 action. The Federal Reporters are expanding quickly enough without our addressing issues that will not affect the outcomes of our decisions.”).

Viereckl v. Ramsey, No. 05 C 6292, 2006 WL 3319973, at *4, *5 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 13, 2006) (“The question of whether there was probable cause in the instant case is one that largely turns on an interpretation and application of the Illinois criminal code. The answer to that interpretive inquiry is at least relatively clear, and, as explained, leads the Court to conclude that probable cause was present under Illinois law. Nonetheless, candor compels the concession that the answers to the state law issues are not pellucid, as there is no Illinois case directly on point. This lack of absolute clarity, however, is not material to the bottom-line result concerning Deputy Sheriff Pogorzielski’s motion to dismiss, because the potential ambiguity serves to underscore why qualified immunity is appropriate, irrespective of how the Illinois issues ultimately are resolved by the Illinois courts in an appropriate case. In such a circumstance, one might be tempted to avoid what is essentially an unnecessary endeavor by a federal court to (attempt to) explicate Illinois’s criminal code and to interpret and apply its state law precedents. Saucier appears to require this threshold analysis in the qualified immunity context, however, irrespective of whatever considerations might counsel otherwise. . . To be sure, there is a substantial body of jurisprudence criticizing this seemingly inflexible mandate to first assess the constitutional question and related issues and only then proceed to the question of whether any putative unlawfulness was clearly established in applicable precedent, such that qualified immunity does not adhere. . . There also is a meaningful body of federal appellate precedent—much from before the Supreme Court’s opinions in Bunting and Brosseau—which held or strongly suggested that the Saucier sequential analysis was more of a preference than a requirement, such that a lower court could proceed simply to the qualified immunity/clearly established question in an appropriate case. [citing cases] In addition, some appellate courts have even gone so far as to put aside the Saucier ordering in the context of a qualified immunity question. [citing cases] Were this Court persuaded that there is flexibility to simply assume a constitutional violation arguendo in this case, and to proceed straight to the qualified immunity/clearly established analysis, the Court would almost surely do so. The threshold questions concerning the Illinois criminal code involve areas of state law that are at least somewhat undeveloped in Illinois caselaw; concomitantly, the questions about Illinois law at issue have seldom been of interest or material consequence in the Illinois courts, so it seems particularly inappropriate to opine about them unnecessarily. In this regard, Saucier explained that its mandate to resolve the issue of whether a constitutional violation occurred first was necessary to ensure that the refinement and illumination of important constitutional concepts is not frustrated. . . That principle would not seem to mandate that federal courts unnecessarily opine about the meaning of a relatively obscure state criminal statute—here, for example, concerning issues relating to the misdemeanor Illinois offense of obstructing the service of legal process—when such speculation is not necessary to fairly resolve the federal case. . . That dynamic is underscored by the fact that this Court’s statements about the meaning of the Illinois statute—indeed, even unanimous pronouncements about the meaning of the Illinois statute by higher federal appellate courts—would have no precedential effect vis-a-vis the Illinois courts, which have not been shy about rejecting federal interpretations of state statutes in at least some other instances. . . Nonetheless, the Court finds it difficult to see how it can, consistent with the Supreme Court's directives in Saucier, as underscored again in Brosseau, elide past the threshold issue of whether a false arrest occurred, which issue is interlaced with questions about the meaning of the Illinois statutes. . . As a result, the Court will proceed sequentially through the two-step Saucier analysis, even though the answer to the first-step of the analysis is not necessary to the resolution of the case, given the answer to the step-two 'clearly established' question.”)

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Smook v. Minnehaha County, 457 F.3d 806, 814, 815 (8th Cir. 2006) (“In addition to granting partial summary judgment in favor of Smook, the district court’s order also granted partial summary judgment for unnamed class members who, as the class was defined by the court, were strip searched at the JDC from June 1, 1999, through September 14, 1999. Banbury and Cheever contend that they are also entitled to qualified immunity from suits for damages by the unnamed class members. To review that contention, it appears that we would be required by the Supreme Court’s current direction to resolve first whether the searches of the unnamed class members violated the Fourth Amendment, and then, if so, whether the defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The requirement to resolve the reasonableness of these searches of unnamed class members places us in a quandary. The specific facts underlying the claims are not yet developed, and the reasonableness of a particular search is often highly contextual. . . . The posture of the appeal is complicated further by our decision that the named class representative, Smook, has no claim for damages against the defendants. . . . Under these unusual circumstances, we decline to pass on the merits of the constitutional claims of the unnamed class members that must be resolved as a first step in determining whether Banbury and Cheever are entitled to qualified immunity from suit.”).

Young v. City of Little Rock, 249 F.3d 730, 735 (8th Cir. 2001) (“The plaintiff argues that Baker [v. McCullan, 443 U.S. 137 (1979)] is distinguishable. In Baker, the fact of the mistaken identity was not discovered for three days. Here, plaintiff argues, the defendants knew that they had the wrong woman, but decided to keep her detained for a probable-cause hearing on Monday morning nonetheless. If we were faced head on with the question whether the Fourth Amendment was violated, this distinction might well prove dispositive. But when the doctrine of qualified immunity is taken into account, we believe the District Court correctly held that these individual police officers are not liable in an action for damages. We decline to hold officers in this situation to the niceties of legal distinctions, even though the distinctions might seem persuasive to judges in the light of hindsight.”).

Greer v. Shoop, 141 F.3d 824, 829 (8th Cir. 1998) (Beam, J., concurring specially) (“The court . . . ‘assume[s] without deciding, based on the facts accepted for purposes of summary judgment, that [appellant] has sufficiently alleged a violation of Mora Greer’s constitutional rights pursuant to the state-created danger theory.’ . . . On this assumption, the court proceeds to deal with the issue of qualified immunity. This approach is squarely at odds with Siegert v. Gilley The Supreme Court established that the ‘first inquiry in the examination of [a claim of qualified immunity]’ is whether a ‘violation of a clearly established constitutional right’ has been alleged at all. . . In Siebert, as here, the circuit court had assumed, without deciding, that Gilley’s actions violated Siebert’s constitutional rights. . . The Supreme Court found this approach to be error. It stated, ‘We think the Court of Appeals should not have assumed, without deciding, this preliminary issue in this case.’”)

Murphy v. Dowd, 975 F.2d 435, 437 (8th Cir. 1992) (“Assuming, without deciding, that a prisoner’s involuntary exposure to ETS can state a constitutional claim, we conclude here that the district court properly granted [defendant] summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . [A]t the time . . . there was no clearly established constitutional right to be free from exposure to ETS.”).

NINTH CIRCUIT

Motley v. Parks, 432 F.3d 1072, 1077, 1078 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (“The parties urge us to skip the first step of the Saucier analysis. They ask us to assume that the officers violated Motley’s constitutional rights by conducting a warrantless and suspicionless search of her apartment without sufficient reason to believe Jamerson lived there, and determine whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the search. The Supreme Court has placed strong emphasis on the need to concentrate at the outset on the definition of the constitutional right. . . . Given the Supreme Court’s emphasis on our duty to clarify the constitutional standards governing law enforcement officers in the performance of their duties, we find it necessary to decide, first, what level of knowledge the officers needed to support the belief that Jamerson resided at the 40th Place address. In other words, how certain did they have to be that they were at the right residence? However, resolution of the related constitutional issue, whether the officers also needed particularized suspicion of wrong-doing on Jamerson’s part, poses unique circumstances that warrant deviating from Saucier’s threshold inquiry. The Supreme Court has granted certiorari in Samson v. California on the precise issue involved in this case. . . Thus, the very justification for Saucier’s first step is inapplicable; avoiding the constitutional question will not impede the elaboration of constitutional principles, and answering the constitutional question would foster neither certainty nor finality. The confluence of our consideration of this case en banc and the Supreme Court’s concurrent review of the same issue presents an extraordinary circumstance not before presented. . . In this unusual circumstance, we bypass Saucier’s first step and decide only whether it was clearly established at the time of the search that the officers needed some suspicion of wrongdoing.”).

Hemphill v. Kincheloe, 987 F.2d 589, 593 & n.4 (9th Cir. 1993) (“If a reasonable official could have believed that his actions were lawful, summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity is appropriate. [cite omitted] This determination should have been made before the district court considered whether the policy was constitutional.... Because we conclude that the officials’ belief was reasonable, we need not decide whether the search policy [permitting digital rectal probe searches on inmates prior to their entry into a secure area of the prison] violated [plaintiff's] Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights.”).

Erickson v. United States, 976 F.2d 1299, 1301 (9th Cir. 1992) (“Fundamental principles of judicial restraint require federal courts to consider nonconstitutional grounds for decision prior to reaching constitutional questions.... Thus, a federal court should decide constitutional questions only when it is impossible to dispose of the case on some other ground....Because the doctrine of qualified immunity disposes of this case, we do not reach the question whether the individual defendants violated [plaintiff's] constitutional rights.”).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Warner v. Grand County, 57 F.3d 962, 964 (10th Cir. 1995) (“Without addressing the merits of the constitutional issue, we hold that it was not clearly established on the date in question that a strip search following an arrest for possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor for which there was no risk that the suspects would be intermingled with the general jail population, was unconstitutional.”).

Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1401 (10th Cir. 1992) (“We do not take the occasion here to decide whether an outside third party or co-employee could ever be liable for sexual harassment under 1983 and the Equal Protection Clause. We resolve this case simply by noting that the Officers here were not violating clearly established law under the Equal Protection Clause when they acted as they did with respect to [plaintiffs].”).

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Williams v. Bd of Regents of Univ. System of Georgia, 477 F.3d 1282, 1300, 1301 (11th Cir. 2007) (on sua sponte reh'g) (“The district court dismissed Williams’s second § 1983 claim against Adams, Harrick, and Dooley as individuals, holding that the defendants have qualified immunity and that Williams failed to state a claim. We need not address whether Williams failed to state a claim because we affirm the district court’s holding on qualified immunity grounds. . . . The Equal Protection Clause confers a federal constitutional right to be free from sex discrimination. . . Here, Williams has alleged a harrowing incident, similar to other allegations that unfortunately have become increasingly common on today’s university campuses. . . Williams presents a compelling case that Adams, Harrick, and Dooley knew about the criminal and disciplinary problems that plagued Cole’s past, but that they considered his basketball skills a greater benefit than his questionable mores were a burden. Furthermore, Williams has presented evidence to show that the defendants’ action, coupled with others’ actions, may amount to discrimination actionable under Title IX. At a minimum, Adams, Harrick, and Dooley acted recklessly, and their apparent ‘win at all costs’ attitude resulted in enormous costs and fewer wins than expected. Nevertheless, Williams has failed to present any cases that show the three defendants violated her clearly established equal protection rights by recruiting and admitting an individual like Cole. Therefore, Williams cannot meet her burden under the second step of the qualified immunity analysis, and we hold that Adams, Harrick, and Dooley are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Hudson v. Hall, 231 F.3d 1289, 1295 n.5 (11th Cir. 2000) (“We recognize that the Supreme Court has written that generally we should—when we adjudicate qualified immunity cases—first decide whether the defendant has violated federal law at all before considering whether the law was clearly established. . . . According to the Supreme Court, such an approach facilitates the development of federal constitutional law. . . . Our Circuit now follows that practice, [citing Hartley], although it means that we often decide close questions of constitutional law when we know that no party in the case before us will be affected by that decision. And at times, some of us do wonder if this abstract development is the kind of development of constitutional law that should be encouraged. But we do not think that the Supreme Court’s suggested approach is—without exceptions—required absolutely, and we decline to follow that approach in this instance. In this case, whether probable cause existed—and, whether the Fourth Amendment was violated—turns upon a difficult question of state law. If we followed here the approach set out in Wilson and in Lewis, we would be required to determine whether O.C.G.A. ‘ 40-6-123 applies to turns from private driveways onto public roadways before we reached the clearly-established question. And, to determine the true scope of O.C.G.A. ‘ 40- 6-123—insofar as the plain language of the statute does not seem clear and no Georgia case law exists to guide us—we would need to certify the question to the Georgia Supreme Court. Yet, certification—at least in this case—would be an exercise in futility and a waste of the time and resources of both this Court and the Georgia Supreme Court. Indeed, regardless of the answer delivered by the Georgia Supreme Court, Officer Hall would be entitled to qualified immunity. We are unwilling to engage in—and we do not believe the Supreme Court intended to require—so vain a gesture.”).

Denno v. School Board of Volusia County, 218 F.3d 1267, 1274 n.5 (11th Cir. 2000) (“Neither party has argued that we must decide the merits of the substantive constitutional issue before addressing qualified immunity. And we believe that this appeal is one of those exceptional cases in which we are not required to do so. . . . Thus, we need decide only whether pre-existing law dictates, that is, truly compels the conclusion that the Tinker standard applies to the exclusion of the Fraser standard. . . . We cannot so conclude.”).

Santamorena v. Georgia Military College, 147 F.3d 1337, 1342-44 (11th Cir. 1998) (“[W]e do acknowledge that the existence or nonexistence of a constitutional right (or duty) in this case presents a perplexing question: a question that we—in part, because it cannot be easily answered—decline to answer at this time. . . . A Supreme Court opinion recently suggested that the “better approach”—in cases involving the defense of qualified immunity—might be to decide whether the contended for constitutional right exists at all before determining whether the right was, at the pertinent time, clearly established. [citing County of Sacramento] We do not understand this footnote as an absolute requirement that lower courts must always follow this “normally” “better approach.” In County of Sacramento, the district court decided the case strictly on qualified immunity grounds, that is, on the ground of the unsettled nature of the law; but the Supreme Court never said the district court erred. And if the Supreme Court intended to impose an absolute requirement on lower courts always to address the merits of constitutional issues even where qualified immunity obviously applies and readily resolves the case, we believe the Supreme Court would have said so more directly. At least in situations like this one—(1) where the existence of a constitutional right (or duty) presents a perplexing question, (2) where the alleged right obviously was not already clearly established, and (3) where the qualified immunity determination does end the whole case—it remains appropriate, and sometimes preferable, to stop at the determination that the right, if any, was not clearly established. . . . [W]e conclude the Supreme Court did not mean to nullify all the traditional restraint principles or to take away all our discretion to analyze particular qualified immunity cases, involving perplexing constitutional issues, without first deciding whether the constitutional right exists. We think the Supreme Court was telling us that, notwithstanding the usual restraint arguments, sometimes the courts can and should decide the constitutional issues; and we will but—because we believe the Supreme Court has left us with some discretion—not today.”).

Spivey v. Elliott, 41 F.3d 1497, 1498-99 (11th Cir. 1995) (“In our opinion, the panel majority had followed the perceived teachings of Siegert . . . in which the Supreme Court indicated that faced with this situation a court should first determine whether there is a statutory or constitutional right implicated, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time. Upon reconsideration on the suggestion of other members of this Court, we now think it enough to decide that there was no clearly established constitutional right allegedly violated by the defendants. . . . Since a plaintiff must show both that there is a constitutional right that is allegedly violated and that the right was clearly established at the time, a negative decision on either prevents the plaintiff from going forward. Once it is determined that there is no clearly established right, the Court could well leave for another day the determination as to whether there is such a right, albeit not one that a reasonable person would have known.”).

Wright v. Whiddon, 951 F.2d 297 (11th Cir. 1992) (court takes an approach which is arguably inconsistent with the analysis required by Siegert where parents of a pretrial detainee who was shot and killed during an attempted escape, asserted that the use of deadly force violated the detainee’s Fourth Amendment rights. The court did not decide the question of whether a pretrial detainee could assert an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment, but disposed of the case on qualified immunity grounds because “[t]he presence of such doubt about the existence and content of the constitutional right that [the defendant] is alleged to have violated is enough to entitle him to qualified immunity.” Id. at 300.).

Powers v. CSX Transportation, Inc., 105 F. Supp.2d 1295, 1307 (S.D. Ala. 2000) (“This Court does not construe Conn and Wilson as mandating a specific order of analysis to be followed in every case. First, the Supreme Court ordinarily can be expected to acknowledge that it is changing an existing rule. Second, the Court cited Siegert and Lewis and clearly was aware they do not establish a mandatory scheme. Third, Justice Breyer concurred in Lewis for the express purpose of clarifying that Lewis ‘should not be read to deny lower courts the flexibility, in appropriate cases, to decide § 1983 claims on the basis of qualified immunity, and thereby avoid wrestling with constitutional issues that are either difficult or poorly presented.’ . . . Fourth, the Conn Court’s use of the term ‘must’ can reasonably be read as requiring that the existence of a constitutional right be determined first only in the ‘normal’ case envisioned by Lewis. . . . Moreover, the Supreme Court has identified only two rationales for analyzing first the existence of a constitutional right. The first—to honor the policies undergirding qualified immunity by disposing of cases quickly on legal grounds—is equally applicable to the ‘clearly established’ inquiry. The second—to ‘promot[e] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct,’ . . . does not readily apply to decisions of the district courts, which typically are unpublished and which do not create binding precedent in any event.”).

Rose v. Town of Jackson’s Gap, 952 F. Supp. 757, 762 n.6 (M.D. Ala. 1996) (“The court notes that, in this circuit, it may in some instances no longer be necessary to answer this inquiry [of whether plaintiff has asserted a constitutional violation]. In a recent case, the Eleventh Circuit diverged from the Siegert order of analysis and stated that ‘we now think it enough to decide that there was no clearly established constitutional right allegedly violated by the defendants.’ Spivey v. Elliott, 41 F.3d 1497, 1498 (11th Cir.1995). . . . In so deciding, however, the panel emphasized that its decision in no way precludes a court, if deemed appropriate, from first determining whether a plaintiff has asserted the violation of a constitutional right.”).

7. Criticisms of the “Rigid Order of Battle”

NOTE: In a denial of certiorari and dissent from the denial, some members of the Court commented on problems caused by the “constitutional- question-first rule.”

Bunting v. Mellen, 124 S. Ct. 1750, 1751 (2004) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg J., and Breyer, J., respecting the denial of certiorari) (“The ‘perceived procedural tangle’ described by Justice SCALIA’s dissent. . . is a byproduct of an unwise judge-made rule under which courts must decide whether the plaintiff has alleged a constitutional violation before addressing the question whether the defendant state actor is entitled to qualified immunity. Justice BREYER and I both questioned the wisdom of an inflexible rule requiring the premature adjudication of constitutional issues when the Court adopted it. See County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 858, 859 (1998). Relaxing that rule could solve the problem that Justice SCALIA addresses in his dissent. Justice SCALIA is quite wrong, however, when he states that the ‘procedural tangle’ created by our constitutional-question- first procedure explains our denial of certiorari in this case. Indeed, it is only one of three reasons for not granting review.”)

Bunting v. Mellen, 124 S. Ct. 1750, 1754, 1755 (2004) (Scalia, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (“The Fourth Circuit’s determination that a state military college’s grace before meals violates the Establishment Clause, creating a conflict with Circuits upholding state-university prayers, would normally make this case a strong candidate for certiorari. But it is questionable whether Bunting’s request for review can be entertained, since he won judgment in the court below. For although the statute governing our certiorari jurisdiction permits application by ‘any party’ to a case in a federal court of appeals, 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1), our practice reflects a ‘settled refusal’ to entertain an appeal by a party on an issue as to which he prevailed. . . . I think it plain that this general rule should not apply where a favorable judgment on qualified-immunity grounds would deprive a party of an opportunity to appeal the unfavorable (and often more significant) constitutional determination. That constitutional determination is not mere dictum in the ordinary sense, since the whole reason we require it to be set forth (despite the availability of qualified immunity) is to clarify the law and thus make unavailable repeated claims of qualified immunity in future cases. . . . Not only is the denial of review unfair to the litigant (and to the institution that the litigant represents) but it undermines the purpose served by initial consideration of the constitutional question, which is to clarify constitutional rights without undue delay. . . . This problem has attracted the attention of lower courts. Two Circuits have noticed that if the constitutional determination remains locked inside a § 1983 suit in which the defendant received a favorable judgment on qualified immunity grounds, then “government defendants, as the prevailing parties, will have no opportunity to appeal for review of the newly declared constitutional right in the higher courts.” Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 247 (C.A.2 1999) (quoted in Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 96 (C.A.D.C.2000)); see Horne, supra, at 247, n. 1 (concluding that this Court could not have reviewed the judgment in County of Sacramento v. Lewis, supra, if the Ninth Circuit had not believed the right clearly established). As both Circuits recognized, the mess up here is replicated below. See Horne, supra, at 247 (noting the parallel between unreviewability of district court and court of appeals decisions); Kalka, 215 F.3d, at 96, and n. 9 (similar). This understandable concern has led some courts to conclude (mistakenly) that the constitutional-question-first rule is customary, not mandatory. See id., at 96, 98; Horne, supra, at 247, 250; see also Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 884 (C.A.7 2001) (doubting that the Saucier rule is “absolute,” for the reasons given in Kalka and Horne). The perception of unreviewability undermines adherence to the sequencing rule we have created. . . . This situation should not be prolonged. We should either make clear that constitutional determinations are not insulated from our review (for which purpose this case would be an appropriate vehicle), or else drop any pretense at requiring the ordering in every case.”).

Morse v. Frederick, 127 S. Ct. 2618, 2624 & n.1 (2007) (“We granted certiorari on two questions: whether Frederick had a First Amendment right to wield his banner, and, if so, whether that right was so clearly established that the principal may be held liable for damages. . . . We resolve the first question against Frederick, and therefore have no occasion to reach the second. . . . Justice BREYER would rest decision on qualified immunity without reaching the underlying First Amendment question. The problem with this approach is the rather significant one that it is inadequate to decide the case before us. Qualified immunity shields public officials from money damages only. . . . In this case, Frederick asked not just for damages, but also for declaratory and injunctive relief.”)

Morse v. Frederick, 127 S. Ct. 2618, 2638, 2639 (2007) (Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (“ This Court need not and should not decide this difficult First Amendment issue on the merits. Rather, I believe that it should simply hold that qualified immunity bars the student’s claim for monetary damages and say no more. . . Resolving the First Amendment question presented in this case is, in my view, unwise and unnecessary. . . .[R]egardless of the outcome of the constitutional determination, a decision on the underlying First Amendment issue is both difficult and unusually portentous. And that is a reason for us not to decide the issue unless we must. In some instances, it is appropriate to decide a constitutional issue in order to provide ‘guidance’ for the future. But I cannot find much guidance in today’s decision. . . . In order to avoid resolving the fractious underlying constitutional question, we need only decide a different question that this case presents, the question of ‘qualified immunity.’ . . . The relative ease with which we could decide this case on the qualified immunity ground, and thereby avoid deciding a far more difficult constitutional question, underscores the need to lift the rigid ‘order of battle’ decisionmaking requirement that this Court imposed upon lower courts in Saucier In resolving the underlying constitutional question, we produce several differing opinions. It is utterly unnecessary to do so. Were we to decide this case on the ground of qualified immunity , our decision would be unanimous, for the dissent concedes that Morse should not be held liable in damages for confiscating Frederick’s banner. . . .While Saucier justified its rule by contending that it was necessary to permit constitutional law to develop, . . . this concern is overstated because overruling Saucier would not mean that the law prohibited judges from passing on constitutional questions, only that it did not require them to do so. . . . I would end the failed Saucier experiment now.”)

Wilkie v. Robbins, 127 S. Ct. 2588, 2617 n. 10 (2007) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“As I have elsewhere indicated, in appropriate cases, I would allow courts to move directly to the second inquiry.”).

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598 n.3 (2004) (per curiam) (“ We have no occasion in this case to reconsider our instruction in Saucier. . . that lower courts decide the constitutional question prior to deciding the qualified immunity question.”)

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 600-01(2004) (per curiam) (Breyer, J., joined by Scalia, J., and Ginsburg, J., concurring) (“I join the Court’s opinion but write separately to express my concern about the matter to which the Court refers in footnote 3, namely, the way in which lower courts are required to evaluate claims of qualified immunity under the Court’s decision in Saucier v. Katz. . . . As the Court notes, . . . Saucier requires lower courts to decide (1) the constitutional question prior to deciding (2) the qualified immunity question. I am concerned that the current rule rigidly requires courts unnecessarily to decide difficult constitutional questions when there is available an easier basis for the decision (e.g., qualified immunity) that will satisfactorily resolve the case before the court. Indeed when courts’ dockets are crowded, a rigid ‘order of battle’ makes little administrative sense and can sometimes lead to a constitutional decision that is effectively insulated from review, see Bunting v. Mellen, 541 U.S. 1019, 1025 (2004) (SCALIA, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari). For these reasons, I think we should reconsider this issue.”).

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1774 n.4 (2007) (“Prior to this Court’s announcement of Saucier’s ‘rigid “order of battle,”’ . . . we had described this order of inquiry as the ‘better approach,’ . . . though not one that was required in all cases. . . There has been doubt expressed regarding the wisdom of Saucier’s decision to make the threshold inquiry mandatory, especially in cases where the constitutional question is relatively difficult and the qualified immunity question relatively straightforward. . . . We need not address the wisdom of Saucier in this case, however, because the constitutional question with which we are presented is . . . easily decided. Deciding that question first is thus the ‘better approach,’ . . . regardless of whether it is required.”).

Scott v. Harris, 127 S. Ct. 1769, 1780, 1781 (2007) (Breyer, J., concurring) (“[T]he video makes clear the highly fact-dependent nature of this constitutional determination. And that fact-dependency supports the argument that we should overrule the requirement, announced in Saucier v. Katz . . . that lower courts must first decide the ‘constitutional question’ before they turn to the ‘qualified immunity question.’ . . Instead, lower courts should be free to decide the two questions in whatever order makes sense in the context of a particular case. Although I do not object to our deciding the constitutional question in this particular case, I believe that in order to lift the burden from lower courts we can and should reconsider Saucier’s requirement as well. Sometimes (e.g., where a defendant is clearly entitled to qualified immunity) Saucier’s fixed order-of-battle rule wastes judicial resources in that it may require courts to answer a difficult constitutional question unnecessarily. Sometimes (e.g., where the defendant loses the constitutional question but wins on qualified immunity) that order-of-battle rule may immunize an incorrect constitutional ruling from review. Sometimes, as here, the order-of-battle rule will spawn constitutional rulings in areas of law so fact dependent that the result will be confusion rather than clarity. And frequently the order-of-battle rule violates that older, wiser judicial counsel ‘not to pass on questions of constitutionality ... unless such adjudication is unavoidable.’ . . In a sharp departure from this counsel, Saucier requires courts to embrace unnecessary constitutional questions not to avoid them. It is not surprising that commentators, judges, and, in this case, 28 States in an amicus brief, have invited us to reconsider Saucier’s requirement. . . I would accept that invitation. While this Court should generally be reluctant to overturn precedents, stare decisis concerns are at their weakest here. . . . The order-of-battle rule is relatively novel, it primarily affects judges, and there has been little reliance upon it.”).

Los Angeles County, California v. Rettele, 127 S. Ct. 1989, 1994 (2007) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment) (“This case presents two separate questions: (1) whether the four circumstances identified in the Court of Appeals’ unpublished opinion established a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the seizure violated respondents’ Fourth Amendment rights . . . (2) whether the officers were nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established. The fact that the judges on the Court of Appeals disagreed on both questions convinces me that they should not have announced their decision in an unpublished opinion. In answering the first question, the Ninth Circuit majority relied primarily on Franklin v. Foxworth, 31 F.3d 873 (C.A.9 1994). As Judge Cowen's discussion of Franklin demonstrates, that case surely does not clearly establish the unconstitutionality of the officers' conduct. . . . Consequently, regardless of the proper answer to the constitutional question, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. I would reverse on that ground and disavow the unwise practice of deciding constitutional questions in advance of the necessity for doing so.").

Criticism by Cases in the Circuits:

Estate of Buchanan v. Maine, 469 F.3d 158, 168-70 (1st Cir. 2006) ("We do not think the law elaboration purpose will be well served here, where the Fourth Amendment question is a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependent on the facts. The question is close whether under normal summary judgment rules, drawing all inferences in plaintiff's favor, this record would preclude submission to the jury of the question whether, given the circumstances, the officers reasonably entered Buchanan's house when they did rather than wait to see if they could break through a busy phone line to ask Buchanan's social worker for advice. On summary judgment on qualified immunity, the threshold question is whether all the uncontested facts and any contested facts looked at in plaintiff's favor show a constitutional violation. . . . Given the complexity of the matter, and since it is perfectly clear that the officers are entitled to immunity, we turn to the second and third prongs. . . . At the time of the deputies' visit to Buchanan's home, it had been clearly established that 'a warrantless entry ... of a residence may be "reasonable," in Fourth Amendment terms,' but was not reasonable unless 'the government [could] demonstrate ... "exigent circumstances,"' such as 'an imminent threat to the life or safety of members of the public, the police officers, or a person located within the residence.' . . . But, under Saucier, that level of analysis is insufficient. The relevant inquiry is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct would be unlawful in the situation he confronted, and this inquiry must be taken in light of the case's specific context, not as a broad general proposition. . . . We cannot say the officers had fair warning under the law that if they entered the house when they did, they would violate Buchanan's Fourth Amendment rights. While there is no case directly on point, case law tended to support the officers' actions, not put them on notice of illegality. . . . Even if we were wrong in our analysis thus far, the deputies would be entitled to immunity on the third prong. Our inquiry at this stage is limited to those objective facts known to (or discernible by) the officers at the time of the event. . . . A reasonable officer could have believed that waiting was not a good idea. There was no assurance the deputies could reach the social worker or that he would have been able to calm Buchanan or provide meaningful help to the officers from his remote location. Plaintiff put on no evidence that a reasonable officer would have waited. Further, the situation was escalating, with Buchanan punching out a window on a cold night, and the deputies did not know that the social worker would be available once the phone line was cleared. Even if the officers were mistaken, this was a reasonable judgment call, and they are entitled to immunity.").

Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 773 n.3 (6th Cir. 2005) (“Two judges of this circuit have recently articulated a number of reasons to eliminate the Supreme Court’s requirement that courts always begin with the question of whether a right has been violated, and never begin with the question of whether any such right at stake has been clearly established. See Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 580-84 (6th Cir.2005) (Sutton and Gibbons, JJ., concurring). Although the points raised are excellent, like those judges, we continue to follow the order of inquiry the Supreme Court set forth in Saucier. It is true that the Supreme Court in Brosseau exercised its discretion to resolve the qualified immunity inquiry without first resolving whether there was a constitutional violation, notwithstanding the Court’s earlier contrary ‘instruction’ to the lower courts. . . . As lower courts we are bound to follow the Supreme Court’s reasoning and holdings, as much as, if not more so than, its ‘instructions.’ The reasoning of Brosseau certainly permits us to follow the instructions, however, and we continue to do so.”)(emphasis original).

Lyons v. City of Xenia, 417 F.3d 565, 581-84 (6th Cir. 2005) (Sutton, J., with whom Gibbons, J., joins, concurring) (“As the Court has acknowledged,. . . requiring courts preemptively to resolve constitutional questions where non-constitutional grounds for disposition remain readily available cuts against the normal grain of constitutional adjudication. The customary rule is that a court ‘will not pass upon a constitutional question although properly presented by the record, if there is also present some other ground upon which the case may be disposed of.’ . . . Just as the Court has been right to identify the risk that the constitutional question might infrequently, if ever, be decided, . . . so there is a risk that constitutional questions may be prematurely and incorrectly decided in cases where they are not well presented. Heightening these concerns is the fact that some constitutional rulings effectively will be insulated from review by the en banc court of appeals or the Supreme Court where the appellate panel identifies a constitutional violation but grants qualified immunity under the second inquiry. . . . By multiplying constitutional holdings that are not subject to review in the normal course, a rigid application of the two-step inquiry may do as much to unsettle the law as to settle it. An unbending requirement in this area produces another oddity: The same lower-court judges that are supposed to adhere to this rule are given complete discretion over whether to publish a given decision. Appellate panels that choose not to publish a decision no more create binding precedent than those that decide only the clearly established question. . . . Lower federal courts given the authority to exercise judgment about when to publish their decisions, it seems to me, ought to be given authority occasionally to decide the last qualified immunity question before the threshold one. The same administrative concerns that permit the former ought to permit the latter. . . . Much as the Saucier two-step inquiry is a reasoned departure from the general rule that a court ‘will not pass upon a constitutional question’ unless essential to the disposition of a case,. . . so also the Court should permit lower courts to make reasoned departures from Saucier’s inquiry where principles of sound and efficient judicial administration recommend a variance. Here, as elsewhere, avoiding difficult and divisive constitutional questions will at times promote, not hinder, the enforcement and development of the law. . . . The alternative, as the four separate opinions from this three-judge panel illustrate, is to require courts to issue narrow, panel-riven, fact-bound constitutional rulings of limited precedential value, only to have them then announce that the government officials are entitled to qualified immunity because the precedents ‘taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case.’ . . And of course in Brosseau itself, the very case that prompted the Court to ask us to take a second look at this case, the Court did not address the constitutional question but only the clearly established question. Lower federal courts ought to have the same authority.”).

Robinette v. Jones, 476 F.3d 585, 592 n.8 (8th Cir. 2007) (“Saucier requires a full analysis of the first prong of a qualified immunity analysis because it ‘permits courts in appropriate cases to elaborate the constitutional right with greater degrees of specificity. . . However, the ‘law’s elaboration from case to case,’ . . . would be ill served by a ruling here, where the parties have provided very few facts to define and limit any holding on the reasonableness of the execution of the arrest warrant. See Buchanan v. Maine, 469 F.3d 158, 168 (1st Cir.2006) (“We do not think the law elaboration purpose will be well served here, where the Fourth Amendment question is a reasonableness question which is highly idiosyncratic and heavily dependent on the facts.”); see also Ehrlich v. Town of Glastonbury, 348 F.3d 48 (2d Cir.2003).”).

Clement v. City of Glendale, 518 F.3d 1090, 1093 n.4 (9th Cir. 2008) (“In deciding a motion for summary judgment in a section 1983 action we are bound to look first to whether there was a constitutional violation and then to whether defendants have qualified immunity, even if the qualified immunity inquiry would resolve the case more easily. . . Some have questioned the logic of this ‘rigid Aorder of battle,’” . . . but we are bound to follow it until further notice. We are free to muse, however, that the Saucier rule may lead to the publication of a lot of bad constitutional law that is, effectively, cert-proof. If a court of appeals holds that a constitutional right exists under Saucier in step one, but that the right is not clearly established (as we do in this case), then neither party will have both the incentive and the standing to petition for review of the constitutional ruling. It may be many years before another case arises that presents the same issue in a form ripe for review by the Supreme Court.”).

Kwai Fun Wong v. United States, 373 F.3d 952, 956, 957 (9th Cir. 2004) (“The confluence of two well-intentioned doctrines, notice pleading and qualified immunity, give rise to this exercise in legal decisionmaking based on facts both hypothetical and vague. On one hand, the federal courts may not dismiss a complaint unless ‘it is clear that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations.’ . . All that is required is a ‘short and plain statement’ of the plaintiff’s claims. . . On the other hand, government officials are entitled to raise the qualified immunity defense immediately, on a motion to dismiss the complaint, to protect against the burdens of discovery and other pre-trial procedures. . . The qualified immunity issue, in turn, cannot be resolved without first deciding the scope of the constitutional rights at stake.[citing Saucier] The unintended consequence of this confluence of procedural doctrines is that the courts may be called upon to decide far-reaching constitutional questions on a nonexistent factual record, even where, as the government defendants contend and as may be the case here, discovery would readily reveal the plaintiff’s claims to be factually baseless. We are therefore moved at the outset to suggest that while government officials have the right, for well-developed policy reasons, see Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 525-27 (1985), to raise and immediately appeal the qualified immunity defense on a motion to dismiss, the exercise of that authority is not a wise choice in every case. The ill-considered filing of a qualified immunity appeal on the pleadings alone can lead not only to a waste of scarce public and judicial resources, but to the development of legal doctrine that has lost its moorings in the empirical world, and that might never need to be determined were the case permitted to proceed, at least to the summary judgment stage.”).

McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1253 n.1 (11th Cir. 2007) (Anderson, J., concurring specially) (“Because we hold that the law was not clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct, it would not be necessary to address the constitutional issue in this case but for the Supreme Court’s admonition in Saucier v. Katz Unfortunately, in this case, because the defendants prevailed on the clearly established prong, the Saucier rule not only requires a constitutional holding that would be unnecessary otherwise; it also operates to insulate from further appellate review an erroneous constitutional ruling that will guide the conduct of police officers in three states. . . . Also, under the Saucier approach, a court is handicapped in addressing the constitutional issue because at least one party often has little incentive to litigate the issue vigorously, especially when it is apparent that the law is not clearly established, as in this case. Similarly, only the Supreme Court’s mandate provides an incentive for busy federal judges to focus intently on the issue; they lack the usual incentive that proper resolution of the matter will make a real difference to a real party. For these reasons and others, twenty-eight states and Puerto Rico have recently urged the Supreme Court in an amicus brief to reconsider its mandatory Saucier approach to qualified immunity. See Brief for 28 States and Puerto Rico as Amici Curiae in Support of Petitioner, Scott v. Harris, No. 05-1631 (Supreme Court, December 2006).).

8. Pearson v. Callahan

In Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009), the Court reviewed a decision of the Court of Appeals of the Tenth Circuit that had held the “consent-once-removed” doctrine which permits a warrantless entry into the home by police when consent has been given to an undercover officer who has observed contraband in the home—did not apply when the person to whom consent was given was a police informant rather than a police officer. The Court of Appeals also denied qualified immunity to the officers involved, noting that “the Supreme Court and the Tenth Circuit have clearly established that to allow police entry into a home, the only two exceptions to the warrant requirement are consent and exigent circumstances.” Callahan v. Millard County, 494 F.3d 891, 898 (10th Cir. 2007), rev’d by Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S. Ct. 808 (2009). In granting certiorari, the Supreme Court directed the parties to brief and argue whether Saucier should be overruled.

In an unanimous opinion authored by Justice Alito, the Court reexamined the mandatory constitutional-question-first procedure required by Saucier and concluded “that a mandatory, two-step rule for resolving all qualified immunity claims should not be retained.” 129 S. Ct. at 817. The Court acknowledged much of the criticism that had been leveled at the “rigid order of battle” by lower court judges and by members of the Court. Id. The Court justified its overruling of precedent by highlighting the various criticisms that have been directed at Saucier’s two-step protocol: (1) Deciding the constitutional question first often results in substantial expenditures of resources by both the parties and the courts on “questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case.” Id. at 818. (2) The development of constitutional doctrine is not furthered by decisions that are often “so fact-bound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases.” Id. at 819. (3) It makes little sense to have lower courts forced to decide a constitutional question that is pending in a higher court or before an en banc panel. Id. (4) It likewise does little to further the development of constitutional precedent to force a decision that depends on “an uncertain interpretation of state law.” Id. (5) Requiring a constitutional decision at the pleading stage based on bare or sketchy allegations of fact or one at the summary judgment stage resting on “woefully inadequate” briefs creates a risk of “bad decisionmaking.” Id. at 820. (6) The mandated two-step analysis often shields constitutional decisions from appellate review when the defendant loses on the “merits” question but prevails on the clearly-established-law prong of the analysis. Such unreviewed decisions may then have “a serious prospective effect” on conduct. Id. (7) Finally, the approach requires unnecessary determinations of constitutional law and “departs from the general rule of constitutional avoidance.” Id. at 821.

While abandoning the mandatory nature of two-step analysis, the Court continued to recognize that the approach can be beneficial in promoting “the development of constitutional precedent[.]” Id. at 818, and “is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.” Id. In the end, the Court has left it to the lower court judges to decide, as a matter of discretion, what “order of decisionmaking will best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition of each case.” Id. at 821. The Court addressed expressed “misgivings” about its decision. First, the Saucier approach is not prohibited; it is simply no longer mandated. Second, constitutional law will continue to develop in other contexts, such as criminal cases, cases involving claims against government entities and cases involving claims for injunctive relief. Third, the Court does not predict a flood of suits against local governments by plaintiffs pursuing novel claims. Id. at 821, 822. Nor does the Court anticipate a new “cottage industry of litigation” over the proper standards to use in deciding whether to reach the merits in a given case. Id. at 822.

Without addressing or overruling the constitutional holding of the Court of Appeals, the Court reversed the Tenth Circuit on the grounds that the law on the “consent-once-removed” doctrine was not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct such that a reasonable officer would have understood the conduct here to be unlawful. As the Court explained:

When the entry at issue here occurred in 2002, the ‘consent-once-removed’ doctrine had gained acceptance in the lower courts. This doctrine had been considered by three Federal Courts of Appeals and two State Supreme Courts starting in the early 1980’s. [citing cases] It had been accepted by every one of those courts. Moreover, the Seventh Circuit had approved the doctrine’s application to cases involving consensual entries by private citizens acting as confidential informants. See United States v. Paul, 808 F.2d, 645, 648 (1986). The Sixth Circuit reached the same conclusion after the events that gave rise to respondent's suit, see United States v. Yoon, 398 F.3d 802, 806-808, cert. denied, 546 U.S. 977, 126 S. Ct. 548, 163 L.Ed.2d 460 (2005), and prior to the Tenth Circuit's decision in the present case, no court of appeals had issued a contrary decision. The officers here were entitled to rely on these cases, even though their own Federal Circuit had not yet ruled on "consent-once-removed" entries. The principles of qualified immunity shield an officer from personal liability when an officer reasonably believes that his or her conduct complies with the law. Police officers are entitled to rely on existing lower court cases without facing personal liability for their actions. . . . [H]ere, where the divergence of views on the consent-once-removed doctrine was created by the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case, it is improper to subject petitioners to money damages for their conduct.

129 S. Ct. at 822, 823.

9. Post-Pearson Cases

U.S. SUPREME COURT

City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, 142 S. Ct. 9, 10 (2021) (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law.")

Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7-9 (2021) (per curiam) (granting certiorari and reversing) ("Even assuming that controlling Circuit precedent clearly establishes law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde did not give fair notice to Rivas-Villegas. He is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]his is not an obvious case. Thus, to show a violation of clearly established law, Cortesluna must identify a case that put Rivas-Villegas on notice that his specific conduct was unlawful. Cortesluna has not done so. Neither Cortesluna nor the Court of Appeals identified any Supreme Court case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here. Instead, the Court of Appeals relied solely on its precedent in LaLonde. Even assuming that Circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of §1983, LaLonde is materially distinguishable and thus does not govern the facts of this case. . . . On the facts of this case, neither LaLonde nor any decision of this Court is sufficiently similar. For that reason, we grant Rivas-Villegas' petition for certiorari and reverse the Ninth Circuit's determination that Rivas-Villegas is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152-54 (2018) (per curiam) ("Here, the Court need not, and does not, decide whether Kisela violated the Fourth Amendment when he used deadly force against

Hughes. For even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation occurred—a proposition that is not at all evident—on these facts Kisela was at least entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remit the case for a trial on the question of reasonableness. An officer ‘cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right’s contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ [citing Plumhoff] That is a necessary part of the qualified-immunity standard, and it is a part of the standard that the Court of Appeals here failed to implement in a correct way. Kisela says he shot Hughes because, although the officers themselves were in no apparent danger, he believed she was a threat to Chadwick. Kisela had mere seconds to assess the potential danger to Chadwick. He was confronted with a woman who had just been seen hacking a tree with a large kitchen knife and whose behavior was erratic enough to cause a concerned bystander to call 911 and then flag down Kisela and Garcia. Kisela was separated from Hughes and Chadwick by a chain-link fence; Hughes had moved to within a few feet of Chadwick; and she failed to acknowledge at least two commands to drop the knife. Those commands were loud enough that Chadwick, who was standing next to Hughes, heard them. This is far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting Hughes to protect Chadwick would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]ot one of the decisions relied on by the Court of Appeals—Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864 (C.A.9 2011), and Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189 (C.A.9 1997)—supports denying Kisela qualified immunity.” [majority discusses and distinguishes Deorle, Glenn, and Harris])

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589 & n.7 (2018) (“Our conclusion that the officers had probable cause to arrest the partygoers is sufficient to resolve this case. But where, as here, the Court of Appeals erred on both the merits of the constitutional claim and the question of qualified immunity, ‘we have discretion to correct its errors at each step.’ . . . We exercise that discretion here because the D. C. Circuit’s analysis, if followed elsewhere, would ‘undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote.’ . . . We continue to stress that lower courts ‘should think hard, and then think hard again,’ before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim. . . . We addressed the merits of probable cause here, however, because a decision on qualified immunity alone would not have resolved all of the claims in this case.”)

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 593 (2018) (Sotomayor, J. concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I agree with the majority that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity and, for that reason alone, I concur in the Court’s judgment reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. But, I disagree with the majority’s decision to reach the merits of the probable-cause question, which it does apparently only to ensure that, in addition to respondents’ 42 U. S. C. §1983 claims, the Court’s decision will resolve respondents’ state-law claims of false arrest and negligent supervision. . . . It is possible that our qualified-immunity decision alone will resolve those claims. . . . In light of the lack of a dispute on an important legal question and the heavily factbound nature of the probable-cause determination here, I do not think that the Court should have reached that issue. The lower courts are well equipped to handle the remaining state-law claims in the first instance.”)

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 593-94 (2018) (Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment in part) (“This case. . . leads me to question whether this Court, in assessing probable cause, should continue to ignore why police in fact acted. . . No arrests of plaintiffs-respondents were made until Sergeant Suber so instructed. His instruction, when conveyed to the officers he superintended, was based on an error of law. Sergeant Suber believed that the absence of the premises owner’s consent, an uncontested fact in this case, sufficed to justify arrest of the partygoers for unlawful entry. . . An essential element of unlawful entry in the District of Columbia is that the defendant ‘knew or should have known that his entry was unwanted. . . But under Sergeant Suber’s view of the law, what the arrestees knew or should have known was irrelevant. They could be arrested, as he comprehended the law, even if they believed their entry was invited by a lawful occupant. Ultimately, plaintiffs-respondents were not booked for unlawful entry. Instead, they were charged at the police station with disorderly conduct. Yet no police officers at the site testified to having observed any activities warranting a disorderly conduct charge. Quite the opposite. The officers at the scene of the arrest uniformly testified that they had neither seen nor heard anything that would justify such a charge, and Sergeant Suber specifically advised his superiors that the charge was unwarranted. . . The Court’s jurisprudence, I am concerned, sets the balance too heavily in favor of police unaccountability to the detriment of Fourth Amendment protection. A number of commentators have criticized the path we charted in Whren v. United States, 517 U. S. 806 (1996), and follow-on opinions, holding that ‘an arresting officer’s state of mind . . . is irrelevant to the existence of probable cause,’ Devenpeck v. Alford, 543 U. S. 146, 153 (2004). See, e.g., 1 W. LaFare, Search and Seizure §1.4(f), p. 186 (5th ed. 2012) (‘The apparent assumption of the Court in Whren, that no significant problem of police arbitrariness can exist as to actions taken with probable cause, blinks at reality.’). I would leave open, for reexamination in a future case, whether a police officer’s reason for acting, in at least some circumstances, should factor into the Fourth Amendment inquiry. Given the current state of the Court’s precedent, however, I agree that the disposition gained by plaintiffs-respondents was not warranted by ‘settled law.’ The defendants-petitioners are therefore sheltered by qualified immunity.”)

Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308-12 (2015) (per curiam) (“We address only the qualified immunity question, not whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation in the first place, and now reverse. . . . In this case, the Fifth Circuit held that Mullenix violated the clearly established rule that a police officer may not “‘use deadly force against a fleeing felon who does not pose a sufficient threat of harm to the officer or others.’”. . . Yet this Court has previously considered—and rejected—almost that exact formulation of the qualified immunity question in the Fourth Amendment context. [discussing Brosseau] In this case, Mullenix confronted a reportedly intoxicated fugitive, set on avoiding capture through high-speed vehicular flight, who twice during his flight had threatened to shoot police officers, and who was moments away from encountering an officer at Cemetery Road. The relevant inquiry is whether existing precedent placed the conclusion that Mullenix acted unreasonably in these circumstances ‘beyond debate.’. . The general principle that deadly force requires a sufficient threat hardly settles this matter. . . Far from clarifying the issue, excessive force cases involving car chases reveal the hazy legal backdrop against which Mullenix acted. . . The threat Leija posed was at least as immediate as that presented by a suspect who had just begun to drive off and was headed only in the general direction of officers and bystanders. . . By the time Mullenix fired, Leija had led police on a 25-mile chase at extremely high speeds, was reportedly intoxicated, had twice threatened to shoot officers, and was racing towards an officer’s location. This Court has considered excessive force claims in connection with high-speed chases on only two occasions since Brosseau. [discussing Scott and Plumhoff] The Court has thus never found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone to be a basis for denying qualified immunity. Leija in his flight did not pass as many cars as the drivers in Scott or Plumhoff; traffic was light on I-27. At the same time, the fleeing fugitives in Scott and Plumhoff had not verbally threatened to kill any officers in their path, nor were they about to come upon such officers. In any event, none of our precedents ‘squarely governs’ the facts here. Given Leija’s conduct, we cannot say that only someone ‘plainly incompetent’ or who ‘knowingly violate[s] the law’ would have perceived a sufficient threat and acted as Mullenix did. . . . Ultimately, whatever can be said of the wisdom of Mullenix’s choice, this Court’s precedents do not place the conclusion that he acted unreasonably in these circumstances ‘beyond debate.’. . More fundamentally, the dissent repeats the Fifth Circuit’s error. It defines the qualified immunity inquiry at a high level of generality—whether any governmental interest justified choosing one tactic over another—and then fails to consider that question in ‘the specific context of the case.’. . Cases decided by the lower courts since Brosseau likewise have not clearly established that deadly force is inappropriate in response to conduct like Leija’s. . . Finally, respondents argue that the danger Leija represented was less substantial than the threats that courts have found sufficient to justify deadly force. But the mere fact that courts have approved deadly force in more extreme circumstances says little, if anything, about whether such force was reasonable in the circumstances here. The fact is that when Mullenix fired, he reasonably understood Leija to be a fugitive fleeing arrest, at speeds over 100 miles per hour, who was armed and possibly intoxicated, who had threatened to kill any officer he saw if the police did not abandon their pursuit, and who was racing towards Officer Ducheneaux’s position. Even accepting that these circumstances fall somewhere between the two sets of cases respondents discuss, qualified immunity protects actions in the ‘“hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.”’ . . Because the constitutional rule applied by the Fifth Circuit was not ‘“beyond debate,”’. . we grant Mullenix’s petition for certiorari and reverse the Fifth Circuit’s determination that Mullenix is not entitled to qualified immunity. It is so ordered.”) Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 312-13 (2015) (per curiam) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I join the judgment of the Court, but would not describe what occurred here as the application of deadly force in effecting an arrest. Our prior cases have reserved that description to the directing of force sufficient to kill at the person of the desired arrestee. See, e.g., Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U. S. ____ (2014); Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U. S. 194 (2004) (per curiam); Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U. S. 1 (1985). It does not assist analysis to refer to all use of force that happens to kill the arrestee as the application of deadly force. . . . [I]t stacks the deck against the officer, it seems to me, to describe his action as the application of deadly force. It was at least arguable in Scott that pushing a speeding vehicle off the road is targeting its occupant for injury or death. Here, however, it is conceded that Trooper Mullenix did not shoot to wound or kill the fleeing Leija, nor even to drive Leija's car off the road, but only to cause the car to stop by destroying its engine. That was a risky enterprise, as the outcome demonstrated; but determining whether it violated the Fourth Amendment requires us to ask, not whether it was reasonable to kill Leija, but whether it was reasonable to shoot at the engine in light of the risk to Leija. It distorts that inquiry, I think, to make the question whether it was reasonable for Mullenix to 'apply deadly force.'")

Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 313-16 (2015) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) ("Chadrin Mullenix fired six rounds in the dark at a car traveling 85 miles per hour. He did so without any training in that tactic, against the wait order of his superior officer, and less than a second before the car hit spike strips deployed to stop it. Mullenix's rogue conduct killed the driver, Israel Leija, Jr. Because it was clearly established under the Fourth Amendment that an officer in Mullenix's position should not have fired the shots, I respectfully dissent from the grant of summary reversal. . . . Here, then, the clearly established legal question—the question a reasonable officer would have asked—is whether, under all the circumstances as known to Mullenix, there was a governmental interest in shooting at the car rather than waiting for it to run over spike strips. The majority does not point to any such interest here. . . . It is clearly established that there must be some governmental interest that necessitates deadly force, even if it is not always clearly established what level of governmental interest is sufficient. Under the circumstances known to him at the time, Mullenix puts forth no plausible reason to choose shooting at Leija's engine block over waiting for the results of the spike strips. I would thus hold that Mullenix violated Leija's clearly established right to be free of intrusion absent some governmental interest. . . . By granting Mullenix qualified immunity, this Court goes a step further than our previous cases and does so without full briefing or argument. . . . When Mullenix confronted his superior officer after the shooting, his first words were, 'How's that for proactive?'. . . The glib comment does not impact our legal analysis; an officer's actual intentions are irrelevant to the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively reasonable' inquiry. . . . But the comment seems to me revealing of the culture this Court's decision supports when it calls it reasonable—or even reasonably reasonable—to use deadly force for no discernible gain and over a supervisor's express order to 'stand by.' By sanctioning a 'shoot first, think later' approach to policing, the Court renders the protections of the Fourth Amendment hollow. For the reasons discussed, I would deny Mullenix's petition for a writ of certiorari. I thus respectfully dissent.")

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2044-45 (2015) (per curiam) ("The Third Circuit concluded that the right at issue was best defined as 'an incarcerated person's right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols.' . . . This purported right, however, was not clearly established in November 2004 in a way that placed beyond debate the unconstitutionality of the Institution's procedures, as implemented by the medical contractor. . . . In short, even if the Institution's suicide screening and prevention measures contained the shortcomings that respondents allege, no precedent on the books in November 2004 would have made clear to petitioners that they were overseeing a system that violated the Constitution. Because, at the very least, petitioners were not contravening clearly established law, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The judgment of the Third Circuit is reversed.”)

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1775-78 (2015) (“The real question. . . is whether, despite these dangerous circumstances, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they decided to reopen Sheehan’s door rather than attempting to accommodate her disability. Here we come to another problem. San Francisco, whose attorneys represent Reynolds and Holder, devotes scant briefing to this question. Instead, San Francisco argues almost exclusively that even if it is assumed that there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the right was not clearly established. This Court, of course, could decide the constitutional question anyway. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (recognizing discretion). But because this question has not been adequately briefed, we decline to do so. . . Rather, we simply decide whether the officers’ failure to accommodate Sheehan’s illness violated clearly established law. It did not. To begin, nothing in our cases suggests the constitutional rule applied by the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit focused on Graham v. Connor,. . . but Graham holds only that the ‘ “objective reasonableness” ’ test applies to excessive-force claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . That is far too general a proposition to control this case. ‘We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Qualified immunity is no immunity at all if ‘clearly established’ law can simply be defined as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Even a cursory glance at the facts of Graham confirms just how different that case is from this one. That case did not involve a dangerous, obviously unstable person making threats, much less was there a weapon involved. There is a world of difference between needlessly withholding sugar from an innocent person who is suffering from an insulin reaction. . . and responding to the perilous situation Reynolds and Holder confronted. Graham is a nonstarter. Moving beyond Graham, the Ninth Circuit also turned to two of its own cases. But even if ‘a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,’ Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. —, — (2014) (per curiam) (slip op., at 4), it does not do so here. The Ninth Circuit first pointed to Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), but from the very first paragraph of that opinion we learn that Deorle involved an officer’s use of a beanbag gun to subdue ‘an emotionally disturbed’ person who ‘was unarmed, had not attacked or even touched anyone, had generally obeyed the instructions given him by various police officers, and had not committed any serious offense.’ . . The officer there, moreover, ‘observed Deorle at close proximity for about five to ten minutes before shooting him’ in the face. . . Whatever the merits of the decision in Deorle, the differences between that case and the case before us leap from the page. Unlike Deorle, Sheehan was dangerous, recalcitrant, law-breaking, and out of sight. The Ninth Circuit also leaned on Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (C.A.9 1994), another case involving mental illness. There, officials from San Francisco attempted to enter Henry Quade’s home ‘for the primary purpose of arresting him’ even though they lacked an arrest warrant. . . Quade, in response, fired a handgun; police officers ‘shot back, and Quade died from gunshot wounds shortly thereafter.’ . . The panel concluded that a jury should decide whether the officers used excessive force. The court reasoned that the officers provoked the confrontation because there were no ‘exigent circumstances’ excusing their entrance. . . Alexander too is a poor fit. As Judge Graber observed below in her dissent, the Ninth Circuit has long read Alexander narrowly. . . Under Ninth Circuit law. . . an entry that otherwise complies with the Fourth Amendment is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction. . . Under this rule, qualified immunity necessarily applies here because, as explained above, competent officers could have believed that the second entry was justified under both continuous search and exigent circumstance rationales. Indeed, even if Reynolds and Holder misjudged the situation, Sheehan cannot ‘establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.’ . . Courts must not judge officers with ‘the 20/20 vision of hindsight.’ . . When Graham, Deorle, and Alexander are viewed together, the central error in the Ninth Circuit’s reasoning is apparent. The panel majority concluded that these three cases ‘would have placed any reasonable, competent officer on notice that it is unreasonable to forcibly enter the home of an armed, mentally ill suspect who had been acting irrationally and had threatened anyone who entered when there was no objective need for immediate entry.’ . . But even assuming that is true, no precedent clearly established that there was not ‘an objective need for immediate entry’ here. No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read Graham, Deorle, and Alexander beforehand, that officer could not know that reopening Sheehan’s door to prevent her from escaping or gathering more weapons would violate the Ninth Circuit’s test, even if all the disputed facts are viewed in respondent’s favor. Without that ‘fair notice,’ an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does it matter for purposes of qualified immunity that Sheehan’s expert, Reiter, testified that the officers did not follow their training. . . Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, (and here, given the generality of that training, it is not at all clear that Reynolds and Holder did so), that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. Rather, so long as ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,’ a plaintiff cannot ‘avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert’s report that an officer’s conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.’ . . Considering the specific situation confronting Reynolds and Holder, they had sufficient reason to believe that their conduct was justified. Finally, to the extent that a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges, . . . no such consensus exists here. . . In sum, we hold that qualified immunity applies because these officers had no ‘fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.’ . . Because the qualified immunity analysis is straightforward, we need not decide whether the Constitution was violated by the officers’ failure to accommodate Sheehan’s illness. * * * For these reasons, the first question presented is dismissed as improvidently granted. On the second question, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350-52 (2014) (per curiam) (“Carroll petitioned for certiorari. We grant the petition and reverse the Third Circuit’s determination that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . In concluding that Officer Carroll violated clearly established law in this case, the Third Circuit relied exclusively on Marasco's statement that 'entry into the curtilage after not receiving an answer at the front door might be reasonable.' . . . In the court's view, that statement clearly established that a 'knock and talk' must begin at the front door. But that conclusion does not follow. Marasco held that an unsuccessful 'knock and talk' at the front door does not automatically allow officers to go onto other parts of the property. It did not hold, however, that knocking on the front door is required before officers go onto other parts of the property that are open to visitors. Thus, Marasco simply did not answer the question whether a 'knock and talk' must begin at the front door when visitors may also go to the back door. Indeed, the house at issue seems not to have even had a back door, let alone one that visitors could use. . . . Moreover, Marasco expressly stated that 'there [was] no indication of whether the officers followed a path or other apparently open route that would be suggestive of reasonableness.' Ibid. That makes Marasco wholly different from this case, where the jury necessarily decided that Carroll 'restrict[ed] [his] movements to walkways, driveways, porches and places where visitors could be expected to go.' . . . To the extent that Marasco says anything about this case, it arguably supports Carroll's view. In Marasco, the Third Circuit noted that '[o]fficers are allowed to knock on a residence's door or otherwise approach the residence seeking to speak to the inhabitants just as any private citizen may.' . . . The court also said that, ' "when the police come on to private property ... and restrict their movements to places visitors could be expected to go (e.g., walkways, driveways, porches), observations made from such vantage points are not covered by the Fourth Amendment.' " . . . Had Carroll read those statements before going to the Carmans' house, he may have concluded—quite reasonably—that he was allowed to knock on any door that was open to visitors. . . . The Third Circuit's decision is even more perplexing in comparison to the decisions of other federal and state courts, which have rejected the rule the Third Circuit adopted here. [citing cases from 2d, 7th, and 9th circuits and New Jersey Supreme Court] We do not decide today whether those cases were correctly decided or whether a police officer may conduct a 'knock and talk' at any entrance that is open to visitors rather than only the front door. 'But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not "beyond debate.'" Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. —, — (2013) (per curiam) (slip op., at 8) (quoting al-Kidd, 563 U.S., at — (slip op., at 9)). The Third Circuit therefore erred when it held that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity. The petition for certiorari is granted. The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Lane v. Franks, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2377-79 & n.4, 2381-83 (2014) ("We granted certiorari. . . to resolve discord among the Courts of Appeals as to whether public employees may be fired—or suffer other adverse employment consequences—for providing truthful subpoenaed testimony outside the course of their ordinary job responsibilities. . . . Truthful testimony under oath by a public employee outside the scope of his ordinary job duties is speech as a citizen for First Amendment purposes. That is so even when the testimony relates to his public employment or concerns information learned during that employment. In rejecting Lane's argument that his testimony was speech as a citizen, the Eleventh Circuit gave short shrift to the nature of sworn judicial statements and ignored the obligation borne by all witnesses testifying under oath. . . . Sworn testimony in judicial proceedings is a quintessential example of speech as a citizen for a simple reason: Anyone who testifies in court bears an obligation, to the court and society at large, to tell the truth. . . . In holding that Lane did not speak as a citizen when he testified, the Eleventh Circuit read Garcetti far too broadly. It reasoned that, because Lane learned of the subject matter of his testimony in the course of his employment with CITY, Garcetti requires that his testimony be treated as the speech of an employee rather than that of a citizen. . . . It is undisputed that Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings. . . . For that reason, Lane asked the Court to decide only whether truthful sworn testimony that is not a part of an employee's ordinary job responsibilities is citizen speech on a matter of public concern. . . . We accordingly need not address in this case whether truthful sworn testimony would constitute citizen speech under Garcetti when given as part of a public employee's ordinary job duties, and express no opinion on the matter today. . . . In other words, the mere fact that a citizen's speech concerns information acquired by virtue of his public employment does not transform that speech into employee—rather than citizen—speech. The critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties. . . . Respondent Franks argues that even if Lane's testimony is protected under the First Amendment, the claims against him in his individual capacity should be dismissed on the basis of qualified immunity. We agree. . . . The relevant question for qualified immunity purposes is this: Could Franks reasonably have believed, at the time he fired Lane, that a government employer could fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave, under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities? Eleventh Circuit precedent did not preclude Franks from reasonably holding that belief. And no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt on the controlling Eleventh Circuit precedent. . . . Morris, Martinez, and Tindal represent the landscape of Eleventh Circuit precedent the parties rely on for qualified immunity purposes. If Martinez and Tindal were controlling in the Eleventh Circuit in 2009, we would agree with Lane that Franks could not reasonably have believed that it was lawful to fire Lane in retaliation for his testimony. But both cases must be read together with Morris, which reasoned—in declining to afford First Amendment protection—that the plaintiff's decision to testify was motivated solely by his desire to comply with a subpoena. The same could be said of Lane's decision to testify. Franks was thus entitled to rely on Morris when he fired Lane. . . . Lane argues that Morris is inapplicable because it distinguished Martinez, suggesting that Martinez survived Morris. . . . But this debate over whether Martinez or Morris applies to Lane's claim only highlights the dispositive point: At the time of Lane's termination, Eleventh Circuit precedent did not provide clear notice that subpoenaed testimony concerning information acquired through public employment is speech of a citizen entitled to First Amendment protection. At best, Lane can demonstrate only a discrepancy in Eleventh Circuit precedent, which is insufficient to defeat the defense of qualified immunity. Finally, Lane argues that decisions of the Third and Seventh Circuits put Franks on notice that his firing of Lane was unconstitutional. See Reilly, 532 F.3d, at 231(CA3) (truthful testimony in court is citizen speech protected by the First Amendment); Morales v. Jones, 494 F.3d 590, 598 (C.A.7 2007) (similar). But, as the court below acknowledged, those precedents were in direct conflict with Eleventh Circuit precedent. . . . There is no doubt that the Eleventh Circuit incorrectly concluded that Lane's testimony was not entitled to First Amendment protection. But because the question was not ‘beyond debate’ at the time Franks acted, al-Kidd, 563 U.S., at — (slip op., at 9), Franks is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Wood v. Moss, 134 S. Ct. 2056, 2061, 2066-70 (2014) (“The First Amendment, our precedent makes plain, disfavors viewpoint-based discrimination. . . But safeguarding the President is also of overwhelming importance in our constitutional system. . . Faced with the President’s sudden decision to stop for dinner, the Secret Service agents had to cope with a security situation not earlier anticipated. No decision of this Court so much as hinted that their on-the-spot action was unlawful because they failed to keep the protesters and supporters, throughout the episode, equidistant from the President. . . . The particular question before us is whether the protesters have alleged violation of a clearly established First Amendment right based on the agents’ decision to order the protesters moved from their original location in front of the Inn, first to the block just east of the Inn, and then another block farther. . . .[W]e address the key question: Should it have been clear to the agents that the security perimeter they established violated the First Amendment?No decision of which we are aware. . . would alert Secret Service agents engaged in crowd control that they bear a First Amendment obligation ‘to ensure that groups with different viewpoints are at comparable locations at all times.’ .Nor would the maintenance of equal access make sense in the situation the agents confronted. . . .It may be, the agents acknowledged, that clearly established law proscribed the Secret Service from disadvantaging one group of speakers in comparison to another if the agents had ‘no objectively reasonable security rationale’ for their conduct, but acted solely to inhibit the expression of disfavored views. . . We agree with the agents, however, that the map itself . . . undermines the protesters’ allegations of viewpoint discrimination as the sole reason for the agents’ directions. The map corroborates that, because of their location, the protesters posed a potential security risk to the President, while the supporters, because of their location, did not. . . .This case comes to us on the agents’ petition to review the Ninth Circuit’s denial of their qualified immunity defense. . . Limiting our decision to that question, we hold, for the reasons stated, that the agents are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012, 2016, 2017, 2020-23 (2014) (“The courts below denied qualified immunity for police officers who shot the driver of a fleeing vehicle to put an end to a dangerous car chase. We reverse and hold that the officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment. In the alternative, we conclude that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they violated no clearly established law. . . .Heeding our guidance in Pearson, we begin in this case with the question whether the officers’ conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. This approach, we believe, will be ‘beneficial’ in ‘develop[ing] constitutional precedent’ in an area that courts typically consider in cases in which the defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense. . . . In this case, respondent advances two main Fourth Amendment arguments. First, she contends that the Fourth Amendment did not allow petitioners to use deadly force to terminate the chase. . . . Second, she argues that the ‘degree of force was excessive,’ that is, that even if the officers were permitted to fire their weapons, they went too far when they fired as many rounds as they did. . . . We address each issue in turn. . . . Rickard’s outrageously reckless driving posed a grave public safety risk. And while it is true that Rickard’s car eventually collided with a police car and came temporarily to a near standstill, that did not end the chase. Less than three seconds later, Rickard resumed maneuvering his car. Just before the shots were fired, when the front bumper of his car was flush with that of one of the police cruisers, Rickard was obviously pushing down on the accelerator because the car's wheels were spinning, and then Rickard threw the car into reverse 'in an attempt to escape.' Thus, the record conclusively disproves respondent's claim that the chase in the present case was already over when petitioners began shooting. Under the circumstances at the moment when the shots were fired, all that a reasonable police officer could have concluded was that Rickard was intent on resuming his flight and that, if he was allowed to do so, he would once again pose a deadly threat for others on the road. Rickard's conduct even after the shots were fired—as noted, he managed to drive away despite the efforts of the police to block his path—underscores the point. In light of the circumstances we have discussed, it is beyond serious dispute that Rickard's flight posed a grave public safety risk, and here, as in Scott, the police acted reasonably in using deadly force to end that risk. . . . We now consider respondent's contention that, even if the use of deadly force was permissible, petitioners acted unreasonably in firing a total of 15 shots. We reject that argument. It stands to reason that, if police officers are justified in firing at a suspect in order to end a severe threat to public safety, the officers need not stop shooting until the threat has ended. As petitioners noted below, 'if lethal force is justified, officers are taught to keep shooting until the threat is over.' . . . This would be a different case if petitioners had initiated a second round of shots after an initial round had clearly incapacitated Rickard and had ended any threat of continued flight, or if Rickard had clearly given himself up. But that is not what happened. In arguing that too many shots were fired, respondent relies in part on the presence of Kelly Allen in the front seat of the car, but we do not think that this factor changes the calculus. Our cases make it clear that 'Fourth Amendment rights are personal rights which ... may not be vicariously asserted.' . . . Thus, the question before us is whether petitioners violated Rickard's Fourth Amendment rights, not Allen's. If a suit were brought on behalf of Allen under either § 1983 or state tort law, the risk to Allen would be of central concern. . . . But Allen's presence in the car cannot enhance Rickard's Fourth Amendment rights. After all, it was Rickard who put Allen in danger by fleeing and refusing to end the chase, and it would be perverse if his disregard for Allen's safety worked to his benefit. . . . We have held that petitioners' conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment, but even if that were not the case, petitioners would still be entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. An official sued under § 1983 is entitled to qualified immunity unless it is shown that the official violated a statutory or constitutional right that was "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . And a defendant cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it. . . . In other words, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question' confronted by the official 'beyond debate.' . . . In addition, '[w]e have repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' . . . since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced. We think our decision in Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 125 S. Ct. 596, 160 L.Ed.2d 583 (2004) (per curiam) squarely demonstrates that no clearly established law precluded petitioners' conduct at the time in question. . . . Brosseau makes plain that as of February 21, 1999—the date of the events at issue in that case—it was not clearly established that it was unconstitutional to shoot a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger. We did not consider later decided cases because they ‘could not have given fair notice to [the officer].’ . . . To defeat immunity here, then, respondent must show at a minimum either (1) that the officers’ conduct in this case was materially different from the conduct in Brosseau or (2) that between February 21, 1999, and July 18, 2004, there emerged either “‘controlling authority’” or a ‘robust “consensus of cases of persuasive authority,”’. . . that would alter our analysis of the qualified immunity question. Respondent has made neither showing.”)

Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 5, 7 (2013) (per curiam) (“There is no suggestion in this case that Officer Stanton knowingly violated the Constitution; the question is whether, in light of precedent existing at the time, he was ‘plainly incompetent’ in entering Sims’ yard to pursue the fleeing Patrick. . . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that he was. It did so despite the fact that federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect. . . . To summarize the law at the time Stanton made his split-second decision to enter Sims’ yard: Two opinions of this Court were equivocal on the lawfulness of his entry; two opinions of the State Court of Appeal affirmatively authorized that entry; the most relevant opinion of the Ninth Circuit was readily distinguishable; two Federal District Courts in the Ninth Circuit had granted qualified immunity in the wake of that opinion; and the federal and state courts of last resort around the Nation were sharply divided. We do not express any view on whether Officer Stanton’s entry into Sims’ yard in pursuit of Patrick was constitutional. But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not ‘beyond debate.’ al-Kidd, supra, at —, 131 S.Ct., at 2083. Stanton may have been mistaken in believing his actions were justified, but he was not ‘plainly incompetent.’”) [See Lange v. California, 141 S. Ct. 2011 (2021) (“The flight of a suspected misdemeanant does not always justify a warrantless entry into a home. An officer must consider all the circumstances in a pursuit case to determine whether there is a law enforcement emergency. On many occasions, the officer will have good reason to enter—to prevent imminent harms of violence, destruction of evidence, or escape from the home. But when the officer has time to get a warrant, he must do so—even though the misdemeanant fled.”)]]

Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2093-97 (2012) (“We granted certiorari on two questions: whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest, and whether clearly established law at the time of Howards’ arrest so held. . . . If the answer to either question is ‘no,’ then the agents are entitled to qualified immunity. We elect to address only the second question. We conclude that, at the time of Howards’ arrest, it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment. We, therefore, reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals denying petitioners qualified immunity. . . . The ‘clearly established’ standard is not satisfied here. This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause; nor was such a right otherwise clearly established at the time of Howards’ arrest. . . . Here, the right in question is not the general right to be free from retaliation for one’s speech, but the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. This Court has never held that there is such a right. . . . We next consider Tenth Circuit precedent. Assuming arguendo that controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law in the circumstances of this case, the Tenth Circuit's cases do not satisfy the 'clearly established' standard here. . . . At the time of Howards' arrest, Hartman's impact on the Tenth Circuit's precedent governing retaliatory arrests was far from clear. Although the facts of Hartman involved only a retaliatory prosecution, reasonable officers could have questioned whether the rule of Hartman also applied to arrests. . . . A reasonable official also could have interpreted Hartman's rationale to apply to retaliatory arrests. . . . Like retaliatory prosecution cases, evidence of the presence or absence of probable cause for the arrest will be available in virtually every retaliatory arrest case. Such evidence could be thought similarly fatal to a plaintiff's claim that animus caused his arrest, given that retaliatory arrest cases also present a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury. . . . To be sure, we do not suggest that Hartman's rule in fact extends to arrests. Nor do we suggest that every aspect of Hartman's rationale could apply to retaliatory arrests. Hartman concluded that the causal connection in retaliatory prosecution cases is attenuated because those cases necessarily involve the animus of one person and the injurious action of another, 547 U.S., at 262, but in many retaliatory arrest cases, it is the officer bearing the alleged animus who makes the injurious arrest. Moreover, Hartman noted that, in retaliatory prosecution cases, the causal connection between the defendant's animus and the prosecutor's decision is further weakened by the 'presumption of regularity accorded to prosecutorial decisionmaking.' . . . That presumption does not apply here. Nonetheless, the fact remains that, for qualified immunity purposes, at the time of Howards' arrest it was at least arguable that Hartman's rule extended to retaliatory arrests. . . . Hartman injected uncertainty into the law governing retaliatory arrests, particularly in light of Hartman's rationale and the close relationship between retaliatory arrest and prosecution claims. This uncertainty was only confirmed by subsequent appellate decisions that disagreed over whether the reasoning in Hartman applied similarly to retaliatory arrests. Accordingly, when Howards was arrested it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could give rise to a First Amendment violation. Petitioners Reichle and Doyle are thus entitled to qualified immunity.") Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2097, 2098 (2012) (Ginsburg, J., with whom Breyer, J., joins, concurring in the judgment) ("Were defendants ordinary law enforcement officers, I would hold that Hartman v. Moore . . . does not support their entitlement to qualified immunity. . . . A similar causation problem will not arise in the typical retaliatory-arrest case. Unlike prosecutors, arresting officers are not wholly immune from suit. As a result, a plaintiff can sue the arresting officer directly and need only show that the officer (not some other official) acted with a retaliatory motive. Because, in the usual retaliatory arrest case, there is no gap to bridge between one government official's animus and a second government official's action, Hartman's no-probable-cause requirement is inapplicable. Nevertheless, I concur in the Court's judgment. Officers assigned to protect public officials must make singularly swift, on the spot, decisions whether the safety of the person they are guarding is in jeopardy. In performing that protective function, they rightly take into account words spoken to, or in the proximity of, the person whose safety is their charge. Whatever the views of Secret Service Agents Reichle and Doyle on the administration's policies in Iraq, they were duty bound to take the content of Howards' statements into account in determining whether he posed an immediate threat to the Vice President's physical security. Retaliatory animus cannot be inferred from the assessment they made in that regard. If rational, that assessment should not expose them to claims for civil damages.")

Note on Post-Reichle Cases:

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1721, 1724- 28 (2019) ("We are asked to resolve whether probable cause to make an arrest defeats a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for speech protected by the First Amendment. . . . Reichle and Lozman also recognized that the two claims give rise to complex causal inquiries for somewhat different reasons. Unlike retaliatory prosecution cases, retaliatory arrest cases do not implicate the presumption of prosecutorial regularity or necessarily involve multiple government actors (although this case did). . . . But regardless of the source of the causal complexity, the ultimate problem remains the same. For both claims, it is particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer's malice or the plaintiff's potentially criminal conduct. . . . Because of the 'close relationship' between the two claims, . . . their related causal challenge should lead to the same solution: The plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest. . . . Bartlett's purely subjective approach would undermine that precedent by allowing even doubtful retaliatory arrest suits to proceed based solely on allegations about an arresting officer's mental state. . . . Because a state of mind is 'easy to allege and hard to disprove,' . . . a subjective inquiry would threaten to set off 'broad-ranging discovery' in which 'there often is no clear end to the relevant evidence[.]'. . . . As a result, policing certain events like an unruly protest would pose overwhelming litigation risks. Any inartful turn of phrase or perceived slight during a legitimate arrest could land an officer in years of litigation. Bartlett's standard would thus 'dampen the ardor of all but the most resolute, or the most irresponsible, in the unflinching discharge of their duties.' . . . Adopting Hartman's no-probable-cause rule in this closely related context addresses those familiar concerns. Absent such a showing, a retaliatory arrest claim fails. But if the plaintiff establishes the absence of probable cause, 'then the Mt. Healthy test governs: The plaintiff must show that the retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the [arrest], and, if that showing is made, the defendant can prevail only by showing that the [arrest] would have been initiated without respect to retaliation.' . . . Although probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim, a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so. In such cases, an unyielding requirement to show the absence of probable cause could pose 'a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.' . . . When § 1983 was adopted, officers were generally privileged to make warrantless arrests for misdemeanors only in limited circumstances. . . . Today, however, 'statutes in all 50 States and the District of Columbia permit warrantless misdemeanor arrests' in a much wider range of situations—often whenever officers have probable cause for 'even a very minor criminal offense.' . . . For those reasons, we conclude that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been. Cf. United States v. Armstrong, 517 U. S. 456, 465 (1996). That showing addresses Hartman’s causal concern by helping to establish that ‘non-retaliatory grounds [we]re in fact insufficient to provoke the adverse consequences.’ . . . And like a probable cause analysis, it provides an objective inquiry that avoids the significant problems that would arise from reviewing police conduct under a purely subjective standard. Because this inquiry is objective, the statements and motivations of the particular arresting officer are ‘irrelevant’ at this stage. . . . After making the required showing, the plaintiff’s claim may proceed in the same manner as claims where the plaintiff has met the threshold showing of the absence of probable cause. . . . Because there was probable cause to arrest Bartlett, his retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law.”)

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1728-29 (2019) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I do not join Part II–D . . . because I do not agree that ‘a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . That qualification has no basis in either the common law or our First Amendment precedents. . . . Because no common-law tort for retaliatory arrest in violation of the freedom of speech existed when § 1983 was enacted, we ‘look to the common-law torts that “provid[e] the closest analogy” to this claim.’ . . . Here, those torts are false imprisonment, malicious arrest, and malicious prosecution. . . . The existence of probable cause generally excused an officer from liability for these three torts, without regard to the treatment of similarly situated individuals. . . . Indeed, the majority cites not a single common-law case that supports imposing liability based on an officer’s treatment of similarly situated individuals. . . . The majority’s exception is also untethered from our First Amendment precedents. . . . The majority today imports its ‘qualification’ from our jurisprudence on selective-prosecution claims. . . . But ‘[t]he requirements for a selective-prosecution claim draw on “ordinary equal protection standards,”’ not the First Amendment. . . . That jurisprudence therefore is not relevant here. . . . With no guidance from the common law or relevant precedents, the majority crafts its exception as a matter of policy. But this ‘narrow’ qualification threatens to derail our retaliation jurisprudence in several ways. For one, although the majority’s stated concern is with ‘ “warrantless misdemeanor arrests”’ for ‘ “very minor”’ offenses like ‘jaywalking,’ . . . its exception apparently applies to all offenses, including serious felonies. This overbroad exception thus is likely to encourage protracted litigation about which individuals are ‘similarly situated,’ . . . while doing little to vindicate First Amendment rights. Moreover, the majority’s rule risks chilling law enforcement officers from making arrests for fear of liability, thus flouting the reasoning behind the emphasis on probable cause in arrest-based torts at common law. . . . In short, the majority’s exception lacks the support of history, precedent, and sound policy. . . . The requirement that plaintiffs bringing First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claims plead and prove the absence of probable cause is supported by the common law and our First Amendment precedents. The majority’s new exception has no basis in either. Accordingly, I join all but Part II–D of the majority opinion.”)

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1730-34 (2019) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The parties approach their dispute from some common ground. Both sides accept that an officer violates the First Amendment when he arrests an individual in retaliation for his protected speech. They seem to agree, too, that the presence of probable cause does not undo that violation or erase its significance. And for good reason. History shows that governments sometimes seek to regulate our lives finely, acutely, thoroughly, and exhaustively. In our own time and place, criminal laws have grown so exuberantly and come to cover so much previously innocent conduct that almost anyone can be arrested for something. If the state could use these laws not for their intended purposes but to silence those who voice unpopular ideas, little would be left of our First Amendment liberties, and little would separate us from the tyrannies of the past or the malignant fiefdoms of our own age. The freedom to speak without risking arrest is ‘one of the principal characteristics by which we distinguish a free nation.’ . . . So if probable cause can’t erase a First Amendment violation, the question becomes whether its presence at least forecloses a civil claim for damages as a statutory matter under § 1983. But look at that statute as long as you like and you will find no reference to the presence or absence of probable cause as a precondition or defense to any suit. Instead, the statute imposes liability on anyone who, under color of state law, subjects another person ‘to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution.’ Maybe it would be good policy to graft a no-probable-cause requirement onto the statute, as the officers insist; or maybe not. Either way, that’s an appeal better directed to Congress than to this Court. Our job isn’t to write or revise legislative policy but to apply it faithfully. Admittedly, though, that’s not quite the end of the statutory story. Courts often assume that Congress adopts statutes against the backdrop of the common law. And, for this reason, we generally read § 1983’s terms ‘in harmony with general principles of tort immunities and defenses’ that existed at the time of the statute’s adoption. . . . As the officers before us are quick to point out, too, law enforcement agents who made a lawful arrest at the time of § 1983’s adoption couldn’t be held liable at common law for the tort of false arrest or false imprisonment. Of course, at common law a police officer often needed a warrant to execute a lawful arrest. But today warrantless arrests are often both authorized by state law and permitted by the Constitution (as this Court has interpreted it), so long as the officer possesses probable cause to believe a crime has been committed. And, given this development, you might wonder if the presence of probable cause should be enough to foreclose any First Amendment claim arising out of an arrest. But that much doesn’t follow. As the officers’ own reasoning exposes, the point of the common law tort of false arrest or false imprisonment was to remedy arrests and imprisonments effected without lawful authority. . . . So maybe probable cause should be enough today to defeat claims for false arrest or false imprisonment, given that arrests today are usually legally authorized if supported by probable cause. But that doesn’t mean probable cause is also enough to defeat a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. The point of this kind of claim isn’t to guard against officers who lack lawful authority to make an arrest. Rather, it’s to guard against officers who abuse their authority by making an otherwise lawful arrest for an unconstitutional reason. Here’s another way to look at it. The common law tort of false arrest translates more or less into a Fourth Amendment claim. That’s because our precedent considers a warrantless arrest unsupported by probable cause—the sort that gave rise to a false arrest claim at common law—to be an unreasonable seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . But the First Amendment operates independently of the Fourth and provides different protections. It seeks not to ensure lawful authority to arrest but to protect the freedom of speech. Here's a way to test the point, too. Everyone accepts that a detention based on race, even one otherwise authorized by law, violates the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. . . . I can think of no sound reason why the same shouldn't hold true here. Like a Fourteenth Amendment selective arrest claim, a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim serves a different purpose than a Fourth Amendment unreasonable arrest claim, and that purpose does not depend on the presence or absence of probable cause. We thus have no legitimate basis for engrafting a no-probable-cause requirement onto a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. But while it would be a mistake to think the absence of probable cause is an essential element of a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim under § 1983—or that the presence of probable cause is an absolute defense to such a claim—I acknowledge that it may also be a mistake to assume probable cause is entirely irrelevant to the analysis. It seems to me that probable cause to arrest could still bear on the claim's viability in at least two ways that warrant further exploration in future cases. First, consider causation. To show an arrest violated the First Amendment, everyone agrees a plaintiff must prove the officer would not have arrested him but for his protected speech. And if the only offense for which probable cause to arrest existed was a minor infraction of the sort that wouldn't normally trigger an arrest in the circumstances—or if the officer couldn't identify a crime for which probable cause existed until well after the arrest—then causation might be a question for the jury. By contrast, if the officer had probable cause at the time of the arrest to think the plaintiff committed a serious crime of the sort that would nearly always trigger an arrest regardless of speech, then (absent extraordinary circumstances) it's hard to see how a reasonable jury might find that the plaintiff's speech caused the arrest. In cases like that, it would seem that officers often will be entitled to dismissal on the pleadings or summary judgment. In the name of causation concerns, the officers ask us to go further still and hold that a plaintiff can never prove protected speech caused his arrest without first showing that the officers lacked probable cause to make an arrest. But that absolute rule doesn't wash with common experience. No one doubts that officers regularly choose against making arrests, especially for minor crimes, even when they possess probable cause. So the presence of probable cause does not necessarily negate the possibility that an arrest was caused by unlawful First Amendment retaliation. . . . Though this case involves a retaliatory arrest claim rather than a selective prosecution claim, it's at least an open question whether the concerns that drove this Court's decision in Armstrong may be in play here. No one before us argues that Armstrong was wrongly decided. And the Court today seems to indicate that something like Armstrong's standard might govern a retaliatory arrest claim when probable cause exists to support an arrest. . . . Some courts of appeals, too, have already applied Armstrong to claims alleging selective arrest under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . At the same time, enough questions remain about Armstrong's potential application that I hesitate to speak definitively about it today. Some courts of appeals have argued that Armstrong should not extend, at least without qualification, beyond prosecutorial decisions to arrests by police. These courts have suggested that the presumptions of regularity and immunity that usually attach to official prosecutorial decisions do not apply equally in the less formal setting of police arrests. They've reasoned, too, that comparative data about similarly situated individuals may be less readily available for arrests than for prosecutorial decisions, and that other kinds of evidence—such as an officer’s questions and comments to the defendant—may be equally if not more probative in the arrest context. . . . Importantly, we did not grant certiorari to resolve exactly how Armstrong might apply to retaliatory arrest claims. Nor did the briefing before us explore the competing arguments in this circuit split. And given all this, I believe it would be rash for us to do more at this point than acknowledge the possibility of Armstrong’s application. Dissenting, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR reads the majority opinion as adopting a rigid rule (more rigid, in fact, than Armstrong’s) that First Amendment retaliatory arrest plaintiffs who can’t prove the absence of probable cause must produce ‘comparison-based evidence’ in every case. . . . But I do not understand the majority as going that far. The only citation the majority offers in support of its new standard is Armstrong, which expressly left open the possibility that other kinds of evidence, such as admissions, might be enough to allow a claim to proceed. Given that, I retain hope that lower courts will apply today’s decision ‘commonsensically,’ . . . and with sensitivity to the competing arguments about whether and how Armstrong might apply in the arrest setting. For today, I believe it is enough to resolve the question on which we did grant certiorari—whether ‘probable cause defeats . . . a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim under § 1983.’ . . . I would hold, as the majority does, that the absence of probable cause is not an absolute requirement of such a claim and its presence is not an absolute defense. At the same time, I would also acknowledge that this does not mean the presence of probable cause is categorically irrelevant: It may bear on causation, and it may play a role under Armstrong. But rather than attempt to sort out precisely when and how probable cause plays a role in First Amendment claims, I would reserve decision on those questions until they are properly presented to this Court and we can address them with the benefit of full adversarial testing.”)

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1734-35 (2019) (Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (“If failure to show lack of probable cause defeats an action under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, only entirely baseless arrests will be checked. I remain of the view that the Court’s decision in Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U. S. 274 (1977), strikes the right balance: The plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that unconstitutional animus was a motivating factor for an adverse action; the burden then shifts to the defendant to demonstrate that, even without any impetus to retaliate, the defendant would have taken the action complained of. . . . In this case, I would reverse the Ninth Circuit’s judgment as to Trooper Weight. As the Court points out, the record is bereft of evidence of retaliation on Weight’s part. . . . As to Sergeant Nieves, there is some evidence of animus in Nieves’ statement, ‘bet you wish you would have talked to me now,’ . . . but perhaps not enough to survive summary judgment. . . . In any event, I would not use this thin case to state a rule that will leave press members and others exercising First Amendment rights with little protection against police suppression of their speech.”)

Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1735-42 (2019) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (“We granted certiorari to decide whether probable cause alone always suffices to defeat a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim under 42 U. S. C. § 1983. The Court answers that question ‘no’—a correct and sensible bottom line on which eight Justices agree. There is no basis in § 1983 or in the Constitution to withhold a remedy for an arrest that violated the First Amendment solely because the officer could point to probable cause that some offense, no matter how trivial or obviously pretextual, has occurred. Unfortunately, a slimmer majority of the Court chooses not to stop there. The majority instead announces a different rule: that a showing of probable cause will defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim unless the person arrested happens to be able to show that ‘otherwise similarly situated individuals’ whose speech differed were not arrested. . . . The Court barely attempts to explain where in the First Amendment or § 1983 it finds any grounding for that rule, which risks letting flagrant violations go unremedied. Because the correct approach would be simply to apply the well-established, carefully calibrated standards that govern First Amendment retaliation claims in other contexts, I respectfully dissent. . . . As JUSTICE GORSUCH explains, the issue here is not whether an arrest motivated by protected speech may violate the First Amendment despite probable cause for the arrest; the question is under what circumstances § 1983 permits a remedy for such a violation. . . . From that common starting point, JUSTICE GORSUCH and I travel far down the same path. I agree that neither the text nor the common-law backdrop of § 1983 supports imposing on First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims a probable-cause requirement that we would not impose in other contexts. . . . I agree that Hartman v. Moore, 547 U. S. 250 (2006), turned on concerns specific to malicious prosecution, and that its automatic probable-cause bar therefore does not extend to claims like this one. . . . And I agree that—while probable cause has undeniable evidentiary significance to the underlying question of what motivated an arrest—some arrests are demonstrably retaliation for protected speech, notwithstanding probable cause of some coincidental infraction. . . . Plaintiffs should have a meaningful opportunity to prove such claims when they arise. I follow this logic to its natural conclusion: Courts should evaluate retaliatory arrest claims in the same manner as they would other First Amendment retaliation claims. . . . The standard framework for distinguishing legitimate exercises of governmental authority from those intended to chill protected speech is well established. See Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U. S. 274, 287 (1977). The plaintiff must first establish that constitutionally protected conduct was a ‘“substantial”’ or ‘“motivating”’ factor in the challenged governmental action (here, an arrest). . . . If the plaintiff can make that threshold showing, the question becomes whether the governmental actor (here, the arresting officer) can show that the same decision would have been made regardless of the protected conduct. . . . If not, the governmental actor is liable. . . . In other words, if retaliatory animus was not a ‘but-for cause’ of an arrest, a suit seeking to hold the arresting officer liable will fail ‘for lack of causal connection between unconstitutional motive and resulting harm.’ . . . This timeworn standard is by no means easily satisfied. Even in cases where there is ‘proof of some retaliatory animus,’ . . . if evidence of retaliatory motive is weak, or evidence of nonretaliatory motive is strong, but-for causation will generally be lacking. That is why probable cause to believe that someone was a serial killer would defeat any First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim—even if, say, there were evidence that the officers also detested the suspect’s political beliefs. . . . Regrettably, the Court casts aside the Mt. Healthy standard for many arrests. It instead announces that courts should look beyond the presence of probable cause only when (in its view) the evidence of a constitutional violation is ‘objective’ enough to warrant further inquiry—namely, when a plaintiff can muster evidence ‘that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Plaintiffs who would rely on other evidence to prove a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim appear to be out of luck, even if they could offer other, unassailable proof of an officer’s unconstitutional ‘statements and motivations.’ . . . To give partial credit where due: The Court sensibly rejects the absolute probable-cause bar urged by petitioners and embraced by JUSTICE THOMAS, . . . and its contrary rule will at least allow the First Amendment to operate in some cases where it is sorely needed. The majority’s reasons for imposing a probable-cause bar in some cases but not others, however, do not withstand scrutiny. And by arbitrarily insisting upon comparison-based evidence, the majority’s rule fences out First Amendment violations for which redress is equally if not more ‘warranted,’ . . . leaving the public exposed potentially to flagrant abuses. . . . On the practical side, the majority worries that because discerning the connection between an arrest and a retaliatory motive may involve causal complexities,’ . . .; some plaintiffs who raise dubious challenges to lawful arrests may evade early dismissal under Mt. Healthy[.] . . . Our precedents do not permit an interpretation of § 1983 to rest on such a freewheeling policy choice,’ . . . and in any event the majority’s concerns do not withstand scrutiny. With regard to the majority’s concern that establishing a causal link to retaliatory animus will sometimes be complex: That is true of most unconstitutional motive claims, yet we generally trust that courts are up to the task of managing them. . . . And the Mt. Healthy standard accounts for the delicacy of such inquiries with its but-for causation requirement, calibrated to balance governmental interests with individual rights. . . . As for the risk of litigating dubious claims, the Court pays too high a price to avoid what may well be a marginal inconvenience. Prevailing First Amendment standards have long governed retaliatory arrest cases in the Ninth Circuit, and experience there suggests that trials in these cases are rare—the parties point to only a handful of cases that have reached trial in more than a decade. . . . Even accepting that, every so often, a police officer who made a legitimate arrest might have to explain that arrest to a jury, that is insufficient reason to curtail the First Amendment. No legal standard bats a thousand, and district courts already possess helpful tools to minimize the burdens of litigation in cases alleging constitutionally improper motives. . . . Far from supporting the novel burden the Court imposes on First Amendment retaliatory arrest plaintiffs, then, the analogy on which the majority’s analysis depends is an unfounded exercise in hybridizing two different constitutional protections. The result is a Frankenstein-like constitutional tort that may do more harm than good. . . . Were it simply an unorthodox solution to an illusory problem, the standard announced today would be benign. But by rejecting direct evidence of unconstitutional motives in favor of more convoluted comparative proof, the majority’s standard proposes to ration First Amendment protection in an illogical manner. And those arbitrary legal results in turn will breed opportunities for the rare ill-intentioned officer to violate the First Amendment without consequence—and, in some cases, openly and unabashedly. These are costs the Court should not tolerate. The basic error of the Court’s new rule is that it arbitrarily fetishizes one specific type of motive evidence—treatment of comparators—at the expense of other modes of proof. . . . In particular, the majority goes out of its way to forswear reliance on an officer’s own ‘statements,’ . . . even though such direct admissions may often be the best available evidence of unconstitutional motive. As a result, the Court’s standard in some cases will have the strange effect of requiring courts to blind themselves to smoking-gun evidence while simultaneously insisting upon an inferential sort of proof that, though potentially powerful, can be prohibitively difficult to obtain. The Court’s decision to cast aside evidence of the arresting officer’s own statements is puzzling. . . . Instead, the majority suggests that comparison-based evidence is the sole gateway through the probable-cause barrier that it otherwise erects. Such evidence can be prohibitively difficult to come by in other selective-enforcement contexts, and it may be even harder for retaliatory arrest plaintiffs to muster. . . . After all, while records of arrests and prosecutions can be hard to obtain, it will be harder still to identify arrests that never happened. And unlike race, gender, or other protected characteristics, speech is not typically sorted into statistical buckets that are susceptible of ready categorization and comparison. The threshold exercise prescribed today—comparing and contrasting a plaintiff’s protected speech and allegedly illegal actions with the speech and behavior of others who could have been arrested but were not—is likely to prove vexing in most cases. I suspect that those who can navigate this requirement predominantly will be arrestees singled out at protests or other large public gatherings, where a robust pool of potential comparators happens to be within earshot, eyeshot, or camera-shot. . . . While some who fit that bill undoubtedly need the protection, see, e.g., Brief for National Press Photographers Association et al. as Amici Curiae 9–15 (collecting examples of journalists arrested during public protests or gatherings), it is hard to see why those plaintiffs are the only ones deserving of a § 1983 remedy. . . . Put into practice, the majority’s approach will yield arbitrary results and shield willful misconduct from accountability. . . . Worse, because the majority disclaims reliance on ‘statements and motivations’ for its threshold inquiry, . . . it risks licensing even clear-cut abuses. . . . I do not mean to overstate the clarity of today’s holding. What exactly the Court means by ‘objective evidence,’ ‘otherwise similarly situated,’ and ‘the same sort of protected speech’ is far from clear. . . . I hope that courts approach this new standard commonsensically. It is hard to see what point is served by requiring a journalist arrested for jaywalking to point to specific other jaywalkers who got a free pass, for example, if statistics or common sense confirm that jaywalking arrests are extremely rare. Otherwise, there will be little daylight between the comparison-based standard the Court adopts and the absolute bar it ostensibly rejects. . . . JUSTICE GORSUCH, alert to the illogic of the majority’s position, instead contemplates borrowing a requirement to adduce ‘clear evidence’ of prohibited purpose from our cases concerning equal-protection-based selective-prosecution claims. . . . This suggestion, though perhaps an improvement over the majority’s approach, would nevertheless take a doctrine applying (1) equal protection principles (2) in a criminal proceeding to (3) charging decisions by prosecutors. . . . and ask it also to govern the application of (1) First Amendment principles (2) in a suit for civil damages challenging (3) arrests by police officers. JUSTICE GORSUCH commendably reserves judgment on a proposal not yet subjected to adversarial testing, so I too refrain from speaking too definitively. . . . For the foregoing reasons, I agree with JUSTICE GINSBURG that the tried-and-true Mt. Healthy approach remains the correct one. And because petitioners have not asked us to revisit the Court of Appeals’ application of the governing standard, I would affirm. . . . The power to constrain a person’s liberty is delegated to law enforcement officers by the public in a sacred trust. The First Amendment stands as a bulwark of that trust, erected by people who knew from personal experience the dangers of abuse that follow from investing anyone with such awesome power. . . . Because the majority

Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1951, 1954-55 (2018) (“Lozman’s claim is that, notwithstanding the presence of probable cause, his arrest at the city council meeting violated the First Amendment because the arrest was ordered in retaliation for his earlier, protected speech: his open-meetings lawsuit and his prior public criticisms of city officials. The question this Court is asked to consider is whether the existence of probable cause bars that First Amendment retaliation claim. . . [W]hether in a retaliatory arrest case the Hartman approach should apply, thus barring a suit where probable cause exists, or, on the other hand, the inquiry should be governed only by Mt. Healthy is a determination that must await a different case. For Lozman’s claim is far afield from the typical retaliatory arrest claim, and the difficulties that might arise if Mt. Healthy is applied to the mine run of arrests made by police officers are not present here. . . . Here Lozman does not sue the officer who made the arrest. Indeed, Lozman likely could not have maintained a retaliation claim against the arresting officer in these circumstances, because the officer appears to have acted in good faith, and there is no showing that the officer had any knowledge of Lozman’s prior speech or any motive to arrest him for his earlier expressive activities. Instead Lozman alleges more governmental action than simply an arrest. His claim is that the City itself retaliated against him pursuant to an ‘official municipal policy’ of intimidation. . . In particular, he alleges that the City, through its legislators, formed a premeditated plan to intimidate him in retaliation for his criticisms of city officials and his open-meetings lawsuit. And he asserts that the City itself, through the same high officers, executed that plan by ordering his arrest at the November 2006 city council meeting. The fact that Lozman must prove the existence and enforcement of an official policy motivated by retaliation separates Lozman’s claim from the typical retaliatory arrest claim. . . . This unique class of retaliatory arrest claims, moreover, will require objective evidence of a policy motivated by retaliation to survive summary judgment. Lozman, for instance, cites a transcript of a closed-door city council meeting and a video recording of his arrest. There is thus little risk of a flood of retaliatory arrest suits against high-level policymakers. As a final matter, it must be underscored that this Court has recognized the ‘right to petition as one of the most precious of the liberties safeguarded by the Bill of Rights.’ . . Lozman alleges the City deprived him of this liberty by retaliating against him for his lawsuit against the City and his criticisms of public officials. Thus, Lozman’s speech is high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values. . . For these reasons, Lozman need not prove the absence of probable cause to maintain a claim of retaliatory arrest against the City. On facts like these, Mt. Healthy provides the correct standard for assessing a retaliatory arrest claim. The Court need not, and does not, address the elements required to prove a retaliatory arrest claim in other contexts. This is not to say, of course, that Lozman is ultimately entitled to relief or even a new trial. On remand, the Court of Appeals, applying Mt. Healthy and other relevant precedents, may consider any arguments in support of the District Court’s judgment that have been preserved by the City. Among other matters, the Court of Appeals may wish to consider (1) whether any reasonable juror could find that the City actually formed a retaliatory policy to intimidate Lozman during its June 2006 closed-door session; (2) whether any reasonable juror could find that the November 2006 arrest constituted an official act by the City; and (3) whether, under Mt. Healthy, the City has proved that it would have arrested Lozman regardless of any retaliatory animus—for example, if Lozman’s conduct during prior city council meetings had also violated valid rules as to proper subjects of discussion, thus explaining his arrest here. For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1955-56 (2018) (Thomas, J., dissenting) (“We granted certiorari to decide ‘whether the existence of probable cause defeats a First Amendment claim for retaliatory arrest under [42 U.S.C.] § 1983.’ . . . Instead of resolving that question, the Court decides that probable cause should not defeat a ‘unique class of retaliatory arrest claims.’ . . . To fall within this unique class, a claim must involve objective evidence, of an official municipal policy of retaliation, formed well before the arrest, in response to highly protected speech, that has little relation to the offense of arrest. . . . No one briefed, argued, or even hinted at the rule that the Court announces today. Instead of dreaming up our own rule, I would have answered the question presented and held that plaintiffs must plead and prove a lack of probable cause as an element of a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim. I respectfully dissent. . . . By my count, the Court has identified five conditions that are necessary to trigger its new rule. First, there must be ‘an “official municipal policy” of intimidation.’ . . . Second, the policy must be ‘premeditated’ and formed well before the arrest—here, for example, the policy was formed ‘months earlier.’ . . . Third, there must be ‘objective evidence’ of such a policy. . . . Fourth, there must be ‘little relation’ between the ‘protected speech’ that prompted the retaliatory policy and ‘the criminal offense for which the arrest is made.’ . . . Finally, the protected speech that provoked the retaliatory policy must be ‘high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values.’ . . . Where all these features are present, the Court explains, there is not the same ‘causation problem’ that exists for other retaliatory-arrest claims. . . . I find it hard to believe that there will be many cases where this rule will even arguably apply, and even harder to believe that the plaintiffs in those cases will actually prove all five requirements. Not even Lozman’s case is a good fit, as the Court admits when it discusses the relevant considerations for remand. . . . In my view, we should not have gone out of our way to fashion a complicated rule with no apparent applicability to this case or any other. . . . Turning to the question presented, I would hold that plaintiffs bringing a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim must plead and prove an absence of probable cause.”).

Mr. Sears’s sworn allegations directly contradict the prison officials’ version of the incident. Our legal system tasks juries with arriving at the truth from among conflicting accounts. Cases brought by inmates are no exception. Our Circuit departed from this allocation of factfinding responsibilities in O’Bryant v. Finch, 637 F.3d 1207 (11th Cir. 2011) (per curiam), and it was O’Bryant that led the District Court to deny Mr. Sears a trial. O’Bryant held that no inmate can state a First Amendment retaliation claim based on a disciplinary report if that inmate is found guilty of the infraction after a hearing that satisfies due process. . . . The majority here rightly holds O’Bryant does not control the outcome for Mr. Sears. . . . I write separately now to point out the flaws in the reasoning of O’Bryant and in hopes that this Court will correct them in an appropriate case. O’Bryant was wrong to hold that being found guilty of an infraction necessarily precludes a First Amendment retaliation claim. To state a retaliation claim, an inmate must show he (1) engaged in First Amendment protected conduct and (2) suffered an adverse action that would deter a person of ordinary firmness from exercising his First Amendment rights (3) because he engaged in protected conduct. . . . First Amendment retaliation claims turn on whether a prison official took retaliatory action against an inmate because the inmate exercised his First Amendment rights. . . . In other words, the question of whether retaliation occurred looks to why officials took the action they did, not whether they had a factual basis for doing so. That there is a factual basis for an inmate to be charged with an infraction does not negate the possibility of a retaliatory motive in bringing those charges. It plainly can be true both that an inmate violated a prison disciplinary rule and that a prison official disciplined the inmate because the inmate engaged in First Amendment-protected conduct. O’Bryant’s ruling that guilt of an infraction precludes a retaliation claim overlooks the point that prison officials might impose discipline in order to retaliate. In missing this point, O’Bryant undermines the very purpose of retaliation claims: to ensure that prison officials do not chill inmates in the exercise of their First Amendment rights. O’Bryant’s error took root when it transplanted due process principles to the First Amendment’s altogether different soil. . . . Neither a finding that due process was accorded nor a finding that the disciplinary infraction happened should dispose of an inquiry into why officials took the action they did. O’Bryant’s holding also puts us on the short side of a circuit split. The Third, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have all taken a view contrary to ours. [collecting cases] Under our Circuit rules, no panel may overrule O’Bryant. . . . Here, the panel has determined that the rule from O’Bryant does not apply in any event. Nevertheless, when the appropriate case presents itself, I believe the holding in O’Bryant merits the attention of the whole Court.”)

Post-Nieves Cases

SUPREME COURT

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663, 1667-68 (2024) (per curiam) (“We agree with Gonzalez that the Fifth Circuit took an overly cramped view of Nieves. That court thought Gonzalez had to provide very specific comparator evidence—that is, examples of identifiable people who ‘mishandled a government petition’ in the same way Gonzalez did but were not arrested. . . . Although the Nieves exception is slim, the demand for virtually identical and identifiable comparators goes too far. We recognized the Nieves exception to account for ‘circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’. . . To fall within the exception, a plaintiff must produce evidence to prove that his arrest occurred in such circumstances. The only express limit we placed on the sort of evidence a plaintiff may present for that purpose is that it must be objective in order to avoid ‘the significant problems that would arise from reviewing police conduct under a purely subjective standard.’. . . Here, Gonzalez provided that sort of evidence. She was charged with intentionally ‘remov[ing] ... a governmental record.’. . . Gonzalez’s survey is a permissible type of evidence because the fact that no one has ever been arrested for engaging in a certain kind of conduct—especially when the criminal prohibition is longstanding and the conduct at issue is not novel—makes it more likely that an officer has declined to arrest someone for engaging in such conduct in the past. Because we agree with Gonzalez’s first argument, we do not need to reach her second. We vacate the judgment below and remand the case for the lower courts to assess whether Gonzalez’s evidence suffices to satisfy the Nieves exception.”)

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663, 1669-76 (2024) (Alito, J., concurring) (“Gonzalez attacks the Fifth Circuit’s judgment on two fronts. First, she contends that the Fifth Circuit took an unduly restrictive view of the Nieves exception. Second, she asks us to cabin the no-probable-cause requirement to on-the-spot arrests. The Court briskly dispatches this case on the first question, but I think lower courts and litigants deserve additional guidance. I therefore divide my analysis into three parts. First, I provide the relevant legal background for retaliatory-arrest and retaliatory-prosecution claims. Second, I elaborate on the scope of the Nieves exception. Third, I explain why Nieves is not limited to split-second arrests. . . . The defendants argue that permitting anything other than the kind of strict comparator evidence demanded by the Fifth Circuit will defeat the whole purpose of the no-probable-cause rule. Our decisions reflect our sensitivity to these concerns, . . . but a proper application of the Nieves exception will not produce this result for at least two reasons. First, courts must remember that the exception is just that—an exception, and a narrow one at that. Judges should not conflate the question whether certain evidence can be considered under the Nieves exception with the entirely distinct question whether the evidence suffices to satisfy this threshold inquiry. We have long recognized ‘[t]he deep-rooted nature of law-enforcement discretion,’ . . . and a plaintiff therefore must surmount a very high bar when the official can point to the existence of probable cause underpinning an arrest. The example in Nieves of a police officer arresting a vocal critic for jaywalking serves as a helpful benchmark for courts and litigants. A plaintiff may satisfy the Nieves exception only by providing comparably powerful evidence. Second, evidence that tends to show only that the plaintiff’s constitutionally protected speech was a ‘substantial or motivating factor’ behind the adverse action should not be considered unless and until the plaintiff can provide other evidence to satisfy the Nieves exception. . . . This requirement flows from the recognition that the Nieves exception serves only as a gateway to the Mt. Healthy framework. The Nieves exception asks whether the plaintiff engaged in the type of conduct that is unlikely to result in arrest or prosecution. By contrast, the Mt. Healthy inquiry is keyed toward whether the defendant’s adverse decision was influenced by the plaintiff’s constitutionally protected speech. . . . On remand, the Fifth Circuit must determine whether Gonzalez’s survey is enough for her claim to advance to the Mt. Healthy framework. The Nieves exception is most easily satisfied by strong affirmative evidence that the defendant let other individuals off the hook for comparable behavior. But when a plaintiff’s claim hinges on negative evidence, like what Gonzalez offers here, context is key for determining the strength of his case. When a plaintiff’s alleged criminal conduct is egregious or novel, for instance, the lack of similar arrests might warrant little weight. Courts must also ensure that they are assessing the plaintiff’s conduct at the appropriate level of generality because every arrest, if defined too specifically, can be described as the first of its kind. If a plaintiff could evade the no-probable-cause requirement simply by submitting evidence that no one who engaged in an exact duplicate of his behavior had been arrested, courts will be ‘flooded with dubious retaliatory arrest suits,’ . . . and the Nieves’s exception would drain the no-probable-cause requirement of all force. . . We also granted certiorari on whether the Nieves no-probable-cause rule applies beyond split-second arrests. The parties vigorously contested this question in briefing and at oral argument, yet the Court today reserves judgment on this issue. I disagree with this course. In my view, Nieves already answered this question in the affirmative after faithfully applying our precedents. . . . [I]t would be bizarre to think Nieves silently limited itself to split-second decisions when the reasoning it imported came from the retaliatory-prosecution context, which by definition involves only deliberative government acts. . . . In sum, Nieves applies to all retaliatory-arrest claims brought under § 1983. And that decision means what it says. ‘[P]robable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim,’ and a plaintiff bringing such a claim ‘must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest’ unless he can fit within its narrow exception. . . . Nothing in the Court’s decision today should be understood as casting doubt on this holding. . . . With these observations, I join the Court’s opinion.”)

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663, 1677 (2024) (Kavanaugh, J., concurring) (“In short, this is (at most) a case about probable cause as to mens rea, not about conduct-based comparisons. This case has nothing to do with the Nieves exception. At this point, the Court’s grant of certiorari looks ill-advised given that the question presented about the Nieves exception bears no relation to the issue on which Gonzalez’s suit actually turns. In any event, we are where we are. I concur in the per curiam because the per curiam does not seem to say anything that is harmful to the law, even though the per curiam (in my view) does not really have anything to do with Gonzalez’s case.”)

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663, 1677-78 (2024) (Jackson, with whom Sotomayor, J., joins, concurring) (“Today, the Court rightly recognizes that petitioner Sylvia Gonzalez’s survey—showing that, in the last decade, no one charged with the crime for which she was arrested had engaged in conduct similar to hers—is objective evidence admissible to prove that she ‘was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . That recognition, however, should not be taken to suggest that plaintiffs cannot use other types of objective evidence to make this showing. The Nieves exception is satisfied in ‘circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . ‘The only express limit we placed on the sort of evidence a plaintiff may present for that purpose is that it must be objective.’ . . . Here, in addition to her survey, Gonzalez presented this other kind of evidence as well. Before the District Court, Gonzalez pointed to, among other things, details about the anomalous procedures used for her arrest and statements in the arresting officer’s warrant affidavit suggesting a retaliatory motive. . . . Those categories of evidence, too, can support the conclusion that Gonzalez ‘was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . On remand, the lower courts may consider the full scope of objective evidence that Gonzalez has offered to establish differential treatment.”)

Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663, 1678-79 (2024) (Thomas, J., dissenting) (“As I have previously explained, the common-law torts most analogous to retaliatory-arrest claims are false imprisonment, malicious arrest, and malicious prosecution—all of which required a plaintiff to prove ‘the absence of probable cause.’ . . . Gonzalez concedes that there was probable cause for her arrest. . . . Her retaliatory-arrest claim therefore cannot proceed. . . . In Nieves v. Bartlett, the Court correctly recognized that probable cause precludes a retaliatory-arrest claim. . . . But, it introduced one purportedly ‘narrow qualification.’ . . . The Nieves Court concluded that a plaintiff need not show a lack of probable cause if he ‘presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Today, the Court expands that qualification. Nieves’s exception can now apply if a plaintiff presents evidence of any objective fact that ‘makes it more likely that an officer has declined to arrest someone for engaging in such conduct in the past.’ . . . Accordingly, even though Gonzalez’s proffered evidence does not point to a single ‘similarly situated individual,’ the Court nonetheless concludes she may satisfy the Nieves exception. . . . There is ‘no basis in either the common law or our First Amendment precedents’ for the exception created in Nieves and expanded upon today. . . . And, the Court should not craft § 1983 rules ‘as a matter of policy.’ . . . I would adhere to the only rule grounded in history: Probable cause defeats a retaliatory-arrest claim. I respectfully dissent.”)

D.C. CIRCUIT

Hylton v. District of Columbia, No. 21-CV-2673 (JMC), 2025 WL 740454, at *9 (D.D.C. Mar. 7, 2025) (“[N]either the D.C. Circuit nor the Supreme Court has extended the rule of Nieves (arrest) and Hartman (malicious prosecution) to the context of investigatory stops. But at least three other circuits have applied that rule to investigatory stops, either on the merits of the First Amendment claim or as a matter of qualified immunity. See Waters, 921 F.3d at 742; Allen, 815 F.3d at 244–45; George v. Rehiel, 738 F.3d 562, 585–86 (3d Cir. 2013). This Court does the same. At a minimum, it was not ‘clearly established’ that Delisi could not conduct an investigatory stop of Hylton upon reasonable suspicion that she was committing a crime just because she was also engaged in First Amendment-protected speech. . . . Hylton’s allegation that she was ‘engaged in protected speech by criticizing MPD’s and Delisi’s conduct and by spray-painting the wall’ does not alter the above analysis. . . . Nieves and its progeny also involve ‘protected speech.’ The question in those cases is whether ‘probable cause to make an arrest,’ or reasonable suspicion to make a Terry stop, ‘defeats a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for’ that ‘speech protected by the First Amendment.’ . . . Those cases’ answer is ‘yes.’ Again, Delisi had probable cause to make an arrest because he had probable cause to believe Hylton was committing a crime. Accordingly, under Nieves, Hylton’s retaliation claim must be dismissed whether she was engaged in protected speech or not.”)

Goodwin v. District of Columbia, No. CV 21-806 (BAH), 2025 WL 637467, at *18 (D.D.C. Feb. 27, 2025) (“The arrest data offered by plaintiffs is insufficient to satisfy plaintiffs’ burden to meet the high bar of the Nieves exception for similar reasons. Plaintiffs argue that 88% of those arrested for curfew violations on June 1, 2020, ‘were involved in protest activities.’ . . . Defendants point out, however, that even were this number accepted as true, ‘[s]everal ... other individuals who were arrested for violating the curfew were clearly not protesting or engaged in any other expressive activity when arrested.’ . . Data showing that arrests of both protesters and non-protesters were made on the same day that plaintiffs were arrested is a far cry from the type of retaliatory arrest evidence presented in Gonzalez, where the evidence suggested that no one had been arrested in the same county for the conduct at issue for roughly a decade. . . In Nieves, the Court used jaywalking as an example of a crime that is ‘endemic but rarely results in arrest.’ . . The data presented by plaintiffs in the instant case shows that at least six and maybe more non-protesting curfew violators were arrested in one day. While certainly fewer arrests for curfew violations of non-protesting than protesting individuals were made, again, context matters, and law enforcement’s focus was on a mobile group of hundreds of individuals moving through the city, when, in MPD’s view, this group had failed to disperse in compliance with the curfew and directions to do so. This arrest data evidence falls short of satisfying the demanding Nieves exception. . . Defendants are therefore entitled to summary judgment on plaintiffs’ retaliatory arrest claim.”)

Goodwin v. District of Columbia, No. 21-CV-806 (BAH), 2022 WL 123894, at *10 (D.D.C. Jan. 13, 2022) (“[P]laintiffs have plausibly alleged that defendants, including then-Chief Newsham, deployed excessive force against them and retaliated for engaging in protected speech to protest police brutality. To be sure, plaintiffs’ assertion of retaliatory arrest is, as noted, viable under Nieves at this early stage, but their success on that claim will ultimately depend on ‘present[ing] objective evidence’ that then-Chief Newsham did not order, and MPD did not arrest, other individuals who also violated the curfew but were not participants in the protests against police brutality on June 1, 2020. . . The precise mechanisms by which then-Chief Newsham authorized and directed the conduct allegedly causing plaintiffs’ well-alleged constitutional injuries and ‘the particular circumstances that he ... faced’ to inform his decision-making throughout the evening of June 1, 2020, . . . are thus unknown at this stage of the proceedings. . . This undeveloped factual record makes premature a ruling on then-Chief Newsham’s qualified immunity claim. . . Accordingly, determining the applicability of qualified immunity must await further factual development and this defense does not provide a basis for dismissal of the § 1983 claims against then-Chief Newsham at this stage of the litigation.”)

Whittaker v. Munoz, No. CV 17-1983 (EGS), 2019 WL 4194499, at *5 & n.9 (D.D.C. Sept. 4, 2019) (“In March 2017, the time of the arrest in this case, the precedent in this Circuit was inconclusive on the question of whether an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment’s protection against retaliatory arrests. See Nieves, 139 S.Ct. at 1728 (explaining that the Court took up the question in 2018, but “ultimately left the question unanswered”). . . And courts had not spoken on the issue of whether an officer who has probable cause to make an arrest, but would typically exercise his or her discretion not to, will violate the First Amendment if he or she arrests someone who engages in protected speech. Since there was no consensus view at the time of the actions in this case, even if there was a First Amendment violation for retaliatory arrest notwithstanding the fact Officer Munoz had probable cause to arrest Mr. Whittaker, Officer Munoz is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Therefore, the Court GRANTS Officer Munoz’s motion for summary judgment on the First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. . . . The Court notes that, as of May 28, 2019, it is clearly established that probable cause may not defeat a claim for retaliatory arrest when an officer arrests and individual who engages in protected speech but chooses not to arrest otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same type of protected speech.”)

FIRST CIRCUIT

Ortolano v. City of Nashua, No. 22-CV-326-LM, 2025 WL 509258, at *4 (D.N.H. Feb. 14, 2025) (“Here, Ortolano points to objective evidence similar to what was produced in Gonzalez from which a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that she was arrested for criminal trespass when other similarly situated individuals would not be. In his deposition, Chief Carignan explained that it is Nashua PD’s general practice not to arrest individuals for criminal trespass when the individual leaves the premises after the arrival of the police officer and upon the officer’s request. . . In this case, although Ortolano left City Hall after being asked to do so by the police, she was ultimately arrested and prosecuted for criminal trespass. In addition, Ortolano has provided the court with documents produced as a result of a Right-to-Know request made to Nashua PD for public records of all instances of criminal trespass that occurred at City Hall between January 1, 2014, and January 31, 2021. . . The records show that, despite several trespass calls to City Hall during that period, Ortolano was the only individual arrested after complying with a police request to leave the premises. This objective evidence permits a trier of fact to conclude that Ortolano was arrested in circumstances when others would not be, such that the existence of probable cause for her arrest does not doom her retaliation claim.”)

Ward v. Petow, No. CV 18-496-JJM-PAS, 2020 WL 1929125, at *4-5 (D.R.I. Apr. 21, 2020) (“The Court agrees with Det. Corporal Petow that Ms. Ward’s claim of retaliatory arrest for exercise of her First Amendment rights must fail as it is undisputed that there was probable cause to arrest her. As correctly noted by both parties, the Supreme Court held in Nieves v. Bartlett that the Heck bar applies equally to First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims and the presence of probable cause thus generally bars recovery. . . Ms. Ward’s plea of no contest acknowledged that there was probable cause to arrest her. As Ms. Ward points out, the Supreme Court did recognize a ‘narrow qualification for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . But, to fit into this narrow qualification, a plaintiff must ‘present[] objective evidence that [she] was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . Ms. Ward has not presented any such ‘objective evidence,’ nor suggested that such evidence exists. Instead, she relies on the fact that she was not arrested until she complained of her breast being grabbed. . . That complaint, according to Ms. Ward, must have been the basis of the arrest and not her overall disorderly conduct. . . Unfortunately for Ms. Ward, that is not the type of objective evidence suitable for the narrow qualification recognized in Nieves and thus summary judgment for Det. Corporal Petow is appropriate.”)

Cass v. Town of Wayland, No. CV 17-11441-PBS, 2019 WL 2292526, at *14–15 (D. Mass. May 30, 2019) (“ ‘Claims of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights are cognizable under § 1983.’ . . . To prove a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, a plaintiff must show that he engaged in constitutionally protected conduct and that he was subjected to an adverse action by the defendant. . . .’ The plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must [also] plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, -- S.Ct. --, 2019 WL 2257157, at *6 (2019). ‘Absent such a showing, a retaliatory arrest claim fails.’ . . . But, ‘[i]f the plaintiff proves the absence of probable cause, then the Mt. Healthy test governs: The plaintiff must show that the retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the [arrest], and, if that showing is made, the defendant can prevail only by showing that the [arrest] would have been initiated without respect to retaliation.’ Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1952 (2018). There is a ‘narrow qualification’ to the no-probable-cause requirement ‘for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . This exception is necessary because ‘an unyielding requirement to show the absence of probable cause could pose a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.’ . . . Thus, a plaintiff can overcome the requirement if he ‘presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . If the plaintiff shows objective evidence, then ‘the plaintiff’s claim may proceed in the same manner as claims where the plaintiff has met the threshold showing of the absence of probable cause.’ . . . Cass asserts that his protected First Amendment activities include distributing the ‘Three Amigos’ fliers, distributing leaflets stating, ‘Fire GAV,’ and recording the Wayland football team practice in Maine. . . . Cass has not asserted a violation of his First Amendment rights against the school officials, but to the extent his whistleblowing activity could be the basis for this claim, that argument has been disclaimed. . . . Detective Berger had probable cause to arrest Cass, and that would normally be the end of the analysis under Nieves v. Bartlett. However, in light of the minor nature of the crime of failing to return a used laptop in the context of an employment dispute, an objective inquiry might produce evidence that an officer would typically exercise his discretion not to arrest other similarly situated individuals. . . . Even if Cass could prove that the ‘narrow qualification’ applies, his claim still fails because there is no evidence that Berger was motivated by Cass’s First Amendment activities as opposed to his retention of the purloined laptop. While Berger was likely aware of Cass’s summertime incidents, Chief Irving directed Detective Berger to investigate the missing laptop based on information from school officials. Berger applied for and received a search warrant, and when he served that warrant on Cass at his home, he quickly found the laptop in question on Cass’s couch, in plain view. Being aware of protected speech is not sufficient evidence that it was a substantial or motivating factor in the arrest. Cass’s MCRA claim also fails as there is no evidence of a constitutional violation. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment for the Defendants on Count V.”)

SECOND CIRCUIT

Meyers v. City of New York, No. 19-892, 2020 WL 2079458, at *2 (2d Cir. Apr. 30, 2020) (not published) (“‘The existence of probable cause defeats a First Amendment claim premised on the allegation that defendants arrested a plaintiff based on a retaliatory motive.’ . . . Though a narrow exception exists where there is ‘objective evidence’ that the police refrained from arresting similarly situated people not engaged in speech, Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019), no such facts were alleged here. As Plaintiffs admit, the NYPD arrested ‘everyone who remained in the [P]ark’ following the dispersal order.”)

Chimelis v. County of Suffolk, No. 2:21-CV-7079, 2025 WL 458242, at *5 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 11, 2025) (“At the time of Plaintiff’s arrest, many other people occupied the roadway and obstructed traffic, including the driver of the vehicle at the front of the caravan. Many persons in the roadway signaled their political views, through signs, apparel, and words. But police only arrested those who protested the pro-Trump contingent. Plaintiff asserts that Police Defendants arrested her after labeling her a ‘leader’ of the protest, if she was identified at all, whereas Police Defendants retort that they labeled her the ‘leader’ of the obstruction. . . . Defendants also argue that Plaintiff ‘was only arrested when she entered the roadway’ and refused to exit upon police instruction, but Plaintiff responds that many others who remained in the roadway were not arrested. . . . There thus exists objective evidence that Police Defendants might have exercised their discretion not to arrest protestors who supported Trump. . . . A reasonable jury could find that this evidence triggers the Nieves exception and itself evidences retaliatory intent. . . . Police Defendants also invoke qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s retaliatory arrest claim, arguing that probable cause legitimized her arrest. Violation here of the clearly established right to engage in First Amendment speech free from retaliatory arrest hinges on disputes regarding probable cause and the Nieves exception’s applicability. . . . As mentioned, Plaintiff has presented objective evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that Police Defendants refused to arrest pro-Trump protestors. These competing inferences present an issue of fact. . . . A jury must thus determine whether ‘objective evidence’ supports the inference that Plaintiff was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Even if the Nieves exception does not apply, Plaintiff’s claim may still proceed if a jury finds that Police Defendants did not have probable cause to arrest Plaintiff. Because these disputes determine whether the officers ‘acted reasonably under settled law in the circumstances,’ . . . summary judgment is inappropriate here[.]”)

Whipper v. Green, No. 3:23-CV-27 (SVN), 2024 WL 3252333, at *10 n.3 (D. Conn. July 1, 2024) (“The Court notes that, prior to the Supreme Court’s decision in Nieves, there were diverging views as to whether the causation standard for a First Amendment retaliation claim was ‘but-for’ or ‘substantial motivating factor.’ See Rivers v. N.Y. City Housing Auth., 176 F. Supp. 3d 229, 245–47 (E.D.N.Y. 2016) (collecting cases and applying the substantial motivating factor test). The Court believes that Nieves has settled the debate and has effectively abrogated Second Circuit precedent describing the causation standard as substantial motivating factor. Compare Handsome, 2024 WL 2747142, at *5 (applying but-for causation test) with Morris v. Lindau, 196 F.3d 102, 110 (2d Cir. 1999) (applying the substantial motivating factor test for section 1983 First Amendment employment retaliation case); but see Specht v. City of N.Y., 15 F.4th 594, 605 (2d Cir. 2021) (citing Morris, 196 F.3d at 110, and applying substantial motivating factor test even after Nieves). Other circuit courts of appeal that have addressed Nieves have held that but-for causation is applicable standard. See, e.g., Lemaster v. Lawrence Cnty., Ky., 65 F.4th 302, 309

(6th Cir. 2023) (applying but-for causation after Nieves); Turner v. Williams, 65 F.4th 564, 581 (11th Cir. 2023) (same); Sanimax USA, LLC v. City of S. St. Paul, 95 F.4th 551, 558–59 (8th Cir. 2024) (same); Thompson v. Ragland, 23 F.4th 1252, 1259 (10th Cir. 2022) (same); Comm. on Ways & Means, U.S. House of Representatives v. U.S. Dep’t of Treasury, 45 F.4th 324, 340 (D.C. Cir. 2022) (same). In any event, given the particular facts of this case, Plaintiff’s allegations satisfy both standards.”)

Maradiaga v. City of New York, 16 Civ. 8325 (GBD), 2020 WL 5849465 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 1, 2020) (“In this case, probable cause existed to arrest Plaintiffs and they have not presented ‘objective evidence that [they were] arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech ha[ve] not been.’ . . . That is, Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that other individuals who were not filming or handing out flyers, but were within feet of vehicles stopped at a checkpoint and who refused to comply with police orders to move a reasonable distance away, were not arrested. Plaintiffs present no evidence that Defendants’ actions were motivated or substantially caused by their exercise of their First Amendment rights. It is undisputed that both Officer Cox and Sgt. Thorney told Plaintiffs they were welcome to film the checkpoint, though at a safe distance. . . . Further, the ‘back’ team was also filming the checkpoint. Those two individuals, however, were not arrested.”)

Nigro v. City of New York, No. 19-CV-2369 (JMF), 2020 WL 5503539, at *1-5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2020) (“Although Nigro’s allegations are troubling and several of his claims would be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under current law, the law as it existed at the time of Nigro’s arrest compels the Court to grant Defendants’ motion on all claims save one: a failure-to-train claim against the City. Accordingly, and for the reasons that follow, Defendants’ motion is granted except as to that one claim. . . . Here, Nigro’s own Complaint makes plain that there was probable cause — or, at a minimum, arguable probable cause — to arrest him for jaywalking. Indeed, his ‘striking’ photograph of NYPD officers walking down 57th Street (which appears in the Complaint) confirms that, shortly before his arrest, he stood in the middle of the street. . . . Nigro’s claim of retaliatory arrest in violation of the First Amendment is more complicated, if only because the Supreme Court held last year that probable cause does not defeat such a claim ‘when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019). In justifying this exception to the general rule that probable cause defeats a retaliatory arrest claim, the Court noted the broad discretion of law enforcement officers to arrest ‘for “even a very minor criminal offense.”’ . . . Notably, the Court then singled out jaywalking by way of example. . . . Based on the allegations in the Complaint, Nigro’s retaliatory arrest claim would seem to fall squarely within the Nieves exception. . . . The problem for Nigro is that the Nieves exception was not clearly established at the time of his arrest in 2016. To the contrary, until Nieves, it was clearly established — at least in this Circuit — that probable cause defeated all claims of retaliatory arrest. [collecting cases] Under well-established law, therefore, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Nigro’s retaliatory arrest claim, and it must be dismissed. . . . Taking Nigro’s allegations as true, as the Court must, his claims are troubling, raising the specter of a police officer singling out a member of the media in retaliation for his First Amendment activity. Notably, it was precisely facts like those alleged here that caused the Supreme Court concern in Nieves and prompted it to hold that where ‘a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,’ a finding of probable cause does not defeat a retaliatory arrest claim. . . . As the Court observed, where ‘jaywalking is endemic but rarely results in arrest’ — as is surely the case in most, if not all, of New York City — ‘it would seem insufficiently protective of First Amendment rights to dismiss’ the retaliatory arrest claim of a person arrested for jaywalking after ‘vocally complaining about police conduct’ merely because there was ‘probable cause for the arrest.’ . . . Yet, as discussed above, binding Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent compel dismissal of all Nigro’s claims save one: his failure-to-train claim against the City”)

McKenzie v. City of New York, No. 17 CIV. 4899 (PAE), 2019 WL 3288267, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 22, 2019) (“[A]s the Supreme Court has recently held, where officers have probable cause to arrest, a plaintiff’s ‘retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law’ unless plaintiff can show that individuals whose speech differed from plaintiff’s were not arrested. Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1728 (2019); see also id. (probable cause generally defeats a retaliatory arrest claim except where “a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been”). Such evidence could potentially include admissions by officers, statistical evidence of the arrest rates for the offense in question, or other direct evidence. See id. at 1733 (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); id. at 1741 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting). Here, however, the record is devoid of such evidence. Summary judgment is therefore warranted for the officers on this claim.”)

Vidal v. Valentin, No. 16-CV-5745 (CS), 2019 WL 3219442, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. July 17, 2019) (“Claims of retaliatory arrest and prosecution provide useful comparisons. The Supreme Court recently declared that a ‘plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1724 (2019). A similar rule applies in the context of retaliatory prosecutions. . . . Although the retaliatory act here is not an arrest or prosecution, the import of the rules is that where retaliation is alleged, if the allegedly retaliatory actor can show probable cause, the retaliation claim cannot stand, or if ‘arguable probable cause’ is shown, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here, in the absence of clearly established law that Plaintiff’s conduct did not violate Rule 113.26, Plaintiff cannot show the equivalent of the absence of probable cause, or at least arguable probable cause, for Defendant’s Report. Defendant would thus be entitled to qualified immunity had summary judgment otherwise been denied.”)

Grant v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 20-735, 2022 WL 11615669, at *13 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 20, 2022) (“[A] reasonable officer could believe that the Nieves holding regarding retaliatory arrests also applies to non-retaliatory arrests. Indeed, it would be nonsensical for a reasonable officer to interpret Nieves to hold that they could only arrest speakers in public with probable cause without violating the First Amendment if the officer actually had a retaliatory animus, but that animus was not the ‘but for’ cause of the arrest. And even if Plaintiff could point to cases before Nieves where the Third Circuit held such a right exists, a reasonable officer could conclude that Nieves abrogated their holdings, just as the Supreme Court held that Hartman justified questioning prior circuit precedent that was directly on point in Reichle. . . It was not clearly established at the time of Plaintiff’s seizure that a reasonable officer would understand that it would be a First Amendment violation to arrest someone speaking in public even when there is probable cause. Therefore, Officer Sauris and Officer Moffitt are entitled to qualified immunity, as to this claim.”)

Demetro v. National Association of Bunco Investigations, No. CV146521KMSCM, 2019 WL 2612687, at *18 n. 20 (D.N.J. June 25, 2019) (“[P]laintiffs alleging claims for racially selective arrests or prosecutions in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment are not required to show a lack of probable cause. See Nieves, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1731–32 (2019) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Hedgepeth v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Auth., 386 F. 3d 1148, 1156 (D.C. Cir. 2004) (“[S]imply because a practice passes muster under the Fourth Amendment (arrest based on probable cause) does not mean that unequal treatment with respect to that practice is consistent with equal protection.”)); see also Gibson v. Superintendent of NJ Dep’t of Law & Pub. Safety-Div. of State Police, 411 F.3d 427, 440 (3d Cir. 2005) (“The fact that there was no Fourth Amendment violation does not mean that one was not discriminatorily selected for enforcement of a law. Plaintiffs’ equal protection claims under the Fourteenth Amendment require a wholly separate analysis from their claims under the Fourth Amendment.” (quoting Carrasca v. Pomeroy, 313 F.3d 828, 836 (3d Cir.2002))).”)

Snoeyenbos v. Curtis, No. 3:19CV377 (DJN), 2020 WL 572716, at *10–11 (E.D. Va. Feb. 5, 2020) (“After reviewing the state of the law in this Circuit in January 2019, the Court finds that a reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that inducing another officer to issue a citation to a citizen in retaliation for the citizen’s protected First Amendment activity violated the citizen’s constitutional rights. . . For one, the Fourth Circuit’s 2013 decision in Tobey recognized that ‘effect[ing]’ someone’s arrest in retaliation for their exercise of First Amendment rights without probable cause to effect that arrest established a viable First Amendment retaliation claim. . . Likewise, the Supreme Court in Lozman found that directing the arrest of a citizen pursuant to an official retaliatory policy presented a cognizable First Amendment retaliation claim regardless of the existence of probable cause for the arrest. . . These precedents provided fair notice to government officials in this Circuit that they could not direct or effect the arrest of a citizen in retaliation for the citizen’s protected First Amendment activity. Logic dictates that if government officials cannot direct or effect the arrest of a citizen for retaliatory reasons, government officials cannot induce the arrest — or, in this case, citation — of a citizen for those same reasons, even if the official so induced otherwise has probable cause for the arrest or citation.

. . . The difference between directing or effecting an arrest and inducing it is one of degree, not kind. Neither do the policy reasons underlying the qualified immunity doctrine militate in Defendant's favor. . . . Of these policies, avoiding unwanted timidity constitutes 'the most important special government immunity-producing concern ... ensuring that those who serve the government do so with the decisiveness and the judgment required by the public good.' . . . These considerations do not justify shielding Defendant from liability if Plaintiff proves that Defendant's retaliatory inducement violated her rights. For one, the undisputed facts show that Defendant did not act in the performance of her public duties when she called Deputy Riley to offer to buy him lunch. Rather, Defendant called Deputy Riley privately without knowing the reasons justifying the stop of Plaintiff's vehicle and attempted to cause the issuance of a citation to Plaintiff by inducing Deputy Riley. Although the Court does not question the dutifulness of Deputy Riley and his decisions during the stop of Plaintiff's vehicle, the same cannot be said of Defendant's conduct. Such conduct cannot possibly be considered a discretionary decision in furtherance of Defendant's duties as a law enforcement officer. Nor does Defendant's decision to call Deputy Riley to induce the issuance of a citation 'ensur[e] that those who serve the government do so with the decisiveness and the judgment required by the public good.' . . . Ultimately, because the state of the law in January 2019 put Defendant on fair notice that her conduct violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights, and after considering the policy reasons underlying the qualified immunity doctrine, the Court finds that qualified immunity does not shield Defendant from liability under Plaintiff's retaliatory inducement theory. However, a triable issue remains as to whether Defendant's conduct violated Plaintiff's rights in this instance, and the Court will revisit whether, as a matter of law, Plaintiff has proven a violation of her rights after the presentation of Plaintiff's evidence during trial.")

Bailey v. Ramos, 125 F.4th 667, 685-86 (5th Cir. 2025) ("Looking to circumstantial evidence, Bailey points out that Ramos did not pay attention to or arrest any of the people walking through the area who were not recording. True, the fact that 'he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of speech had not been' would be good evidence in his favor. . . . But the video evidence blatantly contradicts Bailey's characterization of events. None of the passersby walking through the crime scene were 'similarly situated' to Bailey. Apart from those whom the officers were interviewing as witnesses, no one stopped and lingered in close proximity to the ambulance. Bailey was the only person who appeared to disregard police orders to stay back from the crime scene. Indeed, video shows other individuals recording the interaction, and those individuals were not arrested. Bailey hasn't pointed to any other evidence that would show that Ramos had a subjective retaliatory motive, much less that any such motive was the but-for cause of Ramos's decision to arrest him. Video evidence blatantly disputes his only argument. As a result, no dispute of material fact exists, and Ramos is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on Bailey's First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.")

Martinez v. City of Rosenberg, Texas, 123 F.4th 285, 290-91 (5th Cir. 2024) (“With all due respect to the dissent, this is not a jaywalking case. To the contrary, the officer was enforcing a provision of the Texas Transportation Code that requires pedestrians to walk on the side of the roadway facing oncoming traffic. Walking on the side of the road with one’s back to traffic poses considerably greater risk than jaywalking where the exposure of the pedestrian is quite different. The significance accorded this provision by its placement in the Texas Transportation Code provides an important backdrop to the mission of Officer Cantu. His unchallenged affidavit explained that he confronted Martinez not to arrest him but to explain the importance of the provision that forbade Martinez’s action. Namely, that Martinez’s action was a threat to himself. Martinez chose not to listen to Officer Cantu and instead walked away from him. Officer Cantu faced the choice of either being ignored or enforcing the statute. Officer Cantu decided to place his arm over Martinez’s shoulder and bring him to the ground. Based on our review of video evidence, this maneuver would be unlikely to have caused pain to Martinez but for the fact that Martinez had a deformity unknown to Officer Cantu. That said, this case remains close. Perhaps in one sense, it is a tie. But the officer should not be held liable for damages when there is no evidence of injury in the record and Qualified Immunity protects the officer’s honest mistake.”)

Martinez v. City of Rosenberg, Texas, 123 F.4th 285, 291-93 (5th Cir. 2024) (Higginson, J., dissenting) (“ ‘[J]aywalking is endemic but rarely results in arrest.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, 587 U.S. 391, 407, 139 S.Ct. 1715, 204 L.Ed.2d 1 (2019). If you watch the video of the interaction at issue here, you will see the following: At 4:35:02 P.M. on February 6, 2019, Alejandro Martinez is walking towards his home in Rosenberg, Texas on a residential street without sidewalks. At 4:35:17 P.M., Officer Ryan Cantu pulls over, jumps out of his car, and calls ‘let me talk to you’ to Martinez, who walks back towards him from about ten feet away. At 4:36:29 P.M., Martinez is on the ground, shouting ‘Please! You’re hurting my arm! You’re hurting my arm!’ In that brief window of time, Officer Cantu has slammed him to the ground. Does the law of this country countenance this kind of force from those charged with protecting their communities? Because Martinez was walking on the wrong side of that street, in violation of state law, and because he turned his shoulder slightly, as if to walk away—but did not walk away—the Defendants argue that it does. The majority seems to agree, stating that Officer Cantu’s force was ‘reasonable.’ I respectfully dissent. . . Summary judgment was inappropriate in this case. A jury should be allowed to view this video and hear the evidence as to whether Officer Cantu used excessive force when he brought Martinez to the ground one minute after he stopped him for walking on the incorrect side of a residential street on his way home. The factors articulated in Graham v. Connor . . . and our caselaw suggest that he did. . . . Finally, because qualified immunity cases require us to linger in the details of an interaction and its distinctions from previous instances of excessive force, it is important to return to first principles. As the Supreme Court has noted, the reasonable-officer standard exists because ‘police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’ . . Qualified immunity exists to protect from liability government officers who must make tough—but reasonable—judgment calls. Here there was no emergency, no exigency, no serious crime, no threat to anyone’s safety. Officer Cantu himself admitted that he had no plans to arrest Martinez, and that he just wanted to talk to him. Martinez at most talked back to the officer, expressed his incredulity, and pulled his arm away from Officer Cantu. Our law correctly casts doubt on the notion that an officer reasonably makes a ‘split-second judgment’ to tackle a visibly disabled, unarmed man whose only offense was walking on the wrong side of a quiet residential street in his own neighborhood. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.”)

Grisham v. Valenciano, 93 F.4th 903, 909-10 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Here, as in Nieves, the officers had probable cause to make the arrests for disorderly conduct and resisting arrest, thus precluding the arrestees’ retaliatory arrest claims. Still, on appeal, Plaintiffs argue that ‘probable cause does not foreclose this lawsuit since Grisham and Everard were treated differently from others because of their First Amendment activities.’ Notably, the Nieves Court did delineate a carveout to the probable cause prerequisite in holding that a plaintiff asserting a retaliatory arrest claim does not have to establish the absence of probable cause ‘when [the] plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Plaintiffs contend that other armed protestors were not arrested because the officers personally opposed ‘the message that Everard and Grisham conveyed.’ However, as the magistrate judge noted, other protestors were arrested, but they simply did not join in this lawsuit. Further, caselaw does not require that the officers seize all ‘otherwise similarly situated individuals.’ . . . Rather, ‘where officers have probable cause to make arrests’ they may not disproportionately or unfairly ‘exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . The ‘no-probable-cause requirement’ applies in the instant case because Plaintiffs have not presented objective evidence, beyond conclusory statements, that they were arrested ‘when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Consequently, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because there was probable cause to arrest Everard and Grisham pursuant to a presumptively constitutional and enforceable statute. . . . And, as the record reflects, the officers were objectively reasonable in believing that such probable cause existed.”)

Villarreal v. City of Laredo, Texas, 94 F.4th 374, 404-05 (5th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Higginson, J., joined by Elrod, Graves, Willett, Ho, Oldham, and Douglas, JJ., dissenting), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Gonzalez v. Trevino, 144 S. Ct. 1663 (2024) (per curiam) (“Villarreal’s first amended complaint alleges that ‘[Officer Defendants] selected the Statute as a pretext to target Villarreal. They did so despite knowing that LPD, WDCA, and the Webb County Sheriff had never arrested, detained, or prosecuted any person before under the Statute.’ This conduct falls squarely within the Nieves exception. In fact, there could be no better example of a crime never enforced than this one. Texas has never prosecuted it to conviction, ever. At no point in their district or appellate court briefing did Defendants contest Villarreal’s allegation that law enforcement in Laredo and Webb County, or indeed, any prosecutor anywhere in Texas, had pursued anyone besides her under § 39.06(c). That fact alone—putting to the side Villarreal’s detailed and so-far-untested allegations of police animus, as well as Texas courts’ invalidation of the criminal offense used to arrest her—means that seizing and jailing Villarreal should trigger the Nieves atypical-arrest exception and defeat, at the motion to dismiss stage, any probable cause the majority imagines conferred immunity on Defendants.” [footnote omitted])

Buehler v. Dear, 27 F.4th 969, 993-94 (5th Cir. 2022) (“[O]ur conclusion . . . that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Buehler’s First Amendment claim does not dispose of his corresponding claim against the City, since ‘a municipality may [still] be liable if a plaintiff states a claim against an official but the official is protected by qualified immunity.’ . . . Nevertheless, we ‘may affirm a district court’s Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal on any grounds . . . supported by the record,’ . . . and here there is an obvious alternate ground on which to affirm dismissal of Buehler’s First Amendment claim against the City. Such a claim, just to reiterate, cannot succeed unless the harm he claims to have suffered as a result of the City’s policies or practices (his August 2, 2015 arrest) violated the First Amendment. It did not. As the Supreme Court recently held, a ‘plaintiff pressing a [First Amendment] retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’ . . . (An exception exists ‘when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,’ . . . but Buehler points to no such evidence. . .) And as we have already explained in affirming summary judgment for Defendants on Buehler’s false-arrest claims, the arresting Officers had probable cause to arrest Buehler for interference with official duties. The arrest therefore did not violate his First Amendment rights, and his municipal-liability claim premised on the contrary notion necessarily fails.”)

Roy v. City of Monroe, 950 F.3d 245, 255-56 (5th Cir. 2020) (“To prevail on a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . plaintiffs must plead and prove the absence of probable cause. . . . It follows that, at summary judgment, Roy could not rebut Booth’s qualified immunity defense without, first, producing evidence that Booth’s summons was unsupported by probable cause and, second, establishing that the absence of probable cause would have been apparent to any reasonable officer in Booth’s position. . . . In sum, we find that Roy has failed to carry his summary judgment burden. . . . Roy has not shown that Booth’s issuance of the summons was unsupported by probable cause or, much less, that a reasonable officer would have known that it was unsupported. On the contrary, our decisions in Johnson, Burbridge, and other comparable cases convince us that probable cause supported Booth’s summons. His reliance on the purported victim was justified because there was no ‘apparent reason’ to disbelieve her account. We affirm the district court’s ruling that Booth is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ayala v. Aransas County, 777 F. App’x 100, ___ n.5 (5th Cir. 2019) (“The Supreme Court recently announced an exception to the general notion that probable cause ordinarily defeats a retaliatory arrest claim: ‘when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019). Ayala has not argued that this case falls within the exception, nor is there anything in the record to suggest such a conclusion.”)

Reyes v. City of Austin, No. 1:21-CV-992-RP, 2024 WL 5088385, at *4, *6-7 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2024) (“The Supreme Court issued an opinion mandating that the Fifth Circuit interpret the Nieves exception more widely in June 2024, after the parties submitted their summary judgment briefing. Gonzalez v. Trevino, 602 U.S. 653, 658 (2024). As such, the United States Magistrate Judge did not have the benefit of full briefing on the widened Nieves exception, an issue the parties addressed in their Objections and responses thereto. . . In Gonzalez, the Supreme Court rejected the Fifth Circuit’s ‘overly cramped view of Nieves.’ . . It held that the Fifth Circuit erred when it interpreted Nieves as requiring ‘very specific comparative evidence’ of other individuals who engaged in identical conduct as the plaintiff but were not arrested. . . ‘[T]he demand for virtually identical and identifiable comparators goes too far.’ . . Rather, showing ‘circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so’ using ‘objective’ evidence sufficed to meet the Nieves exception. . . .To summarize, to show retaliatory arrest even where probable cause existed, a plaintiff may produce evidence either of similarly situated individuals who were not arrested, or other objective evidence that circumstances existed where ‘officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . By contrast, arrests for aggravated assault charges have been held to have probable cause with no Nieves exception applicable, because officers would routinely exercise their discretion to make an arrest in circumstances of potential aggravated assault. . . Courts have treated threats of physical violence similarly, including after Gonzalez. . . .As an initial matter, Reyes must show that his arrests violated the First Amendment to prove his Section 1983 claim. Reyes provides evidence of several arrests where he alleges that either (1) there was no probable cause, as supports a finding of retaliatory arrest, or, (2) the Nieves exception applies, because other similarly situated individuals were not arrested or based on other evidence. Taking each arrest in turn, the Court finds that Reyes met his burden to show a disputed material fact as to some, but not all, of his arrests. As such, the Court will modify the report and recommendation to find the existence of a material dispute of fact as to the violation of his First Amendment rights in these instances. The Court notes, again, that these issues were not fully briefed for the Court until the Objections to the report and recommendation. . . . As such, a reasonable factfinder could find that in five instances, APD officers arrested Reyes in retaliation for First Amendment protected activities. Reyes does not provide a material dispute of facts as to all arrests, however, and the Court adopts the recommendation of the United States Magistrate Judge as to all other arrests not described above.”) Schweitzer v. Dagle, No. 3:22-CV-00273, 2024 WL 1348415, at *7–8 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 27, 2024) (“It is undisputed that Dagle had probable cause to arrest Schweitzer. But Schweitzer alleges Dagle unconstitutionally exercised this discretion when he ripped up the ticket Schweitzer had already signed and arrested him for the same offense only after Schweitzer told Dagle: ‘let me go or arrest me.’ . . Schweitzer alleges he ‘was the only person arrested for failing to use [his] turn signal while nobody else in the community was even being pulled over [for] such a small violation.’ . . Schweitzer also points to Galveston Police COVID-19 pandemic protocols that he alleges discouraged arrests for low-level offenses. Taking Schweitzer’s allegations as true, which I must at this stage, Schweitzer adequately alleges the first and third prongs of a retaliatory arrest claim, and that his arrest falls within Nieves’s atypical arrest exception. Schweitzer’s demand to be released or arrested was unquestionably protected speech. . . . Thus, Schweitzer satisfies the first prong of a retaliation claim: he was engaged in constitutionally protected activity. As to the third prong, Schweitzer has more than demonstrated that Dagle's actions were motivated against Schweitzer's speech. Remember, Dagle had already ticketed Schweitzer for failing to signal. . . The Texas Transportation Code requires arresting officers to 'promptly release the person from custody' once they 'make a written promise to appear in court by signing the written notice prepared by the arresting officer.' . . Dagle should have promptly released Schweitzer once Schweitzer signed the ticket. Dagle ripped the ticket up only after Schweitzer exercised his First Amendment right to demand release if he was not going to be arrested. That is exactly the situation contemplated by Nieves. Moreover, Dagle's initial ticketing of Schweitzer lends credence to Schweitzer's allegation 'that the Galveston police department was not making arrests for Class 'C' Misdemeanors.' . . In other words, Schweitzer has adequately alleged facts showing that otherwise similarly situated individuals who did not challenge Dagle were not arrested. Alas, Schweitzer's claim fails as to the second prong: injury. Any curtailing of free speech, even if the effect is 'small,' satisfies the injury requirement of the second prong. . . But Schweitzer must still 'demonstrate that he reduced or changed his exercise of free speech.' . . This Schweitzer cannot do. Schweitzer alleges he asked to speak to a supervising officer after arriving at the jail, and that he explained everything that had transpired with Dagle to the Chief of Police 'in front of everyone,' which presumably included Dagle. . . In other words, Schweitzer 'persisted in exposing and challenging [Dagle].' . . Indeed, Schweitzer's subsequent arrests were a result of his speaking out about the July 28, 2020 arrest. . . Because Schweitzer has not alleged that he 'curtailed [his] protected speech activities in response to [Dagle's] actions,' he cannot satisfy the second prong of his retaliatory arrest claim. . . Thus, Schweitzer fails to state a claim against Dagle, or to overcome Dagle's qualified immunity. I recommend Schweitzer's claims against Dagle in his individual capacity be dismissed.")

Gray v. City of Denham Springs, No. CV 19-00889-BAJ-EWD, 2021 WL 1187076, at *9 (M.D. La. Mar. 29, 2021) ("Jacob Gray's First Amendment retaliation claim is not barred at this stage by Nieves v. Bartlett. Nieves instructs that a Section 1983 plaintiff cannot pursue a claim of retaliatory arrest in violation of the First Amendment when the summary judgment evidence shows that police had probable cause to make an arrest. . . Nieves is distinguishable in two respects. First, it addresses a claim of retaliatory arrest. Here, by contrast, Jacob alleges retaliatory excessive force. As explained above, the issue of whether the John Doe Officers engaged in unlawful and excessive force to prevent Jacob from filming the traffic stop is temporally and conceptually distinct from the issue of whether probable cause to arrest Jacob for disturbing the peace arose after the Officers took his phone, tackled him to the ground, and sprayed him with mace. Second, Nieves was decided at summary judgment, after development of evidence proving that police had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff for drunken conduct and resisting arrest. Here, no such evidence is presently before the Court. Rather, Jacob alleges that he was peaceably and lawfully recording the traffic stop when he suffered retaliation. For present purposes, Jacob's allegations are sufficient.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Hall v. Navarre, 118 F.4th 749, 759-63 (6th Cir. 2024) (“To demonstrate a First Amendment retaliation claim, the constitutional violation asserted here, Hall must show three things: that the First Amendment protected his presence at the protest, that Barr took an adverse action against him by issuing the citation, and that there was a causal connection between his protected activity and the adverse conduct. . . On top of that, Hall must also ‘plead[] and prove[]’ the absence of probable cause supporting the allegedly retaliatory prosecution. . . Further, to demonstrate that a First Amendment right was clearly established at the time of the violation, Hall must convince us that it would have been clear to Barr that his ‘actions were unlawful in the situation [he] confronted.’ . . Between these two considerations, we may take them in either order. . . With that understanding in mind, we turn to the second—whether Hall demonstrated that the right he alleges Barr violated was clearly established—as that analysis begins and ends the matter. . . . Examining Supreme Court precedent as well as that of the circuit courts, we ask whether those authorities ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . Doing so ensures that liability attaches only to ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . What clearly established right did Barr allegedly violate? Hall describes it as his right ‘to be free from retaliatory arrest unsupported by probable cause as a result of protesting public officials and policies.’ Doing so frames the right at an impermissibly high level. . . In particular, it ignores the critical, undisputed fact that Barr ticketed Hall only after Cole, his commanding officer, directed him to do so. Any definition of the right at issue must take account of this detail, narrowing the scope of the First Amendment inquiry. . . Because a superior officer’s credible instruction can support another officer’s reasonable belief that probable cause is present, Cole’s command informs our inquiry whether Barr understood that his actions violated the First Amendment. . . Accordingly, we ask whether Barr violated clearly established law by following an order to cite Hall even where Barr, as the district court seemingly inferred, maintained a speech-based retaliatory animus. The answer is no. Two poles anchor the legal framework. At one end is the understanding that an officer cannot benefit from qualified immunity’s shield simply by asserting that he was ‘following orders.’ . . At the other is the notion that qualified immunity may be warranted when ‘reasonable officers could conclude that they have probable cause’ for their conduct ‘based on plausible instructions from a supervisor when viewed objectively in light of their own knowledge of the surrounding facts and circumstances.’ . . Between the two, Barr’s conduct falls closer to the latter. . . . That Barr did not transcend a clearly established boundary by following Cole’s order is all the more apparent when one considers that Hall was part of a much larger group of demonstrators, many of whom themselves were lawfully detained by officers. As a recording of the incident reveals, the scene at the time of the arrests was chaotic. . . Individuals were running in all directions, smoke surrounded the melee, and events unfolded quickly. In the end, a busload of individuals was arrested for blocking traffic and related offenses and then transported to the detention center. That Hall would be rounded up with the others and taken to the same detention center is not surprising. Especially so, since he stood beside the group disobeying police orders by blocking the street and, like those protesters, was wearing tactical gear. It is reasonable then that Barr, absent other instruction, would have understood them all to be part of the same illegal activity, as other circuits have recognized in similar circumstances. . . In short, it is not clearly established that Barr’s conduct violated settled law. Again, Barr knew two things. One, he witnessed a group of protesters acting in ways he believed unlawful. Two, Cole had instructed him to issue a citation to Hall while Barr was ticketing other offenders at a detention center. Nothing in the record suggests that Barr would have known there was no probable cause justifying the latter order. . . . Put differently, Barr was not ‘plainly incompetent’ in following Cole’s direction to cite Hall, nor did he ‘knowingly violate the law.’ . . . As a result, he is entitled to qualified immunity on Hall’s First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . The district court’s holding that there is a genuine dispute of material fact whether Barr had probable cause to ticket Hall does not upset this conclusion. Whether qualified immunity applies is a distinct legal question from whether there was probable cause for the citation. . . . Here, whether probable cause in fact existed is not the question at hand. Rather, it is whether it was clearly established that Barr should ignore a commanding officer’s order when nothing known to Barr undermined the legitimacy of that order. So too for the district court’s finding that a genuine dispute exists over whether Hall’s participation in protected activity motivated Barr’s decision to cite Hall. Even if Barr viewed Hall’s protected political expression as grounds for arrest, he nonetheless had no reason to doubt that probable cause otherwise existed for Hall’s arrest, given the instruction he received from his commanding officer as well as the surrounding circumstances. In other words, it was not clearly established that ticketing Hall in that context violated a constitutional right he maintained, regardless of Barr’s subjective motivation. . . . [W]hen context and circumstances suggest orders are reasonable, an officer may rely on them without fear of liability. That was the case here. The dissenting opinion likewise faults us for purportedly grafting Fourth Amendment good faith principles onto a First Amendment retaliation claim. That overreads our holding. We are not cementing a substantive rule of constitutional law. Again, our reasoning is limited to the clearly established component of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . [N]o binding precedent interpreting either amendment clearly required Barr to disregard his superior’s order until he could independently verify its validity. For an officer in Barr’s situation, it was not beyond debate that issuing tickets in response to mass detentions of unlawful protestors at the seemingly reasonable command of a superior violated the First Amendment. That is enough to prevail on an assertion of qualified immunity.”) Hall v. Navarre, 118 F.4th 749, 763-68 (6th Cir. 2024) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Defendant Sergeant Timothy Barr cited plaintiff Timothy Hall for disorderly conduct, disobeying a police officer, and blocking traffic despite neither witnessing any conduct by Hall warranting the citations nor communicating with his colleagues about Hall. Barr issued the citations after his supervisor ordered him to do so. Sergeant Barr now appeals the district court’s denial of his motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity as to Hall’s First Amendment retaliation claim. I would affirm because, for purposes of summary judgment, Hall has demonstrated that by issuing these citations, Barr violated Hall’s clearly established right to be free from retaliatory arrest unsupported by probable cause as a result of participating in a public protest. . . . As the district court correctly held, issues of fact remain for the jury that underpin Barr’s qualified immunity defense—notably, whether retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor for the issuance of the citations. . . . Three issues plague the majority opinion’s conclusion to the contrary. First, it grafts a Fourth Amendment good-faith probable cause framework onto our First Amendment retaliation analysis for the first time in our Circuit without explanation or justification. Second, it relies on factual inferences in Appellant Barr's favor, defying our jurisdictional limits. And third, contrary to our precedent, it holds that, as a matter of law, Barr's 'simply following orders' defense is meritorious. . . . Today's opinion regarding Barr's interlocutory appeal rests on a major, unexplained, and novel assumption: that Barr's mistaken but good-faith belief that he had probable cause is just as effective as actual probable cause in defeating the causation element of Hall's First Amendment claim. Rather than draw attention to the novelty of this approach, or explain its basis, the majority simply applies the Fourth Amendment's good-faith exception to this First Amendment case. I cannot agree with this newly charted path.

... [W]e have never applied that good-faith exception in the First Amendment context. Nor should we. Although probable cause plays a role in both First and Fourth Amendment claims, key differences abound. . . . To be sure, the presence of probable cause will 'generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim' because it is 'weighty evidence' that retaliatory animus did not motivate the unconstitutional seizure. . . . But the Supreme Court carved out 'a narrow qualification ... for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.' . . . That qualification is important because it protects against the 'risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.' . . . Thus, while the presence of probable cause automatically defeats a Fourth Amendment claim, the same is not true for a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Just as probable cause's presence does not automatically defeat a First Amendment claim, an officer's good-faith belief in the same will not either. Of course, whether an officer reasonably and in good faith believed there was probable cause is part of the inquiry into what motivated the arrest. But it is only part of the inquiry. And the answer to that question does not, by itself, answer either question the Supreme Court instructed us to focus on: (1) whether 'retaliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the arrest,' and (2) whether 'the arrest would have been initiated without respect to retaliation.' . . . Rather than fundamentally alter the Supreme Court's framework for First Amendment retaliation claims, I would follow the Supreme Court's instructions and consider Barr's assertion of good faith as part of the Mt. Healthy test, not as a freestanding exception that automatically defeats Hall's First Amendment claim. Under the Mt. Healthy approach, Hall's claim survives summary judgment. As explained below, it is an open question whether Hall's participation in the protest was a substantial or motivating factor behind Barr's citations. Barr must show that Hall would have been cited regardless of Hall's mere participation in the protest. At this stage in litigation, Barr has not done so. . . . In sum, this is an interlocutory appeal from the denial of a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. As such, our jurisdiction is limited to issues of law. . . . Under the facts found by the district court and construed in the light most favorable to Hall, he was lawfully exercising his First Amendment right to protest, and he acted as directed by law enforcement by staying on the sidewalk. For purposes of summary judgment, Hall carried his burden of causation by showing that Barr's citations to him for his protected conduct without probable cause violated his clearly established First Amendment right not to be retaliated against.") Enoch v. Hamilton County Sheriff's Office, 818 F. App'x 398, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Enoch II), ("Deputy Hogan testified that court security officers are trained that people are not allowed to film inside the courthouse without permission. . . . Judge Nadel thought that it was implied that the hallways were included in Rule 33(D)(6)’s prohibition on recording in the courtroom. Even if the rule itself, and Judge Nadel’s supplemental order, did not explicitly characterize the hallways as ‘ancillary area[s],’ the un rebutted evidence shows that the common practice in the Hamilton County courthouse was to treat it as such. It was accordingly reasonable for the Deputies to have believed that was the case here. . . . Because they reasonably believed that Rule 33(D)(6) applied to the hallways outside the courtroom, we cannot say that the Deputies were ‘plainly incompetent,’ or that they ‘knowingly violate[d] the law.’ . . . There was no wrongful arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment based on the conduct at issue on this appeal. They are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from liability based on such conduct, and we reverse. . . . No one denies that Rule 33(D)(6) is a reasonable restriction on speech. Rather, Enoch and Corbin maintain that the Deputies could not ‘punish them for gathering news about matter of public importance when their actions violated neither rules nor laws.’ . . . Because Rule 33(D)(6) did not extend to the hallways, they contend, the Deputies arbitrarily stifled their speech. But, as we determined above, it was reasonable for the Deputies to believe that Enoch and Corbin’s conduct violated Rule 33(D)(6). ‘When public officials implement validly enacted state laws that no court has invalidated, their conduct typically satisfies the core [qualified immunity] inquiry—the “objective reasonableness of an official’s conduct”—that the immunity doctrine was designed to test.’ . . . Because it was not objectively unreasonable for the Deputies to conclude that they were enforcing Rule 33(D)(6) when they arrested Enoch and Corbin—and thus had probable cause to arrest them—they are entitled to qualified immunity on the First Amendment claims. See Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1725 (2019) (holding that the presence of probable cause for an arrest generally defeats a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim as a matter of law). Enoch and Hogan respond that other individuals in the hallway were allowed to continue to take pictures and record videos and that they were singled out for disparate treatment, allegedly because of their race or speech. Either way, this claim fails. Starting with the race-based retaliation claim, it is clearly established law that the police may not discriminate on the basis of race. As the Supreme Court has long made clear, however, ‘the constitutional basis for objecting to intentionally discriminatory application of laws is the Equal Protection Clause.’ Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 813 (1996). Enoch and Corbin did not assert a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Their race-based claims therefore are not properly alleged in this case. Turning to the speech-based retaliation claim, the Deputies are entitled to qualified immunity. When Enoch and Corbin were arrested, ‘it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause,’ like the arrests in this case, ‘could violate the First Amendment.’ Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 663 (2012). To be sure, the Supreme Court later clarified that holding in Nieves, which left open the possibility that a retaliatory-arrest claim could survive without a finding of the absence of probable cause if the plaintiff presented sufficient ‘objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . But Nieves was decided after Enoch and Corbin were arrested. Its principles, therefore, were not clearly established law at the time of the arrests. So Enoch and Corbin cannot rely on Nieves’s potential exception to the requirement to prove the absence of probable cause to make out a retaliatory-arrest claim under the First Amendment.”)

See also Enoch v. Hamilton County Sheriff's Office, No. 22-3946, 2024 WL 3597026, at *5–6 (6th Cir. July 31, 2024) (Enoch III) (not reported), cert. denied, 145 S. Ct. ____ (2025) (“[O]ur conclusion that Enoch failed to establish that she engaged in protected activity does not hinge on whether Rule 33 applies to the courthouse hallway. If the rule does apply, then Enoch was arrested for violating a content-neutral restriction on her speech in a limited public forum. If it does not, the deputies’ application of the Rule did not transform her recording into an activity deserving First Amendment protection. Regardless of whether the application of the Rule to the hallway was express or implied, Enoch failed to show that her arrest resulted from anything other than a violation of a reasonable, content-neutral restriction on speech. The district court found that Enoch engaged in protected activity because of our statement in Enoch I that ‘the First Amendment protects the rights of both the media and the general public to attend and share information about the conduct of trials.’. . . But Enoch I did not recognize a First Amendment right to record in a courthouse hallway. Rather, in ruling on the defendants’ motion for judgment on the pleadings, we found that the plaintiffs had alleged a violation of their First Amendment rights after accepting the plaintiffs’ allegation in the Complaint that they had not violated any courthouse rules. . . . Our holding in Enoch II similarly does not establish that Enoch was engaged in protected activity. In discussing the plaintiffs’ speech-based retaliation claim, we held that the deputies were entitled to qualified immunity because no clearly established law held that an officer could be liable for retaliating against someone whose arrest was supported by probable cause. . . . Because we resolved the claim by holding that law enforcement’s arrest was supported by probable cause, we had no occasion to hold that Enoch’s conduct was protected. Enoch cannot rely on either of our prior decisions to satisfy the first prong of her retaliation claim. Enoch has not shown that her recording was protected under the First Amendment. The precedent she cites establishes no more than a general right to attend trials and gather newsworthy information. While our prior decisions in this case have recognized that right, Enoch did not meet her burden of showing that those decisions demonstrate that she engaged in protected activity here. Because she failed to show that her recording was protected, her first theory of speech-based retaliation fails as a matter of law.”)

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 429-30 (6th Cir. 2019) (“If the police did not have probable cause to arrest Novak, then he may bring a claim of retaliation. Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1725. . . . If the officers did have probable cause, on the other hand, they are entitled to qualified immunity. The Supreme Court has said as much. ‘This Court has never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.’ Reichle, 566 U.S. at 664–65, 132 S.Ct. 2088. The Supreme Court said that in 2012, and it remains true today. The Supreme Court decided two retaliation cases after Reichle. Neither case clearly established Novak’s right to be free from a retaliatory arrest based on probable cause. First, the Supreme Court decided Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach. There, the Court held that a plaintiff can bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest but only against official municipal policies of retaliation. . . . So Lozman does not apply where, as here, the plaintiff sues individual officers. . . . Second, the Court held most recently in Nieves that a plaintiff generally cannot bring a retaliation claim if the police had probable cause to arrest. . . . Though Nieves also created an exception to that general rule that we will discuss later, the exception does not apply here because the officers would not have been aware of it at the time of Novak’s arrest since the case was decided later. Nor has our circuit clearly established the law on this issue. In Sandul v. Larion, the Sixth Circuit denied an officer qualified immunity for a First Amendment retaliation claim and held that ‘protected speech cannot serve as the basis for a violation of any of the ... ordinances.’. . . But in that case, the ordinance criminalized the plaintiff’s speech directly, and there was little question whether the speech was protected. . . . Plus, it is not clearly established how we reconcile the apparent holding in Sandul that protected speech cannot be the basis for probable cause with the rule that protected speech can be a ‘wholly legitimate consideration’ for officers when they decide whether to arrest someone. Reichle, 566 U.S. at 668, 132 S.Ct. 2088. ‘[I]f judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’. . . Simply put, Ohio’s statute appears to punish the effects of speech (interruptions), not the speech itself, and whether enforcing such a statute in these circumstances violates the First Amendment is not clearly established. So the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. To sum up, to resolve the retaliation claim, the factfinder below will have to decide: (1) whether Novak’s Facebook page was a parody, and thus protected speech, and; (2) whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Novak under the Ohio statute. If the officers did not have probable cause, they are not entitled to qualified immunity, and Novak can attempt to show the arrest was retaliatory. If the officers did have probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity even if Novak’s page was protected speech because the law at the time did not clearly establish that charging Novak under the statute would violate his constitutional rights.”)

Novak v. City of Parma, 932 F.3d 421, 430-32 (6th Cir. 2019) (“The Supreme Court held recently in Nieves that to bring a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, a plaintiff must generally show that there was no probable cause for the arrest. . . . But the Nieves Court also recognized a narrow exception to this rule ‘where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’. . . . It is plausible that Novak’s arrest under Ohio Rev. Code § 2909.04(B), or one like it, would trigger the exception—i.e., if officers never or rarely arrested someone under this statute. Unfortunately for Novak, this exception was not clearly established before Nieves. . . . Even if Novak’s case would not fall within the narrow exception of Nieves, . . . there is good reason to believe that in the future probable cause alone may not protect the officers. First, this case may not be subject to the general rule of Nieves because the sole basis for probable cause was speech. Besides posting to his Facebook page, Novak committed no other act that could have created probable cause. In other First Amendment retaliation cases on point, by contrast, the defendant’s conduct was a mix of protected speech and unprotected conduct. That is, the defendants both said something and did something. . . . Here, we have nothing like that. Novak did not create a Facebook page criticizing police and use his computer to hack into police servers to disrupt operations. The sole basis for probable cause to arrest Novak was his speech. And there is good reason to believe that, based on the reasoning underlying the First Amendment retaliation cases, this is an important difference. This is important because in Nieves and its predecessors, the Court based its reasoning on the thorny causation issue that comes up in cases with both protected speech and unprotected conduct. The idea is that in cases where the plaintiff both did something and said something to get arrested, the factfinder will not be able to disentangle whether the officer arrested him because of what he did or because of what he said. . . . [T]he vague language of the Ohio statute further heightens the concern raised in Issue 2. That statute makes it a crime to ‘use any computer ... or the internet so as to disrupt, interrupt, or impair the functions of any police ... operations.’ Ohio Rev. Code § 2909.04(B). . . . Where a statute gives police broad cover to find probable cause on speech alone, probable cause does little to disentangle retaliatory motives from legitimate ones. Thus, this case raises new questions under Nieves. It may be that, based on the Supreme Court’s reasoning in that case and others, the general rule of requiring plaintiffs to prove the absence of probable cause should not apply here. We need not decide that now.”)

Hartman v. Thompson, 931 F.3d 471, 484 n.6 (6th Cir. 2019) (“We note that the Nieves Court held ‘that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’. . . Here Plaintiffs have not put forth any objective evidence that similarly situated individuals at the Breakfast had been allowed to engage in similarly disruptive activities without arrest.”)

Hartman v. Thompson, 931 F.3d 471, 496 n.6 (6th Cir. 2019) (Moore, J., dissenting) (“As the majority notes, the Supreme Court in Nieves held that, notwithstanding the general rule that probable cause defeats a claim for a retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment, ‘the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’. . . Because I conclude that Defendants lacked probable cause to arrest Plaintiffs, I need not rely on this exception to the Nieves holding.”)

Grady v. Cratsenburg, No. 22-CV-11142, 2025 WL 747878, at *28–31 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 7, 2025) (“Defendants assert that Plaintiffs cannot qualify for the Nieves exception because ‘the video evidence establishes that there was no similarly situated individual at the scene.’. . . To be clear, the video evidence plainly establishes that there were other spectators at the scene, also filming the encounter, and (as Nieves requires) were otherwise not engaged ‘in the same sort of protected speech’ that Shatina Grady (and occasionally Daniel Grady) were engaged in (i.e. shouting at or criticizing police action, at least until the Gradys were arrested). . . Defendants argue, however, these people do not count as similarly situated individuals because the proper comparator would be people who also stood too close and ‘interfered with the investigation and refused commands to back up.’. . . In the court’s view, that is too narrow a scope to view potential comparators in this case in light of Gonzalez. Differentiating the spectators in this case by drawing careful lines about precisely where they were standing in relation to the house is surely a search for ‘virtually identical’ comparators, which the Court has instructed is not necessary or desirable. . . These other people also stood near police who were on active duty and were part of this same investigation/attempt to safely gain entry to the house (and these other spectators were even nearer to individual officers than the Gradys). . . These spectators also filmed the encounter from a distance, and were not within the property itself. That is sufficient to establish their similarity at this stage. . . Defendants’ argument that what differentiates the Gradys is that they were told to back up is a question for the jury (and begs the question). . . At the level of granularity that Defendants propose, they essentially just are rewording the causation question: could a reasonable jury credit the content-neutral explanation for their arrests and conclude that what differentiates the Gradys from other spectators at the scene is their location and mere failure to move back? Of course they could. . . . But could a jury also conclude that what differentiates the Gradys from other spectators, and what caused their arrests, is their vocal criticism of the police action? They could. . . . Plaintiffs have provided objective proof that there were sufficiently similarly-situated individuals at the scene; it is a question for a jury to decide which of the above explanations best accounts for their differential treatment. . . . In this case, Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity under Nieves because probable cause existed. However, that plaintiffs must ultimately prove that officers acted with ‘subjective animus’ in the First Amendment context reduces the concern that they will not know that their conduct violates the law. . . Nieves essentially creates an assumption for purposes of granting qualified immunity at pretrial stages when a plaintiff has no objective proof of improper motive, rather than changing any underlying substantive law establishing a First Amendment violation – it is still clearly established under Nieves that a retaliatory arrest made for the purpose of punishing speech violates the First Amendment, even if there was an ‘objective’ (but pretextual) reason for the arrest, if police normally do not exercise their discretion to arrest for that conduct. Here, because Plaintiffs fall within the Nieves exception and there is objective evidence of improper motive, Nieves’ default rule as to qualified immunity does not apply. . . Two more notes: the court has also explained why it is arguable whether probable cause existed to think that Shatina Grady interfered with police via her speech. That factual dispute also explains why qualified immunity is not appropriate in this instance. A ‘reasonable juror could conclude that no reasonable officer would perceive’ Shatina Grady as physically interfering with their investigation merely by yelling from a distance. . . If the officers nonetheless arrested her or ordered her arrest based on her speech (as they testified), any reasonable officer so motivated should have ‘immediately’ recognized the clearly established unlawfulness of arresting someone for the purpose of punishing their critical speech, when officers generally do not arrest people standing at a distance while only filming. . . As to Daniel Grady, the protection of qualified immunity is also not appropriate. The court has explained why a jury could find that he was arrested not for his mere failure to comply with a content-neutral restriction, but because police associated him with loud vocal criticism from himself or Shatina Grady. . . Police were aware that Daniel Grady himself was making only a few critical comments, and no reasonable jury could find that his speech was physically disruptive. Accepting (at this stage) that his arrest could have been caused by retaliatory motive, any reasonable officer subjectively entertaining that motive would have been aware of the unlawfulness of that arrest. Therefore, qualified immunity does not apply as to the Gradys’ First Amendment retaliation claim, and the motion for summary judgment on Count I is DENIED.”) Bridgewater v. Harris, No. 16-14112, 2020 WL 813388, at *7 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 19, 2020) (“Although probable cause generally will defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim, two exceptions exist in a case like this, where the defendant officers are being sued in their official capacity. The Supreme Court recently outlined one set of conditions that allow a First Amendment retaliation claim to proceed despite probable cause for an arrest. See Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1954–55 (2018). First, there must be an ‘official municipal policy of intimidation.’ . . . Second, the municipality must have ‘formed a premeditated plan’ to retaliate against the plaintiff. . . . Third, the plaintiff must present ‘objective evidence of a policy motivated by retaliation.’ . . . Fourth, there must be ‘little relation’ between the protected speech and the offense that led to the arrest. . . . Finally, the protected speech must be ‘high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values,’ such as the freedom to petition. . . . In addition to that very narrow exception, last year the Court recognized another situation when the no-probable-cause requirement does not apply. [citing Nieves] In particular, if ‘a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been,’ the existence of probable cause will not preclude a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . So unless the case falls under either of the two exceptions outlined in Lozman and Nieves, Bridgewater also must plead and prove that there was no probable cause for the arrest.”)

Lund v. City of Rockford, Illinois, 956 F.3d 938, 943–49 (7th Cir. 2020) (“Lund claims that the officers arrested him in retaliation for speech and news-gathering activities protected by the First Amendment. Lund’s concerns are not without basis. Nearly every authoring justice of the latest Supreme Court opinion on retaliatory arrest acknowledged “‘a risk that some police officers may exploit the arrest power as a means of suppressing speech.’” . . . Even while expressing concerns about abuse of police power for retaliatory arrests, the Nieves Court answered the only question posed in this case: Does ‘probable cause to make an arrest defeat[] a claim that the arrest was in retaliation for speech protected by the First Amendment?’ . . . The answer, the Supreme Court held (just thirty-nine days after the district court entered its opinion in this case), is ‘yes.’ . . . This answer definitively resolves the question presented by Lund in this case. At the time of Lund’s arrest, the officers had probable cause to arrest him for, at a minimum, driving a motorized vehicle the wrong way on a one-way street. Lund does not challenge this finding. Therefore his claim for retaliatory arrest fails. . . . Lund, however, proposes that his case squeezes through the crack of an opening that Nieves left ajar. . . . Lund asserts that his arrest for driving a vehicle the wrong way down a one-way street was, in fact, retaliation for his protected First Amendment journalistic activity. But to make this argument, Lund would have to present ‘objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . That language in Nieves implies that Lund would have to present objective evidence that the Rockford police rarely, if ever, arrest citizens who drive vehicles or, perhaps more specifically, motorized bicycles the wrong way down one-way streets. It is possible; however, Nieves has left open the possibility that Lund could demonstrate objective evidence of retaliation in some other way. Lund urges us to take the view of the concurring and dissenting Justice Gorsuch and dissenting Justice Sotomayor and apply the majority’s view of the exception ‘commonsensically.’ . . . Regardless of how we interpret the requirements of Nieves, however, Lund has not presented sufficient objective evidence of retaliation that would allow him to slip into the narrow exception to the rule which dictates that probable cause to arrest defeats a retaliatory arrest claim. Lund has made no attempt to present objective evidence showing that the police rarely make arrests for driving the wrong way on a one-way street, or that other similarly situated persons were not arrested, and he has not demonstrated retaliation in some other way. . . . We take no position as to whether Lund's behavior met the criteria for obstruction of justice, and we need not. The officers' reasonable belief that Lund's activities were obstructing, or might come to obstruct, their investigation was sufficient for them to stop Lund and ask him to move along. Although First Amendment activity is generally protected, it loses its protection when it violates the law. . . . And generally applicable laws, like those that prohibit interference with a police investigation, 'do not offend the First Amendment simply because their enforcement against the press has incidental effects on its ability to gather and report the news.' . . . It is possible, of course, that based on Lund's activities, a court might conclude that no reasonable officer could have construed his actions as constituting obstruction of justice. After all, reporters are free to take photos and videos of what they see on a public street, even when it involves police activity. . . . Again, however, we note that we need not delve into this question. The officers had a clear right to stop Lund, question him, and direct him to cease doing anything that placed their undercover investigation in jeopardy. We need not address the question of whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Lund for obstruction of justice, because whatever the officers reasonably believed about Lund's activities, and whether those activities in fact constituted obstruction of justice, did not matter in the end. Lund was not arrested until after his clear violation of an Illinois vehicular law—driving against the traffic pattern on a one-way street. . . . And Lund has not argued in this court that the officers did not have probable cause to arrest him for that offense. Lund has not supplied any 'objective evidence' that 'similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech' have not been and would not be arrested for driving the wrong way down a one-way street. . . . Although we might all agree that jaywalking—the example given in Nieves—is the type of law-breaking toward which most officers would turn a blind eye, it is less clear that officers routinely give a pass to persons driving motorized vehicles the wrong way on one-way streets, an action that could have fatal consequences. . . . In sum, it is clear that the officers had probable cause to arrest Lund for violating an Illinois traffic law. Probable cause defeats a retaliatory arrest claim in all but the most narrow of exceptions. . . . Lund has offered no evidence that his actions or arrest fall within that narrow exception. . . . [E]ven if Nieves did not apply retroactively, Lund still could not prevail, as the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Police officers are entitled to qualified immunity under section 1983 unless they 'violated a statutory or constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . . Three years before Lund's arrest, the Supreme Court was asked to decide two questions: 'whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest,' and second, 'whether clearly established law at the time of [the plaintiff's] arrest so held.' Reichle, 566 U.S. at 663. The Court passed on the first question, (but, as we just noted, answered it seven years later in Nieves, as we described above). The Court, in 2012, did, however, decide the second question and determined that at the time of the defendant's arrest in Reichle, 'it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment.' . . . At the time of Lund's arrest, therefore, the Supreme Court had specifically stated that it had ‘never recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.’. . This forecloses an argument that any reasonable officer would have understood that the First Amendment precluded Lund’s arrest. In short, no matter whether we apply the substantive holding of Nieves or look at the qualified immunity question presented in Reichle, Lund cannot prevail. None of Lund’s other arguments—including Lund’s arguments about the publication of his name, the officers’ subjective intent, and causation, among others—therefore, are relevant.”)

Cosby v. Rodriguez, 711 F.Supp.3d 983, ____ (N.D. Ill. 2024) (“Cosby’s arrest is not the only basis for his First Amendment claim. He also challenges the force used against him in carrying out his arrest. Indeed, Mr. Cosby’s First Amendment claim states that: ‘[t]he Defendant Officers retaliated against Plaintiff for engaging in protected speech by subjecting him to excessive force without legal justification and/or failing to intervene to prevent the use of excessive force.’. . If Officer Rodriguez was motivated by Mr. Cosby’s expressive conduct as a protestor to use excessive force in carrying out his (otherwise legitimate) arrest, Cosby’s First Amendment claim predicated on the excessive force could be colorable. Extrapolating from the principle evinced in the cases discussed above, an impermissible retaliatory motive could have fueled Officer Rodriguez’s use of excessive force as alleged in Mr. Cosby’s Complaint. In sum, Cosby’s claim that his arrest violated the First Amendment fails, but his allegation that the officers’ use of excessive force violated the First Amendment survives Rule 12(b)(6) challenge.”)

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Watson v. Boyd, 119 F.4th 539, 558-59 (8th Cir. 2024) (“In this particular claim, Watson is ‘alleging retaliatory use of force in violation of the First Amendment.’. . This type of claim is distinguishable from cases involving ‘a claim of retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment and an allegation of unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment,’ which ‘concern seizures.’. . We acknowledge that ‘a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim should not turn solely on the personal motive of the arresting officer’ because ‘subjective intent’ is not relevant ‘[i]n the Fourth Amendment context.’. . ‘But if there is an argument for extending the Nieves no-probable-cause requirement beyond a claim of retaliatory Fourth Amendment seizure, ... then [the defendants] ha[ve] not presented it.’. . In summary, the district court erred in failing to address Watson’s retaliatory use-of-force claim. Watson has presented sufficient evidence on this claim to withstand summary judgment.”)

Watson v. Boyd, 119 F.4th 539, 562-64 (8th Cir. 2024) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I respectfully dissent from Part II.A.2, which denies qualified immunity to Officer Eddie Boyd on Fred Watson’s use-of-force retaliation claim, as well as Part II.C, which denies summary judgment to the City of Ferguson (“City”) on Watson’s Monell claim. I would affirm the district court’s judgment in its entirety. Officer Boyd is entitled to qualified immunity, unless Watson shows that a genuine dispute of material fact exists on whether (1) he engaged in protected activity, (2) Officer Boyd took adverse action against him that would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing in the activity, and (3) that there was a but-for causal connection between his injury and Officer Boyd's alleged retaliatory animus. . . If there exists an 'obvious alternative explanation' for Officer Boyd's use of force, causation is missing. . . I agree with the court's analysis on (1) and (2). However, as to (3), the court believes that Officer Boyd is not entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable factfinder could conclude that there exists a but-for causal connection between Watson's request for Officer Boyd's name and badge number and Officer Boyd's pointing of his firearm at Watson. . . In my view, there is no genuine dispute of material fact on the issue of causation. Causation is missing because there exists an 'obvious alternative explanation' for Officer Boyd's use of force. . . Watson testified that his hands were placed on his car's steering wheel when he asked for Officer Boyd's name and badge number. After Officer Boyd refused to provide Watson with this information, Watson removed his hands from the steering wheel and grabbed his phone, which was on the 'console above the radio.' According to Watson, Officer Boyd began 'yelling and screaming [for Watson to] put the phone down' 'because of police safety.' Officer Boyd then called for backup and pointed his firearm at Watson. Thus, the 'obvious alternative explanation' for Officer Boyd's use of force was the intervening act where Watson reached for his phone. The court glosses over the existence of this intervening act, concluding that a genuine dispute of material fact exists because Watson had already returned his hands to the steering wheel by the time Officer Boyd pointed his firearm at him. . . However, this single act by Watson does not negate the rapid sequence of events that occurred prior to it. Watson admitted that Officer Boyd did not point his firearm at him immediately after he asked for Officer Boyd's name and badge number. It was only subsequent to that—after Officer Boyd observed Watson's aggressive hand motion for his phone—that Officer Boyd called for backup and pointed his firearm at Watson. The court does not properly consider this entire sequence of events and therefore takes a narrow view of the entire encounter. In doing so, the court holds Officer Boyd to a higher standard than is required to obtain qualified immunity. . . The court also suggests that the temporal proximity between Watson's request for Officer Boyd's name and badge number and Officer Boyd's subsequent display of force creates a genuine dispute of material fact on causation. Ante, at ——— – ———. As an initial matter, temporal proximity, without more, does not allow for an inference of a retaliatory motive. See Wilson v. Northcutt, 441 F.3d 586, 592 (8th Cir. 2006) ("Temporal proximity is relevant but not dispositive."). But, even more importantly, the court focuses on the temporal proximity between Watson's request and Officer Boyd's subsequent display of force while simultaneously ignoring that Watson's act of reaching for his phone occurred even closer in time to that display of force. The entire sequence of events dispositively shows that Officer Boyd pointed his firearm at Watson due to Watson having reached for his phone. A reasonable factfinder could not conclude otherwise. Officer Boyd was required to make a 'split-second judgment[]' in a 'tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' circumstance. . . Because Officer Boyd's use of force was justified by the existence of the intervening act (Watson reaching for his phone), Officer Boyd is entitled to qualified immunity on Watson's use-of-force retaliation claim. Accordingly, there is also no basis to hold the City liable on Monell. . . For these reasons, I respectfully dissent as to Parts II.A.2 and II.C of the court's opinion.")

Nieters v. Holtan, 83 F.4th 1099, 1110 (8th Cir. 2023) (“Nieters argues Officer Holtan committed two acts of retaliation: the use of force and the arrest. There is no debate whether the First Amendment protected Nieters’s activity at the protest. Nor do the parties question whether Officer Holtan’s actions would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing in the activity. The dispute centers on whether Nieters can establish but-for causation and the lack of probable cause for the retaliatory arrest claim. ‘Even viewing the facts in a light most favorable to [Nieters], causation is missing.’. . . Nieters must show he was ‘singled out because of [his] exercise of constitutional rights.’. . . Nieters fails to point to any evidence in the record to show that Nieters’s First Amendment expression was the but-for cause of Officer Holtan’s decision to arrest Nieters or to use force. Though Nieters points to Officer Holtan’s admission that he believed Nieters was a protestor, this statement is insufficient to show that Officer Holtan singled out Nieters from other protestors. Because Nieters failed to show the causal connection between his protected expression and Officer Holtan’s adverse action, we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment.”)

Murphy v. Schmitt, No. 22-1726, 2023 WL 5748752, at *2 (8th Cir. Sept. 6, 2023) (not reported) (Grasz, J., dissenting) (The First Amendment prohibits a police officer from retaliating against an individual for engaging in protected speech. Murphy alleged Officer Schmitt arrested him because he challenged whether Officer Schmitt could force him to provide his name. The majority concludes that Murphy failed to state a claim because Officer Schmitt had probable cause to arrest Murphy for walking on the wrong side of the road. I respectfully dissent. Because Murphy plausibly asserted that the Sunrise Beach Police Department does not regularly enforce this law, his First Amendment retaliation claim survives under the exception adopted by the Supreme Court in Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715 (2019). . . . At the time Murphy was arrested in 2021, this constitutional right was clearly established. . . . Thus, Officer Schmitt has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the face of the complaint.”)

Welch v. Dempsey, 51 F.4th 809, 812-13 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Probable cause is a constitutional standard under the Fourth Amendment that must be satisfied in order to conduct a search or seizure. Dempsey does not argue that this case involves a search or seizure, and he does not explain why the asserted existence of “arguable probable cause” would be dispositive as a matter of law on a claim alleging retaliatory use of force in violation of the First Amendment. His cited authorities concern seizures: a claim of retaliatory arrest under the First Amendment, Just v. City of St. Louis, 7 F.4th 761, 768-69 (8th Cir. 2021), and an allegation of unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment, Peterson, 754 F.3d at 598. Nieves held that a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim should not turn solely on the personal motive of the arresting officer, explaining that ‘i]n the Fourth Amendment context,’ the Court has ‘almost uniformly rejected invitations to probe subjective intent.’. . . But if there is an argument for extending the Nieves no-probable-cause requirement beyond a claim of retaliatory Fourth Amendment seizure, for which the most analogous common law tort is false imprisonment or malicious prosecution, then Dempsey has not presented it. . . . When Dempsey used force against Welch, . . . she was standing alone on a public sidewalk streaming a live video on her phone. Dempsey did not, during the twelve seconds that he was on the scene, develop arguable probable cause that Welch was rioting or engaged in an unlawful assembly under Iowa law. Dempsey’s arguments thus do not undermine the district court’s conclusion that Welch’s right to be free from a retaliatory use of force was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . For these reasons, the order of the district court denying qualified immunity on Welch’s claim alleging retaliatory use of force in violation of the First Amendment is affirmed.”)

Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 897-98 (8th Cir. 2022) (“[W]e need not address the argument pressed by Mitchell and amici First Amendment scholars that if the complaint’s allegations are true, then the bridge closure violated the First Amendment. Officers merely carrying out their duty as they understand it are not liable for retaliatory arrest or retaliatory use of force even if their understanding of their duty is mistaken—indeed, even if it is so mistaken as to be ‘unreasonable.’ To be sure, they may be liable for unlawful arrest or use of excessive force. . . But constitutional torts of retaliation require acting on retaliatory animus. Here, Mitchell failed to plead facts that make an inference of retaliatory animus plausible. Therefore, his claims for retaliatory arrest and retaliatory use of force were subject to dismissal even assuming the First Amendment protected his right to assemble and speak on the bridge.”)

Thurairajah v. City of Fort Smith, Arkansas, 925 F.3d 979, 985 n.5 (8th Cir. 2019) (“Because we conclude that ‘Trooper Cross lacked even arguable probable cause for an arrest and thus violated Thurairajah’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure,’ . . . the Supreme Court’s recent decision holding that a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim fails as a matter of law when the arrest is based on probable cause is inapposite. See Nieves v. Bartlett, No. 17-1174, — U.S. —, — S.Ct. —, — L.Ed.2d —, 2019 WL 2257157 (U.S. May 8, 2019).”)

Franks v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:19 CV 2663 RWS, 2022 WL 1062035, at *5–6 (E.D. Mo. Apr. 8, 2022) (“[W]ith respect to Franks’ First Amendment retaliation claim, I need not determine whether Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray constituted excessive force. I must only determine whether a reasonable jury could find that: (1) Franks engaged in protected activity, (2) Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was an adverse action taken against Franks that would deter an ordinary person from continuing in protected activity, and (3) Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated at least in part by Franks’ exercise of protected activity. The parties have presented very little evidence of what Franks was doing in the moments leading up to Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray. The evidence that has been presented indicates only that Franks was standing near—and possibly behind—Brandy and recording the scene. . . While participating in a protest and recording police officers performing their duties in public are generally protected activities, and the use of pepper spray may be an adverse action that would deter an ordinary person from continuing in protected activity, Franks has failed to present sufficient evidence showing that Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated, even in part, by her exercise of these activities. Indeed, a reasonable jury could not find that Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks’ act of recording the scene because there is little, if any, evidence that Officer Olsten was even aware that Franks was recording the scene. . . Based on the present record, a reasonable jury could also not find that Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks’ actions at the protest because there is no evidence that Franks was identified or targeted by Officer Olsten. . . Rather than showing that Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated by Franks’ exercise of protected activity, the evidence tends to show that it was motivated instead by other protestors. . . . Because Franks has failed to present sufficient evidence showing that Officer Olsten’s deployment of pepper spray was motivated by her exercise of protected activity, Officer Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks’ First Amendment retaliation claim. Accordingly, summary judgment will be granted to Officer Olsten on Count I.”)

Murray v. McNutt, No. 2:18-CV-63 KGB, 2019 WL 5485589, at *7, *10 (E.D. Ark. Oct. 24, 2019) (“Because there was probable cause to support seizure of the truck and an arrest of Mr. Murray, and because this is not a case in which an exception to the probable cause requirement has been recognized, the Court grants summary judgment in favor of Deputy McNutt on Mr. Murray’s First Amendment claim. . . .When applying the recognized exception to Albright set forth in Moran, the Eighth Circuit has indicated that probable cause must be lacking for the case to proceed. . . If probable cause exists for the seizure of the truck and Mr. Murray’s arrest, then Deputy McNutt’s alleged demand for money to make the charges go away and Mr. Murray’s purported refusal to pay the demand were not the sole cause of the actions about which Mr. Murray complains. Further, if a lack of probable cause is required to state a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim in this context, that requirement makes the law for Fourteenth Amendment claims consistent with the law governing First Amendment retaliation claims based on arrest. See Nieves, 139 S.Ct. 1715. However, it is unclear if proof of lack of probable cause is required to state a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim on the facts alleged here. Because the Court can find no case in which an allegation of extortion has been examined in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim, because the parties cite the Court to none, and more specifically because the Court is unaware of a case decided by the Supreme Court or the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals that specifies the level of causation required to state such a claim, the Court grants Deputy McNutt qualified immunity on the basis that such a right is not clearly established. If Deputy McNutt engaged in the alleged attempt to extort money from Mr. Murray, his purported conduct was thoroughly offensive and particularly reprehensible for a government official in the course of his official duties. . . However, for the reasons explained, the Court grants Deputy McNutt qualified immunity on Mr. Murray’s Fourteenth Amendment claim against him in his individual capacity.”)

NINTH CIRCUIT

Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 61-64 (9th Cir. 2022) (“To evaluate whether there is a constitutional violation, we apply the current law. See Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 678 (9th Cir. 2021). Accordingly, the retaliatory arrest framework stated by the Supreme Court in Nieves governs here. . . . To be sure, the Nieves exception applies only ‘when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Detective Tucker contends that Plaintiffs’ claims do not fall within the Nieves exception because the evidence does not support their allegations that they were singled out based on a retaliatory motive. But Plaintiffs presented objective evidence showing that they were arrested while others who chalked and did not engage in anti-police speech were not arrested. During discovery, Metro produced records indicating only two instances in which chalkers were suspected of or charged with violating Nevada’s graffiti statute. In these two instances, only one individual was cited—not arrested—for chalking on public property. There is no evidence that anyone besides the Plaintiffs has been arrested for chalking on the sidewalk. Additionally, the Plaintiffs presented evidence that other individuals chalking at the courthouse at the same time as Plaintiffs were not arrested. This is the kind of ‘objective evidence’ required by the Nieves exception to show that a plaintiff was ‘arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . If chalking on sidewalks violates Nevada law, committing the offense in Las Vegas is much like jaywalking in that both are offenses for which ‘officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . Similar to jaywalking, if chalking constitutes an offense, it is an offense for which ‘probable cause does little to prove or disprove the causal connection between animus and injury.’ . . . Thus, Plaintiffs have shown differential treatment of similarly situated individuals, satisfying the Nieves exception. . . . “[T]he district court correctly concluded that a reasonable jury could find that the anti-police content of Plaintiffs’ chalkings was a substantial or motivating factor for Detective Tucker’s declarations of arrest. . . . Detective Tucker had previously engaged with Plaintiffs, challenging a chalked message that indicated no Metro officer had ever been prosecuted for murder. In the declarations of arrest, he explicitly included Plaintiffs’ association with anti-police groups and the critical content of their messages. Moreover, rather than cite Plaintiffs—which the evidence showed was an extremely rare occurrence to begin with—Detective Tucker sought arrest warrants. Coupled with the evidence of differential treatment already discussed, a reasonable jury could find that the anti-police content of Plaintiffs’ chalkings was a substantial or motivating factor for effecting the arrest. . . . Viewing the evidence and drawing all reasonable inferences in the favor of Plaintiffs, a jury could conclude that Detective Tucker violated Plaintiffs’ First Amendment rights. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether their constitutional right was violated and have satisfied one part of the qualified immunity inquiry.”) Ballentine v. Tucker, 28 F.4th 54, 64-67 (9th Cir. 2022) (“To determine if a right was clearly established, ‘[t]he relevant inquiry is whether, at the time of the officers’ action, the state of the law gave the officers fair warning that their conduct was unconstitutional.’ . . . Accordingly, we look to the state of the law that concerned conduct at the time of the challenged police action. At the outset, Detective Tucker argues that the law was not clearly established at the time of his conduct in 2013 because the Supreme Court’s decision in Nieves did not clarify the appropriate standard for First Amendment retaliation claims until 2019. But a right can also be clearly established by this circuit’s precedent. . . . Contrary to Detective Tucker’s characterization of Plaintiffs’ claims, Plaintiffs did not merely ‘describe the “clearly established” right in general terms like “retaliatory law enforcement action.”’ . . . Rather, Plaintiffs defined the right as ‘the right to be free from retaliatory law enforcement action even when probable cause existed for that action.’ . . In so doing, Plaintiffs defined the right as we did in Skoog and Ford. . . Thus, at the time of Detective Tucker’s conduct in July 2013, binding Ninth Circuit precedent gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to arrest Plaintiffs in retaliation for their First Amendment activity, notwithstanding the existence of probable cause. . . . Detective Tucker argues that our decision in Acosta, 718 F.3d at 806, created uncertainty as to the state of the law. But Detective Tucker misunderstands Acosta. There, police arrested Acosta in January 2006 for violating a municipal ordinance prohibiting disorderly conduct at city council meetings. . . We correctly concluded that ‘at the time of the Council meeting,’ there was no clearly established right to be free from a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Since Acosta only addressed the state of the law in January 2006, it has no effect on the state of the law in July 2013, the time of Detective Tucker’s conduct. Neither Skoog nor Ford had any place in the Acosta inquiry. In contrast, by the time of Detective Tucker’s conduct in 2013, Skoog had clearly established the right. That the decision in Acosta was issued in 2013 is therefore irrelevant because the decisive inquiry is the state of the law at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . Finally, Detective Tucker argues that the facts of then-existing case law are distinguishable from the facts of this case. But ‘[a] right can be clearly established despite a lack of factually analogous preexisting case law, and officers can be on notice that their conduct is unlawful even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . By the time of Detective Tucker’s conduct, Ninth Circuit precedent had long provided notice to officers that ‘an individual has a right to be free from retaliatory police action, even if probable cause existed for that action.’ . . Detective Tucker’s belief that his conduct was not unlawful because he thoroughly investigated and made the decision to arrest after lesser alternatives failed does not vitiate such notice. A reasonable officer in Detective Tucker’s position had fair notice that the First Amendment prohibited arresting Plaintiffs for the content of their speech, notwithstanding probable cause. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to Detective Tucker.”)

Bello-Reyes v. Gaynor, 985 F.3d 696, 698, 700-01 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2021) (“This case requires us to consider whether the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Nieves v. Bartlett. . . applies to a noncitizen’s claim that Immigration and Customs Enforcement (“ICE”) unconstitutionally retaliated against him for his speech when revoking his bond and re-arresting him. Jose Bello-Reyes (“Bello”) had been detained by ICE and released on bond in 2018. On May 13, 2019, Bello spoke at a rally and read a poem of his own writing, entitled ‘Dear America.’ In this poem, he publicly criticized ICE enforcement and detention practices. Less than thirty-six hours later, ICE revoked his bond and re-arrested him. The Government contends that ICE had probable cause to arrest Bello, and thus his retaliatory arrest argument fails under Nieves. . . We agree with Bello, however, that the distinctions between Nieves and Bello’s habeas petition indicate that Nieves should not control in this case. We reverse and remand for the application of the standard from Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle[.] . . . We conclude that Nieves, a suit for damages brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and arising out of a criminal arrest, should not be extended to Bello’s habeas challenge to his bond revocation. . . .For at least these reasons, in combination, Nieves is not applicable here. First, problems of causation that may counsel for a no probable cause standard are less acute in the habeas context. In § 1983 suits, it is necessary to identify the particular state official or officials who violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Not so in habeas: the petitioner need not identify a particular violator, only that his confinement is unconstitutional. . . Second, Nieves does not apply here because it arose out of the criminal arrest context, where 'evidence of the presence or absence of probable cause for the arrest will be available in virtually every retaliatory arrest case.' . . This reasoning does not translate to the immigration bond revocation context. While a probable cause requirement exists for initial immigration arrests, . . . no equivalent benchmark exists where ICE is revoking bond rather than arresting in the first instance. Instead, the decision is completely discretionary. . . Since the Nieves rule depended on this objective benchmark of a reasonable arrest, extending it to this situation would effectively eliminate almost any prospect of obtaining release on habeas for actually retaliatory, unconstitutional immigration bond revocation. As long as those authorizing the bond revocation exercised discretion (as opposed to acting automatically or arbitrarily) there could ordinarily be no release on habeas. . . We need not define the precise extent of Nieves's applicability in the immigration context here. . . However, we decline to extend a rule this closely dependent on § 1983 case law and the particularities of criminal arrests to Bello's habeas petition. We conclude that Nieves does not control in this case.⁷ [fn.7: Because Nieves does not control, the presence of probable cause for ICE's revocation of Bello's bond is not dispositive. However, even if Nieves did apply, we doubt that it would foreclose Bello's claim. The warrant that the Government alleges establishes probable cause only establishes probable cause for his initial immigration arrest. . . There was no need for ICE to have independent probable cause to revoke Bello's bond.] Because Nieves does not control, we remand to the district court to apply the Mt. Healthy standard, the default rule for First Amendment retaliation claims.")

Lopez v. City of Glendora, 811 F. App'x 1016, ____ n.7 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Kodadek argues that Lopez must also plead and prove the absence of reasonable cause for the pat-down and use of force in light of Nieves v. Bartlett, __ U.S. __, __, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1725, 204 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2019). We assume without deciding that Nieves would apply to this case, but because a jury could conclude that no reasonable suspicion justified the pat-down and that the force was excessive, the Nieves requirements are satisfied.")

Capp v. County of San Diego, 940 F.3d 1046, 1056-58 (9th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e conclude that the mere existence of a legitimate motive, supported though it might be by the FAC, is insufficient to mandate dismissal. If Firth would not have made the recommendation absent retaliatory animus, there could still be a viable retaliation claim. . . And Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that retaliatory animus was a but-for cause of Firth's actions. We find instructive the Supreme Court's decision in Nieves. There, the Court held that plaintiffs bringing 'First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims' must generally 'plead and prove the absence of probable cause.' . . In 'retaliatory arrest cases,' the Court explained, there is 'a tenuous causal connection between the defendant's alleged animus and the plaintiff's injury.' . . If the plaintiff demonstrates that the arresting officer lacked probable cause, that showing bridges the causal gap by 'reinforc[ing] the retaliation evidence and show[ing] that retaliation was the but-for basis' of the official's action. . . But the Court carved out an exception to the ‘no-probable-cause requirement’ in retaliatory arrest cases. . . That requirement does ‘not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . A plaintiff who shows differential treatment ‘addresses [the] causal concern by helping to establish that “non-retaliatory grounds [we]re in fact insufficient to provoke the adverse consequences.”’. . . In this case, Plaintiffs have pleaded both a lack of any substantiated concern for the children’s safety (which may well be the equivalent of probable cause in this context). . . and differential treatment. These allegations together support the inference that Firth was motivated by retaliatory animus. . . . At summary judgment or at trial, Defendants could well marshal evidence that Firth and her colleagues were motivated primarily by their legal obligation to investigate allegations of child abuse, and would have made the custody recommendation for that reason alone. . . . But Plaintiffs plead that Defendants, Firth included, ‘were purely motivated by their desire to retaliate against’ Capp, acted ‘without proper reason or authority’ and ‘without reasonable probable cause,’ and ‘ma[de] false and misleading statements to retaliate against [Capp] and in order to unduly influence and threaten [Debora] to file an application with the Family court.’ Taking these allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, and emphasizing the liberal pleading standard afforded to pro se litigants, we conclude that Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that retaliation was the but-for motive for Firth’s actions. Plaintiffs therefore plead a plausible First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

American News and Information Services, Inc. v. Gore, 778 F. App’x 429, ____ (9th Cir. 2019) (“The district court correctly dismissed Playford’s First Amendment retaliatory arrest, search, and seizure claims against the arresting officers, though it did so based on qualified immunity. The Supreme Court recently held that ‘[t]he plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’ Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1724 (2019). Playford concedes that the officers had probable cause for his first three arrests, and the allegations in the complaint about his fourth arrest on May 25, 2012, for violation of California Penal Code § 148(a)(1), establish the existence of probable cause for that arrest. Because Playford has not demonstrated that an exception to the no-probable-cause requirement applies, see Nieves, 139 S. Ct. at 1727; Lozman v. City of Rivera Beach, 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1951, 1954–55 (2018), his claims fail as a matter of law. Because we can affirm on any basis fairly presented in the record, . . . we affirm the dismissal of these claims.”)

Bressi v. Pima County Board of Supervisors, No. CV-18-00186-TUC-DCB, 2020 WL 1904620, at *4 (D. Ariz. Apr. 17, 2020) (“Plaintiff claims that Deputy Sheriff Roher arrested and charged him with blocking the traffic lane in retaliation for refusing to answer USBP agent’s citizenship question. In this context, Defendants assert that a finding of probable cause for an arrest defeats a retaliatory arrest claim. Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S.Ct. 1715 (2019). Defendants have not, however, established that there was probable cause for the arrest. The Plaintiff alleges that he was told to not move his vehicle out of the primary inspection land by the USBP agent, Sheriff Roher knew this, and the Plaintiff promptly moved his vehicle when Sheriff Roher told him to pull through the checkpoint. Plaintiff alleges he was falsely imprisoned by Defendant Roher when he was ‘handcuffed and prevented from leaving his location outside of the checkpoint,’ . . . without ‘probable suspicion’ of any crime or state traffic violation[.] . . Plaintiff alleges facts supporting a constitutional claim that he was illegally seized without probable cause. Deputy Roher and Deputy Kunze are not entitled to qualified immunity on the facts as alleged by the Plaintiff, without evidence that the arrest was supported by probable cause or that a reasonable officer would have believed probable cause existed for the arrest.”)

Meade v. Smith, No. C17-4034-LTS, 2020 WL 1180410, at *11 (N.D. Iowa Mar. 11, 2020) (“While showing an absence of probable cause is clearly required for some First-Amendment retaliation claims, the requirement does not apply in all cases. Meade does not allege retaliatory arrest or retaliatory prosecution as the basis for his claim. Instead, he challenges other actions by Smith that allegedly caused harm before any arrest or prosecution occurred. I am aware of no binding authority requiring a plaintiff to prove a lack of probable cause under these circumstances. And, in fact, the reasons outlined in Hartman and Nieves for adopting a no-probable-cause element are generally absent here. If Meade were challenging only Smith’s decision to investigate Meade, or the search warrant itself, requiring Meade to show a lack of probable-cause would likely be justified. . . Probable cause for these actions would fulfill the same role as it does for arrests and prosecutions by providing ‘a “distinct body of highly valuable circumstantial evidence” that is “apt to prove or disprove” whether retaliatory animus actually caused the injury.’. Here, however, Meade challenges the manner in which Smith carried out his investigatory activities, not the mere fact of the investigation. Viewing the record most favorably to Meade, it is obvious that Smith went above and beyond normal investigatory tactics. . . . In short, when viewed most favorably to Meade, there are genuine issues of fact for trial on Meade’s First Amendment retaliation claim. Meade is not required to demonstrate a lack of probable cause for the actions he challenges and there is sufficient evidence to show that ‘the presumption of regularity accorded to prosecutorial decisionmaking’ should be suspended and to raise a genuine issue about retaliatory motive. . . Even if the eventual prosecution against Meade may have been supported by probable cause, that would not retroactively shield Smith from liability for prior wrongful acts. . . Smith is not entitled to summary judgment on Meade’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Bledsoe v. Ferry County, Washington, No. 2:19-CV-227-RMP, 2020 WL 376611, at *4-6 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 23, 2020) (“Generally, the plaintiff in a First Amendment retaliation case must also plead and prove a lack of probable cause. See Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1727 (2019); see also Hartman, 547 U.S. at 261. However, the Supreme Court recently has clarified the want of probable cause requirement in the context of retaliatory arrests. In Nieves v. Bartlett, the Court explained that, ‘[a]lthough probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim, a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’. . . The Supreme Court’s exception, as explained in Nieves, recognizes that requiring the plaintiff to plead and prove lack of probable cause in every First Amendment retaliation case does not sufficiently protect First Amendment rights. Ms. Bledsoe’s Complaint properly states the first element of her First Amendment retaliation claim, as she alleged that she engaged in constitutionally protected activity by writing political messages in chalk in a public forum. Second, the Court considers whether Defendants' action would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to exercise her First Amendment rights. Ms. Bledsoe has alleged that the Commissioners' Office encouraged and directed her prosecution. . . She claims that Commissioner Blankenship asked the prosecuting attorney to seek the harshest penalty possible under the malicious mischief statute. . . Facing criminal prosecution and a possible penalty of up to one year in jail would chill a person of ordinary firmness from continuing to exercise her right to free speech. Third, Ms. Bledsoe has alleged facts that, if taken as true, show that the protected activity was a substantial motivating factor contributing to her prosecution. Ms. Bledsoe claims that her messages were designed to encourage citizens to oppose Commissioner Blankenship at a public meeting. . . In response to Ms. Bledsoe's chalking, Commissioner Blankenship allegedly told the Prosecuting Attorney's Office that Ms. Bledsoe should be imprisoned for one year and fined $5,000. . . Ms. Bledsoe states that no other person in the City of Republic has been prosecuted, imprisoned, or fined for writing on the sidewalk in chalk. . . From these factual allegations, the Court draws the reasonable inference that the content of Ms. Bledsoe's messages, rather than Ms. Bledsoe's act of chalking, caused Defendants to seek her prosecution. Therefore, Ms. Bledsoe has stated facts sufficient to show that her alleged protected activity, engaging in political speech via chalked messages, was a substantial factor motivating Defendants' conduct. Fourth, the Court considers whether Defendants 'induced the prosecutor to bring charges that would not have been initiated without [their] urging.' . . As already explained, Ms. Bledsoe's allegations indicate that Defendants in the Commissioner's Office initiated and directed her prosecution. Additionally, . . . Ms. Bledsoe's Complaint contains factual allegations showing that Defendants induced the prosecutor to bring charges that would not have been brought otherwise. Finally, the Court considers whether Ms. Bledsoe has alleged a lack of probable cause. The charges against Ms. Bledsoe were dismissed because, according to Judge Brown, writing in chalk is not property damage, which is an essential element of RCW 9A.48.090(a), the crime for which Ms. Bledsoe was charged. . . Defendants argue that probable cause existed to prosecute Ms. Bledsoe under RCW 9A.48.090(b), a different subsection of Washington's third-degree malicious mischief statute that does not require proof of property damage. However, Ms. Bledsoe was not charged with violating RCW 9A.48.090(b). Therefore, the Court finds that Ms. Bledsoe's Complaint demonstrates that there was a lack of probable cause 'to bring the criminal charge' against her. . . Alternatively, the Court finds that Ms. Bledsoe is not required under Nieves to plead and prove a lack of probable cause, as Ms. Bledsoe has alleged facts demonstrating that chalking on public sidewalks rarely, if ever, is prosecuted. . . The Court emphasizes that this finding is made at an early stage of the proceedings, under the 12(b)(6) standard. For the foregoing reasons, Ms. Bledsoe has alleged a viable First Amendment retaliation claim.")

Taylor v. Vangesen, No. C18-5682 BHS, 2019 WL 4980436, at *6 (W.D. Wash. Oct. 8, 2019) ("Taylor argues that VanGesen had no probable cause to arrest him for obstruction because he complied with VanGesen's instructions to get out of the car, walk to the back, and submit to a pat-down. . . Taylor alleges that he was arrested only after he implied that the stop was based on race through his statement that ‘we both know this isn’t about the brake light,’ and for twice objecting to VanGesen’s excessive use of force. In his motion, VanGesen argues the only way to interpret Taylor’s pled facts is to find probable cause existed and the arrest was not based on Taylor’s speech. . . The Court finds that as Taylor plausibly alleges he complied with VanGesen’s instructions, Taylor has plausibly alleged that he was arrested without probable cause. Having plausibly alleged a lack of probable cause, actual causation of the arrest becomes a question of fact, and so Taylor has sufficiently alleged VanGesen arrested him based on protected speech. Therefore, the Court denies VanGesen’s motion on Taylor’s First Amendment claim. . . . Regarding qualified immunity to Taylor’s Fourteenth Amendment and Fourth Amendment claims, VanGesen argues that Taylor would have to prove ‘initiating a traffic stop for an equipment malfunction on a motor vehicle operated by a person of a different race’ violates clearly-established rights. . . This clearly mischaracterizes Taylor’s position. Taylor does not argue police may not stop motorists of another race for legitimate traffic infractions. Taylor alleges VanGesen had no reason to suspect he had committed a traffic infraction and instead stopped him based only on his race. . . It appears that as alleged VanGesen’s actions would violate the clearly-established right under the Fourteenth Amendment not to be stopped by police based only on race, . . . and the clearly-established right under the Fourth Amendment not to be seized without reasonable suspicion[.] . . Regarding qualified immunity to Taylor’s First Amendment claim, VanGesen argues that there was probable cause to arrest Taylor for obstructing an officer. . . However, that conclusion would require the Court to find that Taylor’s position, that no probable cause existed, is implausible. Notwithstanding VanGesen’s argument that the Kitsap County District Court found probable cause, the Court finds it is plausible that as alleged, Taylor complied with VanGesen’s commands to the point that probable cause for arrest was not present and so Taylor was arrested on the basis of his protected speech. Arrest only on the basis of protected speech violates clearly established First Amendment rights. . . Therefore, the Court finds that VanGesen has not shown he is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ballentine v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep’t, No. 17-16728, 2019 WL 2807848, at *1 (9th Cir. July 2, 2019) (not reported) (“In Nieves v. Bartlett, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff pursuing a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim must generally plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest. . . The Court noted, however, ‘that the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . Because neither the district court nor the parties had the benefit of Nieves when the order on appeal was decided, we vacate that order and remand for further proceedings in light of Nieves.”)

Thomas v. Cassia County, Idaho, No. 4:17-CV-00256-DCN, 2019 WL 5270200, at *8–9 (D. Idaho Oct. 17, 2019) (“Akers recently filed a Motion to Reconsider based on the United States Supreme Court’s decision in Nieves v. Bartlett, 139 S. Ct. 1715 (2019). . . In Nieves, the Supreme Court held that a ‘plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’ . . This holding abrogates the validity of Ford v. Yakima, 706 F.3d 1188 (9th Cir. 2013), upon which this Court’s analysis previously relied, allowing Thomas’ First Amendment retaliation claim to survive summary judgment. As stated above, a plaintiff alleging a retaliatory arrest claim must ‘plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’. The Supreme Court explained further that the absence of probable cause will ‘generally provide weighty evidence that the officer’s animus caused the arrest, whereas the presence of probable cause will suggest the opposite.’. This is because ‘probable cause speaks to the objective reasonableness of an arrest.’. The Supreme Court did identify a narrow exception to this rule in Nieves. It explained that ‘the no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’. Since the Court has determined probable cause existed for Thomas’ arrest, Thomas cannot prevail on his First Amendment retaliation claim unless the exception set forth in Nieves applies. As will be explained more fully below, the Court will reopen discovery for ninety (90) days on this limited issue. . . . Although Nieves dealt with a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, the same logic, analysis, and principles apply to a Second Amendment retaliatory arrest claim as well. The Supreme Court used broad language applicable to any retaliatory arrest claim when it said ‘[t]he plaintiff pressing a retaliatory arrest claim must plead and prove the absence of probable cause for the arrest.’. There are also important policy considerations that apply equally well to both First and Second Amendment retaliation claims. In Nieves, the Supreme Court explained that in retaliatory arrest cases, it is ‘particularly difficult to determine whether the adverse government action was caused by the officer’s malice or the plaintiff’s potentially criminal conduct.’. . Obviously, a subjective inquiry into the mental state of an arresting officer is problematic. . . There are also ‘overwhelming litigation risks’ and the Supreme Court ‘generally review[s] [police officer] conduct under objective standards of reasonableness’ to ‘ensure that officers may go about their work without undue apprehension of being sued.’. Based on the similar legal standards that apply to both First and Second Amendment retaliation claim, as well as policy concerns that apply equally well to both situations, the Court intends to apply the Nieves holding to the merits of Thomas’ Second Amendment retaliation claim. However, as just noted, the Court will reopen discovery for ninety (90) days on the limited issue of whether evidence exists that triggers the Nieves exception. Once this discovery window has closed, and the parties have filed their supplemental briefing, the Court will address the merits of Akers’ Motion for Reconsideration.”) Henneberry v. City of Newark, No. 13-CV-05238-TSH, 2019 WL 4194275, at *5, *7, *9 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 4, 2019) (“In their motion, Defendants argue that Henneberry’s First Amendment retaliation claim is barred because the Court has already determined Fredstrom had probable cause to arrest him, and the Supreme Court’s holding in Nieves establishes that a retaliation claim must fail in such circumstances. . . Defendants acknowledge that Nieves ‘provides a “narrow qualification” to its ruling, setting forth that the “no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff provides objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.”’. However, they argue this exception is inapplicable here because the Supreme Court explained that ‘this narrow exception is warranted “for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.”’.

. Defendants note that the offense in question here is trespassing, which they argue cannot be characterized as a crime for which officers rarely affect an arrest. . . Defendants further argue there is no evidence that probable cause existed to arrest any other attendee at the Event. . . Defendants note that, in denying their motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, Judge James relied upon Ford, but they argue Ford is no longer viable after Nieves. . . They now request the Court reexamine the decision because Henneberry cannot establish that Fredstrom ‘was “plainly incompetent” or “knowingly violated the law,” such that no reasonable officer could conclude his actions were lawful.’ . . Henneberry notes there are two sets of events at issue here: (1) his arrest and (2) whether Fredstrom’s decision and actions to book, transport, and jail him were in retaliation for his speech. . . Henneberry maintains his First Amendment claim is grounded on the latter, ‘on the conduct and punishment flowing from his arrest,’ including his transportation to Santa Rita Jail and detention there for approximately 30 hours. . . ‘As a result, Nieves’s general rule that a plaintiff must plead and prove an absence of probable cause, and that a finding of probable cause precludes a retaliatory arrest claim, does not apply.’ . . Henneberry argues that, even if Nieves’s general rule were to apply to his claims, they fall within the exception to that rule because he was arrested and jailed for misdemeanor trespass under California Penal Code section 602, ‘[b]ut hardly anyone is arrested or cited for this offense.’ . . To the extent the Court determines there is insufficient evidence to make this determination, Henneberry requests it deny or defer Defendants’ motion under Rule 56(d) while discovery is reopened. . . Finally, Henneberry argues Fredstrom is not entitled to qualified immunity ‘because at the time of his conduct here, it was clearly established that an officer “could not exercise his discretion to book an individual in retaliation for that individual’s First Amendment activity.”’ . . . Given that Fredstrom had probable cause to arrest Henneberry, it is clear that Nieves would not permit Henneberry to pursue a First Amendment retaliation claim based on that arrest. Defendants argue Henneberry also cannot satisfy Nieves’s no probable cause requirement as to the subsequent actions because they were tied to the initial arrest. . . However, it is not clear that Nieves protects an officer from all subsequent action after an arrest, which here includes Fredstrom’s decision to transport Henneberry to the Newark Police Department, his decision not to ‘field cite’ him at the Newark Police Station and to instead transport him to Fremont City Jail, and Henneberry’s ultimate transfer to Santa Rita Jail, where he was jailed for 30 hours. Henneberry alleges these actions were all in retaliation for his speech. As Judge James observed in her decision, Henneberry’s claim is based on the ‘narrow question: whether Fredstrom’s desire to chill Plaintiff from engaging in future First Amendment activities was a but for cause of his decision not to cite and release Plaintiff from the Newark Police Department.’ . . Given the post-arrest conduct at issue here, it is not clear that Nieves prohibits such claims. . . Even if Nieves were to immunize all post-arrest conduct, Henneberry argues his claims fall within an exception to Nieves’s general rule. . . In Nieves, the Court emphasized that ‘[a]lthough probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim,’ there is an exception when officers have probable cause but typically exercise their discretion not to make arrests. . . Thus, the ‘no-probable-cause requirement should not apply when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . Henneberry contends that is the case here because Newark Police records show they rarely cite or arrest individuals for the offenses for which he was arrested and jailed. . . He cites to records showing that from 2012 to present, there were only 14 citations or bookings for violations of California Penal Code sections 602(o) or 602.1(a) by the Newark Police. . . Thus, even if the Court were to conclude that Henneberry's First Amendment retaliation claim is a retaliatory arrest claim like that in Nieves, he argues this exception applies and he is not required to plead and prove an absence of probable cause. . . Alternatively, if the Court finds that the Newark Police records do not establish that his claim falls within Nieves's exception, Henneberry argues Defendants' motion still should be denied or deferred pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) for additional discovery related to police records and discretion regarding arrests under California Penal Code section 602. While the standard for this 'narrow qualification' has not been further clarified since Nieves, the Supreme Court used the example of jaywalking, which 'is endemic but rarely results in arrest.' . . That could be the case here, where it is undisputed that for several years leading up to the Event, Henneberry attended many, if not every, City Council meeting held by the City of Newark, that he actively criticized City officials, and that he was well known to Defendants Becker, Fredstrom, and Ashley because he was disruptive and complained too much. Within a few minutes of Henneberry sitting down in the gallery, Ashley informed him he needed to leave because he had not made a reservation, yet Ashley did not check whether persons in the gallery had reservations. After Henneberry stated he felt he was entitled to attend the meeting under the Brown Act, Fredstrom was dispatched to the Event 'because there was some type of disturbance involving Mr. Henneberry.' There is no evidence he was loud, used inappropriate language, was confrontational, or abusive. There is also no dispute that, while Henneberry was seated, Fredstrom and Lawson grabbed him by the hands and arms and escorted him out of the building using a rear wrist lock, handcuffed him and arrested him. Given Henneberry's reputation as a vocal critic of City officials, coupled with his proffered evidence regarding Newark Police's citations for trespass in similar circumstances, the Court finds the Nieves exception could apply. . . As discussed above, Henneberry has established the existence of genuine dispute as to whether Fredstrom violated his First Amendment rights by retaliating against him for his free speech activities. Thus, the Court must determine whether Fredstrom violated clearly established law at the time of his actions. Judge James found it was 'clearly established in April 2013 that officers could not exercise their discretion to "automatically" book individuals even though they had probable cause to arrest them if the booking officer was retaliating against the individual for exercising his or her First Amendment rights.' . . In Ford, the court found that '[a] reasonable officer would have understood that he did not automatically possess the authority to book and jail an individual upon conducting a lawful arrest supported by probable cause.' . . Ford, decided in February 2013, concerned an officer's decision to book an arrestee in 2007. . . The Court noted that '[a]t the time the officers acted in 2007, the law in this Circuit gave fair notice that it would be unlawful to jail Ford in retaliation for his First Amendment activity.' . . In this case, as the allegations took place in April 2013, the Court finds this right was clearly established at that time and a reasonable officer in Fredstrom's position would have known in April 2013 that he could not exercise his discretion in retaliation for Henneberry's First Amendment activity. Finally, the Court must determine whether Fredstrom 'reasonably but mistakenly' could have believed his conduct did not violate his rights. Qualified immunity applies whether the error is a mistake of law or fact, or mixed question of law and fact. . . Judge James found ‘there is nothing in the record that suggests Fredstrom reasonably believed his conduct did not violate Plaintiff’s rights.’ . . She noted the only evidence Defendants presented was Fredstrom’s ‘conclusory declaration that he did not intend to interfere with’ Henneberry’s First Amendment rights, but such evidence ‘does not establish the grounds for reasonable mistake; at most, it creates a triable issue of fact whether Fredstrom acted in retaliation.’ . . Defendants provide no additional evidence on this issue in their renewed motion. Accordingly, the Court agrees with Judge James’s decision and therefore finds Defendants have not established Fredstrom is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Daniels v. Alameda County, No. 19-CV-00602-JSC, 2019 WL 3017645, at *7 (N.D. Cal. July 10, 2019) (“Nieves did not recognize an exception to the no-probable cause rule for retaliatory-prosecution section 1983 cases. To the contrary, Nieves adopted the no-probable cause rule from retaliatory prosecution cases into retaliatory-arrest cases, with one narrow exception. . . As this is not a retaliatory-arrest case, Nieves does not apply.”)

TENTH CIRCUIT

Bustillos v. City of Carlsbad, New Mexico, No. 21-2129, 2022 WL 1447709, at *5–6 (10th Cir. May 9, 2022) (not reported) (“Officer Vasquez had probable cause for Bustillos’s arrest, which defeats Bustillos’s retaliatory arrest claim. Although Bustillos professes a desire to serve the public by filming police encounters, his desire to film from a particular location does not authorize him to break the law. Bustillos correctly observes that the Constitution gives him the rights to free speech and protection from unreasonable seizures. . . But this same Constitution also empowers a state—without violating these rights—to (1) criminalize Bustillos’s refusal to obey lawful police commands, (2) criminalize his subsequent concealment of his identity, and (3) arrest him upon probable cause that he committed either or both crimes. . . In sum, Officer Vasquez is entitled to qualified immunity on Bustillos’s First Amendment claim because there is no genuine factual dispute regarding probable cause. Because Bustillos failed to demonstrate that Officer Vasquez violated his constitutional rights, Bustillos fails to meet the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, and we need not address the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis regarding clearly established law or Bustillos’s claim that the City is liable. We therefore conclude that the district court correctly entered judgment in favor of Officer Vasquez and the City.”)

Fenn v. City of Truth or Consequences, 983 F.3d 1143, 1149 (10th Cir. 2020) (“Fenn argues, however, that a lack of probable cause is not a required element of First Amendment retaliation under the circumstances presented here. He claims to fit within a narrow exception to the no-probable-cause requirement, as described by the Supreme Court in Nieves. In that case, the Court held a plaintiff need not show a lack of probable cause ‘when a plaintiff presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . But Fenn has not pointed to any evidence in the record that he was arrested when other similarly situated individuals were not. Indeed, it seems unlikely that any such similarly situated individuals exist. The record demonstrates, after all, that Fenn was arrested only after having violated no-trespass orders at the Center at least three times, and only after multiple complaints from building tenants about his behavior. Fenn does not fit within the narrow exception carved out in Nieves.”)

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Turner v. Williams, 65 F.4th 564, 588-89 (11th Cir. 2023) (“Turner’s Complaint also alleges facts that could go to the differential treatment exception to Nieves’s requirement that plaintiffs allege and prove an absence of probable cause for a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. This exception ‘is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so,’ . . . and requires ‘objective evidence that [Turner] was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . The Complaint points to nine other officers who had been caught tampering with evidence. According to the Complaint, none of them were ever arrested for their conduct, but most of them were temporarily assigned to teleserve. While there was allegedly a substantial chance each of the nine individuals committed the crime of tampering with evidence and yet were not arrested, Turner’s list of comparators ignores the two closest comparators: Kvies and Griffis. They were arrested. In fact, a single warrant affidavit led to Kvies’s, Griffis’s, and Turner’s arrests. Although the Complaint says the two junior officers were arrested ‘for the sole purpose of arresting Plaintiff without it appearing suspect,’ this is indisputably conclusory. There was just as much probable cause to arrest the two of them as there was to arrest Turner. This differential treatment exception is also narrow and requires objective evidence. Still taking the Complaint’s allegations as true, there are two reasons why this exception cannot apply here. First, all three of the undercover officers from the OIS were arrested, not just Turner. Turner was therefore treated the same as the most similar comparators. Second, almost all of the comparators Turner mentions received some sort of punishment. While not arrested, these past comparators make clear that evidence tampering is not merely an offense in name that often goes overlooked. . . . Since Turner’s Complaint does not adequately allege an absence of probable cause—in fact, we find as a matter of law that there was probable cause to arrest Turner—and the Complaint does not allege facts sufficient to satisfy either the Lozman or the differential treatment exceptions, Turner’s § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim against Williams based on Turner’s arrest was properly dismissed by the District Court as failing to state a claim.”)

Brienza v. City of Peachtree City, Georgia, No. 21-12290, 2022 WL 3841095, at *9 (11th Cir. Aug. 30, 2022) (not reported) (“Nieves, and the exception to the absence-of-probable-cause requirement, were not clearly established until 2019. As the district court concluded, at the time of Brienza’s arrest in 2015, there was no clearly established law creating an exception to the ‘no-probable-cause’ requirement for First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims. Indeed, at the time of Brienza’s arrest, the clearly established law was that a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim was ‘defeated by the existence of probable cause.’ . . . Because, as we’ve already explained, the officers had probable cause to arrest Brienza for obstructing the investigation into underage drinking, the officers were entitled to qualified immunity on Brienza’s First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.”)

Toole v. City of Atlanta, 798 F. App’x 381, ____ (11th Cir. 2019) (“No reasonable officer could have believed that there was probable cause to arrest Toole for standing in the street and impeding traffic if Toole was on the sidewalk and the streets were closed to traffic. ‘[Q]ualified immunity protects the police ... but only up to the line defined by the arguable probable cause standard.’ . . . So, in a situation where ‘the resolution of disputed critical facts determines on which side of this line the officer’s conduct fell, summary judgment is inappropriate,’ and Toole is ‘entitled to have [his] case heard by a jury.’ . . . Now on to the First Amendment. ‘[W]hen an officer has arguable probable cause to arrest, he is entitled to qualified immunity both from Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest and from First Amendment claims stemming from the arrest.’ Gates v. Khokhar, 884 F.3d 1290, 1298 (11th Cir. 2018). But as we have already explained, here Zorn did not have arguable probable cause to arrest Toole, so he isn’t automatically entitled to qualified immunity on Toole’s First Amendment claim. Eleventh Circuit precedent holds that individuals have ‘a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct,’ . . . as well as to engage in lawful protests[.] . . . Additionally, we’ve established that law enforcement officers may not arrest an individual as a way ‘to thwart or intrude upon First Amendment rights otherwise being validly asserted.’ . . . Toole was engaging in constitutionally protected activities—namely, protesting and filming police conduct—at the time of his unlawful arrest. . . . Toole alleges that Zorn’s actions were aimed at preventing him from continuing to film police activity. He recalls protesters saying that people in the crowd were being grabbed and arrested by officers for filming, and Toole’s video of the event shows that he was arrested after zooming in on an officer’s name and saying it out loud. The fact that his phone was returned to him and that was able to film inside the paddy wagon does not change the fact that Toole’s unlawful arrest stopped him from continuing to participate in the protest or film police conduct in public, or that his arrest was allegedly effected to stop him from filming. So, reading the facts in Toole’s favor, he was engaging in protected First Amendment activities when Zorn unlawfully arrested him to stop him from filming police activities. Thus, Zorn violated Toole’s First Amendment rights. Next, we must determine whether Toole’s First Amendment rights were clearly established at the time of his arrest. For Toole to show that his First Amendment rights were clearly established, he ‘must demonstrate (1) that a materially similar case has already been decided, giving notice to the police; (2) that a broader, clearly established principle should control the novel facts in this situation; or (3) this case fits within the exception of conduct which so obviously violates [the] constitution that prior case law is unnecessary.’ . . . This Court has established that individuals have ‘a First Amendment right, subject to reasonable time, manner and place restrictions, to photograph or videotape police conduct’ and that ‘[t]he First Amendment protects the right to gather information about what public officials do on public property, and specifically, a right to record matters of public interest.’ . . . We’ve also held that individuals have a clearly established right to protest peacefully and ‘engage in expressive activities.’ . . . It is also clearly established law in this Circuit that law enforcement officers cannot punish or retaliate against individuals for expressing their First Amendment rights. . . Reading the facts in Toole’s favor, he was unlawfully arrested without arguable probable cause while engaging in protected First Amendment conduct—protesting and filming police activities—specifically to stop him from doing so. Zorn, therefore, violated Toole’s clearly established First Amendment rights and isn’t entitled to qualified immunity.”) DeMartini v. Town of Gulf Stream, 942 F.3d 1277, 1297-1309 (11th Cir. 2019) (“To recap, the presence of probable cause will (1) defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim for an underlying retaliatory criminal prosecution, Hartman, and also (2) will generally defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim for an underlying retaliatory arrest, Nieves, except (a) when the ‘unique’ five factual circumstances in Lozman exist together, or (b) where the plaintiff establishes retaliation animus and presents ‘objective evidence’ that he was arrested for certain conduct when otherwise similarly situated individuals (committing the same conduct) had not engaged in the same sort of protected speech and had not been arrested, Nieves. While these Supreme Court decisions provide significant guidance, the Supreme Court has not addressed a § 1983 First Amendment claim predicated on a retaliatory civil lawsuit. Although there is scant circuit precedent, we discuss those few decisions because they demonstrate how circuit courts have assessed what a plaintiff must prove to establish the required causal connection in § 1983 First Amendment retaliation cases when predicated on civil lawsuits. [court discusses circuit cases] In sum, even before the probable cause decisions in Hartman and Nieves, other circuits were considering whether the underlying civil lawsuit was frivolous before allowing a plaintiff to move forward on a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on that civil lawsuit. . . . DeMartini contends that the circumstances of her case are like those in Lozman because the record amply demonstrates the Town adopted an official municipal policy of retaliation against her. DeMartini argues Hartman’s and Nieves’s probable cause requirement does not apply because the Town unanimously voted to bring its RICO civil action ‘for the sole purpose of stopping the protected activity’ of filing public records requests and lawsuits. Alternatively, even if Hartman and Nieves’s probable cause requirement applies, DeMartini argues that the Town lacked probable cause for its RICO lawsuit. DeMartini contends that the Town’s RICO action was ‘baseless’ and frivolous given Eleventh Circuit precedent that a threat to file a civil lawsuit is not a valid RICO predicate. Not surprisingly, the Town responds that the ‘causation landscape’ here is more similar to that in Hartman because attorneys here functioned in the same role as that of a prosecutor in Hartman. Just as the dual actors in Hartman, the individuals filing the civil lawsuit (outside counsel) were not the same individuals allegedly harboring the animus (the Town’s Commissioners). The Town also stresses, however, that the Supreme Court limited Lozman to its unique factors, several of which are missing here. And like the Supreme Court did in Nieves, this Court should look to the closest common law analog to DeMartini’s First Amendment retaliation claim based on a civil lawsuit, which is a claim for ‘wrongful institution of legal process’ and also requires proving the want of probable cause. If DeMartini is correct that the Town lacked probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit, we would not have to address whether the presence of probable cause defeats DeMartini’s § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim as a matter of law. Thus, we first examine whether the Town had probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit. . . . Because the Town had probable cause to file its civil RICO lawsuit, we must answer the final question: whether the existence of probable cause for a civil lawsuit defeats a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on that underlying civil lawsuit. Based on the factors discussed in the Supreme Court’s Hartman and Nieves decisions, we conclude that, as with § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claims arising in the criminal prosecution and arrest context, the presence of probable cause will generally defeat a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim based on a civil lawsuit as a matter of law. . . This principle will particularly be apt when the alleged retaliatory civil litigation by the government is itself taken as a reasonable response to the plaintiff’s own litigation, or threat of litigation, against the government. Just as a citizen may have the right to sue the government, the government likewise has the right, and duty, to engage in legitimate responsive litigation to defend itself against such challenges. . . . For all of these reasons, we conclude that applying the objective, lack-of-probable-cause requirement to a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation case predicated on the filing of a civil lawsuit is appropriate because it strikes the proper balance between protecting a plaintiff’s important First Amendment rights while, at the same time, ensuring that the Town has a similar ability to access the courts to protect itself and its citizens from non-meritorious litigation. Therefore, the presence of probable cause will generally defeat a plaintiff’s § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on an underlying civil lawsuit, or counterclaim for that matter. Lastly, we must discuss whether there are possible exceptions to this general rule. To date, the Supreme Court has not identified any exceptions to the no-probable-cause requirement in § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claims predicated on criminal prosecutions. Arguably, retaliation claims predicated on prior civil lawsuits would not be subject to exceptions either. We recognize, however, that the Supreme Court has, in two cases, identified potential exceptions to the no-probable-cause requirement in § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claims predicated on a criminal arrest. First, in Nieves, the Supreme Court acknowledged a potential exception when a retaliatory-arrest plaintiff not only establishes the arresting officer’s retaliatory animus but also presents objective evidence that the plaintiff was arrested when people who had committed the same conduct, but who had not engaged in the same sort of protected speech, had not been arrested by that officer. . . . Second, in Lozman, the Supreme Court delineated five ‘unique’ factual circumstances, which, if proven, would combine together to create an exception to the general no-probable-cause requirement for a plaintiff bringing a First Amendment retaliation claim predicated on retaliatory arrest. . . . Whatever role these exceptions, articulated in a retaliatory arrest context, might play in a case in which the plaintiff is alleging that a retaliatory civil lawsuit has been filed against her, it is clear they play no role here. . . . It has long been settled law, and DeMartini does not dispute, that wrongful civil proceedings claims require proving the absence of probable cause. . . . Our holding here—that probable cause defeats DeMartini’s §1983 First Amendment retaliation claim—is also consistent with, and supported by, this common law.”)

Turner v. Williams, No. 3:19-CV-641-J-32PDB, 2020 WL 1904016, at *8-9 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 17, 2020) (“Turner alleges that Williams had Turner arrested in retaliation for announcing his intention to run for sheriff of Nassau County. Although probable cause should generally defeat a retaliatory arrest claim, a narrow qualification is warranted for circumstances where officers have probable cause to make arrests, but typically exercise their discretion not to do so.’ . . . Thus, a plaintiff’s retaliatory arrest claim against an individual officer can proceed when the plaintiff shows an absence of probable cause or ‘presents objective evidence that he was arrested when otherwise similarly situated individuals not engaged in the same sort of protected speech had not been.’ . . . Here, Turner’s claim against Williams (individually) fails for three reasons. First, Turner’s allegations that Williams was involved in the arrest are conclusory. . . . Second, Turner fails to allege that he was treated differently than other similarly situated persons. . . . Third, and decisively, at the time of Turner’s arrest, it was not clearly established that an arrest made with probable cause could nonetheless subject a government actor to liability for First Amendment retaliation. . . . [A]t earliest, the law was clearly established by Lozman in 2018, but that is unlikely given the Supreme Court’s limitation of that case to its facts. . . . Instead, it was not clearly established until Nieves, that an officer could be liable for an alleged retaliatory arrest under these circumstances. Because Nieves was decided two years after the events in question here, Williams is entitled to qualified immunity on Count II.”) Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. 1235, 1244-51 (2012) (“The validity of the warrant is not before us. The question instead is whether Messerschmidt and Lawrence are entitled to immunity from damages, even assuming that the warrant should not have been issued. . . . Under these circumstances—set forth in the warrant—it would not have been unreasonable for an officer to conclude that there was a ‘fair probability’ that the sawed-off shotgun was not the only firearm Bowen owned. . . . And it certainly would have been reasonable for an officer to assume that Bowen’s sawed-off shotgun was illegal. . . . Evidence of one crime is not always evidence of several, but given Bowen’s possession of one illegal gun, his gang membership, his willingness to use the gun to kill someone, and his concern about the police, a reasonable officer could conclude that there would be additional illegal guns among others that Bowen owned. [footnote omitted] Given the foregoing, it would not have been ‘entirely unreasonable’ for an officer to believe, in the particular circumstances of this case, that there was probable cause to search for all firearms and firearm-related materials. . . . It would . . . not have been unreasonable—based on the facts set out in the affidavit—for an officer to believe that evidence regarding Bowen’s gang affiliation would prove helpful in prosecuting him for the attack on Kelly. . . . Not only would such evidence help to establish motive, either apart from or in addition to any domestic dispute, it would also support the bringing of additional, related charges against Bowen for the assault. . . . Moreover, even if this were merely a domestic dispute, a reasonable officer could still conclude that gang paraphernalia found at the Millenders’ residence would aid in the prosecution of Bowen by, for example, demonstrating Bowen’s connection to other evidence found there. . . . Whatever the use to which evidence of Bowen’s gang involvement might ultimately have been put, it would not have been ‘entirely unreasonable’ for an officer to believe that the facts set out in the affidavit established a fair probability that such evidence would aid the prosecution of Bowen for the criminal acts at issue. . . . Whether any of these facts, standing alone or taken together, actually establish probable cause is a question we need not decide. Qualified immunity ‘gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments.’ al-Kidd, 563 U.S., at — (slip op., at 12). The officers’ judgment that the scope of the warrant was supported by probable cause may have been mistaken, but it was not ‘plainly incompetent.’ . . . On top of all this, the fact that the officers sought and obtained approval of the warrant application from a superior and a deputy district attorney before submitting it to the magistrate provides further support for the conclusion that an officer could reasonably have believed that the scope of the warrant was supported by probable cause. . . . In light of the foregoing, it cannot be said that ‘no officer of reasonable competence would have requested the warrant.’ . . . Indeed, a contrary conclusion would mean not only that Messerschmidt and Lawrence were ‘plainly incompetent,’ . . . but that their supervisor, the deputy district attorney, and the magistrate were as well. . . . [B]y holding in Malley that a magistrate’s approval does not automatically render an officer’s conduct reasonable, we did not suggest that approval by a magistrate or review by others is irrelevant to the objective reasonableness of the officers’ determination that the warrant was valid. . . . The fact that the officers secured these approvals is certainly pertinent in assessing whether they could have held a reasonable belief that the warrant was supported by probable cause. . . . In contrast to Groh, any defect here would not have been obvious from the face of the warrant. Rather, any arguable defect would have become apparent only upon a close parsing of the warrant application, and a comparison of the affidavit to the terms of the warrant to determine whether the affidavit established probable cause to search for all the items listed in the warrant. This is not an error that ‘just a simple glance’ would have revealed. . . . Indeed, unlike in Groh, the officers here did not merely submit their application to a magistrate. They also presented it for review by a superior officer, and a deputy district attorney, before submitting it to the magistrate. The fact that none of the officials who reviewed the application expressed concern about its validity demonstrates that any error was not obvious. Groh plainly does not control the result here. . . . The question in this case is not whether the magistrate erred in believing there was sufficient probable cause to support the scope of the warrant he issued. It is instead whether the magistrate so obviously erred that any reasonable officer would have recognized the error. The occasions on which this standard will be met may be rare, but so too are the circumstances in which it will be appropriate to impose personal liability on a lay officer in the face of judicial approval of his actions. Even if the warrant in this case were invalid, it was not so obviously lacking in probable cause that the officers can be considered ‘plainly incompetent’ for concluding otherwise. . . . The judgment of the Court of Appeals denying the officers qualified immunity must therefore be reversed.”)

Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. 1235, 1252 (2012) (Kagan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Malley made clear that qualified immunity turned on the officer’s own ‘professional judgment,’ considered separately from the mistake of the magistrate. . . . And what we said in Malley about a magistrate’s authorization applies still more strongly to the approval of other police officers or state attorneys. All those individuals, as the Court puts it, are ‘part of the prosecution team.’ . . . To make their views relevant is to enable those teammates (whether acting in good or bad faith) to confer immunity on each other for unreasonable conduct—like applying for a warrant without anything resembling probable cause.”)

Messerschmidt v. Millender, 132 S. Ct. 1235, 1253-61 (2012) (Sotomayor, J., with whom Ginsburg, J., joins, dissenting) (“In this case, police officers investigating a specific, non-gang-

related assault committed with a specific firearm (a sawed-off shotgun) obtained a warrant to search for all evidence related to ‘any Street Gang,’ ‘[a]ny photographs ... which may depict evidence of criminal activity,’ and ‘any firearms.’ . . They did so for the asserted reason that the search might lead to evidence related to other gang members and other criminal activity, and that other ‘[v]alid warrants commonly allow police to search for “firearms and ammunition.”’ . . That kind of general warrant is antithetical to the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Court’s analysis bears little relationship to the record in this case, our precedents, or the purposes underlying qualified immunity analysis. For all these reasons, I respectfully dissent. . . . The operative question in this case, therefore, is whether—given that, as petitioners comprehended, the crime itself was not gang related—a reasonable officer nonetheless could have believed he had probable cause to seek a warrant to search the suspect’s residence for all evidence of affiliation not only with the suspect’s street gang, but ‘any Street Gang.’ He could not. . . . The majority has little difficulty concluding that because Bowen fired one firearm, it was reasonable for the police to conclude not only that Bowen must have possessed others, but that he must be storing these other weapons at his 73-year-old former foster mother’s home.[footnote omitted] Again, however, this is not what the police actually concluded, as Detective Messerschmidt’s deposition makes clear. . . .Even assuming that the police reasonably could have concluded that Bowen possessed other guns and was storing them at the Millenders’ home, I cannot agree that the warrant provided probable cause to believe any weapon possessed in a home in which 10 persons regularly lived—none of them the suspect in this case—was either ‘contraband or evidence of a crime.’ . . . The majority asserts, without citation, that the magistrate’s approval is relevant to objective reasonableness. . . .In cases in which it would be not only wrong but unreasonable for any well-trained officer to seek a warrant, allowing a magistrate’s approval to immunize the police officer’s unreasonable action retrospectively makes little sense. . . .To the extent it proposes to cut back upon Malley, the majority will promote the opposite result—encouraging sloppy police work and ex-acerbating the risk that searches will not comport with the requirements of the Fourth Amendment. The Court also makes much of the fact that Detective Messerschmidt sent his proposed warrant application to two superior police officers and a district attorney for review. Giving weight to that fact would turn the Fourth Amendment on its head. This Court made clear in Malley that a police officer acting unreasonably cannot obtain qualified immunity on the basis of a neutral magistrate’s approval. It would be passing strange, therefore, to immunize an officer’s conduct instead based upon the approval of other police officers and prosecutors. [footnote omitted] The effect of the Court’s rule. . . is to hold blameless the ‘plainly incompetent’ action of the police officer seeking a warrant because of the ‘plainly incompetent’ approval of his superiors and the district attorney. . . .Qualified immunity properly affords police officers protection so long as their conduct is objectively reasonable. But it is not objectively reasonable for police investigating a specific, non-gang-related assault committed with a particular firearm to search for all evidence related to ‘any Street Gang,’ ‘photographs ... which may depict evidence of criminal activity,’ and all firearms. The Court reaches a contrary result not because it thinks that these police officers’ stated reasons for searching were objectively reasonable, but because it thinks different conclusions might be drawn from the crime scene that reasonably might have led different officers to search for different reasons. That analysis, however, is far removed from qualified immunity’s proper focus on whether petitioners acted in an objectively reasonable manner. Because petitioners did not, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.”)

Ryburn v. Huff, 132 S. Ct. 987, 990-92 (2012) (per curiam) (“No decision of this Court has found a Fourth Amendment violation on facts even roughly comparable to those present in this case. On the contrary, some of our opinions may be read as pointing in the opposition direction. . . . A reasonable police officer could read these decisions to mean that the Fourth Amendment permits an officer to enter a residence if the officer has a reasonable basis for concluding that there is an imminent threat of violence. . . . The panel majority—far removed from the scene and with the opportunity to dissect the elements of the situation—confidently concluded that the officers really had no reason to fear for their safety or that of anyone else. As the panel majority saw things, it was irrelevant that the Huffs did not respond when the officers knocked on the door and announced their presence and when they called the home phone because the Huffs had no legal obligation to respond to a knock on the door or to answer the phone. The majority attributed no significance to the fact that, when the officers finally reached Mrs. Huff on her cell phone, she abruptly hung up in the middle of their conversation. And, according to the majority, the officers should not have been concerned by Mrs. Huff’s reaction when they asked her if there were any guns in the house because Mrs. Huff ‘merely asserted her right to end her conversation with the officers and returned to her home.’ . . . Confronted with the facts found by the District Court, reasonable officers in the position of petitioners could have come to the conclusion that there was an imminent threat to their safety and to the safety of others. The Ninth Circuit’s contrary conclusion was flawed for numerous reasons. . . . [T]he panel majority did not heed the District Court’s wise admonition that judges should be cautious about second-guessing a police officer’s assessment, made on the scene, of the danger presented by a particular situation. With the benefit of hindsight and calm deliberation, the panel majority concluded that it was unreasonable for petitioners to fear that violence was imminent. . . . Judged from the proper perspective of a reasonable officer forced to make a split-second decision in response to a rapidly unfolding chain of events that culminated with Mrs. Huff turning and running into the house after refusing to answer a question about guns, petitioners’ belief that entry was necessary to avoid injury to themselves or others was imminently reasonable. In sum, reasonable police officers in petitioners’ position could have come to the conclusion that the Fourth Amendment permitted them to enter the Huff residence if there was an objectively reasonable basis for fearing that violence was imminent. And a reasonable officer could have come to such a conclusion based on the facts as found by the District Court. The petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the Ninth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for the entry of judgment in favor of petitioners.”)

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2080, 2083, 2085 (2011) (“Courts should think carefully before expending ‘scarce judicial resources’ to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will ‘have no effect on the outcome of the case.’ . . . When, however, a Court of Appeals does address both prongs of qualified-immunity analysis, we have discretion to correct its errors at each step. Although not necessary to reverse an erroneous judgment, doing so ensures that courts do not insulate constitutional decisions at the frontiers of the law from our review or inadvertently undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote. The former occurs when the constitutional-law question is wrongly decided; the latter when what is not clearly established is held to be so. In this case, the Court of Appeals' analysis at both steps of the qualified-immunity inquiry needs correction. . . . Because al-Kidd concedes that individualized suspicion supported the issuance of the material-witness arrest warrant; and does not assert that his arrest would have been unconstitutional absent the alleged pretextual use of the warrant; we find no Fourth Amendment violation. . . . A Government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, '[t]he contours of [a] right [are] sufficiently clear' that every 'reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. . . . The constitutional question in this case falls far short of that threshold. At the time of al-Kidd's arrest, not a single judicial opinion had held that pretext could render an objectively reasonable arrest pursuant to a material-witness warrant unconstitutional. . . . [Ashcroft] deserves qualified immunity even assuming. . . that his alleged detention policy violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2085 (2011) (Kennedy, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., and Sotomayor, J., concurring) ("The Court's holding is limited to the arguments presented by the parties and leaves unresolved whether the Government's use of the Material Witness Statute in this case was lawful. . . . The scope of the statute's lawful authorization is uncertain.")

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2086, 2087 (2011) (Kennedy, J., concurring) ("The fact that the Attorney General holds a high office in the Government must inform what law is clearly established for the purposes of this case. . . . [T]he Attorney General occupies a national office and so sets policies implemented in many jurisdictions throughout the country. The official with responsibilities in many jurisdictions may face ambiguous and sometimes inconsistent sources of decisional law. While it may be clear that one Court of Appeals has approved a certain course of conduct, other Courts of Appeals may have disapproved it, or at least reserved the issue. When faced with inconsistent legal rules in different jurisdictions, national officeholders should be given some deference for qualified immunity purposes, at least if they implement policies consistent with the governing law of the jurisdiction where the action is taken. . . . The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit appears to have reasoned that a Federal District Court sitting in New York had authority to establish a legal rule binding on the Attorney General and, therefore, on federal law-enforcement operations conducted nationwide. . . . Of course, district court decisions are not precedential to this extent. . . . But nationwide security operations should not have to grind to a halt even when an appellate court finds those operations unconstitutional. The doctrine of qualified immunity does not so constrain national officeholders entrusted with urgent responsibilities.")

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2087 (2011) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Breyer, J., and Sotomayor, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Is a former U.S. Attorney General subject to a suit for damages on a claim that he instructed subordinates to use the Material Witness Statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3144, as a pretext to detain terrorist suspects preventively? Given Whren . . . I agree with the Court that no ‘clearly established law’ renders Ashcroft answerable in damages for the abuse of authority al-Kidd charged. . . But I join Justice SOTOMAYOR in objecting to the Court’s disposition of al-Kidd’s Fourth Amendment claim on the merits; as she observes, . . . that claim involves novel and trying questions that will ‘have no effect on the outcome of th[is] case.’”)

Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S. Ct. 2074, 2089, 2090 (2011) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., and Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I concur in the Court’s judgment reversing the Court of Appeals because I agree with the majority’s conclusion that Ashcroft did not violate clearly established law. I cannot join the majority’s opinion, however, because it unnecessarily ‘resolve[s][a] difficult and novel questio[n] of constitutional ... interpretation that will “have no effect on the outcome of the case.”’. . . Whether the Fourth Amendment permits the pretextual use of a material witness warrant for preventive detention of an individual whom the Government has no intention of using at trial is, in my view, a closer question than the majority’s opinion suggests. Although the majority is correct that a government official’s subjective intent is generally ‘irrelevant in determining whether that officer’s actions violate the Fourth Amendment,’ . . . none of our prior cases recognizing that principle involved prolonged detention of an individual without probable cause to believe he had committed any criminal offense. We have never considered whether an official’s subjective intent matters for purposes of the Fourth Amendment in that novel context, and we need not and should not resolve that question in this case. All Members of the Court agree that, whatever the merits of the underlying Fourth Amendment question, Ashcroft did not violate clearly established law. The majority’s constitutional ruling is a narrow one premised on the existence of a ‘valid material-witness warran[t],’ ante, at 1—a premise that, at the very least, is questionable in light of the allegations set forth in al-Kidd’s complaint. Based on those allegations, it is not at all clear that it would have been ‘impracticable to secure [al-Kidd’s] presence ... by subpoena’ or that his testimony could not ‘adequately be secured by deposition.’. . . Nor is it clear that the affidavit supporting the warrant was sufficient; its failure to disclose that the Government had no intention of using al-Kidd as a witness at trial may very well have rendered the affidavit deliberately false and misleading. . . The majority assumes away these factual difficulties, but in my view, they point to the artificiality of the way the Fourth Amendment question has been presented to this Court and provide further reason to avoid rendering an unnecessary holding on the constitutional question. I also join Part I of Justice KENNEDY’s concurring opinion. As that opinion makes clear, this case does not present an occasion to address the proper scope of the material witness statute or its constitutionality as applied in this case. Indeed, nothing in the majority’s opinion today should be read as placing this Court’s imprimatur on the actions taken by the Government against al-Kidd.”)

Camreta v. Greene, 131 S. Ct. 2020, 2026-36 & n.11 (2011) (“We conclude that this Court generally may review a lower court’s constitutional ruling at the behest of a government official granted immunity. But we may not do so in this case for reasons peculiar to it. The case has become moot because the child has grown up and moved across the country, and so will never again be subject to the Oregon in-school interviewing practices whose constitutionality is at issue. We therefore do not reach the Fourth Amendment question in this case. In line with our normal practice when mootness frustrates a party's right to appeal, see United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36, 39, 71 S.Ct. 104, 95 L.Ed. 36 (1950), we vacate the part of the Ninth Circuit's opinion that decided the Fourth Amendment issue. . . . S.G. . . . alleges two impediments to our exercise of statutory authority here, one constitutional and the other prudential. First, she claims that Article III bars review because petitions submitted by immunized officials present no case or controversy. . . . Second, she argues that our settled practice of declining to hear appeals by prevailing parties should apply with full force when officials have obtained immunity. . . . We disagree on both counts. . . . [T]he critical question under Article III is whether the litigant retains the necessary personal stake in the appeal This Article III standard often will be met when immunized officials seek to challenge a ruling that their conduct violated the Constitution. That is not because a court has made a retrospective judgment about the lawfulness of the officials' behavior, for that judgment is unaccompanied by any personal liability. Rather, it is because the judgment may have prospective effect on the parties. . . . If the official regularly engages in that conduct as part of his job (as Camreta does), he suffers injury caused by the adverse constitutional ruling. So long as it continues in effect, he must either change the way he performs his duties or risk a meritorious damages action. . . . Only by overturning the ruling on appeal can the official gain clearance to engage in the conduct in the future. He thus can demonstrate, as we demand, injury, causation, and redressability. . . . Article III aside, an important question of judicial policy remains. As a matter of practice and prudence, we have generally declined to consider cases at the request of a prevailing party, even when the Constitution allowed us to do so. . . . On the few occasions when we have departed from that principle, we have pointed to a 'policy reaso[n] ... of sufficient importance to allow an appeal' by the winner below. . . . We think just such a reason places qualified immunity cases in a special category when it comes to this Court's review of appeals brought by winners. The constitutional determinations that prevailing parties ask us to consider in these cases are not mere dicta or 'statements in opinions.' . . . They are rulings that have a significant future effect on the conduct of public officials—both the prevailing parties and their co-workers—and the policies of the government units to which they belong. . . . And more: they are rulings self-consciously designed to produce this effect, by establishing controlling law and preventing invocations of immunity in later cases. And still more: they are rulings designed this way with this Court's permission, to promote clarity—and observance—of constitutional rules. . . . [W]e have permitted lower courts to avoid avoidance—that is, to determine whether a right exists before examining whether it was clearly established. . . . In general, courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones. But it remains true that following the two-step sequence—defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity—is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials. . . . Here, the Court of Appeals followed exactly this two-step process, for exactly the reasons we have said may in select circumstances make it 'advantageous.' . . . To that end, the court adopted constitutional standards to govern all in-school interviews of suspected child abuse victims. . . . Given its purpose and effect, such a decision is reviewable in this Court at the behest of an immunized official. No mere dictum, a constitutional ruling preparatory to a grant of immunity creates law that governs the official's behavior. . . . This Court, needless to say, also plays a role in clarifying rights. Just as that purpose may justify an appellate court in reaching beyond an immunity defense to decide a constitutional issue, so too that purpose may support this Court in reviewing the correctness of the lower court’s decision. . . . We emphasize, however, two limits of today’s holding. First, it addresses only our own authority to review cases in this procedural posture. The Ninth Circuit had no occasion to consider whether it could hear an appeal from an immunized official: In that court, after all, S.G. appealed the judgment in the officials’ favor. We therefore need not and do not decide if an appellate court, too, can entertain an appeal from a party who has prevailed on immunity grounds. . . . Second, our holding concerns only what this Court may review; what we actually will choose to review is a different matter. That choice will be governed by the ordinary principles informing our decision whether to grant certiorari—a ‘power [we] ... sparingly exercis[e].’ . . . Although we reject S.G.’s arguments for dismissing this case at the threshold, we find that a separate jurisdictional problem requires that result: This case, we conclude, is moot. . . . When ‘subsequent events ma[ke] it absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur,’ we have no live controversy to review. . . . Time and distance combined have stymied our ability to consider this petition. . . . In this case, the happenstance of S.G.’s moving across country and becoming an adult has deprived Camreta of his appeal rights. Mootness has frustrated his ability to challenge the Court of Appeals’ ruling that he must obtain a warrant before interviewing a suspected child abuse victim at school. We therefore vacate the part of the Ninth Circuit’s opinion that addressed that issue, and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. . . . We leave untouched the Court of Appeals’ ruling on qualified immunity and its corresponding dismissal of S.G.’s claim because S.G. chose not to challenge that ruling. We vacate the Ninth Circuit’s ruling addressing the merits of the Fourth Amendment issue because, as we have explained, . . . that is the part of the decision that mootness prevents us from reviewing but that has prospective effects on Camreta.”)

[For an interesting observation about Justice Kagan’s comments, see Glover v. Gartman, 899 F.Supp.2d 1115, 1138, 1139 & n.5 (D.N.M. 2012) (“While the Court is, of course, obligated to follow faithfully the Supreme Court’s decisions and opinions, the Court has always been unenlightened and even troubled by Justice Elena Kagan’s comments in Camreta v. Greene about ‘large’ and ‘small’ cases. 131 S.Ct. at 2032. As a trial judge, the Court has tried assiduously to avoid thinking about or categorizing some cases as ‘large’ and some as ‘small.’ It usually is not mentally healthy for a judge to put all his or her energy into ‘large’ cases and slight ‘small cases’; to the litigants, their case is the most important case on the Court’s docket, and it is usually wise for the judge to treat each case on which he or she is working—at that moment—as the most important case at that moment. Getting the decision ‘right,’ i.e. getting the law and facts correct and accurate, is obviously important, but getting it right is only one-half of a judge’s task, particularly for a trial judge. The other half of dispensing justice is the appearance of justice—did the Court listen to the litigant’s arguments, wrestle with those arguments, and deal with them in an intellectually honest way. Americans are relatively good about accepting a judicial decision—even an adverse one—and cease obsessing over an issue, if they are convinced that an authority figure has dressed up, taken them seriously, listened patiently and politely, wrestled with the arguments, addressed them, and accurately stated the facts. The Court believes that, if it starts looking at some cases before it as ‘large’ and some as ‘small,’ it begins a slippery slope that does not accomplish both halves of the task of dispensing justice. The justice system depends so much on the nation respecting and accepting the courts' proceedings and decisions, because courts have very little 'power' that does not depend on that acceptance. Thus, Justice Kagan's comments are not only not self-defining, but they are disturbing. If, perhaps, a 'large' case is a Supreme Court case or one that comes from the East Coast or California, rather than one in a district court in New Mexico, then it helps to look at what cases the Supreme Court has decided for civil rights plaintiffs. The three most recent qualified immunity cases with which the Supreme Court has dealt are: (i) Reichle v. Howards, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012); (ii) Filarsky v. Delia, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 182 L.Ed.2d 662 (2012); and (iii) Messerschmidt v. Millender, — U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 182 L.Ed.2d 47 (2012). In Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court determined that secret service agents were entitled to qualified immunity for arresting a protestor who touched the Vice President and held that it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could give rise to a First Amendment violation. See 132 S.Ct. at 2092, 2097. In Filarsky v. Delia, the Supreme Court held that a private individual whom the government hires to do its work, an internal affairs review, is entitled to seek qualified immunity for Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. See 132 S.Ct. at 1660, 1668. In Messerschmidt v. Millender, the Supreme Court held that police officers in Los Angeles, California were entitled to qualified immunity when they relied on an invalid warrant to search a home, because a reasonable officer would not have realized the error. See 132 S.Ct. at 1241, 1250. The Supreme Court has not denied qualified immunity since 2004 in Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 124 S.Ct. 1284, 157 L.Ed.2d 1068 (2004), where it held that an officer unreasonably relied on a deficient warrant. See 540 U.S. at 565, 124 S.Ct. 1284. The Court does not think those presumably 'large' cases (they are Supreme Court cases, after all) are any different—substantively, legally, or factually—than this case involving the suicide of a pretrial detainee in the custody and under the control of a state-run penitentiary. On the flip side, treating large cases like they are large cases can create an appearance problem to the public and to the litigants—that only big cases deserve the Court's attention. A trial judge can overwork a 'large' case. It is better to treat even 'large' cases like every other case; large cases and their litigants need to know and appreciate that they are not the only case on the court's docket, and realize that the scarcity of judicial resources applies to them too.”)]

Camreta v. Greene, 131 S. Ct. 2020, 2036 (2011) (Scalia, J., concurring) (“I join the Court’s opinion, which reasonably applies our precedents, strange though they may be. The alternative solution, as Justice KENNEDY suggests, . . . is to end the extraordinary practice of ruling upon constitutional questions unnecessarily when the defendant possesses qualified immunity. . . The parties have not asked us to adopt that approach, but I would be willing to consider it in an appropriate case.”)

Camreta v. Greene, 131 S. Ct. 2020, 2036 (2011) (2011) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Breyer, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I agree with the Court’s conclusion that this case is moot and that vacatur is the appropriate disposition; unlike the majority, however, I would go no further. As the exchange between the majority and Justice KENNEDY demonstrates, the question whether Camreta, as a prevailing party, can obtain our review of the Ninth Circuit’s constitutional ruling is a difficult one. There is no warrant for reaching this question when there is clearly no longer a genuine case or controversy between the parties before us.”)

Camreta v. Greene, 131 S. Ct. 2020, 2038, 2040-45 (2011) (Kennedy, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting) (“[T]he Court today, in an altogether unprecedented disposition, says that it vacates not a judgment but rather ‘part of the Ninth Circuit’s opinion.’ . . . The Court’s conclusion is unsettling in its implications. Even on the Court’s reading of our cases, the almost invariable rule is that prevailing parties are not permitted to obtain a writ of certiorari. . . . After today, however, it will be common for prevailing parties to seek certiorari based on the Court’s newfound exception. . . . As today’s decision illustrates, our recent qualified immunity cases tend to produce decisions that are in tension with conventional principles of case-or-controversy adjudication. . . . The goal was to make dictum precedent, in order to hasten the gradual process of constitutional interpretation and alter the behavior of government defendants. . . . The present case brings the difficulties of that objective into perspective. In express reliance on the permission granted in Pearson, the Court of Appeals went out of its way to announce what may be an erroneous interpretation of the Constitution; and, under our case law, the Ninth Circuit must give that dictum legal effect as precedent in future cases. . . . [T]he Court’s standing analysis will be inapplicable in most qualified immunity cases. . . . When an officer is sued for taking an extraordinary action, such as using excessive force during a high-speed car chase, there is little possibility that a constitutional decision on the merits will again influence that officer’s conduct. The officer, like petitioner Alford or the petitioner in Bunting, would have no interest in litigating the merits in the Court of Appeals and, under the Court’s rule, would seem unable to obtain review of a merits ruling by petitioning for certiorari. . . . This problem will arise with great frequency in qualified immunity cases. Once again, the decision today allows plaintiffs to obtain binding constitutional determinations on the merits that lie beyond this Court’s jurisdiction to review. The Court thus fails to solve the problem it identifies. . . . It is most doubtful that Article III permits appeals by any officer to whom the reasoning of a judicial decision might be applied in a later suit. Yet that appears to be the implication of the Court’s holding. The favorable judgment of the Court of Appeals did not in itself cause petitioner Camreta to suffer an Article III injury entitling him to appeal. . . . On the contrary, Camreta has been injured by the decision below to no greater extent than have hundreds of other government officers who might argue that they too have been affected by the unnecessary statements made by the Court of Appeals. . . . It is revealing that the Court creates an exception to the prevailing party rule while making clear that the Courts of Appeals are not to follow suit, in any context. . . . If today’s decision proves to be more than an isolated anomaly, the Court might find it necessary to reconsider its special permission that the Courts of Appeals may issue unnecessary merits determinations in qualified immunity cases with binding precedential effect. . . . If qualified immunity cases were treated like other cases raising constitutional questions, settled principles of constitutional avoidance would apply. So would conventional rules regarding dictum and holding. Judicial observations made in the course of explaining a case might give important instruction and be relevant when assessing a later claim of qualified immunity. . . . But as dicta those remarks would not establish law and would not qualify as binding precedent. . . . The distance our qualified immunity jurisprudence has taken us from foundational principles is made all the more apparent by today's decision. The Court must construe two of its precedents in so broad a manner that they are taken out of their proper and logical confines. To vacate the reasoning of the decision below, the Court accepts that obiter dictum is not just binding precedent but a judgment susceptible to plenary review. I would dismiss this case and note that our jurisdictional rule against hearing appeals by prevailing parties precludes petitioners' attempt to obtain review of judicial reasoning disconnected from a judgment.")

Greene*, 131 S.Ct. 2020 (2011), for the proposition that 'a government official has standing to appeal a finding that his actions were unconstitutional ... because the "judgment may have a prospective effect," and "the official regularly engages" in the acts found unconstitutional.' . . . Their reliance on Camreta is misplaced. In holding that a prevailing party may nonetheless have standing to appeal in some limited circumstances, the Supreme Court expressly confined Camreta's holding regarding prospective relief to the qualified immunity context in which a named defendant may prevail, even though the court finds that his or her behavior was unconstitutional. . . . Contrary to the Unions' reading, the Supreme Court did not hold or even suggest that, in an entirely different context—municipal liability under Monell—a non-party may appeal findings of liability against her employer merely because she regularly engages in the behavior at issue.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bernier v. Allen, 38 F.4th 1145, 1155-57 (D.C. Cir. 2022) ("The relevant question in this case is whether Bernier, as his health stood at the time, was constitutionally entitled to treatment with Harvoni within two months of the medical community deciding it was appropriate for lower-risk patients like him to receive it. Whatever the right answer is to that question, we cannot conclude that existing law in December 2015 made it clear. Bernier does not identify—and we are not aware of—any controlling precedent from the Supreme Court or our circuit that affirmatively identifies that right 'in a particularized sense so that [its contours] are clear to a reasonable official.' . . . Nor is there 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that [Dr. Allen] could not have believed that' it was medically appropriate to deny Bernier's application for Harvoni. . . . Bernier seeks to meet the requirement that he identify clearly established law that Dr. Allen violated by citing to three out-of-circuit cases, which he argues support the proposition that corrections officials sued under the Eighth Amendment are not entitled to qualified immunity when they deny prisoners Hepatitis C treatment 'on the basis of implementation of bureaucratic administrative policies not having a specific basis in governing medical standards.' . . . But those decisions do not support the type of claim Bernier asserts. Their reasoning thus does not undercut Dr. Allen's assertion of qualified immunity. . . . We cannot conclude based on the cases on which Bernier relies that there is any 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' in support of his particular claim. . . . Unlike in those cases, there is no plausible allegation here of any deliberate or reckless delay or any disregard of exacerbating symptoms. . . . Nor did any of the cases Bernier cites recognize a clearly established right of a patient under medical management of a serious disease, monitored and apparently stable, immediately to receive the most recently recommended treatment within just a few weeks of its clinical acceptance as appropriate.”)

Jones v. Kirchner, 835 F.3d 74, 85-88 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (“In this case the magistrate, as clearly indicated on the face of the warrant, affirmatively denied the Defendants permission to search Jones’s house before 6:00 AM. The plaintiff alleges the Defendants nonetheless executed the warrant at 4:45 AM. Just as a warrant is ‘dead,’ and a search undertaken pursuant to that warrant invalid, after the expiration date on the warrant, Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206, 212 (1932), a warrant is not yet alive, and a search is likewise invalid, if executed before the time authorized in the warrant. If the Defendants executed the warrant when the magistrate said they could not, then they exceeded the authorization of the warrant and, accordingly, violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Nevertheless, we agree with the district court that the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, albeit for a different reason: It was not clearly established in Maryland in 2005 that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the nighttime execution of a daytime-only warrant. Although two of our sister circuits had by then so held, see O’Rourke v. City of Norman, 875 F.2d 1465 (10th Cir. 1989); United States v. Merritt, 293 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1961), the Fourth Circuit, within which this search occurred, did not come to the same conclusion until after the search in this case. See Yanez-Marquez v. Lynch, 789 F.3d 434, 466 (2015). Indeed, as the Fourth Circuit noted in that case, an unpublished Fourth Circuit opinion from 2009 had treated ‘a nighttime search under the aegis of a daytime warrant as a mere Rule 41 violation, rather than as an unconstitutional search.’. . . To repeat, qualified immunity shields an officer from liability unless he reasonably should have known his conduct would violate the law. . . . If our learned colleagues on the Fourth Circuit believed as recently as 2009 that the nighttime execution of a daytime-only warrant is not a constitutional violation, then the police officers who work in that jurisdiction cannot be faulted for failing to appreciate in 2005 that their conduct was unconstitutional. Until 2009 the Supreme Court ‘required courts considering qualified immunity claims to first address the constitutional question, so as to promote “the law’s elaboration from case to case.”’. . . Today, which part of the qualified immunity analysis to address first is within the ‘sound discretion’ of the court. . . . Where ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right,’ it may make sense to avoid the constitutional question. . . . This is not such a case, however. It seems to us an unremarkable proposition that an officer must respect a time limitation imposed by a magistrate and, indeed, the three other circuits to consider the question reached the same conclusion. In light of the Government’s argument to the contrary, . . . we think it important to clarify this point of law. Since Pearson, our court has often granted qualified immunity without reaching the constitutional question, but both the constitutional question and the answer are more clear in this case than in any of those. Here we need only follow the teaching of the Supreme Court, as have three other circuits, in order to protect the public from a particular type of unreasonable search. One of those circuits – the Fourth – surrounds the District of Columbia on all sides, and officers from Maryland and Virginia frequently cooperate with officers from D.C. on investigations. Resolving the constitutional question here ensures that officers will take care to abide by a magistrate’s limitations regardless where in the Washington area the search is executed. Conservation of judicial resources, see Dissent at 11, is a risible justification for avoiding a straightforward question such as this, . . . especially in view of the dramatic reduction in the caseload per judge of our court in recent years. Nor is doubt about the actual time of entry a relevant consideration in this case. That the facts of the case are as yet unsettled is neither surprising nor unique; this appeal is from the grant of a pre-answer motion to dismiss. There is nothing improper about deciding a constitutional question at this stage. . . Indeed, we ordinarily decide questions of qualified immunity early in order to avoid burdening officers with protracted litigation, see Pearson, 555 U.S. at 232; under our dissenting colleague’s approach, in contrast, we would never reach a constitutional question as long as the defendant’s attorney remembered to raise qualified immunity as a defense. Although well-founded doubt about the veracity of a plaintiff’s factual allegations might steer us toward constitutional avoidance in some circumstances (e.g., where the plaintiff’s account of the facts on summary judgment is ‘utterly discredited by the clear [video] evidence,’ Lash v. Lemke, 786 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2015)), those circumstances are not present here, where the Defendants have not submitted contrary evidence nor even filed an answer denying Jones’s allegations. . . As the Supreme Court has warned, perpetually addressing only the clearly-established question ‘may frustrate the development of constitutional precedent and the promotion of law-abiding behavior.’ . . We see no need to avoid the constitutional question here. . . . We affirm the district court’s holding that the Defendants have qualified immunity for the timing of the search, reverse its dismissal of Jones’s claims for unlawful seizure and no-knock entry, and remand this matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Jones v. Kirchner, 835 F.3d 74, 95-97 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (Randolph, J., dissenting in part and concurring in the judgment in part) (“Ever since Pearson, this court has developed not a page, but a volume of history following the Supreme Court’s decision. In these cases, we have almost invariably declined to decide constitutional questions in qualified immunity cases when it was unnecessary to do so. The majority has made no attempt to distinguish the cases embodying our established practice. [collecting cases] It is no answer to say that this is a matter within the court’s discretion. . . . The nearly uniform practice of this court has established such sound legal principles, and the majority has offered no reason to depart from them. I repeat that we are deciding this case on a complaint alone. The defendant officers have yet to file their answer to the complaint. As the Supreme Court recognized in Pearson, courts should not proceed to a constitutional question if the answer depends on undeveloped facts. . . Still less should a court decide a constitutional question when developed facts show that the question is not presented. The evidence in the criminal proceedings proved that the search of Jones’ premises eleven years ago complied with the warrant’s timing requirement. . . The defendants in this case have won a dismissal on this Fourth Amendment issue; they have no reason to seek rehearing en banc or certiorari in the Supreme Court on that issue. . . The answer to the constitutional question here is by no means certain. . . And it is hardly pressing. The majority cites not a single reported case in this jurisdiction in which officers, federal or local, executed a daytime warrant at night. And this is not such a case, in light of Judge Huvelle’s findings and the evidence supporting her findings. . . . Whatever case the majority is writing about, it is not this one.”)

Lash v. Lemke, 786 F.3d 1, 3, 5, 7-9 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (“The district court granted summary judgment to the officers, concluding they were protected by qualified immunity against Lash’s claims because the officer’s use of the Taser did not violate the Constitution. We also conclude that qualified immunity shields the officers from Lash’s Fourth Amendment claim, but on a different basis that does not require us to take up the constitutional issue the district court reached: A person actively resisting arrest does not have a clearly established right against a single use of a Taser to subdue him. . . .In some cases, it is easier for a court to see that the claimed right, whether it exists or not, is by no means ‘clearly established.’. . . This is such a case and we will accept the invitation of the Court in Pearson to dispose of this suit by holding that the conduct of the officers in arresting Lash did not violate any clearly established law. Thus we need not consider whether the district court was right to conclude that the use of a Taser against Lash in these circumstances was constitutionally permissible. . . .The officers could not have been on notice that using a Taser in these circumstances would violate Lash’s Fourth Amendment rights. Though there is no case from the Supreme Court or our court that is on point, consulting the decisions of our sister circuits reveals a telling pattern. The use of a Taser against a person who is not resisting arrest or merely passively resisting may violate that person’s rights. See, e.g., Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 499 (8th Cir.2009). The use of a Taser may also violate an individual’s rights even in the face of resistance if the officer uses the Taser to excess, such as firing multiple times after the officers have gained control of the scene. See, e.g., Meyers v. Baltimore Cnty., Md., 713 F.3d 723, 735 (4th Cir. 2013). But ‘[t]here is no clearly established right for a suspect who actively resists and refuses to be handcuffed to be free from a Taser application.’ Goodwin v. City of Painesville, 781 F.3d 314, 325 (6th Cir.2015) (internal quotation marks omitted). The Seventh Circuit, surveying the state of the law, found that ‘[c]ourts generally hold that the use of a [T]aser against an actively resisting suspect either does not violate clearly established law or is constitutionally reasonable.’ Abbott v. Sangamon Cnty., Ill., 705 F.3d 706, 727 (7th Cir.2013). The Sixth Circuit reached the same result. See Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff’s Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509–10 (6th Cir.2012) (observing that courts generally find that ‘[i]f a suspect actively resists arrest and refuses to be handcuffed, officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment by using a [T]aser to subdue him’). See also Aldaba v. Pickens, 777 F.3d 1148, 1158 (10th Cir.2015) (finding that ‘where the subject actively resisted a seizure, whether by physically struggling with an officer or by disobeying direct orders, courts have held either that no constitutional violation occurred or that the right not to be tased in these circumstances was not clearly established’). And our own examination of the cases similarly has found that officers who tased individuals actively resisting arrest had qualified immunity against excessive force claims. See, e.g., De Boise v. Taser Int’l, Inc., 760 F.3d 892, 897 (8th Cir.2014); Buchanan v. Gulfport Police Dep’t, 530 F. App’x 307, 314 (5th Cir.2013); Meyers, 713 F.3d at 733; Hoyt v. Cooks, 672 F.3d 972, 979–80 (11th Cir.2012). Because this right is still not clearly established today, a reasonable officer in January 2012 would certainly have been justified in believing that she could use a Taser a single time against a resisting suspect. . . . Even if Mattos were manifestly contrary to the many cases we discussed above, such an outlier would not invalidate broad agreement among other circuits. The “‘consensus view”” we have found necessary to create a clearly established right for qualified immunity purposes requires more than a single decision departing from an otherwise consistent pattern. Bame, 637 F.3d at 384 (quoting Johnson, 528 F.3d at 976). But more to the point, Mattos does not actually contradict the other cases on which we rely. In Mattos the Ninth Circuit carefully noted that the level of resistance offered by both arrestees was quite limited. . . . Lash’s case offers a different context. Lash twice evaded the officer’s efforts to seize him and, even after two officers held his arms, continued struggling between them and fighting against their efforts to force him to the ground. This was not ‘some’ or ‘minimal’ resistance, much less a failure to facilitate the arrest of another. As the video record makes clear, Lash was actively resisting arrest in the face of increasing police efforts to control him without resorting to more substantial force. Mattos was a different case and in consequence the Ninth Circuit’s holding could not have put these officers on notice that using a Taser in this ‘specific context,’ . . . would violate Lash’s rights. And even if Mattos had dealt with closely analogous facts, that decision alone would be outweighed by the consensus position: No clearly established right is violated when an officer uses a Taser a single time against an individual actively resisting arrest.”)

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194, 1202-04 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (“Fourth Amendment Class members urge us to find that ‘the Fourth Amendment prohibits blanket strip searches of [detainees] arrested on minor charges,’ at least where no detainees were held in the general population and ‘there [is] no significant contraband problem.’ . . . Like the district court, however, we have no need to reach the merits of this contested constitutional question in order to find Dillard entitled to qualified immunity. Under our decision in Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 384 (D.C.Cir.2011), any Fourth Amendment right Dillard might have violated was insufficiently clearly established at the time. . . . In Bame, this Court, addressing only the ‘clearly established’ stage of the qualified immunity analysis, found Dillard entitled to qualified immunity for Fourth Amendment claims brought by male plaintiffs—claims otherwise virtually indistinguishable from those brought by Fourth Amendment Class members in this case. Like class members, Bame plaintiffs were arrested for non-drug, non-violent offenses, held temporarily at ‘various police holding facilities,’ brought to the Superior Court ‘to await disposition of the charges against them,’ ‘strip searched upon arrival’ at the Superior Court cellblock, placed together in holding cells, and released directly from the Superior Court cellblock without spending any time in general jail populations. . . . The strip searches at issue in Bame occurred in September 2002, near the end of the Fourth Amendment Class period. . . . [L]ike the district court, we see no daylight between the claims we rejected in Bame and the ones Fourth Amendment Class members press here. . . . Although class members obviously disagree with Bame, that decision is binding on us. As a result, Dillard is entitled to qualified immunity because the Fourth Amendment right he is accused of violating was not clearly established at the time of any violation.”

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194, 1205, 1206 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Rogers, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I write principally because this court, as in ten other circuits, should ‘clearly establish[],’ Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818–19 (1982), that indiscriminate strip searching of individuals awaiting presentment on non-violent, non-drug offenses who are not held in the general population is unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution in the absence of reasonable suspicion an individual possesses contraband or weapons. . . . In the absence of en banc review, Bame, 637 F.3d 380, is the law of the circuit. . . . In Bame, the court applied the doctrine of constitutional avoidance and did not decide whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred. . . . Not deciding the constitutional question ‘threatens to leave standards of official conduct permanently in limbo.’ Camreta, 131 S.Ct. at 2031. By proceeding directly to the immunity question, not only do ‘[c]ourts fail to clarify uncertain questions, fail to address novel claims, fail to give guidance to officials about how to comply with legal requirements,’ id., but the failure to decide constitutional questions ‘may frustrate “the development of constitutional precedent” and the promotion of law-abiding behavior,’ id. (quoting Pearson, 555 U.S. at 237). Also since Bame, six Justices of the Supreme Court have expressed unease with the type of indiscriminate strip searching engaged in by the Superior Court Marshal’s Office that is challenged here and was challenged in Bame. See Florence v. Bd. of Chosen Freeholders of Cnty. of Burlington, —U.S. —, 132 S.Ct. 1510, 1523 (2012) (Roberts, CJ., concurring); id. at 1524 (Alito, J., concurring); id. at 1525 (Breyer, J., joined by Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ., dissenting). . . . Nearly every other circuit court of appeals (and the District of Columbia’s highest court, see United States v. Scott, 987 A.2d 1180, 1196–97 (D.C.2010)) has understood that the humiliating and essentially non-productive practice of strip searching pre-arraignment arrestees not held in the general population is an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment in the absence of reasonable suspicion. [collecting cases] The Third Circuit has yet to address the issue, rejecting only a Fourth Amendment challenge to blanket strip searches upon arrestees admission to the general jail population. See Florence v. Bd. of Chosen Freeholders of Cnty. of Burlington, 621 F.3d 296, 298–99, 311 (3d Cir.2010). Evidence before the courts and in the instant case confirms that modern technology and law enforcement experience have shown that indiscriminate strip searching of non-violent, non-drug pre-arraignment arrestees after the use of metal detectors and patdowns to locate contraband rarely yields additional security benefits. . . . Members of the Fourth Amendment class here were not being held in the general population with post-arraignment arrestees and strip searches in their circumstances illustrate one aspect of the Justices’ unease in Florence, 132 S.Ct. at 1523, 1524, 1525. Applying the canon of constitutional avoidance in this circuit is unwarranted, particularly in view of the recurring court challenges to indiscriminate strip searching by the U.S. Marshals Service in the Nation’s Capital, the frequent situs of demonstrations as in Bame. . . . The United States advises that the U.S. Marshals Service has abandoned the challenged strip searching policy and practice. . . . This does not ensure that the practice will not be revived, much less provide guidance for new policies and practices, promote law-abiding behavior, or justify the court in not ‘clearly establish[ing]’ that the Fourth Amendment rights of the appellant class were violated by the Superior Court Marshal. Joining the ten other circuit courts of appeals, I would hold that the indiscriminate strip searching of the Fourth Amendment class in the absence of reasonable suspicion violated the Fourth Amendment.”)

Taylor v. Reilly, 685 F.3d 1110, 1113, 1117 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (“[W]e begin (and end) with an examination of whether the right the plaintiff asserts was ‘clearly established’ at the time of his 2001 and 2005 parole hearings. . . . A parole official applying the 2000 Regulations at Taylor’s parole hearings would not have had reason to know that doing so would create a ‘significant risk’ of longer incarceration than applying the 1987 Regulations. If there were any difference in the ultimate outcome for Taylor, it would not have become apparent without a searching comparison of the application of each of the two sets of regulations to the facts of his case. Hence, although it was clearly established at the relevant times that applying new parole regulations creating a significant risk of longer incarceration violates the Ex Post Facto Clause, it would not have been clear to reasonable parole officials that applying the new regulations to Taylor would actually create such a risk. Nor had any case required officials—particularly officials who did not already have a basis for believing there was such a risk—to conduct a searching comparison before deciding which regulations to apply.”)

Youngbey v. March, 676 F.3d 1114, 1116, 1117, 1124, 1126 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (“We need not address on this appeal whether the officers’ no-knock, nighttime search violated appellees’ Fourth Amendment rights. . . The dispositive question here is whether, given the circumstances presented by the undisputed record facts, a reasonable police officer would have known that the failure to knock or the nighttime search violated appellees’ clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Since we have found neither controlling precedent of the Supreme Court or this circuit, nor a consensus of persuasive authority from our sister circuits, we must reverse. . . . [I]n determining whether the Fourth Amendment rights at issue are clearly established, a court must look to ‘cases of controlling authority in [its] jurisdiction.’ . . . [H]aving carefully considered the controlling precedent of the Supreme Court and this circuit, as well as the authority from our sister circuits, we agree with appellants that their no-knock entry of appellees’ home did not violate ‘clearly established law.’ . . . We have little trouble in concluding that there is no clearly established law under the Fourth Amendment that prohibits the nighttime execution of a warrant, where, as here, the warrant does not prohibit such a search. Neither controlling precedent from the Supreme Court or this circuit, nor a consensus of persuasive authority from our sister circuits show that the nighttime search here violated the Fourth Amendment.”)

Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 771-73 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (“As it was not clearly established in 2004 that the Fifth and Eighth Amendments apply to aliens detained at Guantanamo Bay—where the Supreme Court has since held the Suspension Clause applies—it plainly was not clearly established in 2004 that the Fifth and Eighth Amendments apply to aliens held in Iraq and Afghanistan— where no court has held any constitutional right applies. . . . The plaintiffs urge us to follow the now-optional Saucier procedure and decide, first, whether they have ‘alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all,’ . . . although we may ultimately conclude any such right was not clearly established at the time of the defendants’ alleged misconduct. . . The Saucier procedure, however, is not appropriate in most cases. Often ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . In such a case, deciding the existence of the constitutional right vel non is ‘an essentially academic exercise,’ . . . that ‘runs counter to the older, wiser judicial counsel not to pass on questions of constitutionality . . . unless such adjudication is unavoidable,’ . . . and results in the ‘substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources on difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case[.]’ . . The Saucier approach can also preclude an affected party from obtaining appellate review of a decision that could significantly affect its future actions. . . If a court decides that the defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional right but is entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established at the time, the 'prevailing' defendant presumably would not be able to appeal the adverse constitutional holding. . . cf. Camreta v. Greene . . . (official who prevails on qualified immunity in district court may not be able to obtain appellate review, notwithstanding availability of certiorari review to official who prevails on qualified immunity on appeal). As in Rasul II, we believe '[c]onsiderations of judicial restraint favor exercising the Pearson option with regard to [the] plaintiffs' Bivens claims.'").

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 384, 386 (D.C. Cir. 2011) ("In this case the principle of constitutional avoidance counsels that we turn directly to the second question. As the Court recognized in Pearson itself, 'There are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.' . . This is such a case. Therefore the first and, as it happens, only question we address is whether it was clearly established in September 2002 that strip searching an arrestee before placing him in a detention facility without individualized, reasonable suspicion was unconstitutional. To answer this question, 'we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view,' Johnson v. District of Columbia, 528 F.3d 969, 976 (D.C.Cir.2008)—if there is one. . . . We conclude the law in 2002 did not clearly establish that strip searching all male arrestees prior to placement in holding cells at the Superior Court violated the Fourth Amendment. The governing precedent was then, as it is now, Bell v. Wolfish, and nothing in Bell requires individualized, reasonable suspicion before strip searching a person entering a detention facility. . . . We are aware of no Supreme Court case . . . that suggests a reasonable officer could not have believed his actions were lawful despite a consensus among the courts of appeals when a precedent of the Supreme Court supports the lawfulness of his conduct. A different reading of Bell by the several circuits to have considered the issue before 2002 could not 'clearly establish' the unconstitutionality of strip searches in this context. That Powell and Bull came down after 2002 is of no moment; those opinions simply accord with our own understanding that Bell did not establish the unconstitutionality of a strip search under conditions like those present here. . . . Because there was in 2002 no clearly established constitutional prohibition of strip searching arrestees without individualized, reasonable suspicion, we need not consider whether Dillard had individual suspicion as to each of the plaintiffs.'")

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 388, 392, 398-400 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (Rogers, J., dissenting) ("Contrary to the principles underlying qualified immunity as a limitation on the occasions when liability for unconstitutional conduct by a public official will be excused, the majority holds the conduct is to be evaluated by recently articulated law and not, as the Supreme Court has instructed, by the clearly established law reflected in the consensus of persuasive authority at the time of the conduct. In so doing, this is the first time a circuit court of appeals has suggested that the protections of the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution against unreasonable searches do not extend to an individual arrested for a non-violent minor offense who is awaiting arraignment apart from the general population of detainees, and is subjected to a strip search in the absence of reasonable suspicion he is hiding contraband or weapons. This runs contrary to the consensus of ten circuit courts of appeals at the time of the challenged strip searches. To reach this result the majority tramples over Supreme Court precedent and gives short shrift to the protections of the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . [P]rior to 2002 all ten of the circuit courts of appeal to address the open question from Bell held that strip searches of arrestees for non-violent minor offenses in the absence of reasonable suspicion were unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . In allowing Marshal Dillard to claim qualified immunity based on post-2002 circuit court of appeals decisions, the majority returns to the pre-Harlow subjective standard whereby a public official is empowered to read a Supreme Court decision on the Fourth Amendment (Bell) as being conclusive on the constitutionality of strip searches of pre-arraignment arrestees such as the plaintiffs despite the clearly established consensus among the other circuit courts of appeals and district court opinions in the official's circuit. As the Supreme Court has adhered to the objective standard adopted in Harlow, the public official has no such authority. . . . The majority misses the point in its discussion of how the ten circuit courts of appeals had interpreted Bell as of 2002. First, for purpose of claiming qualified immunity the Supreme Court has already advised public officials of the standard to which they must conform their conduct: clearly established law as evidenced by a consensus of persuasive authority at the time of their conduct. Of course, had the Supreme Court held, or were this court to hold, that the challenged conduct is Constitutionally permissible, which the majority does not hold, then the plaintiffs would have no Bivens claim. . . . But the subjective belief of a public official about the law is not the test. . . . The question left open in Bell was answered for Marshal Dillard before September 2002 by a consensus of persuasive authority from the circuit courts of appeals and controlling authority from the federal district court having jurisdiction over his conduct. These courts, upon applying Bell's balancing test, had uniformly held that the Fourth Amendment protects pre-arraignment arrestees who like the plaintiffs were arrested for non-violent minor offenses from strip searches absent reasonable individualized suspicion of hiding contraband or weapons. . . . The Eleventh and Ninth Circuits have the authority to change clearly established law upon rehearing en banc, but under Supreme Court precedent Marshal Dillard had no such authority to ignore clearly established law. . . . The Supreme Court aimed to protect Constitutional rights by limiting the availability of qualified immunity to those officials who learn the law as it stands before they act and then act in accordance with that law, not those who apply their subjective views instead. . . . The majority's approach means there are no objective limits to the scope of qualified immunity because a court may one day hold that the settled consensus of persuasive authority misapprehended a Supreme Court opinion on the requirements of the Constitution.”)

Rasul v. Myers, 563 F.3d 527, 529, 530 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (“There is another reason why we should not decide whether Boumediene portends application of the Due Process Clause and the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause to Guantanamo detainees—and it is on this ground we will rest our decision on remand. The doctrine of qualified immunity shields government officials from civil liability to the extent their alleged misconduct ‘does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’. . . Our initial opinion followed the requirement of Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), that courts must first determine whether the alleged facts make out a violation of a constitutional right; if the plaintiff satisfies this first step, then the court must determine whether the asserted right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the violation. . . . After our initial decision, the Supreme Court handed down Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009). Pearson ruled that the Saucier sequence is optional and that lower federal courts have the discretion to decide only the more narrow ‘clearly established’ issue ‘in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . . Considerations of judicial restraint favor exercising the Pearson option with regard to plaintiffs’ Bivens claims in Counts 5 and 6. The immunity question is one that we can ‘rather quickly and easily decide,’ . . . –and already have. . . . We thus follow the ‘older, wiser judicial counsel ‘not to pass on questions of constitutionality ... unless such adjudication is unavoidable.’” . . . In view of Saucier, constitutional adjudication was “unavoidable” when we rendered our initial decision, but given Pearson that is no longer true. Our vacated opinion explained why qualified immunity insulates the defendants from plaintiffs’ Bivens claims. . . . Boumediene does not affect what we wrote. No reasonable government official would have been on notice that plaintiffs had any Fifth Amendment or Eighth Amendment rights. . . . At the time of their detention, . . . neither the Supreme Court nor this court had ever held that aliens captured on foreign soil and detained beyond sovereign U.S. territory had any constitutional rights—under the Fifth Amendment, the Eighth Amendment, or otherwise.”).

Celikgogus v. Rumsfeld, Nos. 06–1996 (RCL), 08–1677(RCL), 2013 WL 378448, *6 (D.D.C. Feb. 1, 2013) (“In Rasul II, the court ‘exercis[ed] the Pearson option with regard to plaintiffs’ Bivens claims,’ . . . and determined that the plaintiffs’ Fifth and Eighth Amendment rights were not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violations. . . . The court reasoned that ‘[a]t the time of [plaintiffs’] detention, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had ever held that aliens captured on foreign soil and detained beyond sovereign U.S. territory had any constitutional rights.’ . . . Again, plaintiffs’ constitutional claims fail because they are legally indistinguishable from those addressed in Rasul II. Because it was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violations that ‘aliens captured on foreign soil and detained beyond sovereign U.S. territory had any constitutional rights,’ defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims.”)

Estate of Gaither ex rel. Gaither v. District of Columbia, 833 F.Supp.2d 110, 123 (D.D.C. 2011) (“The Court need not decide whether this factual record does or does not in fact amount to a constitutional violation. Rather, the important point is that Plaintiff has not and cannot point to a single case predating the challenged conduct that would indicate that the precedent existing at the time of Gaither’s death ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ Al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083. In the final analysis, after reviewing the legal landscape ‘in light of the specific context of this case’ and ‘not as a broad general proposition,’ . . . the Court cannot conclude that the Defendant Correctional Officers were on notice that their conduct would be ‘clearly unlawful[.]’” Segrain v. Duffy, 118 F.4th 45, 58-59 (1st Cir. 2024) (“We affirm the dismissal of the leg sweep claim against Glendinning based on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: we hold that Glendinning is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because Segrain has not established that the leg sweep constituted a violation of a clearly established right as of June 28, 2018. And given this conclusion, we need not reach the question of ‘whether under the facts alleged [Glendinning’s leg sweep] conduct violated a constitutional right.’ . . . Segrain does not point us to either a First Circuit case or a sufficient consensus of persuasive authority clearly establishing that Glendinning’s use of a leg sweep under the circumstances was an Eighth Amendment violation. Rather, Segrain references only two out-of-circuit decisions, both published prior to June 28, 2018, in support of his argument that the leg sweep could constitute such a violation. . . . To demonstrate clearly established law, cases cited need not be ‘directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Treats is analogous in many ways to Segrain’s case under his version of the facts. However, Treats alone is far from the type of ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ necessary to meet the ‘clearly established’ standard. . . . Accordingly, Glendinning is entitled to qualified immunity on the leg sweep Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Segrain v. Duffy, 118 F.4th 45, 59-61, 64-67 (1st Cir. 2024) (“We find that a reasonable jury could hold that, in sum, the use of pepper spray amounted to unconstitutional excessive force. We then proceed to assess Duffy’s qualified immunity defense and conclude that he is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of litigation. Accordingly, we vacate the district court’s judgment as to this claim and remand for further proceedings in line with this opinion. . . . A substantial body of caselaw suggests that the application of pepper spray to a person’s face after the person has already been fully subdued can be considered greater than de minimis force. In the First Circuit, we have stated generally that the ‘excessive use of tear gas by prison officials can amount to an Eighth Amendment violation.’ . . . Multiple other circuits have found that the use of pepper spray can be more than de minimis force when used against a person who does not pose a substantial threat and/or when the spray is used in quantities greater than necessary. . . . Based on the evidence of Segrain’s physical reactions to the spray in addition to the other evidence related to the sequence of events described above, a reasonable jury could consider Duffy’s use of pepper spray against Segrain to be a greater than de minimis use of force. . . . Given that a reasonable jury could find that a majority of these factors weigh against Duffy for the reasons described above, the jury could reasonably infer that Duffy’s use of pepper spray was ‘maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.’ . . . Accordingly, the jury could find that both the objective and subjective prongs of the excessive force analysis were satisfied, and thus that Duffy’s use of pepper spray against Segrain constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . Appellees argue that, even if Duffy’s use of pepper spray constituted an Eighth Amendment violation, qualified immunity shields him from liability. We proceed to decide this legal question even though the district court did not reach it. . . . Because there is ‘sufficient evidence to make out an excessive force claim, [Duffy] is not entitled to qualified immunity on the first’ step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . At this summary judgment stage, we find that Duffy is also not entitled to qualified immunity on the second step because, for the reasons set out below, clearly established law as of June 28, 2018 prohibited Duffy from unnecessarily spraying Segrain with pepper spray at a time when he was restrained and did not pose any reasonable threat. [Court discusses case law] In light of this body of caselaw, we conclude that ‘a robust consensus of persuasive authority[]’ . . . has established that the use of pepper spray by prison officials against a detained person when that person is no longer resisting and no longer presents any reasonable safety threat is an Eighth Amendment violation[.] . . . Although ‘each of the[] cases [described above] presented unique sets of facts that in some respects differ from the facts presented in the case at hand,’ . . . ‘[the Supreme] Court’s case law does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established’ if ‘existing precedent [has] placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate[.] . . . That is the case here: existing precedent as of June 28, 2018 made clear to every reasonable officer that the unnecessary use of pepper spray on an incarcerated person who was restrained and did not pose any reasonable threat constitutes an Eighth Amendment violation. Prison regulations governing correctional officers’ conduct can also be relevant to determining whether a right was clearly established. . . . RIDOC policy states that ‘RIDOC Officers may only use force when necessary,’ they ‘may only use the reasonable force necessary to accomplish the required task,’ and ‘[o]nce the threat or resistance displayed by a subject stops or diminishes, force utilized by Officers in response must cease or diminish.’ A reasonable jury could find that Duffy used pepper spray unnecessarily against Segrain after any ‘threat or resistance’ by Segrain had ‘stop[ped] or diminish[e]d.’ Such an action would violate RIDOC policy, which bolsters Segrain’s position that a reasonable officer in Duffy’s circumstances would have known that his conduct was unlawful. . . . Considering the RIDOC regulation on top of the substantial body of caselaw discussed above, we conclude that the law governing Duffy’s use of unconstitutional excessive force was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Accordingly, Duffy is not entitled to qualified immunity for his use of pepper spray against Segrain at this stage of the litigation.”)

Segrain v. Duffy, 118 F.4th 45, 68-69 (1st Cir. 2024) (“To refute the district court’s conclusion on his decontamination claim, Segrain cites several out-of-circuit cases in support of his argument that a reasonable jury could find that the decontamination delay constituted an Eighth Amendment excessive force violation. But we need not reach the constitutional issue because we find that it was not clearly established as of the date of the incident that a delay in decontamination from pepper spray for the length of time Segrain alleges constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . [T]he law in this area was not ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that’ a delay in decontamination for the length of time Segrain alleges was unlawful. . . . Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Segrain’s claim that the delay in decontamination violated his Eighth Amendment rights.”)

Bannon v. Godin, 99 F.4th 63, 79-80, 83-86 (1st Cir. 2024) (“The record makes clear that any reasonable officer would have concluded that Root posed an immediate threat both to the officers and to the public both before and at the time of the fatal split-second decisions by six officers to shoot Root. The first factor above thus weighs in favor of the officers. The test is not, as the dissent puts it, whether Root ‘pose[d] an immediate threat to police officers or civilians.’ Instead, the correct test is whether a reasonable officer on the scene could believe he did so. . . . Bannon’s appeal, in the end, comes down to an argument that the officers and an independent witness did not see what they consistently testified to and say they saw: that, just before each of the officers made the decision to fire, Root appeared to reach for a gun in his jacket. . . . That movement, under the undisputed circumstances, would lead reasonable officers to conclude that Root posed an immediate threat to the safety of both the officers and the nearby public. . . .Six officers operating under ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ ‘circumstances,’ . . . all made identical and simultaneous ‘split-second judgments,’ . . . that deadly force was necessary to protect themselves and the nearby public from Root. No reasonable juror could conclude that all six of those officers unanimously, independently, and simultaneously reached an unreasonable conclusion. . . . Root led officers on a high-speed chase through heavily trafficked streets during the morning rush hour after pointing an apparent gun at law enforcement officers at a hospital, crashing his car into civilian cars, and continuing to run away. Under those circumstances, ‘[t]he speed with which officers had to respond to unfolding events,’ . . . points unequivocally in favor of the reasonableness of the officers’ use of force here. Under the totality of the circumstances, no reasonable jury could conclude that the officers acted unreasonably in employing deadly force against Root in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We affirm entry of summary judgment for the defendants on Bannon’s § 1983, MCRA, assault and battery, and wrongful death claims arising from the shooting. . . . We independently conclude that the officers are entitled to summary judgment on Bannon’s § 1983 and MCRA claims. . . . based on qualified immunity. . . .Bannon has failed to ‘identif[y] a single precedent finding a Fourth Amendment violation under similar circumstances.’ . . . We have already explained why the cases on which Bannon principally relies, such as Woodcock and Estate of Jones, involve factual scenarios too dissimilar from those confronted by the officers here to clearly establish any relevant right. Bannon cites Franklin v. City of Charlotte, 64 F.4th 519, 532-34 (4th Cir. 2023), a case which was decided over three years after the shooting in February 2020, and so could not have placed the officers on notice of a potential constitutional violation at the time of the incident. . . . There, the man shot by officers was not aggressive or threatening, did not attempt to resist or flee, and sought to comply with police orders to drop his weapon by ‘carefully pull[ing] [his] firearm out of his jacket, point[ing] it at no one, and [holding] it with just one hand from the top of the barrel’ in a ‘non-firing grip.’ . . . In addition to the clearly established law supporting the officers, we also hold that ‘objectively reasonable officers ... would not have understood the[se] actions to violate the law,’ . . . for the reasons discussed earlier. The officers thus are entitled to qualified immunity on that independent basis. . . . On this issue the dissent begins from the premise, not supported by the record, ‘that ... a reasonable factfinder could disbelieve the officers’ testimony and find that Root was not and could not act threateningly at the time of the shooting.’ We have already explained in detail why, properly considering the totality of the circumstances, this premise is incorrect under the well-settled precedent of our circuit. From that erroneous premise the dissent, taking language from Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 39-40 (1st Cir. 2016), argues “‘that a reasonable officer in [the officers’] position would have understood that” shooting a person who is bleeding on the ground and unable to make sudden movements “constituted excessive force in violation of that person’s Fourth Amendment rights.”’ . . . Stamps concerned one officer who shot a man who ‘was fully complying with the orders he was given, was unarmed and flat on his stomach in the hallway, and [who] constituted no threat.’ . . . Even on the dissent’s own preferred read of the evidence, here Root was understood to be armed, was failing to comply with officer orders, and had, at least until seconds earlier, posed a real threat to officers and the general public by virtue of his erratic driving at high speeds. Unlike Stamps, this is not a case where officers ‘sho[t] a person who [wa]s bleeding on the ground and unable to make sudden movements,’ . . . for all the reasons discussed above. We affirm the entry of summary judgment on the § 1983 and MCRA claims for the several reasons stated based on qualified immunity.”)

Perry v. Spencer, 94 F.4th 136, 143, 146-69 (1st Cir. 2024) (en banc) (“Rehearing the case en banc, we affirm the District Court’s grant of summary judgment to the defendants based on qualified immunity. We do so on the ground that, while Perry supportably has shown that his segregated confinement implicated a liberty interest and that the defendants denied him the process that was due to him before depriving him of that interest, there is no basis for concluding on this record that it would have been clear to a reasonable corrections officer that the confinement implicated a liberty interest. In so holding, we clarify both the circumstances in which the use of solitary confinement results in a deprivation of a liberty interest that the Due Process Clause protects and the process that is due in consequence of such a deprivation. . . . We have discretion to bypass the first step if we conclude that the right was not clearly established at the time of its alleged violation. . . . We decline to bypass that first step here, however, because of the stakes involved in the use of prolonged solitary confinement and the concomitant need to provide legal clarity in this area. . . . A ‘liberty’ interest that the Due Process Clause protects ‘may arise from two sources -- the Due Process Clause itself and the laws of the States.’ . . . The Court has not held that a prison system’s segregated confinement of an inmate -- whether for administrative or disciplinary reasons -- implicates this first kind of liberty interest. . . . But the Court has held that the use of segregated confinement in some circumstances implicates the second kind of liberty interest -- that arising ‘from an expectation or interest created by state laws or policies.’ . . . That is the kind of liberty interest that Perry asserts is implicated here. . . . It is clear from . . . precedent, then, that the determination of when, if ever, the imposition of solitary confinement less onerous than that at issue in Wilkinson implicates a state-created liberty interest is partly a function of the baseline that the ‘ordinary incidents of prison life’ establish. We thus need to describe what those ‘incidents’ are. That is not an easy task, given the available precedent. But, as we will explain, certain clear principles do exist to guide the inquiry. [court discusses approaches taken by various Circuits] We have not purported in the wake of Skinner to assess which, if any, of the baselines described above is the proper one for defining the ‘ordinary incidents of prison life.’ Nor have we identified comprehensively what those ‘incidents’ are. . . . As an initial matter, Sandin and Wilkinson lead us to conclude that the ‘ordinary incidents of prison life’ include only the conditions of confinement for inmates within the state prison system at issue, rather than the conditions of confinement that may be imposed by other states on inmates in their custody. . . . Next, a review of Sandin, Wilkinson, and case law from our sister circuits leads us to the conclusion that, within a given prison system, segregated confinement (even when it amounts to solitary confinement) may in some circumstances be an ‘ordinary incident of prison life.’ . . . On the flip side, however, Sandin also indicates that segregation less severe than that involved in Wilkinson is not always an ‘ordinary incident of prison life,’ no matter its nature and duration. . . . In fact, no circuit now holds that the bare legal possibility that a prison administrator may impose solitary confinement less severe than that at issue in Wilkinson on a member of the general prison population in and of itself makes any form of solitary confinement an ‘ordinary incident of prison life’ in that prison system regardless of the nature and duration of that confinement. Rather, the circuits agree that even when the conditions of confinement at issue in a given case are no harsher than those that may obtain in ‘most solitary confinement facilities,’ . . . and even when the regulations in a particular prison system permit officials to subject members of the general population to solitary confinement for administrative rather than only disciplinary reasons, the use of solitary confinement can still constitute an ‘atypical and significant hardship’ rather than an ‘ordinary incident of prison life’ in that prison system. . . . The question therefore is this: Under what circumstances does a particular form of segregation -- given its nature, duration, or the combination of its nature and duration -- constitute an ‘ordinary incident of prison life’ in a particular prison system rather than an ‘atypical and significant hardship’ relative to those incidents? Here, too, Sandin is instructive. It indicates that our focus must be on distinguishing what is ‘ordinary’ and ‘normally expected’ from what is a ‘major disruption’ or a ‘dramatic departure’ from the ‘basic conditions’ of the inmate’s sentence. . . . In other words, Sandin shows that segregation will constitute an ‘ordinary incident of prison life’ within a prison system if such confinement (accounting for its specific nature and duration) would be ‘normally expected’ by such an inmate in the general prison population of that prison system. . . . The ordinary incidents of prison life that would be ‘normally expected,’ . . . are those forms of confinement that would ‘likely’ be faced[.] . . . And, by ‘likely,’ we mean ‘not that the combination of events must be more probable than not, but that there must be a substantial chance of its occurrence.’ . . . First, at least when the solitary confinement that grounds an inmate’s procedural due process claim exceeds thirty days, that confinement will constitute an ‘atypical and significant hardship’ per Skinner if, in relation to the reason for that confinement, it is ‘[ir]rational,’ ‘[in]essential,’ or ‘excessive’ in duration. . . . This presumption is warranted because solitary confinement for longer than thirty days imposes a meaningful hardship, and a member of the general prison population would not reasonably expect to be subjected to such unreasoned uses of it. This is not to say, though, that confinement beyond thirty days constitutes a per se due process violation. Second, the length of segregated confinement that amounts to solitary confinement may make that confinement an ‘atypical and significant hardship,’ based on the length alone, when the inmate can show that ‘few’ members of the general prison population have experienced similar durations of such confinement. . . . Third, as a matter of procedure and burden allocation, the solitary confinement at issue also may be shown to constitute an ‘atypical and significant hardship’ based on its prolonged nature even when the inmate makes no empirical showing as to the frequency with which the prison system at issue imposes solitary confinement of comparable length. . . . We do not identify a minimum length for grounding such a solely length-based showing that the segregated confinement constitutes an ‘atypical and significant hardship.’ . . . Fourth, and again as a matter of procedure and burden allocation, the state’s own regulations, while not the source of any liberty interest themselves, can inform the inquiry into whether the solitary confinement at issue persisted long enough to ground such a solely length-based showing that the confinement constituted an ‘atypical and significant hardship.’ . . . Thus, we conclude, in accord with LaChance, that a plaintiff may rely on the state prison system’s regulations supportably to show that the solitary confinement at issue is atypical due to its length alone, at least when the challenged confinement is longer than thirty days. A plaintiff may do so by showing that such confinement exceeds the longest defined period of time that the state's own regulations specify as the time by which an inmate subject to comparable confinement must receive notice of the factual basis for it and an opportunity for rebuttal. . . . When such a showing has been made, it is fair to proceed on the understanding (if not rebutted) that such solitary confinement is not an 'ordinary incident of prison life' within the state's prison system. . . . None of this is to say that such state regulations necessarily create a liberty interest (regardless of what showing the defendants make) or that no such interest exists in the absence of such regulations. Sandin, as we have noted, rejected a purely regulations-based focus in overturning Hewitt. In that regard, we agree with the Second Circuit that, wholly apart from what a state's regulations provide, a 'more fully developed record' might show that 'even relatively brief confinements' of more than thirty days 'under normal [segregation] conditions [are], in fact, atypical' in the prison system at issue. . . . Perry has not introduced empirical evidence about how frequently (if at all) inmates under DOC custody are held in administrative segregation for as long as he was. . . . But, his fifteen months of solitary confinement -- even prior to his initial out-of-state transfer -- is of such a length that it suffices supportably to show that it imposed on him an 'atypical and significant hardship' in the absence of the defendants making any contrary showing regarding the frequency of use of such prolonged solitary confinement for administrative reasons. This conclusion accords with those conclusions that have been reached by courts that have applied a baseline like the one that we have now adopted. . . . Having established that Perry has supportably shown that his confinement implicated a 'liberty' interest, we next must determine -- still at the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry -- whether a reasonable juror also could find that Perry was denied the process that he was due in consequence under the Due Process Clause. . . . As we will explain, we conclude that a reasonable juror could. . . . Based on the three-factor framework of Mathews v. Eldridge, . . . Wilkinson held that inmates subjected to solitary confinement in a manner that implicates a liberty interest must be afforded the 'informal, nonadversary procedures' set forth in both Hewitt and Greenholtz v. Inmates of Neb. Penal & Corr. Complex[.] . . . Those procedures require at a minimum '[n]otice of the factual basis' for the confinement. . . . and 'an opportunity to present [the inmate's] views' to the official charged with the decision to confine the inmate[.] . . . We thus begin and end our analysis at the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry into the process component of Perry's procedural due process claim with his contention regarding the 'opportunity for rebuttal' afforded to him. For, as we will explain, we conclude that Perry can supportably show on this record that he was denied that opportunity. . . . [D]espite the various forms of process that the record indisputably shows that the defendants offered Perry, the record supportably shows that he was not given the opportunity to contest the factual basis for his confinement in the SMU. Moreover, because of our previous conclusion that Perry has supportably shown that his solitary confinement implicated a state-created liberty interest by virtue of its extended duration (at least given the absence of any showing by the defendants to the contrary), Perry has also supportably shown that he was entitled to such an opportunity to contest the factual basis for his confinement as a matter of procedural due process. Accordingly, a reasonable juror could find that Perry was denied the procedural due process right that he claims. . . . Having specified the contours of the right at issue and the specific grounds on which Perry rests his claim that the record supportably shows that he was deprived of a state-created liberty interest without due process, we are now well-positioned to turn to step two of the qualified immunity inquiry. Here, our focus is on whether the defendants are entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity because the law under which a reasonable juror could supportably find that Perry was denied the right to procedural due process was not clearly established at the time of the denial. . . . [W]e conclude, reviewing de novo, . . . that the law was not clearly established that Perry’s solitary confinement implicated a liberty interest. . . . Perry certainly cannot show that it was clearly established at the time of his confinement that a reasonable juror could conclude from the nature of the DOC’s regulations that solitary confinement of greater than ninety days is excessive in duration and so for that reason alone imposes ‘an atypical and significant hardship’ on a DOC inmate. Indeed, other courts as of that time had held to the contrary. . . . Nor was it clearly established at the relevant time that the length of the solitary confinement that Perry served -- given the conditions that he endured during it -- made it, even if only when not rebutted, an ‘atypical and significant hardship.’ As we have seen, length alone can suffice to establish that solitary confinement is a hardship of that sort. Indeed, today no circuit holds otherwise. But we had not made clear prior to 2010 that administrative segregation -- even involving conditions like Perry’s -- was an atypical and significant hardship if it persisted for as long as his did. . . . Indeed, we had explained, prior to that time, that the baseline from which to measure what is such a hardship was the subject of dispute throughout federal circuits in the wake of Sandin. And we had done so in explaining our reasons for rejecting claims that prolonged periods of such confinement were hardships of that kind. . . . True, Perry’s confinement was quite lengthy. But, even still, the state of the case law within our own circuit as of the time of Perry’s solitary confinement was such that it was not clearly established from our own precedents that his confinement was an ‘atypical and significant hardship.’ . . . Thus, like the District Court . . . and the panel, . . . we agree that, Wilkinson aside, it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation of Perry’s right to procedural due process that he had been deprived of a liberty interest. He thus needs to show that there is some other basis for concluding that the confinement that he endured implicated a liberty interest in a way that would have been clearly established at the relevant time. . . . We did not address at step one of the qualified immunity inquiry whether Perry can supportably show on this record that his confinement is ‘on all fours with Wilkinson.’ But we must address that contention here, given that it is the sole remaining basis on which he may show that he was deprived of a liberty interest under clearly established law. As we will explain, though, Perry’s contention falters, notwithstanding that we have no reason to doubt that the conditions in the general prison population in Ohio during the time of the confinement at issue in Wilkinson are comparable to those of the general prison population in the DOC during the time of Perry’s confinement[, but] . . . [t]he available precedent. . . did not clearly establish that Perry’s segregated confinement was ‘indefinite’ under Wilkinson. . . . Accordingly, we agree with the defendants that it would not have been clear to a reasonable corrections officer at the time of Perry’s confinement that, under Sandin and Wilkinson, such confinement implicated a state-created liberty interest under the Due Process Clause. The defendants are thus entitled on this ground to summary judgment based on qualified immunity.”)

are entitled to qualified immunity. I do not concur in the remainder of the majority opinion. . . . The majority has chosen to exercise this discretion to address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis before addressing the second prong. Under the second prong, in my view, the grant of qualified immunity is plainly compelled. I do not join the majority's choice to exercise that discretion here, not only because I have doubts about the correctness of its analysis and its proposed guidelines, but because I think that choice is both mistaken and inappropriate under the circumstances of this case. . . . There are many reasons in this case why the court 'should address only the immunity question.' . . First, because the court finds that the appellees are entitled to qualified immunity protections on the basis that the law was not clearly established, the first prong analysis 'ha[s] no effect on the outcome of the case.' . . This is not a case where it is 'difficult to decide whether a right is clearly established without deciding precisely what the existing constitutional right happens to be.' . . Indeed, the court's ultimate holding that the law was not clearly established in no way depends upon the majority's determination as to the first prong. The court should therefore decline to 'engag[e] in the "essentially academic exercise" of determining whether that right exists at all.' . . The majority's first prong analysis moreover turns what would be a 'small case[] into [a] large one[].' . . Where an immunity question is 'one that we can "rather quickly and easily decide,"' . . principles of judicial restraint counsel against wading into 'the more difficult question whether the facts make out a constitutional violation at all[.]' . . Since LaChance, Massachusetts inmates in various types of administrative segregation have been given even greater protections than those afforded by the federal Constitution, both as a matter of Massachusetts Department of Correction (DOC) regulations and as a matter of state court decisions. Both these regulations and those judicial rules were established before this court granted en banc rehearing. . . . Because Massachusetts inmates in administrative segregation receive greater protection under state law than is required by federal due process, any future case on administrative segregation in Massachusetts is likely to 'resolve[] into whether [Massachusetts] law authorize[s] the officer's action,' and so likely will not benefit from our attempts to 'clarify the law for the future.' . . For an additional reason, recognized in Pearson, the majority's analysis of the first prong constitutional question poses the risk of being both 'premature[] and incorrect[]' due to inadequate briefing by the parties to this case.")

Perry v. Spencer, 94 F.4th 136, 174 (1st Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Howard, J., concurring) ("I agree with the unanimous judgment of the court that qualified immunity applies in this case. I write separately to note that, while I have reservations about the necessity of going further than the qualified immunity holding, I agree in large part with the majority's analysis of the liberty interest issue, and I agree that an inmate's solitary separation from the general prison population lasting longer than 30 days ordinarily implicates a liberty interest sufficient to require that the deprivation of that liberty must be attended by due process.")

Ciarametaro v. City of Gloucester, 87 F.4th 83, 90-91 (1st Cir. 2023) ("Here, Ciarametaro acknowledges that the City Officials were concerned about his testimony alienating an important local industry. In sum, the defendants' side of the Pickering scale bears substantial weight. . . . Were we required to decide finally whether the City Officials violated Ciarametaro's First Amendment rights, we would now need to balance the City’s foregoing interests against the interests of Ciarametaro and the public in his Lane testimony. . . But we need not undertake this inquiry. This is because the outcome of such a difficult and fact-bound analysis ‘can rarely be considered “clearly established,” at least in the absence of closely corresponding factual or legal precedent.’. . And Ciarametaro identifies no ‘closely corresponding’ precedent clearly establishing that the City Officials -- at the time of their actions -- could not restrict his expert testimony to preserve relationships with the Gloucester fishing community. . . . Ciarametaro’s citation to Rankin tautologically presumes that his speech was protected. But whether and how clearly Ciarametaro’s speech was protected in the first place is the crux of this entire dispute. . . .Our own review also reveals no case clearly establishing that Ciarametaro’s speech was categorically entitled to First Amendment protection. . . In fact, several appellate cases have held that a public employee’s judicial testimony was not protected under Pickering when the testimony criticized third parties with whom the public employer wished to maintain a strong working relationship. . . To be clear, we need not (and therefore do not) decide whether the value of Ciarametaro’s speech outweighed the City Officials’ interests under Pickering balancing. We hold only that the City Officials could have reasonably concluded that it did not. And even if the City Officials’ reasoning was ‘mistaken, it would not have been egregiously so [A]ccordingly, qualified immunity is available.’”)

Ablordeppey v. Walsh, 85 F.4th 27, 32-35 (1st Cir. 2023) (“We need not decide whether Appellant properly put forth both state-created danger and bodily integrity claims in his complaint because, even assuming both claims were properly advanced, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because we may address either prong of the qualified immunity analysis first, we begin (and finish) by assessing the second prong, starting with the clarity of the governing law. . . . Here, as troublesome as the factual allegations are, Appellant has failed to point to any case law clearly establishing applicable law that guarantees him the precise constitutional protections he claims, and we have found none. . . In support of his claim that Appellees violated his substantive due process rights, Appellant advances three possible theories: (1) a right to a safe working environment; (2) the state-created danger doctrine; and (3) the bodily integrity doctrine. The first of these, standing alone, is a non-starter — the Supreme Court has held that ‘[n]either the text nor the history of the Due Process Clause supports [the] claim that the governmental employer’s duty to provide its employees with a safe working environment is a substantive component of the Due Process Clause.’. . By contrast, each of Appellant’s alternate two theories are doctrines that we have previously recognized, but they have only arisen in contexts far afield from the claims presented in this case. . . .Our precedents are thus worlds apart from the particular circumstances within Soldiers’ Home here. And to the extent Appellant directs our attention to district-court and out-of-circuit cases holding that the state-created danger doctrine may be extended to cover ‘environmental’ dangers, those cases fail to demonstrate that the required consensus exists as to the type of claim presented here. . . . Based on Appellant’s allegations in the complaint, we infer that his bodily integrity claim is based on psychological trauma, given that he does not claim to have been infected with COVID-19. However, Appellant has failed to point us to cases in which a bodily integrity claim has been sustained based on psychological harm that was sustained from a voluntary employee’s exposure to risk at a medical facility. Thus, it was far from clearly established that Appellees' actions here would violate Appellant's right to bodily integrity. Lastly, Appellant asks us to follow the Supreme Court's lead in Taylor v. Riojas . . . and find that prior caselaw is not necessary for his claims to survive given that Appellees' conduct 'so obviously violate[d] the Constitution.' . . . Again, the facts in Taylor drastically differ from those before us. . . [T]he exigent circumstances of the rapidly evolving yet unknown nature of COVID-19 called for immediate action. . . . Accordingly, Appellant 'has pointed to no precedent, and we have found none, establishing that the [Appellees' COVID-19 response] violates clearly established law.' Est. of Rahim by Rahim, 51 F.4th at 418. Absent clearly established law, Appellees could not know beforehand that their alleged mismanagement of the COVID-19 outbreak at Soldiers' Home would violate Appellant's rights. While hindsight is 20/20, '[u]nder these circumstances, an objectively reasonable [government official] would not have understood the challenged conduct to violate [Appellant's rights].'"

Penate v. Sullivan, 73 F.4th 10, 19-22 (1st Cir. 2023) ("Experience over the past two decades makes clear that no-knock entries pose serious risks both to occupants and to the entering police. See, e.g., Kevin Sack, Door-Busting Drug Raids Leave a Trail of Blood, N.Y. Times, <https://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2017/03/18/us/forced-entry-warrant-drug-raid.html> (Mar. 18, 2017) (reporting that based on a Times investigation, at least 81 civilians and 13 law enforcement officers died from 2010 to 2016 in "dynamic entry" raids executed by SWAT teams, and "[s]cores of others were maimed or wounded") . . . But here, the officers had a firsthand credible report that one of the suspects had on his person a gun. Nor is this a scenario where the police relied on the presence of a gun alone; they also had a credible report that the suspect had committed a violent crime -- just over twelve hours earlier -- serious enough to incentivize resistance to being captured, and that the suspect had carried the gun on him. . . While Penate argues that any threat of danger was insufficient to justify the officers' actions, she points us to no First Circuit case or consensus of authority 'materially similar enough to have provided reasonable officers under the circumstances with fair warning that they would violate [Penate's] rights' by entering in the manner that they did, given the information they had at the time. . . So even if the decision to execute a no-knock entry violated the Fourth Amendment (an issue we do not decide), Penate's attempt to hold the officers personally liable for damages caused by an unlawful no-knock execution of the warrant must fail. . . We consider next Penate's claim that the officers used excessive force by pointing a firearm at her. . . . Pointing a weapon at a nonthreatening, compliant individual, even while executing a warrant, can constitute excessive force. . . . However, holding bystanders at gunpoint does not always constitute an excessive use of force. . . . [I]f the pointing of weapons is both reasonably necessary to secure the officers' safety and sufficiently short in duration, there will likely be no Fourth Amendment problem. . . . Penate's counsel confirmed at oral argument that under Penate's version of facts, she was held at gunpoint for only 'several seconds.' She asserts that the absolute length of the detention does not control the Fourth Amendment analysis; what matters is that she was held at gunpoint longer than necessary, because it was immediately apparent that she was not a threat to officers. We need not decide whether she is correct because we conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. In 2016, 'in the particular factual context of [this] case,' it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that a several second delay in lowering his gun upon seeing Penate violated Penate's right to be free from excessive force. . . . To be sure, Penate's situation does have some similarities to Mlodzinski and Stamps. Like the bystanders in those cases, Penate was not thought to be dangerous, she submitted to the officers' authority immediately, and according to her testimony officers pointed guns at her even after they determined she was not a threat. But those cases differ from Penate's case in an important respect: they involved periods of time longer than the 'several seconds' of gunpoint coverage that Penate experienced. Indeed, Mlodzinski contains language indicating that it might have come out differently had the detention been shorter. . . . And Rettele, another factually similar precedent, found no violation where plaintiffs were held at gunpoint for a few minutes. . . . Given this precedent, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in 2016 that pointing a gun for 'several seconds' upon warranted entry to an apartment suspected of containing a firearm (and possibly an armed suspect) constituted excessive force, or at least not so clear that 'no competent officer could have thought that [it] was permissible.'")

Punsky v. City of Portland, 54 F.4th 62, 66 (1st Cir. 2022) ("Because we can resolve the qualified immunity challenge considering the prongs in any order, . . . we start (and finish) by analyzing the second aspect of the second prong: whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his or her conduct violated Appellant's constitutional rights. . . . We find that under the particular circumstances that Appellees found themselves in, a reasonable officer in their positions could have not concluded that keeping Appellant standing with socks in cold temperatures was unlawful, especially after offering him footwear multiple times since the outset.")

Swartz v. Sylvester, 53 F.4th 693, 698 (1st Cir. 2022) ("Under the familiar two-prong framework, courts ask (1) whether the defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights and (2) whether the right at issue was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation.' . . . Though we refer to them as the first and second prong, the two prongs need not be addressed in that order. . . . Upon de novo review, we agree with the district court in that Sylvester did not violate Swartz's constitutional rights and is entitled to qualified immunity based on the first prong.")

Alston v. Town of Brookline, 997 F.3d 23, 50-51 (1st Cir. 2021) ("To the extent the remaining Town officials focus on the first prong of qualified immunity in their appellate brief, that reliance is mislaid. They have made, at most, generalized and non-specific arguments with respect to each individual defendant. Since we already have held that Alston has survived summary judgment on the merits of his First Amendment retaliation claims, . . . such arguments are insufficient to ground a conclusion that Alston's version of the facts falls short of working a violation of his constitutional rights. . . . We also think it useful to comment upon the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. In their appellate brief, the Town officials cite that prong and state that 'the law must have been sufficiently clear that "any reasonable official in the defendant's position would have known that the challenged conduct is illegal 'in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.'"' They also discuss the Pickering balancing of the interests . . . and their claimed justifications for the termination of Alston's employment. But they do not explain why these elements of Alston's First Amendment retaliation claims fail one or more components of the second prong. Given the lack of clarity as to the arguments actually being made, we cannot now conclude that the remaining Town officials are entitled to qualified immunity. The entry of summary judgment in their favor on Alston's section 1983 free-speech retaliation claims, in both their individual and official capacities, must, therefore, be vacated. This does not mean, of course, that the district court cannot explore the qualified immunity issue in all its aspects on remand. For instance, the district court may entertain successive motions for summary judgment, . . . or address the issue at a subsequent stage of the litigation[.]. . We leave these matters to the district court's informed discretion, and we take no view of the future disposition of the issue.”)

Justiniano v. Walker, 986 F.3d 11, 27-30 (1st Cir. 2021) (“We can tackle these components of the qualified-immunity test in any order we like... Here, we’ll assume without deciding the first pieces have been shown -- Walker’s use of the pepper spray violated Justiniano’s right to be free from that force, and that right was clearly established and on the books in June 2013 -- and resolve the matter on the question of whether a reasonable, similarly situated officer would understand that Walker’s conduct violated Justiniano’s constitutional right. . . As we do so, we keep in mind that, because ‘c]ourts penalize officers for violating bright lines, not for making bad guesses in gray areas,’ . . . if the pertinent ‘legal principles are clearly established only at a level of generality so high that officials cannot fairly anticipate the legal consequences of specific actions, then the requisite notice is lacking[.]’. . We are also mindful that deciding qualified immunity at the summary-judgment stage can be tricky. . . . [A]s we’ve observed, ‘[t]he doctrinal intersection of qualified immunity principles and summary judgment principles is not well mapped,’ and ‘[p]lotting that intersection can present thorny analytic problems -- problems that are magnified because of the desire to resolve claims of qualified immunity at the earliest practicable stage of litigation.’. . Furthermore, in qualified-immunity summary-judgment cases, it’s a tug-of-war, really, between who gets the benefit of the doubt: summary judgment ‘requires absolute deference to the nonmovant’s factual assertions,’ while qualified immunity ‘demands deference to the reasonable, if mistaken, actions of the movant.’. . We aim to resolve all of this tension by framing the factual events according to summary judgment’s traditional leeway to the nonmoving party’s version of events, and then asking whether, given that story, ‘a reasonable officer should have known that his actions were unlawful.’. . Justiniano contends that the record contains enough conflicting testimony about material facts to raise a genuine dispute over whether Walker can be shielded by qualified immunity, i.e., whether Walker’s use of pepper spray was an inappropriate and excessive use of force in violation of Justiniano’s clearly established right to be free from that use of force. . . . In Justiniano’s view, since there’s no witness who testifies that Justiniano was doing anything other than simply approaching Walker when the pepper spray was deployed, it is valid to infer the nature of his movement was nonthreatening, and thus it was not reasonable for Walker to use the spray. Walker, in turn, argues that none of the facts to which Justiniano points lead to the conclusion that he is not shielded by qualified immunity, and this is so even if all of Walker’s uncorroborated testimony is removed from consideration. So now, as we leapfrog the initial elements of the qualified-immunity analysis (recall that we’re assuming arguendo that the use of the pepper spray was unreasonable and Justiniano had a clearly established right to be free from that use of force), we confront the question of whether a reasonable officer in Walker’s shoes would have understood Walker's conduct to violate Justiniano's constitutional right. . . Even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Justiniano, removing from consideration any of Walker's uncorroborated testimony, and drawing all reasonable inferences in Justiniano's favor, the record here does not support a finding that a reasonable officer would have clearly understood Walker's conduct to be an unreasonable violation of Justiniano's rights. Our careful review of the record here leaves us with these undisputed facts to sketch the contours of what happened. Kyriakides observed Justiniano driving erratically, and when they both pulled over, he was confused, distraught, and spoke unintelligibly. She was scared for Justiniano's wellbeing, as well as her own and that of passersby. After Walker hit the scene, all three civilian witnesses (Kyriakides, Silva-Winbush, and MacKeen) observed Walker at various points trying to calm down and/or stop Justiniano from approaching him by using hand gestures. They also described Justiniano as appearing distraught, even mad; none observed Justiniano heeding Walker's hand gestures to calm down or stop his approach. Silva-Winbush, who witnessed each instance of pepper-spraying, indicated that the first use of the spray (the complained-of rights-violation here) came only after Walker had 'jumped' into the highway as he continued to retreat from Justiniano. And each of these witnesses described various instances of Justiniano lunging or at least engaging in forward motion towards Walker. From an objective standpoint, a reasonable officer could have believed Justiniano posed a threat, and thus that same reasonable officer, in Walker's position, would not have believed that the initial use of pepper spray (a generally non-lethal deployment) against Justiniano constituted a violation of Justiniano's rights. A contrary finding, even a contrary inference, is simply not supportable on the evidence here. True, witnesses describe Justiniano's movements differently, and movement alone wouldn't necessarily justify the use of pepper spray. And yes, the key here is Justiniano's movements (or lack thereof, if that was the case) in the moments before and as the pepper spray was used -- Justiniano being stationary, or approaching Walker in a decidedly nonaggressive fashion, for example, because that's what a jury could rely on to make inferences that Justiniano's behavior did not warrant the use of force he received because Walker couldn't have reasonably thought Justiniano posed a threat. But there is no witness testimony that Justiniano was stationary in the moment before the pepper spray was used; rather, all the evidence points to Justiniano steadily moving towards Walker in one fashion or another. . . . Even framing the facts as favorably as we can according to Justiniano's version of events (no pen-as-weapon in the narrative, no threats issued to Walker by Justiniano), we cannot conclude on this record that a reasonable officer in Walker's position would have known his conduct (using the pepper spray) was unlawful under these circumstances. . . . Accordingly, the magistrate judge was correct that Walker is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Before we go, we note that Justiniano also briefed an argument urging us to abandon the application of qualified immunity in cases resulting in death. As we acknowledged at the outset of today's decision, we do not disagree that the issue of qualified immunity's role in our jurisprudence is topical, to say the least. But we are constrained by the precedent that led to today's outcome, and until that precedent changes, we are dutybound to apply it.”)

defendant raises the qualified immunity defense in a motion to dismiss or motion for summary judgment. . . The officers in this case did not raise their specific qualified immunity defense until they filed a motion for judgment as a matter of law at the end of the jury trial, to which the jury ruled for the officers. But this case's 'unusual posture does not affect the viability of the qualified immunity defense.' . . '[W]hen a qualified immunity defense is pressed after a jury verdict, the evidence must be construed in the light most hospitable to the party that prevailed at trial.' . . As to the unlawful entry claim, the district court declined to instruct the jury on the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement over the defense's objections, explaining that it was not adequately defined in the law. Instead the jury was instructed on the exigent circumstances exception only, and the court stated that it would consider arguments about community caretaking in the context of qualified immunity after the jury returned its verdict. . . Before the jury returned with its verdict, Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan filed a motion for judgment as a matter of law, in which they argued that their entry into both the apartment and the bedroom was justified by the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement. Further, they argued that were entitled to qualified immunity on the same grounds and because the law on community caretaking in 2013 did not clearly establish that their entry violated either brother's constitutional rights. The jury reached a unanimous verdict in favor of all of the defendants on all counts. As to the unlawful entry claim under § 1983, the jury was asked on the verdict form if Christopher or Gavin had proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Edwards, Kaplan, or Jean had violated their constitutional rights by entering either Christopher's apartment or specifically his bedroom on March 17, 2013. The jury responded 'no' to each question for each of the three officers. The district court denied as moot Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan's motion for judgment as a matter of law on the unlawful entry claim in light of the jury verdict in their favor. On July 20, 2018, the Castagnas moved for a new trial, arguing that 'the jury's finding that Defendants Kaplan, Edwards and Jean are not liable to Plaintiffs under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for the unlawful entry into Christopher Castagna's home, or, at the very least, into Christopher Castagna's bedroom,' is 'against the law, the weight of credible evidence and constitutes a miscarriage of justice.' . On January 17, 2019, the district court granted the Castagnas' motion for a new trial, finding 'that the verdict is against the law as to the warrantless entry into the home and that the warrantless entry on the facts at trial is not protected by qualified immunity.' The court said the entry into the bedroom claim was merely a subset of the entry into the home claim, thereby saying it was not an independent claim. Because the only issues still to be resolved at that point in the proceedings were legal issues, instead of holding a new trial, the court instructed the Castagnas to move orally under Fed. R. Civ. P. 52 for the court to amend the judgment so that Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan would be liable for the unlawful entry claim. Without conceding their liability, the three officers moved for a ruling that the Castagnas had not proven a right to any damages beyond nominal damages. On June 28, 2019, the district court amended its judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 52 so that it reflected a judgment in favor of Christopher and Gavin and against Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan as to the § 1983 unlawful entry claim. The court awarded the two brothers one dollar in nominal damages from each of the three officers. The court did not disturb any of the other jury verdicts. This timely appeal followed. . . . Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan were entitled to qualified immunity for the unlawful entry claim under a community caretaking theory. . . As we explain below, neither part of the test for defeating qualified immunity has been met: the officers' entry into the home was in fact constitutional under the community caretaking exception and it was not clearly established at the time of their entry that the community caretaking exception would not give them an immunity defense. . . . Edwards, Jean, and Kaplan are entitled to qualified immunity for entering Christopher's apartment under the first prong of the test for qualified immunity. . . The entry did not violate the Castagnas' constitutional rights because the officers were allowed to enter the apartment through the open door under the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement. . . . This year, after the district court in this case issued its decision, this court held that the community caretaking exception could be used to justify police officers' entry into homes as well. Caniglia v. Strom, 953 F.3d 112, 124 (1st Cir. 2020). [Note: See Caniglia v. Strom, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021) ("What is reasonable for vehicles is different from what is reasonable for homes. Cady acknowledged as much, and this Court has repeatedly 'declined to expand the scope of ... exceptions to the warrant requirement to permit warrantless entry into the home.' . . We thus vacate the judgment below and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")]. Police are entitled to enter homes without a warrant if they are performing a community caretaking function and their actions are 'within the realm of reason.' . . We apply the analysis laid out in Caniglia and hold that the officers' entry was justified under the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement. . . . The officers are entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of the qualified immunity test as well. . . In 2013, there was no clearly established law that the officers' entrance into the apartment fell outside of the scope of the community caretaking exception. As said, this circuit had not explicitly held until this year that the community caretaking exception could be applied to homes. Before 2013, some circuits had held that Cady's community caretaking exception applies only to automobiles, not homes. . . But three other circuits before that date had applied the exception to homes as well as automobiles. . . And neither the First Circuit nor the Supreme Court had held that the exception was limited to automobiles. . . . There was no consensus of persuasive authority at the time of the officers' entry that the community caretaking exception could only apply to automobile searches. We reached the same conclusion in MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2014), an opinion that post-dates the Castagnas' party by a year but relies on precedents that all pre-date the party. . . . Nor was there a consensus of authority in 2013 that the specific circumstances surrounding the officers' entry into Christopher's apartment made their entry an unreasonable application of the community caretaking doctrine. This circuit's pre-2013 community caretaking decisions had established a framework for when the exception might apply to officers' searches. These decisions were the basis for the law applied in Caniglia. . . . Given this legal background, the officers could not have been on notice that their actions would clearly violate the Castagnas' constitutional rights. The officers testified that they were not intending to arrest anyone at the party; as in Rohrig, they merely wanted to make sure the music was turned down so it would stop disturbing the neighbors. As in York, they were concerned with mitigating the risk of harm of excessive drunkenness. Like the officer in Quezada, the police officers here knocked on the door and announced themselves before entering. Their actions were at least arguably within the scope of the community caretaking exception. And for many of the same reasons discussed earlier in the opinion, their actions were at least arguably reasonable under the law in 2013. As this circuit held in MacDonald, a similar case in which officers announced their presence at an open door, received no reply, and entered a home without a warrant, ‘neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff’s home was illegal.’. . ‘Qualified immunity is meant to protect government officials where no such red flags are flying, and we discern no error in the application of the doctrine to this case.’”)

Jean, 2 F.4th 9, 9-10 (1st Cir. 2021) (“In the decision the Castagnas seek to revisit, we held that three Boston police officers were entitled to qualified immunity when, without a warrant, they entered the open door to Christopher Castagna’s apartment after observing apparently underage drinkers exiting the premises. . . We reached this conclusion because at the time of the search, ‘there was no clearly established law that the officers’ entrance into the apartment fell outside of the scope of the community caretaking exception’ to the Fourth Amendment’s warrant exception. . . We cited a number of cases predating the search that held such searches were in fact lawful. . . The Supreme Court’s decision in Caniglia v. Strom, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021), which held that police officers may not always enter a home without a warrant to engage in community caretaking functions, . . . does not alter our holding. To defeat the officers’ assertion of qualified immunity, the Castagnas must show that the officers’ conduct was clearly established as unlawful in 2013. . . . As controlling authority in this Circuit establishes, in 2013 there was no clearly established rule preventing the officers from entering the apartment. . . The Castagnas have not shown that our decision was erroneous, much less demonstrated their entitlement to extraordinary relief. The motion is denied.”)

Caniglia v. Strom, 953 F.3d 112, 118, 122-33 (1st Cir. 2020), vacated and remanded, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021) (“There are widely varied circumstances, ranging from helping little children to cross busy streets to navigating the sometimes stormy seas of neighborhood disturbances, in which police officers demonstrate, over and over again, the importance of the roles that they play in preserving and protecting communities. Given this reality, it is unsurprising that in Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973), the Supreme Court determined, in the motor vehicle context, that police officers performing community caretaking functions are entitled to a special measure of constitutional protection. . . We hold today — as a matter of first impression in this circuit — that this measure of protection extends to police officers performing community caretaking functions on private premises (including homes). Based on this holding and on our other conclusions, we affirm the district court’s entry of summary judgment for the defendants in this highly charged case. . . . The defendants seek to wrap both of the contested seizures in the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement. Notably, they do not invoke either the exigent circumstances or emergency aid exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . Nor do the defendants contend that their seizures of the plaintiff and his firearms were carried out pursuant to a state civil protection statute. . . . Since Cady, the community caretaking doctrine has become ‘a catchall for the wide range of responsibilities that police officers must discharge aside from their criminal enforcement activities.’. . In accordance with ‘this evolving principle, we have recognized

(in the motor vehicle context) a community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement.’. . . Elucidating this exception, we have held that the Fourth Amendment’s imperatives are satisfied when the police perform ‘noninvestigatory duties, including community caretaker tasks, so long as the procedure employed (and its implementation) is reasonable.’. . . Police officers enjoy wide latitude in deciding how best to execute their community caretaking responsibilities and, in the typical case, need only act ‘within the realm of reason’ under the particular circumstances. . . . Until now, we have applied the community caretaking exception only in the motor vehicle context. . . . To be sure, the doctrine’s reach outside the motor vehicle context is ill-defined and admits of some differences among the federal courts of appeals. . . . A few circuits have indicated that the community caretaking exception cannot justify a warrantless entry into a home. [citing cases] Several other circuits, though, have recognized that the doctrine allows warrantless entries onto private premises (including homes) in particular circumstances. [citing cases] So, too, a handful of circuits — including our own — have held that police may sometimes seize individuals or property other than motor vehicles in the course of fulfilling community caretaking responsibilities. [citing cases] Today, we join ranks with those courts that have extended the community caretaking exception beyond the motor vehicle context. In taking this step, we recognize what we have termed the ‘special role’ that police officers play in our society. . . . After all, a police officer — over and above his weighty responsibilities for enforcing the criminal law — must act as a master of all emergencies, who is ‘expected to aid those in distress, combat actual hazards, prevent potential hazards from materializing, and provide an infinite variety of services to preserve and protect community safety.’. . . At its core, the community caretaking doctrine is designed to give police elbow room to take appropriate action when unforeseen circumstances present some transient hazard that requires immediate attention. . . . Understanding the core purpose of the doctrine leads inexorably to the conclusion that it should not be limited to the motor vehicle context. Threats to individual and community safety are not confined to the highways. Given the doctrine’s core purpose, its gradual expansion since Cady, and the practical realities of policing, we think it plain that the community caretaking doctrine may, under the right circumstances, have purchase outside the motor vehicle context. We so hold. This holding does not end our odyssey. It remains for us to determine whether the community caretaking doctrine extends to the types of police activity that the defendants ask us to place under its umbrella. First, we must consider the involuntary seizure of an individual whom officers have an objectively reasonable basis for believing is suicidal or otherwise poses an imminent risk of harm to himself or others. Second, we must consider the temporary seizure of firearms and associated paraphernalia that police officers have an objectively reasonable basis for thinking such an individual may use in the immediate future to harm himself or others. Third, we must consider the appropriateness of a warrantless entry into an individual’s home when that entry is tailored to the seizure of firearms in furtherance of police officers’ community caretaking responsibilities. For several reasons, we conclude that these police activities are a natural fit for the community caretaking exception. . . . The short of it is that the classes of police activities challenged in this case fall comfortably within the ambit of the community caretaking exception to the warrant requirement. But that exception is not a free pass, allowing police officers to do what they want when they want. Nor does it give police carte blanche to undertake any action bearing some relation, no matter how tenuous, to preserving individual or public safety. Put bluntly, activities carried out under the community caretaking banner must conform to certain limitations. And the need to patrol vigilantly the boundaries of these limitations is especially pronounced in cases involving warrantless entries into the home. . . . The acid test in most cases will be whether decisions made and methods employed in pursuance of the community caretaking function are ‘within the realm of reason.’ . . . Because the summary judgment record shows that a reasonable officer could have found that an immediate threat of harm was posed by the plaintiff and his access to firearms, . . . we need not decide whether the community caretaking exception may ever countenance a police intrusion into the home or a seizure (whether of a person or of property) in response to some less immediate danger. . . . Here, the police intrusions at issue — specifically, the seizures of an individual for transport to the hospital for a psychiatric evaluation and of firearms within a dwelling — are of a greater magnitude than classic community caretaking functions like vehicle impoundment. In such circumstances, it may be that some standard more exacting than reasonableness must be satisfied to justify police officers’ conduct. Once again, though, we need not definitively answer this question: the record makes manifest that an objectively reasonable officer would have acted both within the realm of reason and with probable cause by responding as the officers did in this instance. . . . We conclude that no rational factfinder could determine that the defendant officers strayed beyond the realm of reason by deeming the plaintiff at risk of imminently harming himself or others. Consequently, the officers’ seizure of the plaintiff was a reasonable exercise of their community caretaking responsibilities. Thus, that seizure did not offend the Fourth Amendment. . . . On this record, an objectively reasonable officer remaining at the residence after the plaintiff’s departure could have perceived a real possibility that the plaintiff might refuse an evaluation and shortly return home in the same troubled mental state. . . . Such uncertainty, we think, could have led a reasonable officer to continue to regard the danger of leaving firearms in the plaintiff’s home as immediate and, accordingly, to err on the side of caution. . . . To close the circle, the record establishes that the methods employed by the police to effectuate the seizure of the firearms were reasonable. The officers did not ransack the plaintiff’s home, nor did they engage in a frenzied top-to-bottom search for potentially dangerous objects. Instead — relying on Kim’s directions — they tailored their movements to locate only the two handguns bearing a close factual nexus to the foreseeable harm (one of which the plaintiff had admitted throwing the previous day and the other of which had been specifically called to the officers’ attention). We add a coda. In upholding the defendants’ actions under the community caretaking doctrine, we in no way trivialize the constitutional significance of warrantless entries into a person’s residence, disruption of the right of law-abiding citizens to keep firearms in their homes, or involuntary seizures of handguns. By the same token, though, we also remain mindful that police officers have a difficult job — a job that frequently must be carried out amidst the push and pull of competing centrifugal and centripetal forces. Police officers must sometimes make on-the-spot judgments in harrowing and swiftly evolving circumstances. Such considerations argue persuasively in favor of affording the police some reasonable leeway in the performance of their community caretaking responsibilities. In the circumstances of this case, we think that no rational factfinder could deem unreasonable either the officers’ belief that the plaintiff posed an imminent risk of harm to himself or others or their belief that reasonable prudence dictated seizing the handguns and placing them beyond the plaintiff’s reach. Consequently, the defendants’ actions fell under the protective carapace of the community caretaking exception and did not abridge the Fourth Amendment.”)

Caniglia v. Strom, 953 F.3d 112, 134 (1st Cir. 2020), vacated and remanded, 141 S. Ct. 1596 (2021) (“Regardless of whether the seizure of particular firearms can ever infringe the Second Amendment right — a matter on which we take no view — it was by no means clearly established in August of 2015 that police officers seizing particular firearms in pursuance of their community caretaking functions would, by doing so, trespass on the Second Amendment. Here, the plaintiff has wholly failed to identify either binding precedent or a chorus of persuasive authority ‘sufficient to send a clear signal’ to reasonable officers . . . that seizures of individual firearms pursuant to the community caretaking exception fell outside constitutional bounds. The doctrine of qualified immunity is by now familiar. We previously set forth the parameters of that doctrine. . . In general terms, the doctrine is designed to shield government officials from suit when no ‘red flags [were] flying’ at the time of the challenged action — red flags sufficient to alert reasonable officials that their conduct was unlawful. . . Because this is such a case, the defendant officers in their individual capacities are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the plaintiff’s Second Amendment claims. We therefore hold that the district court did not err in granting them summary judgment on those claims.”)

See also Caniglia v. Strom, 569 F.Supp.3d 87 (D.R.I. 2021) (on remand) (“The United States Supreme Court reaffirmed the doctrine of qualified immunity last week in two per curiam opinions. In City of Talequah, OK v. Bond, the Supreme Court held that ‘[t]he doctrine of qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability so long as their conduct “does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.”’. . . To show the law was clearly established, a party must identify precedent that ‘addresses facts like the ones at issue’ in that matter. Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, No. 20-1539, 2021 WL 4822662, at *3 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021). Moreover, ‘[i]t is not enough that a rule be suggested by then-existing precedent; the rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is “clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.”’ City of Tahlequah, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2 (citing D.C. v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 590 (2018)). Qualified immunity, the Supreme Court mandates, protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. The law on the community caretaking function as an exception to traditional warrant procedures in the home was far from clear at the time Mr. Caniglia’s cause of action arose, particularly within this Circuit. This Court previously ruled as such, and upon independent review again, those facts and findings set forth below still hold true. . . . When the First Circuit has considered whether the community caretaking function applies to searches and seizures in homes as well as cars, it observed that ‘the reach of the community caretaking doctrine is poorly defined outside of the motor vehicle milieu,’ that it ‘has not decided whether the community caretaking exception applies to police activities involving a person’s home,’ and that the case law reveals that the scope and boundaries of the community caretaking exception are nebulous.’. . . The First Circuit concluded that ‘neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff's home was illegal.' .Because of this ambiguity, the Court finds that it is not clearly established that the community caretaking exception does not apply to police activity in the home intended to preserve and protect the public. . . . Indeed, the very fact that Supreme Court disagreed with this Court and the First Circuit on the issue of community care taking function illustrates a lack of clarity. Thus, it is not possible that a reasonable Cranston Police Officer could have understood the potentially problematic nature of their conduct. Because the law was not clearly established on the community caretaking exception at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, the Court GRANTS Defendants' Second Motion for Summary Judgment with respect to the individual Defendants on the ground of qualified immunity[.] . . Plaintiff's policy arguments cannot overcome, and do not comport with, the well-established rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court on qualified immunity, which this Court is bound to follow. . . . The Court need not, and does not, address whether there was a constitutional violation in this matter. Given the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson v. Callahan, '[t]he judges of the district courts and the courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' Pearson, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009); see also City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, No. 20-1668, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021) ("We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law.") Therefore, the Court resolves this matter solely upon an analysis of the second prong of the qualified immunity doctrine.") Penate v. Hanchett, 944 F.3d 358, 366-69 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Courts need not engage in the first inquiry and may choose, in their discretion, to go directly to the second. . . We do so here. The 'clearly established' inquiry itself has two elements. . . 'The first focuses on the clarity of the law at the time of the violation. The other aspect focuses more concretely on the facts of the particular case and whether a reasonable defendant would have understood that his conduct violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights.' . . The inquiry is context-dependent; rights cannot be established 'as a broad general proposition.' . This test is refined further in supervisory liability cases. The 'clearly established' inquiry as to supervisors is bifurcated and is satisfied only when '(1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context.' Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 1998). If the constitutional right and the availability of supervisory liability that underlie a plaintiff's § 1983 claim are both clearly established, the qualified immunity analysis 'reduces to the test of objective legal reasonableness.' . Under this latter test, we ask 'whether, in the particular circumstances confronted by [the] appellant, [the] appellant should reasonably have understood that his conduct jeopardized those rights,' whether through deliberate indifference or otherwise. . . This question involves merits-like analysis but is analytically distinct and confined to the qualified immunity inquiry. . . Although we harbor grave doubts about both propositions, we will assume, without deciding, that it was clearly established as early as 2012 that lab chemists could be held liable for withholding exculpatory evidence under Brady and that a deliberately indifferent lab supervisor could be held liable for Brady violations perpetrated by subordinate chemists.⁵ As in Camilo-Robles, then, our inquiry centers on whether Hanchett, under the specific facts alleged in this case, should have ‘understood that his conduct jeopardized’ Penate’s constitutional rights. . . . We hold that Hanchett is entitled to qualified immunity because, under the circumstances alleged, an objectively reasonable lab supervisor would not have discerned that his acts and omissions threatened to violate the constitutional rights of criminal defendants whose suspected narcotics were being tested at the Lab. . . . Penate argues that Hanchett is liable for Farak’s actions because Farak’s behavior, coupled with Hanchett’s general lack of supervision in the Lab, must have given him constructive notice that there was a substantial risk that Farak was abusing drugs while testing the drug samples in Penate’s case. His complaint points to three discrete events which, according to Penate, should have put Hanchett on notice. We disagree that these events, singly or in combination, provided sufficient warning to Hanchett to constitute constructive notice that his actions or inactions amounted to a violation of Penate’s rights, so as to make him deliberately indifferent to Penate’s constitutional rights. . . . Penate pleads many facts about the Lab’s lax security protocol and Hanchett’s failure to oversee meaningfully the chemists under his supervision. But even if Hanchett were negligent in his supervisory duties, that does not suffice. These general allegations do not show Hanchett was on notice that his supervisory failings amounted to a violation of ‘the constitutional rights of others.’ . . . In sum, Penate has not shown that, under the facts alleged, Hanchett clearly acted with deliberate indifference to Farak’s alleged Brady violations or otherwise should have understood that his acts or omissions jeopardized Penate’s constitutional rights. Accordingly, Hanchett is entitled to qualified immunity, and we reverse the district court’s denial of Hanchett’s motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim.”) Eves v. LePage, 927 F.3d 575, 584, 588, 590 (1st Cir. 2019) (en banc) (“We move directly to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis and ask whether Governor LePage’s alleged conduct violated ‘clearly established’ federal law as to political affiliation discrimination. Applying this objective test, we conclude that the law on which Eves relies was not clearly established such that a reasonable governor in LePage’s situation would have concluded that the constitutional question and the policymaker exception was placed beyond doubt in Eves’s favor. . . . There was no ‘controlling authority’ or even a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority,’ . . . that would lead to the conclusion that Governor LePage can be denied immunity. Even if we were to assume that Governor LePage induced GWH to remove Eves solely because Eves was a Democrat -- and not, even in part, because of LePage’s view of Eves’s policy positions. . . . for the reasons that follow, LePage could have reasonably believed that the President of GWH was a ‘policymaker’ who could be lawfully discharged on the basis of his political affiliation. . . . Against this legal backdrop, and faced with these facts particular to MeANS, GWH, and the state of Maine, a reasonable governor could have thought that Eves’s political affiliation was relevant to his performance as President of GWH and that the policymaker exception applied to the position. At the time of these events, LePage could have concluded that no law clearly established that his communications with GWH rose to the level of unlawful First Amendment retaliation against Speaker Eves. But even if Governor LePage were mistaken as a matter of law about whether Eves's position was encompassed by the policymaking exception, any such mistake was reasonable, and a reasonable mistake of law does not defeat qualified immunity. . . . Our holding today is narrow and fact-bound: LePage is entitled to qualified immunity on Eves's political affiliation discrimination claim under the policymaker exception.”) Eves v. LePage, 927 F.3d 575, 590-97 (1st Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Thompson, J., with whom Torruella and Barron, JJ. join, concurring) (“The en banc opinion starts and stops at step (2) — i.e., the decision assumes that even if Governor LePage got Eves fired because of Eves's political leanings, no clearly-established law prevented LePage from thinking Eves held the kind of policymaking job at GWH for which political affiliation was a legitimate credential. And given the unique relationship that existed between GWH, the Center, and MeANS, I'm fully on board with the opinion's policymaker-driven conclusion. Take note, however: if the policymaker exception hadn't been in play, I'd have no trouble concluding that in the circumstances of this case, Eves sufficiently pled a violation of his constitutional right. . . . Admittedly, courts may address the two steps of the qualified-immunity inquiry in any order. . . . But reflexively granting qualified immunity without first deciding whether the complained-of conduct offends the Constitution (i.e., resolving cases solely at step (2)) results in fewer and fewer courts establishing ‘constitutional precedent,’ let alone the kind of clearly-established precedent needed to overcome a qualified-immunity claim — a phenomenon known as ‘constitutional stagnation.’ . . . And this phenomenon can put plaintiffs like Eves in a vicious cycle: they ‘must produce precedent even as fewer courts are producing precedent’; ‘[i]mportant constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because those questions are yet unanswered’; and ‘[c]ourts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there's no equivalent case on the books’ and thus no violation of clearly-established law. See Zadeh v. Robinson, 902 F.3d 483, 499 (5th Cir. 2018) (Willett, J., concurring dubitante). What can break the cycle, however, is starting with step (1) — the constitutional-violation step, an approach courts should take in cases involving a recurring fact pattern where (a) help on the constitutionality of the contested practice is needed and (b) the practice is likely to be contested only in the qualified-immunity context. . . . And having thought about this case a lot, I believe deciding whether LePage infringed the Constitution would advance the law's development: if not resolved, the First Amendment issues pressed here could arise again and again — indeed, it's clear LePage's briefs suggest public officials think they are freer to keep funds from private entities than the First Amendment actually allows. . . . Leaving aside for a moment the relevance of the policymaker exception, I think Eves's complaint — alleging that Governor LePage bullied GWH into canning Eves because of Eves's political affiliation — adequately pleads a constitutional violation, when viewed through the correct legal lens. And none of LePage's arguments to the contrary hits home. . . . [T]he Court has never held that government-imposed conditions on discretionary grant funding — which is exactly what we have here — are categorically immune from First Amendment challenges. . . . A right is ‘clearly established’ if it's ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . A factually on-point precedent certainly helps in deciding what reasonable officials would know. But it's 'not necessary ... that the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.' . . . Rather, officials lose their qualified immunity, 'even in novel factual circumstances,' if they committed a 'clear' constitutional violation, . . . as a case of ours pithily put it, when the 'coerciveness' of the officials' actions is patently obvious, 'no particular case' (let alone a completely-on-point one) must've 'existed to put' reasonable officials 'on notice' of the actions' 'unconstitutionality.' . . . And that's as it should be. . . . What matters ultimately is whether 'the relevant legal rights and obligations [were] particularized enough that a reasonable official' could 'extrapolate from them and conclude that a certain course of conduct will violate the law.' . . . And to that subject I now turn. . . . From the First Amendment decisions arrayed above (long on the books when LePage acted) a sensible governor could extrapolate that he couldn't use his discretionary-spending power to intimidate a private entity into firing his political adversary, just to stick it to his adversary — unless (and to repeat) the adversary's job was a policymaking position. . . . The only question left then is whether Eves held a policymaking job with GWH, thus making his party affiliation something LePage could rely on in threatening to defund GWH. And on that highly fact-dependent question, I agree with the en banc decision on these points (fyi, I've lifted the following quotes from the en banc decision, though the emphasis is mine):

- Maine's legislature 'designated' GWH 'the nonprofit charitable corporation with a public purpose to implement the Center,' 'designat[ed]' the Center 'a public entity,' and left the governor with 'discretion to fund the Center.'
- Also, and of great importance to me, 'GWH fulfills its public function of implementing the Center only by administering MeANS' — indeed, Eves's counsel candidly (and commendably) conceded at en banc 'oral argument that the operation of MeANS is the only way in which the Center has been implemented.'
- Plus, Eves identifies no clearly-established law that would deter a reasonable governor from believing the job of GWH president resembled that of 'a policymaker given GWH's statutory mandate to administer a public entity, the Center ..., and its choice to do so solely through MeANS.'

And after much reflection, I agree with the en banc opinion that in the 'unique' circumstances of this case, a levelheaded governor could've believed, even if wrongly, that the job of GWH president — the very 'highest' post at GWH — resembled that of a policymaker. Which suffices to secure qualified immunity for LePage. . . . Circling back to first principles, I close with a cautionary note — one worth making given all the state-funds-receiving entities out there. . . . The First Amendment typically bars public officials from threatening to cut off funds to a previously-funded entity unless the entity picks a leader to their liking — I say 'typically,' because of the policymaker exception to the ban on politically-based personnel decisions. . . . And against the legal backdrop discussed above, Eves's allegations (that Governor LePage coercively engineered his firing from GWH as political payback) state a sufficient First Amendment claim — but for the policymaker exception, which the en banc opinion correctly applies in declaring LePage qualifiedly immune. Let's never forget, though, that the policymaker exception is exactly what its name implies: an exception — and a 'narrow' one at that — to the clearly-established rule against politically-motivated firings. . . . And in dealing with the First Amendment — which protects some of our most cherished rights, . . . courts must be ever-vigilant in ensuring that this limited exception doesn't swallow the rule. Anything less would deal a serious blow to the fundamental principles of our democracy.”)

Pagán-González v. Moreno, 919 F.3d 582, 590, 599-602 (1st Cir. 2019) (“Because we conclude that the officers’ deception invalidated the consent given for their warrantless entry and search, thus rendering those actions unlawful, we must also consider the second prong of the inquiry: whether the defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because no reasonable officer would have understood that her conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . The government argues that the defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity because there is no consensus on ‘what constitutes permissible deception in enforcing the criminal law.’. . . Pointing out that the plaintiffs themselves have conceded that ‘there is no Supreme Court or First Circuit case forbidding agents from using a ruse,’ the government goes on to characterize this case as one in which ‘known officers misrepresent[ed] their investigative purpose and claim[ed] to be investigating one crime when they are really investigating another.’. . . But the question on which qualified immunity turns in this case is not whether government agents ever may use a ruse to obtain consent for a warrantless search. Under current law, they clearly may. Hence, plaintiffs’ ‘concession’ that ruses have never been prohibited by the Supreme Court or our court is irrelevant to our inquiry. The government likewise misses the mark in pressing the lack of clarity on the lawfulness of ruses in which officers obtain consent by misrepresenting the crime they are investigating. Importantly, the deception that prompted Pagán-González’s consent was not simply a lie about the purpose of the agents’ search, but it involved fabrication of an emergency. In other words, the facts as alleged implicate the narrow line of cases described above in Section II.B.2.ii. . . . Hence, the second-prong question we must address is whether the ‘robust “consensus of cases”’ on fabricated exigent circumstances put the defendants on notice of the unconstitutionality of their particular ruse. . . . Even more specifically, we must consider whether a reasonable law enforcement officer would have understood that the false report of a virus threatening computers in Washington, D.C., conveyed to Pagán-González at his home by a force of ten federal agents identified as such, was materially equivalent to the ruses in the fabricated emergency precedent and thus invalidated his consent to search. . . . Essentially for the reasons leading us to conclude that Pagán-González’s complaint states a claim for an unlawful search under the Fourth Amendment, we also hold that the virus ruse falls squarely within the ‘body of relevant case law’ in which consent premised on a fabricated emergency was found invalid. . . . The clear and primary rationale of this line of precedent is that the consenting individual had no real option to deny access to his home or property because the threat depicted by law enforcement agents was so imminent and consequential that only immediate access could prevent severe harm. In the ‘explosion’ cases -- involving lies about bombs or a gas leak -- officers used the threat of personal harm and destruction of the individual’s residence. . . . In the cases involving young girls, the need to find a missing child or the accusation of a rape likewise presented scenarios where time was of the essence. . . . No reasonable law enforcement officer could fail to understand the similar compulsion that is inherent in the lie used in this case. . . . Indeed, the potential impact of the implied cyberattack carried out in part via Pagán-González’s computer on the nation’s capital was broader than the harms presented in the cases described above -- implicating national security -- and, as we have noted, the threat posed by such an attack was a well-known phenomenon by 2013. . . . Here, the severity of the threat was clearly communicated to Pagán-González by the arrival on his doorstep of ten federal agents. Accordingly, every reasonable officer would have understood that the ruse used here, carried out in a manner that signified an emergency, would leave an individual with effectively no choice but to allow law enforcement officers inside his home so they could attempt to alleviate the grave threat. And, in turn, a reasonable officer would have known that thus denying Pagán-González a ‘free and unconstrained choice’ to forgo the constitutional protection of a warrant was a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity on appellant’s search-based Fourth Amendment claim. . . . The widespread view that probable cause to arrest or prosecute may be established in civil proceedings with unlawfully seized evidence means that, regardless of our view on the merits of Pagán-González’s malicious prosecution claim, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. Put simply, no clearly established law barred the defendants from using evidence obtained in the unlawful search to support probable cause for the criminal charges brought against Pagán-González. In so concluding, we do not reach the first question of the qualified immunity analysis, i.e., whether Pagán-González might in fact have a viable Fourth Amendment claim stemming from his arrest and pre-trial detention. Pagán-González fails to develop fully an argument that he has satisfied the unsupported-by-probable-cause requirement stated in Hernandez-Cuevas notwithstanding the ‘real,’ but unlawfully obtained, evidence of his criminal activity the officers submitted to the magistrate judge. Nor does he suggest an alternative analysis for considering his unlawful detention claim under the Fourth Amendment, such as the forceful theory of relief described by our colleague in his thoughtful concurrence. . . . Accordingly, the district court properly dismissed the malicious prosecution claim on the ground that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Pagán-González v. Moreno, 919 F.3d 582, 602-04, 607-17 (1st Cir. 2019) (Barron, J., concurring) (“I fully agree with the analysis that the majority sets forth to explain why David Pagán-González (“Pagán”) states a viable Fourth Amendment claim with respect to the allegedly unconstitutional, warrantless search for which he seeks damages. I do so notwithstanding the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity. I also agree with the majority that Pagán has failed to provide us with a basis for overturning the District Court’s order dismissing what he styles as his malicious prosecution claim. In that claim, he seeks damages for the pre-trial detention that he endured and that he contends violated the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition against unreasonable seizures. I agree with the majority that Pagán fails to show, with respect to this claim, that he has alleged a violation of clearly established law, and thus I agree that this claim must be dismissed because it cannot survive the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry. The choice to resolve a constitutional tort claim with reference only to the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry - - as we do here with respect to Pagán’s claim concerning his detention -- is often a sensible one. There is a risk, however, that such a choice will unduly stunt the development of the law. . . . Thus, in what follows, I explain why I am of the view that -- absent qualified immunity’s obscuring screen -- Pagán has stated a viable claim for damages under the Fourth Amendment with respect to his pre-trial detention. . . . In sum, Pagán has clearly alleged that at least one of the agents involved in effecting his detention deliberately or recklessly misled the magistrate judge into thinking that the sole evidence of probable cause -- the computer -- had been acquired through a constitutionally compliant consensual transfer. But, Pagán has plausibly alleged, that agent was in fact aware that this evidence had been acquired through a clearly unconstitutional coercive ruse. The consequence of these allegations is that Pagán's detention-based claim brings to the fore at the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry an important legal question. We must decide, at this first step, whether these allegations about this agent's trickery in securing the arrest warrant describe a constitutional violation, such that Pagán may recover damages for his pre-trial detention. We must decide whether those allegations state such a violation, moreover, notwithstanding that the magistrate judge relied on real evidence of criminal activity to make the probable cause finding that served as the predicate for the issuance of the arrest warrant that resulted in Pagán's seizure and notwithstanding that this real evidence was in fact strong enough to support that probable cause finding. In my view, these allegations do suffice to state such a violation. To explain why, though, I need to wend my way through an unfortunately complex doctrinal thicket. Only then can I adequately explain why, on the one hand, Pagán fails to show that he has alleged a violation of clearly established law, but, on the other, little logic supports the precedential obstacles that potentially stand in the way of his doing so. . . . Pagán's complaint -- unlike the one in Hernandez-Cuevas itself, . . . challenges a pre-trial seizure that was based on a finding of probable cause by a magistrate judge that was premised on real and substantial (rather than fabricated) evidence of his criminal activity. To be sure, Pagán does challenge the lawfulness of the means by which law enforcement acquired that evidence -- and the misrepresentations that law enforcement made to the magistrate judge about those means. He does not assert, though, that the evidence itself was fabricated by law enforcement, as was alleged to have been the case in Hernandez-Cuevas, . . . or even that the evidence was on its face so patently weak that it was obviously insufficient to make out a finding of probable cause. Nor does Pagán develop any argument as to how, notwithstanding the existence of real and substantial evidence of his criminal conduct, his claim is nonetheless one that clearly satisfies the probable cause element that Hernandez-Cuevas appears to have established. . . . Nor, moreover, does he even develop any argument as to why his claim does not need to be of that kind in order for it to survive the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry. Thus, I agree with the majority that -- at least given the arguments that Pagán makes to us -- Hernandez-Cuevas poses an insuperable obstacle to his claim going forward. Accordingly, I join the majority's holding at step two of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . There has, however, been yet another change in the relevant legal landscape, although this one occurred only after the initiation of Pagán's case. It thus does little to help Pagán meet the 'clearly established law' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, at least given the arguments that he makes to us. Nevertheless, this change does suggest to me that it would be a mistake to make too much of the obstacle that seemingly stands in the way of Pagán's claim with respect to similar claims that may be brought by others. Thus, in the remainder of my analysis, I explain my reasons for so concluding. . . . The post-Hernandez-Cuevas legal change that I have in mind was brought about by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017). An implication that I draw from Manuel is that it does not make sense to continue to treat a Fourth Amendment-based claim for damages resulting from an unlawful seizure effected via pre-trial detention of a criminal defendant as if it were one for ‘malicious prosecution.’ A further implication that I draw from Manuel is that we are not obliged to borrow the elements from the common law -- or substantive due process -- tort of malicious prosecution when considering a Fourth Amendment-based claim that is brought for damages for the harm caused by such pre-trial detention. To support the first of these conclusions, I note that the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Manuel on the question of ‘whether an individual’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure continues beyond legal process so as to allow a malicious prosecution claim based upon the Fourth Amendment.’ . . Yet, the Court held, ‘Manuel may challenge his pretrial detention on the ground that it violated the Fourth Amendment,’ even though it occurred ‘after the start of “legal process[.]”’ . . without ever referring to such a claim as one for ‘malicious prosecution[.]’ . . In addition to the fact that Manuel eschews the ‘malicious prosecution’ label, it also supports the implication that I draw from it that courts need to examine claims such as the one that Pagán brings through the lens of the Fourth Amendment rather than through the lens of the common law tort of malicious prosecution. Although Manuel expressly encourages us to ‘look first to the common law of torts’ to define the elements of a § 1983 claim, it explains that those ‘[c]ommon-law principles are meant to guide rather than to control the definition of § 1983 claims, . . . serving “more as a source of inspired examples than of prefabricated components.”’ . . The Court then proceeds to admonish us to ‘closely attend to the values and purposes of the constitutional right at issue’ when ‘applying, selecting among, or adjusting common law-approaches.’ . Thus, it is with this fresh guidance from Manuel in mind that I now consider whether the Fourth Amendment claim that Manuel recognizes encompasses a claim like Pagán’s. For the reasons set forth below, I conclude that it does. I do so despite the fact that the evidence that the magistrate judge relied upon to issue the arrest warrant that permitted Pagán’s seizure was both real and sufficient to establish the requisite probable cause. I do so, as well, even though the analogous evidence of probable cause in Manuel allegedly had been fabricated by law enforcement, just as it allegedly had been fabricated in Hernandez-Cuevas. . . . As Manuel recognizes, a claim of the kind that Pagán brings is necessarily predicated on a challenge to whether the seizure at issue comports with the Fourth Amendment. The focus, therefore, should be on discerning the elements of the constitutional tort that logically relate to the constitutional right -- namely, the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizures -- on which the tort is grounded. . . Such a focus, however, makes it mysterious to me why we would continue to define the elements of the claim as Hernandez-Cuevas -- at least at first blush -- presently does. . . I start with the favorable termination element, which Hernandez-Cuevas retains from the old, pre-Albright constitutional tort of malicious prosecution based on the common law tort. . . I then consider the element concerning probable cause, which Hernandez-Cuevas retains from the earlier version of the tort as well. With respect to making favorable termination an element of the Fourth Amendment-based tort, such as the one that Pagán brings, I see little reason to retain that element post-Manuel. The termination of the prosecution -- even if unfavorable to the defendant -- cannot render the pre-trial seizure of the defendant constitutional if that seizure was unlawful from the inception. No matter how the prosecution ends -- including if it ends in a conviction -- the defendant still has a right for there to have been a constitutionally valid basis for the pre-trial detention that he endured. Thus, the favorable termination element -- an artifact of the old, no longer viable substantive due process-based malicious prosecution constitutional tort -- seems to me to be an anachronism. . . I reach the same conclusion with respect to the element concerning probable cause -- at least if we understand that element to require a showing that the magistrate judge's finding of probable cause that grounded the seizure was predicated on evidence that law enforcement fabricated or that was so patently weak that it could not plausibly support a probable cause finding. I add this caveat about whether Hernandez-Cuevas actually meant to establish a definitive holding about the requirements of the probable cause element for the following reason. In Hernandez-Cuevas, the only evidence of probable cause had -- allegedly -- been fabricated by law enforcement. . . Thus, we had no occasion there to decide -- definitively -- whether the probable cause requirement that we set forth was intended to require the plaintiff to show that there was simply no real evidence sufficient to establish probable cause at all. It was enough to conclude that the claim could go forward when the plaintiff had made that showing by virtue of the allegations concerning fabrication. But, insofar as Hernandez-Cuevas does establish a probable cause element of a strict kind, I do not see why it is right to do so given the recent guidance that we have received from Manuel. Here, too, my concern is that the element is being defined with reference to the old, now-rejected malicious prosecution constitutional tort, rather than with reference to the Fourth Amendment-based tort, which is the only variant of that tort that remains viable after Manuel. There is a logic to requiring the prosecution to have been based on real evidence of a crime at the outset if the constitutional claim targets the bringing of the prosecution itself. There is no similar logic, though, to imposing that requirement if the constitutional claim challenges only the seizure that occurred in connection with that prosecution. To see why, we need only follow Manuel's admonition that, in discerning the elements of this Fourth Amendment-based tort, we must keep our eye on the underlying constitutional right. . . A consideration of that right, as I shall next explain, reveals that even real and substantial evidence of probable cause -- such as is present in Pagán's case -- may be insufficient to render an arrest warrant that is issued based on that evidence one that law enforcement may constitutionally rely upon to carry out the ensuing seizure. . . . An arrest warrant can legitimate a seizure premised on a warrant that in fact lacks probable cause. An arrest warrant cannot legitimate a seizure under the Fourth Amendment if law enforcement precluded the magistrate judge from performing the neutral gatekeeping role required of it by the Warrant Clause. In such circumstances, the warrant cannot provide a good faith basis for law enforcement to think that the seizure was lawful due to the trick on the magistrate judge that was used to secure the warrant. Against this legal background, Hernandez-Cuevas and Manuel were hardly innovative in permitting Fourth Amendment-based damages claims to proceed where the plaintiff alleged that his pre-trial seizure had been carried out pursuant to an arrest warrant that the magistrate judge issued based on evidence of probable cause that law enforcement had fabricated. . . In such circumstances, the warrant clearly could not legitimate the seizure, given the trick that law enforcement had performed on the magistrate judge that led the magistrate judge to issue the warrant. The question for our purposes, though, is not quite so easily answered as it was in those cases. The trickery in Manuel and Hernandez-Cuevas led the magistrate judge to issue a warrant based on evidence of probable cause that simply did not exist and that law enforcement knew from the outset did not exist. In a case like Pagán's, by contrast, law enforcement has not tricked the magistrate judge into believing that there was evidence of probable cause when there in fact was none. There was such evidence all along. Rather, law enforcement has -- allegedly -- merely tricked the magistrate judge into believing that the evidence of probable cause was constitutionally acquired when law enforcement knew it was not. As I read our precedent, however, where officers trick the magistrate judge about the unlawfully acquired nature of the evidence that they have put forward to establish probable cause, the resulting warrant is no less premised on a lie or reckless half-truth that materially taints the magistrate judge's capacity to perform the constitutionally prescribed gatekeeping role than when the deceit concerns the existence of the evidence. Thus, law enforcement's ability to rely on that warrant in good faith to justify the seizure may be limited just as it would be in a case in which the lie or reckless untruth does concern the evidence's existence. Specifically, we have explained that a warrant -- even if predicated on evidence that was itself real -- may not be relied upon by law enforcement, if it had been secured by deliberate lies or reckless omissions that misled the magistrate judge into thinking that critical evidence of probable cause had been acquired constitutionally or with a good faith belief that it had been. . . We have done so, presumably, on the understanding that a fully informed magistrate judge might have exercised its discretion to decline to issue the warrant had it known that the evidence of probable cause had been secured only through law enforcement conduct that was not constitutional or that was not undertaken in good faith that it was. In fact, our precedent, like the precedent of other circuits, makes clear that a magistrate judge may decline to issue a warrant when the evidence forming the basis for probable cause is known to have been acquired in such concerning circumstances. . . Thus, lies or reckless omissions that hide facts that would reveal such problematic means of acquiring such evidence -- like the lies alleged by Pagán -- interfere with the magistrate judge's constitutional role as a gatekeeper. . . . [T]he following would appear to be clear, at least under our precedent. When law enforcement intentionally or recklessly makes false statements to a magistrate judge about the constitutional or good faith means by which law enforcement obtained the evidence that supplies the basis for finding the probable cause necessary to justify the warrant that would permit a pre-trial seizure of a criminal defendant, such lies -- or reckless omissions -- undermine the magistrate judge's ability to perform its constitutional role under the Warrant Clause. . . Such intentionally false statements or reckless omissions thus preclude law enforcement officers from relying in good faith on the arrest warrant that is then issued (at least when the officers know of the lies or reckless omissions). And thus, under our precedent, such lies or reckless omissions prevent that warrant from legitimating the seizure that is carried out in reliance on it, . . . notwithstanding that the lies or reckless falsehoods concerned only the means by which the evidence of probable cause had been acquired and not the existence of the evidence itself. . . . Against this legal backdrop, I do not see why a plaintiff should be barred from seeking damages for his pre-trial seizure, simply because he can show that the lies or the reckless omissions that law enforcement told the magistrate judge to secure the arrest warrant concerned only how real evidence had been acquired and not whether such real evidence existed. The deceit still stripped the magistrate judge of the ability to perform its constitutionally prescribed gatekeeping role. The deceit did so by stripping the magistrate judge of the opportunity to deny law enforcement the ability to exploit the unconstitutional conduct it used to acquire the evidence that supplies the sole basis for procuring the warrant that would permit a defendant to be seized. Under our precedent, therefore, the seizure would appear to be no less unconstitutional -- insofar as the warrant is necessary in the first place -- for having been carried out pursuant to unconstitutional trickery of that comparatively subtle (but still egregious) sort. . . . Allowing claims like Pagán's to proceed would not mean that constitutional tort suits could be used to attack arrests based on warrants as a general matter. Leon still shields officers where they rely on warrants in good faith, except in very limited circumstances, such as Franks violations in securing the warrant. . . . But, when the officers' reliance on that warrant is in bad faith -- such as when the officer who participates in the seizure is also responsible for the reckless or deliberate misrepresentations that led to the warrant's tainted issuance -- I do not see why the specter of a damages judgment should not be in the offing. This approach is also entirely consistent with the prevailing view that the exclusionary rule does not apply to civil proceedings. . . . Under this approach, the inquiry is not whether the evidence shows that there was probable cause to believe the plaintiff had committed a crime. The inquiry is whether law enforcement precluded the magistrate judge from performing its constitutionally assigned gatekeeping role through deliberate lies or reckless omissions about the means used to acquire the evidence of probable cause. Thus, as the Fourth Amendment-based tort claim does not depend on guilt or innocence or on whether the improperly procured evidence was real or fake, the plaintiff does not need to exclude the evidence of probable cause to win. The plaintiff needs only to put forward facts sufficient to show a Franks violation. In addition, in all § 1983 cases and Bivens actions, plaintiffs must show some causation between the defendant's conduct, the constitutional violation, and the plaintiff's injury. . . . As we explained in Hernandez-Cuevas, 'in most cases, the neutral magistrate judge's determination that probable cause exists for the individual's arrest is an intervening act that could disrupt any argument that the defendant officer had caused the unlawful seizure.' . . . We noted, too, that this 'causation problem' can be overcome only if it is clear that law enforcement officers were 'responsible for [the plaintiff's] continued, unreasonable pretrial detention,' including by 'fail[ing] to disclose exculpatory evidence' or 'l[ying] to or misle[ading] the prosecutors.' . . . For these reasons, I conclude that Pagán has sufficiently stated a claim for damages under the Fourth Amendment -- save, that is, for the qualified immunity defense that bars that claim from surviving here. The lack of clarity in our precedent or the Supreme Court's as to the elements of such a claim precludes him from overcoming that defense -- at least given his arguments to us. I recognize that this caveat concerning qualified immunity is a rather significant one -- and not only in Pagán's case. The defense of qualified immunity is usually invoked in cases like this one, just as it has been invoked here. A plaintiff who loses at the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry is no better off than one who loses at the first step. Still, it is important to address the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry. That step is certainly relevant in cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is not properly invoked -- and, in fact, it was not invoked in either Hernandez-Cuevas or Manuel. . . . With respect to that step, moreover, it is clear to me that, in light of Manuel, it is a mistake to attempt to fashion a half-fish, half-fowl, hybrid malicious prosecution/Fourth Amendment based tort. I thus do not see how, post-Manuel, we could continue to justify treating a Fourth Amendment-based claim such as Pagán brings here -- targeting, as it does, only the seizure and not the prosecution -- as a species of the old malicious prosecution tort. Rather, we must understand that tort for what it is -- a Fourth Amendment-based challenge to pre-trial detention that targets law enforcement's efforts to circumvent the warrant requirement through lies or reckless omissions that conceal from the magistrate judge facts material to its ability to perform its constitutionally assigned role. For that reason, I think it important to lay out this analysis here. That way, in a subsequent case we will be better positioned to resolve definitively how Manuel bears on -- and, in my view, supersedes -- two of the elements of the constitutional tort that we described in Hernandez-Cuevas: the ones concerning favorable termination and probable cause. . . Unless we at some point address step one of the qualified immunity inquiry in a case involving such a claim, or otherwise definitively define the elements of this constitutional tort post-Manuel, we will be at risk of leaving the law unclear in key respects. In consequence, we will be permitting our pre-Manuel case law to exert an outsized influence on the types of remedies that may be available to those who have been the victims of unlawful law enforcement trickery of the kind that the Fourth Amendment quite clearly condemns. Finally, and relatedly, I would not rule out the possibility that, even before our court does provide clarity to the doctrine in this area, a plaintiff might be able to develop an argument -- which Pagán has not attempted to do here -- as to why such a claim might be viable even in the face of a qualified immunity defense. Our Fourth Amendment precedents in Bain and Diehl clearly establish that law enforcement officers -- per Franks -- may not rely on warrants in good faith that are the product of their own reckless half-truths about the constitutionality (or the officers' good faith belief in the constitutionality) of the means used to acquire the evidence of probable cause on which the magistrate judge relied in issuing the warrant. Nor does Hernandez-Cuevas suggest otherwise. Rather, Hernandez-Cuevas at most creates doubt about the content of one element of the constitutional tort suit that may be brought to recoup damages for the harm caused by the pre-trial detention that results from such clearly unconstitutional law enforcement conduct. Given that qualified immunity is intended to serve a practical, functional purpose, I am not certain that law enforcement officers should be immune from damages for engaging in conduct that, at the time it was undertaken, was clearly unconstitutional under our precedent, simply because we had not also as of that time clearly described an element of the constitutional tort that may be brought to recover damages for the harm caused by such conduct. We have no occasion, however, to consider such a refined question of qualified immunity law here. I thus leave it for another day. For present purposes, it is enough to lay out the lines along which the relevant doctrine may be reconstructed. Doing so is the first step along the route to ensuring that this body of doctrine is freed from the lingering influence of the pre-Albright tort of malicious prosecution and thus may reflect more fully Manuel's suggestion that we 'closely attend to the values and purposes of the constitutional right at issue' when 'applying, selecting among, or adjusting common law-approaches.'")

Gray v. Cummings, 917 F.3d 1, 8-13, 20 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Our starting point is the question of whether a reasonable jury could find that Cummings violated Gray's Fourth Amendment rights through the use of excessive force. The magistrate judge answered this question in the negative, concluding that, as a matter of law, 'the single deployment of a taser in drive stun mode' in these particular circumstances was reasonable. Viewing the record most hospitably to Gray and drawing all reasonable inferences to her behoof, we think that a reasonable jury could find that the force employed by Cummings violated the Fourth Amendment. We explain briefly. . . .In this regard, we think it important that Cummings was not called to the scene to investigate a crime; he was there to return a person suffering from mental illness to the hospital. When the subject of a seizure has not committed any crime, the first Graham factor ordinarily cuts in the subject's favor. . . . To be sure, Gray did not submit to Cummings's orders. Withal, this failure to obey was at most a minor crime, not one that would tip the first Graham factor in Cummings's favor. . . . Nor does the alleged assault tilt the scales. In Cummings's view, the assault occurred when, after Gray walked toward him, he grabbed her shirt and she 'continued pushing against [his] arm.' In the circumstances of this case, we think that a reasonable jury could find that the facts did not support the characterization of Gray's actions as an 'assault.' The same kind of defect mars the magistrate judge's determination that the second Graham factor — 'whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others,' . . . favored Cummings. It is true that Gray was a section 12 patient, that is, an individual who has been involuntarily committed to a hospital pursuant to Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 123, § 12, based on a determination by a qualified medical professional (or, in emergency situations, a police officer) that 'failure to hospitalize [her] would create a likelihood of serious harm by reason of mental illness.' . . . It is also true that Cummings knew as much. Although a jury could supportably find on these facts that Cummings reasonably believed that Gray posed a danger to him, it could supportably find instead that Gray — who was shuffling down the sidewalk barefoot and unarmed — only posed a danger to herself (especially given Cummings's distinct height and weight advantage). So, too, a jury could supportably find that, at the time of the tasing, Gray had been subdued to a point at which she no longer posed a threat. The magistrate judge concluded that the final Graham factor — whether Gray was 'actively resisting arrest,' . . . favored Cummings. This conclusion seems unimpeachable given Cummings's testimony that he asked Gray several times to put her hands behind her back, but that she would not do so. The short of it is that the Graham factors point in conflicting directions. Seen through the prism of the totality of the circumstances, the evidence is subject to interpretation and can support plausible though inconsistent inferences. Drawing those inferences beneficially to Gray and aware that Cummings not only had her down on the ground but also outweighed her by some seventy-five pounds, a reasonable jury could find that Gray had committed no crime and that she posed no threat to Cummings when he tased her. When all is said and done, we think that Gray has presented sufficient evidence to make out a jury question as to whether Cummings used excessive force. . . . This conclusion does not end our inquiry. Cummings has invoked the defense of qualified immunity. . . . [W]e must ask whether, given the circumstances at hand, Gray's right to be free from the degree of force that Cummings used — particularly, the Taser — was clearly established. . . . The district court determined that 'the right not to be tased while offering non-violent stationary, resistance to a lawful seizure was not clearly established at the time of the confrontation between Ms. Gray and Officer Cummings' and, therefore, ruled that Cummings was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Fourth Circuit's conclusion in Estate of Armstrong — that the use of a Taser in drive-stun mode against a noncompliant and resisting individual was not clearly unconstitutional as of 2011 — is not an outlier. Prior to Cummings's encounter with Gray, several other courts of appeals had found the use of a Taser reasonable in situations involving subjects who acted with a level of resistance analogous to that displayed by Gray. . . . Thus, an objectively reasonable officer in Cummings's place and stead could reasonably have believed, in 2013, that the use of a Taser was generally permissible when a subject refuses to be handcuffed. .

. . [A] subject’s mental illness is a factor that a police officer must take into account in determining what degree of force, if any, is appropriate. . . Here, however, the only thing that Cummings knew about Gray’s mental health was that she had been involuntarily committed under section 12; he did not know whether Gray had been deemed a danger to others or only to herself. Given the skimpiness of this information, we think that an objectively reasonable police officer, standing in Cummings’s shoes, would have had to be prepared for the worst. Based on the body of available case law, we hold that an objectively reasonable police officer in May of 2013 could have concluded that a single use of the Taser in drive-stun mode to quell a nonviolent, mentally ill individual who was resisting arrest, did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Even if such a conclusion was constitutionally mistaken — as a jury could find on the facts of this case — Cummings is shielded by qualified immunity. . . . Gray cites a number of other cases in support of her argument that her resistance was ‘passive’ rather than ‘active’ and, thus, did not justify the use of the Taser. This argument is deeply flawed. Labels such as ‘passive’ and ‘active’ are generalizations and cannot serve as substitutes for a careful analysis of the facts of a particular case. In point of fact, the Supreme Court — in an excessive force case — recently cautioned against ‘defin[ing] the clearly established right at a high level of generality.’ . . There, the Court reversed a denial of qualified immunity sought by an officer who had tackled a man after he had closed the door to a dwelling despite being instructed not to do so and ‘tried to brush past’ the officer. . . The Court criticized the Ninth Circuit for relying on ‘case law [that] involved police force against individuals engaged in passive resistance’ without making any ‘effort to explain how that case law prohibited [the officer]’s actions in this case.’ . . And in all events, respectable authority suggests that refusing to be handcuffed constitutes active resistance and may justify the use of a Taser. . . .In the last analysis, Gray does not cite any case, decided before her encounter with Cummings, that arose out of the use of a Taser on facts fairly comparable to the facts at hand. In the absence of either controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority to the contrary, we conclude that Cummings was entitled to qualified immunity. . . .[T]his is a hard case — a case that is made all the more difficult because of two competing concerns: our concern for the rights of the disabled and our concern that the police not be unduly hampered in the performance of their important duties. In the end, though, we think that the protections provided by Title II of the ADA can be harmonized with the doctrines of excessive force and qualified immunity, as explicated by the Supreme Court, to achieve a result that gives each of these competing concerns their due. We think that our ruling today — which establishes in this circuit that a jury could supportably find the use of a Taser to quell a nonviolent, mentally ill person who is resisting arrest to be excessive force — satisfies this exacting standard.”) Alfano v. Lynch, 847 F.3d 71, 75-80 (1st Cir. 2017) (“The qualified immunity analysis entails a two-step pavane. . . The first step requires an inquiring court to determine whether the plaintiff’s version of the facts makes out a violation of a protected right. . . The second step requires the court to determine ‘whether the right at issue was “clearly established” at the time of defendant’s alleged misconduct.’ . . These steps, though framed sequentially, need not be taken in order. . . A court ‘may alter the choreography in the interests of efficiency,’ defer the first step, and proceed directly to the second step. . . Because that path seems the most efficacious here, we focus initially on the second step, that is, whether the right at issue was clearly established when Lynch confronted Alfano. The ‘clearly established’ analysis has two sub-parts. . . The first sub-part requires the plaintiff to identify either ‘controlling authority’ or a ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ sufficient to send a clear signal to a reasonable official that certain conduct falls short of the constitutional norm. . . The second sub-part asks whether an objectively reasonable official in the defendant’s position would have known that his conduct violated that rule of law. . . The question is not whether the official actually abridged the plaintiff’s constitutional rights but, rather, whether the official’s conduct was unreasonable, given the state of the law when he acted. . . The first sub-part of this analysis ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . In other words, the clearly established law must not be gauged at too high a level of generality; instead, it must be ‘particularized’ to the facts of the case. . . Even so, there is no requirement of identity. In arguing for clearly established law, a plaintiff is not required to identify cases that address the ‘particular factual scenario’ that characterizes his case. . . Here, the initial question reduces to whether — as of the parties’ encounter in July of 2014 — controlling and persuasive precedent provided fair and clear notice that the Fourth Amendment requires probable cause before a police officer, acting under a state protective custody statute, can take an individual into protective custody, handcuff the individual, transport him to a police station, and confine him in a jail cell. . . We turn next to that question. It is hornbook law that the Fourth Amendment requires probable cause to place an individual under arrest. . . The proper approach, though, is a functional one: for decades, controlling precedent has made pellucid that the probable cause requirement extends to certain types of custody that, though short of an arrest, possess attributes that are characteristic of an arrest. . . Of particular pertinence for present purposes, we have left no doubt that the Fourth Amendment requires officers acting under a civil protection statute to have probable cause before taking an individual into custody of a kind that resembles an arrest. . . We hold that, in July of 2014, controlling and persuasive authority combined to give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that the Fourth Amendment required probable cause to take an individual into protective custody, handcuff him, transport him to a police station miles away, and confine him in a jail cell. . . This holding does not end our odyssey. Concluding, as we do, that the probable cause requirement is clearly established, what remains to be done ‘reduces to the test of objective legal reasonableness.’ . . Our resolution of this point turns on whether an objectively reasonable officer would have believed he had probable cause to take Alfano into protective custody within the meaning of the relevant protective custody statute. To make this judgment, we must consider whether Lynch’s decision to deem Alfano incapacitated, take him into protective custody, handcuff him, transport him to the police station, and confine him in a jail cell was the kind of decision (whether or not correct) that a reasonable officer standing in Lynch’s shoes would have reached. . . The short of it is that Lynch may well have had probable cause to believe that Alfano was intoxicated. Here, however, Lynch’s reasons for placing Alfano into protective custody did not extend beyond probable cause to think that Alfano was intoxicated, and intoxication alone is not sufficient to warrant a finding of incapacitation. . . The summary judgment record, construed in the light most favorable to Alfano, simply does not support a conclusion that Lynch had adequate reason to believe that Alfano, though intoxicated, was likely to harm himself or anyone else or to damage property.”)

Belsito Communications, Inc. v. Decker, 845 F.3d 13, 23-27 & n.8 (1st Cir. 2016) (“[T]oday we begin — and end — with the clearly-established step, which requires Blackden to spotlight ‘controlling authority’ or ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ (if there is one) that forbade Trooper Decker from acting as he did. . . . Please note: because we resolve this case on the clearly-established ground, we express no view on the constitutionality of Trooper Decker’s conduct, see Barton v. Clancy, 632 F.3d 9, 12, 30 n.20 (1st Cir. 2011) (taking a similar tack in a qualified-immunity case) — a point so important that we will repeat it again and again throughout this opinion. . . . The bottom line, then, is that while Blackden need not show that the complained-about conduct is the spitting image of conduct previously deemed unlawful, he must show that the conduct’s unlawfulness was ‘apparent,’ given preexisting law. . . . What that means is that qualified immunity protects Trooper Decker unless Blackden can persuade us that caselaw on the books in August 2010 put the constitutionality of his actions ‘beyond debate.’ . . . [A]t step two of the qualified-immunity inquiry we must ask whether Blackden has pinpointed clearly-established law at the time of the seizure that would have stopped a reasonable trooper from thinking exigent circumstances existed ‘in the situation [he] encountered.’ . . . And that situation — remember — was this:

- Trooper Decker believed Blackden had violated a number of state laws, giving him probable cause to arrest Blackden — though the Trooper decided not to do that then and there.
- Blackden knew Trooper Decker was investigating him for possible criminal violations, or so the Trooper thought.
- Trooper Decker believed the camera and memory card contained evidence that could help establish Blackden’s presence at the scene, which could help prove Blackden had committed a crime.
- Unlike the turnout coat, helmet, or ambulance, the camera and memory could be destroyed in a flash without breaking a sweat — at least that is what the Trooper concluded.
- And Trooper Decker consulted with a prosecutor before taking the camera and memory card. . . .

Let us be crystal clear: Because we resolve Blackden’s Fourth-Amendment claim at the second step of the qualified-immunity test (as we are free to do), we need not say whether Trooper Decker’s actions were legal — i.e., we do not say whether exigent circumstances were or were not in play. Nor need we explore what the precise parameters of the exigent-circumstances exception are or should be. All we need say is that Blackden has not met his burden of showing that clearly-established law in August 2010 precluded a reasonable trooper from believing the exigent-circumstances exception applied in this situation. And it is on that basis alone that we affirm the judge’s qualified-immunity ruling on this claim.”) Belsito Communications, Inc. v. Decker, 845 F.3d 13, 27-28 (1st Cir. 2016) (“At qualified-immunity’s second step, Blackden must show that clearly-established law in August 2010 would have put Trooper Decker on clear notice of his potential First-Amendment liability. And regarding the ‘by means within the law’ theory, Blackden points us to nothing that would have put a sensible trooper on notice in August 2010 that even if he (the trooper) had probable cause to pursue criminal charges against a photographer unauthorizedly in a restricted area and had talked to a prosecutor, he still could not have rationally concluded that the photographer had acted outside the law while shooting the photos. . . . More, Blackden gives us no convincing reason to suppose that the pertinent constitutional principles were so particularized back then that Trooper Decker could not have rationally thought he had the legal wiggle room to do as he did — i.e., he presents nothing to persuade us that Trooper Decker’s actions, like the actions of the welfare officials in the slavery hypothetical, constitute conduct so egregious that a reasonable official must have known it was unconstitutional. So that there is no confusion about our holding on the First-Amendment claim: We do not say whether Trooper Decker’s actions did or did not violate Blackden’s First-Amendment rights. Nor do we say what a complete compendium of First-Amendment rights for news gather[er]s is or should be. We say only that Blackden failed to identify clearly-established law as of August 2010 showing beyond debate that Trooper Decker’s specific acts violated the First Amendment. And that is that.”)

Marrero-Mendez v. Perez-Valentin, 830 F.3d 38, 43-48 & n.6 (1st Cir. 2016) (“Here, appellants argue that it is unnecessary to address the first prong inquiry because their primary argument is that the second prong has not been satisfied. We can decide based solely on the second prong, however, only if we concluded that appellants are entitled to qualified immunity on that basis. That is not the conclusion we reach. . . . [W]e conclude that the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is met: appellants violated the Establishment Clause by (i) forcing Marrero to observe a religious practice against his will and (ii) punishing him for his non-conformance. . . . Where, as here, a religious practice is conducted by a state official at a state function, state sponsorship is so conspicuously present that only ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,’ . . . would deny it. . . . The district court found that a reasonable officer in March 2012 would have known that ‘ordering a subordinate to observe a religious prayer ... without giving the subordinate the ability to opt out ... would violate the Constitution.’ This formulation of the inquiry, however, is not sufficiently specific. An affirmative answer to this inquiry, though accurate, would state an abstract principle of law, disassociated from the facts of the case. . . . Hence, in accordance with the Supreme Court’s guidance, we frame the ‘clearly established’ inquiry as follows: appellants are entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer in March 2012 would not have known that appellants’ conduct was coercive in the situation they encountered. . . . The relevant situation, and appellants’ actions, consisted of the following: (1) after directing Marrero to abandon the formation, Calixto ordered Marrero, as he was walking away, to stop and stand still until the prayer was finished; (2) as Marrero stood in the vicinity of the group, Calixto shouted that Marrero was standing separately from the group because he does not subscribe to the same faith as the rest of the group; (3) after Marrero complained about the incident, he was stripped of his law enforcement responsibilities and demoted to lesser tasks. . . . With that clarification, we examine whether the law as of March 2012 put reasonable officers on notice that appellants’ conduct -- ordering a subordinate, against his will, to stand nearby while his colleagues engage in a prayer and then humiliating and punishing him for non-conformance -- constitutes religious coercion. We conclude that it did. Indeed, the coerciveness of appellants’ conduct is so patently evident that no particular case -- and certainly not one ‘directly on point,’ . . . need have existed to put a reasonable officer on notice of its unconstitutionality. Nonetheless, existing precedent supports this inescapable conclusion. [discussing cases from other circuits] We reiterate that, while Anderson. . . and Mellen. . . could be read as suggesting that the prayer at issue in this case would be unconstitutional even with an opt-out opportunity, we do not decide that question on this record. As we noted in footnote 4, the facts indicate that such an opt-out opportunity was not provided to Marrero. . . . However complex the nuances of the Establishment Clause doctrine may be for cases without the direct coercion present in this case, a reasonable officer in March 2012 would have known that appellants' conduct amounted to direct and tangible coercion, a paradigmatic example of an impermissible establishment of religion. The district court's denial of qualified immunity is, therefore, affirmed.")

Rivera-Corraliza v. Morales, 794 F.3d 208, 217 n.12, 223 (1st Cir. 2015) ("We need not decide whether Patel—the Supreme Court's most recent decision dealing with Burger—changed the Burger test in any way. That is because the key question for qualified-immunity purposes is whether the law was clearly established when the complained-of actions occurred. . . Notice—prior notice, not after-the-fact notice—is what matters, because officers need to know when they are doing wrong. . . And Patel was not around when the events here went down. . . . In remanding to get the district court's thoughts on the crucial timing and scope issues, we offer this reminder: To defeat a qualified-immunity defense here, plaintiffs must show that defendants violated their Fourth Amendment rights and that those rights were clearly established at the time. . . Repeating what we said earlier, courts may (and sometimes should) decide qualified-immunity claims based solely on the second step—holding that the contours of the right were not clearly established, without deciding whether there was a constitutional violation. . . If the district court goes that route, both the court and the parties should be ever mindful that the qualified-immunity inquiry is highly context-specific, turning on whether it would be clear to reasonable officers in defendants' positions that their actions violated the Fourth Amendment . . . and that defendants' positions run the gamut from policymakers to advisors to supervisors to implementers. We also leave it to the court on remand to resolve codefendants Gadea–Rivera, Diez de Andino, Vescovacci–Nazario, and Flores–Cortés's argument that they had no personal involvement in any alleged constitutional violation, as required by section 1983.")

Hunt v. Massi, 773 F.3d 361, 366-70 (1st Cir. 2014) ("We conclude that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to the defendants for the plaintiffs' claim of excessive force. When defined at the appropriate level of specificity, the necessary question is whether Hunt had a clearly established right to have his hands cuffed in front of him due to an alleged injury despite the officers' judgment call to the contrary. There is no such clearly established right. Instead, First Circuit precedent makes clear that the officers' decision to handcuff an arrestee according to standard police practice is a judgment call that must be analyzed based on the totality of the circumstances. Based on the facts here, no reasonable officer would have believed that his or her decision to handcuff Hunt according to standard police practice violated the constitutional prohibition on excessive force. . . . It is in our discretion not to engage in the first inquiry, but to go directly to the second, as we do here. . . We start by defining the right at issue at 'an appropriate level of generality.’ . . . Citing Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 109 S.Ct. 1865, 104 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989), the plaintiffs argue that ‘[t]here is little doubt that police must refrain from use of excessive force.’ This ‘casts too broad a net.’ . . . The Supreme Court agreed that ‘there is no doubt that Graham ... clearly establishes the general proposition that use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness.’ . . . ‘Yet,’ the Supreme Court explicitly held, ‘that is not enough’ to defeat qualified immunity. . . . In this case, the relevant question is not whether the Fourth Amendment generally prohibited excessive force. The relevant question is whether, in 2011, Hunt had a clearly established right to be handcuffed with his hands in front of him when it would not be obvious to a reasonable officer that Hunt’s abdominal scar would prevent him from putting his hands behind his back. The ensuing events, in which Hunt does not claim to have cooperated, occurred in the course of the handcuffing with his hands behind his back. . . . To be clearly established, the contours of this right must have been ‘sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . ‘In other words, “existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.”’ . . . The district court undertook this analysis at the appropriate level of specificity, but erred in its conclusion that Hunt had a clearly established right to be handcuffed with his hands in front of him due to an alleged injury, ‘even if the injury is not visible.’ . . . The district court relied on four cases to reach this conclusion. . . . Two are easily distinguishable from the present case since they involved much more serious, and visible, injuries that would have been exacerbated by the standard police procedure for handcuffing. . . . The other two district court opinions, which both acknowledge a debate on the issue, are simply insufficient to show that the law was clearly established for immunity purposes. . . . [O]ther circuits have reached different holdings on the constitutionality of handcuffing an allegedly injured arrestee behind his or her back. [collecting cases] In this circuit, the controlling case is Calvi v. Knox County, 470 F.3d 422 (1st Cir.2006), in which we found no constitutional violation when officers handcuffed an allegedly injured arrestee according to standard police practice. . . . There, police officers responded to a report of a woman, Calvi, brandishing a knife in a residence. . . . Calvi’s landlord advised the police officers that Calvi had recently undergone elbow surgery and asked them to be gentle. . . . The police officer ‘did not observe any debilitating condition,’ . . . and handcuffed Calvi according to the ‘[s]tandard police practice’ with her hands behind her back We held that ‘[the officer’s] decision not to deviate from this practice was a judgment call, pure and simple.’ . . . The plaintiffs point to no post-Calvi case that would have put the officers on notice that their decision to handcuff Hunt with his hands behind his back was not a ‘judgment call,’ but clearly violated the Constitution. Nor could they. . . . On the facts of this case, a reasonable officer would not have understood his or her decision to handcuff Hunt with his arms behind his back to constitute excessive force. The officers knew of Hunt’s serious and recent criminal history, and they encountered some admitted resistance. They had also looked at the site of his recent surgery and determined that no new injury or exacerbation would result from the standard technique for handcuffing. Nor was this determination unreasonable since Hunt’s scar was on his stomach. Most of the cases finding excessive force incident to handcuffing involve injuries to the shoulder or arm. . . . After Calvi, a reasonable officer would not have understood this judgment call to be a violation of the Constitution. For these reasons, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiffs’ excessive force claim.”)

Ford v. Bender, 768 F.3d 15, 23-27 (1st Cir. 2014) (“Federal courts have discretion to bypass the first step of the qualified immunity framework and to focus instead on the second step. . . The defendants ask us to do so here. They state that the issue before the court is whether reasonable prison officials would have understood ‘that continuing a lawful DDU sanction during a subsequent period of pretrial detention constituted impermissible punishment proscribed by Bell’ and that the ‘2003 ten-year DDU sanction did not provide adequate process for [Ford’s] 2007–2008 pretrial DDU placement.’ We find that reasonable officials in the defendants’ shoes would not have understood that their actions violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. Since the law was not clearly established, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, the defendants have repeatedly admitted that Ford’s pretrial detention in the DDU had a punitive purpose. For example, Bender acknowledged forthrightly in testimony before the district court that his decision to confine Ford to the DDU in 2007 was ‘[a]bsolutely’ intended to punish. The purpose of the DDU confinement, he declared, was to punish Ford for the assault for which he was awaiting trial. Similarly, St. Amand’s communique noted that the purpose of Ford’s segregated pretrial confinement was to continue serving his punitive DDU sanction. The district court relied on the defendants’ plain expressions of punitive intent to find that the plaintiff’s tenure in the DDU as a pretrial detainee constituted impermissible punishment and, therefore, abridged his right to substantive due process. While Bell provides clear guidance about the constitutional bounds of conditions of confinement for pretrial detainees, Bell does not clearly address whether and when punishment is permitted as an individualized disciplinary sanction for a pretrial detainee’s misconduct. . . . Ford argues that Collazo–Leon concerned a very different factual scenario, one in which the disciplinary infraction and the disciplinary hearing occurred during the pretrial detention itself, whereas Ford’s DDU confinement in 2007–2008 was punishment for an offense committed years earlier when he was serving a prior criminal sentence. Ford might be right that the timing of a disciplinary infraction—during the pretrial detention itself as opposed to during a prior period of incarceration—affects the question of whether pretrial disciplinary segregation violates substantive due process. . . The critical inquiry in deciding this appeal, however, is whether any reasonable official in these circumstances would have understood that the continuing disciplinary sanction, imposed when Ford was a pretrial detainee on different charges, for conduct that occurred during a prior period of incarceration, violated Ford’s constitutional right to substantive or procedural due process. Collazo–Leon does not definitively answer whether Ford’s detention was constitutional or not. It does, however, plainly hold that determining whether an act is punitive does not end the constitutional inquiry in the case of an individualized disciplinary process. Collazo–Leon thus illustrates why Bell alone does not show that the right at issue here was clearly established. . . .The right at issue here is not the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from punishment generally, but rather the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from punishment that was validly imposed while serving a prior criminal sentence. Neither Bell nor Collazo–Leon clearly answers this question. Viewed at the appropriate level of generality, particularly in light of the decision that MCI–Cedar Junction had just received in Karnes, we cannot say that all reasonable prison officials would have known that holding Ford in the DDU during his pretrial detention for an offense that occurred during a prior criminal sentence was unconstitutional. Any violation of Ford's right to substantive due process was not a violation of clearly established law as of 2007–2008. We conclude, therefore, that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the alleged violation of the plaintiff's right to substantive due process.”)

MacDonald v. Town of Eastham, 745 F.3d 8, 10, 14, 15 (1st Cir. 2014) (“This appeal poses the question of whether police officers, responding to a call from a citizen concerned that the door to her absent neighbor’s home is standing wide open, have a right to enter the home in pursuance of their community caretaking function. While the answer to this question is freighted with uncertainty, that uncertainty points the way to the proper disposition of the case: because there is no clearly established law that would deter reasonable police officers from effecting such an entry, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, we affirm the district court’s dismissal of the action. . . . Given the profusion of cases pointing in different directions, it is apparent that the scope and boundaries of the community caretaking exception are nebulous. The plaintiff appears to concede that this rampant uncertainty exists. Nevertheless, he strives to convince us that, whatever the parameters of the exception, the circumstances here fall outside of it. We are not persuaded. There is no real dispute about what the defendant officers did: they responded to a call from a concerned neighbor, saw the door to the plaintiff’s house standing wide open, announced their presence without receiving a reply, and proceeded to enter the home to ensure that nothing was amiss. They conducted their ensuing search in an unremarkable manner. These actions were at least arguably within the scope of the officers’ community caretaking responsibilities—and, given the parade of horrors that could easily be imagined had the officers simply turned tail, a plausible argument can be made that the officers’ actions were reasonable under the circumstances. The plaintiff disagrees. He contends that the officers’ actions were well outside what the law allows and that any reasonable officer should have known as much. To evaluate the plaintiff’s contention, we must examine whether, at the time of the incident, there were either controlling cases or a consensus of persuasive authorities such that reasonable police officers could not have thought that their actions were lawful. . . . Manifestly, there is no directly controlling authority. The question thus reduces to whether a consensus of persuasive judicial decisions exists. We think not. . . . To render a government official’s claim of qualified immunity inert, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . The mixed bag that a canvass of the case law reveals simply does not produce the requisite degree of clarity here. The short of it is that neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff’s home was illegal. Qualified immunity is meant to protect government officials where no such red flags are flying, . . . and we discern no error in the application of the doctrine to this case. . . . Let us be perfectly clear. We do not decide today whether or not the community caretaking exception can be applied so as to render constitutional a warrantless and non-consensual police entry into a residence. Nor do we decide whether or not the circumstances that confronted the officers here come within the compass of the community caretaking exception. These questions are down-to-the-wire close—but the very closeness of the questions is telling. Given the nature of the qualified immunity inquiry, it is sufficient to hold—as we do in this opinion—that because these questions are not resolved by clearly established law, the officers who entered and searched the plaintiff's dwelling are entitled to the shield of qualified immunity. We need go no further.”)

Goldstein v. Galvin, 719 F.3d 16, 29-31 (1st Cir. 2013) (“[T]he plaintiff complains of an allegedly retaliatory act that is not within the scope of either judicial or prosecutorial immunity, specifically, the use of the plaintiff’s name in the public announcement of the enforcement proceeding on the Secretary’s website. The district court disposed of this claim on the basis of qualified immunity. . . . We choose instead to meet it head-on. . . . It is clear beyond hope of contradiction that the inclusion of the plaintiff’s name in a run-of-the-mill website announcement did not sink to the level of actionable retaliatory conduct. The plaintiff does not contend that the website announcement was false or misleading, nor that it divulged confidential information; he takes issue only with the use of his name. . . . Allowing a plaintiff to weave a First Amendment retaliation claim out of something so mundane as a government official’s issuance of a true statement, not couched in inflammatory terms, about a matter of public concern would trivialize the Constitution. . . . That ties up this loose end. The plaintiff has not pleaded a plausible claim for unconstitutional retaliation based on the website announcement. Consequently, the district court did not err in dismissing this claim.”)

Learning Alliances, LLC v. Rivera-Sánchez, 715 F.3d 1, 10 (1st Cir. 2013) (“The district court concluded that Rocket Learning failed to state a plausible equal protection claim. We do not decide that question. Rather, the appellant’s claim falters on the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity test. The record establishes that a reasonable official in the Secretary’s position could have rationally concluded that his actions were consistent with the Constitution.”)

Eldredge v. Town of Falmouth, MA, 662 F.3d 100, 106, 107 (1st Cir. 2011) (“Turning to the claim against Maguire, we first note that it is not mandatory to address the qualified immunity prongs sequentially. . . . Because a finding that a right was not ‘clearly established’ under the second prong of the analysis is sufficient to warrant a grant of qualified immunity, . . . discussion of the first prong will in some cases result ‘in a substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources on difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case[.]’. . . We therefore proceed directly to the ‘clearly established’ prong of the analysis in assessing the claim against Maguire. . . . Maguire urges that, even assuming that he effected an investigatory stop of the plaintiff without reasonable suspicion, he is nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of the detention would not have been apparent to a reasonable officer standing in his shoes. We agree. . . . Here, Officer Maguire was responding to a 911 call in which a fearful caller relayed an urgent situation that was still unfolding—namely, that her ex-boyfriend, who had been drinking, had already ‘trashed’ the inside of her home where children were present and at the time of the call was continuing his destructive behavior outside. As Maguire drove towards the site of the disturbance, he spotted the plaintiff, a male, walking on Sandwich Road after dark on a weeknight, just minutes after a fresh 911 call originating only half a mile away. These facts could reasonably support the suspicion that the plaintiff was the caller’s ex-boyfriend leaving the site of the disturbance. Officer Maguire was therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”)

U.S. v. Garcia-Hernandez, 659 F.3d 108, 115, 116 (1st Cir. 2011) (Ripple, J., concurring) (sitting by designation) (“I join without reservation the clear and comprehensive opinion of the court. Unquestionably, after Hudson, the exclusionary rule is not an appropriate remedy for violations of the knock-and-announce rule. Nor is it an appropriate remedy if a court should determine that the manner in which a warrant was executed violated the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment. I write separately only to emphasize that the confluence of the rule we announce today and the prevailing methodological approach to the resolution of qualified immunity issues raises the significant possibility that conscientious law enforcement officers will be deprived of needed judicial guidance concerning the manner in which warrants must be executed. Today’s decision makes it clear that criminal trials, and appeals from those proceedings, rarely will yield judicial determinations about the reasonableness of the force employed in the execution of the warrant. Such determinations therefore will occur most frequently in the adjudication of civil actions brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 or under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971). In most, although not all, the defense of qualified immunity will be available. In such cases courts now are authorized to decide the qualified immunity issue without reaching the constitutional question. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009). In Pearson, the Court made clear that the two-step sequence for resolving government officials’ qualified immunity claims, previously formulated in [Saucier] should not be regarded as an inflexible requirement. . . It is now permissible for a court to determine that considerations such as judicial economy and the danger of premature constitutional adjudication counsel against resting its decision on constitutional grounds. . . Instead, the court first may determine that, at the time they acted, the defendants’ actions did not violate settled constitutional principles. As the Court noted in Pearson, however, despite this new flexibility in approach, reaching the constitutional question ‘is often appropriate’ and ‘often beneficial.’ . . Indeed, the Court emphasized that ‘the Saucier Court was certainly correct in noting that the two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’ . . Cases involving the manner in which a search warrant is executed certainly fall within this description. One might argue that the constitutionality of a particular search or seizure is ‘so factbound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases,’ . . . and therefore it serves no useful purpose to address the constitutional issue. However, Fourth Amendment principles concerning reasonableness in the execution of a warrant, no less than the legal rules for probable cause and reasonable suspicion, ‘acquire content only through application.’ . . This case-by-case adjudication will not, and need not, yield ‘“a highly sophisticated set of rules, qualified by all sorts of ifs, ands, and buts ... [which is] literally impossible [to apply] by the officer in the field.”’ . . It can develop, however, a body of law to provide meaningful guidance that will benefit both law enforcement officers and civilians. . . By contrast, a judicial approach that, as a matter of course, does not reach the underlying constitutional issue will deprive conscientious officers of the guidance necessary to ensure that they execute their responsibilities in a manner compatible with the Constitution. Here, an incomplete constitutional landscape can present a practical problem of governance of significant proportions.” [footnotes omitted])

Haley v. City of Boston, 657 F.3d 39, 47-51 (1st Cir. 2011) (“In the first of his two section 1983 forays against the detectives, Haley alleges that they abridged his due process rights by failing to comply with the disclosure obligation imposed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and explicated by the Supreme Court in Brady v. Maryland. Because the answer to the second of the two qualified immunity inquiries required by Pearson is plain, we assume without deciding that the alleged no-fault nondisclosure constitutes a viable claim of breach and proceed directly to the question of whether the specific right upon which the claim hinges was clearly established at the time of Haley’s trial. . . . We need not decide when it became clearly established that Brady extended to impeachment evidence. Here, qualified immunity attaches for a different and independent reason: in 1972, it was not clearly established that Brady’s no-fault disclosure obligation applied to police officers as opposed to prosecutors. By its terms, Brady applied only to prosecutors. 373 U.S. at 87-88. The Court’s decision contained no discussion of any independent disclosure obligations that might affect police officers. In the roughly nine years between Brady and Haley’s trial, the question of how, if at all, the Brady rule might apply to disclosure of material known only to police officers remained uncertain. . . . In Kyles v. Whitley, the Court held that the disclosure obligation imposed by Brady extends to evidence known only to police officers, but that the responsibility for obtaining and disclosing such evidence remains the duty of the prosecutor, and not the police officer. . . . The holding in Kyles is antithetic to any suggestion that in 1972, Brady’s affirmative disclosure obligation reached unreservedly to no-fault nondisclosure of Brady materials known only to police officers. A fortiori, it was not then clearly established that police officers owed any affirmative no-fault obligation to criminal defendants. Consequently, the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [W]e take Haley’s case as he has pleaded it, and proceed to determine whether, as a matter of law, the detectives are entitled to qualified immunity on the deliberate suppression claim. In evaluating this claim, we employ the traditional two-step qualified immunity pavane. . . . We start with whether the complaint alleges a violation of a constitutional right. This question is not difficult. Haley’s deliberate suppression claim fits easily within the compass of the right described in Mooney. . . . Deliberate concealment of material evidence by the police, designed to grease the skids for false testimony and encourage wrongful conviction, unarguably implicates a defendant’s due process rights. . . . Almost forty years before Haley was tried, the Supreme Court made it pellucid that due process protects an accused against a conviction procured through deliberate deception. . . . The upshot, then, is that, by 1972, the relevant right was clearly established. The inquiry into whether objectively reasonable officials in the defendants’ positions would have known that their actions contravened this clearly established right need not occupy us for long. This inquiry perforce focuses on the facts of the particular case. . . . We think that, even as far back as 1972, a reasonable officer in the circumstances alleged here would have understood that parlous behavior of the sort described in Haley’s complaint would contravene the constitutional right limned in Mooney and its progeny. . . . Consequently, the district court erred in dismissing this claim.”).

Díaz-Bigio v. Santini, 652 F.3d 45, 52 (1st Cir. 2011) (“Assuming arguendo that the facts alleged by Díaz-Bigio set forth a claim of a First Amendment violation, we turn to the second prong of Pearson and ask whether a reasonably competent city official could have thought that he or she would not violate the First Amendment by terminating Díaz-Bigio's employment given the circumstances of the case—where the city investigated Díaz-Bigio's much publicized allegations of serious improprieties by the executive director of her department, where she refused to provide testimony or evidence to corroborate her claims, where the investigation determined that the claims were false and baseless, and where her actions were found to violate state and local regulations. Under a long line of cases from this circuit granting qualified immunity, the defendants are entitled to summary judgment because the outcome of the Pickering balancing of interests in this case was not so clear as to put all reasonable officials on notice that firing Díaz-Bigio would violate the law. Reasonable officials could well have concluded there was no First Amendment violation on these facts.”)

San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 650 F.3d 826, 838, 839 (1st Cir. 2011) (“In this case, we have already held that plaintiffs have made out a due process claim. . . and we assume here that they would prevail in proving a constitutional violation. Still, the second prong of qualified immunity—whether the right at issue was clearly established—remains to be addressed. . . .In this case, we are not persuaded that the state of the law at the time of the incidents put defendants on clear notice that their actions violated due process. Specifically, we explain above that not every deviation from state law qualifies as ‘random and unauthorized’ conduct within the meaning of Parratt and Hudson, such that defendants are not required to provide predeprivation process. . . . Zinermon makes this conclusion unmistakably clear. . . . Yet, as we have noted (and in fairness to the defendants), a number of our previous decisions might have been reasonably read to require this erroneous interpretation of Parratt and Hudson. . . . These statements easily could have led the defendants to believe that they were not required to provide a meaningful predeprivation hearing and that, under Parratt and Hudson, providing postdeprivation remedies was all the process that was due. In view of this, it cannot fairly be said that the defendants were on clear notice that their failure to provide predeprivation process violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, and defendants thus are entitled to qualified immunity.”), vacated and reh'g en banc granted, 665 F.3d 350 (1st Cir. 2011). The court has asked the parties to file supplemental briefs addressing the following questions:

1. How do the principles of the Parratt–Hudson doctrine, including its development in Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113 (1990), apply in the circumstances of this case?
2. Is First Circuit law inconsistent with this governing Supreme Court law? If so, is that circuit precedent relevant to the “clearly established law” analysis for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry?
3. Assuming a due process violation occurred in the present case, does qualified immunity apply?

Mlodzinski v. Lewis, 648 F.3d 24, 34, 36, 37, 39 (1st Cir. 2011) (“All three plaintiffs bring claims of unreasonable seizure against the Bristol officers and Commander Cormier on the theory that there was no justification for keeping them in handcuffs in the living room for forty-five minutes to an hour while the police searched the apartment. The qualified immunity question before us is whether a reasonably competent officer could have thought, even mistakenly, that in light of the clearly established law at the time, it was reasonable to keep plaintiffs in handcuffs for this duration while the search was executed. . . . In light of Mena, we conclude that the question of qualified immunity must be decided in favor of these officers. They are entitled to immunity because it would have been fairly debatable among reasonable officers whether detaining plaintiffs in handcuffs for forty-five minutes to an hour during the search was reasonable under the facts. We say the question was fairly debatable because, as the district court carefully noted, there are some obvious differences from Mena which we believe reasonable officers should have considered. First, the number of detainees did not, as in Mena, outnumber the number of officers throughout the period of their detention. . . . Second, plaintiffs' home was not a gang house known to have firearms in it, but rather an apartment known to house a family that included a fifteen-year-old girl. . . . Third, the object of the search was a nightstick used when two teenagers attacked another one over a girl, rather than a gun possessed by a gang member who had recently been involved in a drive-by shooting; although the officers had a fear that there was a firearm on the premises that could be used against them, that fear did not have the same foundation as in Mena. . . . Based on these differences, a reasonable officer might well have reached a different conclusion than defendants did here. However, these factors are not so substantial that no competent officer could have thought that the use of handcuffs during the search was permissible. . . . To be clear, we are not holding that on plaintiffs' version of the facts there was no constitutional violation, but rather that if there was a violation, it was not so clear as to give the officers fair warning. . . . For Jessica, the claim of excessive force is based on the fact that she was shoved to the floor by Officer Arell, severely damaging her kneecap, and that she was then handcuffed behind her back with metal handcuffs and detained with an assault rifle held to her head for seven to ten minutes, far beyond the time it took to locate, arrest, and remove Rothman. We do not separate these facts out but rather take them as a whole. . . . On plaintiffs' version of events, Jessica, a fifteen-year-old girl, was in no way a threat to the officers. She was not a suspect and made no efforts to resist, but rather complied with all commands. And the officers' actions are alleged to have caused her serious physical injury, which required two surgeries and extensive treatment, as well as psychological injury, including Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. . . . First, the facts are sufficient to support a finding that a Fourth Amendment violation occurred. Second, taking all facts and inferences in Jessica's favor, we conclude, as did the district court, that the CNHSOU officers involved are not on this state of the record entitled to immunity. The law was sufficiently well established to provide the officers with fair warning that the force they are alleged to have used on Jessica was excessive given the circumstances. . . . Even without a First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts, defendants would have had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive. . . . The circumstances of Tina's detention in bed are unlike those in which a reasonable officer could have thought that keeping a gun pointed at her head was lawful. . . . There was no reasonable danger that Tina, who was not a suspect and was nearly naked in bed and without a sheet, was concealing a weapon. . . . The officers were not carrying out a warrant for a group of individuals who might have been engaged in joint criminal activity with Rothman. . . . And the gun pointed at Tina was not, on her version, lowered as soon as it was clearly safe to do so. . . . Defendants had fair notice that under the circumstances alleged, the detention of Tina with an assault rifle at her head was objectively unreasonable.”)

Lopera v. Town Of Coventry, 640 F.3d 388, 396-98, 402, 403 (1st Cir. 2011) (“In this case, these considerations counsel that we consider the second prong of the analysis and go no further. That prong, we have held, has two aspects: that both (1) the legal contours of the right in question and (2) the particular factual violation in question would have been clear to a reasonable official. . . Together, these two factors ask whether a reasonable officer, similarly situated, would have believed that his conduct did not violate the Constitution. . . . Under the facts alleged by the players, a reasonable officer could have concluded that Coach Marchand had authority to consent to a search of his students. . . . On the plaintiffs’ version of the facts, we cannot say that all officers of reasonable competence would have concluded that Coach Marchand’s consent to the search was invalid. . . . While a jury might find that Coach Marchand subjectively believed his consent was coerced, that is not the issue here; we must look to the view of the reasonable officer. . . Like Coach Marchand, the police officers faced a tough decision in a difficult situation. Whether the officers made the correct decision is not the point. . . . The players do not cite any cases from this court or the Supreme Court finding a violation of the Equal Protection Clause in the absence of purposeful discrimination on the part of the relevant officials. Accordingly, we hold that the players have not shown that it is clearly established that acts that effectuate the known discriminatory intent of others, without more, violate the Equal Protection Clause. . . . There is no evidence that all officers of reasonable competence would have believed the search was undertaken because of the national origin or race of the players.”).

Lopera v. Town Of Coventry, 640 F.3d 388, 404-06, 411 (1st Cir. 2011) (Thompson, J., dissenting in part) (“I agree with my colleagues that a reasonable officer could have believed that Coach Marchand had in loco parentis authority to consent to the search of the players and that their equal protection claims must fail. My colleagues and I part company, however, on the issue of qualified immunity. Because I cannot subscribe to the majority’s determination that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they could reasonably have believed that Coach Marchand voluntarily consented to the search of his students, I respectfully dissent. . . .My colleagues think that a reasonable officer would be unaware of the duress this state of affairs would inspire in the team’s coach. In my view, however, the officers’ request of Coach Marchand while he was surrounded by an angry mob and unable to depart with his players left little room for choice. He was subjected to coercion which, though subtler than a peremptory command and more courteous than the irate mob, could hardly be plainer. This coercion vitiated any consent he could give, rendering the subsequent search unlawful. . . . In granting qualified immunity to the officers, my colleagues analyzed only the second prong of the test, as permitted by Pearson. . . Because I would deny qualified immunity, however, I must address both aspects of the analysis. . . . Because, as discussed below, I believe that a reasonable officer would have known that Coach Marchand’s consent to the search of his players was coerced, the first prong of the qualified immunity test is easily satisfied : there was an actual violation in the form of an unconstitutional search. . . . I am gravely concerned that our case law is treading terribly close to creating ‘an impenetrable defense for government officials’ and a ‘significant risk that qualified immunity will always attach.’ Savard

v. Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 41 (1st Cir.2003)(equally divided en banc court)(opinion of Bownes, J.). The Fourth Amendment is one of our most precious constitutional rights. We should not so comfortably defer to the judgment of government officials at the cost of eviscerating such a fundamental right of our citizens-a right this nation has declared deserves the highest protection. . . . With these concerns in mind and taking, as I must, every inference available in the record in favor of the plaintiffs, I cannot say that a reasonable officer in the defendants' position could have concluded that Marchand voluntarily consented to the search. The Central Falls team's rights were violated; the violation was clear; and a reasonable officer should have recognized it. I would vacate the district court's entry of summary judgment and remand for resolution of the factual disputes upon which the officers' claim of qualified immunity turns.")

Barton v. Clancy, 632 F.3d 9, 22-27 (1st Cir. 2011) ("In conducting a qualified immunity analysis, a court should 'use its full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.' . . . [N]either the Supreme Court nor this court has ever held that the rule forbidding denial of valuable governmental benefits in reprisal for protected speech announced in Perry v. Sindermann and its progeny extends to the denial of non-compensated positions on voluntary boards. Scant authority in support of such an extension of the doctrine currently exists. [court reviews out-of-circuit precedent] In sum, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have found that volunteer positions are entitled to constitutional protection; however, these cases have relied in part, either directly or indirectly, on state statutes which mandate that such volunteers be treated as employees. The Tenth Circuit, albeit in dicta, has concluded that volunteers enjoy First Amendment protection without reliance on any such state statute. The Third Circuit, like this circuit, has assumed without deciding that a public volunteer position is a valuable government benefit, the deprivation of which can trigger First Amendment scrutiny. At the same time, no court has held that volunteers are not protected by the First Amendment. . . . Leaving for another day the question of whether Barton has stated a constitutional violation, we hold that as of April 2006, the law was not sufficiently clear to put Clancy on notice that declining to reappoint Barton to the volunteer position of Parks Commissioner in retaliation for his First Amendment activities was unlawful. . . . In sum, determining whether Clancy was liable for his failure to reappoint Barton would require us to answer two uncertain legal questions: (1) whether a volunteer position is a valuable government benefit the loss of which can form the basis of a First Amendment retaliation claim; and (2) whether, even if the removal from a volunteer position triggers First Amendment scrutiny, the failure to reappoint to a volunteer term position can also trigger such scrutiny. Consequently, the dimensions of the right at issue were far from 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'")

Raiche v. Pietroski, 623 F.3d 30, 36, 37, 39 (1st Cir. 2010) ("Although we do not need to follow the rigid structure that we once did, we will proceed to conduct each step of the analysis in the traditional order. This exercise reveals that, given the jury's resolution of the facts, Pietroski's use of force was not defensible and, therefore, that qualified immunity affords him no refuge. . . . Looking beyond the Graham factors to the sufficiency of the evidence, we find that the record contains ample evidence to support a determination that Pietroski's conduct was unreasonable, even under the Boston Police Department's own standards. Coyne's candid testimony is particularly useful here. According to Coyne, the Boston Police Academy instructs officers to follow the Use of Force Continuum in determining the proper amount of force to use when conducting a stop. The Continuum provides five levels of intensity: (1) the presence of a uniformed police officer; (2) verbal command, which includes a police car's overhead lights or siren; (3) open-hand command, which entails physically taking control of a person; (4) non-lethal incapacitating devices, such as pepper spray; and (5) lethal force. Officers are to conduct a traffic stop using the least amount of force necessary and to end the use of force outright when a person has pulled over and stopped. Coyne's testimony provided a clear framework for the jury to assess Pietroski's use of force; applying this framework, a reasonable jury could easily conclude that the use of force should have ceased when Raiche stopped and pulled over in response to the cruiser's overhead lights. Such a conclusion would compel a finding that Pietroski acted unreasonably when he slammed Raiche and his motorcycle to the pavement. . . . We need not decide whether there are materially similar cases of controlling authority or a consensus of persuasive authority existing at the time of the incident which would have clearly established the law. . . . A reasonable officer with training on the Use of Force Continuum would not have needed prior case law on point to recognize that it is unconstitutional to tackle a person who has already stopped in response to the officer's command to stop and who presents no indications of dangerousness.")

Melendez-Garcia v. Sanchez, 629 F.3d 25, 35-37 (1st Cir. 2010) ("In light of Pearson, we may now address the second prong of the qualified immunity test first. . . . We follow that course here. . . . We conclude that it would not have been clear to a reasonable UPR official that the conduct at issue here was unlawful. . . . Regardless of whether a plaintiff proceeds under the theory that the defendants are liable because they limited his ability to protect himself (the 'limitation' theory), or under the theory that they are liable because they created or substantially contributed to the danger he faced and then failed to protect him from it (the 'state-created danger' theory), the defendants' actions must also 'shock the conscience of the court[]'. . . in order for the plaintiff to prevail. . . . Even if Meléndez were able to establish that the officials here (1) either (a) created a danger and then failed to protect him from it or (b) limited his ability to protect himself or receive protection from outside sources, and (2) engaged in conscience-shocking conduct, he would still need to prove that it would have been clear to a reasonable UPR official that the relevant behavior here was unlawful. He cannot do so. . . . Meléndez argues that the university has been deliberately indifferent to the ROTC's security needs and that this alleged deliberate indifference shocks the conscience. He does not attempt to explain why he believes the relevant law was 'clearly established.' We conclude that it would not have been clear to a reasonable official that the conduct about which Meléndez complains was unlawful. The district court concluded that the continued implementation of the NCP was not conscience-shocking because it was 'an attempt, however imperfect, to balance the competing rights of free speech, safety and use of university property by different student groups on campus.' . . . In light of the evidence that the NCP was established to balance these rights and goals, we conclude that it would not have been clear to a reasonable official that continuing to implement the NCP was unlawful.")

Cortes-Reyes v. Salas-Quintana, 608 F.3d 41, 51-53 (1st Cir. 2010) (“This is a case in which any conclusions we might draw about the relevant Commonwealth law would be uncertain at best. Moreover, as we explain below, that very uncertainty is critical to our analysis of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity doctrine. . . .As we have had occasion to observe in the past, translated Puerto Rico law is both sparse and contradictory on the question of the property interest in continued employment of transitory government employees. . . . In the face of two cases that seem to give opposing answers to the question whether a transitory government employee has an entitlement to his or her continued employment, the plaintiffs do not explain how the law clearly established that conduct ‘materially similar’ to that of the defendants in this case was unconstitutional at the time the plaintiffs were fired. . . . Qualified immunity, therefore, shielded the defendants from the due process claims of the plaintiffs.”)

Walden v. City of Providence, R.I., 596 F.3d 38, 52 (1st Cir. 2010) (“Courts need not address these questions in order. Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818; Maldonado, 568 F.3d at 269-70. We turn to the second part of the test and specifically whether the right in question was so clearly established as to give notice to defendants that their actions were unconstitutional in 2002. . . . This is a question of pure law. This question must be resolved based on the state of the law at the time of the alleged violation. . . . [T]he relevant question in this case is not whether in 2002 the Fourth Amendment generally prohibited the recording of telephone calls. The question is whether, in 2002, public safety employees, like plaintiffs, had a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment not to have calls made at work recorded. We hold there was no such clearly established law.”).

Estrada v. Rhode Island, 594 F.3d 56, 62-64 (1st Cir. 2010) (“In this case, the district court ruled that Officer Chabot had reasonable suspicion to suspect immigration violations, to transport the Plaintiffs to ICE, and to twice pat-down Tamup. The court thus did not reach the issue of qualified immunity. We choose to answer the question of qualified immunity first, which makes it unnecessary to determine whether Officer Chabot had reasonable suspicion to take these actions. . . .After Pearson, we no longer have to take these two steps in ‘strict sequence.’. . . Thus if a reasonable official would not have understood that his conduct violated Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights, we must grant him qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiffs do not contest the validity of the traffic stop, nor do they argue that it was unlawful for Officer Chabot to request identification from all the passengers in the van, a question our Circuit has not conclusively decided. . . . Instead, Plaintiffs argue that Officer Chabot’s inquiry into their immigration status and subsequent call to ICE prolonged the traffic stop, converting it into an unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. We cannot say, however, that it was clear as a matter of law that Officer Chabot’s brief line of questioning, nor the three minutes it took for him to receive a response from ICE, unreasonably prolonged the stop such that independent reasonable suspicion was necessary to support his inquiry into Plaintiffs’ immigration status. The traffic stop at issue took place a year after the Supreme Court’s decision in Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93 (2005). In that case, the Court held that a police officer does not need independent reasonable suspicion to question an individual about her immigration status during the execution of a search warrant, but that such inquiry constitutes ‘mere police questioning’ so long as the detention was not prolonged by the questioning. Other courts have held that questioning that extends the length of detention ‘by only a brief time’ does not ‘make the custody itself unreasonable.’ [citing cases] At the time of the traffic stop, our Circuit had not decided this question. . . . In any event, the law was not and is not [now] clearly established, such that Chabot should have known that he could not investigate further. We thus conclude that Officer Chabot is entitled to federal and state qualified immunity for any possible constitutional violations that he may have committed in asking the van’s passengers questions about their immigration status and in contacting ICE.”).

Estrada v. Rhode Island, 594 F.3d 56, 68, 69 (1st Cir. 2010 (Lynch, C.J., concurring) (“I join in Judge Torruella’s well-done opinion. As he states, this case raises no issue as to whether police officers may ask for the identification of all other passengers in a vehicle that is stopped for a minor traffic violation (failing to signal before changing lanes) by the driver. . . Nor does this case involve whether a police officer may detain and escort to the immigration authorities a vehicle containing persons who do not speak English and appear to be foreign, based on no more than the officer’s ‘hunch’ that the passengers may be aliens who entered or remained in the country illegally. Rather, on the facts of this case, plaintiffs’ claims must fail because a reasonable officer would have had no basis in existing law to conclude that his actions violated any constitutional rights, and so Officer Chabot is entitled to immunity. . . The initial stop of the van and the two pat downs were plainly reasonable for safety reasons and provide no basis for any claim of constitutional violation. In my view, the specific facts of this case also require the conclusion that the officer is entitled to immunity on all claims related to the detention and escorting of the vehicle and its passengers to the immigration authorities.”).

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 269 (1st Cir. 2009) (“It is clear from the Supreme Court’s description of the second, ‘clearly established’ step of the qualified immunity analysis that the second step, in turn, has two aspects. One aspect of the analysis focuses on the clarity of the law at the time of the alleged civil rights violation. . . . The other aspect focuses more concretely on the facts of the particular case and whether a reasonable defendant would have understood that his conduct violated the plaintiffs’ constitutional rights. . . . In administering the Court’s test, this circuit has tended to list separately the two sub-parts of the ‘clearly established’ prong along with the first prong and, as a result, has articulated the qualified immunity test as a three-part test. . . While the substance of our three-part test has been faithful to the substance of the Court’s two-part test, we owe fidelity to the Court’s articulation of the test as well. And so we now adopt the Court’s two-part test and abandon our previous usage of a three-step analysis.”).

Bergeron v. Cabral, 560 F.3d 1, 7, 12, 13 (1st Cir. 2009) (“Pearson creates a pathway to flexibility. It does not in any way preclude courts from going step by step. . . Because the parties briefed and argued the case at hand pre-Pearson, it makes sense to adhere to a sequential mode of analysis here. We proceed in that fashion. . . . [T]he case law of the Supreme Court and this circuit alone establish that there was fair notice that a reduction in income controlled by the employer was actionable. There is no need to go beyond that; we accept the principle that a single out of circuit case would not alone be enough. But we think it germane to note that there was at least one such case decided prior to the decommissioning that had haunting parallels to this case. . . . In Bass, the Tenth Circuit, following an agnate line of reasoning, had held that a sheriff's decision to rescind the commission of a reserve deputy constituted an adverse employment action under what that court viewed as clearly established First Amendment principles. . . . The plain import of these decisions is that, by 2005, it was clearly established that public officials could not significantly impact an employee's compensation or earning capacity on the basis of the employee's political affiliation. Inasmuch as a deputy-sheriff commission offers a jail officer the potential to garner substantial financial benefits, it was clearly established when the defendant acted that she could not deprive a jail officer of his commission out of political animus. Thus, the plaintiffs have satisfied the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . The third prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is qualitatively different from the first two prongs. . . . The inquiry at step three is 'whether it would have been clear to an objectively reasonable official, situated similarly to a particular appellant, that the actions taken or omitted contravened the clearly established right.' . . . So, if the defendant could reasonably have believed that she could decommission the plaintiffs with impunity on the basis of their political advocacy, she would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Public officials have long been on notice that, even when they have authority to take a discretionary action for virtually any reason, there are certain reasons— race, gender, religion, to name a few—upon which they may not rely in exercising their discretion to bestow or withdraw valuable government benefits. . . . In this case, the defendant made a calculated decision to decommission several deputy sheriffs who had opposed her bid for office. She acted deliberately and purposefully. When this type of executive decision violates clearly established law, it is much harder to justify than when a public official makes a split-second judgment in the heat of the moment. . . . Given the clarity of the law in April of 2005, we do not think that any reasonable public official could have thought that she could divest those who opposed her political aspirations of the opportunity to work lucrative details while leaving her political supporters free to cash in on those opportunities. Accordingly, the plaintiffs have satisfied the third prong of the qualified immunity inquiry.”)

Caniglia v. Strom, No. 115CV00525JJMLDA, 2021 WL 5040248, at *1 (D.R.I. Oct. 27, 2021) (on remand) (“The United States Supreme Court reaffirmed the doctrine of qualified immunity last week in two per curiam opinions. In City of Talequah, OK v. Bond, the Supreme Court held that ‘[t]he doctrine of qualified immunity shields officers from civil liability so long as their conduct “does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.”’ . . . To show the law was clearly established, a party must identify precedent that ‘addresses facts like the ones at issue’ in that matter. Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, No. 20-1539, 2021 WL 4822662, at 3 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021). Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 590 (2018)). Qualified immunity, the Supreme Court mandates, protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’. The law on the community caretaking function as an exception to traditional warrant procedures in the home was far from clear at the time Mr. Caniglia's cause of action arose, particularly within this Circuit. This Court previously ruled as such, and upon independent review again, those facts and findings set forth below still hold true. . . . When the First Circuit has considered whether the community caretaking function applies to searches and seizures in homes as well as cars, it observed that 'the reach of the community caretaking doctrine is poorly defined outside of the motor vehicle milieu,' that it 'has not decided whether the community caretaking exception applies to police activities involving a person's home,' and that the case law reveals that the scope and boundaries of the community caretaking exception are nebulous.' . . . The First Circuit concluded that 'neither the general dimensions of the community caretaking exception nor the case law addressing the application of that exception provides the sort of red flag that would have semaphored to reasonable police officers that their entry into the plaintiff's home was illegal.' . . . Because of this ambiguity, the Court finds that it is not clearly established that the community caretaking exception does not apply to police activity in the home intended to preserve and protect the public. . . . Indeed, the very fact that Supreme Court disagreed with this Court and the First Circuit on the issue of community caretaking function illustrates a lack of clarity. Thus, it is not possible that a reasonable Cranston Police Officer could have understood the potentially problematic nature of their conduct. Because the law was not clearly established on the community caretaking exception at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, the Court GRANTS Defendants' Second Motion for Summary Judgment with respect to the individual Defendants on the ground of qualified immunity[.] . . . Plaintiff's policy arguments cannot overcome, and do not comport with, the well-established rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court on qualified immunity, which this Court is bound to follow. . . . The Court need not, and does not, address whether there was a constitutional violation in this matter. Given the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson v. Callahan, '[t]he judges of the district courts and the courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' Pearson, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009); see also City of Tahlequah, Oklahoma v. Bond, No. 20-1668, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2 (U.S. Oct. 18, 2021) ("We need not, and do not, decide whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place, or whether recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force can itself violate the Fourth Amendment. On this record, the officers plainly did not violate any clearly established law.") Therefore, the Court resolves this matter solely upon an analysis of the second prong of the qualified immunity doctrine.") Ballinger v. Kingston, No. CV 18-11187-FDS, 2019 WL 6726689, at *17–18 (D. Mass. Dec. 10, 2019) ("The court has discretion to decide which of these two steps to address first. . . . The Supreme Court has 'detailed a range of circumstances in which courts should address only the immunity question,' and thus skip to the second step. . . . 'But it remains true that following the two-step sequence—defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity—is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.' . . . That is the case here. The analysis above is somewhat fact-intensive, which supports skipping to the second step. . . . But the well-developed record here enables analysis of the first step without unduly expending judicial resources. . . More importantly, that analysis, while fact-intensive, may provide guidance to public officials about the scope of police officers’ right of free speech, which is frequently litigated. . . Accordingly, the Court has started with the first step, finding a triable issue of fact as to whether plaintiff suffered a violation of his right of free speech, and now examines whether any such right was clearly established. Qualified immunity is often applicable in cases of alleged First Amendment retaliation by a government employer. That is because the first two elements of the three-part test—whether the plaintiff spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern and whether his interest in commenting outweighs the government’s interest in promoting efficiency—are fact-intensive and can ‘rarely be considered “clearly established” for purposes of the Harlow qualified immunity standard.’ . . That principle clearly applies here. The question of whether plaintiff spoke as a citizen on a matter of public concern when he testified at Munford’s termination hearing is fact-intensive. . . Thus, even if there were a constitutional violation, Chief Splaine would be entitled to qualified immunity, because objectively reasonable officials would not have understood under the circumstances that the conduct at issue could have violated plaintiff’s constitutional right to free speech. Accordingly, because Chief Splaine is the only named defendant in Count Seven, defendants’ motion for summary judgment will be granted as to Count Seven.”) Campos v. Van Ness, 52 F.Supp.3d 240, 242, 244, 246, 251, 254, 256, 258-59 (D. Mass. 2014) (“On May 19, 2014, following seven days of trial and three days of deliberations, the jury was unable to reach a unanimous verdict on either claim. However, the jury did make unanimous findings on two of the three factual questions presented to it. The court declared a mistrial, directed entry of the factual findings, and ordered the parties to brief the issue of qualified immunity in light of the jury’s factual findings. A hearing on that issue was held on June 20, 2014. For the reasons explained below, the court finds that Van Ness is entitled to judgment as a matter of law with respect to the claims by Campos individually and on behalf of Martins because he is shielded by qualified immunity as to both. Therefore, judgment is being entered for the defendant. . . . During its deliberations, the jury asked several questions, and eventually indicated that it might not be able to reach a unanimous verdict on either claim. Following three days of deliberations, the jury reported that it was at an irresolvable impasse regarding the ultimate questions in the case. . . However, the jury was able to unanimously decide two of the three factual questions they were asked to resolve:

- 1(b)(i): ‘Did Officer Van Ness shoot Mr. Martins before Mr. Martins’ car began moving?’ No.
- 1(b)(iii): ‘Was Mr. Martins’ car moving, but not at Officer Van Ness, when Officer Van Ness shot him?’ Yes.

. . .The jury was not able to unanimously decide Question 1(b)(ii): ‘Was Mr. Martins’ car moving at Officer Van Ness before Officer Van Ness shot him?’ . . .

On May 19, 2014, the court declared a mistrial on all claims and directed the Clerk to enter the jury’s two factual findings. . . . In finding the facts for present purposes, the court is employing the Rule 50 standard and giving ‘deference ... to the jury’s discernible resolution of disputed factual issues.’ . . Therefore, the court accepts the jury’s factual determinations: (1) that Van Ness did not shoot Martins before Martins’ car began moving; and (2) that Martins’ car was moving, but not at

Van Ness, when Van Ness shot him. . . . The court is, therefore, addressing qualified immunity first, which makes it unnecessary to determine whether Van Ness violated Martins' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . As explained below, Van Ness is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Martins' claim based on his actions allegedly taken to defend himself. However, in view of the precedent that existed in July 2008, Van Ness is entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Martins' claim because of the risk that Martins posed to others. . . . The essential question in determining whether Van Ness is protected by qualified immunity, therefore, is whether in July 2008 it was clearly established that this level of risk to others did not justify the use of deadly force. As explained below, neither the parties nor the court have identified a case decided before July 2008 that 'squarely governs the case here,' Brosseau, 543 U.S. at 201, and while this Court is not deciding whether Van Ness' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, some analogous cases to reach the issue have found no Fourth Amendment violation as a matter of law. Most importantly for qualified immunity purposes, the divided body of circuit cases demonstrates that Van Ness' actions 'fell in the "hazy border between excessive and acceptable force."' . . . Therefore, Van Ness is entitled to qualified immunity. As the Supreme Court recently explained in Plumhoff, 'Brosseau makes plain that as of February 21, 1999—the date of the events at issue in that case—it was not clearly established that it was unconstitutional to shoot a fleeing driver to protect those whom his flight might endanger.' . . . The Court went on to find that this remained true at least until July 18, 2004, the date of the incident in Plumhoff. . . . In Brosseau, Scott, and Plumhoff, the Supreme Court has indicated that, although the analysis in each case is fact specific, . . . officers who use lethal force to stop a fleeing driver who poses an imminent public safety risk are at least protected by qualified immunity, and may have acted objectively reasonably as a matter of law. As discussed earlier, the undisputed evidence in the instant case shows that Martins' posed a serious, imminent risk to public safety. . . . Like the driver in Brosseau, it is undisputed that Martins refused to heed the officer's warnings at gunpoint, . . . tried to drive away from the officer and resume his flight, . . . and would be fleeing to an area where other officers and civilians were known to be These cases do not necessarily show that Van Ness' conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment. However, they are similar enough to the instant case that, absent a more recent controlling precedent or the development of a robust consensus in the case law between the time when they were decided and July 2008, a reasonable officer Van Ness' position would not have known that using lethal force against Martins violated his Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Van Ness testified that he knew there was a passenger in the vehicle before he shot into and at it. The jury could have found that he intended to shoot and stop the passenger, Campos, as well as Martins. However, based on Van Ness' agreement it was not required to decide this question. Therefore, it is appropriate to assume for present purposes that Campos' Fourth Amendment rights were implicated and force that could be found to have been directed against her was objectively unreasonable. However, in July 2008, a reasonable officer in Van Ness' position would not have known that his conduct violated Campos' Fourth Amendment rights. As the Supreme Court wrote in Plumhoff with regard to the state of the law in 2004:

There seems to be some disagreement among lower courts as to whether a passenger in Allen's situation can recover under a Fourth Amendment theory. Compare Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323 (11th Cir.2003) (suggesting yes), and Fisher v. Memphis, 234 F.3d 312 (6th Cir.2000) (same), with Milstead v. Kibler, 243 F.3d 157 (4th Cir.2001) (suggesting no), and Landol–Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791 (1st Cir.1990) (same). We express no view on this question. 134 S.Ct. at 2022 n.4. As the Supreme Court implicitly indicated in this 2014 statement in Plumhoff, the law had not become clearly established by 2008.”)

Brown v. Pepe, 42 F.Supp.3d 310, 314-17 & n.7 (D. Mass. 2014) (“There are cases ‘in which a court will rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law before turning to the more difficult question whether the relevant facts make out a constitutional question at all.’ . . . A trial court, in other words, is at liberty to proceed in the sequence that seems most appropriate to the facts of the case at hand. . . . Here, the court will take up the arguably ‘more difficult question’ or whether Brown has alleged a constitutional violation at all. . . . The court notes, however, that because there is no clearly established law in Massachusetts or the First Circuit giving guidance on the constitutionality of a perp walk, the result would be reached very quickly under a ‘clearly established law’ analysis. The court chooses the more difficult approach because of the value of establishing such guidance, a benefit which this case has the potential of achieving. . . . The constitutionality of the so-called ‘perp walk’ is a matter of first impression in this Circuit. Brown’s principal argument is based on an alleged violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be free from ‘unreasonable . . . seizures.’ . . . Weighing the ‘minimal’ intrusion on Brown’s privacy against these significant government interests, it is clear that there was no unreasonable Fourth Amendment seizure in the taping of his perp walk.”)

Pineiro v. Gemme, 937 F.Supp.2d 161, 170-73 (D. Mass. 2013) (“Plaintiff contends that he has a constitutional right to carry a firearm outside the home for the ‘core lawful purpose’ of ‘self-defense.’ Neither Heller nor McDonald addressed the question of Second Amendment rights outside the home. Rather than attempt to answer the difficult constitutional question presented here, the Court will instead proceed directly to the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The initial question, therefore, is whether the ‘legal contours’ of the constitutional right in question were ‘sufficiently clear’ that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated that right. In this context, the answer to that question is relatively easy: the legal contours of the asserted right—that is, the constitutional right to carry firearms outside the home for self-defense—were entirely unclear in 2010, and are hardly more defined today. . . . [N]either the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit has, even today, directly addressed the scope of the right to bear arms outside the home for purposes of self-defense. . . . In short, Heller and McDonald left open the issue of the application of the Second Amendment to the regulation of firearms outside the home. There is no controlling First Circuit precedent, nor even a general consensus among federal courts as to even the most basic points—such as whether the protections of the Second Amendment extend outside the home, or what standard the courts should apply in assessing government regulation of firearms outside the home. . . . Considering this area of law is still very much unsettled, it is hard to see how Chief Gemme would have been unreasonable in believing that denying plaintiff an unrestricted license to carry was constitutional. The license he issued plaintiff permitted him to keep a firearm for self-defense in the home and to take it outside the home for the purposes of sport and targetshooting. While this restriction may have been arbitrary considering plaintiff's application made no mention of sport and target-shooting, an objectively reasonable police officer could have believed it to be constitutional. Accordingly, the Court finds that Chief Gemme is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Inman v. Siciliano, No. 10–10202–FDS, 2012 WL 1980408, at *7 (D. Mass. May 31, 2012) (“The First Circuit has abandoned its former three-part qualified-immunity analysis and adopted the two-part test articulated by the Supreme Court in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223 (2009). See Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 269 (1st Cir.2009). Under Pearson and Maldonado, the relevant inquiries are (1) whether the facts alleged or shown by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional right, and (2) whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct. . . For purposes of the second step of that analysis, whether the right in question was ‘clearly established’ depends on”(a) whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right, and (b) whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right.”)

Coughlin v. Town of Arlington, No. 10–10203–MLW, 2011 WL 6370932, at *13 (D. Mass. Dec. 19, 2011) (“Whether the Fourteenth Amendment includes a right against the disclosure of private information is an unsettled and hotly contested question of law. See Nat’l Aeronautics & Space Admin. v. Nelson, —U.S. —, —, —, 131 S.Ct. 746, 764–65, 178 L.Ed.2d 667 (2011) (Scalia, J., concurring). The Supreme Court has never decided the question despite several opportunities to do so. . . The First Circuit has held that the right, if it exists at all, is not clearly established. See Borucki v. Ryan, 827 F.2d 836, 844–45 (1st Cir.1987). Although Borucki examined the state of the law as it existed in 1983, the question remains unsettled in the First Circuit. . . Absent a violation of a clearly established constitutional right, qualified immunity shields public officials performing discretionary functions from liability for civil damages. . . A right is ‘clearly established’ if, at the time of the alleged violation, ‘the contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . Here, the alleged Fourteenth Amendment right to privacy claimed by plaintiffs was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. . . See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (courts may dismiss claims on qualified immunity grounds without addressing the merits of the claims provided that the claimed right was not clearly established).”)

Mucci v. Town of North Providence ex rel. Vallee, No. CA 09-286 S, 2011 WL 4552541, at *4, *5 (D.R.I. Oct. 3, 2011) (“The Court need not decide whether the instant case raises a genuine issue of material fact with regard to whether the use of a Taser constituted excessive force, because it is clear that Defendants are immune from suit. That is, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mucci, a reasonable officer in Officer Tesseris’s shoes could have concluded that he was not violating Mucci’s constitutional rights in deploying the Taser. Officer Tesseris employed non-deadly force . . . in ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving’ circumstances to subdue Mucci in an attempt to secure the safety of all parties and to avoid the need for deadly force. . . Applying the Graham factors, it is plain that the safety of Mucci and the officers was paramount. While Mucci arguably was not committing a crime or resisting arrest when the officer deployed the Taser, Mucci does not challenge his initial seizure in accordance with the officers' community caretaking function. The officers knew Mucci was emotionally disturbed and a threat to himself; was wielding a deadly weapon; and was not responding to the officers' directives. The situation had the potential to escalate quickly and a reasonable officer could have believed he needed to gain control of the situation and seize Mucci before Mucci hurt himself or one of the officers. The officers' options were limited in that moment, and the Court cannot conclude that a reasonable officer, after ordering Mucci three times to put down the knife, would have known he was violating Mucci's constitutional rights by deploying the Taser. Therefore, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the claims of excessive force, assault, and battery.") Tyree v. Weld, Civ. Nos. 93cv12260-NG, 93cv12725-NG, 2010 WL 145882, at *11, *14, *15 (D. Mass. Jan. 11, 2010) ("Clearly, a court's threshold inquiry into whether a constitutional violation has occurred serves the salutary purpose of clarifying and elaborating on existing law. . . . And this is particularly the case in connection with prison condition litigation. Accordingly, the Court will first consider whether defendants violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights before determining whether they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law they are accused of violating was not 'clearly established.' . . . [P]laintiffs were assigned to Phase III or the STG Blocks and left there, with no notice or opportunity to be heard. . . and without any means of contesting their assignment for a substantial period of time afterwards. . . . Although the government certainly has an interest in avoiding the imposition of new, costly, and complicated procedural requirements, especially in the context of a state prison, the defendants' decision to assign the plaintiffs to Phase III or the East Wing was 'entirely subjective and discretionary.' . . . It is not just that the defendants did not afford the plaintiffs due process. They provided them with no meaningful process at all. . . . Weighing the factors discussed in the preceding section, the Court concludes that, when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the defendants have failed the Mathews balancing test and thus have violated the plaintiffs' rights under the Due Process Clause. . . . After reviewing the applicable law, this Court is obliged to grant the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity. . . . Before the Supreme Court's June 19, 1995, decision in Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472, the question of whether the plaintiffs had a liberty interest in avoiding placement in Phase III was governed by the test articulated in Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. at 471-72, which counseled courts to analyze the language of state statutes and regulations to determine whether the state had created a liberty interest in avoiding restrictive prison conditions. If it was not clear that the DSU regulations applied to prisoners placed in Phase III, it was similarly unclear whether Massachusetts had created a federal liberty interest in avoiding such a placement. The Court's decision in Sandin did little, if anything, to make clear the unconstitutionality of the defendants' conduct. Sandin's holding that a state may create a liberty interest in avoiding an 'atypical and significant hardship ... in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life' was stated at a high level of generality with little elaboration that would aid in its application to particular cases. . . . Indeed, courts have since struggled to define the baseline against which a hardship's atypicality and significance should be judged. . . . One good result of the litigation in connection with the conditions in Phase III and the East Wing has been that the obligations of the state going forward have been clarified. But since the defendants' obligation to afford the plaintiffs greater procedural protections was not clear at the time that the defendants acted, they are entitled to qualified immunity.”).

Marchand v. Town of Hamilton, No. 09-10433-LTS, 2009 WL 3246607, at *7 (D. Mass. Oct. 5, 2009) (“On the pending motion, the question is whether disclosing Marchand’s medication or the fact of his receiving psychiatric treatment (implicit in the medication disclosure) was clearly established as a violation of his constitutional right to privacy. The First Circuit left this question open in Borucki stating that the law was not ‘clearly established’ that a constitutional privacy right would be violated by a disclosure of information (as distinct from an area of life protected by the autonomy branch of the right to privacy). . . Since Borucki, the law (both within and outside of this circuit) has developed further; this issue was carefully canvassed and analyzed in Doe v. Magnusson, 2005 WL 758454 (D.Me.2005). The more recent developments discussed therein persuade me that Marchand has a constitutional right to privacy in the non-disclosure of confidential mental health information allegedly disclosed for no legitimate public purpose. . . However, that right was not, at the relevant time, clearly established. Neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit case has recognized clearly the right. The law in other circuits is divided. See Doe v. Magnusson, 2005 WL 758454 (D.Me.2005). Both the Second Circuit in Powell v. Shriver, 175 F.3d 107, 113-14 (2nd Cir.1999) and the Third Circuit in Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 319 (3rd Cir.2001) have concluded that the right to privacy protecting non-disclosure of medical information was not clearly established. Accordingly, the constitutional right to privacy under the Fourteenth Amendment was not clearly established at any time relevant to the Complaint, and Brewer is entitled to qualified immunity from suit.”).

Plummer v. Town of Somerset, 601 F.Supp.2d 358, 365 n.16 (D. Mass. 2009) (“The instant case well illustrates the wisdom of the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), to dispense with the rigid order of battle mandated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), that required a court to first explore the issue of whether an official’s conduct violated a constitutional right before asking whether the right, if it might exist, was ‘clearly established.’ In so doing the Court meant to vindicate two important interests, the interest of the judicial system in avoiding the squandering of scarce judicial resources on largely meaningless inquiries, and the interest of a defendant in resolving an insubstantial claim prior to shouldering the burden of discovery. As Justice Alito concluded for a unanimous Court: ‘[T]here will be cases in which a court will rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law before turning to the more difficult question whether the relevant facts make out a constitutional violation at all.’. . This is such a case. Had Pearson been decided at the inception of this case, Plummer’s substantive due process claims would have been ripe for termination on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.”)

Bangs v. Smith, 84 F.4th 87, 91, 96-97, 100-02 (2d Cir. 2023) (“Though we recognize that Bangs had a protected liberty interest in his expected release date once it was granted by the Parole Board, we nevertheless conclude that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because Bangs’s rights were not clearly established at the time of the prison officials’ conduct. In particular, we hold that, although our prior decision in Victory v. Pataki recognized the due process rights of parole grantees in New York’s state prisons, . . . legal uncertainties introduced by the revocation of Bangs’s merit time allowance—an issue this Court has not previously addressed—render qualified immunity appropriate under the circumstances of this case. . . . [W]e now have the option of ‘proceed[ing] directly to step two of the analysis, and, [when we] find that qualified immunity applies, avoid[ing] the unnecessary litigation of constitutional issues at step one.’ . . . Nevertheless, in circumstances that may occur repeatedly but are likely to never ‘arise in a case in which qualified immunity is unavailable,’ we may choose to address the merits and thus bring clarity to the law. . . . Bangs suggests that this is such a case, noting that, because merit time allowances ‘are only available against sentences for non-violent felonies, which carry relatively shorter sentences, an individual whose previously granted merit parole release date is rescinded will typically be released from custody before a claim for injunctive relief could be litigated to judgment in federal court.’ . . . Though we are cognizant of this concern, finding qualified immunity applies, we ultimately do not fully resolve the merits of Bangs’s claim. Specifically, though we recognize that Bangs had a liberty interest in his early release once he was granted an open release date by the Parole Board, we decline to specify what protections are constitutionally due. As we discuss in the following section, there are open questions of New York law regarding what procedural protections Bangs should have been provided before his early release date was rescinded. Because the resolution of these questions may render unnecessary any articulation of a constitutionally required minimum, we reserve the issue for another day. . . . Bangs alleges that Defendants violated his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by rescinding his early parole date without a hearing. The Due Process Clause prohibits the states from ‘depriv[ing] any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.’ . . . We ‘examine procedural due process questions in two steps: the first asks whether there exists a liberty or property interest which has been interfered with by the State; the second examines whether the procedures attendant upon that deprivation were constitutionally sufficient.’ . . . Qualified immunity may operate at either of these steps to bar relief—that is, a plaintiff’s damages claim will be dismissed if either his possession of a constitutionally protected interest or his entitlement to greater procedural protections were not ‘clearly established . . . at the time when the [defendants] engaged in the course of conduct at issue.’ . . . We begin with the first step—identifying whether Bangs has plausibly alleged a liberty interest that Defendants have infringed. ‘A liberty interest may arise from the Constitution itself, by reason of guarantees implicit in the word “liberty,” or it may arise from an expectation or interest created by state laws or policies.’ . . . The Supreme Court has made clear that ‘[t]here is no right under the Federal Constitution to be conditionally released before the expiration of a valid sentence, and the States are under no duty to offer parole to their prisoners.’ . . . Accordingly, any ‘liberty interest in parole,’ to the extent one exists, falls into the second category. . . . Although both Green and Victory involved substantive restrictions on the relevant parole authority’s discretion that are facially less limiting than those governing the DOCCS

Commissioner's revocation decision, the parole rescission regulations in those cases required something the revocation regulations at issue here do not—a formal evidentiary hearing. In particular, in Victory, we emphasized that 'New York regulations provide robust procedural protections "[a]fter an inmate has received a parole release date"' and require that a 'majority of the members of the [Parole Board] ... are ... satisfied that substantial evidence exists to form a basis for rescinding the grant of release.' . . And, while Green itself did not discuss the procedural protections afforded in a rescission hearing for federal parole grantees, our opinion in Drayton emphasized the 'detailed procedural scheme' with which the Parole Commission was required to comply. . . The significance of these procedural safeguards should not be overstated. It is the 'substantive limits on the authority of state officials,' not the 'procedural requirements,' that 'ground[]' a liberty interest. . . That said, state law mandating 'procedure may [in certain circumstances] provide significant reasons to infer an articulable [liberty] right meant to be protected.' . . Consistent with that caveat, in both Victory and Drayton, we suggested that we viewed the respective state and federal regulations' formal hearing requirements as indicative of 'the objective nature of the findings that must be made before' parole could be rescinded. . . The regulatory scheme at issue here lacks this particular indicium of objectivity as it does not provide for any pre-deprivation process for challenging the revocation of a merit time allowance. And while we believe it clear on their face that the revocation regulations require the DOCCS Commissioner to make an 'essentially fact-bound' determination, rather than a 'subjective appraisal[]', . . to conclude otherwise—particularly in light of the broad discretion over merit time allowances with which the statutory regime as a whole endows the DOCCS Commissioner—falls within the scope of the 'breathing room' qualified immunity 'gives government officials ... to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions[.]'. . Given that qualified immunity 'protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,' . . it follows that Defendants are entitled to its protection here. For similar reasons, we do not agree with Bangs's argument that his liberty interest in maintaining his merit time allowance as a parole grantee was clearly established by the Supreme Court's decision in Wolff v. McDonnell, which recognized a protected liberty interest in an inmate's 'good time' credits. . . Under the statutory scheme at issue in that case, prisoners received sentence reduction credits for good behavior that, once issued, 'were revocable only if the prisoner was guilty of serious misconduct.' . . In contrast, the regulatory scheme at issue here allows revocation in a broader set of circumstance—including whenever an inmate 'fails to continue to perform and pursue his or her assigned program plan or earned eligibility plan,' 7 N.Y.C.R.R. § 280.4(b)(4)—thus providing greater discretion to the relevant authority. Qualified immunity is often appropriate when we are asked to extend decisions that 'have not set forth clearly-defined standards' and instead have inaugurated doctrinal lineages in which 'the cases have proceeded on a case-by-case basis.' . . Because Wolff does not provide clear guidance for when a less restrictive set of revocation conditions may give rise to a protected liberty interest, even setting aside any other potentially relevant differences between the legal regime at issue in that case and the regime here, we cannot conclude that the Supreme Court's decision in Wolff clearly established Bangs's right to due process. Having concluded that Bangs's liberty interest in his early release date was not so clearly established at the time so as to overcome qualified immunity, we need not go on to discuss what procedural protections were constitutionally due. . . Nonetheless, we note that—depending on how the New York courts resolve the present uncertainty regarding whether maintaining a merit time allowance remains a predicate to parole release once a release date is granted—the answer to the question of ‘how much process is due’ may be ‘no more than state law already provides.’ As we have discussed, New York law may be read to permit the Parole Board to rescind an early release date only when doing so is found to be appropriate following an evidentiary hearing, regardless of whether a previously awarded merit time allowance has been subsequently revoked. . . Had Defendants adopted that view in Bangs’s case, he would have benefited from the ‘robust procedural protections’ New York law provides to parole grantees, satisfying due process. . . Accordingly, because the subsequent development of the law in this area may render anything we say now as unnecessary ‘constitutional dicta,’ . . . we decline to opine further on the issue at this time.”)

Martinez for the Estate of Ortiz v. Hasper, No. 21-2975, 2023 WL 4417355, at *2 (2d Cir. July 10, 2023) (not published) (“Here, we resolve the case on the clearly-established prong. With respect to this requirement, the ‘contours of the right must be sufficiently clear [such] that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . While a prior case need not be ‘directly on point, ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . In determining whether a right is clearly established at the time of the conduct in question, we consider Supreme Court decisions and our own decisions, as well as ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . Guided by these standards, we agree with the district court that, in July 2014, it was not clearly established that shooting a fleeing motorist endeavoring to evade capture during a car chase that endangered officers and pedestrians nearby amounted to excessive force. Indeed, prior to the shooting, the Supreme Court had never ‘found the use of deadly force in connection with a dangerous car chase to violate the Fourth Amendment, let alone to be a basis for denying qualified immunity.’ . . The prevailing law in this Circuit likewise would not have alerted Hasper that his conduct was unlawful. In arguing otherwise, Ortiz relies principally on Cowan ex rel. Cooper v. Breen, which denied qualified immunity to an officer who shot twice – once from forty-four feet, once from eleven feet – at a vehicle that was ‘traveling quite slowly ... and may not even have been moving at all.’ . . But Cowan says nothing about whether, by shooting Ortiz, who had just hit two cars and was driving erratically within feet of police officers and pedestrians, Officer Hasper used excessive force.”)

Dabah v. Franklin, No. 22-845-CV, 2023 WL 3577872, at *___ (2d Cir. May 22, 2023) (not reported) (“The district court held that, as a non-custodial parent, Dabah was not entitled to any type of pre-termination hearing. We need not (and do not) address that issue because we hold that, even assuming arguendo that such a right exists, the pre-termination claim against the individual defendants is defeated by qualified immunity. . . . Dabah points to no case authority clearly establishing the right of non-custodial parents to such a pre-termination hearing. Instead, Dabah relies on decisions addressing custodial parents’ procedural due process rights. However, as we have previously held, ‘[t]here is no authority for the proposition that ... a non-custodial parent ha[s] a clearly established right to a pre-termination hearing before suspension of whatever visitation rights she might have retained.’ Young v. County of Fulton, 160 F.3d 899, 903 (2d Cir. 1998). Dabah identifies no decision since Young by the Supreme Court, this Court, or by a consensus of other courts, that has clearly established that right. Accordingly, qualified immunity shields the individual defendants from Dabah’s pre-termination procedural due process claim.”)

Matzell v. Annucci, 64 F.4th 425, 434-36 (2d Cir. 2023) (“We conclude that Matzell’s Eighth Amendment claim fails at the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: it was not clearly established at the time of Defendants’ conduct that denying a prisoner the opportunity to obtain early release from his sentence of confinement by denying judicially ordered entry into the Shock program would violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . We need not address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, for even assuming Matzell plausibly alleged a violation of his Eighth Amendment right, our decision in Hurd compels the conclusion that the law was not clearly established at the time Defendants denied Matzell an opportunity to obtain early release through participation in Shock. . . . Hurd, which involved conduct that took place in 2016 and 2017 . . . was decided on January 20, 2021. Accordingly, at the time of the conduct in this case, that is 2017 and 2018, there was no precedent establishing that Defendants’ conduct violated the Eighth Amendment. Hence, we conclude that when Defendants denied Matzell’s judicially ordered entry into Shock, it was not clearly established that denying an inmate such an opportunity for early conditional release would violate the Eighth Amendment. Thus, we reverse the district court’s denial of Defendants’ motion for judgment on the pleadings as to the Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Matzell v. Annucci, 64 F.4th 425, 436-441 (2d Cir. 2023) (“We conclude that Matzell has plausibly alleged that Defendants violated a clearly established Fourteenth Amendment right. . . . We consider both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis: first, whether Matzell plausibly alleged a violation of his Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right, and second, if so, whether that right was clearly established. . . . Matzell has alleged that he was sentenced to enrollment in Shock, and that Defendants illegally denied his enrollment despite the provisions of New York statutory law that explicitly deprived them of their authority to deny admission to one sentenced to Shock in these circumstances. Defendants’ decision to disqualify Matzell from enrolling in Shock diverged from the sentencing court’s order and implicated his liberty interest in having his sentence implemented in a manner consistent with law and the sentencing court’s order. . . . Therefore, Matzell has plausibly alleged the violation of a due process right. The second step in the analysis is to determine whether Defendants’ conduct shocks the conscience. . . . Even though the law was clear and Matzell’s counsel sent multiple letters alerting DOCCS to the statute that mandated his admission to the program, Defendants refused to enroll Matzell in Shock. As a result, Matzell was deprived of the opportunity to secure his release 506 days earlier than his actual release. His four-year custodial sentence was increased by almost a third. Hence, Matzell plausibly alleged that Defendants’ actions rose to the level of deliberate indifference in violation of his substantive due process rights. . . . Given the liberty interest at stake and the clarity of the statutory law, we hold that Matzell plausibly alleged that Defendants’ actions were egregious, shocking to the conscience, and unreasonable and, thus, we conclude that Matzell plausibly alleged that Defendants violated his Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. . . . We next consider whether Matzell’s right to have his sentence implemented in accordance with the sentencing court’s order was clearly established at the time of Defendants’ conduct. We consider both the DLRA’s plain statutory language and the precedent established by Hill v. United States ex rel. Wampler, 298 U.S. 460, 56 S.Ct. 760, 80 L.Ed. 1283 (1936), Earley v. Murray, 451 F.3d 71 (2d Cir. 2006), and Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157 (2d Cir. 2013). . . . Second Circuit precedent clearly established that DOCCS’s alteration of the court’s sentence was unconstitutional. . . . Based on this precedent, it was clearly established at the time of Defendants’ conduct that they did not have the power to alter Matzell’s sentence. Yet that is what they did by denying Matzell the opportunity to obtain early conditional release in direct contradiction to the sentencing judge’s order to enroll Matzell in Shock. Even though Wampler, Earley, and Vincent did not specifically involve excluding an incarcerated individual from Shock, Supreme Court case law does not ‘require a case directly on point,’ . . . and the Court has explained that ‘a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question,’ even if the specific conduct has not already been held unlawful. . . . Furthermore, the existing cases ‘defined the contours of the right with reasonable specificity’ by showing that a sentence must be implemented consistent with a sentencing court’s orders even when the change to the order is made pursuant to state law. . . . Matzell has plausibly alleged that his substantive due process right to have his sentence implemented consistent with the sentencing court’s order was clearly established and that this right was violated when Defendants essentially extended his sentencing by refusing to enroll him in Shock when he was eligible. Thus, we affirm the district court’s denial of Defendants’ motion for judgment on the pleadings as to the Fourteenth Amendment claim.”)

Radwan v. Manuel, 55 F.4th 101, 113-14, 120-29 & n.14 (2d Cir. 2022) (“The Supreme Court has emphasized that lower courts are ‘permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . . Here, on the First Amendment claim, we proceed directly to step two and hold that qualified immunity applies and, thus, avoid the ‘[u]nnecessary litigation of constitutional issues’ at step one. . . . As a threshold matter, we must identify the right alleged to have been violated. We have stated that ‘[c]haracterizing the right too narrowly to the facts of the case might permit government actors to escape personal liability, while doing so too broadly risks permitting unwarranted imposition of monetary liability.’ . . . We identify the right at issue here to be the right of a student-athlete at a university, while in public and on the playing field, to make a vulgar or offensive comment or gesture without suffering disciplinary consequences. . . . Given the ambiguity in the Supreme Court’s jurisprudence, we have generally noted that ‘[t]he law governing restrictions on student speech can be difficult and confusing, even for lawyers, law professors, and judges’ and ‘[t]he relevant Supreme Court cases can be hard to reconcile, and courts often struggle to determine which standard applies in any particular case.’ . . . As a result, courts have not hesitated to grant qualified immunity to university officials who attempt to regulate speech at the university level in the uncertain waters of Hazelwood, Fraser, and other Supreme Court precedent. [collecting cases] We reach the same conclusion here. In light of the absence of a decision by the Supreme Court or this Court on the application of the First Amendment to vulgar speech (or expression) by a university student while representing the university at a school-sponsored event, as well as the lack of any consensus among other courts on this issue, we conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As the Supreme Court has emphasized, to find liability for a constitutional violation ‘[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . Here, it would not be unreasonable for a university official to conclude that Hazelwood and other Supreme Court precedent allows that official to sanction a student for vulgar or obscene speech while the student is wearing the university’s uniform at a school-sanctioned sporting event. In other words, existing precedent has certainly not placed this particular constitutional question ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Accordingly, we conclude that the Individual Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds with respect to the First Amendment claim. . . . [W]e conclude that because Radwan’s scholarship was guaranteed for a fixed term and terminable only for cause, it was a property interest protected by the Constitution. However, because this rule was not clearly established at the time Radwan’s scholarship was terminated, we conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim as well. . . . We recognize that there are often sound reasons, including standard principles of constitutional avoidance, to forgo analysis of the constitutional question if qualified immunity applies because any such constitutional right was not clearly established, as we did with respect to Radwan’s First Amendment claim. . . . However, the Supreme Court also has emphasized that ‘it remains true that following the two-step sequence—defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity—is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.’ . . . Notwithstanding the existence of qualified immunity at step two, we conclude that the unsettled nature of the ‘property interest’ issue in the due process claim presents precisely such a situation. Failing to rule on this threshold constitutional question ‘may frustrate “the development of constitutional precedent” and the promotion of law-abiding behavior.’ . . . Moreover, our ruling on the ‘property interest’ issue involves a straight-forward analysis that does not waste scarce judicial resources and undoubtedly will provide useful guidance to public officials in connection with future terminations of fixed-term athletic scholarships.¹⁴ [fn. 14: The policies weighing in favor of considering the merits of the “‘property interest’ issue were absent from Radwan’s First Amendment claim or the adequacy of the particular procedures utilized by UConn in connection with Radwan’s due process claim. Both of those issues would require an expenditure of substantial judicial resources to address and, in contrast to the ‘property interest’ question, are extremely fact-specific determinations that would be of limited value to public officials and future litigants in First Amendment or procedural due process cases involving universities.] Therefore, we address the merits of the ‘property interest’ issue before proceeding to explain why summary judgment is warranted on qualified immunity grounds because the existence of this property interest’ in the context of a fixed-term athletic scholarship was not clearly established at the time of the scholarship revocation in this case. . . . [W]e hold that Radwan’s one-year athletic scholarship—because it was for a fixed period and terminable only for cause, and because Radwan reasonably expected to retain the scholarship’s benefits for that set period—created a contractual right that rose to the level of a constitutionally protected property interest. . . . In sum, we hold that Radwan possessed a constitutionally protected property interest in her fixed-term athletic scholarship that could be terminated only for cause. We emphasize that we do not address whether the prospective renewal of an athletic scholarship would rise to the level of a protected property interest. In light of this constitutionally protected property interest, Radwan asserts that UConn violated her due process rights by providing her with no pre-deprivation notice, hearing, or opportunity to be heard, and by failing to provide a neutral decisionmaker. However, we need not address that issue. Even assuming arguendo that Radwan did not receive the process she was due, we nevertheless conclude that the district court properly granted summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. We do so because no precedent in this Circuit or in the Supreme Court has conclusively established that student-athletes have a constitutionally protected property interest in athletic scholarships. . . . Due process claims are a ‘particularly fertile ground for qualified immunity, given that state officials can be liable only for violations of rights that have been established beyond debate and with particularity by existing constitutional precedents.’ . . . ‘[I]t will be a rare case in which prior precedents have definitively resolved a novel claim of procedural due process.’ . . . Radwan has presented such a novel claim; this Court has never held that an athletic scholarship creates a constitutionally protected right. Therefore, even though we now hold that a fixed-term athletic scholarship terminable only for cause gives rise to a constitutionally protected property right, qualified immunity protects the Individual Defendants here from liability. . . . That does not end our inquiry, however, as even without any controlling authority, a ‘robust consensus’ could have sufficed to have clearly established such a property right. . . . But no such consensus exists. . . . In sum, at the time of the termination of Radwan’s scholarship, no clear rule had been enunciated that could have alerted the Individual Defendants that Radwan had a constitutionally protected property right established beyond debate. Thus, as it was not clearly established that an athletic scholarship creates a constitutionally protected interest, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and we accordingly affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment as to Radwan’s due process claim.”) McKinney v. City of Middletown, 49 F.4th 730, 739, 741-42 (2d Cir. 2022) (“The undisputed facts of this case establish that McKinney threatened, attacked, and resisted the defendant officers as they tried to subdue him so that he could be transferred to a different cell. The undisputed facts further establish that the officers’ incremental and combined uses of a baton, a canine, and a taser were undertaken in response to McKinney’s resistance and that once McKinney ‘finally gave up fighting’ and was ‘handcuffed and secured,’ the officers withdrew their force. . . . McKinney has not identified either a ‘controlling authority ... [or] a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority ... clearly establishing the constitutional violation’ he alleges, . . . foreclosing the conclusion that the defendant officers ‘violate[d] clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known[.]’ . . . We conclude that under ‘the particular facts of [this] case ... reasonable officers [could] disagree about the legality of the defendants’ conduct,’ making ‘summary judgment for the officers ... appropriate.’ . . . We affirm the judgment of the district court. . . . ‘[C]onstru[ing] the facts in the light most favorable to [McKinney] and ... resolv[ing] all ambiguities and draw[ing] all reasonable inferences against [the defendants],’ as we must on review of the district court’s grant of summary judgment to the defendants, . . . we conclude that a reasonable jury could find that Hunter continued to bite McKinney after McKinney stopped actively resisting the officers. While the defendants assert that McKinney ‘remained combative and physically resisted the defendants’ efforts to secure him throughout the encounter,’ . . . a reasonable jury could find otherwise because McKinney ‘gave up fighting’ and ‘yelled for the defendants to get the canine off of him’ before McKinney was placed in handcuffs and Officer D’Aresta removed Hunter from his leg[.] . . . We nevertheless hold that the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity because McKinney has not shown that police officers violate clearly established law by allowing a canine bite to continue until a previously violent suspect can be secured. McKinney argues that ‘by the time of the confrontation here ... manifold cases had held that allowing a dog to continue biting a suspect after he had been subdued violates the Fourth Amendment,’ . . . but the cases McKinney cites do not involve suspects who had just engaged the police in a violent struggle or are otherwise inapposite. . . . McKinney also attempts to support his claim with the general proposition that the police may not use significant force to overcome a suspect’s passive—as opposed to active—resistance. . . . McKinney argues that the defendant officers violated clearly established law by failing to restrain Hunter once he stopped fighting with the officers. But while the police may violate clearly established law by initiating significant force against a suspect who is only passively resisting, . . . McKinney has not shown that it is a violation of clearly established law for the police to ensure that a violent suspect has been secured before withdrawing the significant force required to subdue the suspect. In light of the possibility that McKinney would resume his active resistance once force was withdrawn, we cannot say that it was ‘objectively unreasonable for the officers to believe that their conduct was lawful’ under the circumstances.”)

McKinney v. City of Middletown, 49 F.4th 730, 749-51, 755 (2d Cir. 2022) (Calabresi, J., dissenting) (“The police arrested a mentally disturbed man who, without his medications, started to behave erratically. Three police officers and a police dog entered his cell, and they may, as the police maintain, have meant to help him. But, in fact, they ended up doing things that a unanimous panel of this court said a jury could find violated this man’s constitutional rights. As a result, the man was mangled—truly badly hurt, as the majority must admit. Given that the officers may well have had good intentions, it is not entirely surprising that the majority should stretch to grant them qualified immunity. But if one views the evidence in the light most favorable to the injured man, as we must at this stage, and if one looks at the situation in light of our precedents as well as the holding by our earlier panel, qualified immunity—which should not apply in any case, see infra—certainly does not apply in this one. And so, I respectfully dissent. . . . I can’t help but notice that the majority at times seems to doubt that the use of force it describes was really unreasonable. . . . And I have my doubts whether the majority would, if it were writing on a blank slate, say there was any constitutional violation on the facts it describes. . . . But the majority can’t ignore the prior panel’s holding. . . . And so, it would seem, from now on in our circuit, that the use of force described by the majority—a calibrated escalation in response to resistance, in the close confines of a holding cell—is unconstitutionally excessive. That would be a remarkable holding—and might well, for purposes of qualified immunity, be a new and unexpected one. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. McKinney and mindful, as we must be, of the prior panel’s holding as to what a jury could find, there are at least two separate clearly established constitutional violations that preclude summary judgment. First, before Mr. McKinney was brought to the ground, the officers' use of the dog on a suspect who was not a threat to others was excessive force. And second, the combined use of force once Mr. McKinney was on the ground was likewise excessive. As to each, the law was clearly established. . . . In the case before us, it is not for us to determine whether a jury could find the officers' conduct unreasonable. The previous panel decided it could. And it is perfectly clear that at least two instances of unreasonable force that a jury could, on this record, find had been used would violate clearly established law. If the officers had the dog bite Mr. McKinney before or just as Officer Sebold was pushing him back and striking him, when Mr. McKinney was at most engaged in passive or defensive resistance, that use of significant force would violate clearly established law. If, once he was on the ground, Mr. McKinney was not actively resisting when the officers, having tased him, continued to beat him and have the dog chew on his leg, the officers would not be entitled to qualified immunity for that use of significant force. Of course, if this case came before a jury, that jury might find that it wasn't 'objectively unreasonable' for the officers to act as they did. . . . That would certainly not be an impossible finding. But on this record, at summary judgment, and given the law of this case, we cannot say that now. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Sabir v. Williams, 52 F.4th 51, 58 n.3 (2d Cir. 2022) (amending and superseding opinion at 37 F.4th 810 (2d Cir. 2022)) ("Before Pearson, courts were required to complete both steps in every case, because 'skip[ping] ahead' to the second step without first holding that an official violated a plaintiff's rights might preclude 'the law's elaboration from case to case.' . . . The Supreme Court has continued to recognize this well-founded concern, even after Pearson introduced discretion as to the order in which courts may address the prongs. . . . Camreta warned of a 'repetitive cycle' in which a court repeatedly declines to address the merits because immunity exists, and the official continues to engage in the challenged practice because he will remain immune until the right is clearly established. . . . This cycle could happen 'again, and again, and again,' . . . thereby allowing 'palpably unreasonable conduct [to] go unpunished[.]'. . . . Although this 'repetitive cycle of qualified immunity defenses' could be broken if the same merits questions 'arise in a case in which qualified immunity is unavailable,' the Court has warned that 'some kinds of constitutional questions do not often come up in these alternative settings.' . . . Claims brought by incarcerated individuals against officials at a specific institution likely fall into that category. As evidenced by the case at bar, a prisoner's equitable claims could be mooted at any moment by his transfer to a new facility. . . . Thus, these circumstances present a higher likelihood that prisoners' rights do not become clearly established. Even if it were not clearly established that the wardens violated RFRA, we would therefore still address the merits question first to clearly establish the law and prevent a vicious cycle of shielded misconduct.")

Guan v. City of New York, 37 F.4th 797, 807-10 (2d Cir. 2022) ("We hold that the existence of probable cause to arrest an individual for a criminal violation does not preclude a false arrest claim based on a wrongful arrest for a mental health evaluation. Hence, we conclude that the district court erred in holding that probable cause for a trespass arrest obviated the need for probable cause for a mental health arrest. . . . Accordingly, we hold that the district court erred in construing Devenpeck and Jaegly to bar a mental health false arrest claim based on the mere existence of probable cause to arrest for criminal trespass. Even though probable cause existed to arrest Guan for trespass, the police officers had to have reason to believe that she was a danger to herself or others to arrest her for an emergency mental health evaluation. . . The district court did not decide whether the officers had actual probable cause for a mental health arrest. Likewise, we do not reach the issue, for we conclude that the officers are protected by qualified immunity. . . . Even assuming the officers did not have actual probable cause to make a mental health arrest, they would still be protected from liability if, at the time of the arrest, it was not ‘clearly established’ that their conduct would violate Guan’s rights or if they had arguable probable cause for a mental health arrest. We conclude that the officers here are protected by qualified immunity in both respects. . . It certainly was clearly established, at the time of Guan’s arrest, that an officer had probable cause to arrest an individual for a mental health evaluation only if the officer had reason to believe there was a risk of serious physical harm to the individual or others. It was not clearly established, however, that where police officers had probable cause to arrest a person for a criminal offense, they had to make a separate probable cause determination to arrest the person for an emergency psychiatric evaluation. Devenpeck was decided in 2004 and Jaegly was decided in 2006. In the context of false arrest claims arising from criminal arrests, both cases stand for the proposition that probable cause to arrest for any one charge obviated the need for probable cause to arrest for the actual charge invoked. Guan was arrested in 2017, and no case had made clear by then that police officers could not arrest an individual for a mental health arrest when probable cause existed for a criminal arrest, without an additional finding of dangerousness. Indeed, to the contrary, some district courts had held that the existence of probable cause for a criminal arrest rendered a mental health arrest privileged for purposes of a false arrest or imprisonment claim, relying on Jaegly. . . While we decided Myers, which reiterated the dangerousness requirement for a mental health arrest, in 2016, after Devenpeck and Jaegly, Myers did not address the situation now at hand: a mental health arrest where probable cause existed for an arrest for a criminal offense. Accordingly, we hold that Boyle and Larasaavedra are protected by qualified immunity because it was not clearly established when they arrested Guan in 2017 that they had to have probable cause to arrest her for an emergency psychiatric examination when they had probable cause to arrest her for criminal trespass. . . We also conclude, independent of the state of the law in 2017, that the two officers had at least arguable probable cause to take Guan into custody for an emergency mental health evaluation.”)

Hurd v. Fredenburgh, 984 F.3d 1075, 1084 n.3 (2d Cir. 2021) (“Our qualified immunity analysis ‘is guided by two questions: first, whether the facts show that the defendants’ conduct violated plaintiffs’ constitutional rights, and second, whether the right was clearly established at the time of the defendants’ actions.’ . . ‘We may address these questions in either order,’ and ‘[i]f we answer either question in the negative, qualified immunity attaches.’ . . Although it has become the virtual default practice of federal courts considering a qualified immunity defense to assume the constitutional violation in the first question and resolve a case on the clearly established prong, ‘it is often beneficial’ to analyze both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. . . ‘[T]he two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’ . . . This is such a case.”)

Bacon v. Phelps, 961 F.3d 533, 542-545 (2d Cir. 2020) (“The Supreme Court has recognized that courts should exercise their ‘sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis [to] address[] first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . . Our court has taken the position that ‘there remains a role for courts to rule on constitutional questions even in cases where qualified immunity ultimately determines the result.’ . . . There is value in making constitutional determinations, which ‘have a significant future effect on the conduct of public officials ... and the policies of the government units to which they belong,’ because such rulings ‘establish[] controlling law and prevent[] invocations of immunity in later cases.’ . . . Accordingly, and noting that the district court did the same, we elect to begin by considering whether prison officials violated Bacon’s constitutional rights. . . . Bacon argues that the letter he sent to his sister was an exercise of his right to speech under the First Amendment for which he suffered retaliation by being sent to the SHU. . . . We . . . hold that the district court erred by deeming Bacon’s statement in his letter to be the sort of ‘threatening or otherwise inappropriate language’ that ‘does not constitute protected ... speech.’ . . . Our holding does not undermine prison authorities’ ability to discipline prisoners pursuant to prison regulations that are ‘reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.’ . . . Where a prisoner makes a sexual proposal or threat in a letter in violation of Prohibited Act Code 206 or a similar regulation, he may properly be disciplined. . . . But the mild language at issue here, coupled especially with the fact that it was made in a letter to a member of Bacon’s family, rather than to a correctional official or another prisoner, simply does not meet this standard. Significantly, defendants concede that the cases they cite in support of their argument that Bacon’s statement constituted unprotected speech all involve speech that was communicated directly to the person the comments were about, and not to a third party outside the prison. . . . Although Bacon adequately alleged that prison officials violated his First Amendment rights, the officials nevertheless are entitled to qualified immunity if the rights were not ‘clearly established’ at the time. . . . In this case, the right at issue is not the general proposition that a prisoner has a First Amendment right to send mail and cannot be punished for its contents. . . . Instead, the issue is whether, at the time Bacon sent a letter to a third party expressing his desire for a woman later identified as a female correctional officer, precedent from the Supreme Court or this court put prison officials on notice that they could not punish him for his statements in that correspondence. It did not. The right therefore was not ‘clearly established’ and the defendants hence are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We hold that the First Amendment protects a prisoner’s right to express non-threatening sexual desire in communications with a third party outside the prison. Nonetheless, we conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Francis v. Fiacco, 942 F.3d 126, 140-41, 145-49 (2d Cir. 2019) (“This case implicates the ‘sound discretion’ that Pearson authorized. Because we ultimately resolve this appeal in favor of the State Defendants on qualified immunity grounds, we must also decide whether to reach the merits of Francis’s constitutional claims along the way. We recognize compelling arguments against doing so. As the Supreme Court noted in Pearson, addressing constitutional arguments where qualified immunity applies ‘sometimes results in a substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources on difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case.’. . Standard principles of constitutional avoidance also weigh against the practice. . . Moreover, we acknowledge the Court’s latest pronouncement on this issue: that ‘courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.’. . Nevertheless, there remains a role for courts to rule on constitutional questions even in cases where qualified immunity ultimately determines the result. As the Court explained in Camreta, such rulings ‘have a significant future effect on the conduct of public officials ... and the policies of the government units to which they belong ... by establishing controlling law and preventing invocations of immunity in later cases.’. . For instance, Camreta invoked the hypothetical scenario of a court repeatedly rejecting a novel constitutional claim on qualified immunity grounds, adhering to traditional principles of constitutional avoidance but potentially licensing a government official’s unconstitutional conduct in perpetuity. Courts taking that approach ‘fail to clarify uncertain questions, fail to address novel claims, fail to give guidance to officials about how to comply with legal requirements.’. . And an exclusive focus on qualified immunity in such contexts ‘may frustrate “the development of constitutional precedent” and the promotion of law-abiding behavior.’. . Under the circumstances of this case, we think the arguments weigh in favor of considering the merits of one of Francis’s constitutional claims, notwithstanding the ultimate qualified immunity bar. For the reasons explained below, while the law was not clearly established on this point, we conclude that the State Defendants failed to provide Francis with procedural protections that the Due Process Clause required. Were we to proceed directly to the qualified immunity question, and confine our entire analysis to that subject, the State Defendants could continue to withhold those procedural protections—and thus continue to violate the Constitution—ad infinitum. What’s more, the State Defendants have represented that in the absence of a constitutional holding, they will do exactly that. . . Therefore, having thought hard and then thought hard again, we now exercise our Pearson-conferred discretion in proceeding to resolve one of Francis’s constitutional claims, before ultimately concluding that the State Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from all of them. . . . The Supreme Court has lately emphasized the breadth of qualified immunity protection. . . . With that standard in hand, we now consider whether qualified immunity protects the State Defendants from Francis’s constitutional claims. [court discusses precedents] Sudler expressly declined to resolve the question whether Wampler and Earley ‘should apply not only with regard to a single sentence, but also in the context of a sentencing judge’s pronouncement as to the relationship between the sentence he is imposing and another sentence imposed in a separate proceeding.’. . Instead, the Court held that qualified immunity protected the State Defendants because the answer to that question had not been clearly established. . . No case since Sudler has provided further guidance on the extent of Wampler and Earley’s reach, so Defendants-Appellants should receive qualified immunity again here. As in Sudler, the facts ‘are sufficient to convince us that the asserted unlawfulness of the State Defendants’ conduct in calculating [the plaintiff’s] release date would not have been apparent to reasonable prison officials.’. . In short, in light of the distinctions we have identified above, along with the reasoning we applied in Sudler, we cannot say that ‘every reasonable official would interpret [Wampler and Earley] to establish’ the unconstitutionality of the State Defendants’ conduct in this case. . . We concluded above, without relying on Wampler and Earley, that the State Defendants violated the Due Process Clause pursuant to the traditional three-factor balancing test from Mathews v. Eldridge. See supra Part II. We held that the Due Process Clause required the State Defendants to notify the sentencing court, as well as the attorneys for both parties at sentencing, prior to implementing Francis’s sentence in a manner that deviated from the sentencing court’s original pronouncement. We now consider whether Mathews and its progeny had ‘clearly established’ those constitutional requirements at the time when the State Defendants engaged in the course of conduct at issue here. The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that ‘ “due process,” unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances.’. . . The traditional Mathews balancing test embodies that flexibility, requiring courts to weigh three highly fact-bound considerations with respect to any potential procedural innovation that the parties might propose. Given this flexible, context-dependent approach, it will be a rare case in which prior precedents have definitively resolved a novel claim of procedural due process. That makes particularly fertile ground for qualified immunity, given that state officials can be liable only for violations of rights that have been established ‘beyond debate’ and with ‘particular[ity]’ by existing constitutional precedents. . . With respect to this case in particular, precedent had not clearly established the due process requirements we identified above at the time of the State Defendants’ conduct. Indeed, no case of which we are aware has even hinted that the Constitution might require the specific procedural protections we have now prescribed. Once again, the most closely analogous precedent is Sudler, where we affirmed a grant of qualified immunity to prison officials faced with a similar claim. . . No case before or after Sudler has even considered whether prison officials implementing a state sentence violate the Constitution by failing to provide notice to the sentencing court and attorneys, let alone subjected such a claim to a Mathews analysis. Accordingly, though we identify a constitutional violation pursuant to such an analysis, we conclude that qualified immunity protects the State Defendants from damages liability under the circumstances of this particular case.”)

Cugini v. City of New York, 941 F.3d 604, 608, 611-17 (2d Cir. 2019) (“We conclude that the plaintiff has sufficiently established her constitutional claim for purposes of surviving a motion for summary judgment. A reasonable jury could find that Palazzola’s actions were objectively unreasonable in light of, inter alia, the minor nature of the plaintiff’s alleged crime, the circumstances of her arrest, and the fact that the plaintiff posed no apparent risk of flight or physical threat to the police or others. The defendant was also reasonably made aware of the plaintiff’s pain, both as a result of her signs of distress—her repeated audible, if not verbal, expressions of pain—and because the unreasonableness of the force used by the defendant was apparent under the circumstances. Nevertheless, because at the time of the defendant’s actions it was not clearly established law that a plaintiff who did not verbally complain or request to have her handcuffs adjusted or removed, or both, could nevertheless recover on a handcuffing-based excessive force claim, the defendant was entitled to qualified immunity. The district court therefore correctly granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment on that ground. . . . The plaintiff asserts that Palazzola violated her constitutional rights by using excessive force in handcuffing her while she was in custody. The district court declined to decide the plaintiff's constitutional claim, moving directly to its analysis of qualified immunity instead. Addressing that issue on review nonetheless, as we are permitted to do under Pearson, we conclude that the plaintiff has sufficiently established a constitutional claim for excessive force. . . . [W]e decided long ago that the objective reasonableness standard established in Graham applies to actions taken with respect to a person who asserts, as does the plaintiff here, a claim for excessive force after she has been arrested and detained, but 'prior to the time when [she] is arraigned or formally charged, and remains in the custody (sole or joint) of the arresting officer.' . . . [A] plaintiff asserting a claim for excessive force need not always establish that she alerted an officer to the fact that her handcuffs were too tight or causing pain. The question is more broadly whether an officer reasonably should have known during handcuffing that his use of force was excessive. A plaintiff satisfies this requirement if either the unreasonableness of the force used was apparent under the circumstances, or the plaintiff signaled her distress, verbally or otherwise, such that a reasonable officer would have been aware of her pain, or both. . . . We conclude that where an officer's use of force in handcuffing is plainly unreasonable under the circumstances or where a plaintiff manifests clear signs of her distress—verbally or otherwise—a fact finder may decide that the officer reasonably should have known that his use of force was excessive for purposes of establishing a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . We conclude, then, that a reasonable jury could find that the defendant's actions were objectively unreasonable under the circumstances and that Cugini has therefore established a Fourth Amendment violation for present purposes. . . . At the time of the plaintiff's arrest, the use of excessive force in handcuffing was prohibited by clearly established constitutional law. While we had yet to formally hold that a defendant may violate a plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights in a handcuffing-based excessive force claim, we had long rejected the principle that handcuffing is 'per se reasonable.' . . . And a consensus existed among our sister circuits that unduly tight handcuffing can constitute excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . That was enough to clearly establish in this Circuit that an officer's use of excessive force during handcuffing could give rise to a Fourth Amendment claim for excessive force. . . . Even assuming that the right to be free from excessive force during handcuffing was then clearly established, however, we cannot rest our ultimate conclusion as to immunity on a right that was clearly established only at 'a high level of generality.' . . . Our analysis must instead be 'particularized' to the facts of the case. . . . We must therefore focus more narrowly on whether, at the time of Cugini's arrest, clearly established law required an officer to respond to a complaint by a person under arrest where, as here, that person exhibited only non-verbal aural and physical manifestations of her discomfort. We conclude that at the time of the plaintiff's arrest, there was no such clearly established law. It remained an open question in this Circuit whether a plaintiff asserting an excessive force claim was required to show evidence that an officer was made reasonably aware of her pain by means of an explicit verbal complaint. And our limited case law on the subject appeared to look to the presence or absence of such a complaint as a significant factor, if not a prerequisite to liability, in our Fourth Amendment analysis. . . . Similarly, there was no such consensus in federal circuits outside ours whether a verbal complaint was necessary, so we need not—we cannot—come to a conclusion as to the consequences of any such consensus had indeed there been one. . . Before today, then, the law at least left room for reasonable debate as to whether the plaintiff was required to alert the defendant to her pain, and, if so, whether her non-verbal behavior was sufficient to do so. . . Although the plaintiff has persuasively argued that the defendant used undue force in handcuffing her, a reasonable officer under these circumstances could have concluded at the time of her arrest that he was not required to respond to her non-verbal indications of discomfort and pain. We therefore conclude that the plaintiff has failed to establish that the defendant violated a clearly established constitutional right and that the district court therefore correctly granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on that basis. . . We also conclude, however, that officers can no longer claim, as the defendant did here, that they are immune from liability for using plainly unreasonable force in handcuffing a person or using force that they should know is unreasonable based on the arrestee's manifestation of signs of distress on the grounds that the law is not 'clearly established.'")

See also Chimelis v. County of Suffolk, No. 2:21-CV-7079, 2025 WL 458242, at *7 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 11, 2025) ("Police Defendants assert qualified immunity for Plaintiff's excessive force claim because they contend that there is no 'clearly established law holding that it is an unreasonable use of force to handcuff suspects pursuant to normal handcuffing procedures after they notify law enforcement officers that they have injuries that would be exacerbated by such handcuffing.' . . . But since Ikezi, the Second Circuit has clearly established the right to be free from 'force that [officers] should know is unreasonable based on the arrestee's manifestation of signs of distress.' . . . This right was clearly established at the time the events underlying Plaintiff's case occurred. The Second Circuit decided Cugini in October 2019, and the events here occurred in October 2020. Cugini places 'the lawfulness of the particular [action] beyond debate,' . . . and applies 'with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question[.]'. . . It should be clear to 'every reasonable official' that manifestations of distress, including those caused by preexisting injuries, could render unreasonable force that is reasonable in other circumstances. . . That is especially true because, in setting the standard for handcuffing cases, . . . the Second Circuit cited a case that involved the aggravation of a preexisting injury by otherwise-reasonable force[.] . . Courts in this circuit have applied Cugini to cases where preexisting injuries render ordinary handcuffing unreasonable. . . Other circuits agree that such force is unreasonable. . . Thus, the right Plaintiff invokes is clearly established with sufficient 'specificity.' See Mullenix v. Luna, 577 U.S. 7, 12 (2015). Further, the identified factual disputes prevent the Court from determining whether an objectively reasonable officer would believe that his actions did not violate that right. . . The Court therefore cannot decide qualified immunity as a matter of law. Drawing all inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the Court denies summary judgment on Plaintiff's excessive force and assault and battery claims.")

Toolly v. Schwaller, 919 F.3d 165, 168, 172-75 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Failure to comply with a state procedural requirement—such as the New York Civil Service Law—does not necessarily defeat a claim for qualified immunity under federal law. Moreover, because Schwaller's conduct did not violate clearly established federal law, we further hold that he is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . [W]e have repeatedly held, that a state statute does not serve as ‘clearly established law’ for purposes of qualified immunity. Since a violation of state law does not per se result in a violation of the Due Process Clause, it cannot per se defeat qualified immunity. . . . To determine whether a violation of state law overcomes federal qualified immunity, then, the court must determine whether the conduct that violated the state statute also violates clearly established federal law, and this is a distinct and separate inquiry. And, although there may be some overlap, the requirements of federal due process law are ‘not inherently coextensive’ with those of the New York Civil Service Law. . . . Consequently, a defendant who violates the New York Civil Service Law has not necessarily violated clearly established federal due process law. . . . In the case before us, the question presented is whether there is clearly established federal law holding that the Due Process Clause is violated when the employer has provided the plaintiff with an opportunity to receive the process required by Loudermill, but the plaintiff, for possibly proper reasons, has not made use of that process by appearing or responding. . . . No case, in this Circuit or elsewhere, that has been cited to us has held that, where the defendant provides an opportunity for the plaintiff to receive due process at a meeting and the plaintiff, even for potentially valid reasons, fails to appear, the defendant must provide alternative procedures. Nor has any case established that the procedures required by Loudermill may not be provided at that same hearing or that they must be provided in a particular manner not satisfied here. Accordingly, we need not decide whether, in the circumstances of this case, the notices given satisfy the requirements of due process. And we conclude that, since Schwaller has not violated Toohey’s clearly established rights, he is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Muschette on Behalf of A.M. v. Gionfriddo, 910 F.3d 65, 69-72 (2d Cir. 2018) (“Officer Gionfriddo does not argue on appeal that the plaintiff has failed to allege a constitutional violation (of the Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force), and we therefore decline to address whether there was such a violation. Instead, Officer Gionfriddo argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because his use of force in this case did not violate any clearly established right or, alternatively, that it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that his conduct was lawful. The primary factual dispute identified by the district court is whether Officer Gionfriddo’s instructions and warnings were successfully conveyed to A.M. Officer Gionfriddo alleges that Hammond translated his verbal warnings to A.M. and that the warnings were understood by A.M. A.M. disputes this account. He argues that he was not disobeying the officer or resisting arrest, because the officer’s instructions and warnings were not conveyed to him in ASL, and that the use of a taser under those circumstances was excessive. . . . An officer is entitled to qualified immunity if ‘any reasonable officer, out of the wide range of reasonable people who enforce the laws in this country, could have determined that the challenged action was lawful’. Figueroa v. Mazza, 825 F.3d 89, 100 (2d Cir. 2016). ‘[O]ur inquiry [on qualified immunity] is not whether the officer should have acted as he did. Nor is it whether a singular, hypothetical entity exemplifying the “reasonable officer” ... would have acted in the same way.’. Given the undisputed facts of this case, we cannot say that no reasonable officer, situated as Officer Gionfriddo was, would have used a taser to secure A.M. On arrival at the American School for the Deaf, Officer Gionfriddo was faced with a 12-year-old boy who had fled his dorm and hunkered down in a restricted construction area, holding a large rock. Officer Gionfriddo had been informed that A.M. had thrown a folding chair at a staff member, struck Hammond with a stick, and hurled rocks at Hammond and other staff members. Officer Gionfriddo therefore had a reasonable basis to believe that A.M. posed a threat to himself or the other staff members and that there was a risk of further flight over the terrain of a construction site. Moreover, Officer Gionfriddo had a reasonable basis to believe that his instructions and warnings were being conveyed to A.M. and that A.M. was ignoring them. When Officer Gionfriddo approached A.M. in the construction area, he gave verbal instructions to A.M. to put down the rock. Officer Gionfriddo observed Davis signing to Hammond, who in turn signed ‘very animated[ly and] very purposeful[ly]’ to A.M. The intermediary signers were a teacher and a dean at a school for the deaf, who could be counted upon to communicate with a deaf student. When A.M. did not comply, Officer Gionfriddo verbally warned A.M. that he would use the taser if A.M. did not put down the rock, and Officer Gionfriddo again observed Davis signing to Hammond, who signed to A.M. It was only then--when it appeared to Officer Gionfriddo that A.M. was ignoring his instructions--that Officer Gionfriddo deployed the taser. Officer Gionfriddo deployed the taser a second time to allow Officer Lyth to secure handcuffs on A.M. . . . A.M. argues that it was unreasonable for Officer Gionfriddo to believe that Hammond was conveying his instructions and warnings to A.M., because Officer Gionfriddo admitted that A.M.’s head was down and that he could not tell if A.M.’s eyes were open. But Officer Gionfriddo actually testified that he ‘saw A.M. shaking his head with his head down’ after Hammond signed to him. . . . In any event, one may be looking up even if one’s head is down. And Officer Gionfriddo had a reasonable basis for presuming that his warnings were being conveyed to A.M.: he observed Hammond signing to A.M. after he gave verbal warnings (which supports an inference that Hammond believed that A.M. was seeing him), and Hammond gave no indication that he believed his communication to A.M. was unsuccessful. . . . Accordingly, because it was objectively reasonable for Officer Gionfriddo to believe that his conduct was lawful, he is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Burns v. Martuscello, 890 F.3d 77, 81, 89, 93-95 (2d Cir. 2018) (“Today we hold that the First Amendment protects both a prisoner’s right not to serve as an informant, and to refuse to provide false information to prison officials. We have previously held that citizens enjoy a First Amendment right to refuse to provide false information to the government, but have not previously recognized this right in the prison context. See Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225 (2d Cir. 2011). With regard to a prisoner’s right not to snitch, we have not previously reached this issue—though we have encountered it and declined to decide it on at least two prior occasions. See Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 2015); Allah v. Juchenwioz, 176 Fed.Appx. 187, 189 (2d Cir. 2006) (summary order). Because these rights were not clearly established at the time of the events underlying this suit, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. For these reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court. . . . [T]hough we have not previously considered whether the First Amendment rights discussed in Jackler extend to the prison context, we have little difficulty concluding that they do. . . . We also conclude that the First Amendment protects Burns’s refusal to act as the guards’ snitch by providing truthful information. . . . [W]e need not, and do not, address whether Burns had a First Amendment right to refuse to give truthful information about a past event, or in an emergency. We also wish to underscore that the rights at issue here do not implicate the widespread practice of conditioning pleas or other favorable prosecutorial treatment on the provision of information. Under such circumstances, the government confers a benefit on the potential informant, in the form of relief from warranted criminal or other adverse action. By contrast, we here are concerned with the distinct circumstances of an inmate punished only in retaliation for refusing to provide information as it may come to the inmate's attention on an ongoing basis. Again, the case before us is illustrative. Construing the evidence in Burns's favor, there is no indication that Burns himself was engaged in wrongful conduct. Burns was given a choice between snitching or incurring an otherwise underserved punishment. The distinction is of appreciable significance. It means that the government may withdraw a benefit—by, for example, refusing to lessen charges where the would-be informant declines to offer information—but may not impose punishments at random. Accordingly, for these reasons, we conclude that the refusal to provide false information and to serve as a snitch on an ongoing basis are protected by the First Amendment. . . . On the facts presented here, we conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Jackler was not decided until late 2011, well after Burns was released from IPC. And we have not previously held that the First Amendment protects the right not to snitch. Nor do we believe that prior decisions clearly foreshadowed our decision today. By the time of the events in question, we had issued one summary order noting the possibility of a right not to serve as a prison informant. Allah v. Juchenwioz, 176 Fed.Appx. 187, 189 (2d Cir. 2006) (summary order). However, in that case, we explicitly noted that we did 'not address whether ... an inmate has a constitutional right not to become an informant.' . . . Further, neither the Supreme Court nor any other circuit court has yet to decide whether a prisoner holds a right not to serve as an informant. Accordingly, we conclude that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We hold that the First Amendment protects a prisoner's right not to serve as an informant, as well as the right to refuse to provide false information to prison officials. Nonetheless, due to the novel nature of the legal questions before us, we conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Lee-Walker v. New York City Dep't of Ed., 712 F. App'x 43, ____ (2d Cir. 2017) (“Neither Garcetti nor Hazelwood clearly governs this case. In our only decision directly addressing the issue, we explicitly stated that ‘[i]t is an open question in this Circuit whether Garcetti applies to classroom instruction,’ and we chose ‘not [to] resolve the issue.’ . . . For that reason, there was no clearly established law premised on Garcetti under which the defendants would understand that Lee-Walker’s speech was protected by the First Amendment, and the defendants could have reasonably believed that Garcetti stripped her of those protections. Because we decide the claims against the individual defendants on the basis of qualified immunity, we need not reach the issue of whether Garcetti in fact applies to speech made by educators as a constitutional matter.”)

Barboza v. D’Agata, No. 16-258-CV, 2017 WL 214563, at *2 n.2 (2d Cir. Jan. 18, 2017) (not reported) (“To the extent the district court treated the identification of a clearly established right and the objective reasonableness of defendants' conduct as distinct inquiries and concluded that identification of a clearly established right in the context at issue did not necessarily preclude qualified immunity based on the third inquiry, it misread our precedent. See Zalaski v. City of Hartford, 723 F.3d at 388–89 (identifying two-inquiry analysis and observing that qualified immunity may not attach where right is clearly established in particular context); Walczyk v. Rio, 496 F.3d at 154 & n.16 (identifying two-inquiry analysis and explaining why concurring opinion's objection to characterization of second inquiry is unfounded). There is no need for us to clarify the two-inquiry standard in a published opinion as amicus urges because we have already done so. See Okin v. Vill. of Cornwall-on-Hudson Police Dep't, 577 F.3d 415, 433 n.11 (2d Cir. 2009) (observing that, despite some cases that might appear to frame it in disjunctive, “ ‘objectively reasonable’ inquiry is part of the ‘clearly established’ inquiry”). We here need explain only why, on a correct application of the two-step inquiry, defendants are nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity. See Figueroa v. Mazza, 825 F.3d 89, 99 (2d Cir. 2016) (reiterating authority to affirm on any ground supported by record).”)

Ricciuti v. Gyzenis, 834 F.3d 162, 169–70 (2d Cir. 2016) (“Defendants’ second argument fares no better. It is based on our court’s decision in Taravella v. Town of Wolcott, 599 F.3d 129 (2d Cir. 2010), that ‘even where the law is “clearly established” and the scope of an official’s permissible conduct is “clearly defined,” the qualified immunity defense also protects an official if it was “objectively reasonable” for him at the time of the challenged action to believe his acts were lawful.’. . Defendants contend that because Ricciuti’s speech owed its existence to her employment, it was ‘reasonable’ of the defendants to believe their conduct was lawful under Garcetti. Taravella’s arguable creation of an additional ‘reasonableness’ hurdle a plaintiff must satisfy to prevail in a suit against a public officer alleging a constitutional tort has not been without controversy. See Taravella, 599 F.3d at 136–48 (Straub, J., dissenting); Walczyk, 496 F.3d at 165–71 (Sotomayor, J., concurring). We need not resolve whether the ‘reasonableness’ of a defendant–officer’s belief that his conduct did not violate the law is an independent basis for granting qualified immunity, over and above lack of clarity in the law, because, in any event, on the factually disputed record presented to the district court on the defendants’ motion for summary judgment, the obligation to resolve factual disputes in the plaintiff’s favor compelled a denial of the defendants’ motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. As we have explained above, no reasonable officer faced with Ricciuti’s version of the facts could have concluded that Ricciuti’s speech was made ‘pursuant to’ her official duties as a patrol officer under the meaning of Garcetti merely because her speech owes its existence to her job. Defendants therefore failed to show entitlement to fire Ricciuti or entitlement to qualified immunity under her version of the facts. The law on this issue was clearly established at the time Ricciuti was fired, even though our decision in Weintraub had not yet been issued. Thus, defendants’ conduct was not ‘objectively legally reasonable.’”)

McGowan v. United States, 825 F.3d 118, 123–25 (2d Cir. 2016) (“McGowan argues that his claim does not require us to extend Bivens to a new context, and, even if it did, that there is no adequate ‘alternative remedial scheme’ and no ‘special factor[] counsel[ing] hesitation.’. . Accordingly, he argues, the district court erred in refusing to recognize a Bivens remedy. We need not decide this difficult issue, however, because we conclude that McGowan's Bivens claim fails for the independent reason that defendant Rivers is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We conclude that, at the time the alleged violation occurred, our case law did not clearly establish that McGowan had a First Amendment right to publish his article. The Supreme Court has held that 'when a prison regulation impinges on inmates' constitutional rights, the regulation is valid if it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.' . . . We have not identified any binding authority in existence at the relevant time that either 'directly address[ed]' the reasonableness of the challenged conduct or 'clearly foreshadow[ed]' a ruling in McGowan's favor, . . . nor has McGowan cited any such case. McGowan relies instead on cases establishing the right of a prisoner to be free from retaliation for filing a lawsuit or grievance. . . . But a prisoner's publishing a bylined article may implicate different penological interests from those implicated by his filing a lawsuit or grievance. For example, in litigating the constitutionality of the Byline Regulation in the District of Colorado, the government took the position that allowing inmates to publish bylined articles could create security problems by permitting such inmates to become 'big wheels' in the prison community, or could incite violence, or could intimidate prison staff members. . . . Whether or not we would agree with that analysis is beside the point. We conclude only that, in light of the different interests at stake, our case law establishing a prisoner's right to file a lawsuit or grievance does not clearly establish a prisoner's right to publish an article under a byline. Indeed, the only authority that McGowan has identified that involved expression similar to that at issue in this case is a district court opinion, which, of course, is not binding. See Shaheen v. Filion, No. 9:04-CV-625 (FJS/DRH), 2006 WL 2792739, at *3 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 17, 2006). Thus, in light of the absence of authority clearly establishing the claimed right, we are constrained to hold that Rivers is entitled to qualified immunity from McGowan's Bivens claim. In so holding, we do not reach the question of whether Rivers violated McGowan's First Amendment rights.")

Lawson v. Hilderbrand, 642 F. App'x 34, 35-36 (2d Cir. 2016) ("When a government official charged with violating federal constitutional rights seeks summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity, the Court may first consider whether there was a 'violation of clearly established law before turning to the more difficult question whether the relevant facts make out a constitutional question at all.' . . . Here, we conclude that the lack of clearly established law barring the police actions entitles the Defendants to qualified immunity for their actions. The police entered the home with Duncan Lawson's consent, and when that consent was revoked it was objectively reasonable for the defendants to believe that exigent circumstances made their continued presence in the house, and their confinement of the residents to the living room, lawful. . . . As 'the need to prevent the imminent destruction of evidence has long been recognized as a sufficient justification for a warrantless search,' . . . it follows that the need to prevent the destruction of evidence provides sufficient justification for the less intrusive act of securing the premises until a search warrant is obtained. We have considered all of the plaintiffs' arguments and find them to be without merit. Accordingly, the order of the district court hereby is REVERSED, and this matter remanded for further proceedings consistent with this order.")

See also Lawson v. Hilderbrand, No. 3:13-CV-00206 (JAM), 2016 WL 3039710, at *2-4 (D. Conn. May 30, 2016) (on remand) (“It was perfectly permissible for the Second Circuit to decide this case on qualified immunity grounds without ruling on the constitutional merits of Duncan Lawson’s claims. . . Nevertheless, there is no rule that prevents a federal court from addressing the constitutional merits in a qualified immunity case, and I am hopeful that the Second Circuit will one day decide to consider the constitutionality of the type of ‘knock and talk’ practice as it was allegedly deployed by the police in this case. Absent such an examination of the underlying constitutional issue, I fear that police officers in the Second Circuit are and remain free to engage in the kind of tactics that the police allegedly did here: that is, to trick their way into the home, only then to seek consent to search the home, and then to lock down the entire home and all its occupants for several hours pending the securing of a search warrant if the homeowner elects to exercise his constitutional rights. It won’t matter—as in this case—if the police use such tactics when they are in search of just a few pills that a suspect has freely admitted to possessing in his family’s home. It won’t matter that the homeowner has been cooperative (other than to assert his constitutional rights). It won’t matter that the homeowner has not said or done anything to indicate that he will destroy evidence. And it won’t matter if there are sleeping children whose memories may be forever scarred by the experience of a late-night police occupation of their home. Absent a determination by the Second Circuit (or Supreme Court) of the underlying constitutional issue, there won’t be ‘clearly established’ law to deter future police officers from the type of overreaching conduct that has been alleged to have occurred in this case. . . As the Second Circuit has made clear, district court judges have no authority to articulate a legal standard that will be of consequence for future claims of qualified immunity. . . Others have argued that when an appellate court faces a claim of qualified immunity, it should reach and resolve the underlying constitutional issue, because—as one appellate judge has recently acknowledged—‘if a court reviewing a constitutional claim to which qualified immunity applies need not address the merits of the claim, the same right may be violated time and again, with courts declining each time to provide a remedy or state the law for future cases.’ Stephen R. Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity: The Court’s Ever Increasing Limitations on the Development and Enforcement of Constitutional Rights and Some Particularly Unfortunate Consequences, 113 Mich. L. Rev. 1219, 1249 (2015). After all, litigants and the public alike count on our appellate courts not merely to process appeals but to articulate the law, and when an appellate court applies qualified immunity in a manner that declines to reach the constitutional merits of a claim, then this possibly ‘interferes with the law-pronouncing function of the federal courts and reduces the amount of guidance about the meaning of the Constitution for both government officials and the public at large.’ Alan K. Chen, Qualified Immunity Limiting Access to Justice and Impeding Development of the Law, Hum. Rts., July 2015, at 8, 9 (2015); see also Karen Blum, Erwin Chemerinsky & Martin A. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity Developments: Not Much Hope Left for Plaintiffs, 29 Touro L. Rev. 633, 647-50 (2013) (discussing inclination of appellate courts to avoid merits inquiry); Aaron L. Nielson & Christopher J. Walker, The New Qualified Immunity, 89 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 49-65 (2015) (recommending that appellate courts explain why they decline to address the merits of constitutional claims and noting that fewer than 10% of federal appeals courts explain why they have decided not to address the underlying constitutional claim). This is by no means to say that appellate courts should invariably resolve the underlying constitutional claim on its merits when deciding questions of qualified immunity. There may be powerful judicial economy reasons not to do so, and I do not doubt that the qualified immunity rule is appropriately applied without resolution of the merits in many instances where the police are engaged in conduct highly similar to that which has been previously approved by prior case law, or where the police are reacting to emergency circumstances that suddenly confront them, or where it seems at worst that the police acted negligently (perhaps grossly so). I myself have seen and resolved such cases this way. . . . Still, this case seems different. Reliance on the qualified immunity rule—without a resolution of the merits—is more troubling when facts suggest that police have deliberately deployed a stratagem to circumvent people’s assertions of their rights and the sanctity of their homes. A failure to address the merits in such circumstances may unwittingly reward the police for the use of clever techniques that are designed to cheapen the exercise of constitutional rights. And there is surely a paramount interest besides in having clear rules for what the police may do inside a person’s home. It seems to me that for such cases as this the courts of appeals should clarify the constitutional baseline for future cases, even if courts might otherwise conclude that—for lack to date of a clearly established rule—qualified immunity should insulate the unconstitutional conduct in the one case before them.”)

Lynch v. Ackley, 811 F.3d 569, 576-77, 579-80 (2d Cir. 2016) (“Adjudication of Ackley’s motion for qualified immunity does not need to await jury resolution of disputed factual issues. If on Lynch’s version of disputed facts—accepting reasonable inferences most favorable to him—there was no clear law at the time prohibiting Ackley’s conduct, then Ackley is entitled to qualified immunity. Ackley’s motion can be adjudicated on this basis as a pure question of law, and this appeal is properly before us. . . . Ackley contends she is entitled as a matter of law to dismissal of Lynch’s First Amendment claims by reason of qualified immunity. She argues that, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Lynch, her allegedly retaliatory actions did not violate constitutional standards that were clearly established at the time. We agree that there was no clear law at the time of the events establishing that Ackley’s conduct constituted a First Amendment violation, and we express no view on whether Ackley’s alleged conduct should be found to violate the First Amendment. . . . With respect to what may be Lynch’s strongest claim for protection from retaliation—his claim that Ackley retaliated against him for his perceived role in the Union’s endorsement of Buscetto for mayor—there was no clear law as to whether Ackley’s alleged retaliatory actions constituted prohibited retaliation because Ackley’s alleged retaliatory acts were limited to her exercise of her own First Amendment right to defend herself against Lynch’s attacks. Her speech in defending herself involved core First Amendment issues of public importance. With respect to Lynch’s claim relating to retaliation for a union grievance, the grievance he expressed was not clearly a matter of public concern under Pickering. Finally, with respect to Lynch’s remaining claims, we find that because Lynch’s speech interfered significantly with Ackley’s ability to effectively run the NLPD, she was arguably entitled to retaliate under Pickering’s balancing test, even under the version of the facts most favorable to Lynch.”)

Burgess v. Town of Wallingford, 569 F. App'x 21, 23 (2d Cir. 2014) (“[T]he protection that Burgess claims he deserves under the Second Amendment—the right to carry a firearm openly outside the home—is not clearly established law. . . And as of Burgess’s arrest on May 16, 2010, this right was even less concrete, as the Supreme Court had not yet held that the Second Amendment right in Heller applies to state governments; it did so shortly thereafter in McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (June 28, 2010). Given this legal ambiguity, Defendants–Appellants were entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court correctly granted summary judgment in their favor on Burgess’s Second Amendment claim.”)

U.S. v. City of New York, 717 F.3d 72, 92-94 (2d Cir. 2013) (“If a public official intentionally acts to the detriment of current or prospective public employees on the basis of race, the official is not shielded by qualified immunity simply because the official might have been unaware that at trial a burden-shifting scheme would regulate the conduct of ensuing litigation. ‘For a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours must be sufficiently clear that reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . Having rejected the District Court’s stated reason for dismissing the federal claims on the ground of qualified immunity, we next consider whether the record supports dismissal of these claims on the ground that the Intervenor has not shown a violation of a federal right. The District Court did not reach that component of qualified immunity, see Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226, 232 (1991), accepting instead the opportunity created by Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009), to decide first whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established. . . In considering whether the record would have permitted dismissal on the ground that the officials had not violated a federal right, we encounter two conflicting statements in the District Court’s opinion. On the one hand, the Court referred to ‘copious evidence’ from which a reasonable fact-finder could infer that the officials ‘harbored’ an intent to discriminate against black applicants. . . On the other hand, the Court stated that there was ‘no evidence that directly and unmistakably proves that fact.’ . . We question both observations. As to the second one, there is no requirement that an intent to discriminate must be proved ‘directly and unmistakably.’ . . At the same time, we cannot agree with the District Court that the record revealed ‘copious evidence’ of the officials’ intent to discriminate. . . Although we disagree with the District Court that there was ‘copious evidence’ of the officials’ intent to discriminate, we cannot say that a reasonable fact-finder might not infer, from all the evidence, that, with respect to the Commissioner heading the FDNY, his involvement in the decision to continue using the results of the Exams indicated an intent to discriminate. Were the decision ours to make, we would not draw such an inference, but our task is the more limited one of determining whether such an inference could reasonably be made by the fact-finder. With respect to the Mayor, however, we think the record does not suffice to permit a fact-finder to draw a reasonable inference of intent to discriminate. In light of the myriad duties imposed upon the chief executive officer of a city of eight million people, more evidence would be needed to permit a trier to find that the decision of one municipal department to continue using the results of the Exams supports an inference of discriminatory intent on the part of the Mayor.”) consent to the search of her car, which is determined by looking at what a reasonable person would have understood by the exchange between Trottier and Winfield. We conclude that, while the scope of Winfield's consent was not limited to a search for any particular object of contraband, it did not extend to the text of her mail. However, since this right was not clearly established at the time of the search, Trottier is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Courts may 'exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . . Here, we analyze both because it is "difficult to decide whether [the] right [in this case] is clearly established without deciding precisely what the existing constitutional right happens to be." . . . The right at issue is properly stated as follows: It is a Fourth Amendment violation when a police officer reads a suspect's private papers, the text of which is not in plain view, while conducting a search authorized solely by the suspect's generalized consent to search the area in which the papers are found. No prior case in the Second Circuit has so held. Accordingly, Trottier's actions were "objectively legally reasonable in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken," . . . and he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Coollick v. Hughes, 699 F.3d 211, 221 (2d Cir. 2012) ("We do not decide whether the specific contents of the letter and the grievance procedures are sufficient under the Constitution. We skip step one of the qualified immunity analysis and instead decide that 'existing precedent' has not 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.' . . . Quite to the contrary, the existing precedent, Harhay and Adams in particular, seem to dictate that no constitutional violation occurred here at all. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Coollick, Hughes's actions lie somewhere in the gray area in the spectrum of what satisfies due process given the particular facts of this case. Hughes sent Coollick reasonably clear notice well in advance of any deprivation, which allowed Coollick to avail herself of the collective bargaining agreement's grievance procedures. Without doubt, and certainly undisputed, Coollick received adequate post-deprivation remedies. There is nothing objectively illegal, in a constitutional sense, embodied in Hughes's actions or in what happened to Coollick. Hughes may have been wrong in her view that Coollick did not have certain rights under the collective bargaining agreement, but Coollick was able to avoid any harm through the very grievance procedures in place to remedy any such deprivation. As no constitutional bright lines were transgressed by Hughes in the course of handling Coollick's termination, Hughes is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Sudler v. City of New York, 689 F.3d 159, 173-76 (2d Cir. 2012) ("[W]e . . . conclude that the district court correctly determined that the State Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that their due process rights were violated when DOCS officials failed promptly to afford them PJT credits for the time served on their local sentences. Having also concluded, moreover, that in the circumstances here, we best follow that 'older, wiser judicial counsel not to pass on questions of constitutionality ... unless such adjudication is unavoidable,' . . . we reach the determination that the State Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity without deciding the due process questions that this case presents. . . . The State Defendants are clearly entitled to qualified immunity in the Sudler action. To repeat, Sudler's claim sounds in procedural due process: He alleges that, whatever New York law provides as to whether his misdemeanor sentences could properly run concurrently with his parole revocation sentence, the State Defendants violated his due process right, made explicit in Earley, to serve only the sentence pronounced by Justice Clancy until such time as this sentence was lawfully modified by a judge. Sudler's release date, however, was calculated by DOP personnel prior to this Court's decision in Earley, and Sudler was released from prison approximately one month after the issuance of our decision and one month before our denial of rehearing in that case. It is true that Earley held that 'clearly established Supreme Court precedent'—namely, Wampler—rendered invalid the five-year PRS term added to Earley's sentence by prison administrators, on the ground that the PRS term was not imposed by the sentencing court. Id. at 76. In Scott v. Fischer, however, we noted that the conclusion that a legal proposition is "clearly established" for purposes of its application by professional state court judges' [sic] pursuant to AEDPA does not mean that it is "clearly established" in the qualified immunity context, which governs the conduct of government officials who are likely neither lawyers nor legal scholars.' . . . Moreover, we went on to hold that Wampler, standing alone, was insufficient to establish clearly the right not to serve a term of PRS not imposed by sentence (the right at stake in Earley) for purposes of qualified immunity. . . . The same logic applies to Sudler's detention. Even assuming, arguendo, that Earley applies so as to require the provision of PJT credits in circumstances like those here, because the State Defendants' conduct with respect to Sudler occurred prior to our decision in Earley (or, at the very latest, a few weeks after that decision and prior to our denial of the petition for rehearing), the only guidance available to the State Defendants as to the due process right at issue here was Wampler. We recognized in Scott, however, that for the purpose of qualified immunity, Wampler itself does not clearly establish the procedural right recognized in Earley not to have a custodial sentence extended except by a judge. . . . We see no reason why Wampler, a seventy-year-old case that does not on its face mention the Constitution, could have given the State Defendants notice that administrative alteration of a sentence is in violation of an inmate's due process rights, any more than it could have given the defendants in Scott notice of the same. Thus, we cannot conclude that the State Defendants could 'fairly be said to "know"' that due process required that Sudler be afforded PJT credits for the time he served at Rikers. . . . We also conclude that the State Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity in the Batthany suit. To be sure, Batthany's release date was calculated after our decision in Earley, and Earley recognized that a prisoner who is in custody as a result of a judicially-imposed sentence has a protected liberty interest in not having the term of this custodial sentence extended (even if the sentencing judge omitted some measure of punishment required by law) by a prison administrator, as opposed to a judge. The State Defendants are correct, however, that this holding, by its terms, does not instruct prison administrators as to the calculation of release dates when multiple sentences are at issue—and, indeed, one sentencing judge's instructions may conflict with another's. . . . We need not here decide the precise question whether 'the unconstitutionality of administratively imposed PRS' was clearly established before April 2008. . . . Rather, the fact that New York courts continued to struggle with the implications of Earley until at least that date, combined with the critical differences between the case at bar—implicating multiple sentences—and the facts in Earley, are sufficient to convince us that the asserted unlawfulness of the State Defendants' conduct in calculating Batthany's release date would not have been apparent to reasonable prison officials.”)

Ahlers v. Rabinowitz, 684 F.3d 53, 64-66 (2d Cir. 2012) (“This Circuit has not articulated the standard by which to analyze censorship of mail in the civil commitment context. . . . With regard to legal mail, ‘an isolated incident of mail tampering is usually insufficient to establish a constitutional violation. Rather, the inmate must show that prison officials “regularly and unjustifiably interfered with the incoming legal mail.”’ . . . In the context of civil commitment, this formula is easily adapted. A patient must show regular and unjustifiable interference with incoming legal mail; the actions of facility staff in restricting civilly committed individuals’ access to legal mail are justified if they advance or protect the state’s interest in security, order, or treatment and the restrictions imposed are no greater than necessary to advance the governmental interest involved. Interference with non-legal mail, as Ahlers claims, is more readily justifiable than interference with so-called legal mail. . . . We need not articulate the correct standard here, however, because Ahlers’s complaint cannot support a claim that any alleged ‘interference’ with his non-legal mail was ‘regular[]’ or ‘unjustifiabl[e].’ . . . We have for the first time undertaken a Fourth Amendment balancing analysis with regard to the right of a civilly committed person to be free from unreasonable seizures. In other circumstances, that might justify a remand for a pro se complainant to replead. . . . However, we are satisfied that, in any event, ‘it was objectively reasonable for [the Defendants] to believe their acts did not violate’ Ahlers’s Fourth Amendment rights, or his First Amendment or procedural due process rights.”)

Hilton v. Wright, 673 F.3d 120, 126, 127 (2d Cir. 2012) (“Although we review grants of summary judgment de novo, the opinion of the district court is often helpful in guiding our examination of the record. In this case, the extreme brevity of the district court’s opinion with respect to Hilton’s Section 1983 claim denies us this usual assistance. Indeed, the district court’s determination that Dr. Wright enjoys qualified immunity from Hilton’s claim is entirely conclusory and essentially requires this court to consider the issue in the first instance. Under these circumstances, we elect to vacate the district court’s grant of summary judgement against Hilton on his Eighth Amendment claim and remand the issue for further explanation as to one or both of the following questions: (1) why, given the evidence on the record, there is no genuine issue of material fact about whether Dr. Wright is entitled to qualified and immunity, and (2) why there is no genuine issue of material fact about whether the doctor’s conduct violated the Eighth Amendment. When clarifying these aspects of its decision, the district court should bear in mind the following. In Pearson v. Callahan . . . the Supreme Court revised the traditional two-step qualified immunity analysis set out in Saucier v. Katz [W]e do not pass on which step of the qualified immunity analysis the district court should first undertake. It may begin its analysis by considering whether conditioning medical treatment for a progressive disease on participation in a prison program violates a clearly established right that an objectively reasonable person would have known about, or it may first address whether such a practice in fact violates the Eighth Amendment. If the district court decides, or is eventually compelled, to consider the underlying constitutionality of Dr. Wright’s conduct, we note there may well be genuine issues of material fact.”)

Doninger v. Niehoff, 642 F.3d 334, 345-51 (2d Cir. 2011) (“Following the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan, . . . we may now exercise our discretion in deciding the order in which to conduct the qualified immunity analysis. . . . We do not reach the question whether school officials violated Doninger’s First Amendment rights by preventing her from running for Senior Class Secretary. We see no need to decide this question. We agree with the district court that any First Amendment right allegedly violated here was not clearly established, such that ‘it would [have been] clear to a reasonable [school official] that [her] conduct was unlawful in the situation [she] confronted.’ . . . Accordingly, Defendants were properly afforded qualified immunity as to this claim. . . . [T]he Supreme Court in Tinker did not clearly establish intent as an element of any claim or defense, nor has our case law pursuant to Tinker. As a result, even assuming a factual dispute exists as to Niehoff’s motivation, qualified immunity is still proper where Defendants were objectively reasonable in their judgment that they ‘might reasonably portend disruption from the student expression at issue.’ . . . Moreover, even if this were not the case—even if intent constituted a clearly established element of a Tinker defense—the supposed factual dispute as to whether Niehoff was motivated by the offensiveness of Doninger’s speech or by its disruptive potential would still not matter here. As the district court recognized, it was also not clearly established at the time of these events that Doninger had any First Amendment right not to be prohibited from running for Senior Class Secretary because of offensive off-campus speech, at least when such speech pertained to a school event, invited students to read and respond to it by contacting school administrators, and it was reasonably foreseeable ‘that the speech would come on to campus and thus come to the attention of school authorities.’ . . . Doninger’s discipline extended only to her role as a student government representative: she was not suspended from classes or punished in any other way. Given that Doninger, in serving in such a position, was to help maintain a ‘continuous communication channel from students to both faculty and administration,’ it was not unreasonable for Niehoff to conclude that Doninger, by posting an incendiary blog post in the midst of an ongoing school controversy, had demonstrated her unwillingness properly to carry out this role. To be clear, we do not conclude in any way that school administrators are immune from First Amendment scrutiny when they react to student speech by limiting students’ participation in extracurricular activities. Here, however, pursuant to Tinker and its progeny, it was objectively reasonable for school officials to conclude that Doninger’s behavior was potentially disruptive of student government functions (such as the organization of Jamfest) and that Doninger was not free to engage in such behavior while serving as a class representative—a representative charged with working with these very same school officials to carry out her responsibilities. . . . [I]t was objectively reasonable for Niehoff and Schwartz to believe they could prohibit Doninger from running for Senior Class Secretary without violating her First Amendment rights, given the ‘specific facts and context of the case.’ . . . We thus conclude that Niehoff and Schwartz were properly afforded qualified immunity as to Doninger’s blog post claim.”)

Doninger v. Niehoff, 642 F.3d 334, 353-56 (2d Cir. 2011) (“We again focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether, assuming that Doninger had a First Amendment right to wear her t-shirt at the assembly, this right was clearly established. . . . The law governing restrictions on student speech can be difficult and confusing, even for lawyers, law professors, and judges. The relevant Supreme Court cases can be hard to reconcile, and courts often struggle to determine which standard applies in any particular case. . . . We conclude, for instance, that Tinker governs here—that because the t-shirts were not vulgar, see Fraser, 478 U.S. at 683, could not reasonably be perceived to bear the School’s imprimatur, see Hazelwood, 484 U.S. at 271, and did not encourage drug use, see Morse, 551 U.S. at 409, they could be subject to regulation different from that permissible for adults in non-school settings only if they threatened substantial disruption to the work and discipline of the School. . . . That said, a reasonable school official could well note salient differences between the circumstances here and those in Tinker. . . . [E]ven assuming, arguendo, that it would be clear to a reasonable official that the Tinker standard applied in the circumstances presented, Defendants are still entitled to qualified immunity if such an official could have reasonably erred in determining whether the potential for disruption at the assembly was sufficient to satisfy that standard. Even viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Doninger, we conclude that such is the case here. . . . Given Niehoff’s responsibility for ensuring an orderly election process, enforcing the punishment against Doninger, and safeguarding the interests of those students who were to speak at the assembly, she faced a difficult task in assessing whether the threat of disruption was severe enough to justify preventing Doninger from wearing her t-shirt into the assembly. A reasonable jury could find that a school official who believed the threatened disruption here was sufficiently substantial was, under the circumstances, mistaken. We cannot conclude, however, that such a mistake was anything but reasonable—the very sort of mistake for which the qualified immunity doctrine exists to shield officials against unwarranted liability. . . . We conclude that, in the circumstances here, reasonable school officials could disagree about the potential for a substantial disruption of the assembly as a result of permitting students to wear the t-shirts inside. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Costello v. City of Burlington, 632 F.3d 41, 47, 48 (2d Cir. 2011) (“Affirmance on the ground of qualified immunity only, as Judge Pooler prefers, may decide this case (this time), but it certainly would not advance matters. That is because: Costello could then immediately return to Church Street, and resume screaming, as he is inspired to do; the police would have no incremental guidance from the courts on what to do; the next police officer who enforced Burlington’s noise ordinance would be the defendant in Costello’s next lawsuit; in that suit, the district court would have no guidance from this appeal; nor would we, on the next appeal—and this judicial proceeding, beginning to end, would be a waste of everyone’s time. This is not a case in which prudence counsels kicking the can down the road. . . Judge Pooler argues that, ‘[w]ithout more of a record,’ it may be premature for us to decide whether Burlington’s noise ordinance is ‘plainly constitutional.’. . In Costello I, we previously remanded for further fact-finding, to gauge the ambient noises on Church Street (because shouting in, say, a library is more invasive than shouting in a steel mill). And the district court, having already issued one detailed opinion, responded with a second set of findings—which Judge Pooler still thinks deficient. . . This case has been considered by the district court twice, and twice by this Court. Another remand would be futile. In any event, such obstacles should not be erected to frustrate enforcement of an ordinance that (as we have

Taravella v. Town of Wolcott, 599 F.3d 129, 135, 136 (2d Cir. 2010) (“Dunn read the Agreement, sought legal advice, and reasonably concluded that Taravella could be terminated without a hearing. . . . Because a reasonable mayor could understand the Agreement to provide that Taravella could be fired without a hearing, it cannot be said that Dunn acted unreasonably in doing so. . . . Judge Straub’s dissent is in two parts. The first part questions why this Circuit analyzes qualified immunity by considering three questions rather than just two. Specifically, Judge Straub would only consider: (1) whether the facts plaintiff alleges establish a violation of a constitutional right and (2) whether this constitutional right was clearly established. Such a formulation would omit consideration of whether it was ‘objectively reasonable’ for a defendant to believe his actions were lawful. The second part of Judge Straub’s opinion, which concerns the particulars of this case, illustrates why this third question is indispensable. Judge Straub recognizes the employment contract is ambiguous as to whether Ms. Taravella had the right to a hearing before dismissal. And, he would remand for a finding (on extrinsic evidence) as to the intent of Mayor Dunn’s predecessor, in aid of answering the first inquiry, i.e., whether under the facts she alleged Taravella had a constitutional right to a hearing. However, the ambiguity of a contract is ascertainable as a matter of law, and we all conclude that this contract is ambiguous. Given the contract’s ambiguity and the standard—that we look at ‘whether a reasonable official would reasonably believe his conduct did not violate a clearly established right,’ Kerman v. City of New York, 374 F.3d 93, 109 (2d Cir.2004)—it cannot be said that the defendant acted unreasonably when he interpreted the ambiguous contract one way instead of another. . . . Although Taravella has alleged a violation of a constitutional right, and although that constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, Dunn’s conduct was objectively reasonable in light of the information he had. We therefore reverse the district court’s denial of Dunn’s summary judgment motion on grounds of qualified immunity.”)

Taravella v. Town of Wolcott, 599 F.3d 129, 136, 140, 146, 147 (2d Cir. 2010) (Straub, J., dissenting) (“I respectfully dissent. This is a straightforward qualified immunity case. In line with well-established Supreme Court and Circuit precedent, Mayor Thomas G. Dunn’s appeal from the District Court’s order denying summary judgment based on qualified immunity should be dismissed because the District Court found that material factual disputes preclude summary judgment. I write to make two main points. First, I wish to call the Court’s attention to what appears to me to be a long-standing inconsistency in our case law. For years, our cases have described the qualified immunity analysis both as a two-step process and as a three-step process. The latter has no basis in Supreme Court precedent and has served to confuse the case law in this area. Second, on the merits, I would hold that (under any standard) Dunn’s appeal should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction because the District Court found that material factual disputes exist and the record reflects that these factual disputes are indeed material. . . . [I]n accordance with Saucier and Pearson, the analysis should be as follows: (1) Taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, do the facts alleged or shown (depending on the stage of litigation) show that the state official's conduct violated a constitutional right? (2) If a constitutional violation can be made out on a favorable view of the parties' submissions, was the right clearly established? . . . Of course, in accordance with Pearson, the two elements need not be addressed sequentially. . . . I take no quarrel with the statement that it could be said that Dunn acted reasonably. I part company with the majority because the resolution of that question depends on disputed facts. . . . In this dissent, I seek to make two main points. First, I attempt to call our Court's attention to the apparent long-standing inconsistency in our case law regarding the proper standard for analyzing qualified immunity claims. We should—and it is my hope that we soon will— resolve this inconsistency by holding that qualified immunity is decided in accordance with a two-step analysis: (1) a court must determine whether the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, show that the state official's conduct violated a constitutional right; and (2) even if a constitutional violation can be made out on a favorable view of the submissions, the official is entitled to immunity if the right was not clearly established. Second, because qualified immunity is not available at the summary judgment stage when there are material facts in dispute, and because the District Court found that such disputes exist in this case, I would dismiss Dunn's appeal of the denial of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. Although this should be tested using the two-step method described above, I would hold that Dunn's appeal should be dismissed even under the standard employed by the majority; when the District Court finds that material facts are disputed as to the qualified immunity analysis, we lack jurisdiction to disturb the District Court's finding that these material factual disputes are genuine. Therefore, I respectfully dissent.”).

Redd v. Wright, 597 F.3d 532, 536 (2d Cir. 2010) (“As a result of the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan . . . we are no longer required to determine whether Redd’s rights were violated under the First Amendment and RLUIPA if we determine that the rights claimed by Redd were not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation. . . The task of framing the right at issue with some precision is critical in determining whether that particular right was clearly established at the time of the defendants’ alleged violation. Redd claims that the right at issue here should be characterized as the right ‘not to be subjected to punishment or more burdensome confinement as a consequence of his religious beliefs,’ Redd Br. 26. As the defendants note, however, the Supreme Court has expressly cautioned against framing the constitutional right at too broad a level of generality. . . And we have interposed a ‘reasonable specificity’ requirement on defining the contours of a constitutional right for qualified immunity purposes. . . Redd’s characterization of his right is not ‘reasonably specific’ because it fails to account for the 1996 Policy in particular. We agree with the defendants that the right at issue here is Redd’s right under the First Amendment and RLUIPA to a religious exemption from the 1996 Policy. At the time Redd was confined in TB hold, it had not been clearly established by either the Supreme Court or this court that the 1996 Policy, or a substantially equivalent policy, was not reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest nor that such terms are not the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling governmental interest. For those reasons, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Redd’s First Amendment and RLUIPA claims.”).

Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 433 n.11 (2d Cir. 2009) (“Some cases frame the test [for qualified immunity] as disjunctive: an officer ‘is entitled to qualified immunity if his conduct did not violate a clearly established constitutional right, or if it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that his conduct did not violate such a right.’ Gilles v. Repicky, 511 F.3d 239, 246 (2d Cir.2007) (emphasis added). This would imply that an officer whose actions violated clearly established law might escape liability if he had an objectively reasonable belief that his conduct did not violate the clearly established law. However, Saucier makes it clear that the ‘objectively reasonable’ inquiry is part of the ‘clearly established’ inquiry. . . Thus, once a court has found that the law was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct and for the particular context in which it occurred, it is no defense for a police officer who violated this clearly established law to respond that he held an objectively reasonable belief that his conduct was lawful. This is so because a police officer who violates clearly established law necessarily lacks an objectively reasonable belief that his conduct was lawful. We clarify here that the two are part of the same inquiry, not independent elements as some cases suggested.”).

Dean v. Blumenthal, 577 F.3d 60, 68 (2d Cir. 2009) (“We exercise our discretion here and will initially evaluate whether the constitutional right asserted by Dean was clearly established during the relevant period. Only if the right was clearly established will we then consider whether the facts that Dean has alleged make out a violation of a constitutional right. We invert the once-mandatory Saucier sequence because, as discussed below, it is clear that a constitutional right to receive campaign contributions was not clearly established, but it is ‘far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . We also do not believe that a challenge to a practice that has been defunct for over six years, where injunctive relief is moot and where damages are speculative, presents an appropriate opportunity to explore the complexities of a difficult constitutional question.”).

Kelsey v. County of Schoharie, 567 F.3d 54, 61-65 (2d Cir. 2009) (“The development of constitutional precedent is especially important here, where (1) this Court has not spoken on the issue of the constitutionality of clothing exchange procedures in jails although the issue has been presented in district courts in this circuit . . . ; and (2) the constitutionality of clothing exchange procedures in jails may never be developed if this Court were to dispose of all challenges relating to the procedures simply because the procedure is not ‘clearly established’ as a ‘strip search’ violative of the Fourth Amendment. It is also said that addressing the constitutional issue first may not only avoid the possibility of drawn-out litigation and the imposition of unwarranted liability, but may also serve to clarify official conduct standards. . . We think that all these purposes are served by undertaking the constitutional inquiry first in this case. . . . We conclude that the incidental observation of the body of an arrestee during a required clothing exchange, in the manner described by plaintiffs, is not an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, it seems to us that a clothing exchange observed by corrections officers under the circumstances described by plaintiffs is related to ‘maintaining institutional security and preserving internal order and discipline[,] essential goals that may require limitation or retraction of the retained constitutional rights of both convicted prisoners and pretrial detainees.’ Bell v.

Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 546 (1979). The objectives served by a clothing exchange, according to Sheriff Bates, include assurance that each inmate has clothing that is clean and free of infestation; that inmates are clearly identifiable and distinguishable from visitors, staff and members of the public; and that a positive state of mind be instilled in each inmate. . . . We hold here only that a process for the exchange of personal clothing for prison clothing under the observation of a corrections officer in the manner described by plaintiffs does not implicate the type of privacy protected by the Fourth Amendment nor does it fall within the prohibitions established by our precedents relating to strip searches. Plaintiffs were not required to display or manipulate their body parts in any way. Moreover, Plaintiffs did not deny that methods were available to them to protect viewing of their private parts in the event they desired to make use of such methods. . . . Because the plaintiffs have been unable to identify any constitutional violation on the parts of the individual defendants, the Decision and Order of the District Court is reversed, and the case is remanded with instructions to dismiss the action as against the individual defendants. Because the plaintiffs lack any underlying claim of a deprivation of a constitutional right, the claim of municipal liability on the part of defendant County of Schoharie is to be dismissed as well.”)

Kelsey v. County of Schoharie, 567 F.3d 54, 65, 71 (2d Cir. 2009) (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (“I dissent because the majority has exercised jurisdiction where it has none and assumed the wrong party’s version of the facts. It has also offered dicta that contradicts this Circuit’s precedent and disregards the experienced judgment of jail administrators. Under a correct analysis of this case, we would be presented with the following question: During the relevant time period, did our clearly established precedent interpreting the Fourth Amendment permit arrestees for misdemeanors to be forced to expose their private parts to corrections officers (‘COs’) and inmates without reasonable suspicion? The answer is ‘no.’ Accordingly, the judgment of the district court should be affirmed. . . . If, under plaintiffs’ version of the facts, arrestees for misdemeanors could have protected their private parts from exposure, I would have agreed with the majority that Fourth Amendment interests would not be implicated and violated. But that is not the case before us. Because plaintiffs’ version of the facts indicates a constitutional violation of a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches, we should affirm the district court’s denial of summary judgment.”).

Cox v. City of Rochester, No. 22-CV-6207-FPG, 2025 WL 50340, at *9 (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 8, 2025) (“[T]he Court concludes that Plaintiff has provided sufficient evidence of a violation of a constitutional right. However, the Court also concludes that Officer Vanbrederode is entitled to qualified immunity because the right alleged by Plaintiff was not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. For a right to be clearly established, the ‘contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . It is not necessary to find a ‘case directly on point’ to show that the law governing a plaintiff’s claim is clearly established, but existing precedent must have placed the constitutional right ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Additionally, the right must have been recognized by either the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit. . . . Here, Plaintiff argues that after the Second Circuit’s decision in Carroll v. County of Monroe, it was clearly established that using unreasonable force against a dog is unconstitutional. . . The Court disagrees. In Carroll, the Second Circuit held that the unreasonable killing of a companion animal constitutes an unconstitutional ‘seizure’ of personal property under the Fourth Amendment. . . In its decision, the Second Circuit cited numerous cases from other circuits, which similarly held that killing/destroying a dog could constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . While there does not need to be a ‘case directly on point’ to show that the law governing a plaintiff’s claim is clearly established, there does need to be existing precedent that placed the constitutional right ‘beyond debate.’. As the Second Circuit used the word killing when defining the constitutional violation in Carroll and cited no cases finding an unconstitutional seizure where a dog was wounded or injured but not killed to support its holding, the Court cannot conclude that it is beyond debate that wounding, shooting, or injuring a dog—without killing the dog—constitutes an unconstitutional seizure. . . Neither Carroll nor the cases cited therein delineate the precise circumstances in which the ‘interference’ with the possessory interest in the dog—absent killing the dog—reaches the level of ‘meaningful’ for Fourth Amendment purposes. Therefore, it is unclear whether the ‘interference’ in this case—that the dog is more skittish and less playful than he was prior to the shooting—reaches the level of ‘meaningful’ for Fourth Amendment purposes. Thus, qualified immunity is appropriate. As discussed above, the parties cite only one district court decision in this Circuit that has recognized that the nonfatal wounding of a dog could be an unconstitutional seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . While this Court agrees with the holding in Shimburski, it also acknowledges that there is no Second Circuit or Supreme Court decision recognizing such a right. As such, the Court concludes that the right alleged by Plaintiff was not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct, and therefore, Officer Vanbrederode is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

In re New York City Policing During Summer 2020 Demonstrations, No. 20-CV-8924 (CM)(GWG), 2021 WL 2894764, at *17–18 (S.D.N.Y. July 9, 2021) (“The best explanation I have ever read of the confounding doctrine of qualified immunity is found in the Second Circuit’s opinion in Stephenson v. Doe, 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 2003). There, the Circuit explained that when determining a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds in advance of full merits discovery, the plaintiff’s version of the facts is assumed to be true, ‘without regard to any objection defendants may have to the truth of plaintiff’s version of events.’ See Harris v. City of New York, 222 F. Supp. 3d 341, 348 (S.D.N.Y. 2016) (internal citations omitted). The question to be answered is whether a reasonable government officer, confronted with the facts as alleged by plaintiff, could reasonably have believed that his actions did not violate some settled constitutional right. There are two steps involved in determining qualified immunity. The court must determine whether, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the party asserting the injury, a constitutional infraction was committed. . . If the answer is no, the case is over – not because the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity, but because the defendant did nothing wrong. . . If, however, the answer is yes, the court must decide whether a reasonable official in the defendant’s position (as that position is described by the plaintiff) ought to have known that he was violating the plaintiff’s constitutional rights by doing what the plaintiffs alleges he did. At that point, the operative question becomes whether ‘the unlawfulness of [the official’s] conduct was clearly established at the time.’. Subsequent to Stephenson, the Supreme Court has clarified that a district court confronted with a qualified immunity motion may skip over the first question (was there or was there not a constitutional violation) and answer the question about whether a reasonable official in defendant's position (as that position is described by plaintiff) would have known that his conduct violated the law. . . . In most instances, that turns out to be the easiest way to dispose of a qualified immunity motion – especially when qualified immunity is asserted at the outset of a lawsuit, and ‘the answer to whether there was a violation may depend on a kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed.’. . . The Sow plaintiffs first allege that the Mayor violated their First Amendment rights by ordering a curfew. It is so patently obvious that it was not unconstitutional for the Mayor to issue the curfew orders that it behooves the Court to dismiss this aspect of the Sow complaint because no violation of the plaintiffs' rights has taken place. Disposal of a claim on these grounds is particularly appropriate where (as is so often the case) the moving defendants conflate the two questions in their motion. That is precisely what has happened here. Defendants argue that Mayor de Blasio is shielded from liability with respect to the curfew order by the doctrine of qualified immunity because (1) plaintiffs have not pleaded any violation of a federal right, and (2) there was no clearly established law in June 2020 barring a mayor from imposing a curfew during a pandemic to protect the health and safety of residents. But if the answer to question (1) is that plaintiffs have not pleaded the violation of a federal right, then qualified immunity is irrelevant; the Mayor (and his co-defendants) are entitled to dismissal, not on qualified immunity grounds, but because they have done nothing wrong. That is the case here.”)

Gibbs v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:16-CV-635 (JAM), 2018 WL 4119588, at *1, *4 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2018) (“When I view the video and other evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff (as I am required to do when evaluating a motion for summary judgment), I have to conclude Detective Borona knew that Stukes was no longer armed when he fired the shot that killed him. If plaintiff can prove at trial that Detective Borona knew he was shooting an unarmed man, then plaintiff should be permitted to try to convince the jury that the decision to shoot Stukes was objectively unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and the Court in turn may consider anew in light of the trial evidence and jury findings whether Detective Borona should be entitled to qualified immunity. My ruling today is not a conclusion that Detective Borona violated anyone's rights. Detective Borona was pulled in on the spur of the moment to respond to an explosive situation stemming from Stukes' decision to brandish a rifle in a threatening manner on a public sidewalk. My conclusion for now is solely that the facts surrounding Detective Borona's decision after pursuing Stukes to fire the shot that killed him are disputed enough that it should be for a jury to decide what happened at trial. . . . [A] court has discretion to skip the constitutional question and simply address the application of qualified immunity (i.e., whether any constitutional violation amounted to a violation of clearly established law of which any objectively reasonable officer would have been aware). . . . But I won't do that here. Bryan Stukes is dead. And Detective Borona is accused of a very serious violation of constitutional rights. In such life-and-death cases and where a court's ruling has important expressive value and may offer guidance for future life-and-death cases, a court should ordinarily err in favor of addressing the merits of a constitutional claim rather than simply defaulting to consider qualified immunity.”)

Feb. 5, 2013) (“Since no Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedent exists that clearly establishes a right to traditional Fourth Amendment protections during the type of in-school interview alleged here, the Court concludes that a reasonable official would not have understood that the in-school interview of K.D. could implicate her Fourth Amendment rights. Thus, the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on K.D.’s Fourth Amendment claim. . . Having concluded that the Individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on K.D.’s Fourth Amendment claim, the Court declines to address the constitutionality of Defendants’ conduct.”)

Bock v. Gold, No.1:05-CV-149, 2010 WL 370305, at *2 (D. Vt. Jan. 25, 2010) (“Defendants argue, and the Court agrees, that it is proper to address step two of the qualified immunity inquiry first in this case. The dispositive question is whether it was ‘clearly established’ that Bock had a constitutionally protected liberty interest in his furlough status. Because this question must be answered in the negative, the more cumbersome merits issue—whether a liberty interest actually existed—becomes academic and need not be decided. . . .No federal precedent—Supreme Court, Second Circuit, or otherwise—has clearly established a liberty interest in Vermont’s conditional release system.”).

THIRD CIRCUIT

Rivera-Guadalupe v. City of Harrisburg, 124 F.4th 295, 297, 301-04 (3d Cir. 2024) (“This past year, the Supreme Court held in Chiaverini v. City of Napoleon that ‘the presence of probable cause for one charge does not automatically defeat a Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim alleging the absence of probable cause for another charge.’. . But was that right clearly established when Detective Jacob Pierce, the Appellant in this case, arrested Appellee Jorge Rivera-Guadalupe in 2017? No, we conclude, because although we anticipated the holding of Chiaverini nearly twenty years ago in Johnson v. Knorr, 477 F.3d 75 (3d Cir. 2007), tension between Johnson and Wright v. City of Philadelphia, 409 F.3d 595 (3d Cir. 2005), continued to produce confusion within our circuit that persisted until Chiaverini. Accordingly, we will reverse the District Court’s denial of qualified immunity and remand with instruction to dismiss on that basis. . . .[T]he District Court determined that, under Johnson, the right at issue was clearly established by the time of Rivera-Guadalupe’s prosecution. After explicating the factual and legal distinctions between the cases, the District Court concluded every reasonable officer would have understood at that point that ‘the law has never opened the door for the government to charge someone with a laundry list of crimes simply because they have probable cause for one crime.’ Although we had acknowledged in our en banc opinion in Kossler v. Crisanti, 564 F.3d 181, 193 (3d Cir. 2009) (en banc), that there was ‘considerable tension ... between our treatment of the probable cause element in [Wright]’ and in Johnson, the District Court dismissed ‘the tension between the two [as] merely specious’ and our observation as merely dictum[.]. . . We agree with the District Court’s assessment that Wright and Johnson are ultimately distinguishable. . . But a judge’s ability to discern boundaries between cases in the quietude of chambers does not necessarily translate to what ‘every reasonable official would [have understood]’ in conducting an arrest or prosecution. . . . Rather, the relevant precedent ‘must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’. . . And though we attempted to clarify in Johnson that the ‘any-crime’ rule was applicable to false arrests claims, but not malicious prosecution claims, it did not have that crystallizing effect. . . . In the meantime, other Courts of Appeals came to different conclusions, ultimately necessitating the Supreme Court’s intervention in Chiaverini. . . . Considering the combination of confusion within our own circuit and the other Courts of Appeals, we cannot say that the bounds of the any-crime rule were ‘beyond debate’ when Det. Pierce arrested Rivera-Guadalupe in 2017. The Supreme Court has observed that ‘[i]f judges [themselves] disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’. . . And while not dispositive, ‘a split among the Federal Circuits’—even one that developed only ‘[b]etween the time of the events of this case and [the Supreme Court’s decision resolving it]’—provides additional evidence of ambiguity. . . . Though Chiaverini has now made crystal clear that the any-crime rule does not pertain to malicious prosecution claims, that ambiguity existed in the timeframe relevant here. Because the right that Rivera-Guadalupe seeks to vindicate in his malicious prosecution suit was not clearly established at the relevant time, the District Court erred in denying Det. Pierce qualified immunity. . . . To end what has proven to be a years-long muddle and for the avoidance of doubt in the wake of Chiaverini, we take this opportunity to clarify that the any-crime rule of Wright governs claims for false arrest, whereas Johnson—and now Chiaverini—states the rule for malicious-prosecution claims. Although both claims arise out of the Fourth Amendment’s guarantee against unreasonable seizures, the seizures they concern are different in substance and duration. As the Supreme Court has explained, claims for false arrest challenge ‘detention without legal process,’. . . while malicious prosecution involves seizure ‘pursuant to legal process[.]’. . . And a person arrested may be constitutionally detained without a warrant only for a short period before she must be presented to a neutral magistrate for a determination of probable cause, . . . whereas a person held pursuant to legal process may be subjected to far longer detention, and each charge she faces ‘almost surely will place an additional burden on the defendant[.]’. . . In recognition of these distinct burdens, the majority of our sister circuits to address the question held—even before Chiaverini—that the any-crime rule applies only to false arrest, and not malicious prosecution claims. [citing cases] Though there were some outliers that perceived ‘no principled reason for treating a Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim differently than a Fourth Amendment false-arrest claim,’. . . Chiaverini has now put the debate to rest, once and for all[.] . . . For the foregoing reasons, we will reverse the District Court’s denial of qualified immunity and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.”)

Anderson v. Dohman, No. 23-2603, 2024 WL 3649572, at *3 (3d Cir. Aug. 5, 2024) (per curiam) (not reported) (“At the time of the alleged conduct (primarily alleged to have occurred between 2010 and 2015, with the final alleged conduct occurring in April 2018), neither the Supreme Court nor any federal appellate court had held that a prisoner possesses a constitutional right to refuse to provide information to an internal prison investigation. . . . The District Court decisions were inconsistent, with some concluding that there is no such right, . . . and some ruling that there is such a right (at least in certain circumstances)[.] . . . These scattered District Court opinions are insufficient to clearly establish a right. . . . While the Second Circuit has since concluded that there is a First Amendment right to refuse to serve as an informant, Burns was issued after the events at bar had taken place and thus does not show that Anderson’s rights were clearly established at the relevant time.”)

Anderson v. Dohman, No. 23-2603, 2024 WL 3649572, at *3, *6 (3d Cir. Aug. 5, 2024) (per curiam) (not reported) (Krause, J., concurring) (“I agree with my esteemed colleagues in the majority that, regardless of whether an inmate has a ‘right to refuse to provide information to an internal prison investigation,’ . . . that right was not ‘clearly established’ at the relevant time, so we may affirm on the second prong of the qualified immunity test without reaching the first prong (i.e., the existence of the constitutional right). . . . At the same time, however, the Supreme Court has authorized us to address the two prongs in any order, . . . for good reason. Perpetually failing to recognize a right can prevent it from ever becoming clearly established, . . . and where a district court has erroneously denied the existence of a constitutional right, there is all the more reason to address the existence prong first and set the law straight. Such is the case here. Thus, while I join the majority opinion as far as it goes, I write separately to address the existence of the right and to encourage our Court, as the Second Circuit has done, to engage both prongs of the qualified immunity test and to acknowledge this right when the question is next presented. . . . In sum, I would ‘resolv[e] the . . . more difficult question’ of whether a constitutional right was violated in this case before granting qualified immunity, . . . and, like the Second Circuit, would recognize the existence of a ‘right not to snitch,’ at least absent exigent circumstances, see Burns, 890 F.3d at 88–93. As this right is not yet clearly established, however, I join my colleagues in affirming on that basis.”)

Rivera v. Monko, 37 F.4th 909, 912, 918-23 (3d Cir. 2022) (“The District Court found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the alleged violation, a prisoner had no clearly established right to access legal materials at the trial stage of a civil rights case. Precedent forces us to agree with the District Court: existing Supreme Court and Third Circuit Court of Appeals law had not clearly established a prisoner’s right to access the courts after he or she filed a complaint. Going forward, however, there should be no doubt that such a right exists. The ability of a prisoner to access basic legal materials in a law library, such as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the Federal Rules of Evidence, and the rules of the court in which the prisoner is litigating, does not stop once a prisoner has taken the first step towards the courthouse’s door. Prisoners need to continue to have a right to access the courts after they file their complaints; otherwise, the right is illusory. Under the facts alleged here, the defendants violated this right, even though they may not have been aware at the time that they did so. Thus, while qualified immunity bars Rivera’s claim in this case, it would not bar similarly situated prisoners’ claims in the future. . . . Lieutenant Monko and Sergeant Gilbert argue that ‘properly particularizing . . . the facts of this case, the question is’ whether ‘an inmate who, after his case has been pending for nearly two years, when he is temporarily transferred to another prison closer to the courthouse and placed in segregated housing on the eve of trial, [is entitled to] access to legal materials.’ . . . That is far beyond the level of specificity needed to put the officers on notice of possible unlawful actions. . . . Unlike, for example, certain claims in the Fourth Amendment context, . . . the violation Rivera alleges is clear-cut: he claims that the defendants’ actions deprived him of all access to the legal materials he needed to try his claim. The right to meaningfully access the courts includes a right to ‘the tools ... need[ed] ... in order to challenge the conditions of ... confinement.’ . . . Thus, the right at issue is a prisoner’s right to meaningfully access the courts, through access to a law library, before and during his civil rights trial. . . . We are left with the most difficult question, and the only one the District Court addressed: whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time the defendants allegedly violated it. At the ‘clearly established’ step of the qualified immunity analysis, the question is ‘whether the officer had fair notice that her conduct was unlawful.’ . . . The District Court granted qualified immunity because the parties did not identify ‘controlling authority, or a robust consensus of persuasive authority, holding that an inmate’s right to affirmative assistance in the form of either a law library or legal assistance extends to the trial stage of a civil rights case.’ . . . We agree with the District Court that the right at issue had not been clearly established at the time. A closer look at Supreme Court and our Court’s case law shows that, properly stated, the right the defendants violated was not beyond doubt—although going forward there is no doubt about the right. . . . A two-court circuit split demonstrates that no ‘robust consensus’ exists. Thus, the decisions by other Courts of Appeals does not change our conclusion that no controlling precedent clearly established a prisoner’s right to access the courts at all stages of a civil rights case. Nevertheless, today we recognize that a prisoner has a valid access-to-courts claim when he alleges that the denial of access to legal materials—before and/or during trial—caused a potentially meritorious claim to fail. This aligns us with the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals’ position that Lewis does not confine access-to-courts claims to situations where a prisoner has been unable to file a complaint or appeal. . . . Indeed, it would be perverse if the right to access courts faded away after a prisoner successfully got into court by filing a complaint or petition. Once in court, a prisoner’s need to access legal materials is just as great—if not greater—than when a prisoner initially filed a complaint. Thus, while qualified immunity unfortunately bars Rivera’s claims today, it will not bar such claims in the future.”)

Johnson v. Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 846 F. App’x 123, ___ (3d Cir. 2021) (“The argument for a procedural due process right is even stronger for Johnson, given that he alleges he was held in solitary confinement after both his death sentence and his underlying conviction were vacated. And although Johnson claims he was in solitary confinement for 13 fewer years than Porter, spending 20 years in confinement without hope for relief is equally violative of procedural due process requirements. Defendants attempt to assert the defense of qualified immunity, but we also rejected that argument in Porter, holding that the prisoner’s procedural due process rights had been clearly established since 2017 when we decided Williams. . . . The same conclusion applies here. Accordingly, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Johnson’s procedural due process claim, and we vacate the District Court’s dismissal of that claim. . . . Johnson argues that his decades in solitary confinement were so cruel and unusual as to violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . We agree Johnson stated a viable claim, though we ultimately affirm its dismissal because Defendants have a valid qualified immunity defense. . . . Johnson’s complaint states an Eighth Amendment claim. However, we are also bound by our holding in Porter that the Eighth Amendment right in this context was not clearly established at the time of Porter’s (and Johnson’s) solitary confinement, so the Defendants can assert a qualified immunity defense. . . . Johnson attempts to distinguish Porter by emphasizing that his case was dismissed at the pleading stage, rather than on summary judgment, and argues that a more developed record would help him prove the right was clearly established. This procedural distinction is unavailing, as the facts and law are too similar to Porter. Additional discovery could not overcome the lack of binding, precedential opinions clearly establishing the Eighth Amendment right at issue at the time of Johnson’s solitary confinement. Accordingly, we must affirm the dismissal of Johnson’s Eighth Amendment claim. We emphasize, however, as we did in Porter, that going forward it is well established in our Circuit that solitary confinement of the sort alleged by Johnson and Porter satisfies the second prong of the Eighth Amendment test and supports an Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Bletz v. Corrie, 974 F.3d 306, 310-11 & n.2 (3d Cir. 2020) (“In line with our precedent in Brown and the persuasive rulings of our sister circuits, we hold that the use of deadly force against a household pet is reasonable if the pet poses an imminent threat to the law enforcement officer’s safety, viewed from the perspective of an objectively reasonable officer. . . . In conclusion, Trooper Corrie, while participating in a coordinated effort to serve an arrest warrant on an armed robbery suspect, reasonably used lethal force against a dog who, unrebutted testimony shows, aggressively charged at him, growled, and showed his teeth, as though about to attack. . . . Given our conclusion that the shooting of Ace did not violate the Fourth Amendment, we will not address whether the law was ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity.”)

Porter v. Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corrections, 974 F.3d 431, 437-38, 449-51 (3d Cir. 2020) (“Because we are mindful that ‘it is often appropriate and beneficial to define the scope of a constitutional right’ to ‘promote[] the development of constitutional precedent’ before deciding whether the right was clearly established, we will begin by evaluating whether Defendants have violated Porter’s constitutional rights. . . . Porter first argues that, according to our precedent in Williams, Defendants have violated his procedural due process rights by keeping him in solitary confinement for thirty-three years without any regular, individualized determination that he needs to be in solitary confinement, even though he has been granted a resentencing hearing. We agree. . . . Williams governs Porter’s procedural due process claim. . . . Because Porter’s procedural due process rights have been clearly established since we decided Williams in 2017, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. In Williams, we explicitly stated:

Our holding today that Plaintiffs had a protected liberty interest provides ‘fair and clear warning’ that, despite our ruling against Plaintiffs, qualified immunity will not bar such claims in the future. As we have explained, scientific research and the evolving jurisprudence has made the harms of solitary confinement clear: Mental well-being and one’s sense of self are at risk. We can think of few values more worthy of constitutional protection than these core facets of human dignity.

We were not alone in reaching this conclusion. [collecting cases] There is therefore wide consensus that prolonged and indefinite solitary confinement gives rise to a due process liberty interest for inmates in Porter’s circumstances. These cases gave Defendants ‘fair warning’ that keeping an inmate who has been in solitary confinement for thirty-three years on death row while appeals of his vacatur order proceed violates his procedural due process rights. Defendants therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity as of our decision in Williams. . . .On Porter’s Eighth Amendment claim, however, we reach a different conclusion. Unlike his procedural due process rights, Porter’s Eighth Amendment right has not been clearly established. Porter has correctly pointed out that our Circuit and our sister circuits have held that inmates can bring Eighth Amendment claims based (at least in part) on conditions in solitary confinement. But only one circuit has done so in connection with solitary confinement on death row. Cases that challenge interpretation of death row policy and conditions on death row are distinct from cases brought by inmates in general population subject to solitary confinement. In Williams, for example, we considered whether our decision in Shoats, 213 F.3d 140, was sufficiently similar to the facts and claims raised by the Williams plaintiffs. We decided that, although Shoats is analogous and should have ‘raised concerns’ about whether the treatment of the Williams plaintiffs was constitutional, it was not sufficiently similar because Shoats was not on death row and did not directly dispute the death row isolation policy at issue in Williams. . . . We have not found Eighth Amendment cases with sufficiently similar fact patterns, and the cases that Porter cites in support of his argument are inapposite. . . .The Fourth Circuit has held that solitary confinement conditions on death row violate the Eighth Amendment. Porter v. Clarke, 923 F.3d 348 (4th Cir. 2019). But a single out-of-circuit case is insufficient to clearly establish a right. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Porter’s Eighth Amendment claim. We emphasize, however, that from this point forward, it is well-established in our Circuit that such prolonged solitary confinement satisfies the objective prong of the Eighth Amendment test and may give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim, particularly where, as here, Defendants have failed to provide any meaningful penological justification.”)

Porter v. Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corrections, 974 F.3d 431, 466 (3d Cir. 2020) (Porter, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority holds that qualified immunity is unavailable to Defendants because Porter’s procedural-due-process right was clearly established by Williams. . . I disagree for all of the reasons stated in Part II above. Rather, I believe the majority has created a new procedural-due-process right to be free from solitary confinement notwithstanding an active death sentence. Because that right was not clearly established, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Porter’s procedural due process claim. . . .Assuming for the sake of argument that Porter’s Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishments was violated, I agree that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Richardson v. City of Newark, 820 F. App’x 98, ____ (3d Cir. 2020) (“Because we agree with the District Court’s conclusion on qualified immunity, we do not reach the question of whether Laurie’s conduct actually violated Richardson’s constitutional rights. . . . In essence, Richardson contends that because there is a genuine factual dispute as to whether he was armed and as to whether a reasonable officer would have thought he was fleeing into his home, rather than breaking into a stranger's, a jury could reasonably conclude that he was neither armed, nor dangerous, and only fleeing from Laurie, making this an 'obvious case' under Garner. We disagree. Even if a jury credited Richardson's testimony with respect to the gun, Richardson conceded that he had fled from Laurie and forcefully entered the apartment building before Laurie fired the shot that hit him. Similarly, Richardson agreed that his jacket pocket contained items that would have created a bulge. Finally, while Richardson's subjective intent in attempting to use the second door was apparently to continue fleeing outside the apartment building, he does not contend that a reasonable officer in Laurie's position would have understood that Richardson was attempting to exit the building, as opposed to breaking into a different apartment. Richardson thus fails to contend with Garner's holding that deadly force may be used where an 'officer has probable cause to believe that [a fleeing] suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.' . . . Moreover, the Supreme Court has held that the Fourth Amendment reasonableness inquiry must make 'allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.' . . . The conditions leading to such a decision are the facts as reasonably understood by the police officer when the split-second decision had to be made, not contrary facts as testified to by the plaintiff. Accordingly, this is not an 'obvious case' under Garner, and Richardson cannot rely upon that case to show that Laurie should not be covered by qualified immunity.") Vanderklok v. United States, 774 F. App'x 73 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Vanderklok argues the District Court erred both in determining that his rights were not violated and that the police officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. We need not address Vanderklok's first argument, however, because the District Court properly determined that the police officer defendants were entitled to immunity from this suit. . . . Here, Vanderklok has not brought forward any authority, and we can find none, establishing that probable cause to arrest an individual for disorderly conduct is lacking when that individual has made an angry statement about bombs in an airport's TSA screening area. For that reason alone, Vanderklok's argument against immunity fails. . . . Nonetheless, Vanderklok argues that the District Court erred in finding there was probable cause. He asserts that, for two reasons, it was clearly established that the police officer defendants could not legally arrest him. First, he contends that it is clearly established 'that the statement "anybody can bring a bomb and you wouldn't even know it," when made to a TSA agent at an airport security checkpoint' is a statement protected by the First Amendment. . . . Second, he contends that it is clearly established that a mention of a bomb in an airport security line, without more, 'does not establish[] probable cause for an arrest for disorderly conduct[]' in Pennsylvania. . . . The first of those arguments looks like an effort to move the merits of Vanderklok's First Amendment argument ahead of the qualified immunity defense. But we are focused on the defense, and it requires us to ask not whether Vanderklok had First Amendment rights but whether the law clearly establishes that he had a right to angrily talk about explosives in an airport's security screening area. That is the factual context as Pinkney understood it, and it is the pertinent context for our analysis. . . .As for the second argument – that the mere mention of a bomb in an airport security line does not create probable cause for a disorderly conduct charge under Pennsylvania law – it too is unpersuasive. . . . In this case, the police officer defendants were entitled to infer that Vanderklok’s angrily making a statement about a bomb in a TSA screening area recklessly created an unjustifiable risk of public disturbance. It is common sense, in light of the shared reality of air travel today, that the risk of a public disturbance by angrily talking about explosives is greatly heightened at an airport’s passenger screening area. . . . In light of all the circumstances, the District Court rightly determined that the police officer defendants were entitled to qualified immunity.”) Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 715-20, 722-23 (3d Cir. 2018) (“Because we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the crash that Homanko’s conduct, as alleged in the complaint, could give rise to constitutional liability under the Fourteenth Amendment, we will vacate the District Court’s denial of qualified immunity. We hope, however, to establish the law clearly now. . . .We accordingly define the right at issue here as one not to be injured or killed as a result of a police officer’s reckless pursuit of an individual suspected of a summary traffic offense when there is no pending emergency and when the suspect is not actively fleeing the police. . . . The level of culpability required ‘to shock the contemporary conscience’ falls along a spectrum dictated by the circumstances of each case. . . . Our case law establishes three distinct categories of culpability depending on how much time a police officer has to make a decision. . . . In one category are actions taken in a ‘hyperpressurized environment[.]’. . . They will not be held to shock the conscience unless the officer has ‘an intent to cause harm.’ . . . Next are actions taken within a time frame that allows an officer to engage in ‘hurried deliberation.’ . . . When those actions reveal a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm’ they will be sufficient to shock the conscience. . . . Finally, actions undertaken with ‘unhurried judgments,’ with time for ‘careful deliberation,’ will be held to shock the conscience if they are ‘done with deliberate indifference.’ . . . Our case law is clear that this ‘shocks the conscience’ framework for analysis applies to police-pursuit cases. . . . The District Court rightly interpreted the complaint to allege that Homanko ‘had at least some time to deliberate’ before deciding whether and how to pursue the traffic offender. . . . That places the fact-pattern in the second category of culpability, requiring inferences or allegations of a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm. . . . The liability question thus becomes whether deciding to pursue a potential summary traffic offender at speeds of over 100 miles-per-hour, after radioing for assistance from the neighboring jurisdiction where the potential offender was headed, demonstrates a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm. We have no difficulty in concluding that it does. . . . In sum, Sauers adequately pled that Homanko’s conduct was conscience-shocking under our state-created danger framework. The complaint therefore contains a plausible claim that Homanko violated Sauers’s and his wife’s Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. . . .At the time of the crash in May 2014, the state of the law was such that police officers may have understood they could be exposed to constitutional liability for actions taken during a police pursuit only when they had an intent to harm. Thus, it was not at that time clearly established that Homanko’s actions could violate the substantive due process rights of Sauers and his wife. . . .There is, moreover, an important distinction between assessing whether a plaintiff has pled a ‘clearly established theory of liability’ and the question of whether that theory is fairly applied to a government official in light of the facts in a given case. . . It is only when both the theory of liability and its application to the established facts are sufficiently plain that the legal question of liability is beyond legitimate debate and a plaintiff can defeat a qualified immunity defense. . . In this instance, as discussed above, Sauers’s complaint relies on the clearly established state-created danger theory of liability. The particular factual allegations, meanwhile, involve a police pursuit of a non-fleeing summary traffic offender. Accordingly, to assess whether the right to be free of the risk associated with a non-emergency but reckless police pursuit was clearly established in May 2014, we must ask whether Supreme Court precedent, our own precedent, or a consensus of authority among the courts of appeals placed that right beyond debate. . . . If any uncertainty existed in the law in May 2014 as to whether reckless police driving could give rise to constitutional liability in circumstances such as those alleged here, then we must afford Homanko the protections of qualified immunity. Our survey of the relevant cases reveals that the law was not so clear as to be ‘beyond debate.’ . . An officer on patrol in May 2014 could have reasonably understood, based on prevailing law, that he could pursue a potential traffic offender, even recklessly, without being subjected to constitutional liability. The Supreme Court, in County of Sacramento v. Lewis. . . had adopted an intent-to-harm standard in a police pursuit case involving a high-speed chase of dangerously fleeing suspects. . . . In the years between that decision and the events at issue here, the courts of appeals were inconsistent in whether to apply the intent-to-harm standard in police-pursuit cases only when an exigency necessitated a chase, or whether to apply that standard in all police-pursuit cases, regardless of any exigencies. . . . Lewis, then, clearly established that an officer can be liable for a substantive due process violation resulting from a high-speed pursuit of a dangerously fleeing suspect only if the officer intended to cause harm. But it left open the possibility that a lower level of culpability could suffice in the right circumstances. In May 2014, the courts of appeals had not coalesced around what those circumstances might be in the police-pursuit context. [discussing cases in circuits] Given those decisions by the Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits, we cannot conclude that case law by May of 2014 had clearly established that an officer’s decision to engage in a high speed pursuit of a suspected traffic offender could, in the absence of an intent to harm, give rise to constitutional liability. . . A police officer could have understood that, as long as he believed a pursuit was justified, constitutional liability would not follow based on recklessness alone. Our dissenting colleague disagrees, concluding that it was obvious in May 2014 that Homanko’s conduct violated the Constitution. . . To the dissent, it is of high importance that the Tenth Circuit in Green applied a deliberate difference standard to a police driving case that, as here, involved neither an emergency nor an actively fleeing suspect. But the dissent discounts the fact that no court of appeals (until now) has joined the Tenth Circuit in distinguishing between those police pursuit cases in which a true exigency exists and those in which less is at stake. As we have described above, at least two courts of appeals have explicitly questioned the sort of distinction drawn by the Tenth Circuit. . . We agree with the Tenth Circuit’s application of a culpability standard below that of ‘intent to harm’ in a non-emergency police pursuit case – indeed the entire panel here is in accord on that point. Where we part company with our dissenting colleague is at his rejection of the rest of the Tenth Circuit’s decision. That court acknowledged that the law was not yet clearly established. We accept the accuracy of that assessment then and believe the law as of May 2014 still remained unsettled; our dissenting colleague disagrees. While he evidently views the legal conclusion about constitutional liability as obvious, we do not. Nor can we say that the Tenth Circuit’s decision in Green alone amounts to the “‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority” in the Court of Appeals’ that we have held necessary to clearly establish a right in the absence of controlling precedent. . . . That is especially so in light of the Eighth Circuit’s post-Green decision in Sitzes. . . . Although the state of the law in May 2014 was unsettled as to whether police officers engaged in a police pursuit could be subject to constitutional liability for a level of culpability less than an intent to harm, our opinion today should resolve any ambiguity in that regard within this Circuit. Police officers now have fair warning that their conduct when engaged in a high-speed pursuit will be subject to the full body of our state-created danger case law. That law clearly establishes that the level of culpability required to shock the conscience exists on a spectrum tied to the amount of time a government official has to act. In the police pursuit context, it is also necessary to take into consideration the officer’s justification for engaging in the pursuit. We recognize that most high-speed police pursuits arise when officers are responding to emergencies or when they must make split-second decisions to pursue fleeing suspects. Our holding today does nothing to alter the longstanding principle that, in such cases, constitutional liability cannot exist absent an intent to harm. But when there is no compelling justification for an officer to engage in a high-speed pursuit and an officer has time to consider whether to engage in such inherently risky behavior, constitutional liability can arise when the officer proceeds to operate his vehicle in a manner that demonstrates a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm.”)

Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 724, 729 (3d Cir. 2018) (Vanaskie, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I agree with my colleagues that under our state-created danger framework, the facts alleged by Appellee Michael Sauers readily establish that Officer Homanko’s conduct was conscience-shocking. I also agree that, going forward, [p]olice officers now have fair warning that their conduct when engaged in a high-speed pursuit will be subject to the full body of our state-created danger case law.’. . . I therefore join parts II.A and II.C of the majority’s decision in full. However, because I believe that a reasonable officer in Homanko’s position would have known on May 12, 2014, that the outrageous conduct alleged in this case was unconstitutional, I respectfully dissent from the majority’s finding that Homanko is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The unconstitutional nature of Homanko’s actions, placing at substantial risk those traveling a two-lane, undivided highway in recklessly criminal pursuit of an unsuspecting motorist for a minor traffic infraction, was clearly established when he slammed into the Sauers’ vehicle, mortally injuring Mrs. Sauer and severely injuring her husband. I respectfully dissent.”)

Mann v. Palmerton Area Sch. Dist., 872 F.3d 165, 168, 170-74 (3d Cir. 2017) (“We agree with the District Court’s conclusions pertaining to the claims against the football coach: Walkowiak’s alleged conduct, if proven at trial, would be sufficient to support a jury verdict in favor of Mann on his state-created danger claim, but the right in question—to be free from deliberate exposure to a traumatic brain injury after exhibiting signs of a concussion in the context of a violent contact sport—was not clearly established in 2011. Accordingly, the District Court correctly ruled that Coach Walkowiak was entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In this case, the District Court determined that the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry was satisfied: the Manns had presented sufficient evidence to warrant a jury trial on the question of whether Walkowiak had violated Sheldon’s constitutional rights. It is to this part of the qualified immunity test that we first turn our attention. . . . In summary, we hold that there exists a relationship between a student-athlete and coach at a state-sponsored school such that the coach may be held liable where the coach requires a player, showing signs of a concussion, to continue to be exposed to violent hits. Stated otherwise, we hold that an injured student-athlete participating in a contact sport has a constitutional right to be protected from further harm, and that a state actor violates this right when the injured student-athlete is required to be exposed to a risk of harm by continuing to practice or compete. We now turn to the difficult question of whether this right was clearly established in November of 2011. . . . In this case, the specific context is a football player fully clothed in protective gear, including a helmet, who experiences a violent blow, shows signs of a concussion, and is required to continue to engage in the same activity that caused the first substantial hit. We are aware of no appellate case decided prior to November of 2011 that held that a coach violates the student’s constitutional rights by requiring the student to continue to play in these circumstances. . . . No case has been called to our attention where a state-created danger was established after a student-athlete was required to continue to compete after sustaining a substantial hit, the results of which were observed by the coach and could potentially signal a head injury, yet where the student-athlete told the coach that he was fine to continue to play, all of which is the evidence in this case. And while not binding, we similarly held as recently as 2013 in a non-precedential opinion that a cheerleader who suffered a serious injury due to a coach’s decision to try out a new stunt without proper protective matting in place, did not violate a clearly established right held by the athlete. . . . Here, no case from this Court or any of our sister Courts of Appeals, let alone a Supreme Court case, has applied the principles we elucidated in L.R. and Kneipp to the school athletic context. We therefore agree with the District Court that the right at issue here was not clearly established in November of 2011. ‘When properly applied, [qualified immunity] protects “all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.”’. . . Given the state of the law in 2011, it cannot be said that Walkowiak was ‘plainly incompetent’ in sending Sheldon in to continue to practice after he saw Sheldon rolling his shoulder and being told by Sheldon, ‘I’m fine.’. . . Nor is there any basis for concluding that he knowingly violated Sheldon’s constitutional rights. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court’s qualified immunity ruling.”) Mirabella v. Villard, 853 F.3d 641, 649, 653, 657 (3d Cir. 2017) (“In the Mirabellas’ case, we exercise our discretion to follow the two-step sequence. We do so in order to guide local officials in safeguarding the First Amendment rights of constituents in challenging circumstances: when the government’s constituents are also litigation adversaries. . . . The Mirabellas allege—in the first of two claims on appeal—that local officials Walsh and McDonnell retaliated against them for the exercise of their First Amendment rights. We conclude that the Mirabellas have pled a retaliation claim based upon Walsh’s ‘no contact’ email, but not Walsh and McDonnell’s threat that they would move for litigation sanctions. As to the second prong of qualified immunity, we conclude that the right was not clearly established. . . . Reichle is directly applicable to the Mirabellas' retaliation claim. As in Reichle, the disputed issue here is whether it was clearly established that the defendant's act was retaliatory. . . . Paralleling Reichle, we define the right at issue as the right to be free from a retaliatory restriction on communication with one's government, when the plaintiff has threatened or engaged in litigation against the government. This right was not clearly established when Walsh sent the 'no contact' email. The Mirabellas have identified neither Supreme Court precedent nor a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.' . . . The closest case we have identified, Tuccio, held that the refusal of town officials to meet with a litigation adversary did not amount to First Amendment retaliation. . . . Thus, Walsh is entitled to qualified immunity on the Mirabellas' First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . The Mirabellas also assert a direct violation of their First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances, again based upon Walsh's 'no contact' email. We conclude that the Mirabellas have pled a constitutional violation, but that the right was not clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . . For the reasons above, the Mirabellas have alleged a violation of their First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances. Under the second prong of qualified immunity, however, we conclude that the right was not clearly established. As stated above, we must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . . We therefore define the First Amendment right at issue as the right to be free from a restriction on communicating with one's government, when the plaintiff has threatened or engaged in litigation against the government. This right was not clearly established. While other cases have held that there is a clearly established right to petition a local government, those cases did not involve litigation. For example, the Sixth Circuit has held that there is a clearly established right 'to petition a local, elected representative for assistance in dealing with local government agencies.' . . . Similarly, the Tenth Circuit has held that there is a clearly established right to petition a local government regarding a tax assessment. . . . These cases, while persuasive, do not establish that 'every reasonable official' in Walsh's position would have understood that his 'no contact' email violated the Mirabellas' First Amendment rights. . . . Thus, Walsh is entitled to qualified immunity on the Mirabellas' Petition Clause claim.")

Thompson v. Howard, 679 F. App'x 177, at *180-81 & n.8, 184 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Here, we exercise that discretion to affirm on the basis of the second part of the qualified immunity test, without deciding whether Howard's actions did in fact violate Thompson's constitutional rights. This is a case 'in which the constitutional question is so factbound that [a] decision provides little guidance for future cases,' Pearson, 555 U.S. at 237, at least as to the constitutionality of the police conduct. Because answering the first question will be of relatively little value, the doctrine of constitutional avoidance leads us to decide the case by asking whether the right was clearly established. . . . Thus, we only address whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer at the time of the incident that shooting at a person fleeing in a vehicle, with the gas pedal pressed 'all the way to the floor,' after striking an occupied police vehicle was an excessive use of force. . . . It is beyond dispute that, by the time Howard began shooting, Thompson had already demonstrated a reckless disregard for the safety of others by crashing into Mehalik's police car as Mehalik was getting out of it. Thompson then compounded that recklessness by blindly fleeing with the gas pedal 'all the way to the floor,' driving over sidewalks and lawns in a residential neighborhood. . . Thus, regardless of whether Thompson was at that moment driving towards or away from the officers, it was not objectively unreasonable for Howard, when confronted with Thompson’s dangerous, chaotic, high-speed flight, to believe that Thompson posed a serious risk to persons who might be in the area and to resort to deadly force to prevent such persons from being injured. . . . Because Thompson, on appeal, has cabined his claim of excessive use of force to the shooting, we do not have occasion to consider whether a claim based on the force used by Howard earlier in the encounter or the course of Howard’s conduct viewed as a whole would vitiate qualified immunity. Thompson’s allegations regarding Howard’s lack of self-control and use of racial epithets and death threats are obviously repugnant, and while we recently held in Johnson v. City of Philadelphia, 837 F.3d 343 (3d Cir. 2016), that a superseding cause may limit an officer’s liability even where a police officer has arguably acted unreasonably, . . . we did not rule out the possibility that egregious conduct rising to the level of deliberate provocation may be sufficient to undermine immunity. . . Given that the use of force claim here was limited by Thompson to the shooting, we need not decide whether Howard’s earlier conduct eliminated the protection afforded by qualified immunity. . . . In conclusion, we again emphasize the narrow scope of our holding. We do not say that Howard was right to have fired at Thompson, or that Howard’s earlier actions were justifiable. Instead, we simply conclude that, in light of precedent such as Mullenix and Brosseau, it is not beyond debate that a reasonable officer in Howard’s shoes could have thought the use of deadly force was lawful. Accordingly, we cannot say that it was clearly established that Howard’s decision to fire at Thompson involved excessive force. Qualified immunity applies in exactly such circumstances.”)

Williams v. Secretary Pennsylvania DOC, 848 F.3d 549, 552, 557-59, 570-76 (3d Cir. 2017), cert. denied sub nom. Walker v. Farnan, 138 S. Ct. 357 (2017), and cert. denied sub nom. Williams v. Wetzel, 138 S. Ct. 357 (2017) (“We are asked to decide whether there is a constitutionally protected liberty interest that prohibits the State from continuing to house inmates in solitary confinement on death row after they have been granted resentencing hearings, without meaningful review of the continuing placement. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that there is and that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment therefore limits the State’s ability to subject an inmate to the deprivations of death row once the death sentence initially relied upon to justify such extreme restrictions is no longer operative. However, we also hold that, because this principle was not clearly established before today, the prison officials (“Defendants”) in this consolidated appeal are entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, we will affirm the district courts’ grants of summary judgment in favor of Defendants based on qualified immunity. In reaching this conclusion, we stress that this liberty interest, as explained more fully below, is now clearly established. . . . As the Supreme Court made clear in Pearson v. Callahan, courts are no longer required to tackle these steps in sequential order. The decisions now on appeal represent both possible approaches. The district court that decided Williams’s case found that his constitutional rights had not been violated, albeit not in the context of a qualified immunity analysis. The district court in Walker’s case discussed only the second prong, concluding that because the right Walker alleged was not clearly established, Defendants were entitled to summary judgment based on qualified immunity. Despite relaxing the ‘rigid order of battle’ that formerly governed the analysis of qualified immunity, in Pearson, the Court nonetheless recognized that it is often appropriate and beneficial to define the scope of a constitutional right. . . The analytical approach is thus left to appellate courts to resolve in the context of the individual case, and the constitutional question, before it. ‘Because we believe this case will clarify and elaborate upon our prior jurisprudence in important and necessary ways,’ we exercise our discretion under Pearson to reach the qualified immunity steps in sequence. Accordingly, we will first determine whether Plaintiffs’ rights were violated and then decide if Defendants should have qualified immunity from suit. We adopt this approach for several reasons, not the least of which is the salience of the underlying questions to the ongoing societal debate about solitary confinement. But at a more basic level, lawsuits by prisoners, whether about conditions of confinement or other aspects of incarceration, are frequently—and, we stress, not inappropriately—met with qualified immunity defenses from defendants. Thus, defining rights when given the opportunity to do so not only inures to the benefit of potential plaintiffs, it also informs prison personnel and others about what is appropriate. Those responsible for discharging the difficult responsibility of administering our nation’s prisons deserve clear statements about what the law allows. . . . For the reasons we have discussed, we now hold that Plaintiffs had a due process liberty interest in avoiding the extreme sensory deprivation and isolation endemic in confinement on death row after their death sentences had been vacated. However, as we explain below, we must nevertheless affirm the district courts’ grants of summary judgment in favor of Defendants because we conclude that they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here, although the precedent that existed when Defendants continued Plaintiffs’ confinement on death row should have suggested caution, it was not sufficient to inform Defendants that their conduct violated clearly established law. In arguing to the contrary, Plaintiffs cite Shoats for the proposition that an inmate’s due process right to avoid solitary confinement was clearly established. We agree that the interest in avoiding extreme seclusion in Shoats is analogous to Plaintiffs’ liberty interest even though Shoats did not involve confinement on death row. As we have already explained, the conditions of confinement in Shoats—indefiniteness and extreme seclusion—closely mirror those Plaintiffs suffered. Thus, Shoats is consistent with, and does support, Plaintiffs’ claim that they had a protected liberty interest. However, we are not prepared to conclude that Shoats was sufficient to clearly establish Plaintiffs’ due process interest in avoiding confinement on death row. Shoats was not the only relevant law in existence during Plaintiffs’ confinement after their sentences had been vacated. Section 4303 and its implementing policy setting forth the conditions for release from death row also bear on whether Plaintiffs’ due process rights were clearly established. Plaintiffs do not contest the legality of the statute or policy themselves. Rather, Plaintiffs concede that despite Shoats, the policy gave Defendants reason to believe their actions were lawful: ‘Admittedly, whether Appellants’ rights were “clearly established” at the time of the violation is a difficult question. Prison officials were following a prison policy that required that Appellants remain on death row until they were resentenced.’ . . . In recognizing the validity of Defendants’ interpretation of the policy, we do not suggest that the profound liberty concerns raised by Plaintiffs’ continued confinement on death row can be overcome by a carefully worded prison policy. State policy cannot undermine a constitutional interest. Rather, Defendants’ policy is only relevant to our qualified immunity analysis because the case law in existence during Plaintiffs’ continued confinement on death row did not adequately inform Defendants that the policy ran counter to Plaintiffs' protected liberty interests. Indeed, the limited precedent that existed on the topic suggested the contrary. . . . Clark, as well as the district court that decided Williams's claim, read the policy and underlying statute the same way Defendants did. They concluded that these mandates required inmates' continued confinement on death row despite the fact that their death sentences had been vacated. In Clark, the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania described the policy as establishing that '[a]n inmate successful in having his capital punishment replaced by another sentence is eligible to be discharged from custody [on death row].' Although, as we have just noted, Shoats should have raised concerns and counseled caution, Shoats does not directly dispute Clark or Defendants' interpretation of the policy because Shoats was not on death row. Thus, the DOC death row policy was simply not at issue there. We therefore cannot say Defendants' actions here were 'plainly incompetent' or a 'knowing [] violat[ion of] the law.' Accordingly, we will affirm the district courts' grants of summary judgment based on qualified immunity in favor of all Defendants and against both Plaintiffs. We realize that the court that decided Williams's case incorrectly concluded that Williams did not have a protected liberty interest and therefore did not reach the question of qualified immunity. However, '[w]e may affirm a judgment on any ground apparent from the record, even if the district court did not reach it.' Our qualified immunity analysis applies equally to Walker and Williams. . . . Given the scientific consensus, it should come as no surprise that courts have recently started recognizing inmates' due process right to avoid solitary confinement as clearly established. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit's decision in Wilkerson v. Goodwin is illustrative. There, the record showed that the inmate had been confined to his cell for approximately twenty-three hours a day for nearly forty years, and his rights to visitation, personal property, and exercise had been severely curtailed. Recognizing the clear threat to liberty such conditions pose, the court denied the prison officials' assertion of qualified immunity: 'Viewed collectively, there can be no doubt that these conditions are sufficiently severe to give rise to a liberty interest under Sandin. This is particularly true in light of the district court's finding that [the inmate's] solitary confinement at Wade is effectively indefinite.' Speaking in nearly identical terms, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that '[w]hatever confusion Sandin may have left in its wake, defendants do not argue, nor could a credible argument be made, that it was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violations that ... ten years of solitary confinement[] triggered due process protection.' The Courts of Appeals for the Fourth and Sixth Circuits have also recognized the constitutional implications of solitary confinement. [Discussing Incumaa v. Stirling and Prieto v. Clarke and recent decision by the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, Johnson v. Wetzel] In our ruling today, we now explicitly add our jurisprudential voice to this growing chorus. In doing so, we rely, in part, upon the scientific consensus and the recent precedent involving non-death row solitary confinement. Those decisions advance our inquiry into the unique, yet analogous, scenario presented here. Inmates in solitary confinement on death row without active death sentences face the perils of extreme isolation and are at risk of erroneous deprivation of their liberty. Accordingly, they have a clearly established due process right under the Fourteenth Amendment to avoid unnecessary and unexamined solitary confinement on death row. The State must therefore afford these inmates procedural protections that ensure that continuing this level of deprivation is required for penological purposes, and is not reflexively imposed without individualized justification. . . . Our holding today that Plaintiffs had a protected liberty interest provides ‘fair and clear warning’ that, despite our ruling against Plaintiffs, qualified immunity will not bar such claims in the future. As we have explained, scientific research and the evolving jurisprudence has made the harms of solitary confinement clear: Mental well-being and one’s sense of self are at risk. We can think of few values more worthy of constitutional protection than these core facets of human dignity. Accordingly, we accept Plaintiffs’ request that ‘[t]his Court ... make clear what prison officials should have already known: those no longer subject to the death penalty ... have a due process right to be free from indefinite conditions of solitary confinement.’. . . It is important to emphasize that this right to procedural due process protections is neither abstract nor symbolic, but both meaningful and required. In Shoats, upon finding a protected liberty interest in avoiding solitary confinement, we described what we considered to be adequate procedural protections. There, we granted summary judgment to the prison official defendants only because the procedures provided were sufficient to protect Shoats from being improperly held in solitary confinement. We noted that under the applicable DOC policy, ‘an inmate must receive written notice of the reason for his placement in administrative custody and he is entitled to receive a hearing before a PRC within six days of the initial transfer to administrative custody.’ Most importantly for our purposes, ‘[e]very thirty days thereafter, inmates ... have the opportunity to be personally interviewed by the PRC, which then determines whether the inmate should continue to be maintained in administrative custody.’ That determination takes into account ‘a variety of factors including the safety of other inmates and staff [and] the continued public or institutional risk.’ According to the DOC procedures as set forth in the record before us in this case, the PRC’s decision may be based on evidence such as ‘counselor’s reports [and] Psychiatric/Psychological information.’. . . We see no justification consistent with these Plaintiffs’ constitutionally protected liberty interests for subjecting them to the deprivations of being housed on death row after their death sentences were vacated with any less procedural protections than we held were adequate in Shoats. The review that we found adequate in Shoats is not an inconvenient ritual intended to shelter officials from liability so that they may mechanically continue an inmate’s confinement on death row after a sentence of death has been vacated without fear of sanction. Rather, such inmates have a right to regular and meaningful review of their continued placement on death row. In conjunction with periodic review, to ensure the review is meaningful, this process must include a statement of reasons for the continued placement on death row. Inmates must also have a meaningful opportunity to respond to the reasons provided. These procedures would be of little value absent the attendant right of a hearing. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we will affirm the district courts’ orders granting summary judgment in favor of Defendants based on qualified immunity. We also hold that it is now clearly established that inmates on death row whose death sentences have been vacated have a due process right to avoid continued placement in solitary confinement on death row, absent the kind of meaningful protections discussed herein.”) [footnotes omitted]

Brantley v. Wysocki, 662 F. App’x 138, 141-42 (3d Cir. 2016) (“Brantley also raises a claim of retaliatory prosecution in violation of her First Amendment right to free speech. The District Court granted summary judgment for Wysocki on qualified immunity grounds. The District Court found that there was a constitutional violation, but that the right was not clearly established. We will affirm on alternative grounds, finding no constitutional violation and not reaching the question whether the right was clearly established. In its analysis, the District Court did not address the Hartman requirement that Brantley prove the absence of probable cause. Rather, the District Court concluded that a jury could find causation based upon the ‘temporal proximity’ between Brantley’s ‘protests’ regarding union policy and her criminal prosecution. . . We exercise our discretion to apply Hartman for the first time on appeal. . . We turn then to the ultimate issue—whether Brantley has proven for summary judgment purposes that Wysocki arrested her without probable cause. [Court concludes there was probable cause]”).

Zaloga v. Borough of Moosic, 841 F.3d 170, 174-77 (3d Cir. 2016) (“Here, the District Court erred in its consideration of the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We therefore do not need to decide whether Mercatili’s actions could have violated Zaloga’s constitutional rights, and we decline to do so. Discussing the constitutionality of Mercatili’s actions would require us to grapple with the tension between his First Amendment right to speak and Zaloga’s right to be free of government retaliation. Because the law does not clearly address how to harmonize those competing interests, the second Saucier prong is not met and any analysis addressing the first prong would ‘be an essentially academic exercise.’. . The doctrine of constitutional avoidance counsels against unnecessarily wading into such muddy terrain. . . We thus move directly to an explanation of our conclusion with respect to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Especially in light of Reichle, it is not sufficient to conclude, as the District Court did in this case, that the second Saucier prong is satisfied because there is a well-known ‘right against government retaliation for exercising one[’s right to [free] speech ... ’. . . That put the question of whether the ‘clearly established’ standard had been met at much too high a level of abstraction. Instead, we must attend to context; we need to ‘consider the state of the existing law at the time of the alleged violation and the circumstances confronting [Mercatili] to determine whether a reasonable state actor could have believed his conduct was lawful.’. . Our opinion in McLaughlin v. Watson, 271 F.3d 566 (3d Cir. 2001) – which is the most analogous precedent with respect to Mercatili’s alleged actions –effectively precludes Zaloga and Correctional Care from arguing that Mercatili’s actions violated clearly established law. The plaintiffs in McLaughlin were agents of the Pennsylvania Attorney General’s office who alleged (among other things) that the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania had ‘acted administratively to influence the Pennsylvania Attorney General to take adverse employment-related action against them.’. . Assuming arguendo that those allegations could constitute a First Amendment retaliation claim, . . . we nevertheless concluded that they did not establish the violation of a clearly established right, explaining our reasoning, in part, as follows:

When a public official is sued for allegedly causing a third party to take some type of adverse action against plaintiff’s speech, we have held that defendant’s conduct must be of a particularly virulent character. It is not enough that defendant speaks critically of plaintiff or even that defendant directly urges or influences the third party to take adverse action. Rather, defendant must ‘threaten’ or ‘coerce’ the third party to act.

. . . We ordered dismissal of the case on the basis of qualified immunity. . . McLaughlin thus suggests that a government official like Mercatili would not necessarily understand that mere political pushback could be unlawful. . . The present case. . . does not appear to involve coercion. Unlike the defendant's threats in R.C. Maxwell, Mercatili's efforts to pressure members of the Prison Board were not even coercive enough to achieve their desired effect. By Zaloga's own admission, none of the Board members complied with Mercatili's wishes by voting against renewal of the Borough's contract with Correctional Care. . . [E]ven if we were to characterize Mercatili's alleged statements to Prison Board members as a 'threat' to withdraw political support, there is ample room to debate whether a reasonable official would have known that such threats, without any evident coercive power, were constitutionally out of bounds. . . Finally, it has never been established that a governmental official who does not himself retaliate but instead pressures another individual to retaliate—which is the position Mercatili is in—can be held personally liable. At least one of our sister circuits has held that there is no liability in such circumstances, see Beattie v. Madison Cty. Sch. Dist., 254 F.3d 595, 601 (5th Cir. 2001) (observing that government officials "cannot be liable independently if they did not make the final decision"), and another has noted that this remains an unsettled question of law, see Trant v. Oklahoma, 754 F.3d 1158, 1170 n.5 (10th Cir. 2014) (observing that the Fifth Circuit has held that "only final decisionmakers may be liable" and noting that this is an unsettled question in the Tenth Circuit). We conclude that legal precedent leaves space for good faith disagreement about the constitutionality of Mercatili's alleged actions. Under the high standard for 'clearly established' law, that is enough to defeat the Plaintiffs' challenge to qualified immunity.")

Mack v. Warden Loretto FCI, 839 F.3d 286, 291, 296-301 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Mack's allegations raise several issues of first impression in our Circuit, including (1) whether an inmate's oral grievance to prison officials can constitute protected activity under the Constitution; (2) whether RFRA prohibits individual conduct that substantially burdens religious exercise; and (3) whether RFRA provides for monetary relief from an official sued in his individual capacity. We answer all three questions in the affirmative, and therefore conclude that Mack has sufficiently pled a First Amendment retaliation claim and a RFRA claim. We agree, however, that Mack's First Amendment Free Exercise claim and Fifth Amendment equal protection claim must be dismissed. . . . Mack clearly alerted prison officials to his principal allegation—i.e., that he was removed from his commissary position for a pretextual reason. Even if Mack did not detail his allegedly protected speech, his grievance nonetheless notified officials that he believed he was unlawfully terminated from his work assignment as retaliation for exercising his First Amendment rights. Exhaustion merely requires 'inmates [to] provide enough information about the conduct of which they complain to allow prison officials to take appropriate responsive measures.' . . . Given this fairly lenient standard, and with no specific guidance from BOP grievance procedures, we conclude that Mack exhausted his administrative remedies before bringing his First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . Although the Supreme Court has never formally extended Bivens to First Amendment claims, . . . it seems to have occasionally assumed that First Amendment retaliation claims can proceed under Bivens. . . Our Court, however, has explicitly recognized a Bivens action when a prisoner has been retaliated against for exercising his or her First Amendment right to petition. In Paton v. La Prade, . . . we held that a Bivens action may be implied directly from the First Amendment. . . . The Petition Clause embraces a broad range of communications, and the availability of its protections has never turned on a perceived distinction between written and oral speech. . . . Both the Free Speech Clause and the Petition Clause protect ‘personal expression’—both expression generally and expression directed towards the government for the specific purpose of asking it to right a wrong. . . . While we appreciate the Government’s concerns, we are not persuaded that an oral grievance should not receive constitutional protection solely because it is lodged by a prisoner as opposed to a civilian. It is well-established that inmates do not relinquish their First Amendment right to petition by virtue of being incarcerated. . . . It is also true, as the Government emphasizes, that an inmate only ‘retains those First Amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system.’ . . . But under the facts alleged, there is no reason for us to think that the First Amendment rights Mack seeks to vindicate here are incompatible with his status as a prisoner. . . . To our knowledge, only one other circuit has addressed this specific issue. In Pearson v. Welborn, . . . the Seventh Circuit held that an inmate’s oral complaints to prison guards about the use of shackles in group therapy and the denial of yard time were constitutionally protected under the Petition Clause. . . . The court explained that ‘[n]othing in the First Amendment itself suggests that the right to petition for redress of grievances only attaches when the petitioning takes a specific form.’ . . . And while ‘certain types of “petitioning” would be obviously inconsistent with imprisonment (marches or group protests, for example),’ . . . the inmate’s oral complaints in that case did not fall into that category. We find the Seventh Circuit’s rationale to readily apply to the circumstances of this case. . . . For these reasons, we conclude that Mack’s oral grievance to Stephens regarding the anti-Muslim harassment he endured at work constitutes protected activity under the First Amendment. . . . The remaining question we must answer with respect to Mack’s First Amendment retaliation claim is whether Roberts, Venslosky, and Stephens are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . We have long recognized that prisoners have a right to be free from retaliation for exercising their First Amendment right to petition. Indeed, ‘[r]etaliating against a prisoner for the exercise of [any of] his constitutional rights is unconstitutional.’ . . . Retaliatory termination is clearly unlawful, both inside and outside the prison context. . . . The fact that the officers retaliated against Mack before he reduced his grievance to writing is inconsequential. While we have never held before today that a prisoner’s oral grievance, in particular, is constitutionally protected, we have certainly never suggested that such a grievance is entitled to lower protection than one reduced to writing. And there are myriad cases outside the prison context that make no distinction between oral and written grievances. . . . Thus we have little doubt concluding that prisoners’ oral grievances are indeed entitled to constitutional protection. A reasonable official in the prison officers’ position should therefore have known that retaliating against Mack for exercising his right to petition, whether in the form of an oral or written grievance, was unlawful. . . . This is especially so if the prison actually encourages its inmates to communicate their concerns orally. Because we conclude that Mack has sufficiently stated a First Amendment retaliation claim, and that the remaining defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity, we will vacate the District Court’s dismissal of this claim and remand to the District Court for further proceedings.”)

Mack v. Warden Loretto FCI, 839 F.3d 286, 306-07 (3d Cir. 2016) (Roth, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I respectfully dissent from the holding of the majority in Part II A of its opinion that Mack has stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against defendants Roberts and Venslosky. I believe that, with regard to a retaliation claim made by the inmate of a prison, oral complaints should not be considered protected conduct under the First Amendment. Oral complaints, unlike written grievances, do not create a record. In fact, oral complaints may generate uncertainty about the content, or even the existence, of the grievance. In addition, a written complaint better provides notice to prison officials about the nature of the grievance and the individuals implicated in it. . . This written notice is important because, in the prison setting, inmates constantly interact with multiple prison officials, and ‘virtually any adverse action taken against a prisoner by a prison official—even those otherwise not rising to the level of a constitutional violation—can be characterized as a constitutionally proscribed retaliatory act.’”)

Spady v. Bethlehem Area Sch. Dist., 800 F.3d 633, 638-40 (3d Cir. 2015) (“Pearson recognized, however, that there are instances where a case is most easily resolved by addressing whether the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . We conclude this is such a case and will address the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis at the outset. . . In this case, the specific context is a student who experiences a brief submersion under water, exits the pool and complains of chest pain, is ordered to return to the pool after a several-minute respite, then stays in the shallow end of the pool for the remainder of the class, and does not exhibit signs of serious distress until more than one hour later. The specific constitutional right under the Due Process Clause in this context is the right to affirmative intervention by the state actor to minimize the risk of secondary or dry drowning. And, for qualified immunity purposes, the question is whether the law in this context was so well-established that it would have been apparent to a reasonable gym teacher that failure to take action to assess a non-apparent condition that placed the student in mortal danger violated that student’s constitutional right under the state-created-danger theory of liability. . . . The case law simply did not inform a reasonable gym teacher that the failure to assess a student who briefly goes under water for the possibility of dry drowning violated that student’s constitutional right to bodily integrity free from unwarranted intrusions by the state.”) [See also Dorley v. S. Fayette Twp. Sch. Dist., No. 2:15-CV-00214, 2016 WL 3102227, at *5-6 (W.D. Pa. June 1, 2016), infra]

Werkheiser v. Pocono Twp., 780 F.3d 172, 176-81, 183 (3d Cir. 2015) (“Because we do not believe the right at issue here was clearly established, we begin with the second step. . . . We. . . conclude that Werkheiser’s First Amendment rights, as an elected official, were not sufficiently defined as to warrant denying Appellants qualified immunity. . . We pause here to emphasize that we do not today decide whether Garcetti is applicable to elected officials’ speech or not. Rather, we conclude only that the law was not clearly established on this point. . . . Many of the reasons for restrictions on employee speech appear to apply with much less force in the context of elected officials. . . . While there may be sound reasons to assert that Garcetti does not apply to elected officials’ speech, we cannot accept the District Court’s inherent conclusion that it is ‘beyond debate’ that this was clearly established law at the time of Werkheiser’s non-appointment. . . In this regard, we note the unsettled nature of the law amongst both the circuit courts and the district courts. . . . Although the Supreme Court has noted that qualified immunity is not the guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law, we find that the well-reasoned decisions on both sides render the law sufficiently unclear at the time of Appellants’ actions so as to shield them from liability. . . . Against this legal backdrop, and under these circumstances, it is not beyond debate that a reasonable official in Appellants’ position would have understood that retaliating against Werkheiser by denying him reappointment would violate his constitutional rights. As a result, Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Dougherty v. Sch. Dist. of Philadelphia, 772 F.3d 979, 986, 988-90, 993(3d Cir. 2014) (“The qualified immunity analysis is a two-step process, which a court may address in either order according to its discretion. . . Here, we first decide whether the facts, taken in the light most favorable to Dougherty, establish that the Appellants’ conduct ‘violated a constitutional right.’ . . . Second, we determine whether that right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . Applying Garcetti’s test to the facts the District Court identified in the light most favorable to Dougherty, we agree that Dougherty did not speak ‘pursuant to his official duties’ when he disclosed details of Dr. Ackerman’s alleged misconduct in awarding the prime contract to IBS. The District Court found no evidence that Dougherty’s communication with The Philadelphia Inquirer fell within the scope of his routine job responsibilities at the School District. Unlike the employees in Garcetti, Foraker, and Gorum, ‘nothing about Dougherty’s position compelled or called for him to provide or report this information,’ whether to the School District, the press, or any other source. . . To the contrary, the School District appears to discourage such speech through its Code of Ethics’ confidentiality provision, which is being used to justify Dougherty’s termination in the instant case. Dougherty’s report to The Philadelphia Inquirer, therefore, was made as a citizen for First Amendment purposes and should not be foreclosed from constitutional protection. . . . [T]aking this opportunity to respond to the parties’ differing interpretations of the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Lane, we conclude that Lane reinforces Garcetti’s holding that a public employee may speak as a citizen even if his speech involves the subject matter of his employment. . . . Under Lane, our determination stands that Dougherty’s report to The Philadelphia Inquirer was not made pursuant to his official job duties. Dougherty’s claim is not foreclosed merely because the subject matter of the speech concerns or relates to those duties. . . . Viewing the facts the District Court identified in the light most favorable to Dougherty, we find that the illegality of the Appellants’ actions was sufficiently clear in the situation they confronted. Since at least 1967, ‘it has been settled that a State cannot condition public employment on a basis that infringes the employee’s constitutionally protected interest in freedom of expression.’ . . In the case at bar, Dougherty’s particular type of speech—made as a concerned citizen, purporting to expose the malfeasance of a government official with whom he has no close working relationship—is exactly the type of speech deserving protection under the Pickering and Garcetti rules of decision and our subsequent case law.”)

George v. Rehiel, 738 F.3d 562, 577-80, 584 (3d Cir. 2013) (“We believe that the conduct of the TSA Officials here was . . . consistent with Fourth Amendment limitations. It is not disputed that the initial airport screening to which George was subjected by the TSA Officials was a constitutionally permissible administrative search under the Fourth Amendment, even though it was initiated without individualized suspicion and was conducted without a warrant. It was not until after the TSA Officials discovered that he was carrying some handwritten Arabic–English flashcards containing such words as ‘bomb,’ ‘terrorist,’ ‘explosion,’ ‘an attack,’ ‘battle,’ ‘to kill,’ ‘to target,’ ‘to kidnap,’ and ‘to wound,’ that George was taken by John Does 1 and 2 to another screening area where he was eventually questioned by Jane Doe 3. However, at that point, the Officials had a justifiable suspicion that permitted further investigation as long as the brief detention required to conduct that investigation was reasonable. . . We caution, however, that the detention at the hands of these TSA Officials is at the outer boundary of the Fourth Amendment. Once TSA Officials were satisfied that George was not armed or carrying explosives, much of the concern that justified his detention dissipated. However, it did not totally vanish or suggest that further inquiry was not warranted. Suspicion remained, and that suspicion was objectively reasonable given the realities and perils of air passenger safety. The TSA Officials still were confronted with an individual who was carrying Arabic–English flashcards bearing such words as: ‘bomb,’ ‘terrorist,’ ‘to kill,’ etc. In a world where air passenger safety must contend with such nuanced threats as attempts to convert underwear into bombs and shoes into incendiary devices, we think that the brief detention that followed the initial administrative search of George was reasonable. . . . Thus, we cannot say that it was unreasonable for John Does 1 and 2 to briefly continue George’s seizure to consult with a supervisor. As noted above, 15 minutes after the supervisor (Jane Doe 3) arrived, and while she was in mid-sentence of a conversation with George, Officer Rehiel of the Philadelphia Police Department arrived, placed George in handcuffs and took him away. At that point, the rather brief detention that arose from the initial administrative search ended. As we explain below, despite George’s failed attempt at establishing an agency relationship, none of the TSA Officials played any further role in the protracted seizure that followed. . . . For all of the above reasons, we find that George has failed to allege facts showing that the TSA Screening Officials—John Does 1 and 2 and Jane Doe 3—violated his Fourth Amendment rights. We therefore need not proceed to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis to determine whether that right was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . [W]e reject George’s contention that the TSA Screening Officials are liable for what he alleges was his unconstitutional arrest and detention by the Philadelphia Police Officers. That contention, as we have explained, is based solely on his conclusory assertions that TSA Officials had either the legal or functional control over the decisions and actions of the Philadelphia Police Officers. . . . We also reject George’s claim that allegations about the two JTTF Agents show that they participated in his allegedly unlawful seizure, arrest and detention. . . The JTTF Agents simply responded to a call from the Philadelphia Police, questioned George for about thirty minutes, determined that he posed no security threat, and told him he was free to leave. The JTTF Agents were not at all involved in George’s allegedly unconstitutional seizure, arrest and detention.”)

Kelly v. Borough of Carlisle, 544 F. App'x 129, 2013 WL 6069275, *3-*6 (3d Cir. Nov. 19, 2013) (not published) (“As we did in Kelly II and as the District Court did below, we will focus on Saucier’s second step—whether the constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the encounter between Kelly and Rogers. We have already determined that, ‘at the time of Kelly’s arrest, it was clearly established that a reasonable expectation of privacy was a prerequisite for a Wiretap Act violation,’ and that ‘police officers do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy when recording conversations with suspects.’ Kelly II, 622 F.3d at 258. But we also noted that, although ‘[P]olice officers generally have a duty to know the basic elements of the laws they enforce,’ id., in circumstances when a police officer ‘neither knew nor should have known of the relevant legal standard,’ qualified immunity may still be granted. . . In other words, there are circumstances wherein a police officer’s violation of a law may be within the bounds of reason, even though the law in question can be said, from the comfort of an armchair, to be ‘clearly established.’ . . . In Kelly II, we adopted reasoning similar to that of the Amore court, saying ‘a police officer who relies in good faith on a prosecutor’s legal opinion that the arrest is warranted under the law is presumptively entitled to qualified immunity from Fourth Amendment claims premised on a lack of probable cause.’ . . . We noted that such ‘reliance must itself be objectively reasonable, however, because “a wave of the prosecutor’s wand cannot magically transform an unreasonable probable cause determination into a reasonable one.”’ . . . We further held that a plaintiff may rebut the presumptive entitlement to immunity if he demonstrates that, ‘under all the factual and legal circumstances surrounding the arrest, a reasonable officer would not have relied on the prosecutor’s advice.’ . . . Finally, we asked the District Court to answer two questions: whether the District Court ‘evaluate[d] sufficiently the state of Pennsylvania law at the relevant time’ and whether the record indicates that—although the prerequisites of the Wiretap Act are clearly established—Rogers reasonably and in good faith relied on the ADA’s advice in arresting Kelly. . . . The District Court answered both in the affirmative, and, for at least two reasons, we agree. First, although the prerequisites of the Wiretap Act were clearly established at the time of the incident, this is not a case where Rogers ‘knew or should have known’ that Kelly’s actions were not criminal in nature. . . . The District Court noted that Rogers had a ‘limited familiarity with the Wiretap Act, gained from his training.’ . . . Specifically, his understanding of the law was that because ‘he was obliged to inform motorists if he recorded a stop, ... he believed the duty was reciprocal under the Act.’ . . . Granted, we have previously acknowledged that ‘two Pennsylvania Supreme Court cases—one almost 20 years old at the time of Kelly’s arrest—had held that covertly recording police officers was not a violation of the Act,’ and that those cases supported the conclusion that a reasonable expectation of privacy was a clearly established prerequisite for a Wiretap Act violation. . . . But Rogers’s incorrect understanding of the law is not devoid of merit. As the District Court noted, federal courts have recently ‘cited with approval the Pennsylvania Superior Court’s decision in Commonwealth v. McIvor for the proposition that while there is no expectation of privacy at a traffic stop, a police officer ... does have an expectation of non-interception in his communications at the stop,’ and thus recording his communications would nonetheless be violative of the Wiretap Act. . . . Such recent case law suggests that Rogers was not ‘plainly incompetent’ in wondering about the state of the law. . . . In other words, even though the law was, in a sense, ‘clearly established,’ it was not so clearly established that one could say a reasonable officer ‘would have known’ of the illegality of the arrest. . . . And second, instead of proceeding solely on his own understanding of the Wiretap Act, Rogers contacted Birbeck for legal advice on whether he had probable cause to arrest Kelly. Rogers’s reliance on Birbeck’s comments was justified. Birbeck was ‘an experienced prosecutor who had been serving as the chief deputy district attorney in charge of the trial division for more than a decade.’ . . In fact, Birbeck conducted his own legal research on the Wiretap Act and whether Rogers had probable cause to arrest Kelly, and his quick research led him to conclude, albeit incorrectly, that Kelly had violated the Act. The District Court eliminated any concern that Rogers’s call to Birbeck was merely an attempt to rubber-stamp an arrest. The Court submitted the matter to a jury, which found that (1) Rogers reasonably believed that Kelly was attempting to secretly record him, and Rogers was not looking for a pretextual reason to arrest him; (2) Rogers called Birbeck to seek legal advice on whether probable cause existed to arrest Kelly for a violation of the Wiretap Act, and Rogers was not merely seeking to obtain approval for the arrest; (3) although Rogers neglected to mention that he was recording the traffic stop, he did not deliberately or recklessly omit that fact or any other relevant fact; and (4) Birbeck told Rogers that probable cause existed to arrest Kelly. Although Birbeck’s advice was flawed, it was plausible in the absence of a thorough review of the relevant case law and was provided in real-time as Rogers was involved in a traffic stop. Kelly argues for an absolute rule prohibiting qualified immunity when the relevant law is clearly established. If that were the law, we would have said so the first time this case was before us. We remanded the matter to the District Court because the law is more nuanced. Kelly’s argument fails because it does not make appropriate allowances for government officials who ‘act [] precisely as one would hope [they] would act’ when faced with law that is nominally ‘clearly established’ and yet is shrouded in some obscurity or ambiguity. . . One purpose of qualified immunity is to protect police officers who do their best to understand the law and yet are uncertain of how it may apply in a specific situation. An officer engaged in a traffic stop may not have access to a computer, the internet, Westlaw, or enough time to research the law. It is in everyone’s interest to encourage law-enforcement officials to seek out legal advice in those situations. . . In essence, qualified immunity may be granted when there is a breakdown in the legal fiction that reasonably competent police officers know every clearly established law. . . Because Rogers’s reliance on Birbeck’s advice was in good faith and objectively reasonable, he is entitled to qualified immunity as to Kelly’s arrest.”)

True Blue Auctions v. Foster, 528 F. App’x 190, 192, 193 (3d Cir. 2013) (“[W]e must determine whether the Magistrate Judge was correct to conclude that as of October 16, 2009, Dreibelbis had no clearly established constitutional right to videotape the officers without threat of arrest. The Report and Recommendation relied principally on Kelly, a 2010 case addressing an issue similar to the one we face today. . . .First, the plaintiffs argue that even if Kelly held that there was no clearly established right to videotape police officers during a traffic stop, there was nevertheless a clearly established right to tape police officers on a public sidewalk during the course of their duties. . . Even if the distinction between traffic stops and public sidewalk confrontations is as meaningful as the plaintiffs claim, such that Kelly is not dispositive, the plaintiffs are simply incorrect in claiming that ‘[e]very court has ruled there is a First Amendment right to videotape police in non-traffic stops situations in public forums.’ . . Instead, as Kelly clearly explained, courts have come to divergent conclusions on the issue. [examining cases] Thus, our case law does not clearly establish a right to videotape police officers performing their official duties such that the officers here should have been on notice that Dreibelbis had a First Amendment right to film them. Accordingly, the District Court correctly concluded that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Marcavage v. National Park Service, 666 F.3d 856, 859, 860 (3d Cir. 2012) (“As the Supreme Court has noted, ‘[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’. . . Both a United States Magistrate Judge and a United States District Judge previously determined that the Sixth Street sidewalk was a nonpublic forum—an area that is not used by tradition or designation for public expression and that consequently carries a less stringent standard of review when assessing government justifications for limiting speech. . . This led both judges to find Marcavage’s arrest constitutionally permissible. While we ultimately held otherwise, the fact that two judges found no First Amendment violation indicates that Marcavage’s constitutional right to demonstrate on the Sixth Street sidewalk was not clearly established. . . . [T]o strip Saperstein and Crane of qualified immunity requires the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Marcavage’s right to demonstrate on the Sixth Street sidewalk was far from clear at the time of his arrest. . . . Until we reversed the Magistrate Judge and District Judge in Marcavage III, Saperstein and Crane had made no mistake. They had better than probable cause—they had evidence sufficient for a conviction. As in the First Amendment context, qualified immunity bars Marcavage’s Fourth Amendment damages claim.”)

Schneyder v. Smith, 653 F.3d 313, 328-31 & n.21 (3d Cir. 2011) (“To summarize what we have said so far: The liberty interests of a detained material witness are protected by the Fourth Amendment, because this court adheres to Justice Ginsburg’s ‘continuing seizure’ theory. Schneyder’s detention was a seizure, but because she was not arrested as a criminal suspect ‘probable cause’ is the wrong lens through which to examine the case. Instead, to determine whether her rights were violated we must assess whether the seizure was ‘reasonable’ within the Fourth Amendment’s meaning. This requires balancing Schneyder’s interests against the government’s, and a jury could conclude that Schneyder’s interest in going free outweighed the government’s interest in keeping her locked up until the new trial date. If Schneyder’s rights were violated, Smith was the only official in a position to prevent it—by keeping Judge Means informed of significant changes in the facts underlying the detention order. Smith’s duty not to cause a violation of Schneyder’s constitutional rights required her to promptly report the continuance in the Overby case to Judge Means—though she would have been free to argue that continued detention was warranted even in light of the new facts. Because Smith did not fulfill this obligation, Schneyder has made out a prima facie case for recovery of damages under § 1983. . . Because the foregoing discussion takes place in the context of qualified immunity, our inquiry is not complete. We still must decide whether the duty we have just identified was clearly established at the time the violation occurred. . . . Although we are aware of no decision predating Smith’s actions that involved the sort of claim that Schneyder has raised here, we are nevertheless convinced that this is one of those exceedingly rare cases in which the existence of the plaintiff's constitutional right is so manifest that it is clearly established by broad rules and general principles. That is, this ought to have been a member of that class of 'easiest cases' that, according to Judge Posner, 'don't even arise.' . . . No reasonable prosecutor would think that she could indefinitely detain an innocent witness pending trial without obtaining reauthorization. And there can be no doubt that is what Smith intended. The trial at which Schneyder was to testify did not take place until more than a year and a half after her arrest, and there is no indication that Smith would ever have taken steps of her own volition to free her key witness or even to have her status reviewed. If the initial continuance was not something Smith felt a need to report, there is no reason to think that she would have advised Judge Means of any of the subsequent developments. Were it not for the persistence of Schneyder's family and the generous efforts of a public defender with cases of his own and no prior connection to the plaintiff, there can be no telling how long she would have remained locked up. . . . The judges comprising this panel—all three former prosecutors—feel secure in declaring that any reasonable attorney in Smith's position would have known that her course of action was so outrageous as to be unconstitutional, even in the absence of a case telling her so. 'When properly applied, [qualified immunity] protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law."' The self-evident wrongfulness of Smith's conduct is sufficient to place her in either category. She is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Schmidt v. Creedon, 639 F.3d 587, 589, 590, 598, 599 (3d Cir. 2011) ("We now hold that, except for extraordinary situations, under Pennsylvania law, even when union grievance procedures permit a policeman to challenge his suspension after the fact, a brief and informal pre-termination or pre-suspension hearing is necessary. However, because this rule was not clearly established at the time of Schmidt's suspension, we conclude that appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . At the time of Schmidt's suspension, other circuits had concluded that 'due process requires pre-termination notice and an opportunity to respond even where a [collective bargaining agreement] provides for post-termination procedures that fully compensate wrongfully terminated employees.' [collecting cases] These cases did not clearly establish that Schmidt was entitled to a hearing before being suspended—as opposed to being terminated. In light of the closeness of the question, the absence of clear precedent in this or other circuits, and the District Court's thoughtful conclusion, we cannot say that 'it would be clear to a reasonable [official] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation' presented to appellees in this case.")

Ray v. Township of Warren, 626 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 2010) ("We agree with the conclusion of the Seventh, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits on this issue, and interpret the Supreme Court's decision in Cady as being expressly based on the distinction between automobiles and homes for Fourth Amendment purposes. The community caretaking doctrine cannot be used to justify warrantless searches of a home. Whether that exception can ever apply outside the context of an automobile search, we need not now decide. It is enough to say that, in the context of a search of a home, it does not override the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment or the carefully crafted and well-recognized exceptions to that requirement. . . . Regardless of whether there were exigent circumstances in this case, however, the responding officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . .

. There is no dispute that at the time of the officers' actions in this case, two Circuits had arguably extended the community caretaking doctrine to warrantless entries into homes. . . . Moreover, this Circuit had addressed the issue only in a nonprecedential opinion, Burr v. Hasbrouck Heights, 131 F. App'x 799 (3d Cir.2005), one month prior to the officers' actions, and had left unresolved whether a community caretaking exception might justify a warrantless search of a home. Until our decision in this case, the question of whether the community caretaking doctrine could justify a warrantless entry into a home was unanswered in our Circuit. Given the conflicting precedents on this issue from other Circuits, we cannot say it would have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer that entry into Ray's home on June 17, 2005 was a violation of the law.”)

Kelly v. Borough Of Carlisle, 622 F.3d 248, 259 & n.6, 260, 262 (3d Cir. 2010) (“Kelly also claims the District Court erred when it held his First Amendment right to videotape matters of public concern was not clearly established. . . . Before turning to Kelly’s First Amendment claims, we will address the amicus brief submitted by the American Civil Liberties Union. The ACLU takes issue with the District Court’s decision to skip the ‘violation prong’ of the qualified immunity inquiry and proceed directly to the ‘clearly established’ prong. The ACLU urges us to establish a rule that the Saucier sequence should be the default approach to qualified immunity analysis, especially in cases alleging violations of the First Amendment. The ACLU suggests that deviation from the Saucier sequence is proper only in cases involving unusual facts or uncertain state law. We decline to adopt the rule proffered by the ACLU because it is inconsistent with Pearson. Although the Supreme Court acknowledged that Saucier’s two-step procedure is often advantageous, Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 821, it also recognized that the costs of Saucier outweigh its benefits in some cases. . . . In our view, it would be unfaithful to Pearson if we were to require district courts to engage in ‘an essentially academic exercise’ by first analyzing the purported constitutional violation in a certain category of cases. . . . Should the Supreme Court decide that Saucier sequencing is necessary in First Amendment cases or any other type of case, it may establish such a rule. It is not our place to do so in light of Pearson, and, consequently, the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it bypassed the constitutional question and proceeded to the clearly established prong. . . . Kelly contends his First Amendment rights were violated when Rogers seized his video camera (prior to calling ADA Birbeck) and when Rogers arrested him. In defense, Rogers argues that a ‘right to surreptitiously videotape a police officer without an expressive or communicative purpose’ was not clearly established at the time of the arrest. . . . We have not addressed directly the right to videotape police officers. . . . Though we have not had occasion to decide this issue, several other courts have addressed the right to record police while they perform their duties. We turn now to these cases, as well as cases regarding the more general right to record matters of public concern. . . . In light of the foregoing, we conclude there was insufficient case law establishing a right to videotape police officers during a traffic stop to put a reasonably competent officer on ‘fair notice’ that seizing a camera or arresting an individual for videotaping police during the stop would violate the First Amendment. Although Smith and Robinson announce a broad right to videotape police, other cases suggest a narrower right. Gilles and Pomykacz imply that videotaping without an expressive purpose may not be protected, and in Whiteland Woods we denied a right to videotape a public meeting. Thus, the cases addressing the right of access to information and the right of free expression do not provide a clear rule regarding First Amendment rights to obtain information by videotaping under the circumstances presented here. Our decision on the First Amendment question is further supported by the fact that none of the precedents upon which Kelly relies involved traffic stops, which the Supreme Court has recognized as inherently dangerous situations.”)

Bayer v. Monroe County Children and Youth Services, 577 F.3d 186, 192 (3d Cir. 2009) (“On appeal, defendants do not challenge the court’s conclusion that plaintiffs were entitled, as a matter of procedural due process, to a post-deprivation hearing within 72 hours. And in light of Pearson, we need not reach this issue, as we find that, under the ‘clearly established’ prong of the Saucier test, defendants should be afforded qualified immunity with respect to this claim. . . . Even if we assume that plaintiffs had a constitutional right to a post-deprivation hearing within 72 hours and that this right was clearly established at the relevant time, we consider it objectively reasonable for defendants to have believed, under the law existing at the time, that their particular conduct in this case was lawful and in keeping with this right.”).

Guthrie v. Guthrie, 216 F.Supp.3d 590, ____ (W.D. Pa. 2016) (“In Vargas, decided only six days before the Guthrie incident, our Court of Appeals ‘considered the limits of the community caretaking doctrine,’ examining its earlier decisions and those from other circuit courts. . . . Our Court of Appeals in Vargas extended the community caretaking doctrine to seizures of a person outside of a home for non-investigatory purposes and to protect the individual or the community at large. . . . In Ray v. Twp. of Warren, . . . decided over four years before Vargas, our Court of Appeals held the community caretaking doctrine did not extend to warrantless searches of homes. . . . Neither case addresses whether this doctrine provides an exception to the Fourth Amendment prohibition on warrantless seizures inside the home. Officer Guthrie asks we apply the community caretaking doctrine and enter judgment in his favor on Mr. Guthrie’s Fourth Amendment seizure claim. Officer Guthrie concedes it is ‘not clear’ whether Vargas ‘approved of [the community [caretaking] doctrine] inside a person’s home,’ but asserts because ‘there is no evidence contradicting [his] belief that [Mr. Guthrie] was attempting to get his service revolver, one must inevitably conclude that [Mr. Guthrie’s] seizure was justified under the community caretaking doctrine.’ . . . This is a difficult question of constitutional law which we need not address today. We need not reach the issue of whether Officer Guthrie’s seizure of Mr. Guthrie is unlawful because qualified immunity attaches to the seizure claim. ‘Qualified immunity protects government officials from liability from civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . It applies to give officers ‘breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgment.’ . . . In considering whether to apply qualified immunity, we engage in a two-pronged inquiry. . . . First, we must decide ‘whether the facts that a plaintiff has . . . shown make out a violation of a constitutional right.’ . . . Second we determine ‘whether the right at issue was “clearly established” at the time of officer’s alleged misconduct.’ . . . We may begin consideration with either prong. . . . But under the doctrine of constitutional avoidance, we should not unnecessarily wade ‘into such muddy terrain’ when faced with uncertain violations of a constitutional right. . . . Last summer, the Supreme Court again directed our analysis on whether a right is ‘clearly established’ must be very narrow: We have repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality. The dispositive question is whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established. This inquiry must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition. Such specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context, where the Court has recognized that it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts. . . . As most recently counseled by our Court of Appeals, we look for ‘some degree of specificity in the law...before a right is said to be “clearly established.”’. . . The right claimed by Mr. Guthrie must be ‘framed in terms specific enough to put “every reasonable official” on notice of it, and the more specific the precedent, the more likely it is that a right will meet that threshold.’. . . Applying this standard, and viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Guthrie as the non-moving party, Officer Guthrie’s restraint of Mr. Guthrie in his bedroom did not violate a clearly established right. The Supreme Court has not defined the scope of the citizen’s right to be free from seizure when an officer is assisting a citizen suffering a seizure and potentially reaching for the officer’s gun. Our Court of Appeals’ decisions in Ray and Vargas do not address a clearly established right in this context. In Ray, our Court of Appeals affirmed the district court’s finding of qualified immunity for officers who entered Mr. Ray’s home after a call from Mrs. Ray and based on a known history of domestic disturbances when Mrs. Ray could not see her daughter in the estranged father’s home during her visit. . . . The Court of Appeals did not apply the community caretaking doctrine to the home, but found the responding officers entitled to qualified immunity given the absence of precedent in this Circuit on warrantless entry into the home based on the community caretaking doctrine. Our Court of Appeals found ‘[w]hile the police may not have acted ideally in the situation, what is quite clear from the record is that they were trying to do a difficult job in a potentially dangerous situation.’. . . Officer Guthrie, as in Ray, had no defining authority as to Mr. Guthrie’s clearly established rights when suffering a seizure. We must ‘attend to context’ and ‘need to “consider the state of the existing law at the time of the alleged violation and the circumstances confronting [Officer Guthrie] to determine whether a reasonable state actor could have believed his conduct was lawful.”’. . . As in Ray, we cannot say Officer Guthrie acted unreasonably in restraining Mr. Guthrie during a grand mal seizure. Officer Guthrie is entitled to qualified immunity from the Fourth Amendment seizure claim.”) Dorley v. S. Fayette Twp. Sch. Dist., No. 2:15-CV-00214, 2016 WL 3102227, at *5-6 (W.D. Pa. June 1, 2016) (“Even accepting all of the allegations in the Amended Complaint as true, as the Court must, in applying the directives of Mullenix and Spady, this Court cannot conclude that Patrick and Sciotto put every high school football coach on notice in 2009 that they would be violating the Constitution if they designed a non-contact football drill that was actually full-contact where bigger students were matched against smaller students. Unlike the wrestling cases Sciotto and Patrick, here there were no objective guidelines within the sport that would have necessarily tipped coaches off that they had (and when they had) created an unconstitutional risk of injury. To be sure, it is possible for high school football coaches to be liable for constitutional violations under a state-created danger theory, but football necessarily involves some size and strength

mismatches and that fact alone would not create such liability. And while a culture in which bigger students are encouraged, directly or indirectly, to ‘test’ or ‘toughen up’ smaller students by gratuitously tossing them around the field of play rests in large part on woefully outdated thinking, and would be reprehensible by any measure, in light of Spady, the Court cannot say that the unconstitutionality of such conduct emanating from that culture was in 2009 ‘beyond debate.’ The Spady Court expressed its concern for students who are injured in organized physical activities at school, but nonetheless applied qualified immunity in a death by dry drowning context. Indeed, there is no question here that Zachary Dorley suffered severe injuries during the drill and if the coaches acted with the motives and knowledge as now pled, such conduct is beyond the pale. At this point in the process, the allegations in the Amended Complaint are just that—allegations. But if backed up by admissible evidence at trial, a rational jury could find the elements of a state-created danger constitutional violation fulfilled in that: (1) the harm to Zachary Dorley, perhaps while not specifically intended, was ‘foreseeable and fairly direct,’ (2) that such covert scheming by adults ‘shocked the conscience,’ (3) that there was a pre-existing relationship between the coaches and players that would make smaller players ‘foreseeable’ victims, and (4) that the adult coaches would have affirmatively used their authority to create a risk of the harm pled. . . . But concluding that what has now been pled would be a constitutional violation if proven does not resolve the matter. . . . Because this Court is also duty-bound to apply the qualified immunity doctrine as it is now announced by the Supreme Court, the key issue here is not only whether this conduct would violate Dorley’s rights, but then whether as of the date of this episode, it was ‘beyond debate’ that this conduct was unconstitutional. And as applied to federal litigation in the trial courts, the Supreme Court seems to have made it quite clear that the qualified immunity doctrine gives would-be constitutional tortfeasors a very wide berth, except in the refined circumstances in which a narrowly-crafted, precisely-defined, fact-specific right was so clearly recognized when the conduct occurred that every similarly-situated public official would have known that they were duty-bound to observe it. . . . In this regard, the Court believes that Spady is a game changer in the school activities/state-created danger context. As the Spady Court observed, colorable constitutional violations had previously been found in cases in which an adult educator directly engaged in conduct that was both egregious and intentionally and purposefully focused on causing physical harm to a student. . . . The Spady Court then contrasted those situations, each involving what was in reality direct physical battery, with the array of Sciotto-like cases, each of which (no matter the outcome) involved (as pled) grossly negligent or reckless conduct which created a real and appreciable risk of serious harm, but lacked an intent-to-injure component, and concluded that at least as of September 1, 2015 (the date Spady came down) the constitutional rights at issue in Sciotto were not so ‘clearly established’ as to be ‘beyond debate.’ It is that rule of law that this Court is bound to apply here. Particularly in light of Spady’s observations about the Sciotto line of cases, the Court concludes that even if Dorley had a constitutional right not to be subjected to football blocking drills against upperclassmen that were twice his size when he was suspecting the drills to be noncontact and when the coaches and the upperclassmen clandestinely knew otherwise, that right was not so clearly established in the Mullenix/Spady sense when this incident occurred in 2009 that it was ‘beyond debate.’ Therefore, the individual School District Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and the claims against them. . . will be dismissed with prejudice.”)

Matheny v. County of Allegheny Pa., No. 09-1070, 2010 WL 1007859, at *4-*6 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 16, 2010) (“Plaintiff asserts that Defendants Mollo and Avetta violated his “clearly established” First Amendment right to record the actions of police officers in public by arresting him in retaliation for making a cell phone audio-and video-recording. The Court disagrees that the First Amendment right—assuming such a right exists at all [FN3. Under the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson, the Court is not required to proceed in the two-step sequence set forth in Saucier. See Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818. Here, it is more appropriate first to address what traditionally has been the second inquiry, e.g., whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established. Because the Court finds that the alleged First Amendment right at issue here is not clearly established, the Court does not (and need not) reach the issue of whether Defendants Mollo and Avetta violated Plaintiff’s Constitutional rights under the First Amendment.]—was ‘clearly established’ as of the date of Plaintiff’s arrest on April 29, 2009. As an initial matter, neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has held that individuals have an unfettered First Amendment right to record police officers in the performance of their official duties. Although this is not dispositive of the issue, a review of the sparse existing decisional law reveals that the right—assuming one exists at all—is far from ‘clearly established.’ [collecting and discussing cases] Although these cases may recognize a limited right to videotape police conduct, subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions, such a right notably has not been recognized in the context of an audio recording. . . . Far from demonstrating that the right is clearly established, the existing decisions demonstrate that the law on the subject is plainly underdeveloped. . . . In sum, in light of the existing law as of April 29, 2009, the Court concludes that the purported First Amendment right to record the police was not ‘clearly established.’ The limited case law on the subject simply does not provide sufficient guidelines or define the contours of the right in such a manner that reasonable officials in Defendants’ position would understand that their actions, which were motivated in the first instance by the Pennsylvania Wiretap Act, would impinge upon or violate Plaintiff’s purported First Amendment right to record the incident. Because the First Amendment right to record police conduct is not ‘clearly established,’ the Court concludes that Defendants Avetta and Mollo are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff’s First Amendment retaliation claim under Count I.”)

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Balogh v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 120 F.4th 127, 134, 137-38 (4th Cir. 2024) (“Because Balogh’s burden is two-fold, we can begin with either step, and needn’t reach the second step if the first proves dispositive. That’s what we did in Turner, beginning—and ending—with the clearly established prong. . . We could do the same here, but instead will explain why Balogh fails at both steps. . . . [L]aw enforcement didn’t decline to intervene on behalf of only one group. And when Chief Thomas declared an unlawful assembly, he didn’t enforce that directive selectively. If we accept Balogh’s proposition that law enforcement failed to keep the peace or to protect First Amendment rights, that failure was total, at least until everyone was ordered to disperse. In fact, even if Balogh had not engaged in mutual combat, a heckler's veto claim would fail all the same because law enforcement silenced the so-called hecklers too. Moreover, the police here are entitled to the benefit of Bible Believers' officer-safety backstop. They did not have to 'go down with the speaker' during the escalating violence between the protesters and counterprotesters. . . We affirm the district court's ruling rejecting Balogh's First Amendment claim. . . . As explained above, the defendants did not violate Balogh's constitutional rights. But the constitutional claims also fail because the alleged rights were not clearly established. Balogh cites general First Amendment principles to contend that Chief Thomas and Lieutenant Crannis-Curl were on notice that he had 'the right to some level of police protection.' . . But the cases he relies on didn't grapple with the circumstances here—a violent confrontation between protesters and counterprotesters. And our precedent requires that we 'not define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . 'Defining the right at a high level of generality avoids the crucial question whether the officer acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' . . Balogh never reaches beyond this high level of generality to explain why Chief Thomas or Lieutenant Crannis-Curl would know that they had to intervene on his behalf during an increasingly violent protest. So for this separate reason, the district court correctly dismissed Balogh's constitutional claims.")

Rambert v. City of Greenville, 107 F.4th 388, 398, 400-02, 406 (4th Cir. 2024) ("While courts have discretion to begin with either prong of the qualified immunity analysis, . . .we start by examining whether Johnson's conduct was objectively reasonable. Recall that this issue, if the historical facts are sufficiently settled, is a question of law. . . . Even construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Ramberts, Rambert posed an obvious, serious and immediate threat to Johnson. At the time of each of Johnson's shots, a reasonable officer would have viewed that threat as continuing. As a result, the force Johnson used was not excessive, and his conduct was not objectively unreasonable Johnson did not know whether Rambert was or was not armed when Rambert charged at him, at which point Johnson had mere seconds to judge the risk and determine how to respond to Rambert's aggressive and non-compliant approach. In these circumstances, Rambert's lack of a weapon did not make Johnson's use of force unreasonable. . . . No one—not the homeowner, police dispatcher, Rambert or anyone else—told or insinuated to Johnson that Rambert was in the midst of a mental health episode. But even if Rambert were in mental distress, he was a potential breaking-and-entering suspect who charged at Johnson at full speed while yelling and ignoring Johnson's commands to get on the ground, ultimately reaching a proximity where he might have been able to grapple with Johnson and seize his gun. And Rambert continued to advance aggressively even after being shot by Johnson. Whether or not he was experiencing the effects of mental illness, Rambert posed an imminent threat to Johnson. . . .To repeat, when the historical facts are sufficiently settled, as they are here, the officer's reasonableness is a question of law for the court. And addressing that question, the Ramberts have failed to show a Fourth Amendment violation. Thus, under prong one of our analysis, Johnson is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Also, even if the Ramberts had established that Johnson violated Rambert's Fourth Amendment rights—which he did not—Johnson would still be entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong of our analysis. Under that prong, an officer is entitled to qualified immunity if, at the time of the challenged conduct, the law did not clearly establish that the officer's conduct was unconstitutional. . . . The Ramberts claim that, at the time of the encounter here, the law clearly established that Rambert had a constitutional right to be free from deadly force once the danger he posed had passed. This description, however, is too general. In fact, it is the type of outcome-determinative generality the Supreme Court has made clear is improper, particularly in excessive force cases. . . . To be clearly established, there must be case law finding that conduct similar to Johnson's was unconstitutional. As the defendants point out, at the time of the encounter between Rambert and Johnson, no case nor body of law clearly established that conduct similar to that of Johnson was unreasonable. In fact, our precedent, if anything, supports the opposite. [discussing cases] [T]he Ramberts argue that even if none of the cases they cite independently clearly establishes that Johnson violated Rambert's Fourth Amendment rights, collectively they do. But that is not how the clearly established prong of qualified immunity works. Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' . . . To show that an officer is 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[s] the law,' there must be precedent that establishes that conduct factually similar to that officer's conduct is unconstitutional. . . . Police officers 'are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.' . . . The 'clearly established' analysis requires consideration of specific and similar circumstances. . . . The Ramberts' arguments seek to mix and match principles of dissimilar cases to form nonexistent authority. This approach flies in the face of established Supreme Court precedent.")

King v. Riley, 76 F.4th 259, 265-70 (4th Cir. 2023) ("[T]he Fourth Circuit has carved out a class of deliberate-indifference claims to treat differently. Acknowledging that qualified immunity does not protect officials who knowingly disregard the law, . . . we have reasoned that officials who are aware that their conduct is constitutionally deficient cannot rely on the clearly established prong[.] . . . We have said that, sometimes, context makes the violation 'obvious' and case law is thus not needed to establish this awareness. . . . So when a defendant knows her conduct does not pass constitutional muster, we do not look to see if she violated clearly established precedent. . . . Instead, we ask only if her actions violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . But, if she did not know her actions violated the Eighth Amendment, she is entitled to the same two-pronged, qualified-immunity approach as every other government official. . . . Sergeant McKan is entitled to the two-prong approach. To see why, consider the substantial risk of harm he is alleged to have known about: inmate-on-inmate violence. According to King, Sergeant McKan's conduct is constitutionally deficient because although he took steps to mitigate that risk—for example, performing security checks every thirty minutes—he did not look in the cells on those checks. Yet the Constitution does not 'obvious[ly]' require he look in the cells to mitigate the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence. . . . So context did not make him aware of a knowing violation of the law. . . . We thus cannot say that McKan did not 'need case law to tell him' that his conduct was constitutionally deficient. . . . Turning to the applicable two-prong approach, we may address the prongs in whatever order we choose. . . . Here, we start with the clearly established prong. Under that prong, McKan is immune from suit if there was no clearly established right to properly conducted security checks when the murders occurred in April 2017. . . . [W]hile it's true that we require less specificity when defining the right in the Eighth Amendment context than when the Fourth Amendment is implicated, . . . the unlawfulness must still be ‘apparent’ based on pre-existing law. . . The right at issue here is King’s right to have to have a correctional officer look into the cell window while conducting a security check—given a known and substantial risk of inmate-on-inmate violence in the Unit. . . So—even if the risk of inmate violence was substantial and Sergeant McKan knew that—King needs precedent establishing that Sergeant McKan’s efforts to mitigate that risk (i.e., security checks without looking in cells) were constitutionally deficient. . . King does not point to any analogous cases establishing this specific right. . . . Farmer provides no guidance about how the Eighth Amendment applies to this case’s ‘specific context.’ . . . Not every violation of prison policy is a violation of the constitution. And qualified immunity cares about violations of clearly established constitutional law, not clearly established prison policy. So whether Sergeant McKan violated the prison’s rule shines little light on whether he also violated King’s clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. With hindsight, we know that Sergeant McKan should have conducted security checks by looking into cells rather than walking around. But King has not shown that Sergeant McKan’s failure to do so violated his clearly established rights. So Sergeant McKan is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Rather than claiming that our own controlling precedent clearly established that Sergeant McKan’s and Officer Jones’s conduct violated the Eighth Amendment, King identifies cases from four other circuits holding that an officer is deliberately indifferent when he fails to render aid to a prisoner who appears to be unconscious or dead. . . . Those cases do not come close to establishing such a consensus. . . . First, two of those cases are distinguishable from the right King claims. . . . Second, without Jones or Bozeman, King is left with two out-of-circuit cases. And while those two cases do hold that King has the right he claims, . . . that’s not enough for a ‘consensus[.]’. . . This is all the more true given that other persuasive authorities go the other way. The Fifth Circuit, and our own Circuit in an unpublished opinion, have held that King’s claimed right does not exist. . . Given the thin support for King’s position, he has not shown that the officials violated his clearly established rights by calling for medical aid but not providing it themselves. Therefore, Sergeant McKan and Officer Jones are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As the magistrate judge recognized, John Telly King’s brutal murder—along with three other inmates—was an atrocity. But atrocities occur in prison without the prison bearing responsibility. . . . Sergeant McKan is entitled to qualified immunity because he did not violate King’s clearly established rights when he failed to look in each cell during security checks. For the same reason, Sergeant McKan and Officer Jones are entitled to qualified immunity when they called for first responders but did not render medical assistance themselves.”)

King v. Riley, 76 F.4th 259, 276-79 (4th Cir. 2023) (Wynn, J., dissenting) (“Given the particularly sensitive and unique nature of the Intermediate Care Services unit—home to inmates, both violent and nonviolent offenders, who all require intensive treatment and supervision due to severe and longstanding mental illnesses, and yet run in a fluid manner with inmates free to move about the unit—the ‘risk of harm’ to inmates such as the four victims was ‘so obvious’ that we can conclude that prison officials did actually know about it. . . And, at minimum, McKan was subjectively aware that ‘his actions were inappropriate in light of that risk,’ . . . having admitted to knowing what a proper security check entailed and knowing that security checks were done for inmate safety

but nevertheless ‘common[ly]’ failing to do them properly[.] . . . As stated in the majority opinion, to be held accountable via Section 1983, Defendants must have violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . But while we have cautioned against defining the right ‘at a high level of generality,’ we are also clear that ‘there is no requirement that the very action in question must have previously been held unlawful for a reasonable official to have notice that his conduct violated that right.’ . . . And yet that’s what the majority opinion does here, defining the right as the right ‘to have a correctional officer look into the cell window while conducting a security check.’ . . . Eighth Amendment claims in particular ‘don’t require the same level of specificity that is needed in, for example, the Fourth Amendment context.’ . . . Since at least the Farmer decision almost thirty years ago, the Supreme Court has been clear that ‘prison officials have a duty to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners.’ . . . And we have expressly defined the constitutional right in just those terms. . . . [T]o speak of a ‘generalized risk’ of harm in prison is to speak of a fiction—and this Court ought not be a prisoner to its own fictions. Common sense tells us that the risk of harm that a prisoner faces from the failure of prison staff to monitor and control other dangerous and violent prisoners is definitionally and continuously ‘specific.’ Faced with danger, an inmate has virtually no recourse. Inmates, of course, cannot carry a weapon for self-defense. There is nowhere to retreat. And within the Intermediate Care Services unit, they can’t even lock their own cell doors—the security guard must lock and unlock the door for them. And yet the majority speaks of ‘general risks’ in prisons, as if the risks are somehow less real because we judges deem them to be ‘general,’ or no greater than those faced by each of us every day walking down the street. That’s not only a fiction, that’s also an absurdity. . . . Here, the majority opinion’s description of the conduct at issue makes McKan’s failures seem like minor technical violations. But McKan didn’t just fail to look into a few cell windows; he utterly failed to account for the presence and safety of each Intermediate Care Services unit inmate. He knew the security checks were inadequate and in violation of his training. The majority opinion responds that ‘knowingly violating a prison policy does not amount to deliberate indifference.’ . . . But even if violating prison policy alone does not amount to deliberate indifference, it can be evidence of knowledge of a risk or intent. . . . In this case, McKan made five separate rounds after King was attacked. At no point during these almost three hours did he realize that one, two, three, and ultimately four inmates were unaccounted for and lying dead or unconscious in another cell. His failures mattered, as there is at least a question of fact as to whether proper security checks would have saved the four murdered inmates, especially because the coroner listed the time of death for each—including King—as falling after 10:00 a.m. In the ‘specific context of th[is] case,’ . . . there is an issue of fact regarding whether McKan took ‘reasonable measures’ to abate the substantial risk of harm that inmates like John King faced in the Intermediate Care Services unit[.] . . . And, there is an issue of fact regarding whether an objectively reasonable officer in McKan’s position would have known that his actions were unreasonable and violated rights ‘manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle’ articulated in Farmer and our case law. . . . In short, McKan is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Today, the majority opinion adds an unnecessary brick on top of the already-steep deliberate-indifference wall. In declining to find a constitutional violation on these alarming facts (even if it does so based solely on the idea that the constitutional right in question, if it exists, was not clearly established), the majority provides no further guidance on when a prison official's utter dereliction of his responsibility to provide for the safety and security of prison inmates amounts to an Eighth Amendment violation. Today also, the majority opinion lays out a blueprint for how prison officials can avoid liability under Section 1983. First, the majority opinion incentivizes prison officials to say nothing and make sure no official is 'exposed to information concerning [any] risk' of harm. . . A prison official should avoid telling guards about an inmate's prior history of violent crimes and any risk of danger, and prison staff are advised that they should not ask who has special privileges in a unit or what those privileges entail. In addition, there should not be a written policy in place governing security checks and related safety protocol. Finally, the majority opinion informs prison officials that should something go wrong, they should wash their hands and disclaim any actual knowledge. This, despite our express admonition that 'prison officials may not simply bury their heads in the sand and thereby skirt liability.' . . But a faithful reading of Supreme Court and our own precedent requires more. For while '[f]ederal courts sit not to supervise prisons,' we must continually strive 'to enforce the constitutional rights of all "persons," including prisoners.' . . With respect for my good colleagues in the majority, I dissent.")

Robertson v. Anderson Mill Elementary School, 989 F.3d 282, 288 (4th Cir. 2021) ("It is left to the discretion of federal district and appellate courts to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . In this case, we will start with the first inquiry and need not proceed any further because the allegations underlying Appellant's amended complaint, even if true, do not substantiate a violation of R.R.S.'s constitutional rights.")

Dean for and on behalf of Harkness v. McKinney, 976 F.3d 407, 414-20 (4th Cir. 2020) ("The parties disagree as to what standard of culpability should apply in this case. McKinney argues that the district court should have applied the higher standard of 'intent to harm' to his actions because he was responding to what he believed to be an emergency, and the plaintiff presented no evidence that he intended to harm Harkness. But even if the lesser 'deliberate indifference' standard applies, he contends his actions did not demonstrate deliberate indifference and were not conscience-shocking. The plaintiff asserts that there was no emergency, and that McKinney's conduct was so egregious that it undoubtedly establishes that he acted with deliberate indifference to Harkness's life and safety. We have examined each standard in light of the facts and circumstances in this case and conclude that for purposes of summary judgment, deliberate indifference is the standard by which McKinney's conduct should be measured. . . . [U]nder Lewis, the intent-to-harm culpability standard applies to officers responding to an emergency call. . . . [W]hen an officer is able to make unhurried judgments with time to deliberate, such as in the case of a non-emergency, deliberate indifference is the applicable culpability standard for substantive due process claims involving driving decisions. . . . Under this legal framework and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, . . . we find that a jury could conclude that McKinney was not responding to an emergency and had time to deliberate his actions. . . . An officer's actions demonstrate deliberate indifference where the evidence shows that the officer subjectively recognized a substantial risk of harm and that his actions were inappropriate in light of the risk. . . A defendant's subjective knowledge of the risk may be inferred from circumstantial evidence. . . . [A] reasonable jury could conclude that McKinney knowingly disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm, and that his deliberate indifference to life and safety was conscience-shocking, in violation of Harkness's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. See Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 718 (3d Cir. 2018) (responding to non-emergency call at over 100 mph demonstrates conscious disregard for a great risk of serious harm); Browder, 787 F.3d at 1081 (where off-duty officer was not chasing suspect or responding to an emergency, "a reasonable jury could infer ... a conscious contempt of the lives of others and thus a form of reckless indifference to a fundamental right"). . . . That there is little precedent imposing liability under these specific circumstances does not necessarily mean that an officer lacks notice that his conduct is unlawful. As then-Judge Gorsuch wrote for the panel in Browder:

[S]ome things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare its attempt.

Browder, 787 F.3d at 1082–83 (citations omitted). . . Further, this Court has found that 'we need not—and should not—assume that government officials are incapable of drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense. In some cases, government officials can be expected to know that if X is illegal, then Y is also illegal, despite factual differences between the two.' . . With this legal framework in mind, the question to be resolved is whether a reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known that his conduct—driving a police vehicle without activating his emergency lights and siren at over 80 miles per hour on a curved, unlit road at night while not responding to an emergency or pursuing a suspect—could give rise to a claim for a Fourteenth Amendment violation. As the district court noted, 'there is relatively scant caselaw imposing liability in these specific circumstances.' . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has considered the exact conduct presented here. McKinney urges that the facts of this case are most similar to the circumstances presented in Lewis, where the Court declined to find a constitutional violation. But Lewis, . . . as well as this Circuit's opinion in Temkin, . . . involved officers who caused injuries while actively pursuing a fleeing suspect. We have already established here that the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, do not support a conclusion that these circumstances are akin to a high-speed chase or that McKinney was responding to an emergency. Beyond this, the parties concede that no other court decisions have addressed the factual circumstances upon which we must make a determination. But while there is no case directly on point factually to inform our analysis, core constitutional principles set forth in numerous cases lead us to the conclusion that Harkness's substantive due process right was clearly established. . . Lewis is not factually analogous to our case, but the Supreme Court did find that an officer not actively pursuing a suspect or responding to an emergency requiring quick decision-making, i.e., where 'deliberation is practical,' may be liable based on a deliberate indifference standard for unintentional conduct. . . . After Lewis, two Tenth Circuit cases adopted the view that an officer can be liable for a substantive due process violation under a deliberate indifference standard when not responding to an emergency or chasing a suspect. . . . Thus, while the courts have yet to consider a case where an officer engaged in the same conduct as McKinney, he is not absolved of liability solely because the court has not adjudicated the exact circumstances of his case. We find that a reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known, based on rights 'manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principles invoked,' . . . that an officer may be subject to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment under a deliberate indifference standard for unintentional injuries caused when not responding to an emergency or chasing a suspect. This substantive due process right was clearly established at the time McKinney engaged in the conduct that caused Harkness's injuries. A reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known his conduct was not only unlawful, but that it created a substantial risk of serious harm to those around him. As the court stated in Browder, some conduct is so obviously unlawful that an officer does not need a detailed explanation. . . Thus, we affirm the district court's finding that 'in October 2016, it was clearly established that an officer driving more than 80 mph at night, on a curved section of an unlit road, in a non-emergency, non-pursuit situation could be subject to liability under the Fourteenth Amendment for deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to those around him' and that '[a] reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have realized such conduct was unlawful.' . . Accordingly, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we find that McKinney's actions were deliberately indifferent to Harkness's life and safety such that it shocks the conscience and rises to the level of a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the collision. We acknowledge that in the context of qualified immunity, officials are not liable for 'bad guesses in gray areas.' . . But McKinney's actions, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, do not constitute a 'bad guess in a gray area' that qualified immunity protects. . . Thus, McKinney is not entitled to qualified immunity and his motion for summary judgment on that basis must be denied.")

Dean for and on behalf of Harkness v. McKinney, 976 F.3d 407, 421-22, 424-34 (4th Cir. 2020) (Richardson, J., dissenting) ("The majority dutifully recites the familiar rule that qualified immunity shields an officer from suit unless he violated a constitutional right that was 'clearly established.' Yet the majority fails to faithfully follow that rule—ignoring the Supreme Court's consistent admonition that it really must be clearly established that the officer's particular conduct was prohibited by the Constitution. Instead, the majority hangs its hat on a murky substantive-due-process claim. The governing constitutional standards are not clearly established. And the caselaw's application to the hurried, discrete, and torn conduct underlying this case is also not clearly established. Yet the majority ignores this compounded uncertainty to forge new law that it then finds had been 'clearly established.' The only course available to us as inferior-court judges is to respect the Supreme Court's instructions and hold that the officer is immune from suit. I respectfully dissent. . . . The lack of clarity surrounding substantive due process—and the Court's admonishments in this area—cautions us to seek cases that address the specific circumstances at hand to find clearly established law. . . .Controlling authority from the Supreme Court and our Circuit fails to clearly establish that the deliberate-indifference standard applies in reviewing the officer's conduct here. . . . At their very most, our few precedents in this area offer far too little. There are some contexts that call for the deliberate-indifference standard

(Young's pretrial detention). But we also know that this standard is inappropriate in other contexts (Temkin's high-speed car chases). Yet our law does nothing to firmly place the type of conduct here on the end of the spectrum that justifies applying deliberate indifference. If anything, it seems telling that in the closest situation to our case—the high-speed chase in Temkin—we rejected the very deliberate-indifference standard that the majority seeks to apply. . . . The closest cases the majority has—the Tenth Circuit's decisions in Browder and Green and the Third Circuit's decision in Sauers—do little to convince me that the conduct here falls under the rubric of the deliberate-indifference standard. While the Browder decision applied the deliberate-indifference standard, it did so where the officer was on his personal time, not pursuing any official business at all. . . . And the Green decision, beyond whatever differences we might draw, is at most one dim point in a confused constellation that the majority calls on to answer the case before us today. See Green, 574 F.3d at 1301 n.8, 1310 (recognizing that whether there is sufficient time to deliberate is “elusive” and “context-specific,” and holding that the deliberate-indifference standard was appropriate when an officer collided with another car while engaged in a high-speed chase of a car that had stolen gasoline). In fact, after finding that the officer did not act unconstitutionally, the Tenth Circuit in Green concluded that it was ‘not clearly established what specific standard applied to the particular facts of this case—i.e., where the officer was engaged in a high-speed non-emergency response.’ . . . The Sauers decision, also distinguishable, cuts the other way by refusing to apply the deliberate-indifference standard to a high-speed, long-lasting chase of a suspect for a minor traffic offense. . . . Rather than provide clarity, the Third Circuit only muddled the waters further by applying its own unique standard—higher than deliberate indifference but lower than intent to harm. . . . The Third Circuit has held that when officers have time to engage in ‘hurried deliberation,’ there will be liability when those actions ‘reveal a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm.’ . . . The Third Circuit applied this higher standard rather than deliberate indifference where an officer lost control of his car and hit the plaintiff while engaged in a high-speed pursuit (sometimes exceeding 100-mph) over a non-emergency ‘summary traffic offense.’ . . . The Third Circuit found that the officer violated the Constitution in this situation, but after surveying cases from across the country, including Green, the court held that the law had not been clearly established. After granting qualified immunity, the Third Circuit stated that its decision would establish the law for similar cases within that circuit. . . . But Sauers cannot provide clearly established law here, as Sauers came two years after this crash. . . . Taking these cases together, no consensus, much less a robust one, emerges. Reasonable arguments exist that the conduct here—hurried, discrete, and torn between competing interests in responding quickly but safely to a newly downscaled call—falls either on the ‘deliberate indifference’ or ‘intent to harm’ side of the line (or perhaps somewhere in-between). The situation here required a quick (but not split-second) response. It implicated important (but not compelling) interests. And it involved an urgent (but no longer an emergency) situation. So what to make of the precise conduct here is challenging. Without a clearly established general standard, the majority's case for stripping the officer of qualified immunity is off to a poor start. . . . Even were one to find a robust consensus requiring the officer act with only deliberate indifference and not an intent to harm, the application of that standard to the particular conduct here was not clearly established. . . . [W]hile I believe that the majority has stumbled at each step of its analysis, I also believe that the majority's decision today has created a more serious problem. That is, the majority apparently proposes that when engaged in a multi-step analysis in search of clearly established law, the doubts at each step of the analysis need not be aggregated at the end. Surely, there must be at least some relationship between how confident we are that we are using the right doctrinal yardstick and how confident we are that the officer's conduct falls short. But the majority, apparently, finds none. That is a mistake. . . What happened to Harkness was a tragedy (one for which state tort law provides a remedy). But there is no clearly established constitutional law here. This case arises at a seldom-visited crossroads in our doctrinal landscape—the rare rendezvous where the demanding requirement that the law must be 'clearly established' meets the famously malleable set of amorphous commitments that go by the name of 'substantive due process.' Sometimes, the common-law process, developing from one case to the next, can distill clear answers from even the murkiest fonts. But that is not the case here. As the majority itself seems to acknowledge, the cases in this area of law are scarce. And the more abstract and general the standard, the more concrete and specific the application must be. Yet what cases we have are distinguishable and countered by cases cutting the other way—leaving us with little guidance on what to do with the hurried, discrete, and torn conduct here. Without clear standards with clear application, the only thing that seems clearly established is that the majority has gone awfully far afield from the Supreme Court's instructions. What, then, to make of today's decision? With no clearly established law, perhaps it has less to do with the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity doctrine and more to do with misgivings about the wisdom of that doctrine. Those misgivings, to be sure, are understandable. Even after all these years, the doctrine of qualified immunity remains controversial, and there are thoughtful reasons for reconsidering or reforming it. But those are decisions for the Supreme Court (or Congress). Not us. And so, with respect for my colleagues, I cannot join an opinion that I fear will have the effect of quietly diluting and tacitly cheapening a doctrine that we are bound to apply so long as it remains standing. I respectfully dissent.”) Fijalkowski v. Wheeler, 801 F. App'x 906, ____ (4th Cir. 2020) (“We decline to resolve whether the officers’ conduct constitutes a substantive due process violation under the state-created danger doctrine. Rather, we agree with the district court that even if it does, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that delaying by up to two-and-a-half minutes. . . the rescue of a drowning person who may have posed a danger to others violated that person’s substantive due process rights. . . . The parties have identified no controlling authority placing the constitutionality of the officers’ conduct beyond debate, and we agree that there is none. But this doesn’t end our inquiry; a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ may also clearly establish the right allegedly violated. . . . Fijalkowski offers no such robust consensus. The officers, for their part, point to three cases from our sister circuits addressing alleged substantive due process violations by officers who prevented the rescue of drowning persons. The officers contend that together, these cases fail to provide a consensus, let alone a robust consensus, that would have given them fair warning that their conduct violated Fijalkowski’s substantive due process rights. We agree. . . . Accordingly, Ross, Beck, and Andrews would not have given the officers fair warning that delaying Fijalkowski’s rescue under the circumstances here violated his substantive due process rights. But this doesn’t end our inquiry. Fijalkowski insists that the officers' conduct so patently violated the fundamental principle that 'the state cannot arbitrarily assert its power so as to cut short a person's life,' . . . that objectively reasonable officers would have known their conduct was unconstitutional even without closely analogous case law. We cannot agree. Looking to the facts alleged in the complaint, we cannot say that the officers' conduct amounted to a patently arbitrary assertion of power. True, the complaint alleges that the officers knew that Fijalkowski was at risk of drowning after being submerged for thirty seconds and that Brooks was able and equipped to rescue him. But the complaint also alleges that the officers were aware that Fijalkowski's inability to swim and his mental state made him a risk of danger to others. And, they had seen him enter and exit the pool twice before on his own. Unlike in Ross, where '[t]here was simply no rational reason' for the officer to prevent the rescue efforts, . . . here there were such reasons. And ultimately, the officers allowed Brooks to rescue Fijalkowski after (at most) two-and-a-half minutes, far less than the amount of time that had elapsed in Ross, Beck, and Andrews. Accordingly, the complaint doesn't allege conduct that amounts to a patently arbitrary assertion of power to cut short Fijalkowski's life.")

Parker v. Henry & William Evans Home for Children, Inc., 762 F. App'x 147, ____ (4th Cir. 2019) ("In determining whether Austin and the DSS Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, we exercise our discretion and turn first to whether the constitutional rights at issue were clearly established at the time. A constitutional right is clearly established where 'its contours [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Here, the rights at issue are the rights of a child to not be removed from her parents' custody and detained without a judicial order. We have not articulated the legal standard that applies to Fourth Amendment unlawful seizure claims in the child removal context. . . . No case from the Supreme Court or our circuit has established what standard governs the removal of children from their parents' custody without a prior court order or parental consent. The majority of our sister circuits to have considered this question have held that officials may seize a child from her parents without a judicial order or parental consent only where officials have reasonable cause to believe that imminent harm to a child does not leave sufficient time to obtain judicial authorization prior to the removal. [citing cases from 9th, 10th, and 7th circuits] Those circuits explain that this exacting standard for exigency is the 'logical corollary' to the Constitution's proscription against warrantless seizures absent exigent circumstances in the criminal context. . . . On the other hand, the Fifth Circuit appears to apply a totality of the circumstances test for exigent circumstances, . . . and the Second Circuit has suggested, though it has not held, that mere probable cause to believe that a child was abused may justify a warrantless removal[.]. . . . However, because we have not yet articulated the constitutional standard that governs the removal of children from their parents' custody, that right was not clearly established at the time the DSS removed the children here. Nor have we or the Supreme Court articulated what constitutional standard applies to the continued separation of children from their parents pending court authorization in the absence of a clearly-established constitutional prohibition of the initial separation. Appellants point to no cases defining the scope of officials' authority to continue detaining children where the children were removed based on suspicion of child abuse or neglect. We must conclude, therefore, that this right was also not clearly established at the time the children were withheld from their parents in the instant case. In sum, a reasonable social worker would not have known that the initial seizure and continued withholding of the children violated the Fourth Amendment. Because we determine that the law for the removal of a child and the child's continued detention was not clearly established under the second prong, we need not determine whether there was a constitutional violation under the first prong. Accordingly, Austin and the DSS Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, thereby barring Appellants' Fourth Amendment claims against Austin and the DSS Defendants.”) Feminist Majority Foundation v. Hurley, 911 F.3d 674, 699-706 & n.15 (4th Cir. 2018) (“We retain discretion to address the separate qualified immunity inquiries in the order of our choosing. . . We acknowledge, however, that ‘it is often the better approach to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right at all.’ . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has explained ‘that following the two-step sequence — defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity — is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.’ . . Thus, we first assess and decide whether there can be a constitutional claim for deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment and whether the plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded such a claim. . . Our distinguished colleague also disagrees with our decision to reach the constitutional violation prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . Contrary to the Supreme Court’s Camreta decision, the dissent would prefer to ‘leave [the] standards of official conduct [in these circumstances] permanently in limbo.’ . . For support, our friend relies on the Court’s Pearson decision, but fails to consider the factors specified therein that inform when it is appropriate to first address and resolve the constitutional issue. . . Put simply, however, the relevant Pearson factors are satisfied in this appeal. Indeed, the constitutional question has been fully briefed. . . and the inquiry is not ‘so factbound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases[.]’ . . Finally, we are not aware of any case in which the Supreme Court has granted certiorari on the question presented here. . . . Although the plaintiffs do not rely on any decisions from other circuits, we are aware that several of our sister courts of appeals have ruled — consistent with Jennings — ‘that sexual harassment in an educational setting can violate the [Equal Protection Clause], and that an administrator’s ratification of that conduct could also violate [that] Clause.’ See T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 588 (7th Cir. 2010); see also, e.g., Stiles ex rel. D.S. v. Grainger Cty., Tenn., 819 F.3d 834, 851-52 (6th Cir. 2016). Because the issue was not presented therein, our Jennings decision did not decide whether a victim of student-on-student sexual harassment may pursue a constitutional claim against a school administrator who is deliberately indifferent to such harassment. But five other courts of appeals have concluded that a school official can be liable under the Equal Protection Clause for his deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment. See Stiles ex rel. D.S., 819 F.3d at 851-52 (6th Cir.); Hill v. Cundiff, 797 F.3d 948, 978-79 (11th Cir. 2015); Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified Sch. Dist., 324 F.3d 1130, 1135-38 (9th Cir. 2003); Murrell, 186 F.3d at 1250 (10th Cir.); Nabozny v. Podlesny, 92 F.3d 446, 454 (7th Cir 1996). . . Our review of the foregoing authorities leads us to conclude that a victim of student-on-student sexual harassment can pursue an equal protection claim predicated on a school administrator’s deliberate indifference to such harassment. This ruling is consistent with and compelled by the Supreme Court’s Fitzgerald decision and the principles we enunciated in Jennings. . . . Although the equal protection claim in Jennings was premised on supervisory liability, there are compelling parallels between that claim and an equal protection claim premised on a school administrator's deliberate indifference to known student-on-student sexual harassment. In each circumstance, the school administrator has the power and opportunity to both address and rectify the sexual harassment. And, in each situation, the administrator's failure to exercise that power can result in the harassment victim suffering further injury. Lastly, each scenario directly impacts a student's right to be free from sexual harassment in an educational setting. We are not alone in appreciating those parallels. When confronting a school administrator's deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment, our sister circuits have relied on the principle that a government official can be liable for a subordinate's sexually harassing behavior. . . . We are persuaded by the logic of those and other decisions that recognize an equal protection claim predicated on a school administrator's deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment. . . . To state an equal protection claim for deliberate indifference to known student-on-student sexual harassment, a plaintiff must first allege that she 'was subjected to discriminatory peer harassment.' . . . Secondly, the plaintiff must allege that the school administrator 'responded to the discriminatory peer harassment with deliberate indifference, i.e. in a manner clearly unreasonable in light of known circumstances.' . . . In other words, the plaintiff must allege that the school administrator knew about harassment of the plaintiff 'and acquiesced in that conduct by refusing to reasonably respond to it.' . . . Third, the plaintiff must allege that the school administrator's deliberate indifference was motivated by a discriminatory intent. . . . In sum, the Complaint alleges that UMW students harassed and threatened the plaintiffs based on their sex. The Complaint further alleges that Hurley responded to that harassment with deliberate indifference, in that he had the authority to address and curtail the harassment but failed to do so over a period of months. . . . Additionally, with respect to President Hurley's discriminatory intent, the Complaint alleges that he 'ratified the "right" of angry students to target female classmates with hateful, sexist, threatening harassment, free from any disciplinary consequences.' . . . Indeed, according to the Complaint, Hurley sought to downplay the harassment and threats, and he made no effort to stop them. Those allegations are sufficient to state the intent element of the equal protection claim. . . . With the constitutional violation sufficiently alleged, we must turn to the other qualified immunity prong. That is, we analyze and decide whether the right to be free from a university administrator's deliberate indifference toward known student-on-student sexual harassment was clearly established at the time of President Hurley's conduct. . . . When performing the clearly established assessment, we first analyze 'cases of controlling authority in this jurisdiction — that is, decisions of the Supreme Court, this court of appeals, and the highest court of the state in which the case arose.' . . . If there is no controlling authority, 'we may look to a consensus of cases of persuasive authority from other jurisdictions, if such exists.' . . . Although we recognize today that an equal protection claim can be predicated on a university administrator's deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment, we are also satisfied that President Hurley did not have fair warning that his conduct in this case gave rise to such a claim. We reach this conclusion because neither controlling authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority clearly established the pertinent right at the time of the wrongful conduct alleged in the Complaint. . . . We first observe that — when President Hurley failed to adequately respond to the harassment and threats lodged against the plaintiff Feminists United members — controlling authority did not clearly establish the right to be free from a university administrator’s deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment. As discussed heretofore, the Supreme Court recognized in its 2009 Fitzgerald decision that a victim of student-on-student sexual harassment can pursue an equal protection claim against an individual school employee under § 1983. . . . The Fitzgerald Court, however, did not define the applicable standard for an equal protection claim premised on deliberate indifference, in that the only theory presented to the Court concerned disparate treatment. Consequently, Fitzgerald did not itself provide fair warning that Hurley’s response to student-on-student harassment was unconstitutional. As for the plaintiffs’ reliance on our 2007 Jennings decision, although we observed therein that a university administrator can be liable under § 1983 for his deliberate indifference to sexual harassment, Jennings did not involve student-on-student harassment. . . . Our discussion of deliberate indifference to sexual harassment in Jennings occurred solely in the context of a supervisory liability equal protection claim. As explained above, an equal protection claim predicated on a university administrator’s deliberate indifference to school-official-on-student sexual harassment parallels an equal protection claim based on a university administrator’s deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment. But the similarities between those two types of claims did not provide fair warning, i.e., ‘obvious clarity,’ that an insufficient response to student-on-student harassment violates established law. . . . A reasonable administrator could well have perceived that a constitutionally impermissible response to harassment by a subordinate employee differed from a constitutionally impermissible response to harassment by a student. . . . Moreover, although the Jennings decision recognized a general right to be free from sexual harassment at an educational institution, we must heed the Supreme Court’s admonition not to define clearly established law too broadly. . . . Consequently, despite the fact that Jennings compels us to recognize the equal protection right alleged in the Complaint, that decision failed to give President Hurley fair warning of his potential liability for violating that right. . . . Having examined controlling authority without discerning a clearly established right at the time of the events alleged in the Complaint, we will also consider the pertinent decisions of our sister circuits. Such persuasive authority clearly establishes a legal principle only when there was a robust consensus of decisions by the time of the allegedly wrongful actions. . . . Invoking decisions of ten of the thirteen courts of appeals, Booker observed that ‘[t]he unanimity among our sister circuits demonstrates that the constitutional question is “beyond debate.”’. . . Based on that ‘overwhelming consensus,’ Booker determined that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established. . . . In contrast with Booker, by the time of President Hurley’s challenged conduct, only three circuits — the Seventh, Ninth, and Tenth — had rendered decisions of persuasive authority recognizing the general right of a student to be free from a school administrator’s deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment. See Flores, 324 F.3d at 1135-38 (9th Cir.); Murrell, 186 F.3d at 1250 (10th Cir.); Nabozny, 92 F.3d at 454 (7th Cir.). And those courts of appeals adopted and applied different intent standards for such a claim. More specifically, the Ninth and Tenth Circuits authorized a student-on-student sexual harassment victim to proceed on the basis of an administrator’s deliberate indifference alone, . . . whereas the Seventh Circuit required that such a victim also prove the administrator’s ‘discriminatory purpose[.]’. . . Because of the limited number of relevant decisions that could be persuasive authority, plus their apparent lack of accord on the intent element, we are not convinced that there was a robust consensus of decisions providing Hurley with fair warning that his challenged behavior was unlawful. . . We are therefore satisfied that the persuasive authority did not — at the appropriate time — clearly establish the constitutional right at issue in these proceedings. We are thus constrained to conclude that, at the time of President Hurley’s challenged conduct, the equal protection right to be free from a university administrator’s deliberate indifference to student-on-student sexual harassment was not clearly established by either controlling authority or by a robust consensus of persuasive authority. Consequently, Hurley is entitled to qualified immunity, and the dismissal of the equal protection claim by the district court must be affirmed.”) Feminist Majority Foundation v. Hurley, 911 F.3d 674, 721-22 (4th Cir. 2018) (Agee, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) (“The majority’s analysis of the first prong unnecessarily announces and opines on new and unsettled legal principles in this Circuit that has the effect, at best, of superfluous dicta. Specifically, the majority has to first consider whether a plaintiff alleging peer harassment can ever pursue an equal protection claim before then deciding whether an equal protection claim can be predicated on an official’s alleged deliberate indifference to peer sexual harassment. Only then could the majority decide whether FMF’s Complaint sufficiently alleges that President Hurley’s conduct violated FMF students’ constitutional rights. None of this is ultimately dispositive. Such circumstances counsel against exercising our discretion to consider both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis for the reasons succinctly set out by the Supreme Court in Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009): ‘There are circumstances in which the first step of the [qualified immunity analysis] may create a risk of bad decisionmaking.’. . In cases such as these, courts are well advised that addressing the ‘two-step protocol [in order] departs from the general rule of constitutional avoidance and runs counter to the older, wiser judicial counsel not to pass on questions of constitutionality unless such adjudication is unavoidable.’. . Unfortunately, the majority ignores these warnings and forges ahead. . . I would not have engaged in such a lengthy discourse of untested theories of liability ‘because it “unnecessarily resolves a difficult and novel question ... that will have no effect on the outcome of the case.”’. . In contrast, here, the second prong’s clearly established law analysis is straightforward: a reasonable official would not have understood that the actions alleged here violated the student plaintiffs’ rights. Courts have described the second prong many ways, but ‘[a] right is clearly established if the contours of the right were sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’. . Put differently, for the law to be clearly established, officials must have ‘fair notice’ that their conduct violated the plaintiff’s constitutional right. . . FMF’s complaint presses a novel combination of legal duties and rights. As the majority opinion discusses at greater length, neither controlling authority nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority provided President Hurley with fair notice that he violated FMF students’ constitutional rights by responding as he is alleged to have done after receiving their reports of peer sexual harassment occurring on a third-party social media app. . . As such, President Hurley is entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court properly dismissed this claim. . . . Make no mistake, the majority’s novel and unsupported decision will have a profound effect, particularly on institutions of higher education, until the Supreme Court reaffirms that Davis means what it says. Institutions, like the University, will be compelled to venture into an ethereal world of non-university forums at great cost and significant liability, in order to avoid the Catch-22 Title IX liability the majority now proclaims. The University should not hesitate to seek further review.”)

Allen v. Cooper, 895 F.3d 337, 357 (4th Cir. 2018) (“Of course, we need not resolve whether North Carolina’s display of the video footage and the still photograph violated the Copyright Act to resolve the issue of qualified immunity. . . . What we do conclude is that reasonable officials in the position of the North Carolina officials would not have understood beyond debate that their publication of the material violated Allen’s rights under the Copyright Act. The issue is indeed debatable. Accordingly, we conclude that Allen and Nautilus’s copyright claims against the North Carolina officials in their individual capacities are precluded by qualified immunity.”)

Wilson v. Prince George’s County, Maryland, 893 F.3d 213, 216, 220-24 (4th Cir. 2018) (“[W]e hold that the district court erred in determining that Officer Gill’s conduct did not violate Wilson’s Fourth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, we affirm the district court’s determination that Officer Gill is entitled to qualified immunity, because we hold that the constitutional violation was not clearly established when the incident occurred. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Wilson, the facts show that Wilson did not threaten Officer Gill, Johnson, or any other individual present at the scene during the encounter. Wilson had a small knife in his hand and did not drop the knife when ordered to do so by Officer Gill. However, Wilson testified, and the defendants do not dispute, that Wilson never pointed the pocket knife in the direction of anyone but himself. Neither did Wilson move suddenly or act in a threatening manner toward Officer Gill or others. . . . Additionally, at the time Officer Gill discharged his weapon, Wilson had slit his own throat and had stabbed himself in his chest. And finally, a key disputed fact further calls into question whether Officer Gill faced an immediate threat. The parties dispute the distance separating Officer Gill and Wilson at the time that Wilson ‘stumbled’ forward and Officer Gill discharged his weapon. The estimates of the three people present ranged between eight feet and 20 feet. A jury could determine that Wilson, standing 20 feet away and armed only with a pocket knife that he was using solely against himself, did not pose an immediate threat to Officer Gill or others, thereby rendering Officer Gill’s use of lethal force unreasonable. Under these alleged facts, therefore, a jury could conclude that Officer Gill violated Wilson’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. In reaching this conclusion, we emphasize that we do not make credibility determinations in resolving the first prong of the Saucier analysis. . . . Therefore, we conclude that the present record, when viewed in the light most favorable to Wilson, establishes that Officer Gill’s use of force was not ‘objectively reasonable’ and, thus, was excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, we hold that the district court erred in reaching a contrary conclusion. . . . Defined at the level of specificity required by the Supreme Court, we ask here whether it was clearly established law in October 2012 that shooting an individual was an unconstitutional use of excessive force when: (1) the officer had probable cause to believe that the person had committed certain misdemeanors, one of which involved the use of force against another person; (2) the individual was standing about 20 feet from the officer holding a knife and using it to hurt himself, but was not threatening anyone or making any sudden movements; and (3) the individual had ignored the officer's repeated commands to drop the knife. Upon our review of relevant precedent, we hold that it was not clearly established law in October 2012 in the Supreme Court, this Circuit, or in the Court of Appeals of Maryland, that an officer shooting an individual under such circumstances would be engaging in an unconstitutional use of excessive force. . . . The conduct at issue here lies somewhere between the officer's unreasonable use of force in Clem and the officers' reasonable use of force in Sigman. Although Clem and Sigman both featured a mentally unstable individual, neither case is sufficiently analogous to the circumstances present here. Unlike in Clem, Wilson was armed and had been engaged in criminal activity. And unlike in Sigman, Wilson never threatened others, either verbally or with the knife, during his interaction with Officer Gill. Therefore, our precedent at the time regarding the use of force on mentally ill individuals did not offer sufficient guidance to place 'every reasonable offic[er]' in Officer Gill's position on notice that his conduct would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . A survey of other circuits' case law also illustrates the lack of clear consensus regarding violations of this nature. . . . Ultimately, this case simply is not an 'obvious' one, permitting us fairly to say that the decisions in Garner and Graham, on their own, clearly established the right at issue. . . . [A]s of October 2012, our precedent and the decisions of the Court of Appeals of Maryland fell short of providing sufficient notice to an officer to bar qualified immunity when the officer used deadly force against an armed, but otherwise non-threatening, self-harming individual suspected of committing misdemeanor offenses. . . . We emphasize, however, that as of the date this opinion issues, law enforcement officers are now on notice that such conduct constitutes excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

E.W. by and through T.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 179-87 (4th Cir. 2018) ("To 'provide guidance to those charged with the difficult task' of protecting students 'within the confines of the Fourth Amendment,' we exercise our discretion to first decide whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . . And our discussion of the alleged constitutional violation is '[n]o mere dictum' because 'a constitutional ruling preparatory to a grant of immunity creates law that governs the official's behavior.' Camreta, 563 U.S. at 708. . . . [W]e have a calm, compliant ten-year-old being handcuffed on school grounds because she hit another student during a fight several days prior. These considerations, evaluated under the Graham framework, demonstrate that Dolgos's decision to handcuff E.W. was unreasonable. . . . [T]he use of handcuffs and force is not reasonably expected in the school context because it is counterproductive to the mission of schools and school personnel. For these reasons, the school setting—especially an elementary school—weighs against the reasonableness of using handcuffs. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to E.W., the totality of the circumstances weighs against Dolgos and demonstrates that her actions were not 'objectively reasonable' in light of the facts and circumstances confronting' her. . . . Dolgos took a situation where there was no need for any physical force and used unreasonable force disproportionate to the circumstances presented. We therefore find that Dolgos's actions amount to excessive force. As such, E.W. has demonstrated a violation of her constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . . At the time Dolgos seized E.W., the law was clear that, as a general matter, an officer must carefully measure the force used to respond to the particulars of a case, including the wrongdoing at issue, the safety threat posed by the suspect, and any attempt to evade arrest or flee. . . But the Supreme Court has emphasized that Graham is ‘cast at a high level of generality,’ . . . and does not by itself ‘create clearly established law outside ‘an obvious case,’” ” White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017) (quoting Brosseau, 543 U.S. at 199). Here, Dolgos handcuffed a calm, compliant ten-year-old who was surrounded by multiple adults in a closed room for hitting another child three days earlier. While E.W.’s right not to be unreasonably handcuffed is clearly implicated by ‘more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked,’ . . . namely, the right to be free from the use of excessive and unreasonable police force, we cannot say that her seizure amounts to an ‘obvious case’ such that Graham put Dolgos on sufficient notice that her conduct was unlawful. . . . [I]t was not obvious that Dolgos could not handcuff E.W. here. Although precedent supports the conclusion that Dolgos acted unreasonably and violated E.W.’s Fourth Amendment rights, it did not put Dolgos on sufficient notice that her conduct was unlawful. Indeed, this Court previously stated that the use of handcuffs would ‘rarely’ be considered excessive force when the officer has probable cause for the underlying arrest. . . And the parties do not point us to any controlling authority sufficiently similar to the situation Dolgos confronted. In fact, E.W. chiefly relies on Graham to define the clearly established law. Without more, we cannot conclude that it would have necessarily been clear to a reasonable officer that handcuffing E.W. would give rise to a Fourth Amendment violation. We emphasize, however, that our excessive force holding is clearly established for any future qualified immunity cases involving similar circumstances. Accordingly, we conclude that E.W.’s right not to be handcuffed under the circumstances of this case was not clearly established at the time of her seizure. As such, Dolgos is entitled to qualified immunity, and we affirm the district court as to the § 1983 claim.”)

E.W. by and through T.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 189, 195-99 (4th Cir. 2018) (Shedd, J., concurring in the judgment only) (“Unfortunately, the majority is not content to speak with one voice and resolve this case on the noncontroversial immunity grounds. Instead, the majority reaches out unnecessarily to hold that E.W. has presented sufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment on her claims that Deputy Dolgos used excessive force and committed assault and battery by handcuffing her during the custodial arrest. In doing so, the majority disregards the undisputed objective fact that Deputy Dolgos handcuffed E.W. in preparation for transporting her from school to juvenile authorities, thereby erroneously judging the deputy’s actions without considering the totality of the circumstances. Compounding this factual error, the majority significantly extends our precedent in a novel and uncertain manner that subjects law enforcement officers to potential liability for simply handcuffing a lawful custodial arrestee. The majority’s holding runs counter to the prevailing federal rule and provides little, if any, guidance for law enforcement officers going forward. . . I concur only in the result reached by the majority – i.e., the affirmance of summary judgment in Deputy Dolgos’ favor. I write separately to explain my disagreement with the majority’s holding regarding the merits of E.W.’s federal and state claims. Simply put, on this record, the deputy’s conduct is lawful under federal and state law. . . . In a nutshell, the prevailing federal rule appears to be that an arrestee may pursue a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim based on the use of handcuffs only in very limited circumstances, such as when the handcuffing causes physical injury. That type of circumstance would likely qualify as the rare instance we recognized in Brown where handcuffing a lawful custodial arrestee may be unreasonable. However, there is scant authority for the proposition that handcuffing an arrestee, without more, may constitute excessive force. . . . To be clear, this is not a case (as described by the majority) where a police officer handcuffed a child and forced her to sit in a closed room surrounded by adults for disciplinary or instructional reasons. Instead, the undisputed facts establish that: Deputy Dolgos had probable cause to arrest and take E.W. into custody; before she changed her mind, she was preparing E.W. for transport from school to juvenile authorities; and she handcuffed E.W. in preparation for transport. Viewing the totality of circumstances, as we are required to do, and mindful of the universal acceptance of handcuffing custodial arrestees, the inherent danger presented in every custodial arrest, and the natural unpredictability of juveniles, it is clear as a matter of law that the deputy's use of handcuffs in this instance was objectively reasonable. . . . If the excessive force holding is limited to the majority's view of the facts of this case (i.e., Deputy Dolgos handcuffed E.W. for disciplinary reasons with no intention of transporting her), then it seems to be relatively narrow: law enforcement officers may not handcuff an arrested juvenile at school simply to punish or teach him a lesson. Interpreted in this manner, the majority's holding would be rather obvious and unexceptional. . . . I suspect, however, that the majority intends its excessive force holding to be broader. It is certainly not unreasonable to read the majority opinion as opening the door to permit all custodial arrestees to pursue (but not necessarily win) excessive force claims based on the mere fact that they were handcuffed. It may, perhaps, be slightly more reasonable to read the majority opinion as being limited to cases involving the handcuffing of certain juveniles who are arrested at school. Of course, either reading extends well beyond our precedent, runs counter to the prevailing federal rule, and will hinder law enforcement officers in safely and efficiently performing their duties. Instead of being able to handcuff arrestees for custodial transport as a matter of course for obvious and practical safety reasons, which is the standard procedure in virtually all custodial arrests, officers subject to the majority decision will now have to make on-the-spot predictions about whether every arrestee will peacefully submit to the arrest and transport. Their ad hoc predictions will potentially be subjected to judicial second-guessing based on a variety of factors (both known and unknown to the officers) that should be irrelevant to the handcuffing determination. Included among these factors are the relative age or size disparity between the officer and arrestee, the arrestee's gender or background, the potential emotional consequences that an arrestee may one day suffer as a result of the arrest and handcuffing, and anything else a reviewing court may deem to be pertinent.”)

Brown v. Elliott, 876 F.3d 637, 643-45 (4th Cir. 2017) (“[V]iewing the evidence in the best light for Ms. Brown, for purposes of summary judgment Deputy Elliott was neither ‘stuck’ in the truck nor ‘dragged’ by it, but the evidence was undisputed that Deputy Elliott’s torso was inside the truck when he fired the fatal shot. . . . With these ‘circumstances of the case’ in mind, we turn to the question of whether any controlling authority clearly established that an officer must abstain from employing deadly force when a suspect puts a vehicle in motion while the officer is leaning into it. Ms. Brown does not cite, nor have we found, a single case that so holds. In arguing to the contrary, Ms. Brown principally relies on two clearly distinguishable cases. . . . When Deputy Elliott fired his gun, he was leaning into the window of a moving truck, not standing off to the side as the truck passed him without veering in his direction. He was, as police officers frequently are, ‘forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’ . . . No ‘existing precedent placed the conclusion that [Deputy Elliott] acted unreasonably in these circumstances “beyond debate[.]”’ . . . Nor has Ms. Brown suggested that Deputy Elliott’s actions were so ‘extreme’ to place him ‘on notice that [his] conduct violated established law even in novel factual circumstances.’ . . . For these reasons, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Ms. Brown contends that we must ‘delv[e] into the reasons’ that Deputy Elliott ‘cites for his decision’ to fire his weapon. . . . She maintains that Deputy Elliott explained that he feared for his life and so justified his use of force ‘for no other reason’ than he was dragged by the truck, and since she offered evidence that he was not dragged, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . But the law is well-settled that the qualified immunity inquiry turns on ‘the objective reasonableness of an official’s conduct, as measured by reference to clearly established law,’ not on the official’s ‘subjective intent.’ . . . The relevant question is fact-specific but objective, asking whether the law clearly established that an officer’s conduct was unlawful in the particular circumstances he or she confronted. Deputy Elliott’s subjective intent and his professed justifications for his use of force are irrelevant to that inquiry. . . . Our holding today, however, should not be read to suggest that Deputy Elliott’s use of force here was in fact reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. We express no view as to the alleged constitutional violation itself. Instead, we simply hold that existing law did not clearly establish that an officer in Deputy Elliott’s situation violates the Fourth Amendment by using deadly force. Accordingly, we affirm the grant of summary judgment to the Defendants.”)

Crouse v. Town of Moncks Corner, 848 F.3d 576, 584-87 (4th Cir. 2017) (“We have the “discretion [to] decid[e] which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . . Because we find that the law was not clearly established here, we will not reach the other step in the analysis—whether a constitutional violation actually occurred. . . . The district court granted Caldwell qualified immunity because it was not clear ‘from the facts in this case whether [Crouse and Winningham] were speaking as citizens or as government employees.’ . . . The first inquiry in Crouse and Winningham’s case is, again, whether they spoke as ‘citizen[s] upon matters of public concern’ rather than as ‘employee [s] upon matters only of personal interest.’ . . . Here, Crouse and Winningham argue that they spoke as citizens because they were in plainclothes and an unmarked car, they went to Berkeley’s house during their unpaid lunch hour, and they were never instructed to speak to Berkeley. On the other hand, though, as Chief Caldwell was aware, Berkeley easily identified Crouse and Winningham as police officers from their guns and badges. In fact, Berkeley so clearly recognized Crouse and Winningham as police officers that he told Winder that very day that Moncks Corner police officers had visited his home. While the lunch hour was unpaid, Crouse and Winningham were expected to be on call at that time and to remain prepared to do their job. And police officers have many interactions with citizens that are not the result of an instruction from their supervisor but are still a part of their official duties. Plaintiffs also gave Berkeley the police department’s citizen complaint form. Though these forms were freely available in the police station, Crouse and Winningham's delivery of an official town form lends to their speech an additional connection to their official police duties. These facts allowed Chief Caldwell to reasonably believe that, as a legal matter, Crouse and Winningham were speaking in their capacity as employees of the police department. Unlike in Hunter, Crouse and Winningham were clearly identified as police officers, and their speech more closely resembled their daily duties as police detectives than did the Hunter plaintiffs' calls to the governor's office. Chief Caldwell's perception may be debated, but he is not 'liable for bad guesses in gray areas.' . . . Because it was reasonable for Chief Caldwell to believe that Crouse and Winningham acted in their public roles as police officers, it was reasonable for Caldwell to believe that their speech was not protected, and he is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even were we to assume arguendo that Crouse and Winningham spoke as private citizens on a matter of public concern, Chief Caldwell would still be entitled to qualified immunity because, based on the clearly established law at the time of his decision and the facts he knew at that time, the outcome of the Pickering balancing test is not 'beyond debate.' . . . Chief Caldwell could reasonably have believed that Crouse and Winningham were acting as police officers rather than private citizens when they visited Berkeley. Moreover, given Crouse and Winningham's ongoing disputes with Roach, their efforts to conceal their speech, and the challenge their conduct, if not addressed, posed to police department operations, Chief Caldwell could reasonably have viewed the department's interest in maintaining discipline as paramount in the Pickering balance. Because his judgments were reasonable ones, Chief Caldwell is entitled to qualified immunity.") Crouse v. Town of Moncks Corner, 848 F.3d 576, 587-90 (4th Cir. 2017) (Motz, J., concurring in the judgment) ("For the reasons that follow, I agree that qualified immunity shields Chief Caldwell from liability in this case. I write separately because I cannot join the majority's rationale for so holding. . . . In this case, Chief Caldwell forced Detectives Crouse and Winningham to resign because they brought a citizen complaint form to James Berkeley and encouraged him to file a complaint about the treatment he received from Lt. Roach. Thus, the controlling question is whether this speech by Crouse and Winningham 'is itself ordinarily within the scope of [their] duties.' . . . The majority apparently believes that it was, but the record does not contain a shred of evidence to support that view. . . . Garcetti teaches that if Crouse and Winningham acted pursuant to their official duties, there must have been some job duty they were supposedly carrying out. But the record in this case, viewed in whatever light you please, shows that there was no such duty. It also shows that Chief Caldwell did not believe, and could not have reasonably believed, otherwise. The majority engages in no meaningful inquiry into the detectives' official duties. Instead, it relies almost entirely on the fact that Berkeley easily identified Crouse and Winningham as police officers. . . . In effect, the majority holds that whether public employees speak 'pursuant to their official duties' depends on whether their audience can tell what their job is. But that is not the law. Public employees do not lose their First Amendment rights simply because their audience knows, or can guess, where they work. The majority's conclusion to the contrary has no root in Garcetti or its progeny. . . . Even though the record is clear that Detectives Crouse and Winningham spoke as citizens on a matter of clear public concern, namely, police brutality, I agree that Chief Caldwell enjoys qualified immunity from their claims in this lawsuit. To determine the Chief's entitlement to qualified immunity, we balance the detectives' interest in speaking out against the Chief's interest in maintaining efficient delivery of the police department's public service. . . . When balancing these interests, we must consider 'the manner, time, and place of the employee's expression,' as well as 'the context in which the dispute arose.' . . . Qualified immunity applies in this case because no precedent clearly established that this balance favored the detectives. . . . Police departments have good reason to fear disruption in cases like this. Effective policing requires an effective chain of command, and that is undermined when subordinates try to get their superiors fired at the drop of a hat. More importantly, a police department's ability to protect the public depends on the public's trust that the police department will use its powers responsibly and adequately discipline officers who do not. Officers risk eroding that trust when they go to the public with unsubstantiated allegations of abuse or misconduct without allowing internal review and investigations to unfold. No one is well served when officers rush to try their superiors in the court of public opinion. Under these circumstances, a reasonable officer in Chief Caldwell's position could conclude that the department's interest outweighed that of the detectives. It was not 'beyond debate' which way the scales tilted. . . . At best, it was a gray area to which qualified immunity applies. This is not to say that qualified immunity applies whenever police officers speak out about misconduct by their superiors. For example, it is clearly established law in this circuit that police officers may speak out about a department's efforts to cover up an incident of excessive force. . . . Our case law also establishes that local police officers may report their superiors' alleged corruption to state law enforcement. . . . However, when officers rush to have a superior officer fired for excessive use of force, without giving the department a chance to conduct its own review or investigation, it is not clearly established law that their interest in telling private citizens to take action against their superiors outweighs the department's interest in preventing disruption. Accordingly, I concur with the majority that Chief Caldwell is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Maney v. Garrison, 681 F. App'x 210, 215-22 (4th Cir. 2017) ("In many cases it is beneficial to determine first whether the facts establish a violation of the Constitution. See, e.g., Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Vill. of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892, 899–900 (4th Cir. 2016). But in some cases, and this is one, the 'constitutional question is so factbound that' deciding it would provide 'little guidance for future cases.' . . . We therefore proceed to the second question, keeping in mind that 'a defendant cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' . . . [T]here is no denying that Melgar muddled the question of whether officers must issue warnings when utilizing police dogs on leash, as Appellee did here. Indeed, the rule Appellant maintains was clearly established -- that an officer must warn before using a canine, whether on leash or off -- was forcefully articulated in the Melgar dissent, rather than the majority opinion. . . . As a result, we cannot say that any reasonable officer would have known he was required to warn of Bikkel's presence as he approached Appellant's position. . . . Unlike Kopf, there is no indication that Appellee gratuitously prolonged the biting after determining that Appellant was unarmed and surrendering. . . . Under those circumstances we think an objective officer familiar with Kopf could reasonably, even if mistakenly, have believed that he was not required to call Bikkel off for the eight or so seconds that it took to surmise that Appellant posed no immediate threat to officer safety. . . In the end, whatever Kopf may say about the likelihood that a suspect will calmly surrender while being bitten by a dog, the case is simply too factually dissimilar to place the situation facing Appellee beyond constitutional debate. Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Appellee's decision to briefly prolong Bikkel's seizure of Appellant did not violate a constitutional right that was clearly established by Kopf. . . Appellant's final argument, quite apart from Kopf and Vathekan, is that every reasonable officer would have known that the use of any force was unreasonable here because there was no basis for seizing Appellant in the first instance. . . . [W]e think Appellant did not become the intended object of a seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes until Appellee realized what had happened but nevertheless declined to call off the attack. . . The question, then, is whether every reasonable officer would have known the second and third bites were clearly unreasonable. . . . In sum, Appellee was faced with a situation that was tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving -- precisely the context in which the Supreme Court has counseled us to make allowances for on-the-scene decisions about the amount of force that is necessary, 'even if it may later seem unnecessary in the peace of a judge's chambers[.]'. . Once he ascertained that Appellant posed no threat and was not resistant, Appellee discontinued the use of force, even though a reasonable officer could have considered Appellant's connection to the robbery suspect and reasons for hiding from the police as yet open questions. Under those circumstances, we cannot say that every reasonable officer would have known his conduct was, beyond question, a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Judge Harris laments the severity of the force employed in this case, and understandably so. One need not look far beyond each morning's newspaper to find alarming examples of police officers using force in ways that should give us -- as citizens and as judges -- cause for concern. This case is no exception. That is why I would not hold, much less suggest, that Appellee's deployment of Bikkel complied with the Fourth Amendment. . . But current events remind us, too, that threats to officer safety are not imaginary, and that police are often asked to intervene at a moment's notice in tense, difficult situations, on the basis of imperfect information and with little time for deliberation. That is why we do not engage in 'unrealistic second-guessing' of action taken in swiftly developing situations, . . and why we do not subject officers to personal liability for 'bad guesses in gray areas,' Maciariello v. Sumner, 973 F.2d 295, 298 (4th Cir. 1992). Our task instead is to assess whether Appellee ran afoul of bright constitutional boundaries. In the dissent's view, the common sense answer is clearly 'yes.' I agree that common sense should guide our decision making. And when three judges consider the same set of facts and in good faith take three different views of the law, common sense tells me that things may not be as clear to every cop on the beat as the dissent would suggest.")

suspicion stops between January 2004 and June 2012. Floyd v. City of New York, 959 F. Supp. 2d 540, 556 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). Countless citizens who ultimately will be found to have committed no crime are subject to Terry stops on a daily basis. No police officer should be under the impression that whether canine attacks may be used to carry out those stops, as a first resort against suspects who are neither fleeing nor resisting, is an open or difficult question. . . .[E]ven if we were to hypothesize some other justification for Maney's seizure, so that Terry's restrictions do not apply, it would remain clear that the Fourth Amendment's more general limits on the use of force were exceeded here. Whatever the imagined alternative basis for Maney's seizure — and assuming, for the sake of argument, that there was one, despite the undisputed absence of probable cause — use of force in its effectuation would be subject to the 'objective reasonableness' test of Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 394-97 (1989). And while many Graham cases present close questions, this is not one of them. . . . I do not believe that this case falls within a 'gray area,' . . . entitling Garrison to qualified immunity because the Fourth Amendment limits he exceeded were not sufficiently 'clearly established' to put him on notice. Our qualified immunity analysis takes into account 'not only already specifically adjudicated rights, but those manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principle invoked.' . . . And for the reasons given above, my view is that the 'core constitutional principle[s]' and doctrine articulated in Terry and Graham make manifest that canine attacks may not be used in the first instance to seize suspects on, at best, reasonable suspicion, and without objective indicia of a weapon. But if more were required, then I believe it is provided by our cases dealing directly with police canine attacks. Those cases clearly establish that Graham's objective reasonableness standard applies to police canine attacks, see Vathekan, 154 F.3d at 178; that even the weighty government interest in apprehending armed and fleeing robbery suspects may not be enough to justify a canine attack under Graham, see Kopf v. Wing, 942 F.2d 265, 266, 268-69 (4th Cir. 1991); and that dog attacks are no exception to the rule that even in a fast-moving and tense situation, a use of force that is excusable at one moment may become unreasonable at the next, and that officers are obliged to respond accordingly[.] . . . And even if that were not sufficient, there still would be our determination in Vathekan that a police officer may not use a canine attack as a first resort against a person found on the scene of a suspected burglary — after a resident has assured the police that no innocent person should be on the premises — in order to rule out the possibility that he or she is a burglar or otherwise poses a threat. . . . Unless we are going to require that the precise conduct at issue already have been held unlawful in order to defeat qualified immunity — which we do not, . . . then surely this is close enough. . . . And then, finally, there is common sense. . . . Garrison was tracking an unarmed-robbery suspect with no reported accomplice at around 10:00 p.m., while accompanied by a second police officer and a police canine. While I do not doubt that finding Maney crouched outside a vacant house may have been startling and even frightening — notwithstanding Garrison's awareness of the homeless camp in the immediate vicinity — common sense would dictate that use of a violent canine attack to address those fears was an overreaction. And if there is a paucity of case law addressing the intentional use of a police canine attack against a non-fleeing, non-resisting, non-suspect in a non-armed robbery, common sense tells us that this is because the principles of Terry and Graham are sufficiently clear that no reasonable police officer could so badly misjudge their application. In the end, what is missing from this case is any sense of proportionality, the touchstone of Graham's objective reasonableness standard. . . Garrison imposed an enormous cost on Maney when he allowed Bikkel to continue his savage attack. He did so intentionally, knowing that Maney was not the suspect he was tracking, without any indication that Maney was armed, and absent any resistance by Maney, in order to address an inchoate concern that Maney nevertheless might pose some threat. Because I believe that the Fourth Amendment unmistakably renders that response disproportionate and excessive, I must respectfully dissent.”)

Jones v. Chandrasuwan, 820 F.3d 685, 691-96 (4th Cir. 2016) (“While courts have the discretion to decide which of the steps to address first, based on the facts and circumstances of the case at hand, the two-step procedure is ‘often appropriate’ and ‘beneficial’ because it ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent.’ . . . Indeed, ‘our regular policy of avoidance’ often ‘threatens to leave standards of official conduct permanently in limbo.’ . . . To prevent that problem, the Supreme Court permits ‘lower courts to determine whether a right exists before examining whether it was clearly established.’ . . . Nevertheless, the Supreme Court instructs courts to ‘think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.’ . . . After thinking hard about it twice, we determine that the two-step procedure is appropriate in this case in order to clearly establish the standard that probation officers must meet in order to arrest a probationer who allegedly violated the conditions of his probation. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has announced the level of suspicion required under the Fourth Amendment to arrest a probationer for a suspected probation violation. The Supreme Court faced an analogous issue in Knights—the level of suspicion required for searches of probationers—which provides guidance in the arrest context. In Knights, the Supreme Court determined that, where a probationer was subject to a probation condition that his person or property could be searched at any time without a warrant, reasonable suspicion that the probationer is engaged in criminal activity is enough to make a search reasonable. . . . After Knights, it remains an open question whether a suspicionless search of a probationer can be constitutional. . . . Additionally, the Supreme Court has upheld suspicionless searches of parolees pursuant to a state statute allowing for such searches. . . . However, the privacy interests and governmental interests implicated in arrests and searches are sufficiently different to foreclose the possibility of a constitutional suspicionless arrest of a probationer. . . . Suspicionless arrests implicate obvious privacy concerns while doing little to advance the government’s ‘two primary goals of probation—rehabilitation and protecting society from future criminal violations.’ . . . While the privacy concerns implicated by an arrest are certainly substantial, balancing the governmental and private interests supports a degree of suspicion lower than probable cause for arresting a probationer for an alleged probation violation. . . . Therefore, we hold that probation officers must have reasonable suspicion before seeking the arrest of a probationer for allegedly violating conditions of his probation. . . . Relying on Knights, we hold that reasonable suspicion in the arrest context is present when there is a sufficiently high probability that a probationer has violated the terms of his probation to make the intrusion on the individual’s privacy interest reasonable. . . . Appellees could not have had reasonable suspicion that Jones violated a condition of probation by failing to pay his costs and fines because there was no enforceable condition requiring him to pay the costs and fines before the termination of his probation. . . . In seeking Jones’s arrest, Appellees also claimed that Jones had absconded from supervision. . . . Appellees did not have reasonable suspicion that Jones had absconded. Their attempts to reach Jones were completely outside of the Compact. They had no communications with Georgia probation officials, who Appellees acknowledge were supervising Jones’s probation. . . . Quite simply, there was not a sufficiently high probability that Jones absconded because no effort was made to contact the office responsible for supervising Jones’s probation. Therefore, Appellees violated Jones’s Fourth Amendment rights by seeking his arrest for alleged probation violations without reasonable suspicion. . . . As discussed above, neither the Supreme Court nor this Court had announced the level of suspicion required under the Fourth Amendment to arrest a probationer for a suspected probation violation. In other words, precedent had not placed the level of suspicion required to arrest a probationer ‘beyond debate.’ . . . The district court acknowledged that ‘this area of the Fourth Amendment is particularly murky.’ . . . This ‘murkiness’ is also demonstrated by the fact that Jones originally argued that Appellees violated his rights by arresting him without probable cause, before later settling on a reasonable suspicion standard. As discussed above, precedent had not definitively ruled out suspicionless arrests of probationers. Therefore, we conclude that the standard required by the Fourth Amendment to arrest a probationer was not clearly established at the time Appellees sought Jones’s arrest for allegedly violating the terms of his probation. . . . Although we find that Appellees violated Jones’s Fourth Amendment rights, we affirm the district court’s conclusion that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly established at the time Appellees sought Jones’s arrest.”)

Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Vill. of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892, 895, 901-10 (4th Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 61 (2017) (“On review, we hold that Appellees used unconstitutionally excessive force when seizing Armstrong, but we, nevertheless, agree with the district court that Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. We, therefore, affirm the grant of summary judgment in Appellees’ favor on the grounds explained below. . . . Noncompliance with lawful orders justifies some use of force, but the level of justified force varies based on the risks posed by the resistance. . . . And, here, the factual circumstances demonstrate little risk—Armstrong was stationary, non-violent, and surrounded by people willing to help return him to the Hospital. That Armstrong was not allowing his arms to be pulled from the post and was refusing to comply with shouted orders to let go, while cause for some concern, do not import much danger or urgency into a situation that was, in effect, a static impasse. . . . Deploying a taser is a serious use of force. . . . The taser use at issue in this case . . . contravenes current industry and manufacturer recommendations. . . . In 2013, moreover, Taser International, the manufacturer of the taser Appellees used in this case, warned, ‘Drive-stun use may not be effective on emotionally disturbed persons or others who may not respond to pain due to a mind-body disconnect.’ . . . Taser users, the warning goes on, should ‘[a]void using repeated drive-stuns on such individuals if compliance is not achieved.’ . . . Even the company that manufactures tasers, in other words, now warns against the precise type of taser use inflicted on Armstrong. Force that imposes serious consequences requires significant circumscription. Our precedent, consequently, makes clear that tasers are proportional force only when deployed in response to a situation in which a reasonable officer would perceive some immediate danger that could be mitigated by using the taser. . . . While the questions whether an arrestee has been restrained and is complying with police directives are, of course, relevant to any inquiry into the extent to which the arrestee ‘pose[s] a continuing threat to the officers’ safety,’ . . . they are not dispositive. A rule limiting taser use to situations involving a proportional safety threat does not countenance use in situations where an unrestrained arrestee, though resistant, presents no serious safety threat. Indeed, application of physical restraints cannot be the only way to ensure that an arrestee does not pose a sufficient safety threat to justify a tasing. If it were, use of a taser would be justified at the outset of every lawful seizure, before an arrestee has been restrained. This, of course, is not the law. . . . Unsurprisingly, then, other circuits have held that taser use can constitute excessive force when used in response to non-violent resistance. . . . And this conclusion, that taser use is unreasonable force in response to resistance that does not raise a risk of immediate danger, is consistent with our treatment of police officers’ more traditional tools of compliance. . . . Our precedent, then, leads to the conclusion that a police officer may only use serious injurious force, like a taser, when an objectively reasonable officer would conclude that the circumstances present a risk of immediate danger that could be mitigated by the use of force. At bottom, ‘physical resistance’ is not synonymous with ‘risk of immediate danger.’ . . . Therefore, in the case before us, Appellees’ use of force is only ‘proportional[] ... in light of all the circumstances,’ . . . if Armstrong’s resistance raised a risk of immediate danger that outweighs the Graham factors militating against harming Armstrong. But when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Appellant, they simply do not support that conclusion. Under these facts, when Officer Gatling deployed his taser, Armstrong was a mentally ill man being seized for his own protection, was seated on the ground, was hugging a post to ensure his immobility, was surrounded by three police officers and two Hospital security guards, . . . and had failed to submit to a lawful seizure for only 30 seconds. A reasonable officer would have perceived a static stalemate with few, if any, exigencies—not an immediate danger so severe that the officer must beget the exact harm the seizure was intended to avoid. . . . Appellees, therefore, are not entitled to summary judgment on the question whether they violated the Constitution. Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Appellant, Appellees used excessive force, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The constitutional right in question in the present case, defined with regard for Appellees’ particular violative conduct, is Armstrong’s right not to be subjected to tasing while offering stationary and non-violent resistance to a lawful seizure. . . . While our precedent supports our conclusion that Appellees violated that right when seizing Armstrong, we acknowledge that this conclusion was not so settled at the time they acted such that ‘every reasonable official would have understood that’ tasing Armstrong was unconstitutional. . . . A survey of other circuits’ case law confirms that Appellees did not have sufficiently clear guidance to forfeit qualified immunity. . . . Other circuits, in short, have sometimes distinguished permissible and impermissible tasing based on facts establishing bare noncompliance rather than facts establishing a risk of danger. Because Armstrong was not complying with Appellees’ commands, these cases negate the existence of any ‘consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ across our sister circuits ‘such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . . We conclude, therefore, that Armstrong’s right not to be tased while offering stationary and non-violent resistance to a lawful seizure was not clearly established on April 23, 2011. . . . This ought not remain an evolving field of law indefinitely though. ‘Without merits adjudication, the legal rule[s]’ governing evolving fields of constitutional law ‘remain unclear.’ John C. Jeffries, Jr., Reversing the Order of Battle in Constitutional Torts, 2009 Sup.Ct. Rev. 115, 120. ‘What may not be quite so obvious, but is in fact far more important, is the degradation of constitutional rights that may result when ... constitutional tort claims are resolved solely on grounds of qualified immunity.’ . . . This degradation is most pernicious to rights that are rarely litigated outside the context of § 1983 actions subject to qualified immunity—rights like the Fourth Amendment protection against excessive force at issue here. . . . Rather than accept this deteriorative creep, we intend this opinion to clarify when taser use amounts to excessive force in, at least, some circumstances. A taser, like ‘a gun, a baton, ... or other weapon,’ . . . is expected to inflict pain or injury when deployed. It, therefore, may only be deployed when a police officer is confronted with an exigency that creates an immediate safety risk and that is reasonably likely to be cured by using the taser. The subject of a seizure does not create such a risk simply because he is doing something that can be characterized as resistance—even when that resistance includes physically preventing an officer’s manipulations of his body. Erratic behavior and mental illness do not necessarily create a safety risk either. To the contrary, when a seizure is intended solely to prevent a mentally ill individual from harming himself, the officer effecting the seizure has a lessened interest in deploying potentially harmful force. Where, during the course of seizing an out-numbered mentally ill individual who is a danger only to himself, police officers choose to deploy a taser in the face of stationary and non-violent resistance to being handcuffed, those officers use unreasonably excessive force. While qualified immunity shields the officers in this case from liability, law enforcement officers should now be on notice that such taser use violates the Fourth Amendment.”)

Estate of Armstrong ex rel. Armstrong v. Vill. of Pinehurst, 810 F.3d 892, 910-13 (4th Cir. 2016) (Wilkinson, J., concurring in part), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 61 (2017) (“I am happy to concur in the judgment of affirmance and in Part III.C of the majority opinion. Having resolved the case by properly awarding judgment to defendants on qualified immunity grounds, the majority had no need to opine on the merits of the excessive force claim. In fact, it runs serious risks in doing so. This was a close case, the very kind of dispute in which judicial hindsight should not displace the officers’ judgmental calls. I do not contend that the officers’ behavior was impeccable here, but I do believe, with the district court, that it was not the kind of action that merited an award of monetary damages. . . . Having thoughtfully resolved the appeal on qualified immunity grounds, . . . the majority launches into an extended discussion on the merits of the excessive force claim. This is so unnecessary. Sometimes it is best for courts not to write large upon the world but to discharge our simple rustic duty to decide the case. . . . Today’s prescription may not fit tomorrow’s facts and circumstances. Our rather abstract pronouncements in one case may be of little assistance with the realities and particulars of another. . . . Clarity is arguably most difficult to achieve in Fourth Amendment cases because bright-line rules at most imperfectly take account of the slight shifts in real-life situations that can alter what are inescapably close judgment calls. . . . It is hard to disagree with the majority’s highly generalized assertion that Taser use is unwarranted ‘where an unrestrained arrestee, though resistant, presents no serious safety threat.’ . . . But of course, what conduct qualifies as ‘resistant,’ and what rises to the level of a ‘serious safety threat’ is once again dependent on the actual and infinitely variable facts and circumstances that confront officers on their beat. . . .The majority has left it all up in the air. And its approach to this case is not without consequence. The great majority of mentally ill persons pose no serious danger to themselves or others and the challenge of society is to help these good people lead more satisfying lives. A smaller subset of the mentally ill do pose the greatest sort of danger, not only to themselves but to large numbers of people as the string of mass shootings in this country will attest. It is difficult sometimes for even seasoned professionals to predict which is which, not to mention officers and others with more limited training. And yet it is important in this area that law not lose its preventive aspect. It can be heartbreaking to wait until the damage is done. Delivering vague proclamations about do's and don'ts runs the risk of incentivizing officers to take no action, and in doing so to leave individuals and their prospective victims to their unhappy fates. Law enforcement will learn soon enough that sins of omission are generally not actionable. . . .And in the face of nebulae from the courts, the natural human reaction will be to desist. Perhaps this is what we mean to achieve, but over-deterrence carries its own risks, namely that those who badly need help will receive no help, and we shall be the poorer for it.”)

Raub v. Campbell, 785 F.3d 876, 881-84 (4th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 503 (2015) (“Raub’s Fourth Amendment argument is based on the claim that Campbell acted without probable cause in recommending that Raub be taken into custody for a mental health evaluation, and when he petitioned the state court for a temporary detention order. We choose, however, not to reach the question of whether Campbell’s conduct amounted to a constitutional violation. Rather, we hold that because Campbell’s conduct was not proscribed by clearly established law, summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity was proper. . . .In this prong of the qualified immunity analysis, the ‘inquiry turns on the objective legal reasonableness of [Campbell’s] action, assessed in light of the legal rules that were clearly established at the time it was taken.’ . . .As a result, we look not to whether the right allegedly violated was established ‘as a broad general proposition’ but whether ‘it would be clear to a reasonable official that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.’ . . . [T]o the extent the cases should have informed Campbell’s conduct, they support the view that he acted reasonably under our prevailing legal standards. Unlike in Bailey, Campbell’s recommendation that Raub be detained was supported by far more than a 911 call. Rather, it was based on the initial observations of law enforcement officers, the content of Raub’s Facebook posts, the information provided by Raub’s former colleagues, and—later—on Campbell’s own evaluation and observations of Raub. Indeed, the quantum of evidence here is greater than that in Cloaninger—where we found probable cause based only on an initial hospital call, a history of suicide reports, and a belief that Cloaninger possessed firearms—and is more like the circumstances in Gooden and S.P.—where officers based their seizure on both prior reports of distress and their personal observations of individuals at the scene. In sum, we think it doubtful that Campbell violated Raub’s Fourth Amendment rights based on our existing precedent. We need not, however, pass on that question because we hold that Campbell is entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that the unlawfulness (if any) of his conduct was not clearly established at the time he recommended Raub’s seizure.”)

West v. Murphy, 771 F.3d 209, 212-16 (4th Cir. 2014) (“In 2007, the district court initially denied defendants’ motions to dismiss, holding that the wardens were not entitled to qualified immunity because ‘the right of those arrested for offenses not likely to involve weapons or contraband to be free from strip searches without any individualized finding of reasonable suspicion appears to be clearly established’ in the Fourth Circuit. . . . However, the court reversed course in its 2013 summary judgment opinion, highlighting ‘the present lack of a clear test applicable to the specific circumstances of detention practices at [Central Booking] during the years at issue in this litigation.’. . . This more recent decision is the subject of this appeal. The Supreme Court’s intervening decision in Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 132 S.Ct. 1510 (2012), prompted the district court to change direction. The Supreme Court held that ‘every detainee who will be admitted to the general population [of a jail] may be required to undergo a close visual inspection while undressed.’. . . The district court determined that Florence ‘overruled some aspects of Fourth Circuit law’ on which the 2007 decision had ‘relied,’ and ‘left the contours of any “exception” that would apply to the plaintiffs in this case unclear and open to debate.’. . . We may address either prong of the qualified immunity analysis first. [citing Pearson] Here the availability of the qualified immunity defense makes it unnecessary to take up the merits of plaintiffs’ constitutional challenge. . . . Defendants contend, and the district court held, Jones v. Murphy, 2013 WL 822372, at *6 (D. Md. Mar. 5, 2013), that Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 132 S.Ct. 1510 (2012), demonstrates that the law was not clearly established even though that decision came several years after the close of the class period. The relevant question, however, is whether the law was clearly established as of the time of the search. . . . This temporal element inheres in qualified immunity because the inquiry into ‘clearly established law’ is tethered to the need for notice. Public officials, no less than private citizens, are entitled to know when their actions violate the law. Notice means prior notice, not notice after the fact. . . . Decisions issued after the allegedly unconstitutional conduct do not affect whether the law was clearly established at the time of the conduct unless, of course, the later decision addresses or otherwise illuminates whether the law was clearly established at the time of the challenged official action. In some instances, the law may change for the apparent benefit of government officials. But though such a change in law may indicate that there was no constitutional violation on the merits, it does not affect whether the law was clearly established because the favorable judicial decision could not have informed the officials’ understanding of whether their actions were unlawful. Of course the need for prior notice is a two-way street. It is just as likely that a later-in-time judicial decision could clearly establish the illegality of the conduct in question. But later-in-time is not at the time, and prescience is not to be presumed in granting or withholding the immunity. The Supreme Court decided Florence on April 2, 2012. . . . The class period in this case ran from May 12, 2002, until April 30, 2008. . . . As Florence came down almost four years after the class period closed, it does not demonstrate that the law on jail strip searches either was or was not clearly established at the time these alleged searches were conducted. . . . Under the Bell balancing test, the searches in Logan, Amaechi, and Abshire were unconstitutional because there were no security reasons strong enough to justify the intrusive and public nature of the searches. The searches allegedly performed at Central Booking, however, were conducted in a different and less public setting than those described by our precedents, and the security justifications for the Central Booking searches were more compelling. We do not address the constitutional merits of these searches. But ‘[g]iven such an undeveloped state of the law,’ the immunity defense does not permit us to tax correctional officers with clairvoyance. . . The district court ultimately was correct that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the law did not clearly establish at the time that the searches were conducted that they were unlawful.”)

West v. Murphy, 771 F.3d 209, 217 (4th Cir. 2014) (Wynn, J., concurring) (“I concur in the well-reasoned majority opinion. I write separately to underscore the importance of addressing the legality of strip searching detainees held outside the general population in the appropriate case. . . . [I]n Florence, the Supreme Court staked out an important limitation to its holding. Florence does not apply to strip searches of detainees held outside of the general population. It now falls to us to apply the Constitution and relevant precedent to those cases that Florence does not control. Clearly, as this Court holds today, our ruling in Logan v. Shealy does not put officers on reasonable notice as to the limits the Constitution places on strip searches under the circumstances of this case. . . This Circuit has held that it is appropriate to address the constitutional merits in a qualified immunity case where doing so would ‘clarify and elaborate upon our prior jurisprudence in important and necessary ways.’ . . . There can be no question that our jurisprudence in this area needs clarification and elaboration. Unfortunately, by not reaching the constitutional merits in this matter, we leave corrections officers adrift in uncharted waters. Nonetheless, because the trial court confined itself to the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity analysis and did not reach the constitutional merits, and because the parties focused on the ‘clearly established’ prong on appeal, I join with the majority opinion in delaying our consideration of this important constitutional issue for another day.”)

Cantley v. W. Virginia Reg’l Jail & Corr. Facility Auth., 771 F.3d 201, 205-07 (4th Cir. 2014) (“The district court found that the strip search of Teter ‘struck a reasonable balance between the need to provide safety and security at the facility and Mr. Teter’s privacy interests’ and thus held that the search was constitutional. . . The doctrine of qualified immunity protects defendants in § 1983 suits from the burden of going to trial where the ‘conduct [at issue] does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . A defendant is entitled to judgment if either ‘the facts ... [do not] make out a violation of a constitutional right’ or if the law was not “‘clearly established” at the time of defendant’s alleged misconduct.’ . . . We may address either prong of this analysis first . . . and we find it unnecessary to reach the constitutional merits of the strip search of Teter. . . . Logan did not clearly establish that it was unconstitutional for a correctional officer to conduct a visual strip search in a private room of an arrestee, who was to be held until the next morning in a holding cell with possibly a dozen or more other arrestees. Because the law was not clearly established, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the strip search of Teter. . . . The district court held that the delousing of both Cantley and Teter was constitutional and granted summary judgment on the delousing claims. . . . We affirm the grant of summary judgment, but on the grounds that it was not clearly established that the delousing policy was unconstitutional. . . . In short, at the time of the delousing, ‘existing precedent [did not] place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2083 (2011). The defendants thus are entitled to qualified immunity for the delousing of Cantley and Teter.”)

Cantley v. W. Virginia Reg’l Jail & Corr. Facility Auth., 771 F.3d 201, 208 (4th Cir. 2014) (Wynn, J., concurring) (“The majority opinion does not reach the precise question of whether the strip search conducted on Floyd Teter was unconstitutional, but it does cast serious doubt on the legality of similar searches going forward. . . In my view, strip searching pre-arraignment detainees who are held outside the general population of a detention facility is unconstitutional absent reasonable suspicion. See Florence v. Bd. of Chosen Freeholders of Cnty. of Burlington, 132 S.Ct. 1510, 1523 (2012) (Roberts, C.J., concurring); id. at 1524 (Alito, J., concurring); id. at 1525 (Breyer, J., joined by Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ., dissenting). I agree with the majority that corrections administrators would be wise to take into account recent changes in the legal landscape governing strip searches when crafting policy in this area, particularly in light of the varying opinions in Florence.”)

Santos v. Frederick County Bd. of Com’rs, 725 F.3d 451, 463-65, 468, 469 (4th Cir. 2013) (“Because the Constitution grants Congress plenary authority over immigration, Johnson v. Whitehead, 647 F.3d 120, 126–27 (4th Cir.2011), state and local law enforcement officers may participate in the enforcement of federal immigration laws only in ‘specific, limited circumstances’ authorized by Congress, Arizona v. United States, 132 S. Ct. at 2507. . . .[W]e hold that, absent express direction or authorization by federal statute or federal officials, state and local law enforcement officers may not detain or arrest an individual solely based on known or suspected civil violations of federal immigration law. Like the district court, we conclude that the deputies seized Santos for purposes of the Fourth Amendment when Deputy Openshaw gestured for her to stay seated after dispatch informed him of the outstanding civil ICE deportation warrant. . . At that time, the deputies’ only basis for detaining Santos was the civil ICE warrant. Yet as the defendants concede, the deputies were not authorized to engage in immigration law enforcement under the Sheriff’s Office’s Section 1357(g)(1) agreement with the Attorney General. They thus lacked authority to enforce civil immigration law and violated Santos’s rights under the Fourth Amendment when they seized her solely on the basis of the outstanding civil ICE warrant. . . . In sum, the deputies violated Santos’s rights under the Fourth Amendment when they seized her after learning that she was the subject of a civil immigration warrant and absent ICE’s express authorization or direction. . . .Even though the deputies violated Santos’s rights under the Fourth Amendment, the deputies still may be entitled to qualified immunity if the right was not clearly established at the time of the seizure. . . .For three reasons, we conclude that when the deputies detained Santos, it was not clearly established that local law enforcement officers may not detain or arrest an individual based solely on a suspected or known violation of federal civil immigration law. First, the Supreme Court did not directly address the role of state and local officers in enforcement of federal civil immigration law until Arizona v. United States, which was decided more than three years after the deputies’ encounter with Santos. Second, until today, this Court had not established that local law enforcement officers may not seize individuals for civil immigration violations. Therefore, no controlling precedent put the deputies on notice that their actions violated Santos’s constitutional rights. And finally, before Arizona v. United States, our Sister Circuits were split on whether local law enforcement officers could arrest aliens for civil immigration violations.”)

Hensley v. Koller, 722 F.3d 177, 181 (4th Cir. 2013) (“A court may address the second question—whether a right is clearly established—without ruling on the first-existence of the right. . . But ‘there are cases in which there would be little if any conservation of judicial resources to be had by beginning and ending with a discussion of the “clearly established” prong.’ . . This is such a case. The Hensleys seek injunctive and declaratory relief in addition to money damages. A determination that a right is not clearly established only shields a state official from money damages. . . Thus, if we resolved the case on the ground that no clearly established law permits an award of damages against the state officials, the case would necessarily return to the district court for a determination of the availability of injunctive and declaratory relief. Here, the ‘conservation of judicial resources,’ . . weighs strongly in favor of resolving the question of whether the Directors violated the Hensleys’ federal rights. For this reason, we begin (and end) with the first step of Saucier’s two-step inquiry—determination of whether § 673(a)(3) creates a privately enforceable right to parental concurrence, which the Directors have violated.”) [Court concludes The Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 does create a privately enforceable right to parental concurrence in change of adoption assistance payments but that the right was not violated]

Williams v. Ozmint, 716 F.3d 801, 805, 806 (4th Cir. 2013) (“A court may exercise its discretion to determine which of the two steps of the qualified immunity analysis ‘should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . In the present case, we exercise our discretion to determine first whether Williams had a clearly established constitutional right to visitation at the time of the warden’s decision. Williams does not cite any case, or combination of cases, from this Court, the Supreme Court, or the highest court in South Carolina, that clearly establishes a constitutional right to visitation in prison grounded in the First, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments. . . Having failed to do so, Williams also necessarily has failed to identify any authority establishing a right to such visitation that could not be restricted by prison officials under the facts presented here. The absence of controlling constitutional authority in this regard thus forecloses Williams’ argument that, upon application of an objective standard, the warden should have been aware that his conduct violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Like the Supreme Court in Overton, we need not determine the issue whether, by virtue of their incarceration, prisoners may be deprived of all associational rights in all instances, nor need we define the boundaries of any such associational rights. . . Qualified immunity serves to protect officers from suit for money damages in cases involving ‘gray areas’ of constitutional rights or the violation of such asserted rights. . . In view of controlling precedent, and upon application of the above standards, we conclude that the warden’s action suspending Williams’ visitation privileges for two years did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. Accordingly, we hold that the warden is entitled to qualified immunity on Williams’ claim for monetary damages arising from the suspension of his visitation privileges. . . . In view of our conclusion that the warden did not violate clearly established law, we need not address the first step of the Saucier analysis, namely, whether a constitutional violation occurred.”)

Evans v. Chalmers, 703 F.3d 636, 647-49 (4th Cir. 2012) (“[E]ven when, as here, a prosecutor retains all discretion to seek an indictment, . . . police officers may be held to have caused the seizure and remain liable to a wrongfully indicted defendant under certain circumstances. In particular, officers may be liable when they have lied to or misled the prosecutor, . . . failed to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutor, . . . or unduly pressured the prosecutor to seek the indictment [I]t seems contrary to the very purpose of qualified immunity to extend personal liability to police officers who have assertedly conspired with, but neither misled nor unduly pressured, an independent prosecutor. Police officers and prosecutors often work together to establish probable cause and seek indictments; such collaboration could always be characterized as a ‘conspiracy.’ Allowing § 1983 claims against police officers to proceed on allegations of such a ‘conspiracy’ would in virtually every case render the officers’ qualified immunity from suit ‘effectively lost,’ . . . and make discovery the rule, rather than the exception

Thus, we hold today that an alleged officer-prosecutor conspiracy does not alter the rule that a prosecutor’s independent decision to seek an indictment breaks the causal chain unless the officer has misled or unduly pressured the prosecutor. . . . Because the Evans plaintiffs do not allege that Officers Gottlieb and Himan either misled or pressured Nifong to seek their indictments, we reverse the district court’s denial of the officers’ motions to dismiss the Evans plaintiffs’ § 1983 malicious prosecution claims against them.”)

Durham v. Horner, 690 F.3d 183, 188 (4th Cir. 2012) (“Put succinctly, Durham’s ‘malicious prosecution’ claim fails the first step of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . Although ‘it is not entirely clear whether [there is] a separate constitutional right to be free from malicious prosecution, if there is such a right, the plaintiff must demonstrate both an unreasonable seizure and a favorable termination of the criminal proceeding flowing from the seizure.’ . . . Thus, what has been inartfully ‘termed a “malicious prosecution” claim . . . is simply a claim founded on a Fourth Amendment seizure that incorporates the elements of the analogous common law tort of malicious prosecution.’ . . . More specifically, ‘we have required that [1] the defendant have “seized plaintiff pursuant to legal process that was not supported by probable cause and [2] that the criminal proceedings have terminated in plaintiff’s favor.”’ . . . Durham is unable to establish a constitutional violation because, although the underlying criminal proceedings were terminated in his favor, the prosecution was plainly supported by probable cause, as conclusively established by the three indictments.”)

Lebron v. Rumsfeld, 670 F.3d 540, 557-60 (4th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2751 (2012) (“There exist strong reasons for defendants to believe that RFRA did not apply to enemy combatants detained by the military. Indeed, no authority suggested to the contrary. And the defendants have asserted that, at the very least, they are entitled to the qualified immunity available to public officials on the grounds that ‘any rights that enemy combatants may have had under RFRA were not clearly established during the period of Padilla’s military detention.’ . . . We agree.

This case is an appropriate one for the recognition of the immunity defense because it would run counter to basic notions of notice and fair warning to hold that personal liability in such an unsettled area of law might attach. The following discussion underscores why it would be impermissible for us to conclude that the relevant law was clearly established in anything like a manner that would vitiate a qualified immunity defense. We thus dismiss Padilla's RFRA claim on qualified immunity grounds. . . . Padilla offers us no evidence to support the conclusion that RFRA supplies an action at law to enemy combatants in military detention. . . . Indeed, the same concerns about judicial interference with the military that caused us to hesitate in implying a Bivens action give us pause in interpreting this statute to achieve an equally unanticipated and comparably disruptive outcome. . . . Were Congress to prefer damages actions over alternate remedies for those in Padilla's situation, that would be one thing. But we have no indication that Congress even considered the prospect of RFRA actions brought by enemy combatants with anything like the care that it has customarily devoted to matters of such surpassing sensitivity. The foregoing discussion underscores what we believe are considerable obstacles to applying RFRA in this context. But we need not go so far as to announce such a proposition in its most absolute terms. Under Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), we are permitted to explain directly why 'there was no violation of clearly established law.' . . . As set forth in Pearson, the qualified immunity inquiry is hardly an empty one. For here it brings us to the threshold question of whether RFRA even speaks to the military detention setting. We think it anything but clearly established that it does. At the very least, the defendants transgressed no clearly established law in this area, and to hold them personally liable in the absence of clear notice that such a prospect was even possible would run counter to the reasons that the immunity exists. . . . For the reasons heretofore expressed, we hold that the defendants have asserted a valid qualified immunity defense to Padilla's RFRA claim.")

Lesueur-Richmond Slate Corp. v. Fehrer, 666 F.3d 261, 264, 269 (4th Cir. 2012) ("When qualified immunity is asserted, the reviewing court should usually first ask whether the right was violated on the facts alleged, and then determine whether that right was 'clearly established.' . . . We therefore first consider LeSueur-Richmond's Fourth Amendment claims before addressing qualified immunity. . . . [W]here the searches were objectively supported by multiple complaints to which the inspectors were responding and there was no indication that the inspections were a pretext for harassment or other improper conduct, there was no Fourth Amendment violation. We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of LeSueur-Richmond's complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. . . . Here, having found that there was no constitutional violation, we must conclude that Appellees are protected by qualified immunity.")

Braun v. Maynard, 652 F.3d 557, 560 (4th Cir. 2011) ("In keeping with courts' reluctance to answer constitutional questions unnecessarily, we may determine whether the constitutional rights allegedly violated here were clearly established without first determining whether those rights exist at all. . . . In this case, we need not address whether the searches violated the Constitution. Inasmuch as the law regarding Ionscans and searches in the prison employee context was not clearly established, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . For purposes of this case, it has never been clearly established that a strip or visual body cavity search after an Ionscan alarm cannot satisfy Fourth Amendment standards.”)

Stickley v. Sutherly, No. 09-2317, 2011 WL 893760, at *2, *3 (4th Cir. Mar. 14, 2011) (“Having heard the parties’ arguments and reviewed the record, we believe it appropriate to forego making a determination of whether defendants actually violated Stickley’s First Amendment rights. Instead, we consider only whether Stickley’s right to comment on his demotion within the Strasburg Police Department was clearly established at the time defendants dismissed him from the force. . . . Having reviewed the substantive law governing employee speech, we are persuaded that the law in this area is not ‘clearly established’ such that a reasonable person would have known what the law necessarily required in many cases. We reach this conclusion because the language of the Connick test itself and the nuanced and careful approach the test requires lead to the conclusion that an employee’s right to speech in any particular situation will often not be immediately evident. The first prong of the test requires a determination of whether the employee’s speech is on a ‘matter of public concern.’ This is a highly fact-intensive inquiry, which may be influenced by any variety of factors. Moreover, the line marking when something becomes a matter of public concern is blurry, and thus the boundary confining a public official’s behavior is hard to discern. The second prong of the test may be even more problematic because it requires a balancing of the employee’s and the employer’s competing interests. This not only requires a keen understanding of the respective interests of each party, but also necessitates a conclusion as to which interests are more substantial. This conclusion, in turn, becomes an inherently subjective task, and it is the subjective nature of the inquiry— especially when an official must undertake it ex ante—that makes the inquiry problematic from a qualified immunity standpoint. As we have stated before, ‘where a sophisticated balancing of interests is required to determine whether the plaintiff’s constitutional rights have been violated, “only infrequently will it be ‘clearly established’ that a public employee’s speech on a matter of public concern is constitutionally protected.”’)

Doe ex rel. Johnson v. South Carolina Dept. of Social Services, 597 F.3d 163, 175-77 (4th Cir. 2010) (“We now hold that when a state involuntarily removes a child from her home, thereby taking the child into its custody and care, the state has taken an affirmative act to restrain the child’s liberty, triggering the protections of the Due Process Clause and imposing ‘some responsibility for [the child’s] safety and general well-being.’ . . . Such responsibility, in turn, includes a duty not to make a foster care placement that is deliberately indifferent to the child’s right to personal safety and security. . . . [U]nlike the children in DeShaney, Milburn and Weller, Jane was clearly within the custody and control of the state social services department when foster care placement decisions were made. Accordingly, the state officials responsible for those decisions had a corresponding duty to refrain from placing her in a known, dangerous environment in deliberate indifference to her right to personal safety and security. We affirm the grant of summary judgment, however, under the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. Although our precedents do not foreclose a foster child’s claim that her substantive due process right to personal safety and security is violated by a foster care placement made in deliberate indifference to a known danger, such a right was not clearly established in this circuit at the time Thompson made her placement decisions regarding Jane. In determining whether there has been a violation of a constitutional right, we must identify the right ‘at a high level of particularity.’ . . . Here, when the placement decisions were made, there was no authority from the Supreme Court or this circuit that would have put Thompson on fair notice that her actions violated Jane’s substantive due process rights. On the contrary, given the precedents that did exist in our circuit on the issue of affirmative state protection of foster children, we think it quite reasonable for jurists and officials to have believed that we would have answered the DeShaney question in the negative and foreclosed the existence of such a right. In sum, because it would not have been apparent to a reasonable social worker in Thompson’s position that her actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment, she is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Pritchard v. Mobley, No. 4:20-CV-00060-M, 2022 WL 983159, at *8–11 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 30, 2022) (“Officer Mobley shot Pritchard in the back without giving a verbal warning, so the inquiry asks whether every reasonable officer would have understood that Pritchard did not pose an immediate threat of serious physical harm to the officer or others under the circumstances. The circumstances include that Pritchard (1) was the subject of a lawful traffic stop, (2) had just jumped out in front of an approaching officer holding a pistol, and (3) ran away toward a residence without pointing the pistol at the officer when (4) the officer knew he was a felon prohibited from possessing firearms and (5) had reason to suspect he had recently engaged in gun violence. No decision had decided these facts or set a clear rule resolving them. Nor had any analogous decisions moved the use of deadly force under these circumstances out from the ‘unsettled peripheries of the law.’ . . . Officer Mobley is thus entitled to qualified immunity. To start, these circumstances have not been addressed by any binding decision cited by the parties or found by the court. Even framed in general terms—for example, using deadly force against an armed fleeing felon—the question is unsettled. Consider the Fourth Circuit’s recent statement in Estate of Jones by Jones v. City of Martinsburg, West Virginia, 961 F.3d 661 (4th Cir. 2020). . . . The panel held that it was clearly established in 2013 that officers could not use deadly force against an armed suspect who was secured and incapacitated. . . . It supported this conclusion, in part, by noting that the man officers encountered walking in the street ‘was not an armed felon on the run.’. . . To be sure, Estate of Jones does not go so far as to say that deadly force would have been reasonable had he—like Pritchard—been an armed felon fleeing from officers. That said, drawing this contrast would make little sense if it had also been clearly established in 2013 that deadly force was unreasonable under those more threatening circumstances. At the very least, Estate of Jones evidences a lack of clarity about the use of deadly force against armed fleeing felons at a relevant time. Turning to cases addressing suspects possessing firearms, the Fourth [Circuit] rejected two general rules that would have settled this question in Cooper. On the one hand, Cooper holds that a reasonable officer could not use deadly force against Pritchard merely because he possessed a firearm. . . . On the other hand, Cooper refused to condition the reasonable use of deadly force against an armed suspect like Pritchard on his ‘engaging] in some specific action—such as pointing, aiming, or firing his weapon.’. . . Instead, Cooper recognizes that ‘[p]ursuant to Tennessee v. Garner and its progeny, there are many circumstances under which a police officer could reasonably feel threatened.’. . . Without a decision or rule directly on point, the question becomes whether commonsense inferences or analogies from holdings about other circumstances put the unconstitutionality of Officer Mobley's actions beyond debate. . . . Given the fact-driven nature of the objective reasonableness inquiry, Scott cautions courts against venturing too far afield in search of such guidance. . . . Several decisions address officers shooting suspects who had not pointed firearms at them but were at least reasonably believed to be armed. Officer Mobley acted in an unsettled area beyond these cases and therefore receives qualified immunity's protection. . . . Qualified immunity precludes Officer Mobley being held liable for a split-second decision in a constitutional grey area. . . . He pleads qualified immunity as a defense . . . and the facts establish his entitlement to its protection[.] The court need not resolve the overlapping questions this encounter raises as their very existence precludes liability. This case presents the situation the Supreme Court had in mind when Pearson permitted proceeding directly to the second prong of the inquiry: one in which 'it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.' . . . Courts must avoid surprising officers with liability in these 'unsettled peripheries of the law.' . . . Thus, the court grants Officer Mobley's motion for summary judgment on the Estate's § 1983 claim.")

Rios v. Jenkins, 390 F.Supp.3d 714, ____ (W.D. Va. 2019) ("The Supreme Court has held that lower courts are 'permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' . . . The Court has urged lower courts to 'think carefully before expending "scarce judicial resources" to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will "have no effect on the outcome of the case."'. . . Therefore, addressing the second prong before the first is especially appropriate in cases where 'a court will rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law.' . . . Because this is one of those cases, the court will proceed directly to the second prong. Under the second prong, a government official is entitled to qualified immunity if the right at issue was not 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . . The Supreme Court has 'repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality. . . . In this case, Rios contends that at the time of his detention, 'it was clearly established that local law enforcement in Virginia lack[] authority to effectuate civil immigration arrests absent a 287(g) agreement,' and that local law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they detain an individual solely based on an ICE detainer and administrative warrant. . . . To support these arguments, Rios cites to two cases: Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 132 S.Ct. 2492, 183 L.Ed.2d 351 (2012); and Santos v. Frederick County Board of Commissioners, 725 F.3d. 451 (4th Cir. 2013). . . . For the following reasons, the court concludes that neither of the cited decisions placed it beyond debate that Jenkins' actions violated the Fourth Amendment, and that a reasonable official in Jenkins' position could have believed that Rios' continued detention at the request of ICE was lawful. . . . Significantly, . . . the instant case does not involve a state or local law enforcement officer's 'unilateral decision ... to arrest an alien for being removable absent any request, approval, or other instruction from the Federal Government.' . . . Instead, the complaint makes clear that the plaintiff was detained upon receipt of a 'request from federal immigration authorities' in the form of an immigration detainer and administrative warrant. . . . Contrary to the plaintiff's assertion, the Supreme Court’s decision in Arizona does not suggest, much less clearly establish, that a written 287(g) agreement is required in order for a state or local law enforcement official to lawfully detain a removable alien at the request of ICE. Nor does it otherwise make clear that compliance with ICE detainers and administrative warrants falls outside the scope of permissible ‘cooperat[ion]’ with ‘detention’ under § 1357(g)(10)(B). Instead, the Arizona decision can be read to suggest that the challenged conduct in this case—detaining an individual in accordance with an ICE detainer request and administrative warrant—‘w[as] not unilateral and thus, did not exceed the scope’ of Jenkins’ authority to cooperate with federal immigration enforcement efforts. . . . Thus, the Supreme Court’s decision did not clearly establish the unconstitutionality of the detention at issue in this case. The same is true for the Fourth Circuit’s decision in Santos v. Frederick County Board of Commissioners. In that case, the plaintiff alleged that local deputies violated her Fourth Amendment rights by seizing and arresting her based on an outstanding civil warrant for removal issued by ICE. . . . At the time of the plaintiff’s seizure, ‘the deputies’ only basis for detaining Santos was the civil ICE warrant’ reported by dispatch. . . . The deputies were not authorized to engage in immigration law enforcement pursuant to a 287(g) agreement, and they had not yet confirmed that the warrant was active. . . . Although ICE ultimately requested that Santos be detained on its behalf, the ‘request ... came fully forty-five minutes after Santos had already been arrested.’ . . . Therefore, it was ‘undisputed that the deputies’ initial seizure of Santos was not directed or authorized by ICE.’ . . . Applying Arizona, the Fourth Circuit held that, ‘absent express direction or authorization by federal statute or federal officials, state and local law enforcement officers may not detain or arrest an individual solely based on known or suspected civil violations of federal immigration law.’ . . . The facts of this case are readily distinguishable from those in Santos. Jenkins did not detain Rios based on a suspected civil immigration violation before communicating with federal authorities. Instead, Jenkins held Rios for up to 48 additional hours pursuant to the immigration detainer and administrative warrant issued by ICE. As indicated above, the detainer specifically requested that Jenkins maintain custody of Rios for an additional 48 hours beyond the time when he would otherwise have been released from the sheriff’s custody. And unlike Santos, Jenkins received the ICE detainer and administrative warrant long before the plaintiff’s detention was temporarily extended. While Rios argues that the detainer is ‘merely a request’ and therefore ‘does not constitute “ICE’s express authorization or direction” within the meaning of Santos,’ this argument finds no support in the Fourth Circuit’s decision. Rather than faulting the form of the request from ICE, the Fourth Circuit took issue with the timing of it—namely, the fact that the officers detained Santos before receiving any communication or direction from ICE. . . . The Court in no way suggested that when a state or local law enforcement officer detains someone after being requested to do so by ICE, the officer could violate the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizures. Thus, the Fourth Circuit’s decision in Santos did not put Jenkins on notice that detaining the plaintiff under the circumstances presented here would violate the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. Rios does not cite, and the court has not found, any other preexisting decisions from the Fourth Circuit or its sister circuits which clearly established the unlawfulness of Jenkins’ actions. . . . Although the Third Circuit had determined that ICE detainers are ‘permissive,’ rather than ‘mandatory,’ Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634, 642 n.9 (3d Cir. 2014), no circuit had held that it would violate the Fourth Amendment to comply with an ICE detainer and administrative warrant. The same is true today. The court recognizes that some district courts have recently determined that § 1357(g)(10) should not be ‘read to allow local law enforcement to arrest individuals for civil immigration violations at the request of ICE,’ . . . and that holding someone pursuant to an ICE detainer, without separate probable cause to believe that the person has committed a crime, ‘gives rise to a Fourth Amendment claim against the local law enforcement.’ Creedle v. Miami-Dade Cty., 349 F. Supp. 3d 1276, 1304 (S.D. Fla. 2018). However, other district courts have held to the contrary. . . . Thus, even now, it cannot be said that the constitutional and statutory questions at issue in this case are ‘beyond debate.’ . . . In sum, the court is convinced that Jenkins did not violate clearly established federal law by detaining Rios for an additional 48 hours pursuant to the ICE detainer and administrative warrant. At the time of the plaintiff’s detention, existing precedent suggested that, ‘[e]ven in the absence of a written agreement,’ local law enforcement officials may cooperate with ICE in the detention or removal of aliens not lawfully present in the United States, . . . when such cooperation is expressly ‘request[ed]’ or authorized by ICE[.] . . . In this case, the ICE detainer specifically requested that the Jail hold Rios for up to 48 additional hours after he would otherwise be released, and both the detainer and the administrative warrant attested to probable cause of removability. Consequently, Jenkins had no reason to believe that complying with the 48-hour detainer request would violate the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizures. Because existing precedent ‘did not put [the sheriff] on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, [dismissal] based on qualified immunity is appropriate.’”)

Garcia v. Montgomery County, No. CV TDC-12-3592, 2015 WL 6773715, at *7-10 (D. Md. Nov. 5, 2015) (“Although the Court finds that there is a constitutional right to video record public police activity, it concludes that the right was not clearly established in this jurisdiction at the time of the incident, and so grants qualified immunity to the officers on the First Amendment damages claim. . . . The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has not addressed in a published opinion whether there is a First Amendment right to record public police activity. However, other circuits confirm that this right exists. [citing cases from 1st, 7th, 9th, and 11th Circuits] Thus, based on the Supreme Court precedent finding First Amendment rights to gather the news and to engage in free discussion of governmental affairs to advance the wise and honest conduct of government, as well as the precedent from other circuits explicitly finding a First Amendment right to record public police activities, this Court finds that video recording of police activity, if done peacefully and without interfering with the performance of police duties, is protected by the First Amendment. . . . Here, none of delineated controlling sources clearly establish that, as of 2011, citizens had a right to record police officers in the routine public performance of their duties. As explained above, the Supreme Court has not spoken directly on the issue. The Fourth Circuit, in its only foray into this area, affirmed in an unpublished opinion a district court’s determination that ‘the right to record police activities on public property was not clearly established in this circuit at the time of the alleged conduct’ and did not opine one way or the other on whether such a First Amendment right exists. Szymecki v. Houck, 353 F. App’x 852, 853 (4th Cir. 2009). Thus, as of the incident in 2011, and even today, the Fourth Circuit has not provided police officers with fair warning that it is unconstitutional to stop someone from video recording the police in the routine public performance of their duties. Nor has the Maryland Court of Appeals weighed in on the issue. . . . The fact that, in 2011, the Montgomery County Police Department had a policy on media relations directing that “to the extent possible, members of the media should be treated as invited guests at incident scenes,” and that “no police officer shall take any action to prevent or interfere with the news media in photographing or televising an event,” does not alter the analysis. . . . A public relations mandate from one’s employer, designed to ‘enhance [the Department’s] image and reputation,’ is not the same as a constitutional right. . . . While Officers Baxter and Malouf might have been aware of what the media could be invited to do, that knowledge is not a substitute for a clear understanding of what the media or individual citizens have a right to do in terms of recording police activity. As discussed above, based on the fairest reading of Supreme Court precedent, and the great weight of authority from other circuits, it seems fairly well-settled in 2015 that there is a First Amendment right to video record police officers as they carry out their public duties. But the Fourth Circuit has specifically identified the sources from which a clearly established right can be identified, and as of 2011—and still today—none of the three identified courts has held that citizens have a right to record police officers as they perform their routine duties. Indeed, the Fourth Circuit, albeit in an unpublished opinion, expressly stated that this right is not clearly established. Szymeck, 353 F. App’x at 853. Thus, the Court must conclude that the right to record police officers in the routine public performance of their duties was not clearly established in this Circuit at the time of the events at issue in this case. Officers Baxter and Malouf are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from a suit for damages on this aspect of Garcia’s First Amendment claim.”)

Garcia v. Montgomery County, No. CV TDC-12-3592, 2015 WL 6773715, at *11-12 (D. Md. Nov. 5, 2015) As set forth below, the Court finds that the First Amendment protects against the seizure of a recording of police activity in order to prevent its public dissemination, but concludes that the right was not clearly established in this jurisdiction at the time of the incident, and so grants qualified immunity to Officer Malouf on this aspect of Garcia’s First Amendment damages claim. . . . Here, as discussed above, the video recording of public police actions is an activity protected by the First Amendment, so it follows that the recording itself is First Amendment-protected material akin to a film or written publication. Following the reasoning of Roaden and Rossignol, the seizure of the recording, if done for the purpose of preventing the dissemination of the information on the recording, would constitute an unconstitutional prior restraint. . . . The Court therefore holds that the First Amendment protects against the seizure and retention of a video recording of public police activities if the seizure was for the purpose of preventing the public dissemination of the contents of that recording. . . . As noted above, based on Supreme Court and Fourth Circuit precedent predating 2011, it was clearly established that government officials, including police officers, violate the First Amendment if they seize newspapers, films, or other First Amendment-protected materials in order to prevent the dissemination of their content. . . . However, under this precedent, the Court cannot conclude that Officer Malouf had ‘fair warning’ that his actions violated Garcia’s First Amendment rights. . . . Garcia’s recording was not of something newsworthy—the kind of recording almost certain to enter public circulation—but a recording made on the chance that something newsworthy might happen. There is therefore no easy analogy to be drawn between Roaden and Rossignol and the facts in this case. Although a right may be clearly established even in the absence of case law involving the exact or ‘fundamentally similar’ facts, . . . and ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,’ . . . the scenario at issue here differs from the controlling case law in one material way: the seized item was not one that was clearly protected by the First Amendment. Because it was not clearly established in the Fourth Circuit in 2011 that recording routine police activity was protected by the First Amendment, it also could not have been clearly established in 2011 that the product of that recording was entitled to the same First Amendment protections applicable to newspapers and films sold or displayed to the public. To be sure, under Garcia’s version of events, it would be difficult to justify the seizure and retention of the video card as constitutional. But, as discussed below, the well-traveled path to that conclusion runs through the Fourth Amendment, not the First Amendment. . . Thus, the Court grants qualified immunity to Officer Malouf on the First Amendment damages claim relating to the seizure of the video card.”)

Russell v. Wright, 916 F.Supp.2d 629, 643, 644 (W.D. Va. 2013) (“Lacking any meaningful factual disputes, the court finds that Deputy Wright is entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. In doing so, the court exercises its judicial prerogative to employ either of the qualified immunity prongs first, and determines that regardless of whether Wright’s actions constituted excessive force, an issue the court expressly does not decide, his actions were objectively reasonable because they did not violate clearly established law. . . Given the dearth of caselaw on the use of tasers in excessive force cases, particularly within the Fourth Circuit, the court simply cannot say that Wright’s use of his taser under these circumstances violated clearly established law. Tasers are still relatively novel devices, and courts across the country continue to grapple with determining their proper role in assisting law enforcement officers. Reviewing the relevant caselaw that does exist, the court believes that the line between active resistance and compliance is helpful in evaluating whether Wright’s behavior was objectively reasonable. The officers in this case were responding to a report of violence, and were confronted with a suspect who refused to obey multiple commands. Unlike in Draper, a case where the officer was held not to have used excessive force, Wright and Mattox never had control of the scene before the taser was used. Russell’s only acts of compliance with the officers’ requests were to initially raise his hands (before later lowering them), and to cease approaching an officer who had his handgun drawn and trained on him. These acts alone do not demonstrate compliance, and are far outweighed by Russell’s demonstrations of resistance discussed above. Additionally, the situation confronted by the officers in this case was far more dangerous and fast moving than the facts presented in the Ninth Circuit’s consolidated en banc cases mentioned above, in which the officers were granted qualified immunity. See Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir.2011). Furthermore, another officer on the scene, Deputy Mattox, believed that Wright should deploy his taser—indeed he instructed Wright to do so. Although an officer’s actions must be viewed objectively, this fact certainly indicates that a reasonable officer would not have understood that using a taser in these circumstances would violate clearly established law. . . .Even if Wright’s actions were deemed excessive, in light of the existing caselaw, it would be simply unfair to subject him to trial for using a taser on a potentially violent, noncompliant arrestee.”)

Baltimore County*, No. 24-578, 2025 WL 299518 (U.S. Jan. 27, 2025) (“The facts of the accidental shooting of Kodi are tragic and heartbreaking. However, at the time of the shooting, no decision from any appellate court in the country—much less a controlling decision or ‘a robust consensus of persuasive authority,’ . . . had held that an officer who took action similar to that of Corporal Ruby violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Accordingly, we cannot conclude that the law at the time ‘clearly established’ that Corporal Ruby violated Kodi’s Fourteenth Amendment rights when he ended an armed standoff with Ms. Gaines at her apartment by shooting Ms. Gaines with Kodi present. A full qualified immunity analysis would normally proceed in two steps. First, we would assess Kodi’s underlying argument that the shooting violated his substantive right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, taking the evidence at trial in the light most favorable to him. . . . Second, if we determined that there was a violation, we would then assess whether qualified immunity was nevertheless warranted because it was not ‘clearly established’ at the time that the shot violated Kodi’s rights. . . . The two steps need not be taken in order, although doing so is ‘sometimes beneficial[.]’ . . . Rather, courts have discretion to invert the order and to address only one step or the other, depending on the circumstances. . . . There are also times when it can be better to proceed out of order, such as when ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . Here, we will only undertake the second step of the analysis. We hold that it was not clearly established that Corporal Ruby would violate Kodi’s right to substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment when Corporal Ruby shot Ms. Gaines. Accordingly, Corporal Ruby is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Here, there is no evidence that Corporal Ruby intended to harm Kodi or that he knew that Kodi would be harmed, and indeed he aimed high to avoid hitting Kodi. It was only after Corporal Ruby’s bullet hit and passed through Ms. Gaines’s upper back, hit a refrigerator, and ricocheted that Kodi was harmed. In other words, it is undisputed that, in fact, Kodi was not in the direct line of fire of the shot that Corporal Ruby took. . . . There appears to be no case at the time of the shooting that held an officer liable under the Fourteenth Amendment for a ricochet shot, and several cases in the hostage context that did not hold officers liable in an even more serious context: accidentally shooting a hostage when the officer had reason to believe that the hostage was in the line of fire. . . . The question we have decided in this case relates to whether someone a law enforcement officer did not intend to harm has rights under the Fourteenth Amendment when they are injured by a shot intended for someone else, despite not being in the direct line of fire. . . . As discussed above, the law relating to that issue (unlike the law concerning Ms. Gaines’s excessive force claim) is not well settled. To the contrary, it is largely unsettled. Under governing precedent from the United States Supreme Court, because the law was not clearly established that shooting at Ms. Gaines where Kodi was not in the direct line of fire would violate Kodi’s Fourteenth Amendment rights, Corporal Ruby is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Ferguson, 128 F.4th 727, 734 (5th Cir. 2025) (“We have discretion as to which of the two prongs should be analyzed first; but, ‘often the better approach to resolving cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is raised is to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a [federal] right at all’. . . For the reasons that follow, Plaintiffs fail to plausibly allege violation of a constitutional right. Therefore, we do not reach the second prong (whether right clearly-established). Our court has held repeatedly: a student has a substantive due-process right to be free from physical sexual abuse; and such abuse by a school employee violates that right. . . . [T]o overcome Defendants’ motions to dismiss based on qualified immunity, Plaintiffs must have pleaded facts permitting our court to draw a reasonable inference that: (1) Ferguson and Hamrick ‘learned of facts ... pointing plainly toward’ sexual abuse; (2) they showed ‘deliberate indifference toward’ the Doe children’s rights by ‘failing to take action’ to stop the abuse; and (3) the ‘failure caused a constitutional injury to’ the Doe children. . . . Plaintiffs make the blanket allegation that Ferguson and Hamrick were ‘actually, subjectively aware of Paniagua’s abuse ... but failed to act in response’. Plaintiffs base this allegation on ‘the District’s surveillance policy, the Defendants’ actual possession of the videos, and the fact that the videos showed the assaults’. This is a legal conclusion that merely ‘restates the standard required to demonstrate the requisite subjective knowledge’. . . Plaintiffs do not assert either Ferguson or Hamrick personally were notified of, or watched, the school-bus surveillance footage, instead alleging they were on notice of the footage ‘regardless of whether [they] bothered to look at the videos’. The operative complaint does not identify who would first review extensive video-surveillance footage from all bus drivers in the district, or identify a chain-of-command for reporting such footage. Plaintiffs do not allege the videos were reviewed at all before 7 May 2022 when the Doe children first informed their mother of the abuse. Establishing Defendants’ subjective knowledge would require at least two missing links in the causal chain: a subordinate reported the videos to his or her superiors; and those superiors either were, or reported the videos to, Ferguson or Hamrick. The complaint fails to allege either. . . . Because Plaintiffs fail to allege sufficient facts to plausibly show Defendants were subjectively aware of the abuse, we do not reach the second (deliberate-indifference) or third (constitutional injury) prongs of the three-prong Taylor test. And, as stated supra, because Plaintiffs fail to allege violation of a constitutional right, we do not reach the second prong of the qualified immunity test (whether right clearly established).”)

Carmona v. City of Brownsville, 126 F.4th 1091, 1096-97, 1099-1100 (5th Cir. 2025) (“We have discretion as to which of the two prongs should be analyzed first; but, ‘often the better approach to resolving cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is raised is to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a [federal] right at all’. . . For the reasons that follow, Plaintiff fails to plausibly allege violation of the claimed constitutional right. Therefore, we do not reach the second prong (whether right clearly-established). . . .Where the claimed constitutional violation involves the Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care, Plaintiff must allege facts, which, if proved, would show Officers exhibited deliberate indifference to Carmona’s serious medical needs. . . . To show deliberate indifference, Plaintiff must plausibly allege that Officers ‘(1) w[ere] aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and (2) actually drew the inference’. . . .Plaintiff was required to plead facts which, if proved, showed Officers were ‘aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists’,—the serious harm being internal bleeding in this instance—‘and actually drew the inference’. . . Viewing the well-pleaded facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff—i.e., Officers were aware Carmona was involved in multiple automobile collisions, and she had visible abrasions and contusions on her extremities—Plaintiff, at most, alleged that Officers should have known Carmona was at-risk for internal bleeding. But, as discussed supra, actual knowledge is required for liability to attach. . . Because Plaintiff fails to allege sufficient facts to plausibly show Officers were subjectively aware of the risk of internal bleeding, her allegations do not state a deliberate-indifference claim. And, as noted, because Plaintiff fails to allege violation of a constitutional right, we do not reach the second prong of the qualified-immunity test—whether that right was clearly established at the time of the violation.”)

Winder v. Gallardo, 118 F.4th 638, 646 (5th Cir. 2024) (“When it comes to deadly force, ‘[a]n officer’s use of deadly force is not excessive, and thus no constitutional violation occurs, when the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses a threat of serious harm to the officer or to others.’ . . And ‘if the officer believes the suspect has a gun, the calculation changes—even if there was never, in fact, a gun.’ . . Uses of force may be reasonable when the officer could reasonably believe the suspect was reaching for or had a gun. . . . [W]hether Steve was in fact aiming a gun at Deputy Gallardo does not matter—binding caselaw demonstrates that what matters is whether Deputy Gallardo could reasonably believe that Steve was reaching for or had a gun.”)

McKay v. LaCroix, 117 F.4th 741, 746-47 (5th Cir. 2024) (“We may address either prong first. . . Here, our inquiry begins and ends with whether Brandy alleged a violation of August’s constitutional rights. . . A state generally has no affirmative obligation to protect its citizens from private harm. . . . But when a state affirmatively acts to restrain an individual’s freedom ‘through incarceration, institutionalization, or other similar restraint of personal liberty,’ the state establishes a ‘special relationship’ with the individual. . . Where a special relationship exists, a state may have a constitutional duty to protect the individual from dangers, including in certain circumstances, private harm such as private violence, . . . or self-inflicted harm[.]Such a relationship has arisen between a state and prisoners, . . , pretrial detainees—including suspected criminals injured while being apprehended by police. . . and involuntarily-committed mental patients[.] . . Yet, no constitutional duty exists where, like here, the state has not restrained an individual’s liberty. This is not a case like City of Revere, where police injured a suspect while apprehending him. . . There is no indication from the alleged facts that Sgt. Bordelon and Trooper LaCroix planned or attempted to arrest August or confine him to his home. They visited August’s home to inform him that he was being reassigned at work, and to confirm that the premises were safe for the LSP to execute the search warrant. After they left his house, August tragically proceeded to commit suicide. Indeed, Brandy does not allege in her complaint that Sgt. Bordelon or Trooper LaCroix restrained August’s liberty. To the contrary, she seeks to hold them responsible for August’s death because they ‘allowed [him] to enter his home, where his guns were,’ ‘allowed [him] to roam around his home,’ ‘d[id] nothing to restrict his movements,’ and then ‘took no action whatsoever to attempt to disarm [August]’ but instead ‘elected to flee the home.’ Put otherwise, she blames them because they did not restrain his liberty. Without a restraint of liberty, there is no constitutional duty. Without a constitutional duty, there can be no constitutional violation. And without a constitutional violation, Sgt. Bordelon and Trooper LaCroix are entitled qualified immunity.”)

Terrell v. Allgrunn, 114 F.4th 428, 439 (5th Cir. 2024) (“Mrs. Terrell’s excessive force claim is easily resolved on the second prong of the QI analysis. In short, plaintiffs can identify no case remotely resembling Mrs. Terrell’s claim. The only case that even mentions psychological injury was raised by the district court. See Flores v. Palacios, 381 F.3d 391, 397 (5th Cir. 2004). But an abstract statement that psychological injury is not per se to be excluded from Fourth Amendment claims is not enough. Plaintiffs do no work to show any case established a right to be free from this sort of psychological injury (even generally defined) based on this sort of conduct (even generally defined). . . Therefore, we reverse and render judgment for Allgrunn on Mrs. Terrell’s excessive force claim.”)

Edmiston v. Borrego, 75 F.4th 551, 559-60 (5th Cir. 2023) (“Pursuant to our above-discussed discretion to begin our two-prong qualified-immunity analysis with either prong, we elect to begin with the first. For the reasons that follow, plaintiffs fail to plausibly allege a violation of a statutory or constitutional right. Therefore, we do not reach the second prong (whether clearly-established). To overcome appellants’ motions to dismiss based on qualified immunity, plaintiffs must, as stated supra, have pled facts permitting our court to draw a reasonable inference that Borrego, Sheriff Carrillo, and Deputy Melendez ‘(1) had subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm and (2) responded to that risk with deliberate indifference’. . . In the context of detainee suicide, the requisite substantial risk of serious harm must be specific; plaintiffs must allege defendants ‘were aware of a substantial and significant risk that the detainee might kill himself’. . . For the reasons that follow, plaintiffs fail to plausibly allege appellants had the requisite subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide. Accordingly, whether they responded to that putative risk with deliberate indifference does not come into play.”)

Reed v. Nacogdoches County, No. 22-40126, 2023 WL 3563017, at *___ (5th Cir. May 19, 2023) (not reported) (“Here, we need not consider the first prong of qualified immunity because Reed cannot satisfy the second. To begin the analysis, we must properly frame the right at issue ‘in light of the specific context of the case.’ . . Considering the specific factual context of this case, the right at issue here is: Whether it violates the Fourteenth Amendment for a jailer to ignore emergency intercom calls for three minutes and fourteen seconds while handling a personal phone call. . . We conclude Fuentes is entitled to qualified immunity. That is because Reed cannot point to a case that placed the constitutional question here beyond debate at the time of the incident in 2017. Reed’s best case is Stewart v. Guzman, 555 F. App’x 425, 432 (5th Cir. 2014). An unpublished circuit case cannot clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity. . . But even if it could, Stewart’s facts aren’t close to the facts here. In Stewart, jail officials ignored an emergency intercom on four separate dates, watched and ignored an inmate lying on the floor, and ignored other inmates knocking on the cell door, resulting each time in the inmate having an asthma attack.

Id. at 426–29. The jail officials there also ‘intentionally disregarded’ the inmate’s ‘established treatment plan.’ . . . But here, unlike in Stewart, Fuentes ignored the emergency intercom on only one date. And in any event, there is no evidence that Fuentes intentionally disregarded anything. Thus, Stewart is not close enough factually to give fair warning to a reasonable officer in Fuentes’s shoes that her conduct in ignoring the emergency intercom—without more—violated the Constitution. Further, it was not until July 2021 that our court held that failing to promptly call for emergency assistance in the face of a known, serious medical emergency violates the Constitution. . . . Even after Cope, it’s not clear that our precedents can clearly establish the law. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7 (2021) (per curiam) (assuming published circuit precedent can in theory clearly establish law but only to reverse the Ninth Circuit’s reliance on it). And it’s also not clear that every reasonable officer would conclude that ignoring an emergency intercom—which might be alerting to a medical emergency—is the same as an officer knowing for a fact that a medical emergency is ongoing and not calling for emergency assistance like the officer in Cope. . . . Thus, Fuentes is entitled to qualified immunity on Reed’s Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . . We reach the same conclusion regarding Reed’s Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim against Riddley. Even assuming Riddley’s actions in delaying CPR violated the Fourteenth Amendment, Reed points to no controlling case law that clearly governs this situation. On the contrary, this Court’s recent decision in Aguirre v. City of San Antonio, 995 F.3d 395 (5th Cir. 2021), underscores the lack of clearly established law surrounding delays in administering CPR. There, the Court held that officers who delayed CPR for three minutes while retrieving medical equipment and performing a ‘sternum rub’ on a man who was not breathing did not act with deliberate indifference. . . . The Court reasoned that while ‘these measures may have been inadequate, Plaintiffs [did] not present any evidence that the Officers knew they were insufficient and intentionally failed to do more out of indifference to [the man’s] well-being.’ . . . Aguirre illustrates that where officials elect to do something rather than nothing, it is difficult or impossible to say they acted with ‘indifference’ much less deliberate indifference. Thus, even assuming a constitutional violation, we conclude Riddley is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Addington v. Wells, No. 22-30220, 2023 WL 2808466, at *5 & n.3 (5th Cir. Apr. 6, 2023) (not reported) (“The facts in Cleveland are analogous to the present events; accordingly, our analysis in that case guides our decision here. Like Cleveland, Addington received medical treatment in the days before his death. And, like in Cleveland and unlike in Felder, Addington never made an explicit request for medical treatment that was ignored by the prison staff. In sum, Addington’s proffered sources of clearly established law involve materially different facts, and our holding in Cleveland shows that an officer acting under similar circumstances does not violate clearly established law. Accordingly, we cannot say that Addington has met his burden of placing ‘beyond debate’ the question of whether an officer acting under similar circumstances would have been on notice that he was violating clearly established law. . . . We thus reverse the judgment of the district court on this prong of the qualified immunity analysis without reaching the question of whether Wells’s actions constituted a constitutional violation. . . . For clarity, our holding here should not be imputed to an analysis of the first prong; in other words, we are not holding that deliberate indifference arising to a constitutional violation must always require an explicit request for medical attention or involve obvious and externally visible injuries. We are concerned only with the narrow question of whether the cases discussed by Addington and the district court show that Wells's conduct under these specific facts violated clearly established law.”)

McClelland v. Katy Independent School District, 63 F.4th 996, 1009-10 (5th Cir. 2023) (“The district court correctly concluded that there is no clearly established rule that could have placed Hull on notice that disciplining McClelland for his off-campus speech was unconstitutional. Our developing jurisprudence has not yet resulted in a rule that would have given fair warning to Hull and to ‘every “reasonable official”’ in Hull’s position that suspending McClelland for his video was unconstitutional. Even Mahanoy, which was decided after the underlying incidents here, offers little assistance. In Mahanoy, the Supreme Court held that ‘[w]e leave for future cases to decide where, when, and how these features mean the speaker’s off-campus location will make the critical difference.’. . . Here, McClelland’s free speech rights at the time of the Snapchat incident were not clearly established so as to defeat qualified immunity for Hull. . . . The district court ended its qualified immunity analysis after concluding that McClelland’s free speech rights were not clearly established in relation to the Snapchat incident. As discussed above, it is entirely within the district court’s discretion to forego the constitutionality question after concluding that the rights at issue are not clearly established. . . . The district court did not err in choosing to forego the constitutional inquiry. This court too may forego the more difficult constitutional inquiry. When the Supreme Court relaxed its strict adherence to the two-part qualified immunity protocol, it noted that engaging in the constitutional inquiry may be advantageous in some situations and detrimental in others. . . . For example, it is helpful in the development of constitutional precedent and ‘especially valuable for questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’. . . At the pleading stage, however, this inquiry ‘may create a risk of bad decisionmaking,’. . . since ‘the answer to whether there was a violation may depend on a kaleidoscope of facts not yet fully developed.’. . . Here, the district court’s determination of qualified immunity as to defendant-appellee Hull was sound. This court will not engage in the constitutional inquiry because (1) it is evident that McClelland’s free speech rights were not clearly established at the time of the incident; and (2) the underlying case was disposed of at the motion-to-dismiss stage, before the facts were developed.”)

Rogers v. Jarrett, 63 F.4th 971, 977-78 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 193 (2023) (“In sum, Rogers failed to raise a fact dispute over whether Jarrett and Bridges acted with deliberate indifference. But even if he had, he’d still need to show that his rights were ‘clearly established at the time of the violation.’. . . As we have explained many times, that takes showing that ‘the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’. . . It just isn’t enough to identify a right as ‘a broad general proposition.’. . . The district court did not address qualified immunity’s second step. Jarrett and Bridges argue, though, that even assuming a violation, the law was not clearly established under this standard. We agree with Jarrett and Bridges. In barely half a page of briefing Rogers argues that the Supreme Court’s decision in Estelle ‘clearly established [the] law govern[ing] the substance of this entire dispute.’ But the only right Rogers identifies as being violated was his right to be free from deliberate indifference towards his serious medical needs. That generalized proposition of law is not enough. The Supreme Court has articulated an exacting standard. Rogers needed to point to ‘a case or body of relevant case law in which an officer acting under similar circumstances was held to have violated the Constitution.’. . And Estelle just isn’t that case. The Supreme Court reversed us in Estelle that the doctors had acted with deliberate indifference towards the prisoner. . . And on remand, we held that the nonphysician prison staff likewise didn’t act with deliberate indifference. . . Therefore, we cannot agree with Rogers that he has shown that Jarrett and Bridges violated clearly established law.”)

Byrd v. Harrell, 48 F.4th 343, 348-50 (5th Cir. 2022) (Graves, J, concurring) (“I agree with the result in this case because Byrd’s asserted right was not clearly established when this case’s events happened in 2014. But I would take this opportunity to establish that right. Under the undisputed evidence—and viewing the disputed evidence in the light most favorable to Byrd. . . a jury could rationally conclude that Sergeant Harrell maliciously and unnecessarily struck Byrd with a baton with bone-breaking force. The parties dispute whether Byrd was armed, but the surveillance footage clearly shows that Byrd’s left hand was empty when Sergeant Harrell struck Byrd’s left forearm and there is no summary judgment evidence showing that Byrd was otherwise armed. And it is undisputed that Sergeant Harrell repeatedly struck Byrd’s left arm with a baton with enough force to break it, while the arm was free and not holding a weapon, and while four guards pinned Byrd’s body and a fifth held Byrd’s neck in a chokehold. Even if Byrd charged out of the cell, a jury might well conclude that the need for bone-breaking force had been negated by the time Sergeant Harrell repeatedly struck Byrd with a riot baton, and therefore that Sergeant Harrell acted ‘maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.’. . . [W]e also have a responsibility to identify constitutional violations. And we must identify the line separating permissible from impermissible force not just to preserve rights, but to inform prison officials about what conduct will expose them to the burdens of litigation. . . The undisputed evidence in this case shows a constitutional violation. We should unequivocally state that conclusion. Nonetheless, I concur in the majority’s judgment because Sergeant Harrell is entitled to qualified immunity under our caselaw, at least as it stood when this case’s events happened. In 2014, we declined to ‘endorse a per se rule that no force may ever be used after an inmate has been subjected to measures of restraint—particularly if the effect of the restraint is only partial.’. . . That holding insulates Sergeant Harrell from liability. But I would take this opportunity to establish for future cases that prison officials may not continue to apply bone-breaking force to an inmate who is partially restrained but who poses no threat to any officer, even if the inmate had earlier necessitated the use of some force.”)

Rogers v. Hall, 46 F.4th 308, 313-14 (5th Cir. 2022) (“In several respects, Rogers’s case comes close to Lane: He gave sworn testimony, compelled by a subpoena, . . . in court proceedings on a matter of public concern. But ‘close’ does not count in the qualified immunity calculus. Arguably, Rogers’s case fits squarely within the scenario Lane left open for another day, assuming as the district court found that giving sworn testimony about matters Rogers observed during an investigation he led fell within Rogers’s ‘ordinary job duties’ as a public law enforcement officer—indeed, as the Chief of Investigation at Parchman. . . Just as arguably, as ably discussed by Judge Costa in his dissent, Rogers’s testimony may well have fallen outside his normal work duties in this instance because the subject of Rogers’s testimony—the altercation between Lee and Bobo—was somewhat tangential to the main investigation. Moreover, Rogers was not testifying on behalf of MDOC at the probable cause hearing—he was subpoenaed by Bobo and testified unfavorably to various MDOC personnel. Therein lies the rub: To defeat qualified immunity, Rogers must show that the defendants violated a right that was not just arguable, but ‘beyond debate.’. . . And he fails to ‘point to controlling authority—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority,’. . . that either answers the question Lane left open regarding sworn testimony given by a public employee within his ordinary job duties, or clearly establishes that Rogers’s testimony was outside his ordinary job duties as a law enforcement officer (or was otherwise protected speech). Nor does Rogers point to record evidence demonstrating that his testimony was undisputedly outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities, as was his burden to do. . . As a result, he fails to show a violation of any ‘right [that] was “clearly established” at the time of the challenged conduct,’. . . and he therefore cannot overcome the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity.”) Rogers v. Hall, 46 F.4th 308, 314-17 (5th Cir. 2022) (Gregg, J., dissenting) (“Do police officers have the same First Amendment rights that other public employees enjoy? That is the decisive question in this appeal. Because those serving in law enforcement do not lose their freedom of speech when they testify as citizens, I would reverse. Public employees who testify outside the scope of their ordinary job duties are entitled to First Amendment protection, even if they testify about matters they learned at work. Lane v. Franks, 573 U.S. 228, 238 (2014). The First Amendment thus protected the plaintiff in Lane, a community college director who testified about on-the-job happenings but not pursuant to any job duty. . . The harder issue is whether that same protection applies when employees do testify as part of their job duties. That is the question the Supreme Court left open in Lane. . . . While some courts have concluded that this testimony also is protected citizen speech, see Reilly v. Atlantic City, 532 F.3d 216, 231 (3d Cir. 2008), we have not yet addressed whether constitutional protection extends to public employees’ testifying as part of their job duties. We need not decide that difficult issue here. . . Rogers’s speech fits in the Lane box. Taking the allegations in the light most favorable to Rogers as we must at this stage, . . . he was not testifying as part of his job duties. Rogers was subpoenaed to testify by the defense, not the prosecution. . . If Rogers had not shown up to testify, he might have been held in contempt of court, but he would not have been defying a work expectation. . . . A rule that any time an officer testifies about work-related incidents he does so as part of his job duties would give officers less First Amendment protection than other public employees. That is not the law. Law enforcement officers are not relegated to a watered-down version of constitutional rights.’. . . None of the public employee speech cases set special rules for the police. The dividing line—for all public employees—is between speech as a citizen and speech as an employee. . . When the speech is testimony, the distinction is between testimony provided in the course of one’s job duties (an open question whether that is citizen speech) and testimony that is not (protected speech per the Supreme Court). . . . The Supreme Court has not said whether the First Amendment protects the detective who testifies for the prosecution about his investigation. But it has answered the question for officers like Rogers who learn things on the job and testify about those facts outside of their ordinary job duties. Such testimony is citizen speech, so Rogers has a retaliation claim for the consequences of his whistleblowing.”)

Buehler v. Dear, 27 F.4th 969, 982-89 (5th Cir. 2022) (“[A]lthough we now may also ‘leapfrog’ the first prong and resolve cases solely on the basis that defendants’ conduct—even if unlawful—did not violate clearly established law, ‘we think it better to address both steps in order to provide clarity and guidance for officers and courts.’ . . . In our view, of the five cases relied upon by Buehler and discussed above, only Ramirez and Sam are similar enough to this case to lend any support to his claim that the Officers . . . violated clearly established law, and still Ramirez and Sam involved more severe and less appropriate uses of force than that used by the Officers here. . . On the other hand, there is ample circuit authority supporting the Officers’ position that their use of force did not violate the Fourth Amendment, or at least not clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . We have frequently held that officers were either constitutionally justified or entitled to qualified immunity for taking suspects to the ground in response to forms of physical resistance similar to those in which Buehler engaged. . . Likewise, a survey of our sister circuits’ precedent on this issue turns up ‘[m]any decisions [that] hold that there is no clearly established rule forbidding a clean takedown [of a suspect] to end mild resistance.’ . . To be sure, arrestees in some of the cases to which we have referred were suspected of more serious crimes than Buehler’s. But other such cases either involved petty crimes or were apparently decided without regard to the severity of the suspected offenses, . . . suggesting that this consideration ought not affect the outcome here. And as we have previously noted in response to an excessive-force plaintiff’s emphasis on ‘the minor nature of the crime that [a suspect] had allegedly committed,’ ‘neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever held that all of the Graham factors must be present for an officer’s actions to be reasonable.’ . . Ultimately, we conclude that the Officers stayed not only within the bounds of ‘clearly established law,’ but also within those of the Fourth Amendment. Looking beyond our circuit, there is a wealth of appellate cases where comparable force by arresting officers under similar circumstances was held not violative of the Fourth Amendment. In case after case, courts upheld officers’ use of takedowns to gain control of suspects who had disregarded lawful police orders or mildly resisted arrest, even when arrestees were suspected of minor offenses and the force employed appeared greater than necessary in retrospect—at least when officers’ tactics caused arrestees only minimal injuries. . . Considering this decisional authority, as well as the totality of the factors discussed thus far in our excessive-force analysis, we conclude that none of the four Officers involved in arresting Buehler . . . used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court thus erred in denying their motion for summary judgment on the excessive-force claims.”)

Timpa v. Dillard, 20 F.4th 1020, 1029-38 (5th Cir. 2021) (“Although we may begin with either prong of qualified immunity, we turn first to the merits of the excessive force claim to provide clarity and guidance to law enforcement. The Plaintiffs contend that Dillard’s restraint of Timpa constituted both excessive force and deadly force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Claims that law enforcement used deadly force are ‘treated as a special subset of excessive force claims.’.

. We consider first whether Dillard’s use of force was excessive and second whether a jury could find the force used was deadly. . . . Approximately nine minutes into the restraint, Timpa was cuffed at both the wrists and the ankles, his lower legs had stopped moving, and he was surrounded by five officers, two paramedics, and two private security guards—most of whom were mulling about while Dillard maintained his bodyweight force on Timpa’s upper back. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most positive to the Plaintiffs, none of the Graham factors justified the prolonged use of force. A jury could find that Timpa was subdued by nine minutes into the restraint and that the continued use of force was objectively unreasonable in violation of Timpa’s Fourth Amendment rights. Of course, a jury may ultimately conclude the opposite: that Timpa was not subdued and that he continued to pose an immediate threat throughout his restraint. Under that consideration of the facts, Dillard’s decision to continue exercising force might be reasonable. Ultimately, it is the job of the factfinder, not of this court, to resolve those factual disputes for itself. A jury’s interpretation ensures that legal judgments of reasonableness hew closely to widely shared expectations of the use of force by our police officers. . . . Plaintiffs argue that the prolonged use of a prone restraint with bodyweight force on the back of an individual who possessed apparent risk factors and posed no serious threat of harm constituted an objectively unreasonable application of deadly force. . . . ‘[W]hether a particular use of force is “deadly force” is a question of fact, not one of law.’ . . . The question is whether a jury could find that the use of force ‘carr[ied] with it a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm.’ . . . The Plaintiffs argue that kneeling on the back of an individual with three risk factors—obesity, excited delirium, and prior vigorous exertion—carried a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm. The Officers argue that the Plaintiffs have failed to set forth sufficient evidence to create a triable fact issue. . . . Plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the use of a prone restraint with bodyweight force on an individual with three apparent risk factors—obesity, physical exhaustion, and excited delirium—‘create[d] a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury.’ . . . A jury could find that this use of force constituted ‘deadly force.’ . . . Officers can use deadly force only if they have ‘probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm.’ . . . Here, the Officers concede that the use of deadly force was not justified. But the record supports an inference that Dillard knelt on Timpa’s back with enough force to cause asphyxiation. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the record supports that Timpa was subdued nine minutes into the continuing restraint and did not pose a threat of serious harm. The Officers make no argument that the use of asphyxiating pressure was necessary to maintain control of a subdued subject. In other words, the record supports the inference that, for at least five minutes, Timpa was subjected to force unnecessary to restrain him. If a jury were, in addition, to find that the use of a prone restraint with bodyweight force on an obese, exhausted individual in a state of excited delirium carried a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily harm, then the prolonged restraint constituted an objectively unreasonable application of deadly force. . . . The district court determined that no precedent clearly established that the use of a prone restraint with bodyweight force to bring a subject under police control was objectively unreasonable. But the district court failed to consider the continued use of such force after Timpa had been restrained and lacked the ability to pose a risk of harm or flight. We hold that the state of the law in August 2016 clearly established that an officer engages in an objectively unreasonable application of force by continuing to kneel on the back of an individual who has been subdued. Officers are entitled to qualified immunity ‘unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’ . . . That does not require a showing that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.’ . . . Rather, there can be ‘notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on ... so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights.’ . . . Within the Fifth Circuit, the law has long been clearly established that an officer’s continued use of force on a restrained and subdued subject is objectively unreasonable. [collecting cases] The distinguishing facts between Strain, Cooper, Darden, and this case sharpen the excessiveness of Dillard’s continued use of force. Unlike the subjects in Cooper and Darden, who were suspected of serious crimes, Timpa himself called the police asking for assistance. . . . The officers had no intention of arresting him for any crime. Whereas the defendant-officers in Strain, Cooper, and Darden ceased using force shortly after the subject was restrained, Dillard continued to kneel on Timpa’s back for seven minutes after he was restrained at both the wrists and the ankles, including five minutes after he ceased moving his lower legs, and three-and-a-half minutes after he lost consciousness. . . . Here, the use of force lasted for over fourteen minutes as compared with the one-to-two minute dog bite in Cooper; the one-to-two minute use of a prone restraint with weight force in Darden; and the momentary use of force in Strain. . . . Finally, unlike the use of force in Cooper and in Strain, the use of a prone restraint with weight force resulted in the subject’s death in Darden and again here. . . . These cases clearly established the unreasonableness of Dillard’s continued use of bodyweight force to hold Timpa in the prone restraint position after he was subdued and restrained. This conclusion comports with the decisions of our sister circuits that have considered similar facts.⁷ [collecting cases] [fn. 7: Only the Eighth Circuit has held in the reverse and the Supreme Court recently vacated that decision on the merits. See Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, 956 F.3d 1009 (8th Cir. 2020), rev’d, — U.S. —, 141 S. Ct. 2239, 210 L.Ed.2d 609 (2021) (per curiam).] The Officers argue that the Fifth Circuit ‘has held that [the use of a] prone restraint [on] a resisting suspect does not violate the Fourth Amendment even when pressure is applied to the suspect’s back.’ We have never articulated this per se rule. Nor could we because the Supreme Court has specifically rejected exactly that rule. See Lombardo, 141 S. Ct. at 2241 (per curiam) (rejecting any per se rule that ‘the use of a prone restraint—no matter the kind, intensity, duration, or surrounding circumstances—is ... constitutional so long as an individual appears to resist officers’ efforts to subdue him’). The Officers mischaracterize our caselaw. . . . Here, a prone restraint was used in tandem with Dillard’s body weight for over fourteen minutes. If a jury were to find that Timpa was subdued and nonthreatening by nine minutes into the restraint, then the continued use of force for five additional minutes was necessarily excessive. . . . We recognize that our police officers are often asked to make split-second judgments about the use of force, but the Constitution demands that officers use no more force than necessary and ‘hold[s] [them] accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly.’ . . . Because the state of the law in August 2016 had clearly established that the continued use of force against a restrained and subdued subject violates the Fourth Amendment, Defendant-Officer Dillard is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Jackson v. Gautreaux, 3 F.4th 182, 187-88 (5th Cir. 2021) (“Fraire, Hathaway, and Ramirez require us to find no Fourth Amendment violation here. That’s for three independent reasons. First, like the drivers in Fraire and Hathaway, Stevenson was using his car as a weapon. . . It does not matter whether Stevenson (unlike the drivers in our precedents) ‘ha[d] not threatened or attempted to harm any of the deputies.’ . . Second, Stevenson and the drivers in our precedents exhibited volatile behaviors that contributed to the officers’ ‘justifi[cation] in firing to prevent ... death or great bodily harm.’ . . Before the incident, Stevenson was drinking and using drugs; he pepper sprayed his girlfriend and her daughter in a fit of rage; he stole his girlfriend’s wallet and drove away while intoxicated; he repeatedly told his girlfriend and the officers that he was suicidal; he repeatedly yelled ‘Kill me!’ at one officer while ignoring commands from other officers; and he repeatedly rammed his car into a patrol unit and a concrete pillar while inches away from hitting Lieutenant Birdwell. Stevenson’s immunity to reason was patent; the risk of injury or death to the Lieutenant was equally patent. Third, Plaintiffs have not produced any evidence that suggests the officers might’ve had a reasonable alternative course of action. See Ramirez, — F.4th at —, 2021 WL 257199, at *4. When asked at oral argument for a reasonable alternative, Plaintiffs’ counsel said that officers should’ve ‘step[ped] back and allow[ed] Mr. Stevenson to finish the episode, and then they could have acted.’ . . That’s absurd. Lieutenant Birdwell was inches from the front left bumper of Stevenson’s car while he was repeatedly driving it backwards and forwards and violently crashing into things. Whatever reasonable alternatives officers might’ve had, doing nothing and praying for the best is not one of them. And without a reasonable alternative to the officers’ conduct, Plaintiffs are without a Fourth Amendment claim that the officers behaved ‘unreasonably.’ . . The district court therefore correctly held, in accordance with our precedent, that Plaintiffs’ excessive-force claim fails as a matter of law.”)

Batyukova v. Doege, 994 F.3d 717, 725-29 (5th Cir. 2021) (“The district court reached only the issue of whether any constitutional violation occurred. Because we review the grant of a summary judgment using the same standards as the district court, . . . we can and do resolve the appeal of Batyukova’s excessive-force claim based on the other qualified-immunity consideration: whether the law was clearly established that the deputy’s actions violated Batyukova’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . In this case, Batyukova’s deemed admissions conclusively establish the following facts. She ignored Deputy Doege’s commands to show her hands and to place her hands on the hood of her vehicle. Instead, she gave him the middle finger and shouted expletives at him. She then started walking towards Deputy Doege, which prompted him to reverse his vehicle to maintain distance. She failed to comply with his subsequent command to ‘get down.’ Then, Batyukova reached for her waistband. Other uncontroverted summary-judgment evidence shows that Deputy Doege observed Batyukova reach behind her back, that her hand disappeared from view, and that Deputy Doege feared that she was reaching for a weapon. . . The district court determined that ‘a reasonable officer in Doege’s position would have believed Batyukova posed an immediate threat to his safety’ and that his ‘decision to use deadly force was objectively reasonable under the circumstances.’ The court concluded that Batyukova failed to demonstrate a Fourth Amendment violation, a conclusion that resulted in the grant of qualified immunity without needing to consider whether the law supporting a violation was clearly established. We resolve the appeal of Batyukova’s excessive-force claim on whether the right she claims was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Batyukova must show that the law was ‘sufficiently clear’ at that time ‘that every reasonable official would have understood that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right.’. . There are two ways to demonstrate clearly established law. Under the first approach, the plaintiff may ‘identify a case’ or ‘body of relevant case law’ in which ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the [Constitution].’. . This approach ‘do[es] not require a case directly on point,’ but ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . In the excessive-force context, ‘officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’. . Under the second approach, ‘there can be the rare “obvious case,” where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’. . As for the potential for an obvious violation of rights, Batyukova argues that all reasonable officers would have known they could not use deadly force against someone who clearly posed no threat. Because that does not describe the facts of this case, we will say no more about the category of an obvious constitutional violation. To overcome qualified immunity in this case, Batyukova must show that clearly established law prohibited using deadly force against a person who (1) repeatedly ignored commands, such as to show her hands, to place her hands on the hood of her vehicle, or to get down; and then (2) reached her hand behind her back towards her waistband, which the officer perceived to be a reach for a weapon to use against him. . . . Deputy Doege made a split-second decision to use deadly force against a non-compliant person who made a movement consistent with reaching for a weapon. We cannot say that Batyukova posed ‘little to no threat’ to Deputy Doege. We conclude that Batyukova failed to identify clearly established law prohibiting Deputy Doege’s use of deadly force. The district court’s grant of summary judgment on her excessive-force claim is affirmed.”)

Cloud v. Stone, 993 F.3d 379, 383-87 (5th Cir. 2021) (“‘We can analyze the prongs in either order or resolve the case on a single prong.’. . Here, prong one resolves the case. We address separately Luker’s taser use and his subsequent shooting of Cloud, in that order. . . . Although Plaintiffs suggest that only a few seconds elapsed between Luker’s initial tase and his drive-stun maneuver, the situation remained ‘tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’. . Under these circumstances, Luker’s continued force to complete the arrest, like his initial tase, was reasonable. . . .Even drawing all inferences in Plaintiffs’ favor, the record shows that Cloud was shot while moving toward the revolver and potentially seconds from reclaiming it. . . Plaintiffs contend Cloud was likely trying to flee, not to regain the revolver, but even if true, that would be irrelevant. Whatever Cloud’s intentions, the circumstances warranted a reasonable belief that Cloud threatened serious physical harm. The lethal force was therefore not constitutionally excessive. . .Because we find no constitutional violation, we need not reach prong two of the qualified immunity defense and consider whether Luker violated any clearly established law.”)

Roque v. Harvel, 993 F.3d 325, 332-36, 339 (5th Cir. 2021) (“Although qualified immunity raises two distinct questions (whether the conduct was unconstitutional and whether the unconstitutionality was clearly established), we have discretion ‘to decline entirely to address the’ first question. We can ‘skip straight to the second question concerning clearly established law.’ But we have repeatedly emphasized that there is value in addressing both questions ‘to develop robust case law on the scope of constitutional right.’ In that vein, we first address Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim and then discuss the clearly established law at the time of the shooting. . . . When an officer uses deadly force, that force is considered excessive and unreasonable ‘unless the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.’ Further, ‘an exercise of force that is reasonable at one moment can become unreasonable in the next if the justification for the use of force has ceased.’ The parties do not dispute the district court’s conclusion that, even though all of the officers claim they didn’t see Jason point the gun in their direction, Harvel was justified in taking the first shot. The video evidence (from all angles) shows that right before the first shot, and after the officers shouted at Jason to put down his gun, Jason pointed the gun in the officers’ general direction. It’s also undisputed that Jason Roque suffered an injury (element one of his excessive-force claim). At issue, then, is whether Officer Harvel’s second and third shots were excessive (element two) and objectively unreasonable (element three). These questions are ‘often intertwined.’ Because Officer Harvel used deadly force, the answer to these intertwined questions depends on whether Jason posed a threat of serious physical harm after the first shot struck him. Two factual disputes concerning the placement of the gun and Jason’s movements prevent us from answering these questions. . . . Both fact disputes go to whether a reasonable officer would have known that Jason was incapacitated after the first shot. If Jason was incapacitated, he no longer posed a threat. And if he no longer posed a threat, Harvel’s second and third shots were excessive and unreasonable. Whether Jason was incapacitated is therefore not only disputed but material to Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim. . . . The district court implied that this was an obvious case under Tennessee v. Garner. . . . Although the officer in Garner shot and killed a fleeing burglary suspect who was never armed, we have applied Garner to situations where a suspect has a weapon but is incapacitated or otherwise incapable of using it (functionally unarmed). The district court stated that, according to Plaintiffs’ narrative, which is supported by video evidence, Jason never pointed the gun at anyone but himself. Before the first shot, Jason simply waved the gun in an arc as he turned around to look in the officers’ direction right after they yelled at him to drop the gun. As Jason was turning around, Harvel took the first shot. The shot hit Jason, and he dropped the gun and stumbled into the street away from the officers and his mother. Thus, the district court concluded that under these facts, it was obviously unconstitutional to continue shooting at an unarmed suspect who was limping away from everyone present. . . . If the jury accepts Plaintiffs’ narrative, which is supported by video evidence, then Harvel shot a suicidal, unarmed, wounded man who was a threat only to himself. That would make this case an ‘obvious’ one. But we need not rely on obviousness here, as multiple cases show that by May 2, 2017, the day that Harvel shot Jason, it was clearly established that after incapacitating a suspect who posed a threat, an officer cannot continue using deadly force. . . . To sum up, Garner, Mason, and Graves are the most pertinent cases. And those cases show that by 2017, it was clearly established—and possibly even obvious—that an officer violates the Fourth Amendment if he shoots an unarmed, incapacitated suspect who is moving away from everyone present at the scene. . . . This is a tragic case that raises difficult questions about how police officers should respond to suicidal suspects. Those questions cannot be answered here without the resolution of several factual disputes. And if resolved in Plaintiffs’ favor, Harvel is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ramirez v. Guadamara, 844 F. App’x 710 (5th Cir. 2021), reissued as opinion, 3 F.4th 129, 136-37 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2571 (2022) (“Although the employment of tasers led to a tragic outcome, we cannot suggest exactly what alternative course the defendant officers should have followed that would have led to an outcome free of potential tragedy. We emphasize that the reasonableness of a government official’s use of force must be judged from the perspective of a reasonable official on the scene, not with the benefit of 20/20 hindsight. . . . The fact that Olivas appeared to have the capability of setting himself on fire in an instant and, indeed, was threatening to do so, meant that the officers had no apparent options to avoid calamity. If, reviewing the facts in hindsight, it is still not apparent what might have been done differently to achieve a better outcome under these circumstances, then, certainly, we, who are separated from the moment by more than three years, cannot conclude that Guadarrama or Jefferson, in the exigencies of the moment, acted unreasonably. While the preceding discussion applies to both officers, we now must distinguish between the actions of Guadarrama and those of Jefferson. . . . Given that Guadarrama fired first, the most readily apparent justification for his use of his taser was to prevent Olivas from lighting himself on fire. . . . Jefferson fired second, and while at one point he claimed to have fired instinctively, Plaintiffs allege that he did so intentionally. Accepting Plaintiffs’ allegation as true, Jefferson still had good reason to try to immobilize Olivas, namely, to prevent him from spreading fire around the house. Moreover, at that point there was no risk that using a taser might ignite a fire since Olivas was already engulfed in flames. Accepting the pleaded facts as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, neither officer’s conduct was unreasonable, nor was the force they employed clearly excessive. We thus find that Plaintiffs’ factual allegations do not make out a violation of Olivas’s Fourth Amendment rights. The plaintiffs have asserted that Officers Guadarrama and Jefferson violated the Fourth Amendment rights of their deceased husband and father by using excessive and unreasonable force, causing his death. The officers have invoked qualified immunity from the lawsuit, arguing that there was no constitutional violation because their use of force was reasonable under the circumstances. We have found that, given the horrendous scene that the officers were facing, involving the immediate potential for the destruction of lives and property, the force used—firing tasers—was not unreasonable or excessive, and consequently we hold that the officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment and are thus entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ct. 2571 (2022) (“From purple prose, to the astonishment of what God has wrought, to images of nineteenth-century Justices in green eyeshades hovering over a telegraph transmitter tapping out opinions in Morse code, to the patriotic celebration of 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and finally to the sermonette that good can come even from the tragedy of the unanimous panel opinion, much as it did to Samuel F.B. Morse in the invention of the telegraph, the dissent packs it all in—except for a fair and complete rendition of the facts and law. Three years after the fact, the dissent is unable to articulate what the Fourth Amendment required Officer Guadarrama and Sergeant Jefferson to do in the circumstances they confronted. As for the ‘obviousness’ of the Fourth Amendment violation, if a distinguished United States Circuit Judge—after months of research, thought, and contemplation—does not now know what the Constitution then required, it seems ‘obvious’ that ‘these officers had no “fair and clear warning of what the Constitution require[d]”’ in the split-second, life-or-death encounter. . . In short, I write to say the dissent is quite unfair to the record, to the law, and to the officers.”)

Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 2 F.4th 506, 509-11 (5th Cir. 2021) (Ho, J., joined by Jolly and Jones, JJ., concurring in denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2571 (2022) (“A robust majority of this court has voted to deny rehearing en banc in this matter. I concur and write separately to offer a brief response to the dissent authored by Judge Willett. . . No one would deny that the threat of lethal violence in Cole was less imminent than the danger presented here. In Cole, the potential school shooter was merely on the way to the school when officers shot and killed him. . . Here, by contrast, the suspect was at home, in the very same room as—and in dangerously close proximity to—the officers and citizens he was endangering. So what is the dissent telling police officers in our circuit—that they can use lethal force, but only when the lethal threat is less imminent than the one presented here? What kind of rule is that? . . . Reasonable people can disagree with the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . But that debate has nothing to do with this appeal. As the dissent acknowledges, the panel decided this case based on the absence of a constitutional violation, not on whether any such violation was ‘clearly established’ for purposes of qualified immunity. Reasonable people can disagree with what the police officers did here. But assuming that the police had the duty to do something here to protect innocent lives, no one has explained: What should the officers have done instead? The dissent acknowledges that that is a ‘perfectly sensible question.’ . . But it offers no answer. Reasonable people can advocate in favor of greater restrictions on the police than what the Fourth Amendment requires. Our Nation is currently engaged in a rigorous debate over the need for police reform. Some argue the police should not use force, even in cases involving deadly threats—or that we should defund the police altogether. But that is a policy debate for the political branches, not the judiciary. As judges, we apply our written Constitution, not a woke Constitution. I am grateful for the overwhelming vote to leave the panel ruling intact. That includes Judge Smith, whose dissent notes that the panel ‘got it exactly right.’ . But the fact remains that we are sending some awfully confusing and discomfiting signals to police officers. I fear that officers in our circuit will stop taking on these difficult and dangerous duties, if they have to worry about which panel of our court they will draw in the event tragedy strikes. I fear that officers will decline to put their careers and families on the line because they’re unable to predict the outcome of our en banc votes. I fear that officers will choose to stand by and watch, rather than to protect and to serve, if the rules of engagement are unclear and unknowable at the time of the incident—determinable only after discovery is completed. I concur in the denial of rehearing en banc.”)

Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 2 F.4th 506, 511-15 (5th Cir. 2021) (Oldham, J., joined by Jolly, Jones, Ho, and Engelhardt, JJ., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2571 (2022) (“This case is tragic, as so many of our cases are. But the question is not whether it's tragic. The question is whether the plaintiffs pleaded a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Judge Willett says the answer is obviously yes. I respectfully disagree for three reasons. . . .First, I do not understand how the dissent can say the officers' split-second decision was 'unreasonable'—much less plainly unreasonable—when no one can specify what reasonable alternative the officers had. . . .Second, the dissent says that none of this matters because the plaintiffs should be allowed to take discovery and only then (maybe) tell us what a reasonable officer would've done in a split-second confrontation with a suicidal man doused in gasoline and holding a lighter in a room with innocent family members. . . . I doubt that ever has been the Rule 12(b)(6) standard, . . . but it's certainly not the standard today. (discussing Twombly) Third and finally, the dissent is quite right to focus on the Supreme Court's recent qualified-immunity orders. This Term, the Court summarily reversed one of our grants of qualified immunity and vacated another. (Taylor and McCoy) It's true that summary reversals can constitute sharp rebukes. . . . And these summary orders are particularly remarkable because they are the Court's first- and second-ever invocations of the obvious-case exception to the clearly established law requirement. But Taylor and McCoy both tell us to look for 'particularly egregious facts' where there is 'no evidence' of 'necessity or exigency.' . . . It's unclear how we should apply these orders where there is overwhelming evidence of dire, life-threatening exigencies. It's one thing to say, 'it should've been obvious that you cannot house prisoners in feces-covered cells for days' (Taylor), or 'it should've been obvious that you cannot gratuitously pepper-spray people who are no threat to anybody' (McCoy). But it's altogether different—and much harder—to figure out the 'obvious' answer in a split-second confrontation with a suicidal man doused in gasoline and holding a lighter in a room with innocent family members. . . . This is a tragic case. But the Fourth Amendment is not an antidote to tragedy. It's a cornerstone of our Bill of Rights, with an august history and profound original meaning. We cheapen it when we treat it like a chapter from Prosser & Keeton. And we transmogrify it beyond recognition when we say officers act 'unreasonably' without any effort to say what a reasonable officer would've done.”) Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 2 F.4th 506, 516, 522-24 (5th Cir. 2021) (Willett, J., joined by Graves and Higginson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2571 (2022) (“In recent months, the Court has signaled a subtle, perhaps significant, shift regarding qualified immunity, pruning the doctrine’s worst excesses. The Justices delivered that message in back-to-back cases, both from this circuit and both involving obvious, conscience-shocking constitutional violations. . . . This case is of a piece—yet more troubling. Whereas the Supreme Court’s two summary dispositions checked us for holding, on summary judgment, that there was no violation of ‘clearly established’ law, despite obvious constitutional violations, here we held, on a motion to dismiss, that there was no violation of law whatsoever, despite an obvious constitutional violation. By giving a premature pass to egregious behavior, we have provided the Supreme Court yet another message-sending opportunity. . . . [T]he panel opinion collides with recent warnings from the Supreme Court summarily negating grants of qualified immunity for obvious constitutional violations. . . . Twice in recent months, the Supreme Court has vacated immunity grants. Both cases were from this circuit. And while these quiet, ‘shadow docket’ actions may not portend a fundamental rethinking of qualified immunity, the Court seems determined to dial back the doctrine's harshest excesses. If not reconsidering, the Court is certainly recalibrating. Most importantly here, the Court is warning us to tread more carefully when reviewing obviously violative conduct. . . . Indeed, Taylor was the first time in 16 years (and just the third time ever) that the Supreme Court expressly found official misconduct to violate 'clearly established' law. . . . Taylor . . . declares that the obviousness principle has vitality and that egregiousness matters. In summarily reversing us without full briefing or argument. . . . the Court sent the message that not only were we wrong, we were obviously wrong—more specifically, we were obviously wrong about an obvious wrong. And though a rarity, Taylor was not a one-off. Just a few months ago, the Supreme Court doubled down in another case from our circuit, McCoy v. Alamu, involving an inmate gratuitously assaulted with pepper spray 'for no reason at all' by a prison guard who was angry with another inmate. . . . The Court issued a 'grant, vacate, and remand' order directing us to reconsider in light of Taylor. The Supreme Court's reliance on Taylor confirms that the Court does not consider that case an anomaly, but instead a course correction signaling lower courts to deny immunity for clear misconduct, even in cases with unique facts. . . . The message is low-key but loaded. These two orders make clear that the Court is earnest about reining in qualified immunity's severest applications. This doctrinal clarification may not amount to sweeping reexamination, but the upshot is plain: In cases with 'particularly egregious facts,' courts must not strain to absolve constitutional violations. Even if the precise fact pattern is novel, there is no need for a prior case exactly on point where the violation is obvious. . . . And a conclusion of obviousness at step two necessarily means that step one has been satisfied; an obvious violation of a 'clearly established' right inescapably means that a right has been violated. The principle uniting these recent rebukes is that the qualified-immunity doctrine does not require judicial blindness. Courts need not be oblivious to the obvious. One can only speculate how the Supreme Court, having upended us in Taylor and McCoy, would evaluate today's case. For my part, this case is even clearer, and its holding more jolting, for two reasons: (1) Taylor and McCoy were appeals following summary judgment, after the cases had been factually developed, whereas this is a motion-to-dismiss case that requires us to take Plaintiffs' allegations as true; and (2) in Taylor and McCoy, we at least acknowledged there was a constitutional violation, whereas here we held there was no violation at all—not even a plausible one. Where is the bottom? In my judgment, nothing better captures the yawning rights-remedies gap of the modern immunity regime. . . . than giving a pass to alleged conscience-shocking abuse at the motion-to-dismiss stage and step one of the immunity inquiry. . . . This year America commemorates the sesquicentennial of our preeminent civil rights statute, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the text of which promises a federal remedy for the violation of 'any' right—not just 'clearly established' ones. Nonetheless, the atextual, judge-created doctrine of qualified immunity shields lawbreaking officials from accountability, even for patently unconstitutional abuses, thus largely nullifying § 1983. The pages of F.3d abound with head-scratching examples But transformation is often born of tragedy. Samuel Morse's invention of the telegraph was spurred by heartbreak, the death of his wife, news of which arrived by letter, far too late for him to attend her burial. Morse set his mind to developing a way to deliver messages in minutes rather than days or weeks. And years later, in a hushed Supreme Court chamber, Morse transmitted his revolutionary message. The horrific death of Gabriel Olivas is also suffused in sorrow. And while qualified immunity has enjoyed special solicitude at the Supreme Court, perhaps these ‘particularly egregious facts’ . . . will prompt another meaningful message from the Court, one that marries law with justice (and common sense) and makes clear that those who enforce our laws are not above them.”)

Joseph on behalf of Estate of Joseph v. Bartlett, 981 F.3d 319, 331-32, 336-46 (5th Cir. 2020) (“While we have discretion to leapfrog the merits and go straight to whether the alleged violation offended clearly established law, . . . we think it better to address both steps in order to provide clarity and guidance for officers and courts. . . We consider first the excessive-force claims against Officers Martin and Costa. We then address the claims against Officers Leduff, Morvant, Thompson, Dugas, Varisco, Rolland, Faison, Verrett, and Bartlett. . . . Though Joseph was not suspected of committing any crime, . . . was in the fetal position, and was not actively resisting, Officers Martin and Costa inflicted twenty-six blunt-force injuries on Joseph and tased him twice, all while he pleaded for help and reiterated that he was not armed. Officers Martin and Costa are not entitled to summary judgment on the constitutional merits. Here, Plaintiffs may not be able to prove their claims, and the officers may well prevail at trial. But our task at this stage is to ascertain whether, viewing all facts and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs’ favor, there exist genuine disputes of material fact that a jury should suss out. Based on the record before us and our standard of review at this stage, there are genuine disputes of material fact, meaning that Plaintiffs are entitled to make their best case to a jury. If, that is, they can also demonstrate these facts amount to a violation of clearly established law, which we confront next. . . .On Plaintiffs’ facts, Officers Martin and Costa violated Joseph’s Fourth Amendment rights. But that does not defeat qualified immunity. Plaintiffs must also demonstrate that the law was ‘clearly established’—that, as of February 7, 2017, the date of their encounter with Joseph, any reasonable officer would have known that Officer Martin’s and Officer Costa’s behavior was unlawful. . . .Decades ago, Graham clearly established that the use of force is contrary to the Fourth Amendment if it is excessive under objective standards of reasonableness. . . . But aside from ‘rare,’ ‘obvious’ cases, the allegedly violated right cannot be defined at this level of generality to overcome a qualified-immunity defense. . . . The Supreme Court has explained that for a court to deny qualified immunity based on ‘clearly established’ law, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . In other words, existing precedent must ‘squarely govern[]’ the specific facts at issue, such that only someone who is ‘plainly incompetent’ or who ‘knowingly violates the law’ would have behaved as the official did Because this ‘specificity’ ‘is “especially important in the Fourth Amendment context,”’ the Supreme Court has ‘stressed the need to “identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.”’ . . . In this case, the district court found that a genuine dispute exists such that, under Plaintiffs’ version of the facts, Officers Martin and Costa used force in a manner that violated clearly established law. The district court undertook the clearly established law analysis itself, as Plaintiffs had twice failed to identify a case putting the officers on notice that their conduct was unconstitutional. The court had ordered supplemental briefing specifically identifying this failure, giving Plaintiffs a second chance. Plaintiffs urged that this was an obvious case, but the court did not adopt that reasoning. The officers ask us to reverse on grounds of clearly established law, again arguing that the officers' actions were justified because Joseph was struggling and noncompliant. We have no more ability to review these factual disputes as to clearly established law than we did as to the constitutional merits—which is to say, none. The officers also ask us to reverse because the district court did not hold Plaintiffs to their burden to identify an analogous case, and this is not the rare obvious case for which no similar case is needed. Plaintiffs now argue that Newman, Deville, and Darden clearly established that 'two taser strikes, baton strikes, punches to the head, and kicks to the groin and elsewhere' was excessive force because Joseph 'engaged in no violence, committed no crime, caused no harm, surrendered into the fetal position behind a store counter, and ... at all times presented with psychological disorientation.' The standard for obviousness is sky high, and this case does not meet it. We have nothing approaching the clarity we have perceived in other obvious cases. For example, we found that it was obviously unconstitutional for an officer to shoot—without warning, despite an opportunity to warn—a suspect who was pointing a gun to his own head and did not know the officer was there. . . We explained that it was an obvious case because Tennessee v. Garner prohibits the use of deadly force without an immediate threat and without a warning when one is feasible. . . In another case, we found that an officer obviously did not have reasonable suspicion to detain a man based on the following: The man briefly looked around a car in a well-lit parking lot, turned to get into another car, noticed the officer, got into that other car, and began to drive. . . The man exhibited no headlong flight or evasive behavior, and the officer had no prior tip or other information providing a reason to suspect the man of criminal activity. . . Here, the parties agree that the officers became involved because the assistant middle-school principal expressed concerns about Joseph being near the school. The parties agree that Joseph ran from the officers and disobeyed commands. The parties dispute how, if, and when Joseph resisted during the encounter in the store. The district court declined to find this case was obvious, and we are not persuaded otherwise. Therefore, we must 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' . . While we needn't limit our analysis to the cases cited by Plaintiffs, . . . we must explain why the cases we identify prohibited the challenged conduct in this case. . . Surveying the state of the law as of February 7, 2017, we conclude that analogous facts from Newman v. Guedry, Ramirez v. Martinez, and Cooper v. Brown provided notice to any reasonable officer that it was unconstitutional to tase and strike Joseph as Officers Martin and Costa did here. . . . In sum, viewing the facts in Plaintiffs' favor, Officer Martin struck, punched, and tased Joseph, while Officer Costa repeatedly kicked and punched him—twenty-six blunt-force strikes and two rounds of tasing in total. All the while, Joseph was facedown in the fetal position, not suspected of committing any crime, not posing a threat to officers or others, and not actively resisting arrest. Officers Martin and Costa did not respond to Joseph with measured and ascending force that corresponded to his resistance. If Plaintiffs' facts are true, the actions of Officers Martin and Costa were disproportionate to the situation, in violation of the Fourth Amendment and the clearly established law. And thus, Officers Martin and Costa are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage. . . . Roughly a dozen police officials stood around and behind the checkout counter observing the use of force against Joseph, and not one attempted to stop Officers Martin and Costa from applying the force they did. The officers facing bystander liability claims are Officers Leduff, Morvant, Thompson, Dugas, Varisco, Rolland, Faison, Verrett, and Bartlett. . . An officer is liable for failure to intervene when that officer: (1) knew a fellow officer was violating an individual’s constitutional rights, (2) was present at the scene of the constitutional violation, (3) had a reasonable opportunity to prevent the harm but nevertheless, (4) chose not to act. . . Bystander liability requires more than mere presence in the vicinity of the violation; ‘we also consider whether an officer “acquiesced in” the alleged constitutional violation.’ . . . The district court denied qualified immunity to the ‘bystander officers,’ determining that the officers’ only argument against bystander liability depended on whether Officers Martin and Costa committed an underlying constitutional violation. . . The district court did not separately analyze the constitutional merits and the clearly established law. Before us, neither party engages in a separate analysis for each officer, as qualified immunity requires, and neither party briefed the clearly established law. As we did above, we will address the constitutional merits and then the clearly established law. . . . The video evidence does not eliminate Plaintiffs’ narrative that the officers knew excessive force was being applied, had the opportunity to try to stop it, and did not. If the jury found those facts to be true, then Officers Leduff, Morvant, Thompson, Dugas, Varisco, Rolland, Faison, Verrett, and Bartlett: (1) knew Officers Martin and Costa were violating Joseph’s constitutional rights, (2) were present at the scene of that constitutional violation, (3) had a reasonable opportunity to prevent the harm, but (4) chose not to act. . . Officers Leduff, Morvant, Thompson, Dugas, Varisco, Rolland, Faison, Verrett, and Bartlett have raised no argument that defeats Plaintiffs’ claim that they violated Joseph’s Fourth Amendment rights by failing to intervene. They are not entitled to summary judgment on the constitutional merits. . . . Plaintiffs do not identify a single case to support the argument that any reasonable officer would have known to intervene under these circumstances. We make no comment on whether Plaintiffs could have done so—the record in this case simply shows that they have not done so. In fact, they do not make any arguments as to the clearly established law. Nor do they argue that this case is obvious as to these nine officers. The officers don’t identify cases or make arguments either, but that is not their burden. As we noted, Plaintiffs made the same mistake for the clearly established law proscribing the conduct of Officers Martin and Costa. The district court pointed out this shortcoming and gave Plaintiffs a second chance in supplemental briefing. Plaintiffs did not fix it; the district court fixed it for them. But the district court did not fix it here. The court did not assess the clearly established law applicable to the nine other officers. The Supreme Court strictly enforces the requirement to identify an analogous case and explain the analogy. . . . With no briefing and no district-court analysis to review, we cannot justify a denial of qualified immunity on the grounds that clearly established law shows that every officer acted unconstitutionally in this case. Officers Leduff, Morvant, Thompson, Dugas, Varisco, Rolland, Faison, Verrett, and Bartlett are entitled to qualified immunity and summary judgment.”)

Joseph on behalf of Estate of Joseph v. Bartlett, 981 F.3d 319, 346-47 (5th Cir. 2020) (Oldham, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I agree with the majority that police officers cannot beat an unresisting man. . . Under circuit precedent, that’s enough to send Officer Costa and Officer Martin to trial. I also agree with the majority that an absence of clearly established law entitles the ‘bystander officers’ to qualified immunity. Where ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established,’ the Supreme Court permits us not to reach the underlying constitutional merits. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 237 (2009). I would accept that invitation in this case. Doing so seems particularly wise here because the district court did not fully resolve the constitutionality of each bystander officer's conduct. And while I agree that 'Plaintiffs fail to identify any case' to support their constitutional claims against the bystander officers, . . . I think that militates in favor of avoiding those claims rather than adjudicating them. See Pearson, 555 U.S. at 239 (noting it makes sense to skip the constitutional merits where "the briefing of constitutional questions is woefully inadequate").")

Mayfield v. Currie, 976 F.3d 482, 487-88 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Officer Currie does not cite any cases holding that, in determining whether an officer would have known that her affidavit failed to establish probable cause, it is appropriate to consider other affidavits and applications submitted to the same judge regarding the same case. But in the context of qualified immunity, it is the plaintiff's burden to establish that an allegedly violated right was clearly established. . . Plaintiff-Appellees have not met that burden. Indeed, their own Amended Complaint acknowledges that the municipal judge signed the arrest warrant in question 'on the basis of the Currie affidavit and the Harrison affidavits,' and references the other warrants submitted by Officer Currie and her colleagues. The district court's conclusion that Plaintiff-Appellees adequately alleged a Malley wrong was therefore error.")

Mayfield v. Currie, 976 F.3d 482, 488-93 (5th Cir. 2020) (Willett, J., concurring) ("Stating the correct outcome is easy in this case; untangling a knotty constitutional inquiry to arrive at that outcome, less so. Today's bottom-line disposition is certainly correct: Reversing the denial of Officer Currie's Malley-based motion to dismiss, and remanding the Franks issue. I write separately only to point out that the Mayfields have not shown any constitutional violation, much less a clearly established one. . . The court begins (and ends) its immunity analysis on 'clearly established law' grounds, declining to address—let alone determine—whether Officer Currie violated the Fourth Amendment in the first place. True, the Supreme Court has blessed our 'sound discretion' to pivot solely on prong two of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . And 'clearly established law' is often outcome-determinative. But just because we can jump straight to prong two without undertaking the nettlesome task of determining if anyone's rights were violated doesn't mean we should. Leapfrogging the constitutional merits does make for easier sledding. . . But such skipping, jurists and scholars lament, leads to ' "constitutional stagnation"—fewer courts establishing law at all, much less clearly doing so.' . . The modern immunity regime, as with many judge-invented doctrines, could use greater precision. And one way to advance constitutional clarity is to give courts and public officials more matter-of-fact guidance as to what the law prescribes and proscribes. Yes, scrutinizing the alleged constitutional offense requires more work. More time. More resources. Overworked federal courts already resemble Lucy and Ethel in the chocolate factory. . . But since we require plaintiffs to prove a violation of clearly established law, it seems only fair that we do our part in establishing what that law is. How can a plaintiff produce precedent if fewer courts are producing precedent? How can a plaintiff show a violation if fewer courts are showing what constitutes a violation? The result: Section 1983 meets Catch-22.... Important constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because no one's answered them before. Courts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there's no equivalent case on the books. No precedent = no clearly established law = no liability. An Escherian Stairwell. Heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses. . . Ordinary citizens are told that ignorance of the law is no excuse. The judge-created rules of qualified immunity are, well, different. Accordingly, judges should, whenever possible, shrink the universe of uncertainty and 'clearly establish' which alleged misdeeds violate the law, and which do not, thus narrowing the presumed knowledge gap between those who enforce our laws and those who live under them. . . . Officer Currie is shielded from civil liability 'insofar as [her] conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.' . . . Specifically, the Mayfields must show: '(1) that [Officer Currie] violated a statutory or constitutional right, and (2) that the right was "clearly established" at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . . As explained below, the Mayfields fall doubly short: There is no Fourth Amendment violation at all, clearly established or otherwise. . . . In sum, the record evidence establishes that the municipal court judge was presented with an arrest-warrant affidavit containing facts that were corroborated and supplemented by other arrest and search-warrant affidavits, which, considered together, establish probable cause and justify the warrant for Mr. Mayfield's arrest. . . . Because the warrant was supported by probable cause, the Mayfields have not shown a constitutional violation. . . . Turning to the second issue—"clearly established law"—the court rightly concludes that the Mayfields fail to establish that the alleged Fourth Amendment violation was 'clearly established' at the time of the challenged conduct. . . . To be clearly established, a right must be sufficiently clear 'that every "reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right."' . . . An officer is not eligible for qualified immunity under Malley when there is an 'obvious failure of accurately presented evidence to support the probable cause required for the issuance of a warrant.' . . . We have held the standard in Malley is not satisfied when an officer proffers a facially invalid warrant affidavit—one devoid of any facts—one that 'states nothing more than the charged offense, accompanied by a conclusory statement' that the individual committed the offense. . . . And, while we have held that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity under Malley when the warrant was based solely on a skimpy affidavit, the burden is on the Mayfields to cite a case holding that the Fourth Amendment required the affidavit to establish probable cause on its own, without consideration of other supporting documents. . . . They have not done so. . . . The Supreme Court has explicitly recognized our discretion to address the qualified-immunity prongs in whatever order we choose. In my judgment, the development of the law is best served by undertaking, wherever possible, the threshold constitutional analysis. Respectfully, courts should attempt to provide greater judicial guidance at the outset, explaining whether a right was in fact violated, not merely whether a rights violation was clearly established. In any event, because the Mayfields have failed to show a constitutional violation, let alone a clearly established one, Officer Currie cannot be liable under Malley. And the court is right to remand the Franks issue so that the district court can tackle it in the first instance.") Walsh v. Hodge, 975 F.3d 475, 481-83, 485-88 (5th Cir. 2020) ("While courts should 'think hard' before addressing the constitutional question, 'it remains true that following the two-step sequence—defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity—is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.”. . . The first prong of qualified immunity requires us to address whether Walsh suffered a deprivation of procedural due process by not being permitted to cross-examine his accuser. . . . Because we have concluded Walsh suffered a violation of his procedural due process rights, we proceed to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: was Walsh’s constitutional right clearly established? . . . Walsh is correct that we have clearly established that due process for a terminated professor includes ‘a meaningful opportunity to be heard in his own defense.’. . . However, none of our case law speaks directly to the procedures necessary to protect a professor’s interest in avoiding career-destruction after being accused of sexual harassment. . . . [A]s the above discussion makes clear, before today we have not explicitly held that, in university disciplinary hearings where the outcome depends on credibility, the Due Process Clause demands the opportunity to confront witnesses or some reasonable alternative. Our sister circuits, meanwhile, are split on this issue. . . . And the Department of Education recently revised Title IX regulations to require universities to permit cross-examination of all witnesses, further demonstrating how in flux this right is. . . . Nor can we hold, as Walsh contends, that ‘a meaningful opportunity to be heard’ should have put Defendants on notice that their actions were unlawful. The clearly established standard ‘requires a high “degree of specificity.”’. . . Our case law does not make clear that the University’s use of an investigator to interview the accused student and face cross-examination at the hearing violated Walsh’s due process rights. Walsh presents us with no binding or persuasive authority for the proposition that the Committee was required to give Walsh the opportunity to test Student #1’s version of the events more than it did. Because of our conflicting, inconclusive language in past cases, we cannot find that Defendants ‘knowingly violate[d] the law.’. . . And, because of all the opportunities Defendants afforded Walsh to be heard, we cannot conclude Defendants were ‘plainly incompetent’ in denying Walsh the right to cross-examine Student #1 or some substitute method to test her testimony. . . . The district court, therefore, erred in denying Defendants’ motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity for these claims.”) Garcia v. Blevins, 957 F.3d 596, 600-02 (5th Cir. 2020) (“Because it resolves the case, we begin and end with step two: was the alleged right clearly established at the time of the shooting? The district court determined it was not. We agree. . . . In excessive-force cases, ‘police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent squarely governs the specific facts at issue.’. . . The Garcias fail to show Blevins violated clearly established law. It is not enough to argue Garcia had a clearly established right ‘to be free from deadly force where he was not attempting to flee and did not pose an immediate threat to the officers, nor anyone else.’ That high level of generality cannot clearly establish the relevant law. . . . The Garcias rely primarily on Reyes v. Bridgwater, 362 F. App’x 403 (5th Cir. 2010), to show the law was clearly established. Reyes is unpublished, however, and so cannot clearly establish the law. . . . And Reyes would fail to do so in any event. In that decision, we concluded that officers violated clearly established law by shooting a man who held a kitchen knife, but who did not make a movement towards the officers or any other threatening gestures. . . . We emphasized that a knife is a very different weapon than a gun, which is capable of causing fatal harm instantly at distance. . . . We concluded that no reasonable officer could have concluded that the suspect posed an immediate danger of harm, and thus deadly force was excessive. . . . Here, by contrast, Garcia was holding a gun, which he could at any time have turned on Blevins or any of the other individuals in the parking lot. Reyes thus provides no help to the Garcias' case. While not cited by the Garcias, our recent en banc decision in Cole v. Carson is also distinguishable. In that case, while searching in the woods, officers suddenly confronted a teenager holding a gun to his head and shot him. . . . We explained that it violated clearly established law in 2010 for police to shoot someone who—though pointing a gun at his own head—made no threatening movements toward the officers, was facing away from the officers, was not warned by the officers even though there was opportunity to do so, and may have been unaware of the officers' presence. . . . Here, by contrast, it is undisputed Garcia was aware of Blevins' presence and that Blevins ordered Garcia to put down his weapon, but Garcia refused to do so. Those facts take this case beyond the contours of clearly established law at the time of the shooting. . . . Blevins, having just twice broken up fighting in the restaurant in which Garcia was involved, was told someone in the parking lot had a gun. He saw Garcia walking, gun in hand, towards other people in the parking lot. Garcia ignored Blevins' commands to drop the weapon, first ducking between parked vehicles and then trying to give the gun to someone else. Even under Plaintiffs' version of events, it is undisputed that—although he may have put his hands up at some point—Garcia refused to drop the gun when ordered to do so, and he could have quickly turned it on Blevins. '[W]e have never required officers to wait until a defendant turns towards them, with weapon in hand, before applying deadly force to ensure their safety.' . . . Here, we cannot say the law was 'so clearly established that—in the blink of an eye ...—every reasonable officer would know it immediately.' . . . We therefore hold Blevins is entitled to qualified immunity because he did not violate clearly established law.")

Voss v. Goode, 954 F.3d 234, 239-40 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Voss's second argument is that Goode is not entitled to qualified immunity because a reasonable officer would not have thought that he had probable cause to arrest her for interference with public duties. We need not determine whether Goode had probable cause under the first part of the qualified immunity test, because Goode's behavior was reasonable in light of the clearly established law at the time of the incident. An officer is entitled to qualified immunity even if he did not have probable cause to arrest a suspect, 'if a reasonable person in [his] position "would have believed that [his] conduct conformed to the constitutional standard in light of the information available to [him] and the clearly established law."' . . . Here, a reasonable officer could believe that Voss's conduct did not fall within the speech-only exception. While Voss maintains that she did not physically put K.V. in her car, she does not deny that she told K.V. to get in her car, contravening Goode's order that K.V. get in his patrol car. Importantly, her counsel acknowledged at oral argument that K.V. obeyed Voss and got in Voss's car after Voss ordered her to do so. A reasonable officer could think that this behavior gave rise to probable cause for interference. . . . Here, Goode had legal authority to place K.V. in protective custody, and Voss told her child to disobey a physical order. These circumstances are more similar to the facts of our cases upholding qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, Goode's conduct was not unreasonable in light of the prevailing law.")

Powers v. Northside Indep. Sch. Dist., 951 F.3d 298, 306-07 (5th Cir. 2020) (“Because of the uncertainty created by these decisions, our law on this issue remained unsettled until 2018 when the Sims court provided ‘overdue clarification.’. . . There, our court held that there is no absolute bar on liability for individuals who are not final decision-makers in a First Amendment retaliation claim. . . . The Sims court further held that the ‘causal link’ standard in Jett controls and sets the causation requirement on such a claim. . . . Nevertheless, like in Sims, this clarification of the law provides no recourse to the plaintiffs in the instant case because the law was not clearly established at the time the incident occurred. . . . When Powers and Wernli were terminated in April 2014, the inconsistency in our law as to whether First Amendment liability can attach to a public official who did not make the final employment decision had not yet been resolved. See Culbertson, 790 F.3d at 627 (concluding that the law remained unsettled in June 2015). Accordingly, the district court did not err in dismissing Plaintiffs’ claims against Woods based on qualified immunity.”)

Horvath v. City of Leander, Texas, 946 F.3d 787, 795, 800-03 (5th Cir. 2020) (Ho, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part) (“I would welcome a principled re-evaluation of our precedents under both prongs. . . . The second prong has been widely criticized, and for good reason: Neither the text nor the original understanding of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 supports the ‘clearly established’ requirement. . . . In addition, courts too often misuse the first prong, finding constitutional violations where none exist as an original matter. . . . In sum, we grant immunity when we should deny—and we deny immunity when we should grant. But be that as it may, I am duty bound to faithfully apply established qualified immunity precedents, just as I am duty bound to faithfully follow Smith. I concur in the judgment in part and dissent in part. . . . The ‘clearly established’ requirement is controversial because it lacks any basis in the text or original understanding of § 1983. Nothing in the text of § 1983—either as originally enacted in 1871 or as it is codified today—supports the imposition of a ‘clearly established’ requirement. . . . By contrast, Congress has expressly adopted a ‘clearly established’ requirement in other contexts. For example, in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Congress imposed special burdens on habeas petitioners who seek relief from convictions. AEDPA requires habeas petitioners not only to establish a violation of law, but to identify ‘clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States.’. . . The qualified immunity doctrine imposes a similar ‘clearly established’ standard in § 1983 cases—but without any corresponding textual basis. That is troubling because, in other contexts, the Supreme Court has declined to read language into a statute if Congress explicitly included the same language in other statutes. . . . Nor is there any other basis for imputing such a requirement to Congress, such as from the common law of 1871 or even from the early practice of § 1983 litigation. . . . In sum, there is no textualist or originalist basis to support a ‘clearly established’ requirement in § 1983 cases. . . . One of the primary justifications for the ‘clearly established’ requirement is that the fear of litigation not only deters bad conduct, but chills good conduct as well. That is a valid but, I believe, ultimately misplaced concern. For if courts simply applied the first prong of the doctrine in a manner more consistent with the text and original understanding of the Constitution, we might find that the second prong is unnecessary to prevent chilling, as well as unwarranted by the text. Law enforcement officials and other public officials who engage in misconduct should be held accountable. . . Public officials who violate the law without consequence ‘only further fuel public cynicism and distrust of our institutions of government.’ . . But there is also concern that the fear of litigation chills public officials from lawfully carrying out their duties. . . . Much of the chilling problem, however, stems from misuse of the first prong of the doctrine. Simply put, courts find constitutional violations where they do not exist. For example, the Fourth Amendment does not prohibit reasonable efforts to protect law-abiding citizens from violent criminals—it forbids only ‘unreasonable searches and seizures.’ . . As those words were understood at the time of the Founding, the Fourth Amendment allows police officers to take the steps necessary to apprehend and prevent felons from harming innocent citizens. . . . So if chilling police conduct is the concern, there is no need for an atextual ‘clearly established’ requirement. The Constitution should be enough—if we get the substantive Fourth Amendment analysis right. Our court’s recent debates about qualified immunity illustrate this point. In Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464 (5th Cir. 2019), no member of our court claimed that the officers violated ‘clearly established’ law. We all agreed that the officers involved in the death of a suspected active shooter were entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong. . . What divided us was the first prong—whether the plaintiff established a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Four members of our court dissented from the denial of rehearing en banc, writing that, ‘[i]f we want to stop mass shootings, we should stop punishing police officers who put their lives on the line to prevent them’—echoing the same chilling concerns previously expressed by the Supreme Court. Winzer v. Kaufman County, 940 F.3d 900, 901 (5th Cir. 2019) (Ho, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc). But we did so under the first prong, not the second. . . So too in Cole v. Carson, 935 F.3d 444 (5th Cir. 2019) (en banc). There we again divided over whether the officers violated the Fourth Amendment—the first prong of the qualified immunity doctrine—in taking steps to prevent a distraught and armed teenager from shooting up a nearby school. . . Once again, so long as the substantive analysis under the first prong is right, there is no need for the second prong. . . . Smith does not foreclose Horvath’s Free Exercise claim against the city. But qualified immunity requires us to affirm the judgment as to the fire chief. I would vacate the judgment as to the Free Exercise claim against the city and remand to allow Horvath to proceed on that claim. I dissent in part for that reason. In all other respects, I concur in the judgment.”)

Clarkston v. White, 943 F.3d 988, 992-93 (5th Cir. 2019) (on denial of rehearing and rehearing en banc) (“We affirm on a basis different from the one relied on by the district court. White is entitled to QI because, at the time of his alleged violation, it was not clearly established that First Amendment liability could attach to a public official who did not possess final decisionmaking authority. The district court did not reach the QI inquiry, but this court may affirm for any reason supported by the record, even if not relied on by the district court. . . Government officials ‘are entitled to [QI] under § 1983 unless (1) they violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the unlawfulness of their conduct was clearly established at the time.’ . . Courts are ‘permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the [QI] analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . The plaintiff has the burden to point out the clearly established law. . . . We conclude, at the second prong, that the right at issue was not clearly established, so White is entitled to QI. It thus is unnecessary for us to reach the more complicated issue of whether a rights violation occurred at the first prong. . . . At the time White allegedly violated plaintiffs’ rights—March 2016, at the latest—this court’s jurisprudence was ambiguous regarding whether First Amendment liability could attach to a public official who did not possess final decisionmaking authority. . . . Because White was not a final decisionmaker, it was not clearly established that he could be liable for his recommendation to the BESE. Accordingly, he is entitled to QI.”) [See Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632 (5th Cir. 2018), infra]

Longoria Next Friend of M.L. v. San Benito Indep. Consol. Sch. Dist., 942 F.3d 258, 264-70 (5th Cir. 2019) (“In reaching its conclusion, the district court followed the traditional two-step approach to qualified immunity. First, it determined that the facts alleged by M.L. stated a claim for the violation of a constitutional right. Then, it analyzed whether the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the defendants’ actions. This two-step inquiry, however, is not mandatory. . . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has ‘detailed a range of circumstances in which courts should address only the immunity question,’ and has admonished courts to ‘think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones’ by engaging in unnecessary constitutional analysis. . . . We therefore turn to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis and find that, regardless of whether M.L.’s rights were violated, the right at issue was not clearly established. . . . Nevertheless, though we do not reach the first prong, we are mindful of the pressing ‘need to provide clear guidance for students, teachers, and school administrators that balances students’ First Amendment rights ... with the vital need to foster a school environment conducive to learning.’ . . . Given the ubiquity of social media and the permeable boundaries between on-campus and off-campus speech, this task is complicated but increasingly urgent. We thus conclude by articulating limitations derived from our existing precedent for school discipline of student off-campus speech. . . . M.L. argues that the Supreme Court’s own cases clearly established the unconstitutionality of the defendants’ actions. . . . The Court’s four school speech cases, including Morse, all pertain to on-campus speech or speech conducted during a school-sponsored activity. Because the Court has not had the occasion to articulate a rule that sets forth the limits of school discipline of off-campus speech, its cases did not clearly establish the contours of M.L.’s rights in light of the specific facts of this case. . . . Indeed, there are a number of unique circumstances present here that set this case apart from Bell and the Supreme Court’s precedent. M.L. and her mother both signed the Cheerleading Constitution, which put them on notice that M.L.’s social-media activity could be monitored and penalized. M.L. identified herself as a member of the San Benito cheerleading team on her Twitter page. And perhaps most notably, M.L. was dismissed from an extracurricular activity as a consequence of her speech—not suspended from school altogether. The fact that the retaliatory action here involved an extracurricular sanction further distinguishes this case from our precedent. . . . In the absence of a case providing a general rule that could have placed defendants on notice, we decline to find that M.L.’s free speech rights were clearly established at the time that she was dismissed from the cheerleading team. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s holding that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Before addressing M.L.’s remaining claims, we briefly synthesize the school speech law identified above. We note that the lack of clarity in the case law has given rise to frequent calls from commentators asking courts to ‘more clearly delineate the boundary line between off-campus speech entitled to greater First Amendment protection, and on-campus speech subject to greater regulation.’. . Much of our case law on these issues has resulted in a finding of qualified immunity, thus ‘bypass[ing]’ an ultimate determination on the constitutional limits of official action ‘again, and again, and again.’. . First, nothing in our precedent allows a school to discipline non-threatening off-campus speech simply because an administrator considers it ‘offensive, harassing, or disruptive.’. . Second, it is ‘indisputable’ that non-threatening student expression is entitled to First Amendment protection, even though the extent of that protection may be ‘diminished’ if the speech is ‘composed by a student on-campus, or purposefully brought onto a school campus.’. . And finally, as a general rule, speech that the speaker does not intend to reach the school community remains outside the reach of school officials. . . Because a school’s authority to discipline student speech derives from the unique needs and goals of the school setting, a student must direct her speech towards the school community in order to trigger school-based discipline. We acknowledge, however, that the ‘pervasive and omnipresent nature of the Internet’ raises difficult questions about what it means for a student using social media to direct her speech towards the school community. . . We express no opinion whether M.L.’s dismissal from the cheerleading team violated these principles, and we rest our holding instead on our conclusion that there was no clearly-established law that placed M.L.’s rights beyond debate at the time of the sanction—particularly given the unique extracurricular context here. We recognize that the articulation of these rules still leaves many questions unanswered, and a more defined rule will be left for another day. . . Given these principles, however, we hope to give some guidance to schools for the future, with the important reminder that ‘a broad swath of off-campus student expression’ remains fully-protected by the First Amendment.”)

Jones v. Perez, 790 F. App’x 576, ____ (5th Cir. 2019) (“Because ‘a warrant is not a prerequisite to a lawful arrest,’ the ultimate inquiry for a Fourth Amendment false arrest claim is whether the arrest was reasonable. . . And an arrest is reasonable when ‘there is probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been or is being committed,’ warrant or no warrant. . . That is why our court has, in civil suits challenging arrests, . . . applied a third step after completing the traditional Franks analysis. It asks whether ‘any reasonably competent officer possessing the information each officer had at the time [s]he swore [her] affidavit could have concluded that a warrant should issue.’. . This inquiry is the ultimate liability question in a false arrest case: Did the officer have information establishing probable cause, whether or not that information was included in the warrant? So whether the district court properly reconstructed the affidavit or correctly determined that the reconstruction supported a finding of probable cause is beside the point if Perez, at the time she swore out her affidavit, had probable cause to believe Jones had committed the murder. She did. . . . Because Perez could have reasonably believed probable cause existed when she obtained the warrant for Jones’s arrest, that arrest did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights. . . The outcome of this civil suit may seem inconsistent with the deterrence rationale of Franks. . . But it is a product of a false arrest claim ultimately being about whether probable cause existed rather than the validity of a warrant. And this case also shows that civil litigation is not the only way to hold officers accountable for misconduct. Police departments can play a role too, as Dallas’s did in suspending Perez and removing her from homicide investigations based on her conduct in obtaining the warrant charging Jones with murder.”)

Maldonado v. Rodriguez, 932 F.3d 388, 394-95 (5th Cir. 2019) (“Whether the political sensitivity of the prosecutorial function inherently requires political trust and loyalty throughout the DA’s office remains unsettled, . . . but Gunaca’s twenty-four-year-old precedent affording qualified immunity to the DA who fired an investigator has not been altered. Nor has the scope of First Amendment protection for employees of a DA’s office become ‘clearly established’ in the interim. Pending further development of the law concerning DA employees other than attorneys, we must take Gunaca to furnish a baseline at least for granting qualified immunity. If an investigator’s position was sufficiently significant to possibly deny the employee First Amendment protection from retaliation, and therefore to afford the DA qualified immunity, then surely the DA must receive qualified immunity for firing personnel above the investigator’s level in the chain of command. Using Gunaca as a baseline, on the record before us, there is no material fact dispute that the former HIDTA Task Force Commander and her Assistant, Dora Munoz and Yates, although perhaps not as intimately connected with the DA’s duties as assistant prosecutors, held more responsible and discretionary positions than ordinary investigators. Indeed, they can be fairly characterized as criminal investigators with substantial additional responsibility. . . . Even if we were to define their positions as entitled to First Amendment protection from political retaliation, a decision we need not make in light of Pearson v. Callahan, . . . Rodriguez would be entitled to immunity pursuant to Gunaca. And because of Gunaca, we are constrained to conclude that Rodriguez may claim qualified immunity for firing the Hidalgo County investigators Salazar and Leal, who held positions identical to that of Gunaca himself. As a matter of law, these four individuals’ claims are defeated by the DA’s qualified immunity.”) Maldonado v. Rodriguez, 932 F.3d 388, 399 (5th Cir. 2019) (Dennis, J., dissenting in part) (“In concluding that whether the Investigator-Plaintiffs are protected by the First Amendment from political retaliation is not clearly established, the majority relies heavily on Gunaca v. State of Texas, 65 F.3d 467, 468 (5th Cir. 1995), in which this court granted qualified immunity for the termination of Dempsey Gunaca ‘as an investigator at the El Paso County District Attorney’s Office.’ Problematically, however, this interpretation overlooks that this court in Gunaca found a constitutional violation under the first prong of qualified immunity and therefore clearly established that First Amendment protection from termination can extend to investigators in DA’s offices for future cases. . . . The Supreme Court has endorsed the process of determining whether a constitutional violation exists before deciding whether the law was clearly established, as this ‘two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’. . . The Gunaca panel engaged precisely in this two-step procedure, establishing for future cases, such as this one, that investigators in DA’s offices are generally protected from political termination. This result is especially pronounced with respect to the non-HIDTA investigators, who the majority notes ‘held positions identical to that of Gunaca himself.’. . . I cannot see how Gunaca’s holding that a violation existed there could function in any

Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 468-70 (5th Cir. 2019) (on rehearing), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (“To summarize, we have concluded there was a violation of Dr. Zadeh’s constitutional rights. That is true even with our twin assumptions that pain management clinics are part of a closely regulated industry and that Dr. Zadeh operated a pain management clinic. Nonetheless, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity unless the constitutional requirements they violated were clearly established at the time of their actions. . . We hold that it was clearly established at the time of this search that the medical profession as a whole is not a closely regulated industry, meaning that governmental agents violate the Constitution when they search clinics that are not pain management clinics without providing an opportunity for precompliance review. We also hold, even assuming that pain management clinics are part of a closely regulated industry, that on-demand searches of those clinics violate the constitution when the statutory scheme authorizing the search fails to provide sufficient constraints on the discretion of the inspecting officers. We need to analyze, though, whether that last statement of law was clearly established when this search occurred. . . . For the law to be clearly established, there must be a close congruence of the facts in the precedent and those in the case before us. . . ‘The precedent must be clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiffs seek to apply.’. . Defendants rely on one of our precedents that reviewed an administrative search of a dentist’s office by agents of the Texas State Board of Dental Examiners, accompanied by Department of Public Safety officials. Beck v. Tex. State Bd. of Dental Exam’rs, 204 F.3d 629, 632 (5th Cir. 2000). . . . In light of Beck, the Board argues that reasonable investigators could have believed the Burger exception permitted the execution of the subpoena as they too were investigating prescriptions of controlled substances within the medical industry. The plaintiffs insist that Beck is ‘patently distinguishable’ for the same reason argued in the separate opinion here. The clarity of any possible distinction, though, must be viewed through the lens that the law, including a distinction, must be ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful’ at that time. . . That means ‘existing law must have placed the constitutionality of the officer’s conduct “beyond debate.”’. . Perhaps most relevant, the ‘legal principle [must] clearly prohibit the officer’s conduct in the particular circumstances before him. The rule’s contours must be so well defined that it is “clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.”’. . The claimed sufficient distinction here is that the regulations and statutes under which the investigators in Beck acted explicitly permitted inspections without prior notice. . . The Beck court discussed that point at the end of the opinion, as it addressed several questions regarding whether what occurred was a valid administrative search of a closely regulated industry. . . The final subject the court discussed was that one of the statutes under which the inspection was conducted did not require that prior notice be given. . . That is no small distinction, and we conclude today that absent similar statutory or perhaps regulatory authority that dispenses with prior notice, a search such as occurred here cannot be conducted without prior notice. The issue for us, though, is whether that law was clearly established at the time of the search we are reviewing today. As we already stated, the right is not clearly established unless it is beyond debate using an objective test. We have discussed the intricacies of New York v. Burger, which permit warrantless searches when they satisfy a three-factor test. Our Beck decision held that the search there was of a closely regulated industry, and therefore went through the three Burger factors. The discussion of the specific statutory authorization for no-notice inspections was to show that the third Burger factor was satisfied, which is that an adequate substitute for a warrant existed. We did not say in Beck that the only sufficient substitute under Burger was a statute authorizing no-notice searches. We did hold that ‘under these circumstances, Beck does not show a violation of a clearly established constitutional right.’ . . . Instead of clearly establishing the principle that prior notice of a regulatory search must be given unless the authorizing statute explicitly announces it is unnecessary, Beck applied the general Burger principle to the facts of that case that a warrant substitute authorized by a ‘regulatory statute must perform the two basic functions of a warrant: it must advise the owner of the commercial premises that the search is being made pursuant to the law and has a properly defined scope, and it must limit the discretion of the inspecting officers.’ . . . In the Beck situation, that factor was satisfied with the statutory language already discussed. We cannot see, though, that every reasonable official prior to conducting a search under the circumstances of this case would know this Burger factor was not satisfied. We think some, even many, reasonable officers would believe under the third Burger factor that the owner of the premises was charged with knowledge that a statute authorized the search, and the officers would reasonably believe the scope of the search and the discretion of the officials was validly limited. We have held that the statute fails this standard, but we do not hold that all reasonable officers would have known that, until now. Therefore, although Beck does not control the constitutionality of the Board’s actions in this case, it does weigh in favor of the defendants’ receiving qualified immunity. . . . Because we have not so far required there to be a clear limit on determining whom officials select for an administrative search, the defendants reasonably could have believed that the administrative scheme here provided a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant. . . . In conclusion, the unlawfulness of the defendants’ conduct was not clearly established at the time of the search.”) Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 474-81 (5th Cir. 2019) (on rehearing) (Willett, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (“The majority opinion correctly diagnoses Dr. Zadeh’s injury but refuses to prescribe a remedy: His rights were violated, but since the law wasn’t clearly established, Dr. Zadeh loses. I originally agreed with this violation-without-vindication result. . . . But deeper study has convinced me that the officials’ constitutional misstep violated clearly established law, not a previously unknown right. And it has reaffirmed my broader conviction that the judge-made immunity regime ought not be immune from thoughtful reappraisal. . . . Here, Texas officials gave Dr. Zadeh no time to question the subpoena’s reasonableness. That’s a violation. Plain and simple. . . . But there are exceptions to most every rule. Under the Supreme Court’s 1981 decision in Burger, officials don’t have to give people time to comply if:

- the business is part of a closely regulated industry;
- there’s a substantial government interest;
- warrantless searches are necessary; and

- there's a 'constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant.' . . .

This search whiffs two requirements. So I agree with the majority opinion: The Burger exception doesn't apply. Medical practices—including pain-management clinics—aren't 'closely regulated' industries. . . . In sum, the law strongly protects privacy in medicine. Pain management is a medical field. So pain-management clinics aren't closely regulated. Unfortunately, the majority opinion assumes without deciding that pain-management clinics are closely regulated. In doing so, the majority blurs constitutional contours. . . . Our legal system serves the public best when it provides clear rules, consistently applied—bright lines and sharp corners. We owe clarity to the courts below us, the litigants before us, and the cases beyond us. Thankfully, our court has at least established that medicine generally isn't closely regulated. . . . Setting aside the 'closely regulated' issue, the Burger exception still doesn't apply. The laws here aren't a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant. In Burger, the Court explained that a statute has to notify the public that the government can search on-demand. And it must limit officer discretion. These statutes neither notify nor limit. Here, the statutes don't notify business owners of on-demand searches. These statutes allow 'a reasonable time' to produce records. And they define 'reasonable time' as 'fourteen calendar days'; less only if there's an emergency or a risk 'that the records may be lost, damaged, or destroyed.' That's not notice of routine, on-the-spot searches. Lastly, the statutes don't limit officer discretion. The only limits: who can subpoena things (the Board); who the Board can subpoena (licensees); and what the Board can demand (medical records). But that's it. Otherwise, there's total discretion. Thus, the Burger exception doesn't apply. And so all that's left to decide is if the violation was clearly established. . . . The Supreme Court in See, Lone Steer, and Patel made clear the need for precompliance review of administrative subpoenas. That's controlling law. Summing up: The Board violated Dr. Zadeh's Fourth Amendment rights. No exception applies. And the law was clearly established. The state officials are thus not immune. On this basis alone, Dr. Zadeh deserves his day in court. . . . The majority concedes that the statutes here don't limit the discretion of the inspecting officers as Burger requires. The court also acknowledges that statutes must provide notice. Yet the court holds that these requirements weren't—themselves—clearly established. I understand the impulse. After all, qualified immunity is supposed to protect 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law'—that's what the Supreme Court remarked in Wesby. So if reasonably competent officers wouldn't necessarily know that they're violating the law, they shouldn't be liable. For example, the majority says that since we haven't yet enforced the limited-discretion requirement, reasonable officials could've thought that the subpoena satisfied Burger. Thus, they wouldn't necessarily realize they're breaking the law. But that hyperspecific take snubs the Supreme Court's time-worn test: Was there a clearly established violation? Yes, it's a violation to conduct a warrantless search without precompliance review. Sometimes there's an exception to this test. But not here. No exception applies. And it's only when an exception applies that the general rule doesn't. . . . Yet even if we should ask whether the Burger exception was clearly established, Dr. Zadeh still ought to win. Controlling law dictates that there must be statutory notice. . . . Everyone agrees his Fourth Amendment rights were violated. But owing to a legal deus ex machina—the 'clearly established' prong of qualified-immunity analysis—the violation eludes vindication. At first I agreed with the panel majority that the government violated the law but not clearly established law. I was wrong.

Beyond this case, though, I must restate my broader unease with the real-world functioning of modern immunity practice. To some observers, qualified immunity smacks of unqualified impunity, letting public officials duck consequences for bad behavior—no matter how palpably unreasonable—as long as they were the first to behave badly. Merely proving a constitutional deprivation doesn't cut it; plaintiffs must cite functionally identical precedent that places the legal question 'beyond debate' to 'every' reasonable officer. Put differently, it's immaterial that someone acts unconstitutionally if no prior case held such misconduct unlawful. This current 'yes harm, no foul' imbalance leaves victims violated but not vindicated. Wrongs are not righted, and wrongdoers are not reproached. Today the majority opinion says Dr. Zadeh loses because his rights weren't clearly established. But courts of appeals are divided—intractably—over precisely what degree of factual similarity must exist. How indistinguishable must existing precedent be? On the one hand, the Supreme Court reassures plaintiffs that its caselaw 'does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established.' On the other hand, the Court admonishes that 'clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case.' How to square these abstract instructions? Take Dr. Zadeh. Effectively, he loses since no previous panel has ever held this exact sort of search unconstitutional. In day-to-day practice, the 'clearly established' standard is neither clear nor established among our Nation's lower courts. Two other factors perpetuate perplexity over 'clearly established law.' First, many courts grant immunity without first determining whether the challenged behavior violates the Constitution. They avoid scrutinizing the alleged offense by skipping to the simpler second prong: no factually analogous precedent. Forgoing a knotty constitutional inquiry makes for easier sledding, no doubt. But the inexorable result is 'constitutional stagnation'—fewer courts establishing law at all, much less clearly doing so. Section 1983 meets Catch-22. Plaintiffs must produce precedent even as fewer courts are producing precedent. Important constitutional questions go unanswered precisely because no one's answered them before. Courts then rely on that judicial silence to conclude there's no equivalent case on the books. No precedent = no clearly established law = no liability. An Escherian Stairwell. Heads government wins, tails plaintiff loses. Second, constitutional litigation increasingly involves cutting-edge technologies. If courts leapfrog the underlying constitutional merits in cases raising novel issues like digital privacy, then constitutional clarity—matter-of-fact guidance about what the Constitution requires—remains exasperatingly elusive. Result: gauzy constitutional guardrails as technological innovation outpaces legal adaptation. Qualified immunity aims to balance competing policy goals: 'the need to hold public officials accountable when they exercise power irresponsibly and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability when they perform their duties reasonably.' And I concede that the doctrine enjoys special favor at the Supreme Court, which seems untroubled by any one-sidedness. The Court recently declined to take up a closely watched case challenging the warrantless strip search of a four-year-old preschooler. A strange-bedfellows alliance of leading scholars and advocacy groups of every ideological stripe—perhaps the most diverse amici ever assembled—had joined forces to urge the Court to fundamentally reshape immunity doctrine. Even in this hyperpartisan age, there is a growing, cross-ideological chorus of jurists and scholars urging recalibration of contemporary immunity jurisprudence. Indeed, it's curious how this entrenched, judge-created doctrine excuses constitutional violations by limiting the statute Congress passed to redress constitutional violations. Count me with Chief Justice Marshall: ‘The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.’ Doctrinal reform is arduous, often-Sisyphean work. Finding faults is easy; finding solutions, less so. But even if qualified immunity continues its forward march and avoids sweeping reconsideration, it certainly merits a refined procedural approach that more smartly—and fairly—serves its intended objectives.”)

Harmon v. Dallas County, Texas, 927 F.3d 884, 893-94 (5th Cir. 2019) (“The parties here essentially agree that Harmon alleges a violation of his First Amendment rights; indeed, Evans concedes—ultimately to his advantage, of course—that ‘the facts in Howell are identical to the speech at issue in this case.’ And Harmon alleges that it was not part of his ordinary duties as a deputy constable to report the illegal acts of his supervisors to investigators, the FBI, and other authorities. Even so, Harmon’s termination occurred just one month prior to the officer’s termination in Howell, where we held that it was not clearly established whether a law enforcement officer’s involvement in an investigation with outside law-enforcement enjoyed protection under the First Amendment. Accordingly, the same result in Howell must obtain here. . . We thus agree with the district court that Evans is entitled to qualified immunity on Harmon’s First Amendment retaliation claim.”)

Reed v. Taylor, 923 F.3d 411, 418 n.48 (5th Cir. 2019) (“A decade ago in Pearson v. Callahan, the Supreme Court altered the mechanics of qualified-immunity analysis. . . . In short, Pearson relaxed the categorical Saucier two-step inquiry that had required courts to first decide whether the law was violated before turning to whether the law was clearly established. . . . Post-Pearson, courts have case-by-case discretion to leapfrog Prong One if Prong Two is outcome-determinative. . . . In this case, as in most, we believe it is worthwhile to follow the Saucier sequence and not bypass the first inquiry. First, ejusdem generis renders the textual analysis easy. In many cases the Prong One issue is doubly challenging: legally difficult and inadequately briefed. Neither is true here. Second, as a practical matter, identifying whether this law was clearly established requires almost all the work of deciding whether a violation occurred. Examining one necessarily overlaps with the other. . . . Fourth, as the Supreme Court has itself modeled, it advances the development of the law to clarify for future cases what conduct is prescribed and proscribed. . . . Section 407(a) remains on the books, even if Texas’s noncompliance penalty does not.”)

Reed v. Taylor, 923 F.3d 411, 419-20 (5th Cir. 2019) (Elrod, J., concurring in the judgment) (“I agree with the panel majority’s ultimate conclusion. We should affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment. But we should reach that conclusion by addressing only the second prong of qualified immunity—not the first. In 2015, as the panel majority observes, Texas repealed the criminal penalty for failure to pay for GPS monitoring. Resolving whether that state law violates the Social Security Act is therefore unnecessary because the law no longer exists. The main justifications for addressing the first prong of qualified immunity are to prevent stagnation in the law's development and to keep 'government officials [from] violat[ing] ... rights with impunity.' . Neither concern is implicated here. We need not illuminate whether threatening a social security beneficiary with prosecution is legal under federal law; it is not even legal under state law anymore. And we need not prevent officials from potentially violating the rights of social security beneficiaries in this way because state law no longer allows those officials to do so. . . All that remains is whether Reed is entitled to damages. It is enough to answer that question by looking exclusively to whether the law in this area was clearly established at the time that Reed made his coerced payments. I agree with the panel majority that it was not. For that reason, I concur in the judgment.”)

Okorie v. Crawford, 921 F.3d 430, 432-40 (5th Cir. 2019) (“Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 705 (1981), allows law enforcement to detain the occupant of a residence where a criminal search warrant is being executed. Consistent with the touchstone of the Fourth Amendment, however, the scope of such detentions must be reasonable. . . We confront a question that courts have rarely had to address in the nearly four decades since Summers was decided: May the government detain the owner of a business that is being searched not because of suspected criminal activity but instead for possible civil violations? This question arises from the search of a medical clinic that resulted in the doctor being detained for three to four hours. During that time, an investigator pushed the doctor down, drew his gun multiple times, and limited the doctor’s movement and access to facilities such as the restroom. We conclude that the doctor’s allegations establish a Fourth Amendment violation based on the intrusiveness of the detention, but that the sparse caselaw in this area had not clearly established that unlawfulness. As a result, the investigator is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . This is the third case in the past year to reach our court alleging constitutional violations in connection with an administrative search of a medical office, see Barry v. Freshour, 905 F.3d 912 (5th Cir. 2018); Zadeh v. Robinson, 902 F.3d 483 (5th Cir. 2018), so addressing the constitutional issue will provide guidance for this increasingly common tactic. . . . Th[e] fundamental distinction between criminal and civil violations—that people can always be detained without a warrant if there is probable cause for violating criminal laws, . . . casts significant doubt on Summers’s application to administrative searches. . . . But we need not resolve whether detention incident to execution of an administrative warrant is allowed as a general matter, because we conclude that the intrusiveness of this one rendered it unconstitutional. . . . Balancing the relatively minor benefits to law enforcement of this detention against the serious intrusions it imposed on Okorie’s liberty, the allegations establish an unreasonable seizure. Going forward, an hours-long detention of a person during an administrative search of a medical clinic or similar establishment, during which a gun is drawn, will be unlawful absent heightened security concerns. . . . But looking backward, the law in this undeveloped area was not clear enough when Dalton detained Okorie so that ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating’ the Fourth Amendment. . . Dalton thus has a qualified immunity defense. We have previously acknowledged that the limits of Summers are not well defined. . . Not many cases in our circuit have addressed when a Summers detention becomes unreasonably intrusive. . . . Because this detention was less intrusive than the one in Heitschmidt, that case alone does not establish that the ‘violative nature of this particular conduct is clearly established.’ . The only feature that arguably makes Okorie's claim a stronger one than Heitschmidt's is that this detention was incident to an administrative seizure. As we have discussed, that at a minimum affects the balancing of Summers's interests in analyzing the intrusiveness of a detention even if it does not outright eliminate the government's right to detain without probable cause. But we have never considered the question, and only a few other courts have. The dearth of caselaw on this question might indicate the government rarely detains people while executing administrative searches, a fact that would be consistent with Okorie's view of the Fourth Amendment. The consequence, though, is that Okorie is unable to point to caselaw clearly establishing the unlawfulness of this type of detention. As a result, qualified immunity defeats Okorie's claim.") Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464, 474-77 (5th Cir. 2019), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied, 940 F.3d 900 (5th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 85 (2020) ("The district court concluded that 'a reasonable officer on the scene ... could have easily drawn the inference that the black man cycling towards five armed police officers, disregarding their orders to drop his weapon, and raising his arm in their direction was the same black man who had so brazenly fired upon them just around the corner.' The errors in the district court's analysis are myriad. First, as discussed above, the central error is the district court's failure to credit Henry's testimony, instead adopting the officers' characterization of the events preceding the shooting. This alone is reversible error. [citing Tolan] Second, the district court improperly concluded that Gabriel was 'raising his arm' towards the police. This is directly contrary to Appellants' summary judgment affidavit, which claims that 'Gabriel had both hands on the handle bar of his bike.' Further, Henry claims that 'Gabriel did not point anything towards the deputies' and 'did not move his hands in any way that might have suggested that he was reaching for something.' The district court should have viewed these statements 'in the light most favorable' to Appellants in determining whether an objectively reasonable officer would have concluded that Gabriel posed an 'immediate threat' to the safety of the officers or others. . . Third, the district court ignored facts in the record casting doubt on whether a reasonable officer would have concluded that the 'black man cycling towards [the officers] ... was the same black man who had so brazenly fired upon them' earlier. . . . A jury could conclude that a reasonable officer would not have determined that Gabriel was the dangerous suspect. . . Fourth, the district court's conclusion that Gabriel 'disregard[ed] their orders to drop his weapon,' aside from improperly concluding on summary judgment that Gabriel had a weapon, is contradicted by the video evidence, which shows the officers fired on Gabriel within a second of shouting to 'put that down!'. . It is far from clear that Gabriel had the opportunity to be deterred by the officers' warnings or to even register their commands. . . . It is for a jury to determine whether a reasonable officer on the scene, when confronted with these facts, would have determined that Gabriel posed such an imminent risk to the officers that use of deadly force was justified within seconds of his appearance. Given the district court's multifarious errors, and that we must consider the facts in the light most favorable to Appellants, we conclude that it is proper to consider only the following facts in determining whether an objectively reasonable officer would have believed that Gabriel posed an imminent threat and whether Hinds's use of force was constitutional. Hinds responded to a 911 call of a man with a gun. The suspect was a black male, afoot and wearing a brown shirt. Upon Hinds's arrival, the suspect fired a shot at Hinds and Hinojosa. Hinds then lost sight of the suspect. The officers encountered numerous civilians along the road as they searched for the suspect. The officers eventually set up a defensive barrier complete with three vehicles, five officers, four semiautomatic rifles, and a shotgun on a road in the vicinity of the suspect's last known location. Minutes later, Gabriel, on his bike and dressed in blue, not brown, appeared on the same street as the last known location of the suspect. Gabriel was riding his bicycle more than 100 yards away. Further, Gabriel did not have anything in his hands, had both hands on the handlebar of his bike, did not reach for anything, did not point anything towards the deputies, and was unarmed. Nonetheless, an officer stated that Gabriel 'had that gun,' while another screamed 'put that down!' Hinds opened fire on Gabriel within seconds of spotting him. . . While '[w]e are loath to second-guess the decisions made by police officers in the field,' . . . we conclude that a jury could find that the use of deadly force was unreasonable if it credited and drew reasonable inferences from the Winzers' account. Accordingly, Hinds was not entitled to qualified immunity under the first prong. . . . Having determined that there are genuine issues of material fact with respect to whether Hinds's use of deadly force was objectively reasonable, the question remains 'whether the right was clearly established at the time of the conduct.' . . The Supreme Court has held that we cannot 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality.' . . This inquiry ' "must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition." ' The Supreme Court does 'not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . Under this exacting standard, we cannot conclude that Gabriel's right to be free from excessive force was clearly established here. . . . Because we determine that there are genuine issues of fact as to whether there was a constitutional violation, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the county as premature and remand to the district court for reconsideration.") Winzer v. Kaufman County, 916 F.3d 464, 477, 481-82 (5th Cir. 2019) (Clement, J., dissenting in part), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied, 940 F.3d 900 (5th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 85 (2020) ("The majority has correctly concluded that Officer Hinds is entitled to qualified immunity due to the lack of clearly established law. But en route to this decision, it has taken an unnecessarily difficult path, disregarding the deference long afforded to district courts' evidentiary rulings and misapplying well-worn qualified immunity standards. In light of these significant errors, I dissent from sections III(A), III(B)(1), and IV of the opinion. . . . It should come as no surprise that all of the officers on the scene, including Officer Hinds, stated that they feared for their safety and the safety of others at that critical moment. And there was nothing unreasonable about Officer Hinds's decision to shoot. In that split second, Officer Hinds was justified in concluding that the individual riding at them while their guns were drawn was the armed suspect. He had just heard that Gabriel was holding a gun. And his own experience with the suspect, as well as his knowledge that the suspect had been shooting at his neighbors' mailboxes, justified his thought that Gabriel posed a serious threat to his own, his fellow officers', and other civilians' safety. . . Regardless of any factual dispute regarding the visibility of the gun Gabriel possessed or the color of his shirt, Officer Hinds cannot be faulted for acting out of a reasonable desire to protect himself and the neighborhood by pulling the trigger. None of the countervailing concerns noted by the majority undercuts this conclusion. Officer Hinds clearly 'ha[d] reason to believe that the suspect pose[d] a threat of serious harm to [him] or to others.’ . . . He acted on that reasonable belief. There was no constitutional violation. . . . The majority’s analysis flouts well-established legal guideposts and omits applicable burdens. Its conclusion that Officer Hinds may have behaved unreasonably is not persuasive. Fortunately, the majority at least gets the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis right. But its failure to accord appropriate deference to Officer Hinds on the first prong is not only misguided—it invites future error. And because the majority errs on the reasonableness prong, Kaufman County is also denied the summary judgment which is clearly appropriate.”)

Linicomn v. Hill, 902 F.3d 529, 535, 538-39 (5th Cir. 2018) (“The Supreme Court has held that we have discretion to address either prong of the qualified immunity analysis first. . . . Further, the Court recognized that, even where defendants are clearly entitled to qualified immunity under the second prong, undertaking the two-step procedure ‘is often beneficial ... [because it] promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’ . . . We believe this to be the case here. Accordingly, although we ultimately conclude that the officers were entitled to a judgment on the pleadings based on the second prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry, we begin our analysis with the first prong. . . . We therefore conclude that Vernon has facially pleaded sufficient facts to support a plausible claim that the officers violated his Fourth Amendment rights when they entered his house without a warrant and absent proof or showing of exigent circumstances. . . . Though we find plausible Vernon’s allegations that the officers’ warrantless entry into his house violated his Fourth Amendment right, we cannot conclude, under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, that this right was clearly established under the circumstances of this case at the time of the officers’ entry. . . . The law is clearly established when there is ‘controlling authority—or a “robust consensus of persuasive authority”—that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’ . . . An officer is entitled to qualified immunity ‘unless all reasonable officials in the defendant’s circumstances would have then known that the defendant’s conduct violated the United States Constitution.’ . . . Here, however, the officers acted in response to Linda’s 911 call asking for assistance checking on her sick and lethargic child. Because Linda’s call could reasonably be construed as evidence that her daughter was physically ill, Troop does not clearly establish that the officers’ actions were unreasonable in light of clearly established law. While Troop may be relevant to the question of whether the exigent circumstances exception applies, it is not ‘controlling authority ... that defines the contours of the right in question with a high degree of particularity.’ . . . Vernon does not cite to any controlling authority establishing that the officers’ entry into his house would have violated a clearly established right under the circumstances. Accordingly, we affirm the district court’s decision to grant the officers’ motion for judgment on the pleadings on the basis of qualified immunity.”)

Samples v. Vadzemnieks, 900 F.3d 655, 660-63 (5th Cir. 2018) (“This court lacks jurisdiction to determine ‘whether the defendant[] did, in fact, engage in [a certain course of] conduct’; it only possesses jurisdiction to examine whether that conduct ‘would, as a matter of law, be objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.’ . . . We accept the plaintiff’s version of the facts as true and review it through the lens of qualified immunity. . . . In resolving the purely legal questions, we apply a de novo standard. . . . First, the district court held that ‘[b]ased on the record, a reasonable jury could conclude that it was more likely than not that Samples’s head injury happened when he fell to the ground after being hit [] by a taser.’ As a procedural matter, we’re then barred from gainsaying this determination and must accept that there is indeed a genuine factual dispute about causation. . . . It is eminently reasonable to infer that when someone goes limp and falls backwards, a head eventually hits the ground. . . . We conclude that the evidence is sufficient for a jury to find that Vadzemnieks used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. We have repeatedly held in the past that a taser is a force that, deployed when not warranted, can result in a constitutional deprivation. . . . In short, the officers lacked reason to believe that Samples committed a crime, sought to flee, or posed a threat of danger to them. We conclude that the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied: the evidence is sufficient to show that Vadzemnieks violated Samples’s Fourth Amendment right to be free of excessive force. . . . Vadzemnieks and Samples each marshal caselaw asserting to resolve the question of clearly established law. In our view, Carroll v. Ellington provides the closest analogue. . . . In Carroll, an officer repeatedly deployed a taser on a schizophrenic man who, like Samples, spoke incomprehensibly when questioned about his identity and conduct, such that the officer believed him to be on drugs. . . . As here, the officer in Carroll knew that the suspect was unarmed and nonviolent when the officer first elected to tase him. . . . And like Samples, the suspect only weighed approximately 160 pounds. . . . In both cases, officers confronted a suspect whom they believed to be on drugs, attempted to verbally secure the suspect’s compliance, and chose to deploy a taser despite their knowledge that the suspect was unarmed. Faced with these facts, the Carroll panel decided that, as of three years ago, no clearly established law made the officer’s decision to resort to the taser unreasonable. And equally important, the Carroll panel ‘decline[d] to reach the close constitutional question of whether the officer’s actions amounted to a Fourth Amendment violation, resting its decision solely on the second prong of qualified immunity. Samples struggles to show that Vadzemnieks’s conduct violated clearly established law. But his task is made insurmountably difficult by Carroll. He points to Ramirez v. Martinez . . . and Newman v. Guedry. . . . But those cases are factually farther afield—neither of them, nor any other case he cites, presented a situation in which police officers had to decide whether to deploy a taser on an uncooperative suspect who appeared to be drug-addled or otherwise unstable. . . . Similarly, for its part, the district court relied on two traffic stop cases involving suspects who were able to communicate clearly with the officers and who could readily understand their situations. . . . The difference here is at least plausibly important: erratic, unpredictable behavior on the part of a suspect could lead officers to fear sudden or particularly severe violent outbursts, which could in turn give them license to resort to force more readily than in each of the cases cited by Samples or the district court. In light of Carroll’s express reservation of so similar a constitutional question, and in light of the Court’s repeated instruction that caselaw involving excessive force claims must be sufficiently particularized and must put the issue altogether ‘beyond debate,’ we must conclude that Vadzemnieks’s actions did not violate law that was clearly established at the time of the incident. Vadzemnieks is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Right or wrong, the very premise of qualified immunity is that not every constitutional violation suffered by plaintiffs like Samples is redressable. While recognizing an uncertainty of law that sustains the defense of qualified immunity, this opinion has bite, for it offers guidance to officers. We reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment to Vadzemnieks and render judgment for him.”)

Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632, 638-41 (5th Cir. 2018) (“[I]n overruling the short-lived regime of Saucier v. Katz, . . . which required courts to first address the underlying constitutional question, Pearson recognized it would still ‘often [be] advantageous’ to follow the two-step order. . . . Doing so is ‘beneficial’ here for reasons the Supreme Court recognized. . . . This is the fourth time in three years that an appeal has presented the question whether someone who is not a final decisionmaker can be liable for First Amendment retaliation. [citing cases] Continuing to resolve the question at the clearly established step means the law will never get established. . . . Addressing the first-step liability question is ‘especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’. . . That is the case here. First Amendment retaliation claims do not arise in criminal litigation (as, for example, a Fourth Amendment claim often would), and this issue of individual liability would not arise in other civil suits, such as those against a municipality, in which qualified immunity does not apply. Because this is a question unique to section 1983 First Amendment claims brought against individual defendants, we conclude that clarifying the liability question is important to provide guidance to public employees who may find themselves on either side of the “v” in these lawsuits that can raise important issues of whether employees who challenge corrupt governmental practices are protected in exercising First Amendment rights. In our recent decision resolving this question on ‘clearly established’ grounds, we recognized the tension in our caselaw on whether only final decisionmakers can be individually liable for First Amendment retaliation claims. . . . If an individual defendant’s animus against a coworker’s exercise of First Amendment rights is a link in the causal chain that leads to a plaintiff’s firing, the individual may be liable even if she is not the final decisionmaker. . . . In light of Jett and the consensus view of other courts of appeals that individual liability is just a matter of causation, why did uncertainty develop in our circuit on this point? Beattie v. Madison County School District, 254 F.3d 595 (5th Cir. 2001), unwittingly planted the seeds of confusion that later sprouted on this issue. . . . [T]he focus of the appeal was on the question of municipal liability, which attaches only if final decisionmakers are liable. . . . The unconstitutional motives of the principal and superintendent who recommended the termination were not attributed to the school board that made the final decision because the board did not know about the plaintiff’s First Amendment activity. . . . Not recognizing that Beattie was only confronting Monell liability, a later case involving individual defendants read Beattie for the principle that ‘only final decision-makers may be held liable for First Amendment retaliation employment discrimination under § 1983.’ Johnson v. Louisiana, 369 F.3d 826, 831 (5th Cir. 2004). In reversing a verdict against a supervisor who retaliated against a subordinate for complaining about sexual harassment, Johnson ignored Jett’s contrary and precedential position that an individual is liable for First Amendment retaliation if her unlawful conduct is a link in the causal chain that resulted in the plaintiff’s firing. Some cases have followed Johnson’s categorical view that only final decisionmakers can be liable for First Amendment retaliation. . . . Other cases following Beattie and Johnson have imposed a causation standard that is more stringent than Jett's 'but-for' standard for nonfinal decisionmakers. . . They have done so because they, like Sims, have mistakenly characterized the question as whether the nondecisionmaker can be liable under a cat's paw theory of imputed liability. That turns cat's paw liability on its head, and is another example of relying on the law of employer liability for a question of employee liability. As 'cat's paw' liability arose under Title VII in which only employers can be liable, it is not about the liability of individual employees. . . It is instead about whether the employers who are subject to Title VII liability can be held liable by imputing to those entities the unlawful motives of employees who are not final decisionmakers. . . Unlike Title VII, section 1983 applies to individuals. So the question is not whether the metaphorical paw (the City) is liable for carrying out the ill-motivated actions of the metaphorical cat (Covington); it is whether the cat itself can be liable for having unlawful motives that caused the firing. That individual liability turns on traditional tort principles of whether the particular act was a 'causal link' in the termination. . . Beattie, Johnson, and subsequent cases thus inadvertently created the uncertainty we have recognized in this area. We now provide the overdue clarification. Because it is at odds with our earlier holding in Jett, Johnson's absolute bar on First Amendment liability for those who are not final decisionmakers is not binding. Nor are the imputation principles of cat's paw liability applicable to an effort to hold a nondecisionmaker liable. Jett's 'causal link' standard sets the causation requirement for a suit against an individual defendant with retaliatory motives who does not make the final employment decision. Although today's decision clarifying that Jett controls means the law will no longer be 'unsettled' in this area, . . . it provides no recourse to Sims. That is because of the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry, which requires a plaintiff to show that any violation of rights was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. . . When Sims was terminated in July 2012 the inconsistency in our law on whether First Amendment liability can attach to a public official who did not make the final employment decision had not been resolved. Indeed, three years after that Culbertson recognized the tension in affirming a grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds in favor of a defendant who made a recommendation to fire the plaintiff but did not have the authority to make the ultimate decision. . . If judges have mixed up principles of individual and municipal liability in this area and failed to recognize Jett as the controlling decision, law enforcement officials should not be expected to have a more nuanced understanding of section 1983 law. We therefore agree with the district court's holding that Sims's claim is foreclosed by Culbertson on immunity grounds.") Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 220-22 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Bustillos argues that the Doctors and Nurses violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures by detaining her in order to conduct x-ray, pelvic, and rectal exams without reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. The district court held those allegations cannot overcome the Doctors' and Nurses' qualified immunity because the right at issue was not clearly-established. We agree and affirm on that ground. Nonetheless, we take this opportunity to clarify the constitutional duties of medical staff when they cooperate with law enforcement searches. . . .The searches conducted at the Hospital were all non-routine. The Doctors and Nurses therefore needed reasonable suspicion of drug smuggling to constitutionally justify those searches. Whether the Doctors and Nurses had reasonable suspicion turns on an issue of first impression in this circuit: Must medical staff establish their own, independent reasonable suspicion where law enforcement officers either state that sufficient suspicion exists or request the search? We conclude they do not. A medical professional has no constitutional duty to independently evaluate the Fourth Amendment determinations of law enforcement officers. Nonetheless, medical staff must, either through their own independent determination or through reliance on law enforcement officials, have sufficient suspicion to justify each search in a series of non-routine searches. Though there is no Fifth Circuit case on point, our sister courts have held that medical professionals do not violate the Constitution where they rely on law enforcement officers' Fourth Amendment determinations. . . . However, in each of these cases, the officers presented the medical professionals with either a warrant, direct request for a specific search, or other articulation of adequate suspicion. . . . A different set of facts is presented where an 'examining physician conduct[s] a [search] without a request to do so by the customs agent; and neither the physician nor the [law enforcement] agents ... ha[ve] real suspicion [the individual] [is] concealing narcotics.' . . . Accordingly, Bustillos' allegations could potentially assert a constitutional violation. The complaint is, however, ambiguous on critical factual allegations. For instance, it is unclear who Bustillos alleges actually ordered the various searches. Further, it is unclear what the CBP officers told medical staff regarding their basis for requesting the various searches. . . . Regardless, we need not determine the sufficiency of Bustillos' allegations. Even if the complaint sufficiently alleges a Constitutional violation, the violated right was not clearly established under our law at the time of the searches. . . . 'It is the plaintiff's burden to find a case in [her] favor that does not define the law at a "high level of generality."' . . . Appellant has not carried her burden of pointing this panel to any case that shows, in light of the specific context of this case, that the Doctors' or Nurses' conduct violated clearly established law. Further, our independent review has uncovered only one case, Huguez. Though we find the analysis in Huguez persuasive, and adopt it above, we are not persuaded that a single, fifty year old case from another circuit is sufficient in this instance to have 'placed the ... constitutional question [at issue] beyond debate.' . . . The district court did not err in granting the Doctors and Nurses qualified immunity.") Rayborn v. Bossier Parrish School Bd., 881 F.3d 409, 418 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Rayborn contends that the notes of her encounters with HDC, in which she detailed the 'red flags' that turned Bourgeois and Hughes against her, were subpoenaed in connection with HDC's parents' lawsuit against BPSB and that under Supreme Court precedent those notes should receive First Amendment protection. In Lane v. Franks, the Supreme Court considered testimony given by an individual pursuant to a subpoena and concluded: 'Truthful testimony under oath by a public employee outside the scope of his ordinary job duties is speech as a citizen for First Amendment purposes. That is so even when the testimony relates to his public employment or concerns information learned during that employment.' . . . It was undisputed in Lane that 'Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings.' . . . In Garcetti v. Ceballos, however, the Supreme Court held that 'when public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline.’ . . . The district court correctly concluded that all of Rayborn’s actions that she claims are protected by the First Amendment, including offering her notes in accordance with the subpoena requests, were made according to her official duties. The test is not whether she was required to engage in the speech, but rather whether she made the speech ‘pursuant to [her] “official responsibilities”’ and whether that speech is ‘ordinarily within the scope of [her] duties.’ . . . The district court observed that Rayborn’s job responsibilities were ‘maintaining complete records on all school nurse activities’ and these include ‘assessment and evaluation of individual student health and behavior patterns; conferences with teachers and parents; and routine follow-up on reported health concerns of students.’ Rayborn stresses the Supreme Court’s caution about over-reliance on written job descriptions, . . . but she fails to create any genuine issue of material fact as to whether this speech was made pursuant to her official duties as school nurse. Rayborn has not shown that Hughes and Bourgeois violated her first amendment right as an employee ‘to speak as a citizen addressing matters of public concern.’ . . . Thus, Hughes and Bourgeois’s qualified immunity defense prevails, and Rayborn’s § 1983 claim against them fails.”)

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 685-90 (5th Cir. 2017) (“The district court’s analysis rested on the second, ‘clearly established,’ prong, so we begin there. . . . At the time in question, neither the Supreme Court nor this court had determined whether First Amendment protection extends to the recording or filming of police. . . . Although Turner insists, as some district courts in this circuit have concluded, that First Amendment protection extends to the video recording of police activity in light of general First Amendment principles, . . . the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly’ instructed courts ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality’: ‘The general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . Thus, Turner’s reliance on decisions that ‘clarified that [First Amendment] protections ... extend[] to gathering information’ does not demonstrate whether the specific act at issue here—video recording the police or a police station—was clearly established. . . . The district court stated that circuit courts ‘are split as to whether or not there is a clearly established First Amendment right to record the public activities of police.’ The circuit courts are not split, however, on whether the right exists. The First and Eleventh Circuits have held that the First Amendment protects the rights of individuals to videotape police officers performing their duties. . . . In American Civil Liberties Union v. Alvarez, the Seventh Circuit explained that the First Amendment protects the audio recording of the police and concluded that an Illinois wiretapping statute, which criminalized the audio recording of police officers, merited heightened First Amendment scrutiny because of its burdens on First Amendment rights. . . . No circuit has held that the First Amendment protection does not extend to the video recording of police activity, although several circuit courts have explained that the law in their respective circuits is not clearly established while refraining from determining whether there is a First Amendment right to record the police. . . . We cannot say, however, that ‘existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate’ when Turner recorded the police station. . . . Neither does it seem that the law ‘so clearly and unambiguously prohibited [the officers’] conduct that “every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates [the law].” . . . In light of the absence of controlling authority and the dearth of even persuasive authority, there was no clearly established First Amendment right to record the police at the time of Turner’s activities. All three officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Turner’s First Amendment claim. . . . Although the right was not clearly established at the time of Turner’s activities, whether such a right exists and is protected by the First Amendment presents a separate and distinct question. . . . Because the issue continues to arise in the qualified immunity context, . . . we now proceed to determine it for the future. We conclude that First Amendment principles, controlling authority, and persuasive precedent demonstrate that a First Amendment right to record the police does exist, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . . We agree with every circuit that has ruled on this question: Each has concluded that the First Amendment protects the right to record the police. . . . This right, however, ‘is not without limitations.’ . . . Like all speech, . . . filming the police ‘may be subject to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions.’ . . . In this case, however, we need not decide which specific time, place, and manner restrictions would be reasonable. . . . Nonetheless, we note that when police departments or officers adopt time, place, and manner restrictions, those restrictions must be ‘narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest.’ . . . That said, to be constitutionally permissible, a time, place, and manner restriction ‘need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of serving the government’s interests.’”)

Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 696-97 (5th Cir. 2017) (Clement, J., dissenting as to Parts III.A.2 & III.B.1.b) (“I respectfully dissent from the majority’s dicta purporting to clearly establish a First Amendment right to film the police and from the majority’s reversal of the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to Officers Grinalds and Dyess regarding Turner’s unlawful arrest claim. . . . The majority does not determine that the officers here violated Turner’s First Amendment rights—perhaps because it would be reasonable for security reasons to restrict individuals from filming police officers entering and leaving a police station. Because the majority does not hold that the officers actually violated the First Amendment, ‘an officer acting under similar circumstances’ in the future will not have violated any clearly established law.”)

Griggs v. Brewer, 841 F.3d 308, 315-16 (5th Cir. 2016) (“In assessing Brewer’s conduct under the defense of qualified immunity, we need not determine whether an actual constitutional violation occurred. The question for us is whether Brewer’s conduct was unreasonable in the light of clearly established law. In this instance, Griggs points to no authority establishing that it was unreasonable for an officer to use non-deadly punches to gain control of the arms of a drunken, actively resisting suspect. Griggs actively resisted and refused to comply with the officers’ clear and audible commands. Although the officers might have used less forceful conduct, there was no settled authority to put Brewer on notice that his use of force in such circumstances violated Griggs’s constitutional rights. . . . Although the parties have different ‘spins’ on the facts, the pertinent objective facts, demonstrated by testimony and the video, are undisputed. In the light of this evidence, we conclude that no material fact issue exists and that none of Officer Brewer’s conduct in effecting Griggs’s arrest was objectively unreasonable in the light of clearly established law.”)

Zimmerman v. Cutler, 657 F. App'x 340 (5th Cir. 2016) (“Like the officers in McKenney and Cockrell, Harris used a single Taser shot to stop a fleeing person reasonably suspected of a misdemeanor. Although the crimes Zimmerman was suspected of committing were relatively minor, ‘Fourth Amendment jurisprudence has long recognized that the right to make an arrest or investigatory stop necessarily carries with it the right to use some degree of physical coercion or threat thereof to effect it.’ . . . We conclude that at the time of Zimmerman’s arrest it was not clearly established (so as to give Harris notice) that a single shot or use of a Taser to halt a fleeing misdemeanor suspect would amount to excessive force.”)

Howell v. Town of Ball, 827 F.3d 515, 520, 523-26 (5th Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 815 (2017) (“Although we hold that Howell asserts a violation of his right of free speech, we further hold that the right at issue was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of his discharge. . . . Howell contends here that the defendants violated his First Amendment rights by firing him for cooperating with the FBI investigation into the FEMA fraud. Howell emphasizes that, under the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Lane, the relevant question is whether the speech at issue is ordinarily within the scope of an employee’s duties. . . . According to Howell, his ordinary professional obligations as a police officer for the town of Ball did not include secretly providing information to an outside law enforcement agency regarding crimes committed by coworkers and other municipal employees, or secretly participating in an external agency’s investigation into municipal corruption. Howell has offered evidence that his involvement in the FBI investigation was outside the ordinary scope his professional duties. Under Garcetti and Lane, the ‘proper inquiry is a practical one,’ and focuses solely on whether the speech at issue is ordinarily within the scope of the employee’s professional duties. . . . Howell’s statements to the FBI were made outside the normal chain of command and without the knowledge or permission of anyone else in the police department. . . . [W]e decline to infer solely from a Louisiana law enforcement officer’s non-specific duty to ‘detect and prevent crime’ that Howell, as a local police officer, had an ordinary duty to participate secretly in an FBI investigation of coworkers’ and superiors’ illegal conduct. In sum, Howell asserts that it was never part of his normal job duties, secretly and without departmental authorization, to aid in an FBI investigation of coworkers and superiors, much less to record surreptitiously coworkers’ conversations at the FBI’s request. The defendants offer no evidence to the contrary, other than the all-encompassing, judicially established general description of a police officer’s professional responsibilities in the state of Louisiana, which, as we have stated, cannot be considered dispositive. Accordingly, the district court erred in finding that Howell’s involvement in the FBI investigation was in furtherance of his ordinary job duties, and thus was not entitled to First Amendment protection. . . . But we must move further down the road to consider whether the district court’s Garcetti error ultimately affects Howell’s claims. . . . At the time that Howell was fired, Garcetti’s distinction between speech made pursuant to official duties and speech made as a private citizen was relatively new, and this court had not considered it in the context of an action involving a police officer’s statements to an outside law enforcement agency, or in the context of a law enforcement officer’s assistance with an outside agency’s investigation. Garcetti, by its own admission, did not ‘articulate a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee’s duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.’ . . .

Furthermore, the Supreme Court did not emphasize that only speech made in furtherance of an employee's 'ordinary' job duties is not protected until nearly three years after Howell was discharged. See Lane, 134 S. Ct. at 2369; see also Gibson, 773 F.3d at 668 (acknowledging that, although Lane's insertion of the qualifier "ordinary" did not meaningfully alter Garcetti's original test, it does provide additional guidance regarding what speech falls within an employee's official duties); Mpoy v. Rhee, 758 F.3d 285, 295 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ("In particular, the use of the adjective 'ordinary'—which the [C]ourt repeated nine times—could signal a narrowing of the realm of employee speech left unprotected by Garcetti."). The lack of the application of Garcetti to similar facts at the time of Howell's discharge, coupled with the Supreme Court's only recent clarification of Garcetti's citizen/employee distinction in Lane, compels us to hold that the Board defendants did not violate a 'clearly established' constitutional right when voting to fire Howell. . . We thus affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the Board defendants.")

Jackson v. Ladner, 626 F. App'x 80, 87-89 (5th Cir. 2015) ("At the time Hill requested and obtained access to M.J.'s Facebook messages—in September 2007—no precedent had held that the Fourth Amendment proscribed Hill's actions, viz., the search of a student's electronic communications pertaining to school activities based on a reasonable belief that those communications directed threats and offensive language to another student about school activities and where those communications were a continuation of a quarrel that began during a school-related activity. To the contrary, as explained above, the Supreme Court's 1985 decision in T.L.O. held that a public school official ordinarily may search a student (and in the circumstances of that case, the student's purse) if, at the inception of the search, the official has a reasonable suspicion 'that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school.' . . The Court qualified that rule by stating that '[s]uch a search will be permissible in its scope when the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.' . . It was not until 2009 that the Court clearly established that the Fourth Amendment prohibited the strip search of a 13-year-old female student upon reasonable suspicion that she had brought forbidden prescription and over-the-counter medications to school. . . However, in light of the uncertainty about the scope of schools' authority to conduct strip searches pursuant to T.L.O., the Court in Redding granted qualified immunity to the school officials notwithstanding the fact that the strip search in that case violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Similar reasoning compels the grant of qualified immunity here. . . Accordingly, while we express no opinion regarding whether the individual defendants' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment, we conclude that the defendants are nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity with respect to M.J.'s constitutional privacy claim because the right asserted by plaintiffs was not 'clearly established' as of September 2007 in light of the particular facts of this case. . . [W]hile these general First Amendment principles were firmly established in 2007, this is not dispositive of our inquiry into whether M.J.'s First Amendment rights were 'clearly established' at the time of defendants' conduct given the unique facts of this case. . . Rather, consistent with our preceding Fourth Amendment analysis, we also must determine whether or not it 'would be clear' to a reasonable school official in the defendants' position that punishing M.J. for the content of her Facebook messages would violate the First Amendment given the particular circumstances here. . . . [W]hile the speech at issue in Porter occurred entirely outside the school environment, . . . the off-campus speech at issue here arose during and in the course of school-related activities and was a continuation of a quarrel that began on the bus ride home from a school-related event. Moreover, unlike in Porter, the undisputed summary-judgment evidence shows that M.J. was not suspended from school on the basis of her speech but rather suspended from her participation on the cheer squad. Our careful review of relevant case law has uncovered no intervening precedent between Porter and the underlying events here that would provide ‘every reasonable [school] official’ with sufficient notice that the defendants’ actions violated the First Amendment. . . . Thus, while we express no opinion as to whether the defendants’ conduct conflicted with the First Amendment, we nevertheless conclude that the district court erred in denying the defendants qualified immunity on M.J.’s free-speech claim given the unique factual circumstances of this case.”)

Carroll v. Ellington, 800 F.3d 154, 172-73 (5th Cir. 2015) (“The Supreme Court recently held that, as of 2013, ‘federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect.’ Stanton v. Sims, 134 S.Ct. 3, 5 (2013) (per curiam). The Court held that an officer who entered a home in 2008 in hot pursuit of a suspected misdemeanor was therefore entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the officer’s conduct. . . . The Court specifically noted that ‘[i]t is especially troubling that the Ninth Circuit would conclude that Stanton was plainly incompetent—and subject to personal liability for damages—based on actions that were lawful according to courts in the jurisdiction where he acted,’ referring to state courts in California. . . . Here, like the California courts mentioned in Stanton, Texas courts have upheld warrantless entries in hot pursuit of persons suspected of committing the misdemeanor offense of evading detention or arrest. . . . The Carrolls do not point to authority that the law on hot pursuit of misdemeanor suspects was any clearer in 2006, when Viruette entered the residence, than in 2008, when the Supreme Court ruled the law was not then clearly established. . . . Therefore, the Carrolls have not met their burden, . . . and Viruette is entitled to qualified immunity—though we express no view on whether Viruette’s entry into Barnes’s home was constitutional.”)

Carroll v. Ellington, 800 F.3d 154, 174-77 (5th Cir. 2015) (“[T]he initial application of the Taser to the seated and unarmed Barnes on suspicion of vandalism and trespass presents a difficult question whether a reasonable jury could find this first use of force to be clearly and objectively excessive. We decline to reach the close constitutional question and instead decide the case on the second prong of qualified immunity. . . . The issue, then, is whether an officer’s application of a Taser to an unarmed, seated suspect who fails to comply with an order to get on the ground is ‘objectively unreasonable in light of clearly established law.’ . . . We conclude that it is not. Testimony at trial and case law establish that officers are trained to use nonlethal force to gain compliance if a subject actively resists arrest and does not comply with verbal task directions to get on the ground. . . . Whether a Taser could be used to gain compliance in this circumstance was not clearly established in 2006. The en banc Ninth Circuit confronted a similar situation in Mattos

v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir.2011). . . .The court held that the use of force was excessive, but concluded that, as of 2004, the law was not clearly established and granted qualified immunity. . . . Similarly, the Sixth Circuit held that ‘it was [not] clearly established in May 2007 that using a taser repeatedly on a suspect actively resisting arrest and refusing to be handcuffed amounted to excessive force.’ Hagans v. Franklin Cnty. Sheriff’s Office, 695 F.3d 505, 509 (6th Cir.2012). We agree with the Ninth Circuit’s and the Sixth Circuit’s conclusion that, as of October 2006, the law was not clearly established that using a Taser to gain compliance of a unarmed, seated suspect for resisting arrest and failing to follow verbal commands was clearly excessive and objectively unreasonable. . . .The Carrolls point to no case clarifying the law between 2005 (when the Ninth Circuit found the law to be unclear) and the tasing in this case in October 2006. . . and we are aware of none. Therefore, we conclude that Deputy Viruette is entitled to qualified immunity on the Carrolls’ excessive-force claim. . . .The law was clearly established at the time of the deputies’ conduct that, once a suspect has been handcuffed and subdued, and is no longer resisting, an officer’s subsequent use of force is excessive. . . Thus, the deputies are not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law for injuries Barnes sustained after he was handcuffed and restrained and after he stopped resisting arrest.”)

De La Paz v. Coy, 786 F.3d 367, 369, 371-72, 375, 377-78, 380 (5th Cir. 2015), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied by De La Paz v. Coy, 804 F.3d 1200 (5th Cir. 2015) (“On appeal, both cases present the same fundamental question: can illegal aliens pursue Bivens claims against CBP agents for illegally stopping and arresting them? This question has not been squarely faced in our circuit, although two other circuits have held in the negative. Mirmehdi v. United States, 689 F.3d 975 (9th Cir.2011) (no Bivens claim for constitutionally invalid immigration detention); Arar v. Ashcroft, 585 F.3d 559 (2d Cir.2009) (en banc) (no Bivens claim regarding extraordinary rendition of alien). Like those courts, we conclude that Bivens actions are not available for claims that can be addressed in civil immigration removal proceedings. Accordingly, we REVERSE and REMAND with instructions to dismiss both actions against the individual officers. . . . Our jurisdiction over qualified immunity appeals extends to ‘elements of the asserted cause of action’ that are ‘directly implicated by the defense of qualified immunity [.]’ including whether to recognize new Bivens claims. . . On appeal from a motion to dismiss, this court accepts all well-pleaded facts as true and views them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . When this court reviews a denial of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, it does not assess the district court’s factual findings, but decides whether those facts are material and whether, based on the undisputed material facts, the agents have qualified immunity. . . . On appeal, the agents present two issues. First, they argue that the INA and special factors bar Bivens claims in the immigration context. Alternatively, the agents assert qualified immunity, not for the traffic stops (at this stage), but only for the aliens’ arrests and detentions. Because we hold that aliens involved in civil immigration enforcement actions cannot sue the arresting agents for simply stopping and detaining them, we need not decide whether the agents have qualified immunity. . . .The Supreme Court’s later cases have disavowed that a Bivens suit is ‘an automatic entitlement;’ in fact, it is disfavored. . . . The Court has not created a new Bivens remedy in the last thirty-five years, although ‘it has reversed more than a dozen appellate decisions that had created new actions for damages.’. . .We conclude that there is both an alternative process for protecting the Fourth Amendment rights of illegal aliens subjected to unconstitutional traffic stops and arrests, and special factors require denying a Bivens remedy for their claims arising out of civil immigration enforcement proceedings. . . .The absence of monetary damages in the alternative remedial scheme is not ipso facto a basis for a Bivens claim. . . .Once the legislature has chosen a remedial scheme, federal courts are not free to supplement it. Here, the implicit but emphatic message from Congress requires this court to abstain from subjecting immigration officers to Bivens liability for civil immigration detention and removal proceedings. . . . It is an easy exercise for aliens, even without an attorney, to file suit alleging, as in these cases, that there was no reasonable suspicion for their stops, arrests or detentions. Extending Bivens actions to millions of illegal aliens could cripple immigration enforcement with the distraction, cost, and delay of lawsuits, even as it exposed enforcement officers to personal liability simply for doing their job. In the final tally, the costs of judicially creating a new Bivens remedy significantly outweigh any largely conjectural benefits. On the second prong of the Bivens analysis, this is not a hard case. Were we a common law court empowered to craft a remedy for the alleged illegal traffic stops and arrests here (which we are not as a result of the analysis on the first Bivens prong), we would desist for all the reasons recited above.”)

Rice v. ReliaStar Life Ins. Co., 770 F.3d 1122, 1131-33 (5th Cir. 2014) (“This is not the first time we have encountered a tragic factual scenario like the one present here: a police officer, in an attempt to aid a potentially suicidal individual, entered without a warrant and killed the person the officer was trying to help. . . . In these cases, we have resolved the case on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident, the law was not clearly established that it was unreasonable for an officer to enter without a warrant to address the threat an individual posed to himself. . . . Having only held that the law was not clearly established, our Court has not yet resolved the constitutional question these cases present: whether the exigent circumstances exception to the warrant requirement may allow for a warrantless entry based on the threat an individual poses to himself. Today we reach that issue and hold that the threat an individual poses to himself may create an exigency that makes the needs of law enforcement so compelling that a warrantless entry is objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Our decision is consistent with the decisions of our sister circuits. [collecting cases] Turning to the facts of this case, we hold that Arnold did not violate Rice’s Fourth Amendment rights when he entered Rice’s home without a warrant because he had an objectively reasonable belief that Rice would imminently seriously injure himself. After Craig’s 911 call, Arnold knew the following: Rice was suicidal; Rice had a gun; and Rice had been drinking and was sitting in his truck holding a gun to his head. Based on these facts, it was objectively reasonable for Arnold to believe he needed to protect Rice from imminent injury. . . . Finally, the fact that Arnold’s entry into Rice’s home may have violated departmental policies does not deprive him of qualified immunity. Admittedly, the fact that Arnold allegedly failed to follow departmental policy makes his actions more questionable, because it is questionable whether it is objectively reasonable to violate such a departmental rule. . . . Violating a departmental regulation, on its own, is not sufficient to deprive Arnold of qualified immunity. .

. . Thus, we hold the district court did not err in granting Arnold’s motion for summary judgment on the warrantless entry claim because Arnold is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Velasquez v. Audirsch, 574 F.3d 476, 480-83 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2014) (“The district court’s analysis was arguably correct in evaluating the merits of the Velasquezes’ underlying constitutional claim We express no opinion on the first step, whether the plaintiff has shown a violation of a constitutional right. . . . [H]owever, this analysis misconstrues qualified immunity doctrine. As discussed above, the ultimate question is not whether the Officers’ actions were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment; the question is whether the law at the time of the Officers’ entry into the Velasquezes’ home clearly established that their actions were unreasonable. The Supreme Court’s decision in Ryburn v. Huff, 132 S.Ct. 987 (2012) (per curiam) leads us to the inescapable conclusion that the law was not clearly established in the circumstances here. . . . Applying the Court’s guidance from Ryburn to the facts here, the law at the time of the Officers’ entry into the Velasquezes’ home did not clearly establish that the officers were unreasonable in believing the threat Efrain posed to himself or others constituted exigent circumstances. . . . The Velasquezes do not direct this Court to precedent clearly establishing the Officers’ conduct here was unlawful, and we are aware of none. The Velasquezes do not respond to Ryburn or even cite it. Thus, accepting the Velasquezes’ version of all disputed facts, ‘reasonable police officers in [the Officers’] position could have come to the conclusion that the Fourth Amendment permitted them to enter the [house based on the] objectively reasonable basis for fearing that violence was imminent.’ . . Therefore, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Doe v. Robertson, 751 F.3d 383, 388-92 & n.14 (5th Cir. 2014) (“We conclude that the Complaint contains well-pleaded factual allegations that Robertson and Rosado had actual knowledge both of the Service Agreement violations and of the violated provision’s objective of preventing sexual assault. . . . Stated simply, the Complaint alleged that Robertson and Rosado were aware both of violations of the Service Agreement provision requiring at least one transport officer to be the same gender as that of transported detainees, and of the provision’s assault-preventing rationale. . . . Plaintiffs did allege that Robertson and Rosado had actual, subjective knowledge of the Service Agreement violations. . . And as already explained, this allegation is not a mere ‘naked assertio [n]’; it is supported—though not proven—by the additional factual allegations recounted above. . . . We accordingly conclude that Plaintiffs properly alleged that Robertson and Rosado had actual knowledge both of the violations of the Service Agreement provision and of that provision’s assault-preventing objective. . . . Accepting the truth of the facts as alleged, we next consider whether these facts are sufficient to nudge the Bivens claim across the ‘plausibility’ threshold. . . That is, we must decide whether Robertson and Rosado’s knowledge of violations of the Service Agreement provision prohibiting a lone male officer from transporting female detainees, where they also knew the provision aimed to prevent sexual assault, . . . make plausible Plaintiffs’ claim that Robertson and Rosado were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm, in violation of ‘clearly established’ law. . . Even presuming the truth of their factual allegations, we conclude that Plaintiffs’ claim is not plausible because no clearly established law provides that violations of contractual terms that aim to prevent sexual assault are ‘facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists.’ . . . Here, even if Robertson and Rosado knew of the Service Agreement violations, no clearly established law demonstrates that these contractual violations are sufficiently proximate to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Although Robertson and Rosado were allegedly aware of ICE’s past struggles with sexual assault in general, the Complaint fails to allege any ‘longstanding, pervasive, well-documented, or expressly noted’ risk of assaults either at Hutto or during detainee transports. . . . Here, we simply cannot equate knowledge of the Service Agreement violations with the violation of a ‘clearly established’ constitutional right. . . . Accepting the truth of Plaintiffs’ factual allegations, we hold that no clearly established law provides that an official’s knowledge of contractual breaches and of the breached provision’s aim to prevent sexual assault of detainees, standing alone, amounts to deliberate indifference in violation of a detainee’s Fifth Amendment rights, because no controlling authority provides that such breaches are ‘facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists.’ . . . Accordingly, because the Complaint did not plausibly allege the violation of a ‘clearly established’ constitutional right, Robertson and Rosado are entitled to qualified immunity . . . and the district court erred in denying their motion to dismiss. . . . We hold only that it is not clearly established that Farmer extends to the facts alleged here, and do not decide whether this case presents any constitutional violation.”)

Stauffer v. Gearhart, 741 F.3d 574, 584, 586, 587 (5th Cir. 2014) (“We need not decide whether Stauffer’s rights were actually violated, because even if they were, Stauffer has not proven that those rights were clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. . . . Even assuming the applicability of Mann and Green, Stauffer has not shown that the contours of his right to receive the magazines was ‘sufficiently clear’ that every ‘reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . In sum, Stauffer did not have a clearly established right to receive the magazines at the time that they were confiscated. He has not pointed to any case law indicating that Defendants should have reasonably known that he had a right to the magazines. His claim for damages therefore fails.”)

Whitley v. Hanna, 726 F.3d 631, 649, 653-55 (5th Cir. 2013) (Elrod, J., concurring only in the judgment) (“I write separately to address Whitley’s § 1983 deliberate-indifference claim against Ranger Hanna. Taking Whitley’s allegations as true, Hanna made a conscious decision to allow a fifty-five-year-old law enforcement official to engage in predictable, preventable, and yet repeated sexual assaults on a fifteen-year-old participant in a law-enforcement-learning program. Thus, at this early stage of the case, I would hold that Whitley states a plausible § 1983 claim. I concur in the judgment, however, because Whitley cannot overcome Hanna’s assertion of qualified immunity. . . . The implicit message in the majority opinion’s deliberate-indifference analysis is that an officer can escape § 1983 liability for a conscious endangerment of a victim’s constitutional rights, provided that he acted with good intentions. . . . No matter how well-intended, investigatory and prosecutorial strategies must yield to the inviolable constitutional rights of those involved (typically the defendant, but here the victim). . . . In short, while Hanna may have preferred perfect proof of Ariaz’s sexual abuse, video or eyewitness evidence was by no means a mandatory prerequisite to Whitley’s rescue. I would hold at this preliminary stage that Hanna’s alleged deliberate choice to prioritize Ariaz’s eventual prosecution over Whitley’s immediate safety plausibly constitutes deliberate indifference to a known risk of constitutional violations. . . . I would hold that Hanna lacked fair notice that his conduct would amount to a constitutional violation. . . . Although there is no debate that a child has an inviolable right to bodily integrity, . . . our case law regarding an individual’s obligation to intervene in incidents of child sexual abuse arises almost exclusively in the context of school officials. . . . The other analogous body of law arises in bystander-liability cases, in which we require both actual presence at and acquiescence in the underlying constitutional violation. . . . There simply is not enough controlling or persuasive authority to conclude that every reasonable official in Hanna’s position would understand that what he was doing violated the law. For that reason, Hanna is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . This case is about a state actor’s knowing, deliberate choice not to intervene despite a substantial risk of continued statutory rape by a public official, in hopes of obtaining direct evidence for a conviction. While the underlying law-enforcement goal may be laudable, it must bend where a constitutional right is in play. Therefore, I would hold that Whitley states a plausible deliberate-indifference claim under § 1983. Nevertheless, I concur in the judgment because Hanna is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Carty v. Rodriguez, No. 11–40253, 2012 WL 851622, at *2-*4 (5th Cir. Mar. 14, 2012) (not reported) (“Recent decisions suggest that the Supreme Court continues in its retreat from the old Saucier two-step analysis. In Camreta v. Greene, . . . using stronger language than before, the Court clarified that lower courts ‘should address only the immunity question’ in the circumstances outlined in Pearson. The Camreta Court further cautioned that lower courts should ‘think hard, and then think hard again’ before unnecessarily deciding the merits of a constitutional issue, and thus risk ‘turning small cases into large ones.’. . . Then, only days later, in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, . . . the Court cautioned that we should ‘think carefully before expending “scarce judicial resources” to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will “have no effect on the outcome of the case.”’. . . On appeal, Defendants contend that Plaintiff failed to show (1) a violation of a constitutional right and (2) that the alleged constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the incident. We address the second question first. . . . The district court found that a constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the Defendants’ alleged misconduct, generally relying on a clearly established constitutional right to bodily integrity and life recognized in cases involving the sexual abuse of children. To support her position that Defendants’ deliberately indifferent conduct caused Carty’s death and thus violated his substantive due process right to bodily integrity and life, Plaintiff relies principally on Fifth Circuit decisions recognizing a student’s right to be free from physical abuse by school employees. . . . The court has grounded this right in the student’s substantive due process right to bodily integrity. . . . Under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it cannot be said that this line of authority provides clearly established law for Plaintiff’s position. These cases are not ‘sufficiently similar’ to the facts here [My note: plaintiff’s husband died as result of injury sustained during training exercise at academy for state police] to have given the Defendants ‘fair warning’ that their conduct violated constitutional rights. . . . That these cases typically involved sexual abuse, and an adult intentionally taking advantage of a child under his or her care, sufficiently demonstrates their inadequacy for giving ‘reasonable warning’ to the Defendants in this case. . . Plaintiff fails to persuade us that Defendants violated a clearly established right.”)

Sama v. Hannigan, 669 F.3d 585, 592, 594, 595 (5th Cir. 2012) (“Exercising our discretion under Pearson v. Callahan, we may analyze and resolve this issue under the ‘clearly established’ prong of the qualified immunity test. Because Sama did not meet her burden of demonstrating Benoit’s and Hannigan’s conduct was not objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, the district court did not err in dismissing the case. Raising a fact issue as to whether she consented to removal of her ovary did not suffice to meet her burden regarding clearly established law. . . .In light of all of these circumstances, we cannot say that the law is, or was at the time of the defendants’ conduct, clearly established such that a reasonable official in Benoit’s and Hannigan’s position would understand that their conduct violated Sama’s Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. Sama had the burden to negate qualified immunity. Accepting her assertions as true, and considering the other undisputed facts in the record before us, Sama has not cited, and we have not located, a Supreme Court or circuit court decision holding that a violation occurred under similar circumstances, in which an inmate had consented to at least part of the treatment provided, the additional treatment was deemed medically necessary as well as necessary to complete the consented-to procedure that was underway, and the attending physicians determined that it would be potentially life-threatening to end the surgery without removing the ovary and completing the radical hysterectomy. The few circuit and district court cases involving somewhat similar factual situations provide support for the position that an inmate’s liberty interest in such circumstances is outweighed by the state’s interests and that a reasonable person in the defendants’ position could not have believed his actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We are not presented with a proceeding in which Sama is seeking to prevent the State from going forward with treatment against her will. We are looking in hindsight at physicians’ actions to determine if the law was so clearly established in this area that it ‘compel[s] ... the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what [the] defendant [was] doing violate[d] federal law in the circumstances.’ This is a question of law and one which this court routinely answers in qualified immunity cases, even if the district court did not reach it. It was Sama’s burden to negate the applicability of qualified immunity. She did not satisfy that burden. . . .In sum, the law governing Fourteenth Amendment claims involving unwanted medical treatment in the prison context is far from certain. Given the dearth of case law and the existence of at least some case law supporting the position that Hannigan’s and Benoit’s conduct was not contrary to clearly established law, Sama has failed to rebut the defendants’ entitlement to qualified immunity on her Fourteenth Amendment claim, and summary judgment was appropriate.” footnotes omitted)

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 371, 382-90 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Benevides, J., holding for majority that “the principals are entitled to qualified immunity because clearly established law did not put the constitutionality of their actions beyond debate. . . . The principals are entitled to immunity because the general state of the law in this area is abstruse, complicated, and subject to great debate among jurists. At the time of the incidents in question, neither a single ‘controlling authority’ nor a ‘robust consensus of persuasive authority’ had held that the First Amendment prohibits school principals from restricting the distribution of written religious materials in public elementary schools. Nor had a single federal court of appeals definitively held that Tinker-based speech rights inhere in public elementary schools, let alone defined the scope of those rights with a high degree of particularity. The generalized prohibition against viewpoint discrimination is far too abstract to clearly establish the law in this case, and the circuits are divided over its application in public elementary schools. The speech rights asserted in this case cannot be said to be ‘clearly established’ when balanced against competing Establishment Clause concerns that inhere in public elementary schools. . . . The defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity because existing precedent failed to place the constitutionality of their conduct ‘beyond debate.’ Like other educators to have contended with religious speech in public schools, Swanson and Bomchill had to make on-the-ground decisions balancing constitutional imperatives from three areas of First Amendment jurisprudence: the Supreme Court’s school-speech precedents, the general prohibition on viewpoint discrimination, and the murky waters of the Establishment Clause. The law tasked them with maintaining the most delicate of constitutional balances: between students’ free-speech rights and the Establishment Clause imperative to avoid endorsing religion. But it failed to provide any real, specific guidance on how to do so. Moreover, almost all of the federal courts of appeals to have considered speech restrictions in this area have found no constitutional violation in the first instance, including one case with facts nearly identical to those now before us. And no federal court of appeals has ever denied qualified immunity to an educator in this area. We decline the plaintiffs’ request to become the first.” [footnotes omitted])

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 396, 401-09 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Elrod, J., holding for the majority on prong one of the qualified immunity analysis that “this right—to engage in private, non-disruptive, student speech—is protected from viewpoint discrimination under the First Amendment, and that the right extends to elementary-school students. . . . Under Pearson v. Callahan, courts have discretion to decide which of the two prongs of qualified immunity to tackle first. . . . Although courts should ‘think hard’ before exercising this discretion, ‘it remains true that following the two-step sequence—defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity—is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.’. . . Here, the students argue that the principals violated their First Amendment rights by discriminating against their speech because of its religious viewpoint. Based on the facts alleged, we agree. . . . In short, whatever latitude school officials may have with respect to school-sponsored speech under Hazelwood, or with government-endorsed speech under the Establishment Clause—that is, speech that could be erroneously attributed to the school—outside of that narrow context, viewpoint discrimination against private, student-to-student, non-disruptive speech is forbidden by the First Amendment.”)

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 413, 414 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Eldrod, J., concluding for minority that “the principals had fair, unmistakable warning that private, non-disruptive student speech is protected from viewpoint discrimination, and that any attempts to censor student speech should be undertaken only on the firmest of grounds. Even if the Supreme Court’s unbroken line of decisions were somehow not enough to give school districts fair warning that the First Amendment prohibits viewpoint discrimination against non-disruptive, private student speech, moreover, the Department of Education (DOE) has made clear to schools that viewpoint discrimination against religious speech in schools is prohibited. In sum, the Supreme Court, the Fifth Circuit, and the United States government all provided fair warning to the principals that elementary school students have a right to be free from viewpoint discrimination. That school officials nonetheless discriminated based on viewpoint under the facts alleged is not a failure of our precedent or that of the Supreme Court, but rather of the officials themselves.”)

Kovacic v. Villarreal, 628 F.3d 209, 213-15 (5th Cir. 2010) (“In light of the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan, we are permitted to consider the question of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity without determining whether or not the plaintiff’s constitutional rights were violated. . . . The plaintiffs argue that a ‘special relationship’ existed between Kovacic and the defendant officers because he had been in their custody at one point in time and thus the officers should be liable for the private violence perpetrated against him by the hit-and-run driver. Plaintiffs have not referenced a single case in either the district courts or the court of appeals of this circuit in which state actors were held liable for private harm caused to an individual after he was released from custody. . . . As stated above, once a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs in this case have not presented any evidence to contradict Rubio’s and Villarreal’s affidavits that Kovacic demanded to be let out of the squad car in the Speedy Stop parking lot and thus was released from their custody at his request. There is also no evidence in the record that shows that the officers had any reason to think that Kovacic likely would not call his wife to pick him up as he indicated, or that the officers were aware that Kovacic was lacking the resources to secure another way home. . . . A number of courts have interpreted DeShaney to allow a second exception to the rule against state liability for violence committed by private actors in situations where ‘the state actor played an affirmative role in creating or exacerbating a dangerous situation that led to the individual’s injury.’. . . The Fifth Circuit has not adopted the ‘state-created danger’ theory of liability. . . . Given the lack of any contrary precedent, we hold that reasonable, competent officers would not conclude that it would violate Kovacic’s constitutional rights to honor his request that he be let out at the Speedy Stop. No such constitutional law was then, or is now, clearly established. The defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court’s denial of their motion for summary judgment is reversed.”)

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App’x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *4 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) (“Federal courts now have the discretion to sidestep the preliminary inquiry-whether plaintiff has sufficiently alleged the violation of a constitutional right-and proceed directly to consider the right’s clarity. . . . In the context of the Eighth Amendment issue presented here, the order is of less importance because the obligation of prison officials to protect prisoners from violence at the hand of other inmates is clear. . . . Thus, we will proceed directly to consider whether Morgan has alleged a substantial risk of serious harm of which Hubert was deliberately indifferent. If he has, then he has alleged the violation of a clear constitutional right.”) [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App’x

321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.)

Pasco ex rel. Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 579 (5th Cir. 2009) (“Until recently, we resolved government officials’ qualified immunity claims under the strict two-part test mandated by the Supreme Court in Saucier v. Katz, deciding (1) whether facts alleged or shown by plaintiff make out the violation of a constitutional right, and (2) if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct. . . However, the Supreme Court has revisited this rule and determined that the rigid two-step structure is no longer mandatory. . . Accordingly, as the Court did in Pearson, we will first consider whether the officer’s conduct violated clearly established law. . . If we determine that the answer is no, qualified immunity will shield Knoblauch from suit.”).

Ontiveros v. City of Rosenberg, Tex., 564 F.3d 379, 382, 385 (5th Cir. 2009) (“For several years, the Supreme Court required that the first of these criteria—whether plaintiffs’ facts allege a constitutional violation—must be decided at the outset. . . Recently, however, the Court reversed course, holding that ‘courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ . . The district court’s decision, rendered before Pearson, principally addressed the merits question whether Lt. Logan’s use of deadly force was unconstitutional. We see no reason, post-Pearson, to alter that approach here. . . [W]e agree with the district court that ‘an officer could have reasonably believed that Ontiveros posed a threat of serious physical harm to himself or other officers’ and that Lt. Logan’s actions were reasonable under the circumstances as he described them. Because we hold that Lt. Logan did not violate Ontiveros’s constitutional rights, we need not determine whether Lt. Logan would have had qualified immunity or whether the City of Rosenberg would have been liable had Lt. Logan’s use of force violated the Fourth Amendment.”).

J.W. through Williams v. City of Jackson, Mississippi, No. 3:21-CV-663-CWR-LGI, No. 3:21-CV-667-CWR-LGI, No. 3:22-CV-171-CWR-LGI, 2023 WL 2617395, at *12-15 (S.D.Miss. Mar. 23, 2023) (“[T]he weight of Supreme Court precedent and the persuasive precedent of the Courts of Appeals reveal that the Fourteenth Amendment’s right to bodily integrity is violated when the government induces unwitting citizens to consume lead-contaminated water without their consent. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, as the Court must at this stage, the Court finds that the Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a violation of their right to bodily integrity against each of the Defendants. But the Court cannot say that the right was clearly established at the time of the Defendants’ misconduct. . . . Here, the Plaintiffs have not offered (and the Court cannot find) any controlling authority establishing with particularity the bodily integrity right that they press. Instead, the Plaintiffs rely upon the Sixth Circuit’s recent decision in Guertin v. State, 912 F.3d 907 (6th Cir. 2019) to support the existence of a clearly established right. . . That reliance is misplaced for at least three reasons. First, Guertin’s finding of a clearly established right rested on the strength of the Sixth Circuit’s prior bodily integrity precedent. . . .

Unfortunately for these Plaintiffs, though, this Circuit’s precedents provide no basis to justify that right. Second, Guertin was decided more than five years after most of the unconstitutional conduct alleged in our Plaintiffs’ Amended Complaint began. It is impossible, therefore, that the Sixth Circuit’s decision in Guertin would have put these Defendants on notice that their misconduct violated the Plaintiffs’ Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . Finally, and perhaps most obviously, although a well-reasoned and common-sense application of the law, Guertin is not controlling authority for this Court. And because Guertin is the Plaintiffs’ only comparable case alleging a bodily integrity claim, it cannot be said that there exists the kind of ‘robust persuasive authority’ necessary to support finding a clearly established right. . . In sum, although the Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that Defendants Craig, Lumumba, Yarber, Powell, and Miller violated their Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity when they induced the Plaintiffs to consume toxic, lead-contaminated water without their informed consent, that right was not clearly established at the time the Defendants engaged in it. . . Thus, the Court finds that the judicially created doctrine of qualified immunity once again works to insulate Defendants from liability for their gross misconduct, which, as we must find at this stage of the proceedings, has caused harm to these Plaintiffs. Accordingly, the individual Defendants’ motions to dismiss, for judgment on the pleadings, and for qualified immunity with respect to the bodily integrity claim are GRANTED.”)

J.W. through Williams v. City of Jackson, Mississippi, No. 3:21-CV-663-CWR-LGI, No. 3:21-CV-667-CWR-LGI, No. 3:22-CV-171-CWR-LGI, 2023 WL 2617395, at *16-17 (S.D.Miss. Mar. 23, 2023) (“Under the precedent in this Circuit, the Plaintiffs’ state-created danger claim against the individual Defendants must fail because ‘the theory of state-created danger is not clearly established law.’ . . Of course, the reason why the state-created danger claim is ‘not clearly established’ and ‘uncertain’ in the Fifth Circuit is because that court has avoided every opportunity to clarify it. While the Fifth Circuit has identified the elements that plaintiffs must satisfy to prove such a claim, every such invocation is accompanied by a statement expressing uncertainty about the claim’s core legitimacy. . . At the same time, however, the court has not specifically disclaimed a cause of action under the state-created danger theory. . . This indecision and circularity have left litigants and district courts in the lurch: Supreme Court precedent has recognized the state-created danger cause of action for some purposes and the Fifth Circuit has provided a standard for reviewing those claims, but it remains unclear if or when that standard can be met and what remedy is available when it is. And when presented with persuasive, analogous cases from its sister circuits defining the application of the theory, . . . the Fifth Circuit has simply, to borrow from Justice Scalia, ‘fann[ed] [its] fingers ... under [its] chin.’ . . It is not only judges and lawyers who have been disadvantaged by this approach. The Fifth Circuit’s categorical bar on holding government actors accountable for the dangers they create or enhance has also had nightmarish consequences for ordinary citizens in this Circuit.”)

established’ element without deciding whether Craig violated Segler’s constitutional rights. . . This element requires Segler to show that any ‘reasonable official’ in Craig’s position would have recognized that his conduct exceeded constitutional bounds. . . Except in obvious cases, this test requires plaintiffs to identify the constitutional rule that the state actor allegedly violated with particularity—not at a high level of generality (such as the general right to ‘due process’). . . The need for specificity, in turn, usually compels plaintiffs to identify caselaw that clearly establishes the specific rule on which they rely. . . Here, however, Segler identifies no case that would have made it clear to Craig that his decision to implicate Segler at the press conference violated either the Due Process Clause or the Second Amendment. . . . Segler’s allegations contain a critical difference from Constantineau. In that decision, the state actor himself deprived the plaintiff of the additional interest (the right to buy alcohol). . . In this case, by contrast, Segler alleges that unknown private parties—not a state actor like Craig—deprived him of the additional interests (the right to bodily integrity or to business). This distinction reveals the important legal question on which Segler’s case hinges: May a plaintiff satisfy the ‘plus’ element of the Supreme Court’s ‘stigma-plus’ test by showing that private parties harmed the plaintiff because of a state actor’s false statements? We can save our answer for another day. Segler has not cited a single case that has adopted his stigma-plus theory tying the ‘stigma’ (reputational harms) from a state actor’s defamation to the ‘plus’ (tangible injuries) from a private party’s actions. That fact dooms his theory in this qualified-immunity context. It shows that nothing in the existing caselaw clearly establishes the theory with the required ‘degree of specificity.’ . . Nor is Segler’s theory the type of ‘obvious’ extension of existing law that would excuse his failure to identify any on-point precedent. . . . We need only conclude that the existing caselaw does not clearly establish Segler’s view of the law. So Craig is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As with his due-process claim, he does not cite a single decision that has extended this First Amendment retaliation framework to the Second Amendment. Here again, then, Segler fails to identify existing caselaw with the required degree of specificity.’ . . Nor do we find it ‘obvious’ whether (or how) this test should apply in the Second Amendment context. . . After all, the Supreme Court has adopted a test under the Second Amendment that requires us to examine ‘the Nation’s historical tradition of firearm regulation.’ . . Yet Segler does not identify any history on the question that this case implicates: Can government actors ‘infringe[]’ the ‘right’ to ‘keep and bear Arms’ not just through direct regulations of those arms but also through other actions that indirectly chill the exercise of this right? . . So Segler again fails to show that existing caselaw clearly establishes his proposed rule. And Craig is again entitled to qualified immunity.”) Harrod v. Lee, No. 24-5228, 2024 WL 5103834 (6th Cir. Dec. 13, 2024) (not published) (“We start and end with the ‘clearly established’ prong of qualified immunity. . . Even if Corporal Ruehling violated Harrod’s rights by arresting him for aggravated assault without basis—a question we do not address. . . by Harrod’s own argument, his rights were established by the Chiaverini decision in 2024, not as of his 2020 arrest. So Harrod’s claims fail to overcome Corporal Ruehling’s qualified-immunity defense. . . . To rule on the constitutional violation, we’d need to decide complicated questions the district court didn’t reach, like whether Chiaverini applies both to false arrests and malicious prosecutions, and whether Harrod’s aggravated-assault

Jones v. Naert, 121 F.4th 558, 567-68 (6th Cir. 2024) (“[W]e hold that Officer Naert lacked probable cause to believe that Jones was about to directly endanger others, and violated her constitutional rights by arresting her for disorderly conduct. . . . We next consider whether the unlawfulness of this arrest was clearly established in December 2019. If it wasn’t, Officer Naert is still entitled to qualified immunity from Jones’s § 1983 claims whether or not he violated the Constitution. . . . A right is clearly established if its contours are definite enough ‘that any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . . In the context of probable cause, the plaintiff must normally identify a case where an officer ‘acting under similar circumstances’ was deemed to have violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Barring that, the plaintiff must show that her claim presents one of those ‘rare “obvious case[s]”’ where no existing precedent is needed. . . . We do not consider whether Jones’s rights were clearly established under existing precedent because Jones disclaims any argument on that front. Instead, she argues that Officer Naert’s conduct was ‘obviously’ unlawful in light of the statutory language at issue here. . . . While we have held that a criminal statute can by itself put an officer on notice of an unconstitutional arrest, we have done so when the statute clearly addressed the specific circumstances confronted by the officer. . . . For example, in reviewing an arrest under a failure-to-disperse statute that explicitly requires a crowd of at least three people, we held that an officer clearly lacked probable cause for an arrest when he was faced with only two people, which defeated qualified immunity. . . . While statutory language need not be that precise to establish a right, Jones does not explain how the element at issue—‘endangering directly’ other persons or property—by itself offers sufficiently clear guidance for her specific situation. Jones thus fails to show that the statute ‘clearly established’ her rights in this case.”)

Jones v. Naert, 121 F.4th 558, 569-71 (6th Cir. 2024) (Murphy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I agree with much of Judge Bloomekatz’s opinion, but I would resolve part of this appeal on narrower grounds. To overcome Officer Steven Naert’s qualified-immunity defense, Ronda Jones must show not just that Naert violated the Constitution but also that the existing law clearly established this violation. . . . And we may decide these two qualified-immunity elements in the order that makes the most sense for the case. . . . Here, Jones brings both a ‘false arrest’ claim and a ‘malicious prosecution’ claim under the Fourth Amendment. I am comfortable deciding Jones’s malicious-prosecution claim on the constitutional merits for the reasons that Judge Bloomekatz provides. But I would not resolve whether Naert had probable cause to arrest Jones for her false-arrest claim. Rather, I would jump straight to the second qualified-immunity element: Naert did not violate clearly established law by concluding that he had probable cause to arrest Jones. . . . As Judge Bloomekatz explains, Jones has not cited any on-point cases covering this unique factual situation. . . . Nor is this case an ‘obvious’ one in which the plaintiff does not need to identify analogous precedent. . . . I see little value in deciding whether Naert actually had probable cause to arrest Jones because this federal probable-cause inquiry largely turns on an unclear state-law question. Naert arrested Jones under Michigan’s ‘disorderly person’ statute. . . This statute treats as ‘a disorderly person,’ among other individuals, one ‘who is intoxicated in a public place and who is ... endangering directly the safety of another person or of property[.]’. . An inebriated individual ‘endangers’ another person’s safety or that person’s property if the individual ‘expose[s]’ the person or property ‘to harm or danger’ or ‘imperil[s]’ the person or property. . . Under this language, a defendant can violate the statute even if no harm occurs to the other person or property. Rather, the statute makes the risk of harm the critical fact. So a drunken bar patron need not actually start landing punches to violate the statute; she can instead violate the statute if her belligerent and ‘erratic behavior’ creates a risk of that violence. . . But risks come in differing degrees. A heavily intoxicated person who unwittingly stumbles onto an expressway creates a grave risk of a harmful accident. Yet even a perfectly sober jogger creates some risk of an accident if the jogger runs along a road’s shoulder while dressed all in black late at night. Many conscientious joggers thus wear reflective clothing or lights during nighttime runs. So what degree of risk suffices to violate this Michigan statute? The Michigan Supreme Court has not answered that question. And the Michigan courts of appeals have offered only limited guidance. . . . Keep in mind, too, that Naert did not need conclusive proof that Jones had violated this state law. To establish probable cause under the Fourth Amendment, he needed only ‘a probability or substantial chance’ that Jones had or would do so. . . And because the Michigan law also punishes a risk of harm, we must ask whether a probability of a probability existed. Yet without a good grasp of the first (state-law) probability, I find it difficult to evaluate the second (federal-law) one. In this situation, the Supreme Court has suggested that we should just resolve the appeal at step two of the qualified-immunity analysis. ‘A constitutional decision resting on an uncertain interpretation of state law,’ the Court has said, is ‘of doubtful precedential importance.’ . Given that any probable-cause holding will rest on our ‘uncertain assumptions about state law,’ that holding may well lose value if the state’s highest court takes a different view of the underlying state law. . . I would follow the Court’s reasoning here. I thus join Sections I.B and II of the majority opinion and otherwise concur in the judgment.”)

Campbell v. Riahi, 109 F.4th 854, 860-62 (6th Cir. 2024) (“We skip to the question whether Riahi’s action violated any clearly established right. . . The Fourteenth Amendment requires (among other things) that jail officials take reasonable measures ‘to protect pretrial detainees from harm.’ . . At the time of the alleged constitutional violation here, a plaintiff alleging a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim needed to prove two elements: first, that the detainee faced a ‘substantial risk of serious of harm’; and second, that the defendant understood yet ‘consciously disregarded’ that risk—meaning the defendant knew of the risk and responded unreasonably to it. . . . Here, regardless of whether Riahi subjectively perceived the potential risk that Baker would commit suicide, Baker’s mother has not cited—nor have we found—any case that would have put Riahi on notice that her decision to close Baker’s cell door was ‘so unreasonable as to violate the Fourteenth Amendment.’ . . At that time, Riahi was responding to an ongoing altercation between two cellmates, which had escalated over the course of nearly thirty minutes. Twice Riahi tried to defuse the altercation; but when Baker and Herbert started ‘going in and out’ of their cells attempting ‘to get’ each other, Riahi closed each of their cell doors ‘to avoid a physical altercation.’ At that moment—as the sole corrections officer on duty—Riahi was forced to balance competing exigencies: the potential risk that Baker might harm herself, on the one hand, and the risk that Baker and Herbert might harm each other (or another inmate), on the other. No ‘clearly established law’ from our court or the Supreme Court ‘prohibited’ Riahi from balancing those considerations by closing Baker’s cell door for ten minutes while seeking assistance from her supervising officer. . . .At the time of Baker’s suicide, no case from the Supreme Court or this court established that Riahi’s actions were unconstitutional at the time she took them. Riahi is therefore entitled to qualified immunity as to the federal claim against her.”)

Farris v. Oalkand County, Michigan, 96 F.4th 956, 963 (6th Cir. 2024) (“Here, we find it appropriate to resolve Farris’s unlawful-arrest claim on the constitutional merits because some of her state-law claims also turn on the same probable-cause question. But we find it easiest to resolve her excessive-force claim at the second step because Farris has not identified any case that would have ‘clearly established’ the illegality of the deputies’ limited force.”)

Lawler ex rel Lawler v. Hardeman County, Tennessee, 93 F.4th 919, 921-22, 925-28, 936 (6th Cir. 2024) (“In July 2018, Brian Lawler tragically committed suicide at a county jail. To hold officers liable for failing to prevent a pretrial detainee’s death at that time, our caselaw required proof that the officers subjectively believed that there was a strong likelihood the inmate would commit suicide. . . . Today, however, our court would hold officers liable if they recklessly overlooked a pretrial detainee’s strong likelihood of suicide—even if they did not subjectively recognize it. See Helphenstine v. Lewis County, 60 F.4th 305, 316–17 (6th Cir. 2023). When denying qualified immunity to the officers sued in this case, the district court held that a reasonable jury could find that they ‘recklessly disregarded’ the strong risk that Lawler would commit suicide. But that standard governs today; it did not govern when Lawler committed suicide in 2018. And when we apply the correct test, the evidence shows that the officers did not subjectively believe that Lawler was likely to take his life. We thus reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity to the officers. . . . Here, given that the controlling legal rules have recently changed, we find it easiest to resolve the Officers’ appeal by jumping immediately to the ‘clearly established’ requirement. We need not (and do not) decide whether the Officers violated today’s legal rules because Lawler’s father has not shown that they violated the rules in place when Lawler committed suicide. Qualified immunity thus insulates the Officers from this damages suit. . . . Because the district court invoked the wrong set of legal rules (understandably so, given our evolving caselaw), we begin by clarifying the law that applies here. . . . [C]ourts evaluating a qualified-immunity defense may consider only the legal rules existing when ‘the challenged conduct’ occurred, not legal rules adopted by later caselaw. . . . Under this framework, we must identify the rules that governed in July 2018 when Lawler took his life. This inquiry starts by identifying the constitutional right at issue. Lawler was a pretrial detainee at the time of his death, meaning that a court had yet to try or punish him. Lawler’s father thus cannot invoke the Eighth Amendment right against ‘cruel and unusual punishments’ because that right kicks in only after a conviction. . . . Still, pretrial detainees like Lawler do have a Fourteenth Amendment right not to be ‘deprive[d]’ of their ‘life’ ‘without due process of law.’. . . And the Supreme Court has long held that the Due Process Clause offers protections to pretrial detainees that at least match those afforded convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. . . Having identified the right, we next must identify the claim at issue. This case implicates the legal rules that apply to claims that jail staff violated the Due Process Clause by failing to protect pretrial detainees from harm. These types of claims can arise in a variety of circumstances. Sometimes, a correctional officer might fail to protect the detainee from violence by other inmates. . . Other times, a prison doctor might fail to treat the detainee for a harmful medical condition. . . At still other times, jail staff might fail to thwart a detainee's suicide. . . In the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has held that the failure to protect prisoners from harm violates the ban on cruel and unusual punishment only if the prisoners prove both objective and subjective elements. . . Objectively, prisoners must have faced a 'substantial risk of serious harm.' . . Subjectively, officers must have acted with 'deliberate indifference' to this risk. . . Under this test, an inmate must prove both that an officer subjectively knew of facts that created a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate and that the officer subjectively concluded that this risk existed. . . Because officers must consciously know of the risk, then, they do not violate the Eighth Amendment merely by negligently or recklessly overlooking it. . . Should these Eighth Amendment rules for failure-to-protect claims by prisoners extend to similar claims by pretrial detainees under the Due Process Clause? For years, we answered "yes" to this question. . . But the ground underlying our traditional approach began to shift in 2015 when the Supreme Court decided Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015). That case concerned an excessive-force claim (not a failure-to-protect claim). . . . In the ensuing years, circuit courts disagreed over whether Kingsley's decision to jettison the Eighth Amendment's subjective element for a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim also modified the subjective element for a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claim. . . In 2021, we sided with the courts that extended Kingsley to this failure-to-protect context. . . After initial disagreement over what Browner required, we settled on a test that reduced Farmer's subjective element from 'actual knowledge to recklessness.' . . Today, officers can face liability even if they did not actually know of a risk of harm to a pretrial detainee. Pretrial detainees need only prove that the officers recklessly disregarded a risk so obvious that they either knew or should have known of it. . . What do these recent legal changes mean for the claims here? The changes do not affect our resolution because Lawler's father must overcome qualified immunity's 'clearly established' prong. Our recent cases that depart from Farmer in this pretrial-detainee context came out between 2021 and 2023. Because they postdate Lawler's suicide, they do not clearly establish anything 'at the time' the Officers acted. . . Admittedly, the Supreme Court decided Kingsley before Lawler took his life. But Kingsley, a decision about excessive force, did not clearly apply to this failure-to-protect context. The circuit split about Kingsley's scope confirms this point. . . In short, our older decisions applying Farmer to the claims of pretrial detainees provide the only clearly established law in 2018. This difference matters. To be sure, the district court suggested that it need not decide whether Browner modified Farmer because Lawler's father had created a genuine dispute of fact even under Farmer's more demanding test. . . But the court actually invoked Browner's more lenient test in all but name when applying the law to the facts. It reasoned that a jury could find that the Officers had 'recklessly disregarded' a significant risk that Lawler would take his life. . . Farmer, however, requires the Officers to have 'consciously' (not recklessly) disregarded that risk. . . That is, they must have 'draw[n] the inference' that the risk existed. . . The district court thus applied the wrong law to deny the Officers qualified immunity. . . Given the date of the conduct at issue, we instead must apply Farmer's standards. . . . Our conclusion that Lawler's father cannot hold the Officers liable under § 1983's qualified-immunity test says nothing about whether he could have held them liable under today's standards. It also 'says nothing about whether [the Officers'] conduct was proper as a matter of good policy.' . . And nothing we say here bars Tennessee or its jail administrators from holding correctional officers to more demanding standards of conduct as a matter of state law. . . But Lawler's father lacks the type of evidence that we have traditionally required to meet the stringent constitutional test that applied when Lawler tragically committed suicide. We thus reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Officers and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Pleasant View Baptist Church v. Beshear, 78 F.4th 286, 295-96, 300 (6th Cir. 2023) ("The Supreme Court makes clear that qualified-immunity's two prongs can be considered in any order. . . Some jurists generally prefer to answer the constitutional question first, fearing that answering only the clearly established prong 'risks constitutional stagnation' and can prevent a constitutional guarantee from becoming clearly established in the future. . . Some scholars have noted the value in courts articulating their 'reasons for exercising (or not) their Pearson discretion to reach constitutional questions.' . . Accordingly, we explain why we choose to exercise our Pearson discretion and consider the free-exercise claim under the clearly established prong. Just days after the Governor issued EO 2020-969, on November 29, 2020, this court considered this exact same free-exercise argument under the preexisting law and held that EO 2020-969 likely did not violate the Free Exercise Clause. . . In light of that ruling and other precedents, we find it doubtful, even implausible, that on November 18, 2020, the 'constitutional question' of whether EO 2020-969 violated the Free Exercise Clause was 'beyond debate.' . . Because of Danville, we bypass the constitutional-violation prong and adjudicate Governor Beshear's qualified-immunity defense under the clearly established prong. . . We start by providing an overview of the law as it existed on November 18, 2020, because the 'clearly established' inquiry mandates that even without 'requir[ing] a case directly on point ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate,' 'at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . It is in that context, under the 'pre-existing law,' that 'the unlawfulness must be apparent.' . . We must therefore confine our analysis to the law as it stood on November 18, 2020. . . . Neither this court's nor the Supreme Court's precedent clearly established that temporarily closing in-person learning at all elementary and secondary schools would violate the Free Exercise Clause when Governor Beshear issued EO 2020-969 on November 18, 2020. As the Governor points out, Plaintiffs have not provided this court with any cases denying a government official qualified immunity for their immediate public-health response to the COVID-19 pandemic. . . Because the Governor issued EO 2020-969 in the midst of a vibrant debate on this constitutional issue, he is thus entitled to a qualified-immunity defense. Accordingly, because Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that a clearly established right existed at the time Governor Beshear issued EO 2020-969, we AFFIRM the district court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' free-exercise claim.")

Cahoo v. SAS Institute, Inc., 71 F.4th 401, 406-12 (6th Cir. 2023) (“This appeal comes to us at the summary judgment stage after considerable discovery. With the benefit of discovery comes a burden. The plaintiffs now must identify evidence in the record to substantiate each claim in their complaint. . . In a qualified immunity case like this one, that means the plaintiffs bear the burden of identifying record evidence showing a violation of their clearly established rights. . . The plaintiffs, in other words, must substantiate their theories on both qualified immunity prongs with record support. Instead of merely showing that each claim alleged in the complaint satisfies these two prongs, as we decided the last time we looked at the case, they must point to record-based evidence backing each theory. We need not decide today whether the questionnaires and notices violated the Due Process Clause or whether a reasonable jury could find that Moffett-Massey and Geskey directed the development of them. Either way, the plaintiffs’ due process claims do not clear step two of the qualified-immunity test. Consider several key developments since our prior opinion. At the motion to dismiss stage, we assessed a broadly framed, putative class action complaint. . . Focusing on the complaint’s allegation that MiDAS failed to provide claimants with pre-deprivation notice or process before automatically shutting off unemployment benefits, garnishing wages, and seizing tax refunds, we held that the claimants had alleged a clearly established right to pre-deprivation notice and a hearing. . . That conclusion stemmed from several Supreme Court cases about the midstream termination of welfare benefit payments and the like. . . Our holding also hinged on the case’s procedural posture. Courts, we pointed out, sometimes benefit from waiting to resolve qualified immunity until summary judgment—with the benefit of discovery—rather than settling the issue immediately through a motion to dismiss. . . Patience can be especially prudent in the due process context, where courts employ a three-part, broadly framed balancing test. . . Discovery sometimes yields new insights about the public and private interests at stake, impacting the qualified immunity inquiry. All things considered, we concluded in the first appeal that ‘any reasonable official would have known that depriving Plaintiffs of their protected property interests in the manner alleged violated their due process rights.’ . . At the same time, we warned Cahoo that she would ‘need to substantiate [her] allegations to survive a motion for summary judgment.’ . . We have no second thoughts about these conclusions. . . . We now know that MiDAS did not immediately deprive these plaintiffs of their property rights. No plaintiff lost ongoing benefit payments due to MiDAS. . . . Now that we know MiDAS did not immediately terminate these plaintiffs’ ongoing benefit payments without pre-deprivation process, cases like Goldberg and our prior opinion do not tell us what to do with the remaining claims in the case. What was once relatively easy to answer no longer is. . . . No case put Moffett-Massey and Geskey on notice that these pre-deprivation forms and appeal procedures for these plaintiffs in this context did not stack up. Quite a few cases suggested the contrary. [collecting cases] Cahoo claims that Hope v. Pelzer solves these problems. That case recognized that a novel violation can be ‘so obvious’ that it nevertheless oversteps clearly established law, it is true. . . And we relied on Hope in our prior opinion, it is true too. . . But because our prior opinion focused on the alleged midstream deprivation of property rights without pre-deprivation notice and a hearing, cases like Goldberg naturally extended to the novel MiDAS setting. Those cases, in other words, gave Agency supervisors ‘fair warning’ that the midstream deprivation of benefits without process ‘violated the Constitution.’ . . In today’s setting, however, Cahoo did not identify any case in her appellee brief that fairly extends to this situation. Goldberg's holding does not 'obvious[ly]' cover after-the-fact fraud findings accompanied by notices of determination and multiple levels of appeal before any immediate consequences for property rights. . . . The entire process, including above all the delayed deprivations in this instance, distinguishes the plaintiffs' claims from due process precedent. Any other approach creates notice problems in the other direction. Qualified immunity carefully balances between the 'vindication of citizens' constitutional rights' and 'officials' effective performance of their duties,' a balance maintained only by giving officials fair notice of the wrongfulness of their conduct. . . . Now that the district court has declined to certify a class, each plaintiff's individual due process claim must stand on its own. . . . Today's claims rest on theories that we did not consider the last time around. The district court concluded that not one of the remaining four plaintiffs immediately lost her ongoing benefits, immediately had her wages garnished, or immediately had her tax refunds intercepted. . . . Hence the prior opinion's explanation that precedent patently required 'an individual [to] be given an opportunity for a hearing before he is deprived of any significant property interest,' . . . remains true but irrelevant to the remaining claims in the case. . . . The missing link, then, is a case that clearly established the inadequacy of the questionnaires, notices of determination, and appeal processes available in the run-up to the property deprivation. To this day, the plaintiffs have not provided that case. What precedent there was would not have clearly alerted Moffett-Massey and Geskey to the constitutional inadequacies of the questionnaires and notices as to these plaintiffs and these property deprivations. . . . All in all, while we share our colleague's concerns about the MiDAS system, we respectfully disagree with her conclusion as to the clearly established prong in this appeal.")

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 64 F.4th 736, 752 (6th Cir. 2023) ("We. . . hold that Jackson has plausibly alleged that Marburger violated his right of access to the courts by redacting exculpatory material from the investigative file and thereby stymieing his efforts to file a petition for postconviction relief. But it was not yet clearly established in 2016 that redacting exculpatory information from a response to a public-records request would violate the right of access to the courts, and therefore we must grant qualified immunity to Marburger.")

Roberts v. Cruz, No. 22-5687, 2023 WL 2181145, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Feb. 23, 2023) (not reported) ("Roberts's conduct here may not have risen to the level of dangerousness present in [the cited] cases, but ultimately, we need not wade into the morass of case law on deadly force and Fourth Amendment reasonableness. As the Supreme Court has instructed, there is no need to perform the broader Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis where it is clear that the specific right in question was not clearly established. . . . We therefore start our analysis with whether Cruz's decision to tase Roberts in the stairwell violated one of Roberts's clearly established rights. Here, even if Cruz's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on excessive force, we would nevertheless be obligated to affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment because he violated no clearly established right. A right is clearly established when its 'contours' are clear enough that every reasonable officer would know that his conduct violated that right and 'existing precedent' has 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . . The Supreme Court has also directed us to employ a ‘high degree of specificity’ in defining the relevant right so as to better answer ‘the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’. The right to be free from excessive force is and has been clearly established. . . But whether force is ‘excessive’ depends on the particular context. Although this circuit has routinely determined that non-threatening individuals have a clearly established right to be free from tasing, . . . ‘[o]ur cases firmly establish that it is not excessive force to tase someone (even multiple times) when the person is actively resisting arrest[.]’ . . . On the other hand, in a case even closer to this one—though still no perfect fit—we concluded that a suspected misdemeanor who earlier fled from police but was no longer fleeing or resisting had a clearly established right not to be tased at the top of a staircase. . . And in that case we highlighted the heightened risk of injury or death associated with tasing an individual on an elevated surface, like stairs. . . Accepting, as the district court did, that Roberts was still on the stairs and may not have had the knife in his hand at the instant of tasing, our inquiry boils down to whether an individual who disobeys police commands to drop a weapon and then flees has a right not to be tased on a staircase. Given that even the closest case to this one, Baker, has important distinguishing factors—specifically, there was no indication that the suspect there had a weapon and he had stopped fleeing—we conclude that this case falls into the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,’ which means that Cruz did not violate a clearly established right. . . At bottom, ‘[t]he essence of qualified immunity[] is to give government officials cover when they resolve close calls in reasonable (even if ultimately incorrect) ways.’ . . . Because we cannot say that Cruz’s actions violated clearly established law, we must affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.”) Yerkes v. Ohio State Highway Patrol, No. 22-3030, 2022 WL 17753528, at *5-7 (6th Cir. Dec. 19, 2022) (not reported) (“The district court’s qualified immunity analysis contoured the right in question at too high a level of generality. . . The pertinent question is not whether the law banning discrimination on the basis of sex is clearly established, but a more nuanced one: whether reporting a potential policy violation up the chain of command with the intent to cause a fellow officer to lose their job, due to that officer’s sex and/or sexual orientation, constitutes a clearly established constitutional violation. As our caselaw on this issue has gone in conflicting directions, we find that the answer to that question is no. There are many cases in the Sixth Circuit which state/hold that an officer may be held liable under § 1983 for a constitutional violation even if he did not himself perform a particular action necessary to that violation. [collecting cases] These cases appear to be merely specific applications of the long-accepted proposition that ‘[s]ection [1983] should be read against the background of tort liability that makes a man responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.’ . . . However, none of these cases are directly on point, and most are First Amendment retaliation cases. The First Amendment retaliation standard incorporates a causation requirement, . . . unlike the discrimination standard, so the proximate cause analysis in retaliation cases doesn’t clearly apply here. Further, there are numerous cases in this circuit—also First Amendment retaliation cases—that seem to contradict the notion that individuals who are not final decisionmakers can be held liable for the actions of the final decisionmaker, even in the retaliation context. . . . These cases muddy the waters. The confusion in the caselaw, and the lack of any case directly on point, makes it difficult to conclude that ‘existing precedent ... place[s] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . Thus, the law on this issue was not clearly established, and all four Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.⁷ [fn. 7: Because we conclude that the law was not clearly established, we decline to analyze whether Defendants’ actions constitute a constitutional violation, as we may under Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009).]”)

Zakora v. Chrisman, 44 F.4th 452, 465-67 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Courts may ‘exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’. . The Estate does not cite to any Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit precedent suggesting that an inmate has an Eighth Amendment right to be protected from the unfettered flow of drugs into a prison. Two factors lead us away, however, from deciding this case under the ‘clearly established’ prong of qualified immunity for the first time on appeal. First, the MDOC Defendants have forfeited the argument as an appellate issue. . . The MDOC Defendants did not make any argument at all as to the “clearly established” prong in their appellate brief, insisting only that the Estate did not plausibly allege a constitutional violation. Indeed, the words ‘clearly established’ do not appear a single time in that brief. Our dissenting colleague, however, notes that a forfeiture argument can itself be forfeited, citing United States v. Shultz, 733 F.3d 616, 619 (6th Cir. 2013). But unlike in criminal-sentencing cases, in which the basis for the district court’s sentencing is necessarily clear from the sentencing record, the district court here did not address the ‘clearly established’ or ‘obviousness’ issues at all. We cannot, however, undertake our own analysis without input from either party, when the ‘clearly established’ prong depends on factual issues that were not before the district court, as discussed in more detail below. Second, the resolution of the Estate’s response to the defendant’s qualified-immunity defense turns on facts that the parties have not yet developed. The Estate argues that this is the rare, ‘obvious case where the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct is sufficiently clear.’. . In the Estate’s view, no reasonable official could have concluded that failing to investigate the drug smuggling at Lakeland, despite the documented risk of harm, was constitutional. But the district court did not reach the ‘obviousness’ issue because, once it decided that the Estate had not shown that a constitutional violation had occurred, there was no need for the court to address the second prong of the qualified-immunity defense. For us to opine on this issue now would thus violate ‘the general rule that a federal appellate court does not consider an issue not passed upon below.’. . We of course have discretion to deviate from the general rule in ‘exceptional cases’ or to avoid ‘a plain miscarriage of justice.’. . . But we see no similar reason to exercise our discretion here. To the contrary, any consideration of the ‘obviousness’ argument at the motion-to-dismiss stage, where there has been virtually no factual development as to the MDOC Defendants’ actions or inactions, would contravene the reasoning behind this court’s stated preference for deciding a defendant’s entitlement to qualified immunity at summary judgment as opposed to under Rule 12(b)(6). . . Our dissenting colleague describes our refusal to address the ‘clearly established’ prong as a ‘deus ex machina’ (whatever that means), arguing that we are improperly saving the Estate’s claim from defeat. . . But our decision is not based on some obscure technicality. The Estate makes serious allegations of misconduct within Lakeland. Consider, for example, the Estate’s allegations that top prison officials instructed their subordinates not to investigate known drug smuggling at Lakeland and that other officials were themselves involved in supplying the lethal drugs to Zakora. Accepting these allegations as true, as we must at this stage in the proceedings, the Estate has at least a colorable argument that ‘the unlawfulness of the [officials’] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.’ . . . This issue, however, was not addressed by the district court nor adequately briefed on appeal, so consideration by us in the first instance would be inappropriate. . . . And because there has been no factual development regarding these disturbing allegations, this issue is best left to the district court to address in the first instance at the summary-judgment stage. . . . For these reasons, we review only the district court’s conclusion that the Estate did not plausibly allege a constitutional violation. We do not consider nor express any view as to whether the alleged constitutional violation was obvious for the purposes of a qualified-immunity analysis.”) Zakora v. Chrisman, 44 F.4th 452, 484-89 (6th Cir. 2022) (Sutton, C.J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) (“If ever a claim was designed for qualified immunity, this is it. Zakora has not identified any court in the country, anytime anywhere, that has recognized such a claim. No hints, no dicta, no holdings. The point of the defense is to protect ‘all but the plainly incompetent’ so ‘long as their actions could reasonably have been thought consistent with’ the U.S. Constitution. . . . The Court determines that the state officials forfeited prong two of the claim of qualified immunity in this appeal. It decides that Zakora has raised a cognizable constitutional claim. And it remands the case to the district court to decide the clearly established ruling in the first instance—even though it cannot identify a single case that has ever recognized such an unorthodox claim. This winding approach defies convention. While I am confident that the prison officials did not violate the U.S. Constitution, I am certain that their qualified immunity defense remains in the case and certain that they did not violate clearly established law. . . . No surprise, given the oddities of this claim, the district court granted relief to the prison officials. . . . Judge Neff ruled that the officials won on prong one of the qualified immunity claim—that no constitutional violation occurred as a matter of law—holding that the ‘allegations about drug smuggling do not state any plausible constitutional violation.’ . . . Because she found that no constitutional violation occurred, it follows, she did not think that state officials violated a clearly established right. . . . Zakora never argued that the defendants forfeited anything. Just as we must treat like individuals alike in our cases, we must treat like defenses alike. To compromise the one invariably compromises the other. This is not a forfeiture; it is a deus ex machina. . . . On the merits of prong one of the qualified immunity defense, this conditions-of-confinement case strikes a few dissonant chords. By its terms, the voluntary and illegal nature of Zakora’s activity pushes the claim outside the Eighth Amendment’s ambit. . . . Traditional conditions-of-confinement cases arise in a markedly different context from today’s case. When a State removes an inmate from society and restricts his freedom, it has obligations to him. Having ‘stripped’ inmates of ‘virtually every means of self-protection and foreclosed their access to outside aid,’ prison ‘officials are not free to let the state of nature take its course.’ . . . The types of risks that give rise to Eighth Amendment claims are those an inmate cannot reasonably be expected to avoid on his own. . . .

Zakora never argues that her son consumed fentanyl involuntarily. What was true outside prison was true inside prison. Any risk from the availability of drugs did not become serious until he chose to use them. . . . What ought to create a stop sign at step one of qualified immunity generates a grinding halt at step two. Recall that to overcome qualified immunity, Zakora must prove not only that the officials violated the Eighth Amendment but that they also violated clearly established Eighth Amendment law. That requires her to show that the law on the books at the time of this incident left the illegality of the officials' actions 'beyond debate.' Wesby, 138 S. Ct. at 589 (quotation omitted). . . . That is not remotely so. Start with what ought to be an end-of-the-story reality. No case holdings support the claim. None at all. That by itself should bring this dispute to a close. There is more anyway. . . . Zakora has not identified a single decision holding that officials' failure to stem the flow of illegal drugs alone exposes them to liability for overdoses. The screeching silence of precedent seriously undermines this claim. . . . Because no forfeiture occurred, because no constitutional violation occurred, and because no clearly established violation occurred, the prison guards and administrators 'should not be subject to liability or, indeed, even the burdens of litigation.' . . . I respectfully dissent from the Court's contrary decision.")

Cunningham v. Blackwell, 41 F.4th 530, 536-37, 540, 543 (6th Cir. 2022) ("We may resolve a qualified immunity defense under the first or second prong, as there is no 'rigid order of battle.' . . . In today's case, the due process and free speech claims both fail to satisfy the second prong, the violation of clearly established rights. . . . Even if we assume for the sake of argument that the professors had a property interest in their clinical duties, the College administrators did not violate any clearly established due process right when they suspended the professors from working in the clinic and allowed them to continue working in their other roles. . . . [T]he dissent faults us for asking the professors to do too much to overcome qualified immunity. But we do not demand a case on all fours, only one with enough overlap to place the constitutional question beyond dispute. Due process is flexible and fact intensive. . . . The more discretion a constitutional guarantee gives a state actor, the less likely it will be clearly violated in a case without similar facts. . . . We have no such case here, and the professors have not otherwise placed the unconstitutionality of the administrators' conduct 'beyond debate.' . . . The courts of appeals have arrived at different answers to the question of whether the First Amendment allows an employer to require an employee to sign his name to a statement he believes is false as part of his job duties. The Second Circuit has taken the position that the First Amendment can step in. Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 229, 231–32 (2d Cir. 2011) (holding that a former police officer's refusal to submit a report with which he disagrees qualifies as protected activity for First Amendment purposes). The D.C. and Seventh Circuits have gone the other way. Bowie v. Maddox, 642 F.3d 1122, 1127, 1134 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (holding that a former employee did not enjoy First Amendment protection when he refused to sign an affidavit containing 'misstatements of fact' and 'language that would convey impressions that he would not agree with' about a former colleague (quotation omitted)); Davis v. City of Chicago, 889 F.3d 842, 846 (7th Cir. 2018) (holding that the First Amendment did not protect an employee's right to refuse to publish reports reaching conclusions with which he disagreed). Our Court to date has stayed out of the fray. Kingsley v. Brundige, 513 F. App'x 492, 499 (6th Cir.

2013). This collective uncertainty on prong one of qualified immunity creates certainty on prong two. If the circuits disagree and if our circuit has yet to take a stand, the law remains unsettled. Cagle v. Gilley, 957 F.2d 1347, 1349 (6th Cir. 1992). That reality precludes Shehata from establishing he clearly engaged in protected activity. In our dissenting colleague's view, the split between the circuits does not swallow this case because admitting to a crime fell outside the scope of Shehata's professional duties. We cannot agree, at least not with certainty that puts the question 'beyond debate.' . . . A reasonable official could conclude that acknowledging past misdeeds qualified as a job responsibility.") Cunningham v. Blackwell, 41 F.4th 530, 544-47 (6th Cir. 2022) (Donald, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("Courts, including the majority here, too often apply a 'rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard,' requiring plaintiffs to ferret out virtually identical circumstances arising in the purview of their circuit and resulting in a controlling decision with sufficiently detailed guidance. . . But the standard is not nearly that onerous. We have repeatedly rejected the notion that 'the very action in question [be] previously ... held unlawful,' . . . that a case be 'directly on point,' . . . or that a case be 'on all fours in order to form the basis for the clearly established right[.]' To do so would lead judges 'to demand a degree of certainty at once unnecessarily high and likely to beget much wrangling.' . . Instead, the proper inquiry is whether, at the time of the challenged conduct, 'the contours of a right [were] sufficiently clear' such that every 'reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . The dispositive question thus boils down to whether the state of the law gave the defendants 'fair warning' that their actions were unconstitutional. . . . It is beyond debate that failing to provide, at a minimum, a post-deprivation hearing before a neutral decisionmaker violates the due process clause. This is especially true given that Provost Blackwell ultimately believed Dr. Shehata had 'treated every single patient' and yet still continued to blacklist him from all clinical activities for another year. The majority's decision to the contrary renders the Fourteenth Amendment's procedural due process guarantees hollow. . . . The same rings true for the University Defendants' alleged retaliation against Dr. Shehata. Our case law gives fair warning that 'public employees may not be required to sacrifice their First Amendment free speech rights in order to obtain or continue their employment' . . And it is well settled that '[t]he free speech rights of a public employee ... include the right to refrain from speaking.' . . Thus, it has been clearly established for over thirty years that a public employee cannot be compelled to speak. The majority narrowly construes the matter to ask whether Dr. Shehata had a clearly established right to refuse to submit a false statement pursuant to his official duties. It is true that the University's Compliance Program Manual required all healthcare employees 'within 24 hours of discovery, to report any misconduct that they, in good faith believe is potentially illegal, unethical, abusive, or otherwise not in adherence with the spirit or intent of UKHC's [Corporate Compliance Program].' However, the University Defendants requested not only that Dr. Shehata confirm whether Dr. Cunningham influenced him to engage in 'wrongful behaviors' or 'told him to "keep quiet" about the false documentation,' but also that he admit to the elements of healthcare fraud. . . There is an insurmountable difference between reporting employee misconduct and confessing to a crime. Certainly, a forced admission to a crime is not 'ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties' as a clinical professor; it does not ‘owe [its] existence’ to the responsibilities of a public employee. . . To require a public employee to submit a sworn incriminating statement goes beyond internal personnel misconduct and implicates private speech—speech that indisputably constitutes an improper basis on which to terminate a public employee. . . Thus, no reasonable public employer could have concluded that it was constitutionally permissible to hinge Dr. Shehata’s continued employment on his compelled admission to a criminal act.”)

Jarvela v. Washtenaw County, 40 F.4th 761, 765-66 (6th Cir. 2022) (“We . . . hold that the Constitution does not require a canine handler always to shout out a warning to a fleeing suspect . . . And we hold that, under the circumstances facing the officers here, Houk did not violate the Constitution when he chose not to shout a verbal warning while tracking Jarvela with Argo on a leash. If Jarvela had wanted to surrender, he should not have fled on foot. . . More briefly, we hold that Houk is entitled to qualified immunity for his actions during what we call the contact phase. That phase is notable above all for its confusion, as Jarvela wrestled with Argo as the dog bit his arm, and Houk shouted commands with which Jarvela did not promptly comply. ‘When a person resists arrest—say, by swinging his arms in the officer’s direction, balling up, and refusing to comply with verbal commands—the officers can use the amount of force necessary to ensure submission.’ . . Here, Houk ceased to use any force once Jarvela complied with Houk’s commands to roll onto his stomach. And Jarvela has not identified any binding precedent that would have made clear to Houk that any of the force he used before then was unnecessary to ensure Jarvela’s submission. Houk is therefore entitled to judgment on all of Jarvela’s claims against him.”)

Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, 37 F.4th 1182, 1189-90 (6th Cir. 2022) (“Here, we can begin and end with the clearly established prong. . . To show that the officers violated clearly established law, Colson must make one of two showings. One is that this is an ‘obvious case’ where general ‘standards can “clearly establish” the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.’ . . Colson, however, does not argue that hers is such a case. That leaves the second method for showing that the officers violated clearly established law: ‘identify a case that put [the officers] on notice that [their] specific conduct was unlawful.’ . . To do so, Colson must define the right with particularity ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition,’ . . . and then identify ‘existing precedent’ that ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate[.]’ . . This demanding standard requires Colson to identify a ‘case that addresses facts like the ones at issue here.’ . . Yet rather than trying to clear this high bar, Colson instead attempts to lower it. According to Colson, she is ‘not required to find a case perfectly aligned with the facts presented’ here because her ‘right to medical care for serious medical needs’ is defined with sufficient particularity to be clearly established. But defining a right so broadly does not show that it was clearly established at the time of the purported violation. . . And for good reason. Colson’s formulation of the right, after all, is merely a restatement of the Fourteenth Amendment right itself, . . . which ‘is far too general a proposition to control this case[.]’ . . Indeed, accepting Colson’s formulation would ‘collaps[e] the two qualified-immunity inquiries into one, permitting the constitutional-violation inquiry always to answer the clearly established inquiry.’ . . Viewed in the proper light, Colson’s definition of the right did not put the officers ‘on notice that [their] specific conduct was unlawful,’ . . . because it does not address the officers’ particular actions or Colson’s particular injury[.] . . . Nor, it bears adding, is today’s case controlled by our decision in Colson v. City of Alcoa (Colson I), No. 20-6084, 2021 WL 3913040 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 2021). Colson I, to be sure, arose out of the same incident. And we affirmed the denial of qualified immunity for a Blount County jail officer who also relied on Russell’s medical opinion that Colson’s injury did not require medical care. . . . As an unpublished decision, Colson I does not restrain our evaluation of Colson’s claims against the officers. . . . And even if it did, Colson I would be a poor guide here. Colson I, of course, had not issued at the time of the alleged violation, and thus did not clearly establish the law for today’s purposes. . . . And since it was decided, the Supreme Court has twice instructed us that, except for an obvious constitutional violation, we are to grant qualified immunity unless the plaintiff identifies a case with sufficiently similar facts. See City of Tahlequah v. Bond, — U.S. —, 142 S. Ct. 9, 12, 211 L.Ed.2d 170 (2021) (per curiam); Rivas-Villegas, 142 S. Ct. at 8. Heeding those instructions, we hold that Cook and Wilson are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Reynolds v. Addis, No. 21-1454, 2022 WL 1073832, at *3-6 (6th Cir. Apr. 11, 2022) (not reported) (“In this case, we need only address the second prong. Even when an officer violates a plaintiff’s constitutional rights, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity ‘so long as their conduct “does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.”’ . . . Although there does not need to be ‘a case directly on point ... existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . In reviewing an officer’s actions, we are mindful of the split-second decisions officers must make in the field. . . . In a case such as this, where an officer discharges multiple shots within a span of two seconds, we consider the volley of shots as a single use of force. . . . The general standards present in Graham and Tennessee v. Garner—that deadly force requires that a suspect pose a threat of serious physical harm to an officer or others—are only sufficient to clearly establish law in an ‘obvious case.’ . . . This is not an obvious case. As reflected in the plaintiff’s version of the facts and the video, Addis reasonably suspected Cody of stabbing his parents with a knife. When Addis arrived at the scene, he did not know whether Cody was still armed with the knife. Addis, with his weapon drawn, gave several commands to Cody. Cody failed to comply with those commands. When Addis asked Cody if he had a knife on him, Cody responded by suddenly leaping up and running toward Addis. Reynolds suggests that Cody leapt to flee Addis. But Cody’s subjective intent is not relevant to the inquiry; we are limited to the information available to a reasonable officer in Addis’s position. . . . From Addis’s position, Cody leapt up and moved towards Addis—confirmed by the uncontroverted evidence that Addis’s first shot struck Cody to his front, not at a lateral angle. It thus would not have been obvious to a reasonable officer that, in the decisive moment, Cody posed no threat of harm. . . . Reynolds points us first to the Eleventh Circuit’s decision in Samples ex rel. Samples v. City of Atlanta, 846 F.2d 1328 (11th Cir. 1988). But Samples cannot clearly establish a violation in this case. To begin with, ‘out-of-circuit precedent clearly establishes rights only in “extraordinary case[s]” when the out-of-circuit decisions “both point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and [are] so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct” was unconstitutional. . . In Samples, the court held that there was a ‘serious issue of fact’ as to ‘the question of excessive force’ because one of the officer’s five shots hit the decedent in the back. . . Samples does not, on its own terms, hold any specific conduct unconstitutional. Perhaps more critically, in Samples, there was no forensic evidence to suggest which shot was first—the court had only an autopsy showing a number of shots, one of which was to Samples’s back. . . It then relied on the fact that a jury could find that the officer shot Samples first in the back, or shot him as he ran, as precluding summary judgment. . . Here, we know from video and forensic evidence that Addis’s first shot hit Cody while they faced each other. We also know that Addis’s volley occurred too quickly for us to conclude that Addis had time to decide that any threat had abated, if indeed Cody was fleeing. . . Samples does not provide the fair warning needed to avoid qualified immunity. . . Reynolds and the dissent also rely on cases where officers fired at automobile drivers while in positions of safety. In Godawa v. Byrd, under the plaintiff’s version of events, the officer fired on the decedent as he was driving away from the officer. . . In Hermiz v. City of Southfield, evidence suggested that the officer shot at the decedent from the side after the front of the car had already passed the officer. . . In Smith v. Cupp, an officer fired on a previously cooperative suspect who, on the plaintiff’s version of the facts, fired into the side of the vehicle the plaintiff drove as it passed the officer. . . In all three cases, on the plaintiff’s versions of the facts, the officer no longer faced a threat from the driver of the vehicle at the time the officer fired his weapon. The same cannot be said here. Reynolds also points to Hope v. Pelzer . . . to argue that we do not need ‘materially similar’ cases to find the law here was clearly established. . . But we note that Hope is an Eighth Amendment case, and the Supreme Court has since repeatedly warned that specificity is especially important in the Fourth Amendment context to clearly establish law for officers. . . Hope does not stand for the proposition that plaintiffs in Fourth Amendment cases do not need to offer any similar cases to demonstrate that an officer should have been on notice that his conduct violated the constitution. The Court did not write on a blank slate when it held that handcuffing an inmate to a hitching post for seven hours in the sun as punishment was clearly established. . . Rather, the Court pointed to two prior Circuit decisions reasoning that related conduct—handcuffing prisoners in awkward positions for prolonged periods; denying drinking water to inmates as punishment—violated the Eighth Amendment. . . To be sure, Supreme Court precedent is clear that plaintiffs do not require a case that is ‘directly on point.’ . . But Hope does not excuse Reynolds from needing to offer relevant precedent that shows Addis’s conduct violated clearly established law. And Reynolds has not done so. The dissent argues that we err by requiring too close of a factual match between our precedents and the situation Addis confronted. But the dissent ignores that the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts not to define clearly established law at too high a level of generality.’ . . And the differences between this case and the dissent’s cited precedents are not mere pedantry. The dissent would have us rely on cases where we have held an officer violated the Fourth Amendment by shooting from the side or behind a fleeing suspect from a position of safety. . . Here, even under Reynolds’s facts, the first shot was to Cody’s chest as he moved towards Addis. Our precedents that hold that an officer violates the constitution by shooting a fleeing suspect in the back or from a position of safety could not have put Addis on notice that his use of force was constitutionally violative. These cases are ‘materially distinguishable and thus do[] not govern the facts of this case.’ . . Because

Reynolds v. Addis, No. 21-1454, 2022 WL 1073832, at *6-10 (6th Cir. Apr. 11, 2022) (not reported) (Clay, J., dissenting) (“Whether summary judgment is appropriate in this case turns on one question: could a reasonable jury find that Officer Addis used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment and Michigan law when he shot and killed Cody Reynolds after responding to the scene of an alleged stabbing? The record indicates that a reasonable jury could find that Addis’ force was excessive. Indeed, the evidence fails to confirm Officer Addis’ allegation that he faced a deadly threat when Cody Reynolds got up from his knees and purportedly advanced toward him. . . The record instead suggests the possibility that Cody ran away from Addis to flee from the scene when he stood up and ran. . . This Court has repeatedly held that an officer’s use of deadly force is excessive when a suspect with visibly empty hands runs away from a police officer in a way that does not ‘imperil[] the lives of officers or the public.’ Godawa v. Byrd, 798 F.3d 457, 467 (6th Cir. 2015); see also Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 11 (1985); Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 769–75 (6th Cir. 2005). Because courts must draw all inferences in favor of Plaintiff at this stage, the district court appropriately denied Defendant’s motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff’s Fourth Amendment and state law claims. . . Addis cannot explain how Cody received three gunshots in his back, and the Court must accept Plaintiff’s assertion that Addis remained behind the driver’s side door and turned to follow Cody’s path as he ran ‘in a southeasterly direction,’ as Dr. Spitz concluded. . . Even though the majority concedes as much, it nevertheless concludes that ‘Addis’s volley occurred too quickly for us to conclude that Addis had time to decide that any threat had abated, if indeed Cody was fleeing.’ . . But even though ‘we do not require an officer to judge whether a threat has abated’ within a ‘fraction of a second,’ the Court must consider the totality of circumstances. In this case, Addis’ shots spanned multiple seconds; the shots were not, in fact, fired ‘within a fraction of a second.’ . . Accordingly, a jury could find that several of Addis’ shots amounted to excessive force, particularly where the Plaintiff’s version of the facts indicates that Addis fired the second, third and fourth gunshots as Cody was running away from him, rather than at him, at a distance. . . The photographs from the scene, coupled with the facts raised by the autopsy report, support Dr. Spitz’ conclusions and raise questions about the reasonableness of Addis’ use of force. . . . A reasonable jury could conclude that after shooting Cody one time in the upper-left torso, Addis indeed ‘turned to his left and fired multiple times as Cody ran toward the south side of the road.’ . . Additionally, the autopsy report illustrates the location of the bullets that entered Cody’s body squarely in the back. . . Both pieces of evidence support Plaintiff’s theory that Addis did not face a lethal threat as he fired several, or all, of the shots because Cody did not charge at him. . . . Even though Addis and Cody faced one another while Cody knelt on the ground, these assertions support the theory that Cody got up and immediately fled to his right (Addis’ left), rather than charging directly at the officer. A jury could thus find that shooting and killing Cody was excessive given these facts, even if the interaction happened over the course of a short period of time. . . . Viewing the available facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, and under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable jury could find that Addis’ use of deadly force violated Cody’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . In this case, the Court need only address whether the constitutional right that Plaintiff asserts was “‘clearly established” when the event occurred such that a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated it.’. . . That is because ‘[p]ublic officials are entitled to qualified immunity from suits for civil damages if either the official’s conduct did not violate a constitutional right or if that right was not clearly established at the time of the conduct.’. . . The majority inconsistently defines and incorrectly applies this burden. Indeed, it simultaneously confirms that Plaintiff need not put forth ‘a case directly on point,’. . . and also concludes that Plaintiff’s argument fails ‘because Reynolds is unable to point to a case that would place a reasonable officer in Addis’s position on notice that his use of force was unlawful[.]’ . . . This raises a critical flaw in the majority’s reasoning. To get around the Court’s precedent showing that an officer cannot shoot a fleeing suspect whose hands are visibly empty, the majority raises the burden by requiring Plaintiff to cite a prior case that tracks the precise facts of the one now before the Court. . . . This requirement runs roughshod over the caselaw that sets out the ‘salient question’ in regard to this prong of the excessive force analysis: whether the law ‘at the time of an incident provided “fair warning” to the defendants “that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional.”’ . . . Indeed, as the Court recently reiterated, ‘when determining whether a particular right is clearly established, courts “ask whether it would have been clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted,”’ not whether this Court previously determined that the exact conduct in question amounted to excessive force. . . . In this case, Plaintiff raised evidence showing that Officer Addis shot and killed Cody Reynolds as Cody attempted to flee from the scene while his empty hands were visible to the officer. . . . Simultaneously, the Court has clearly established that deadly force is constitutionally excessive when a police officer shoots an unarmed suspect that is running away from an officer when neither the officer nor the public is in immediate danger of death or serious injury. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, this Court has clearly established that deadly force is excessive under the circumstances faced by Addis. . . . Consequently, the district court correctly determined that Plaintiff’s claims should survive summary judgment.”) Kirilova v. Braun, No. 21-5649, 2022 WL 247751, at *4–6 (6th Cir. Jan. 27, 2022) (not reported) (“Young’s Estate argues that the totality of the circumstances, including the officers’ decision to ascend the stairs to the second floor and continue their search, demonstrates that the officers’ use of deadly force was unreasonable. Rather than just the confrontation between Young and the officers, the Estate urges us to consider the officers’ ‘decision to aggressively force an immediate confrontation with Mr. Young with only their handguns at the ready.’ The Estate also questions multiple decisions made before the officers climbed the stairs to the second floor, including their decision not to follow Louisville Metro Government policies on barricaded subjects and dealing with persons with diminished capacity. As the Estate points out, there was some circumstantial evidence that the individual in the house was mentally ill or had diminished capacity, including Young’s failure to respond to officers, his retreat into the abandoned house, and the officers’ suggestion that they may have encountered Young in the house before. We have held, however, that ‘[w]ithin a few seconds of reasonably perceiving a sufficient danger, officers may use deadly force even if in hindsight the facts show that the persons threatened could have escaped

unharmful.’ . . Though different decisions on the night of February 11, 2017, might have led to a better outcome, the record does not support an obvious causal connection between those alleged oversights and the officers’ decision to use force against a previously hidden and threatening Young. . . Our precedent generally requires the excessive force analysis to focus on the moments immediately leading up to the use of force, which indicates the need for allegations and evidence that the immediately preceding conduct is part of the same event. . . Due to the fact-intensive nature of excessive force claims, precise guidelines on what constitutes an analyzable unit of time for a particular event are absent from our cases. But our precedent shows that some causal connection between the preceding seconds or minutes to be included in the claim and the actual use of force is necessary. . . Here, the record does not support the conclusion that the officers’ decision to enter the house to conduct a lawful search, and to continue that search on the second floor, is so ‘conceptually [in]distinct’ from the deadly force used that they should be analyzed as one ‘segment.’ . . Furthermore, the fact that a suspect has a disability is relevant to the use of force analysis, but only if the officers were aware that some disability exists. . . Here, the string of inferences necessary to conclude that the officers were actually aware that it was Young on the second floor and that Young suffered from mental illness that required treating him as an individual with diminished capacity is too attenuated. Thus, that Young suffered from mental illness also does not impact our analysis. Instead, we must consider the video evidence showing that, as the officers reached the top of the stairs, Young stepped determinedly toward Officer Braun with a metal skewer in his hand pointed toward the officer’s body. These facts place the officers’ use of deadly force on the ‘reasonable’ side of our excessive force cases. This is not a case in which officers used force against an already subdued suspect. . . Nor is it a situation in which we must be wary of the self-serving accounts of police officers. . . Though Young cannot provide his own version of the events, the body camera footage does provide a more objective understanding of that night’s events. The video shows that Young was hidden from view—even with the banister railings providing some sightline to the second-floor landing—until Officer Braun turned around at the top of the stairs and Young came toward him. This focused analysis on the shooting does not expand what we consider a reasonable use of deadly force. The officers argue that our prior decisions in Baker v. City of Trenton, 936 F.3d 523 (6th Cir. 2019), and Livermore v. Lubelan, 476 F.3d 397 (6th Cir. 2007), dictate that our inquiry consider only the officers’ decisions in the few seconds immediately preceding the use of lethal force and must result in a finding of reasonableness. Those cases, however, are too factually distinct to offer much guidance here, and their logic does not underlie our focused analysis. [court discusses Baker and Livermore] In contrast, Young’s threat to the officers became apparent only when he advanced on Officer Braun with the metal skewer, an object posing a less obvious danger than the lawnmower blade or shotgun. Additionally, the officers here had less notice of Young’s possible intent to cause harm than the officers in Baker and Livermore, who had already witnessed the suspect’s dangerous actions prior to their use of deadly force. Baker and Livermore, therefore, do not establish that the use of lethal force against Young was reasonable. Our decision in Chappell v. City of Cleveland does offer some guidance. 585 F.3d 901 (6th Cir. 2009). . . . Here, as in Chappell, Young was armed with a weapon and moved suddenly and decisively toward an officer in a manner that a reasonable officer could view as aggressive. Young’s failure to respond to police commands and his movement toward Officer Braun with the skewer pointed at Braun's body support the conclusion that, based on our precedent, he posed a serious risk to the officers. In analogous cases in which we have found that an officer's use of deadly force was unreasonable, moreover, there is often evidence that the individual was attempting to obey police orders or was no longer a threat to the officers. . . . In contrast, video evidence of Young's death makes it clear that rather than lowering his weapon in response to the officers' presence, Young proceeded toward Officer Braun with the metal skewer pointed toward his torso. Because it was not unreasonable for the officers to believe that Young was threatening an officer with death or serious injury, their use of deadly force was not a violation of Young's Fourth Amendment rights. Because we find no constitutional violation, we need not examine the second prong of qualified immunity. The district court was correct in granting summary judgment to the officers on the § 1983 excessive force claim.")

Kenjoh Outdoor, LLC v. Marchbanks, 23 F.4th 686, 693-95 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Here, Kenjoh cannot show it was clearly established that prior restraint applied to commercial speech. If anything, our precedent seems to go the other way. So the district court properly granted Nathan Fling qualified immunity. Government officials are entitled to qualified immunity unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was 'clearly established.' . . . The plaintiff has the burden of meeting this test. . . . And we can tackle the test in either order. . . . If one prong is decisive, we need not to consider the other. . . . And here we skip to the second prong. A right is 'clearly established' if 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . And although the plaintiff need not provide 'a case directly on point,' the 'existing precedent must have placed the ... question beyond debate.' . . . The point is to give the official 'fair notice' that his actions violated the plaintiff's rights. Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, — U.S. —, 142 S. Ct. 4, 7, — L.Ed.2d — (2021). For this reason, we look to the law at the time the official acted. . . . And here, at the time Fling acted, the compliance rule only regulated commercial speech. See Ohio Rev. Code § 5516.01(A) (2007). And Kenjoh made only one challenge to the regulation—that it was a prior restraint. So, to succeed, Kenjoh must show that prior restraint applied to commercial speech. But Kenjoh fails to make this showing. It cites no cases from this Court holding that prior restraint applies to commercial speech. If anything, we have strongly suggested that prior restraint never applies to commercial speech. . . . Kenjoh attempts to get around this by generalizing its right. It asserts that Fling violated its right to speak through billboards and argues that this is a clearly established right. But that conflicts with Supreme Court precedent. The Court has warned against framing a right at such a high level of generality. . . . So the inquiry is not whether Fling violated Kenjoh's right to free speech. That is too general. Rather, it is whether stalling permit applications for advertising billboards counts as an unconstitutional prior restraint. But, to answer this, we must first answer if prior restraint even applies to commercial speech. And as explained above, it does not. ")

Gordon v. Bierenga, 20 F.4th 1077, 1082-85 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Here, we begin and end with the second prong. Even when a defendant violates a plaintiff's constitutional rights, the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity unless the right at issue was 'clearly established[.]'. . . . The inquiry depends on the specific facts of the case and their similarity to caselaw in existence at the time of the alleged violation. . . Such specificity is ‘especially important’ in the Fourth Amendment excessive force context, because ‘it is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.’. . . In this case, although it is a close call, no existing precedent “squarely governs” the specific facts at issue.’. . . The ‘critical question’ in cases involving use of deadly force during vehicular flight is ‘whether the officer has “reason to believe that the [fleeing] car presents an imminent danger” to “officers and members of the public in the area.”’. . . Deadly force is justified against ‘a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car.’. . . Deadly force is generally not justified ‘once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety[,]’ but an officer may ‘continue to fire at a fleeing vehicle even when no one is in the vehicle’s direct path when “the officer’s prior interactions with the driver suggest that the driver will continue to endanger others with his car.”’. . . Thus, in evaluating the reasonableness of deadly force in the context of a fleeing driver, we must look both to whether anyone was in the car’s immediate path at the time of the shooting and to the officer’s prior interactions with the driver that show potential for ‘imminent danger to other officers or members of the public in the area’ if the driver is permitted to continue fleeing. . . We have held, in several cases, ‘that deadly force was objectively unreasonable when the officer was to the side of the moving car or the car had already passed by him—taking the officer out of harm’s way—when the officer shot the driver.’[citing cases] However, none of those cases contained facts similar enough to this case such that ‘every reasonable official’ in Bierenga’s position would have been on notice that his conduct violated Gordon’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Here, like in Latits, the video from the White Castle drive-thru permits an interpretation that Bierenga fired four shots at Gordon after Gordon’s car ‘had passed the point where it could harm him,’ such that Bierenga ‘had time to realize he was no longer in immediate danger.’. . . But the driver’s conduct prior to the moments of the shooting in Latits are not close enough to the facts here such that every reasonable officer in Bierenga’s position would be on notice that shooting Gordon, rather than permitting Gordon to continue to flee and potentially endanger the public, would violate Gordon’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . Crucial to our analysis in Latits was that the ‘chase occurred under circumstances in which risk to the public was relatively low.’. . . The driver fled, in the dead of night, on ‘a large, effectively empty highway surrounded by non-populated areas (a cemetery and vacant state fairgrounds), passing no pedestrians, cyclists, or motorists besides the police trailing him.’. . . Furthermore, the driver in Latits ‘had shown no intention or willingness to drive recklessly through residential neighborhoods.’. . . The circumstances of Gordon’s flight are different. Gordon fled from Bierenga during rush hour in the middle of a major road in a populated Detroit suburb, adjacent to residential neighborhoods and businesses. Bierenga observed Gordon make a reckless left turn in the face of oncoming traffic near a busy intersection to escape from Bierenga, causing oncoming cars to brake to avoid colliding with Gordon as he turned into the White Castle parking lot. Several cars were parked in the parking lot. Multiple patrons and employees were inside. What’s more, after Bierenga later blocked in Gordon at the drive-thru window, Gordon reversed into the occupied vehicle behind him before accelerating forward and hitting Bierenga’s police vehicle. Although Gordon’s contact with those vehicles occurred at a relatively low speed, his conduct showed a willingness to strike both police and civilian vehicles to effectuate his escape from police. Given the time and place at which it occurred, Gordon’s reckless driving posed a materially higher risk of harm to the surrounding public than the reckless driving in Latits. . . Thus, Latits did not ‘clearly establish’ that using lethal force in the specific scenario Bierenga confronted was unconstitutional. . . . In this case, unlike in Cupp or Sigley, a reasonable officer in Bierenga’s position had at least some suggestion that Gordon ‘pose[d] more than a fleeting threat’ to the surrounding public. . . . While Cupp and Sigley are similar to this case in that they ‘involved officers confronting a car in a parking lot and shooting the non-violent driver as he attempted to initiate flight[,]’ . . . neither case involved reckless flight from a traffic stop in a crowded area prior to the shooting, or the striking of both civilian and police vehicles in an attempt to flee. To be sure, Gordon’s reckless driving did not demonstrate an ‘obvious willingness to endanger the public by leading the police on chases at very high speeds and through active traffic.’ . . . But that is what makes this such a close case. On one hand, Gordon’s reckless flight did not rise to level of that in cases like Plumhoff and Freland. On the other hand, Gordon’s reckless flight posed a materially higher risk to the public than the driver in Latits. Thus, stuck on this ‘hazy border[] between excessive and acceptable force,’ we cannot say that ‘existing precedent ... placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.’ Rivas-Villegas, 142 S. Ct. at 7–9 (citations omitted). In sum, the estate cannot point to a case that meets the requisite level of ‘specificity’ to clearly establish that it was unlawful for Bierenga to shoot Gordon in this factual scenario. . . . Thus, Bierenga is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Yatsko v. Graziolli, No. 20-3574, 2021 WL 5772527, at *9-11 (6th Cir. Dec. 6, 2021) (not reported) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“What is a police officer to do when a civilian punches him square in the face after the officer points a gun at him? May he shoot the civilian? Does it matter whether the officer started the fight? These are hard questions that we haven’t answered before. According to the Supreme Court’s unequivocal guidance, that means qualified immunity applies. Qualified immunity shields officials like Graziolli from civil liability unless the plaintiff can show: (1) The official violated a federal statutory or constitutional right, and (2) the violation was clearly established at the time of the offense. . . . Although Yatsko bears the burden of proving these two prongs, we must take the facts in the light most favorable to him. . . . According to Yatsko, Graziolli created the situation that ultimately resulted in Graziolli’s use of deadly force. But the Supreme Court recently emphasized that it’s an open question whether an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by ‘recklessly creating a situation that requires deadly force.’ City of Tahlequah v. Bond, No. 20-1668, --- S. Ct. ---, 2021 WL 4822664, at *2 (Oct. 18, 2021) (per curiam). And no one would suggest that an officer’s provocative behavior is a dispositive factor under the Court’s totality-of-the-factors test for excessive force. See, e.g., County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1546–47 (2017). In fact, in our circuit, we have limited the review of deadly force to the moments preceding the shooting. [citing cases] Luckily, when it is hard to determine whether the official violated a constitutional right, courts may start with the clearly established inquiry. . . . To show a violation was clearly established, the plaintiff must prove that ‘every reasonable official’ would have known that the particular conduct at issue was unlawful. . . . In the excessive-force context, the Supreme Court has made two points crystal clear: The plaintiff bears the burden, and the plaintiff must point to a case with near-identical facts that puts the official on notice of the violation. See Rivas-Villegas v. Cortesluna, No. 20-1539, --- S. Ct. ---, 2021 WL 4822662, at *2–3 (Oct. 18, 2021) (per curiam). In this way, qualified immunity ensures liability reaches only ‘the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . Yatsko doesn’t identify any case even hinting that Graziolli violated a clearly established right. Instead, Yatsko points to three sources: Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985)—which involved a police officer who shot a fleeing suspect—a slew of Ohio state-court cases, and readily distinguishable Sixth Circuit cases. . . . None of these moves the ball. . . . So how does the majority escape this conclusion? It turns the burden on its head: It suggests that Graziolli—rather than Yatsko—bears the burden of establishing qualified immunity. And it does so in two ways. First, it argues that Graziolli forfeited any argument that the Constitution permits an officer to use deadly force ‘to settle a fistfight in which he was involved.’ . . . But Graziolli did not have to make such an argument. Once Graziolli raised qualified immunity, Yatsko bore the burden of showing both that Graziolli’s conduct violated the Constitution and that the violation was clearly established. . . . Second, the majority declines to engage in the clearly established analysis because Graziolli disputes many facts. . . . I agree that we need not accept Graziolli’s version of events. But that doesn’t mean we can avoid the clearly established analysis altogether. That’s because, again, Yatsko bears the burden. Thus, we must ask whether Yatsko has shown that, under his account of the facts, Graziolli’s conduct violated a clearly established right. . . . And here, under Yatsko’s version of events—indeed under any version—Graziolli didn’t violate a clearly established right. As explained above, Yatsko has not identified any on-point case. Nor has the majority. Yet it denies qualified immunity anyway. In doing so, it sends this case to trial, even though the outcome is inevitable no matter what the jury finds. This approach defies the Supreme Court’s guidance on qualified immunity. The Court has made clear that the doctrine gives officers immunity from suit, not a ‘mere defense’ to liability. . . . Indeed, qualified immunity is meant to protect government officials from the burdens of litigation. . . . And it is ‘effectively lost’ if the case erroneously goes to trial. . . . That is why the denial of qualified immunity is immediately appealable in the first place. . . . It is also why the Supreme Court has urged lower courts to resolve qualified immunity ‘at the earliest possible stage in litigation.’ . . . And sometimes, as here, that means addressing the second prong of qualified immunity first. . . . But the majority overlooks this guidance. It also overlooks the Supreme Court’s unwavering pattern of reversing lower courts who deny qualified immunity without identifying a case with nearly identical facts. See, e.g., Rivas-Villegas, 2021 WL 4822662, at *3; Bond, 2021 WL 4822664, at *3; City of Escondido v. Emmons, 139 S. Ct. 500, 503–04 (2019) (per curiam); Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1153–54 (2018) (per curiam); Wesby, 138 S. Ct. at 591; White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551–52 (2017) (per curiam); City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. 600, 613–17 (2015); Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. 13, 17–18 (2014) (per curiam); Wood v. Moss, 572 U.S. 744, 759–60 (2014); Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U.S. 765, 780–81 (2014); Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. 13, 17–18 (2014) (per curiam); Stanton v. Sims, 571 U.S. 3, 10–11 (2013) (per curiam); Ryburn v. Huff, 565 U.S. 469, 474 (2012) (per curiam); Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741–42 (2011); Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 200–01 (2004) (per curiam). Was Graziolli’s conduct here laudable? No. But was it so ‘plainly incompetent’ that every reasonable officer would have known it was constitutionally forbidden? No again. Thus, qualified immunity shields him from liability on the federal claims. What’s more, Yatsko is not without recourse. As the majority points out, there are state-law remedies available. Such alternative routes to recovery are yet another reason why we should not torture our qualified-immunity jurisprudence by turning the burden on its head. I respectfully dissent in part.”)

Taylor v. City of Saginaw, 11 F.4th 483, 486-90 (6th Cir. 2021) (“The City of Saginaw routinely chalked car tires to enforce its parking regulations. In our prior opinion, we held that doing so is a search for Fourth Amendment purposes, and that ‘based on the pleadings stage of this litigation, ... two exceptions to the warrant requirement—the “community caretaking” exception, and the motor-vehicle exception—do not apply here.’. . . However, we left for another day whether the search could be justified by ‘some other exception’ to the warrant requirement. . . We consider one of those other exceptions today—specifically, whether suspicionless tire chalking constitutes a valid administrative search. Because we conclude that it does not, we reverse the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of the City. But because we conclude that the alleged unconstitutionality of suspicionless tire chalking was not clearly established, the City’s parking officer, defendant Tabitha Hoskins, is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As we held in Taylor I, ‘chalking is a search for Fourth Amendment purposes’ under the property-based Jones test. . . And we see no reason to depart from that conclusion, which was a logical extension of the Court’s holding in Jones that a physical trespass to a constitutionally protected area with the intent to obtain information is a search under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e hold that the administrative-search exception does not justify the City’s suspicionless chalking of car tires to enforce its parking regulations. We express no opinion on the remaining exceptions to the warrant requirement because we are ‘a court of review, not first view.’. . . [E]very reasonable parking officer would not understand from Jones that suspicionless chalking of car tires violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, Hoskins is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Wilson v. Gregory, 3 F.4th 844, 855-59 (6th Cir. 2021) (“We may pick which prong to consider first. . . Here, we opt to start with whether the asserted violation of Mr. Huelsman’s rights was clearly established at the time. . . . The Huelsmans assert that the state-created-danger exception itself defines the clearly established right at issue: the Due Process Clause limits affirmative state actions that violate rights, and ‘[i]f there was an “affirmative act by the state which either created or increased the risk” to the plaintiff ... and a sufficiently culpable state of mind ... then that rule has been violated.’. . . In return, the Deputies argue that ‘[t]he particularized law at issue here is whether a police officer can be found liable under the state created danger theory when they respond to a 911 call and the individual ultimately commits suicide.’. . . The Deputies’ conception is too vague, eliding many possible events between when an officer ‘respond[s] to a 911 call’ and when ‘the individual ultimately commits suicide.’ Instead, we formulate the ‘clearly established’ question here as follows: by the time of the September 19, 2015 events at issue, was the law clearly established that it was unconstitutional to take affirmative actions that created or increased the risk of a person’s suicide when the person was not in official custody? . . . What matters most at this stage of the qualified immunity inquiry is whether the link between the state-created-danger doctrine and fact patterns involving suicide by a person not in official custody was clearly established at the time of the events here. Our cases have considered suicide-related liability in the context of the state-created danger doctrine, and their application to this case raises questions, particularly about the conduct of Deputy Gregory. The Huelsmans question why suicide should be treated differently than any other harm that state action creates or makes more likely. But the fact remains that our cases have treated suicide differently. . . And we have not yet extended the state-created-danger exception to similar instances of suicide by someone not in official custody. If ‘[t]he “salient question” in determining if a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity is whether she had “fair warning” that her conduct was unconstitutional,’ . . . then we cannot say that Deputies Gregory and Walsh had sufficient warning of the possible unconstitutionality of their conduct. Under governing precedent, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, we need not reach the issue of whether any conduct by the Deputies violated Mr. Huelsman’s constitutional rights.”)

Cunningham v. Shelby County, Tennessee, 994 F.3d 761, 764-67 (6th Cir. 2021), cert. denied sub nom. Cunningham v. Paschal, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) (“ We will begin by considering the second prong, which asks whether on March 17, 2017, it was ‘clearly established’ that deputies Paschal and Wiggins’ resort to lethal force violated a Fourth Amendment right ‘of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . None of the three cases relied upon by the district court identifies situations where officers acting under circumstances similar to those faced by deputies Paschal and Wiggins were held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . None of them involved the ultimate victim calling the police to declare that she possessed a firearm and intended to use it against anyone who came to her residence. And in none of them was it undisputed that the victim of the police shooting was brandishing a firearm in the manner Lewellyn displayed in the video. Deputy Paschal said in his deposition that he felt threatened by her display of the gun as he perceived her beginning to turn in the deputies’ direction. The district court’s reliance on a stop action ‘screen shot’ notwithstanding . . . , Paschal’s perception is consistent with the video viewed in real time. . . . Because plaintiff cannot prevail on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we need not delve deeply into the district court’s conclusion with respect to the first prong: that material questions of fact precluded summary judgment in favor of deputies Paschal and Wiggins. Specifically, we are troubled by the district court’s use of ‘screen shots’ to analyze the dashcam videos. By relying on screen shots, a court would violate the teaching of Graham against judging the reasonableness of a particular use of force based upon 20/20 hindsight. While the district court acknowledged that it ‘spent much time pinpointing moments’ to help it to establish what occurred, it conceded that such moments ‘do not tell the full story’ in light of ‘how quickly the incident occurred.’ . . . We agree and therefore believe that the district court erred by including several screen shots in its opinion to support its conclusions. For example, directly below one screen shot, the court stated that ‘[b]ased on the video footage, the Court finds that a genuine dispute of material fact exists about whether Lewellyn pointed her gun in the deputies’ direction when she reached the driveway.’ . . . To the extent that the district court relied upon screen shots, as it apparently did here, to decide whether it was objectively reasonable for the officers to use lethal force, it erred. The deputies’ perspective did not include leisurely stop-action viewing of the real-time situation that they encountered. To rest a finding of reasonableness on a luxury that they did not enjoy is unsupported by any clearly established law and would constitute reversible error.”)

Bethel v. Jenkins, 988 F.3d 931, 945 (6th Cir. 2021) (“Because we find that there was no violation of Bethel’s First Amendment or procedural due process rights, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . And even if there was a violation of a constitutional right, Bethel cannot show that a right to receive books withheld pursuant to a ban of third-party orders from unapproved vendors was clearly established, especially given precedent upholding ‘publisher only’ policies, . . . and the process provided following the withholding of books.”)

Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 656-57 (6th Cir. 2020) (“Tlapanco claims that making a forensic mirror (i.e., copying) of his electronic devices, including his cell phone and laptops, after the trial court’s oral decision to return his property was an unlawful search and that then retaining the forensic mirrors after returning the physical devices and dismissal of the criminal prosecution is a continuing unlawful seizure. We first note that it is not mandatory to address the qualified immunity prongs sequentially; rather, discussion of the first prong will in some cases result ‘in a substantial expenditure of scarce judicial resources on difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case.’. We decline to address the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis and proceed directly to the clearly established prong in assessing this claim against McCabe as that prong is dispositive here. This circuit has not previously addressed the Fourth Amendment implications of mirroring a suspect’s electronic files prior to returning the physical device and maintaining the forensic mirror after dropping a criminal prosecution. Indeed, no circuit has assessed the constitutionality of this practice, let alone deemed it unlawful. The Second Circuit considered the issue in the context of a motion to suppress in United States v. Ganas (Ganas I), 755 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014), but ultimately, after en banc rehearing, the full court decided not to reach the issue of whether the retention of copied hard drive data was a Fourth Amendment violation warranting suppression of the documents because it found the agents acted in good faith reliance on the basis of a valid warrant. . . Similarly, in the context of a motion to suppress, the First Circuit considered whether the retention of all copied emails collected pursuant to a warrant during the pendency of a defendant’s criminal appeals warranted suppression and held that it was reasonable to interpret the warrant to permit retention of the data until the appeals were completed. United States v. Aboshady, 951 F.3d 1, 6–8 (1st Cir. 2020). The absence of any existing precedent on this issue is dispositive of Tlapanco’s unlawful search and seizure claims against McCabe. In the absence of any guiding precedent, a reasonable officer in McCabe’s position would not have known that he was committing a constitutional violation when he mirrored electronic devices seized pursuant to a search warrant and then retained the forensic mirrors after the charges had been dismissed and the devices returned to their owner. Therefore, we affirm the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to McCabe on these claims.”)

Gale v. O’Donohue, 824 F. App’x 304, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Donald, J., concurring) (“While I concur in the judgment, I write separately to address the constitutional claims Gale raises regarding Paramo’s refusal to immediately allow Gale to exit the patrol vehicle upon Gale’s request. Though the majority correctly notes that Gale failed to establish that Paramo's actions violated clearly established law, Gale's inability to identify a case specifically addressing the constitutionality of Paramo's actions is not due to his failure to research the issue, but rather due to a lack of case law. Declining to address the constitutionality of an officer's actions simply because there is no clearly established law rendering those actions unconstitutional prevents future plaintiffs in Gale's position from seeking redress for similarly unconstitutional behavior. Providing that analysis in this opinion is an important step in the development of qualified immunity law, and I believe declining to do so in this instance is a mistake. . . . This case presents a unique consideration—if consent to a ride is given at the outset, at what point is it unreasonable for an officer to continue detaining an individual in his vehicle once that consent is withdrawn? Although Defendants contend that 90 seconds is a 'reasonable amount of time' to keep Gale detained in the vehicle after he requested to leave, the duration of an officer's interference with an individual's freedom of movement is not determinative as to whether a seizure has occurred, United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 113 n.5 (1984), and 'an officer must have a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity to even briefly seize an individual,' Crawford v. Geiger, 656 F. App'x 190, 204 (6th Cir. 2016). As Paramo repeatedly assured Gale during the ride, he did not suspect Gale of criminal activity. Instead, Paramo explained that he was continuing to hold Gale in the vehicle because Paramo was concerned for Gale's safety due to Gale's intoxication, Gale's unfamiliarity with the area, and Paramo's concern that Gale would cause civil unrest while wandering a neighborhood late at night unable to contact anyone or find his way home. These reasons amount to, at best, a tenuous justification for continuing to seize an individual upon his revocation of consent. While it was reasonable for Paramo to continue driving until he was able to pull over and allow Gale to safely exit the vehicle, Paramo's speculation that Gale's presence in the residential area may cause civil unrest did not justify his continued captivity inside the vehicle. Thus, I believe Paramo's detainment of Gale in the vehicle despite Gale's unequivocal, repeated requests that he be permitted to exit ultimately amounted to an unconstitutional seizure. However, due to the lack of clearly established law rendering those 90 seconds an unlawful seizure in light of Paramo's stated concerns for Gale's safety and Gale's initial consent to the ride, Paramo is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Beck v. Hamblen County, Tennessee, 969 F.3d 592, 598-604 (6th Cir. 2020) (“To overcome a qualified-immunity defense, § 1983 plaintiffs must show two things: that government officials violated a constitutional right and that the unconstitutionality of their conduct was clearly established when they acted. . . The Supreme Court has told us that we may address these two issues in the order we think best. . . In this case, we think it best to resolve the appeal on the ‘clearly established’ prong alone without deciding whether Sheriff Jarnagin violated Beck’s constitutional rights. . . Whether or not Jarnagin adequately attempted to remedy the problems at the jail within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, the unconstitutionality of his conduct was not ‘beyond debate’—as it must be to rebut his qualified-immunity defense. . . . [T]he fact pattern of the prior case must be ‘similar enough to have given “fair and clear warning to officers” about what the law requires.’ . . . The standard sets a high bar because it requires a plaintiff to identify with ‘a high “degree of specificity”’ the legal rule that a government official allegedly violated. . . The rule

‘must be “particularized” to the facts of the case.’ . . Given this requirement, the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly told courts ... not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.’ . . Such an abstract framing ‘avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’ . The Supreme Court has also told us how to decide if a plaintiff has identified a sufficiently specific legal rule: The plaintiff has identified a rule at too high a level of generality ‘if the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct “does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [the identified rule] was firmly established.”’ . . Sheriff Jarnagin is entitled to qualified immunity on Beck’s deliberate-indifference claim. We begin with the governing legal principles. In the context of inmate-on-inmate violence, the Supreme Court has held that ‘[a] prison official’s “deliberate indifference” to a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate violates the Eighth Amendment’ rights of convicted prisoners. . . To prove this type of deliberate-indifference claim, a prisoner first must establish an objective element: that the prisoner ‘is incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm.’ . The prisoner next must establish a subjective element: that the government official subjectively knew of this risk of harm. . . The prisoner must lastly show that the official failed to ‘respond[] reasonably to the risk.’ . . Courts are split over whether Kingsley’s holding for excessive-force claims should also modify the subjective element from Farmer that we have traditionally applied to pretrial detainees’ deliberate-indifference claims. . . We have yet to resolve this question. . . So Kingsley’s effect on Beck’s deliberate-indifference claim (if any) cannot qualify as ‘clearly established’ law under the qualified-immunity test. . . Indeed, Beck does not even cite Kingsley. We thus assume that Farmer’s rules still apply in this pretrial-detainee context. . . Even taking the facts in the light most favorable to Beck, we cannot find that the unconstitutionality of Sheriff Jarnagin’s conduct was ‘beyond debate’ under Farmer at the time of the assault on Beck. . . Beck has identified no evidence suggesting that Jarnagin had any personal knowledge of Beck’s specific situation. Jarnagin, for example, did not help choose the cell in which Beck was detained. Jarnagin also had not heard the warnings about placing Beck in a cell with Cisneros. . . And he did not know of any of Beck’s personal characteristics that might make him more susceptible to assault. . . Instead, Beck seeks to hold Jarnagin liable on a general theory that would apply just as much to any assault at the jail as it would to the assault on Beck. For the first deliberate-indifference element (a substantial risk of serious harm), Beck cites the reports by the Tennessee Corrections Institute describing the safety concerns at this overcrowded and understaffed jail. . . For the second deliberate-indifference element (knowledge of the risk), Beck notes that Jarnagin readily admits he knew of those general safety concerns. . . For the third deliberate-indifference element (unreasonably failing to reduce the risk), Beck argues that Jarnagin should have done more to reduce this general risk of violence. . . With regard to Farmer’s third element, however, Jarnagin did make some efforts ‘to abate’ this general risk of inmate-on-inmate violence. . . Starting from when he first became sheriff, he has repeatedly described the safety concerns to the Hamblen County Commissioners and stated his view that the commissioners should build a new jail. Jarnagin has also obtained increased funding, which has allowed him to hire more corrections officers. Not only that, the safety problems detailed by the Tennessee Corrections Institute largely fell outside Jarnagin’s control because he was unable to limit the number of inmates at the jail. Sheriff Jarnagin also did not have the power to allocate more taxpayer dollars to the safety problems—whether by building a new jail or by hiring more staff. Those budgetary decisions fell within the prerogative of the county commissioners. Under the qualified-immunity test, therefore, Beck must prove that it would have been ‘clear to a reasonable officer’ that Jarnagin’s responses to the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence were so inadequate that we can describe him as ‘plainly incompetent’ in thinking they satisfy constitutional standards. . . Beck has not made that showing. For starters, Farmer’s reasonableness test—like the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness test—does not itself provide ‘fair warning’ to Jarnagin that his responses to the risk of inmate-on-inmate violence were constitutionally inadequate. . . And Beck has ‘point[ed] to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case’ that would have ‘given “fair and clear warning to [Jarnagin]” about what the law requires’ in the situation in which he found himself: a resource-limited official who knew of general safety concerns arising from overcrowding and understaffing problems largely outside his control. . . Indeed, a pre-Farmer case found resource constraints relevant to defending against a deliberate-indifference claim. See Roberts v. City of Troy, 773 F.2d 720, 725 (6th Cir. 1985). . . . All told, neither the Supreme Court nor our court has issued a decision concluding that a government actor responded unreasonably to a known risk of harm when the actor took actions similar to the actions that Jarnagin took here. Under the Supreme Court’s precedent, therefore, Beck cannot overcome Jarnagin’s qualified-immunity defense. . . . Just as the general right to be free from excessive force often will not clearly establish whether an officer used excessive force on a given occasion, . . . so too the general right to be free from inmate violence will often not clearly establish whether an official reasonably responded to the risk of violence on a given occasion. That is the case here. The general right against inmate violence does not answer ‘the crucial question’ whether Jarnagin responded reasonably to the general safety risks. . . That is because ‘the unlawfulness of [Jarnagin’s response] “does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [a right against inmate violence] was firmly established”’ by Farmer. . . The district court next relied on an unpublished decision suggesting that ‘[a] case could be made as to the [constitutional] liability of a sheriff responsible for a jail where “inmate-on-inmate violence occurred regularly when the jail was overcrowded, as it was [when the incident in question occurred].”’. . But Fisher’s statement was pure dictum because we found the sheriff entitled to qualified immunity. . . In any event, Fisher did not clearly establish what such a ‘case’ for liability would require. . . The district court thus turned to two out-of-circuit decisions—Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756, 761–62 (10th Cir. 1999), and Hale, 50 F.3d at 1583–84. Yet ‘our sister circuits’ precedents are usually irrelevant to the “clearly established” inquiry.’ . . They can create a clearly established rule only in extraordinary situations. . . . Sheriff Jarnagin’s entitlement to qualified immunity does not leave Beck without any potential recourse for the assault that he claims to have suffered and the general safety concerns that he identified. After all, Beck also sued Hamblen County. He claims that individuals such as Sheriff Jarnagin and Chief Deputy Mize have repeatedly notified the county of the safety concerns at the jail, and that the county’s longstanding failure to address the problem shows an unconstitutional custom of deliberately disregarding inmate safety. . . The district court allowed that claim to proceed to trial, along with other state-law tort claims against Jarnagin. We do not express an opinion on the viability of these other claims. But because the law did not clearly establish the unreasonableness of Jarnagin’s responses to the general safety concerns that Beck alleges, Jarnagin is entitled to qualified immunity under §

Schulkers v. Kammer, 955 F.3d 520, 533-43 (6th Cir. 2020) (“Plaintiffs . . . argue that Kammer (acting at the behest of Campbell) violated their Fourth Amendment rights by seizing them from their public-school classrooms and interviewing them without reasonable suspicion, a warrant, or consent. In response, Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that social workers are bound by the Fourth Amendment when conducting in-school interviews pursuant to a child abuse investigation. They point out that neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever held that analogous conduct by a social worker violates the Fourth Amendment. For the reasons that follow, we find that Plaintiffs did not have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers investigating child abuse at the relevant time. This is because our precedent is unclear about the role of the Fourth Amendment in the specific factual circumstances alleged here, i.e., when social workers perform an in-school interview of a child pursuant to an abuse investigation. However, we also exercise our discretion to consider the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry and conclude that Defendants’ alleged conduct in this case was unconstitutional. . . We hold that, at a minimum, social workers investigating child abuse must have ‘some definite and articulable evidence giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that a child has been abused or is in imminent danger of abuse’ before seizing a child from his or her school classroom without a warrant and when no other exception to the warrant requirement applies. . . . The Supreme Court has never held that a social worker’s warrantless in-school interview of a child pursuant to a child abuse investigation violates the Fourth Amendment. In 2011, the Supreme Court granted certiorari on this issue but its opinion did not reach the merits of the issue due to mootness. [citing Camreta v. Greene] . . . In Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840 (6th Cir. 2015), we held that a child’s right to avoid warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers on suspicion of child abuse was not clearly established in 2011. . . . Because we granted qualified immunity to the social worker on the ground that the law was not clearly established, we did not reach the question of whether the social worker’s warrantless in-school interviews of the child were in fact unconstitutional. . . . Following Barber, this Court has not had another occasion to consider the constitutionality of in-school interviews like the one at issue here. Therefore, we can find no reason to depart from Barber’s holding that the law surrounding in-school interviews by social workers is not clearly established in this circuit. . . . Because we find that the district court should have granted summary judgment in favor of Defendants Kammer and Campbell on Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim, we do not need to decide whether their conduct was in fact unconstitutional. . . . However, after carefully considering the Supreme Court’s guidance on when a court of appeals should exercise its discretion to reach the underlying constitutional question in a qualified immunity case, we decide to reach that question now in order to ‘promote[] the development of constitutional precedent,’ . . .and ‘promote[] clarity in the legal standards for official conduct, to the benefit of both the officers and the general public[.]’ . . . For the reasons that follow, we hold that under Plaintiffs’ version of the facts, Kammer and Campbell violated the plaintiff children’s Fourth Amendment rights by seizing them from their classrooms without a warrant and without any reasonable suspicion of child abuse or neglect. . . . There is some disagreement in the circuits regarding whether the special needs exception applies to a social worker's in-school interview of a child pursuant to a child abuse investigation, and this Court has not yet spoken to the issue. As discussed above, in a decision that has since been vacated, the Ninth Circuit held that the Fourth Amendment's traditional probable cause standard applies to a social worker's seizure of a child from school pursuant to a child abuse investigation. . . . Other circuits have indicated that the lesser, modified reasonableness standard of New Jersey v. T.L.O. may govern a social worker's seizure of a child from a public school pursuant to an abuse investigation. . . . In the present case, we do not need to decide which Fourth Amendment standard governs a social worker's in-school interview of a child pursuant to an abuse investigation because Defendants' alleged conduct fails even the modified reasonableness standard of New Jersey v. T.L.O. . . . We hold that the Fourth Amendment governs a social worker's in-school interview of a child pursuant to a child abuse investigation, and thereby clarify our decision in Barber v. Miller At a minimum, a social worker must have reasonable suspicion of child abuse before conducting an in-school interview without a warrant or consent. Therefore, Defendants' conduct in this case, as alleged by Plaintiffs, was unconstitutional because it failed to satisfy even the lesser modified reasonableness standard of New Jersey v. T.L.O. . . . Having determined that Defendants are immune from suit on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims, we next consider whether Defendants Campbell, Kammer, and Kara are entitled to qualified immunity from suit on Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claims. For the reasons that follow, we find that they are not. . . . [W]e find that Defendants had fair notice that the Schulkers had a protected liberty interest in 'the companionship, care, custody and management of [their] children,' Lassiter, 452 U.S. at 27, 101 S.Ct. 2153, and in the right 'to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of [their] children' without arbitrary government interference, Troxel, 530 U.S. at 66, 120 S.Ct. 2054. And we find that these cases placed Defendants on fair notice that depriving Plaintiffs of this liberty interest without a compelling governmental interest would be unlawful. . . . After finding that the Schulkers have a clearly established liberty interest in the companionship and management of their children, we next consider whether that substantive right triggered protections of the procedural due process clause. Again, this Court and others have consistently held that it does. . . . Because Defendants had fair notice that the alleged conduct was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment, we must determine whether Plaintiffs have demonstrated a genuine dispute of material fact as to each Defendant's individual liability. . . . For the reasons that follow, we find that Plaintiffs have demonstrated a triable issue as to whether each Defendant's conduct in fact violated their substantive and procedural due process rights.")

J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 716-20 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Because we can answer the qualified immunity questions in any order, . . . we begin with the question of whether McMahan violated a constitutional right and then turn to whether that right was clearly established. . . . Under Bell, a pretrial detainee can demonstrate that he was subjected to unconstitutional punishment in either of two ways: (1) by showing 'an expressed intent to punish on the part of the detention facility officials,' or (2) by showing that a restriction or condition is not rationally related to a legitimate government objective or is excessive in relation to that purpose. Id. at 538–39, 99

S.Ct. 1861; see also Kingsley v. Hendrickson, — U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015). . . .The ‘expressed intent to punish’ prong proscribes an intent to punish for the alleged crime causing incarceration prior to an adjudication of guilt. . . It also prohibits officials from subjectively seeking to punish detainees simply because they are detainees, . . or on the basis of vengeful or other illegitimate interests[.]. . This prong does not, however, categorically prohibit discipline imposed by jail officials for infractions committed while in pretrial detention. . . Here, J.H. alleges that he was placed in solitary confinement in direct response to the November 17 disciplinary incident. This alleged action, without more, does not run afoul of the first prong of Bell. The relevant question is thus under Bell’s second prong: whether J.H.’s placement in segregation was ‘rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether [it] appear[s] excessive in relation to that purpose.’ . . In answering the first part of this question, we agree that McMahan has put forth a legitimate governmental purpose: ‘maintain[ing] safety and security in the facility.’ . . As the Supreme Court explained in Bell, ‘maintaining institutional security and preserving internal order and discipline are essential goals’ of a detention facility. . .Temporary placement of J.H. in solitary confinement, given his accused disciplinary infraction, appears rationally related to this purpose. Yet where McMahan’s argument falters is on the question of whether the discipline here was excessive. . . . In considering whether the discipline imposed on J.H. was excessive, we are mindful of J.H.’s age; his known mental health issues; and the duration and nature of his confinement. We weigh these factors against the disciplinary infraction of which J.H. was accused and the governmental purpose for which the discipline was imposed. When considering ‘the totality of [these] circumstances,’ we conclude that the discipline imposed was excessive relative to its purpose and thus violated J.H.’s Fourteenth Amendment rights as described in Bell. . . . As a 14-year-old, J.H. was uniquely vulnerable to the harmful effects of solitary confinement, and thus his placement in segregation was a particularly harsh form of discipline. Second, it was well-known to McMahan before placing J.H. in solitary confinement that J.H. had been diagnosed with and required treatment for PANDAS, which is associated with several psychiatric symptoms. . . . In sum, considering J.H.’s age, mental health, and the duration and nature of his confinement, we conclude that the punishment imposed on J.H. was excessive. When weighing the penalty imposed against his disciplinary infraction—in which he made verbal threats but did not physically injure another detainee—it is apparent that his punishment was disproportionate in light of the stated purpose of maintaining institutional security. . . Any momentary need to separate J.H. from the specific detainees whom he had threatened on November 17 does not justify the extended duration in which McMahan subjected J.H. to solitary confinement and completely isolated him from all contact with other juveniles. This discipline was excessive given the infraction that J.H. was accused of and the unique vulnerabilities he possessed—namely his age and mental health status. . . We therefore hold that, assuming J.H.’s allegations to be true, his Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights were violated when he was held in solitary confinement from November 17 to December 8, 2013. . . . The second question is whether the constitutional right in question was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .We cannot say that the right at issue was established with sufficient specificity as to hold it clearly established as of 2013, the time of these incidents. Many of the cases recognizing what a punishing experience placement in solitary confinement can be—especially for juveniles and those with mental health issues—have been issued after 2013. Thus, McMahan is entitled to qualified immunity, and we are obliged to affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment on this claim.”)

J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 724-28 (6th Cir. 2020) (Readler, J., concurring in part, and in the judgment) (“The public employees operating the Williamson County Juvenile Detention Center faced a dilemma. Responsible for the care of up to a dozen minors, those officials had under their supervision one minor, J.H., who, due to mental health concerns, was a threat to himself and others. To remedy the situation and protect the juvenile detainee population, the facility for a time housed J.H. away from other detainees, in a single cell. A state juvenile court judge approved that arrangement and ordered that it continue for an additional period to allow for further evaluation of J.H. I concur with much of the majority opinion, including its holding that the conduct of these public safety officials did not violate a clearly established constitutional right. But I respectfully disagree with the majority’s assessment that the conduct nonetheless ran afoul of substantive due process principles. In reaching that conclusion, the majority tailors its analysis to the unique facts before us: the multi-week confinement of a fourteen-year-old suffering from mental illness, one so severe that it is ‘associated with several psychiatric symptoms.’ A heartbreaking episode, we all agree, for both J.H. and his family. As this case aptly demonstrates, however, ensuring safety in a detention facility sometimes requires difficult decisions. . . . [A] safety-based restriction must simply be legitimate and not excessive for that purpose. . . . Where legitimate factors support the restriction, the ‘limited scope of the judicial inquiry’ is at an end. . . . As well intentioned as is the majority, we nonetheless may not substitute our judgment for that of detention officials.”)

Greve v. Bass, 805 F. App’x 336, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (“[A]n after-the-fact determination, be it by warrant or indictment, does not pro forma ‘serve to validate a prior arrest.’ . . . Moreover, ‘[p]olice officers cannot, in good faith, rely on a judicial determination of probable cause when that determination was premised on an officer’s own material misrepresentations to the court.’ . . . Greve contends that Bass made material misrepresentations in the warrant affidavits and, regardless of whether Greve is correct, as we have already explained, Greve has created a genuine dispute of material fact on this question, which settles this in his favor. . . . Officer Bass argues that the Supreme Court’s recent opinion in District of Columbia v. Wesby, 583 U.S. ___, 138 S.Ct. 577 (2018), overcomes our precedent or has changed the law. We disagree. The Court in Wesby considered whether police officers responding to partying and loud music at a vacant home had probable cause to arrest the partygoers, and whether the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they ‘reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.’ . . . Officer Bass emphasizes the Court’s conclusion that ‘[t]here was no controlling case holding that a bona fide belief of a right to enter defeats probable cause, that officers cannot infer a suspect’s guilty state of mind based on his conduct alone, or that officers must accept a suspect’s innocent explanation at face value.’ . . . But Wesby is distinguishable. The Wesby Court stressed that ‘probable cause deals with probabilities and depends on the totality of the circumstances,’ . . . and pointed to the partygoers’ ‘reaction to the officers’ as a basis for the officers to believe that the partygoers knew that they had no right to be in the house. . . . Greve, on the other hand, did nothing overtly incriminating. Quite the contrary, Greve waited near the Club’s entrance, in the frigid cold, for the police—or someone, anyone—who could let him inside. And, despite the sounding security alarm and the broken door handle—Greve enthusiastically approached and greeted Officer Bass’s arrival, introducing himself and making every effort to explain what had occurred. But even if our facts were on point, Wesby emphasized that we review the officer’s probable cause determination under the totality of the circumstances, not by looking at each fact ‘standing alone.’. . . Officer Bass would have us consider only his preferred facts and disregard the rest, ignoring the totality of the other circumstances, such as Greve’s proffered explanation and attempt to cooperate. But Wesby emphatically rejected such an approach A correct application of Wesby neither affects our precedent nor changes our analysis. Officer Bass’s refusal to consider the totality of facts and circumstances undermines his contention that he had probable cause to arrest Greve. That refusal, if proven at trial, would be a violation of Greve’s rights.”)

Greve v. Bass, 805 F. App’x 336, ____ (6th Cir. 2020) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“To summarize, a police officer responding to a burglary alarm at two o’clock in the morning arrived at a dark, desolate, locked nightclub to find a single person there, who admitted to attempting to enter the premises. In my view, these facts satisfy the low bar of reasonable suspicion. . . . Ultimately, the majority faults Officer Bass for not crediting the story of a visibly intoxicated man wrapped in a tablecloth over the club manager who had no apparent reason to lie. Bulut (and his employer, via respondeat superior liability) should be made to answer for his false statements and his decision to press charges against a man he knew had reason to be at the club. The police officer who relied on those statements in good faith should not.”)

Hernandez v. Boles, 949 F.3d 251, 259-62 (6th Cir. 2020) (“The Hernandez-Plaintiffs do not dispute that the Troopers had probable cause to have the dog climb into and sniff the interior of the car following its initial alert. So, the question is whether the Troopers still had probable cause to conduct a manual search after the dog failed to alert to the interior of the car. The Hernandez-Plaintiffs argue that the Troopers did not have probable cause for this search because, ‘under the specific circumstances, the dog alert was unreliable.’ They rely on Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237, 133 S.Ct. 1050, 185 L.Ed.2d 61 (2013), for the proposition that ‘officers must look at the specific circumstances before concluding that an alert has produced probable cause.’ The Troopers respond that, even if there was a constitutional violation, they are entitled to qualified immunity because the Hernandez-Plaintiffs cannot ‘point to any legal authority clearly establishing that a drug dog’s alert to the outside but not the inside of a vehicle would not provide probable cause to search the vehicle.’ The Hernandez-Plaintiffs’ reliance on Harris does not resolve the legal issue. Harris stands for the proposition that a dog’s alert only provides probable cause if, in ‘controlled settings,’ the ‘dog performs reliably in detecting drugs.’. . . The Harris Court did leave open the possibility that even if ‘a dog is generally reliable, circumstances surrounding a particular alert may undermine the case for probable cause—if, say, the officer cued the dog (consciously or not), or if the team was working under unfamiliar conditions.’. . . But that does not cover the situation here—where a dog first alerts to the exterior and then fails to alert to the interior of a car. The un rebutted evidence in the record showed that the drug dog was generally reliable: The dog's handler testified at his deposition that 'she didn't do any false alerts since the time I got her till the time I retired.' And there is nothing in the record to suggest that the circumstances of the dog's alert undermine the dog's reliability in the sense meant by Harris. The issue is governed by our precedent addressing the circumstances under which probable cause dissipates. We held almost thirty years ago that the information acquired from a fruitless search can dissipate probable cause and render a subsequent search illegal. See United States v. Bowling, 900 F.2d 926, 932 (6th Cir. 1990). . . . Other circuits to treat the issue agree that the acquisition of new information can dissipate the probable cause for a search. . . . We have also held that the failure of a drug-sniffing dog to alert to a car dispels suspicion. See United States v. Davis, 430 F.3d 345, 356 (6th Cir. 2005) (holding that officers no longer had reasonable suspicion to detain a motorist on suspicion of drug possession and call a second drug-sniffing dog to the scene after the first drug-sniffing dog did not alert). . . . Based on Bowling and Davis, a reasonable jury could find in the Hernandez-Plaintiffs' favor. Bowling stands for the proposition that a fruitless search negates probable cause, if it is sufficiently thorough, and Davis stands for the proposition that a drug dog's failure to alert dispels suspicion. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Hernandez-Plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, a jury could determine that the dog's fruitless sniffing of the car interior was sufficiently thorough to dissipate the probable cause to search provided by its initial alert. . . . We therefore turn to whether the law was clearly established. . . . Here, neither Bowling nor Davis is specific enough to clearly establish that the manual car search was illegal. Bowling establishes that a fruitless search can dissipate probable cause and Davis establishes that the failure of a drug-sniffing dog to alert at all dispels suspicion. But neither governs the unusual circumstances of this case, where the same drug-sniffing dog first alerted and then failed to alert to a car during a subsequent search. At the time of these events, a reasonable officer would not have been on notice that the drug dog's failure to alert again to the interior of the car was the kind of new information that dissipated the probable cause provided by its initial alert to the car exterior. This case provides such notice for future searches. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the Troopers.")

Baker v. City of Trenton, 936 F.3d 523, 533-35 (6th Cir. 2019) ("The following facts are not in dispute: at the moment of the shooting, 1) Kyle was holding a lawnmower blade, 2) he was advancing or had partially advanced up the stairs towards Driscoll, 3) Driscoll had fallen backwards onto the stairs or a landing on the stairs, and was in a seated or semi-seated position, and 4) Kyle actually struck Driscoll with the lawnmower blade. We must judge these facts 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, rather than with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.' . . . Given these facts, no reasonable jury could find for Ms. Baker. . . . Given that Driscoll had probable cause to believe that Kyle would cause death or serious injury, his use of deadly force was not a violation of Kyle's rights under the Fourth Amendment. Once again, finding no constitutional violation on this count, we need not examine the second prong of qualified immunity.") Kanuszewski v. Michigan Department of Health and Human Services, 927 F.3d 396, 414-16, 423 (6th Cir. 2019) (“[E]ach of Plaintiffs’ damages claims asserting a violation of the children’s substantive due process rights when their blood was collected and screened for diseases is barred by either state sovereign immunity or qualified immunity. Because these claims cannot be maintained against Defendants in light of the relevant immunities, we may affirm the district court without deciding whether the children’s substantive due process rights were actually violated. . . Nevertheless, under Pearson v. Callahan, we may still ‘exercise [our] sound discretion’ to decide whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . In this instance, we will exercise our discretion to decide the underlying constitutional question because this is an issue for which ‘a discussion of why the relevant facts do not violate clearly established law make[s] it apparent that in fact the relevant facts do not make out a constitutional violation at all.’. . The qualified immunity discussion above makes it apparent that the children’s substantive due process rights were not violated. As mentioned, the Supreme Court has strongly suggested that minor children lack a liberty interest in directing their own medical care. . . Instead, children must instead rely on parents or legal guardians to do so until they reach the age of competency. . . Accordingly, any substantive due process rights related to directing the medical care of children devolve upon the parents or legal guardians of the children, rather than the children themselves. The children’s substantive due process rights were therefore not violated when Defendants drew their blood and screened it for diseases, providing another basis upon which to affirm the district court’s dismissal of these claims. . . . It is true that the Supreme Court has recognized parents’ substantive due process right to ‘direct the upbringing and education of children under their control.’. . However, this precedent does not address the issue of parents’ right to control their children’s medical care and therefore does not demonstrate that Defendants violated Plaintiffs’ clearly established rights. . . The case law in this area is sparse; Plaintiffs cite only a Tenth Circuit case and a district court case touching on the issue of parents’ right to control their children’s medical care. . . . State sovereign immunity and qualified immunity therefore bar all of Plaintiffs’ claims alleging that the parents’ substantive due process rights were violated when Defendants drew their children’s blood and screened it for diseases, and we decline to exercise our discretion to reach the merits of this issue. . . In contrast with the issue discussed in the previous section, we cannot easily say, based on the allegations in the Complaint, that the drawing of the children’s blood ‘do[es] not make out a constitutional violation’ of the parents’ substantive due process right to direct their children’s medical care. . . The Supreme Court has suggested that we might decline to exercise our jurisdiction in situations where ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’. . Because this issue presents such a situation, we decline to rule on whether the initial drawing of blood violated the parents’ substantive due process rights, and we affirm the district court’s judgment solely on qualified immunity and state sovereign immunity grounds. . . .Because our case law does not clearly establish in what circumstances the Fourth Amendment bars a medical professional from drawing a child’s blood for medical purposes without parental notification or consent—or whether such medical purposes must be the primary or predominant motivation for the drawing of blood—the individual Defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .We have noted that there remains a substantial question as to whether drawing blood for the purpose of screening for diseases constitutes a search or seizure for Fourth Amendment purposes. See Herring v. Sliowski, 712 F.3d 275, 281 (6th Cir. 2013) (“This court has not taken a definitive position on whether the Fourth Amendment’s protection against unreasonable searches applies to the provision of medical services by government-employed health-care professionals.”). In Herring, we held that a defendant nurse was entitled to qualified immunity because ‘existing precedents did not give [her] fair warning that her medical assessments were subject to the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness requirement, and accordingly the right at issue was not clearly established.’. . We did not reach the merits of the plaintiff’s claim in Herring, nor have we settled this issue in any decision after Herring. . . Thus, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiffs have failed to show that ‘the right at issue was clearly established at the time of [their] alleged misconduct.’. . State sovereign immunity and qualified immunity therefore bar all of Plaintiffs’ claims alleging that the children’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Defendants drew their blood and screened it for diseases, and we decline to exercise our discretion to decide whether these actions actually violated the children’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . As our discussion of this issue in Herring demonstrates, this is a situation where ‘it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’. . We therefore decline to rule on whether the initial drawing of blood violated the children’s Fourth Amendment rights, and we affirm the district court solely on qualified immunity and state sovereign immunity grounds.”)

Burgess v. Bowers, 773 F. App’x 238, ____ (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 475 (2019) (“[A]lthough Payton clearly establishes that a suspect has the right to be free from a warrantless arrest in his own home, it is substantially less clear when a suspect is entitled to claim the same right in someone else’s home. Like the suspects in both Bucker and Love, William was not living in his mother’s home when the officers arrested him. Nor is there any indication that he was an overnight guest. At the same time, William was certainly more than a casual visitor since he used Grace’s basement as a workshop. But it is difficult to know what significance to assign that fact. . . . In any event, we need not decide today whether—under these circumstances—the officers violated William’s constitutional rights when they arrested him in his mother’s home without a warrant (but with probable cause). . . It will suffice to say that, after extensive research, we cannot say that such a right, if it exists, was clearly established. . . We therefore reverse the district court’s judgment and hold that all of the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on William’s unreasonable seizure claim.”)

Burgess v. Bowers, 773 F. App’x 238, ____ (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 475 (2019) (“As we have noted recently, the law in our circuit with respect to excessive-force claims involving canine seizures is clearly established at the outer bounds. On one end of the spectrum, ‘we have held that officers cannot “use[] an inadequately trained canine, without warning, to apprehend two suspects who were not fleeing.”’. . On the other end, ‘we have upheld the use of a well-trained canine to apprehend a fleeing suspect in a dark and unfamiliar location.’. . ‘These cases and their progeny establish guidance on the ends of the spectrum, but the middle ground between the two proves much hazier.’. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to William, his case is much closer to Robinette than it is to Campbell. Like Robinette, ‘this is a case where an officer was forced to explore an enclosed unfamiliar area in which he knew a man was hiding.’ . . . When Ballard arrived on the scene, William was hiding in the crawlspace of the basement underneath a plastic vapor barrier and refusing to come out. Very little light entered the openings of the crawlspace, so the area was difficult to see and none of the officers could be sure that William was not armed. And because the crawlspace height was as low as eighteen inches in some areas, an officer would need to enter it on his hands and knees, making it difficult for an officer to defend himself. Moreover, the officers repeatedly warned William to surrender or else they would deploy the canine. . . . Still, William refused to comply. So, as in Robinette, the officers were confronted with a man who ‘knew the building was surrounded, who had been warned ... that a dog would be used, and who gave every indication of unwillingness to surrender.’ . . . Of course, the facts here do not match those in Robinette perfectly. There, the plaintiff was suspected of committing a felony. Here, in contrast, William was only suspected of committing a misdemeanor. William also makes much of the fact that the canine continued to bite him while he was being tased by the officers and after he was subdued. Still, William never rebutted the officers’ declarations that they tased him because he was attempting to fight off the dog. And during his criminal trial, William admitted that Ballard called off the canine once the other officers finished tasing him and he was subdued. We have said that ‘a delay in calling off [a] dog may rise to the level of an unreasonable seizure.’ . . . But it does not follow that Ballard violated William’s clearly established constitutional rights just because there was some unspecified delay between the time he called off the dog and the time the canine reacted to his command. As the Supreme Court has exhorted, to be clearly established, it is not enough that a legal principle ‘is suggested by then-existing precedent. The precedent must be clear enough that every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.’ . . . The district court found that, ‘[e]ven adopting plaintiffs’ version of the facts,’ William’s case fell ‘somewhere in the middle of the spectrum’ of our canine-seizure precedents where the law is not clearly established. . . . Nevertheless, it denied Ballard qualified immunity because it was ‘not left with a clear picture of the facts in this case.’ . . . This was error. Having concluded that William failed to show that Ballard violated clearly established law, the court should have granted him qualified immunity. . . . To the extent the court was uncertain about whether his conduct violated clearly established law even after adopting William’s version of the facts, that was not a proper basis for denying qualified immunity. ‘Once a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the plaintiff bears the burden to show that qualified immunity is inappropriate.’ . . . Accordingly, we hold that Ballard is entitled to qualified immunity.”) Burgess v. Bowers, 773 F. App’x 238, ____ (6th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 475 (2019) (“As with our canine-seizure cases, the law with respect to our taser cases is clearly established in two opposing situations: ‘It is clearly established in this Circuit that the use of a taser on a non-resistant suspect constitutes excessive force. Conversely, it is also clearly established that tasing a suspect who actively resists arrest and refuses to be handcuffed does not violate the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Based on the undisputed facts, we find that William’s case is closer to the latter situation than the former. William never disputed Stanley and Thompson’s explanation that they tased him because he was stomping the canine's head with his right foot in the crawlspace. Nor did he dispute the officers' statements indicating that they tased him for only as long as was necessary to subdue him. The district court denied Stanley and Thompson qualified immunity because, in its view, 'it is not clear whether William Burgess was resisting arrest or whether the taser was deployed after the dog' began biting William. . . The court reasoned that if the tasers were deployed after the canine began biting William, then he 'had a right to be free from' being tased. . . But in so reasoning, the court created a false dichotomy. The court never explained why William could not have been resisting arrest while the dog was trying to apprehend him. And we find no basis in the record or the law to suggest that the two are mutually exclusive. See McQueen v. Johnson, 506 F. App'x 909, 916 (11th Cir. 2013) (finding that the simultaneous use of tasers and a canine were a reasonable use of force against a noncompliant suspect). As such, we find that Stanley and Thompson are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Maye v. Klee, 915 F.3d 1076, 1082-87 (6th Cir. 2019) ("While courts may take these steps in any order, 'we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed.' . . . Accordingly, we address whether Maye sufficiently alleged a deprivation of his constitutional rights before proceeding to whether those rights were clearly established. . . . Assuming that Taylor prevented Maye from participating in Eid without any justification, penological or otherwise, such a decision would be unreasonable under Turner and would therefore violate the Free Exercise Clause. . . . This circuit has not yet resolved the question of whether we look to Turner to determine whether prison officials violated the Establishment Clause or simply treat the policy as 'suspect' and 'apply strict scrutiny in adjudging its constitutionality.' . . . But accepting Maye's factual allegations as true, the Establishment Clause violation in this case is clear under either standard. . . . Construed in the light most favorable to Maye, the record reveals no justification for treating the Nation of Islam celebration of Eid any differently than the Al-Islam celebration of Eid. . . Thus, Maye's claim that Serafin admitted to affording preferential treatment to those who adhere to Al-Islam is sufficient to allege an Establishment Clause violation. . . . As established above, a facially discriminatory distinction between the Nation of Islam and Al-Islam sects would burden Maye's fundamental rights to religious freedom under the First Amendment, which means an invidious purpose may be inferred. Therefore, Maye has sufficiently alleged that Serafin deprived him of his right to equal protection under the law. . . . So only one question remains: in light of the precedent in Dowdy-El, would a reasonable official have known his actions violated clearly established constitutional rights? The answer must be yes, especially when considered through the lens of either 'defendant's position' in this case. . . The district court's injunctive order in Dowdy-El applied to these defendants and concerned virtually identical facts to the scenario that Serafin and Taylor were facing. Put succinctly, reasonable officials follow court orders. Additionally, in response to the Dowdy-El litigation, MDOC disseminated an amended policy specifically placing its employees on notice that Eid al-Fitr was a protected holy day for Muslim inmates. . . Any reasonable MDOC employee would have known that preventing a Muslim inmate from attending Eid violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments.”) Baxter v. Bracey, 751 F. App’x 869, ____ (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 1862 (2020) (“Relevant here, courts can jump straight to the second question and dispose of a claim without deciding whether the officer’s conduct violated the plaintiff’s constitutional rights. . . So long as the alleged violation has not been clearly established, the officers receive qualified immunity and the suit can be dismissed. . . Proceeding in this way is often appropriate in ‘cases in which the briefing of constitutional questions is woefully inadequate.’ See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 239 (2009). By resolving the issue on only the second prong, courts avoid ‘expending scarce judicial resources to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will have no effect on the outcome of the case.’. That is the case here. The officers are entitled to qualified immunity because Harris’s use of the canine to apprehend Baxter did not violate clearly established law. And because this court does not have the benefit of sophisticated adversarial briefing from both parties, we decline to resolve the more complex constitutional question raised by Baxter’s claim. . . We have demarcated the outer bounds of excessive-force cases involving canine seizures with some degree of clarity. In this circuit, for example, we have held that officers cannot ‘use[] an inadequately trained canine, without warning, to apprehend two suspects who were not fleeing.’ Campbell v. City of Springboro, 700 F.3d 779, 789 (6th Cir. 2013). But just as clearly, we have upheld the use of a well-trained canine to apprehend a fleeing suspect in a dark and unfamiliar location. See Robinette v. Barnes, 854 F.2d 909, 913–14 (6th Cir. 1988). These cases and their progeny establish guidance on the ends of the spectrum, but the middle ground between the two proves much hazier. Baxter’s case looks closer to Robinette than Campbell—but the fit is not perfect. Like the suspect in Robinette, Baxter fled the police after committing a serious crime and hid in an unfamiliar location. He also ignored multiple warnings that a canine would be released, choosing to remain silent as he hid. And unlike Campbell, the canine here was properly trained with no apparent history of bad behavior. All of these facts would lead a reasonable officer to believe that the use of a canine to apprehend Baxter did not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Militating against those facts is Baxter’s claim that he surrendered by raising his hands in the air before Harris released the dog. This conduct might show that he did not pose the kind of safety threat justifying a forceful arrest. . . But Baxter does not point us to any case law suggesting that raising his hands, on its own, is enough to put Harris on notice that a canine apprehension was unlawful in these circumstances. That’s because even with Baxter’s hands raised, Harris faced a suspect hiding in an unfamiliar location after fleeing from the police who posed an unknown safety risk—all factors the Campbell court identified as significant to determining whether the seizure was lawful. . . Given all of this, we cannot say that Harris violated any clearly established law in using Iwo to apprehend Baxter. Even if Baxter raised his hands, the other circumstances—undisputed in the record below—weigh against a finding that ‘every reasonable official would understand that what [Harris did] is unlawful.’. . For that reason, Harris is entitled to qualified immunity. We reach this decision mindful of the fact that, on appeal from the prior motion to dismiss, we held that Baxter’s right to be free from excessive force was clearly established under Campbell. But there, we looked only at the facts as pleaded in the complaint. Baxter alleged that he surrendered before the arrest, and his complaint was understandably silent about whether Iwo had proper training or the time that elapsed before Harris released the dog. The facts revealed during discovery add much-needed color to this case—as they often do. We now know that Iwo was well-trained, that Harris released him within only a few seconds after entering the basement, and that Baxter fled the scene, hid in the basement, was warned twice, and still never communicated with the officers before being apprehended. All of these facts change the analysis and move the well-pleaded claims to a place where we cannot say that ‘every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful.’”) Brennan v. Dawson, 752 F. App’x 276, ___ & n.4 (6th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 108 (2020) (“We recently held in Morgan v. Fairfield County that the area five to seven feet from the home was part of the home’s curtilage. . . The dashcam video from Dawson’s police cruiser shows that he was within an arm’s length from the home when he set out from the porch and began to walk the perimeter. And he remained within the curtilage as he continued around the home’s perimeter, knocking on and peering into windows. Although the Fourth Amendment protects the curtilage, a police officer has an implied license to enter the curtilage and attempt to speak with the home’s occupant, even if the officer lacks a search warrant. . . And until recently, this Court, along with the Third, Fourth, and Eighth Circuits, also recognized special circumstances under which a police officer may travel to the rear of the home without a warrant during a ‘knock and talk’ investigation. . . In Hardesty, we explained that when ‘circumstances indicate that someone is home’ and an officer’s knocking at the front door goes unanswered, ‘an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.’ . . We held that an officer may travel to the rear of the home when he has reason to believe that the occupant is inside but does not answer the front door. . . Hardesty, however, set no specific limitation on how long officers could continue to search for an occupant who they suspected was inside but was not answering the door. . . This Court recently considered the viability of Hardesty and a related decision, Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App’x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), and concluded that Jardines and Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018), overruled both decisions. . . Morgan, 903 F.3d at 565. (“[I]n light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law”). Thus, law enforcement officials cannot linger on the curtilage once they have exhausted the ‘implied invitation extended to all guests,’ even if they suspect that someone is inside. . . Here, even if Hardesty were still good law, Dawson arguably violated the Constitution. . . But regardless, that conclusion is now clear in light of Morgan. To be sure, Dawson’s initial approach to the home and knocking on the front door to administer the breath test fell squarely under his implied license as established in Jardines. But Dawson overextended his stay. . . A police officer simply cannot linger and continue to search the curtilage of the home if his knocking at the front door goes unanswered. . . Those actions are inconsistent with the limits of the implied license recognized in Jardines. As a result, we hold that Dawson exceeded his implied license when he repeatedly entered and traveled through Brennan’s curtilage over the course of ninety minutes and thus violated Brennan’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . Brennan argues that Jardines clearly establishes that Dawson could not linger on the curtilage for more than ninety minutes after no one inside the home answered the door. True, recent developments in our case law—including our decision to overturn Hardesty and Turk because of Jardines—leave no room for doubt that Dawson violated Brennan’s constitutional rights. But the law was not so clear on February 21, 2015, which is the reference point we must use to determine whether Dawson is entitled to qualified immunity. To be sure, this is a close question. As discussed above, the court’s decision in Nyilas, which found conduct like Dawson’s unconstitutional, determined that the law was not clearly established largely because the Supreme Court did not decide Jardines before the conduct in that case. . . . But the Court decided Jardines before Dawson’s conduct, so that impediment to Brennan’s recovery does not exist here. That said, we still hold that the law was not clearly established. When this Court affirmed the trial court’s decision in Nyilas, we offered no view on the constitutionality of the conduct or the continuing viability of Hardesty and Turk. Instead, we held that the officers ‘did not violate clearly established rules of constitutional law in these circumstances.’ . . . Thus, as of the time of the actions here, we cannot conclude that Dawson’s conduct was clearly prohibited. . . . Because we continued to treat Hardesty as good law when the violation occurred, it was not clearly established that Jardines governed situations in which a police officer had reason to believe that someone was inside the home. . . . Thus, we hold that the law governing the scope of Dawson’s implied license was not clearly established at the time of the violation and affirm the district court’s decision to grant Dawson qualified immunity on Brennan’s unlawful search claim. . . . The dissent takes issue with our conclusion regarding whether the law was clearly established at the time of the incident. To be sure, the dissent makes some good points and we agree with many of them. Our conclusion, however, is compelled by the standard for determining whether a legal principle is clearly established as set forth in Wesby. Here, the constitutionality of the officer’s conduct was not ‘beyond debate.’”).

Brennan v. Dawson, 752 F. App’x 276, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) (Moore, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 108 (2020) (“The majority today determines that although Brennan’s constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment were violated, Officer Dawson is entitled to qualified immunity because Brennan’s specific right to be free from a prolonged intrusion into his curtilage was not clearly established in February 2015. Although I emphatically concur that Brennan’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Dawson walked into and around Brennan’s curtilage for over an hour in an attempt to give him a breathalyzer test, I dissent from the majority’s affirmance because I believe Brennan’s constitutional rights were clearly established at the time of Dawson’s conduct. The majority poses the question at issue in this case as ‘whether it was clearly established that a police officer could not repeatedly enter and pass through the curtilage of the home when: (1) the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that someone was inside of the home; and (2) the officer was trying to conduct a probation check.’ . . . However, in answering this inquiry, the majority primarily relies on Hardesty v. Hamburg Twp., 461 F.3d 646 (6th Cir. 2006), and Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App’x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), cases that the majority agrees did not consider the central question at issue here: the ability of an officer to linger in the curtilage of an individual’s home while conducting a knock and talk. . . . Rather than address Dawson’s conduct specifically, these cases merely held that, when an officer has a reasonable belief that a suspect is at home and has not answered the door, the officer is permitted to ‘take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage,’ including walking to the back door. . . . Neither Hardesty nor Turk suggests that an officer can linger in a suspect’s curtilage for over an hour when investigating a suspect who the officer has reason to believe is home. At most, Hardesty and Turk put officers on notice that they are permitted to take ‘reasonable steps’ to talk with the individual in the house. . . . Under this correctly limited view of Hardesty and Turk, it is clear that the Supreme Court’s decision in Florida v. Jardines (decided in 2013) prohibited Dawson’s conduct in February 2015. . . . Specifically, Jardines necessarily limited the temporal parameters of the ‘reasonable steps’ discussed in Hardesty and Turk. . . . [E]ven if Dawson understood that, under Hardesty and Turk, he was permitted to go to the back of Brennan’s home, he was still allowed to take only the ‘reasonable steps’ necessary to confront Brennan, namely knocking, briefly waiting, and then leaving. Stated differently, just because our Circuit may not have explicitly stated until 2018 that the primary holding in Hardesty and Turk (if an officer has a reasonable belief that a suspect is at home and is refusing to answer the door, the officer is permitted to enter the curtilage and knock on the back door) could not survive Jardines or Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018), does not mean that the validity of the secondary holding (officers may take only “reasonable steps”) was similarly reliant on our decision in Morgan. . . . I conclude that in February 2015 the law was clearly established that, even if an officer was arguably permitted to walk to the back of a suspect’s house to knock on their door, this authority was temporally limited by Jardines to a reasonably brief period and certainly could not be extended to over ninety minutes. Put simply, no reasonable officer could have concluded that, following the Supreme Court’s decision in 2013 in Jardines, Dawson engaged in actions that ‘any private citizen might do’ while conducting a knock and talk for a probationer. . . . Consequently, Dawson is not entitled to qualified immunity, and I respectfully dissent.”)

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 560-65 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Government officials sued in their individual capacities for constitutional violations are free from liability for civil damages unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was clearly established at the time that it was violated. . . . Courts can address these two elements in any order. . . . And although this decision turns on the second element—whether the law was clearly established—we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed. For that reason, we address both parts of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Because the area surrounding Morgan’s and Graf’s house was curtilage, and curtilage is treated as part of the home for Fourth Amendment purposes, the officers’ entry onto the curtilage could be justified only by a warrant or one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is undisputed that the SCRAP unit had no warrant. As for exceptions to the warrant requirement, the county argues that the entry was justified for three reasons. None, however, is convincing. . . . The SCRAP unit was concerned about general drug activity at Morgan’s and Graf’s house. But the Fourth Amendment prohibited them from entering the property: they had no warrant, no exigent circumstances, and no other exception to the warrant requirement. A “knock and talk” by police was permitted ‘precisely because that is “no more than any private citizen might do.”’ . . . Thus, the officers' right to enter the property like any other visitor comes with the same limits of that 'traditional invitation': 'typically ... approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.' . . . Certainly, '[a] visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use.' . . . Neither can the police. By doing so here, the SCRAP unit violated Morgan's and Graf's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In determining the contours of the right, there is a tension between defining the right at too high a level of generality, on one hand, and too granular a level, on the other. There does not need to be 'a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.' . . . In all, the most important question in the inquiry is whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . . For centuries, the common law has protected the curtilage of the house. . . . And the Supreme Court long has held that the curtilage is 'considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.' . . . That means that the police can enter the curtilage on the same terms that they can enter the rest of the home—no more, no less. . . . Under those long-settled principles, warrantless searches 'are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.' . . . A reasonable officer thus would understand that without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, entering the curtilage violates a clearly established right. Despite these long-settled standards, one case from this circuit, although incorrectly decided, requires that we grant qualified immunity. That case, Turk v. Comerford, decided within a month of the "knock and talk" in this case, found that the law was not clearly settled against a factual background that was, in every material way, the same as here. . . . Central to Turk's analysis was our published decision in Hardesty, in which we held that '[if] knocking at the front door is unsuccessful in spite of indications that someone is in or around the house, an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.' . . . Hardesty's extension of the knock-and-talk doctrine was, by its terms, limited to particular circumstances. . . . And if our case law ended there, qualified immunity here would be improper. But in Turk, this court read Hardesty more broadly and reasoned that because some limited intrusions of the curtilage were allowed, it was not clearly established that surrounding a house for a "knock and talk" was in the category of unacceptable intrusions. . . . Although Hardesty and Turk are outliers, Morgan and Graf cannot overcome their burden of showing that the law was clearly established at the time of the search in this case. In those two cases, this court should have reaffirmed long-settled Fourth Amendment principles. . . . But it did not. And although unpublished cases do not upset the state of the law, in rare instances they can show that members of this court, during the same time period, facing the exact same question, did not think the law to be clearly established. And '[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.' . . . For that reason we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the officers in their individual capacities. Nevertheless, in light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law. . . . Jardines and, more recently, Collins made clear that, outside of the same implied invitation extended to all guests, if the government wants to enter one's curtilage it needs to secure a warrant or to satisfy one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . Our acknowledgment that those cases are no longer good law does not affect the qualified-immunity analysis here, which looks to the law at the time of the challenged action. . . But it does put officers on notice that principles of Jardines and Collins—and not Hardesty or Turk—should guide their actions going forward.”)

Carter v. Carter, 728 F. App’x 419, 423 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Carter argues that the force employed by the officer was per se excessive because the earlier strikes had incapacitated him such that he was, at most, passively resisting. . . Our precedents do suggest that officers cannot continue using force against an arrestee who has stopped resisting. . . . But the fact remains that the officers had the lawful authority to arrest Carter, and it is undisputed that his ‘balling up’ left the officers unable to place him in handcuffs because they did not have access to his hands. . . . That means that some amount of force was necessary to secure Carter’s arrest, and the officer’s decision to apply three to four modest punches, rather than, for instance, rolling him over or pulling his arms out from under him, was not constitutionally infirm. . . In other words, that the officers’ use of force may not have been the only—let alone the best—method to secure Carter’s arrest does not make it a constitutionally impermissible method of so doing. . . . Here the governmental interest in securing Carter’s arrest outweighs Carter’s interest in being free from a few modest strikes. Thus, even though we assume that Carter was merely passively resisting, the officer’s use of force was still an objectively reasonable way to arrest him.”)

Stanfield v. City of Lima, 727 F. App’x 841, 850-51 (6th Cir. 2018) (“Stanfield has cited no case that ‘clearly establishes’ that it is a violation of the law for an officer to ‘take down’ a suspect who is resisting arrest. Therefore, despite the fact that Montgomery violated Stanfield’s constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim because Stanfield has not demonstrated that it was ‘clearly established’ that such conduct was in violation of the law. . . .Garman fractured Stanfield’s rib in an attempt to secure his hands, even as Montgomery was on top of Stanfield’s back and Stanfield was saying that he was incapable of removing his arms from under himself. Of the cases Stanfield cited to demonstrate that the unlawfulness of this conduct was ‘clearly established,’ the most analogous is Lawler. . . . However, Lawler is readily distinguishable from the instant case because its reasoning was premised on the fact that the force took place ‘in a booking room—beyond the point at which any threat could have been reasonably perceived.’ . . . As such, a reasonable officer would not be on notice that the reasoning in Lawler applied to situations outside of a booking room or in a context in which ‘any threat could have been reasonably perceived.’ Therefore, despite the fact that Garman violated Stanfield’s constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . .Rode struck Stanfield in the leg twice with his flashlight in an attempt to coerce Stanfield into giving Montgomery and Garman his hands. Of the cases Stanfield cited to demonstrate that the unlawfulness of this conduct was ‘clearly established,’ the most analogous is Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356 (6th Cir. 2009). . . .The important distinction here is the fact that the plaintiff in Harris was clearly subdued when the second officer administered the peroneal strikes. In the instant case, from the perspective of Rode, there was still a struggle taking place between the other two officers and Stanfield. As such, a reasonable officer would not be on notice that the reasoning in Harris applied to situations where a suspect was not subdued, or at least in handcuffs, like the plaintiff in Harris. Therefore, despite the fact that Rode violated Stanfield's constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Stanfield v. City of Lima, 727 F. App'x 841, 852 (6th Cir. 2018) (Kethledge, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("For substantially the reasons stated by the majority, I agree that the officers here did not violate Stanfield's clearly established rights. But I would also hold that they did not violate Stanfield's rights at all. The officers received a report that Stanfield was driving an RV around the city while intoxicated. They approached Stanfield in an unlit vacant lot, late at night. Stanfield was in fact obviously drunk and kept putting his hand in his jeans pocket, despite the officers' repeated demands that he not do that. Finally they told him they were going to pat him down. At that point—as the cruiser's dash-cam video makes clear—Stanfield resisted the pat-down search and then forcibly resisted the officers' attempts to handcuff him. In my view that resistance continued well past the point that the majority thinks it stopped, since for another 20 seconds the video shows Stanfield rolling around on the ground and trying to keep the officers from controlling his arms. And it was only after the fourth or fifth time that the officers told Stanfield to "put your hands behind your back," that he responded, "I can't." Under these circumstances, the officers' force—a knee to the ribs and a flashlight strike on his calf—was as calibrated as it needed to be. See, e.g., Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641 (6th Cir. 2015).")

Thornton v. City of Columbus, 727 F. App'x 829, 836-38 (6th Cir. 2018) ("In this circuit, the court 'consider[s] the officer's reasonableness under the circumstances he faced at the time he decided to use force.' . . . Accordingly, '[w]e do not scrutinize whether it was reasonable for the officer to create the circumstances.' . . . '[A] different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.' . . . Lastly, in the use-of-force context, 'once the relevant set of facts is determined and all reasonable inferences are drawn in favor of the plaintiffs, to the extent supported by the record, the question of whether the [officers'] actions were objectively unreasonable is "a pure question of law.'" . . . But 'if there is some evidence – more than a mere scintilla of evidence – that [the appellant], through his conduct, judged from the perspective of reasonable officers on the scene, did not give the officers probable cause to believe that he posed a serious threat of harm, a genuine fact dispute is created.' . . . Analyzing the use of force from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we hold that the use of deadly force by the Officers in this instance was justified even though there are issues of fact concerning (1) whether Thornton saw or heard the Officers, (2) whether Thornton had time to comply with the Officer's orders, and (3) whether Thomson was actually facing or walking towards the Officers. This is so, because what is undisputed is that the Officers responded to a report of a man threatening others with a gun while standing on a front porch of a residence. Further, as the Officers exited their police cruiser, several individuals informed the officers that Thornton had run inside the residence while possessing a firearm. After moving to the porch, the Officers witnessed Thornton emerge from the back of the house with a shotgun, in addition to seeing an armchair in the living room with an assault rifle resting on it. Moreover, there is no dispute that the Officers could have reasonably believed that the man with the shotgun was the same man who had, only moments earlier, threatened another person with a gun. Officers repeatedly ordered Thornton to drop the shotgun but Thornton failed to comply with the Officers' orders, and whether Thornton actually heard the commands has no bearing on this court's analysis. . . And though Thornton never pointed the shotgun at the Officers before they fired their weapons, the undisputed manner in which Thornton was holding the weapon combined with the short distance between himself and the Officers further leads this court to conclude that any reasonable police officer would believe that Thornton posed a serious physical threat that required a use of deadly force. Additionally, because the deadly threat posed by Thornton could have easily and quickly transformed into deadly action in a split-second, any reasonable police officer in the Officer's position would know that a decision to use deadly force would need to be rendered quickly. The Officers . . . did not have to wait for Thornton to raise his weapon before employing deadly force. . . Relatedly, this court has recently rejected a 'categorical rule that force can only be reasonable if a suspect raises his gun.' . Accordingly, for the aforementioned reasons, the Officers did not violate Thornton's constitutional rights by utilizing force on him on April 21, 2013. Therefore, the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the Officers on Thornton's excessive force claim because the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity. We need not discuss the 'clearly established' prong of qualified immunity analysis on this claim either, because Thornton has failed to establish the violation of a constitutional right.")

Peffer v. Stephens, 880 F.3d 256, 264-66 (6th Cir. 2018) ("We need not address. . . whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation on the grounds that the affidavit did not properly allege that a crime had been committed. That is because we are convinced that there was no clearly established constitutional violation and therefore qualified immunity applies. Although we generally determine whether a constitutional violation occurred before we determine whether qualified immunity applies, we need not follow this order of inquiry when determining whether a constitutional violation occurred would require interpreting unsettled state law. . . It is an open question of Michigan law whether a private citizen writing under the guise of a police officer to request an official to perform an official action constitutes an attempt to 'compel' action under § 750.215(1)(c). . . We therefore cannot say that it is clear that Michigan courts would find that a request from a (purported) police officer to assist minor children in (imagined) danger is not, as a matter of Michigan law, an attempt to 'compel' the recipient of the request to act. Accordingly, we hold that even if the sending of the letters were not criminal under Mich. Comp. Laws §§ 750.122(3)(a) and 750.215(1)(c), the law on this point was not clearly established. Sergeant Stephens thus would be protected by qualified immunity from liability for executing an otherwise valid search warrant seeking evidence that Mr. Peffer violated those criminal statutes.")

Thomas v. City of Eastpointe, 715 F. App'x 458, 460-62 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Before asking whether Officer Barr violated Thomas's rights, it makes sense to ask whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. The reason is simple: If Thomas's rights were not clearly established, Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity. So we turn first to a 'particularized' determination based on the facts at hand. . . May an officer tase someone he reasonably perceives to be ignoring his commands and walking away? This circuit—and several others—have drawn the line at the suspect’s ‘active resistance.’ . . . If the suspect was actively resisting, use of a taser to subdue him was reasonable. If not, then tasing was unreasonable. . . . We have found active resistance where a suspect physically struggles with police, threatens or disobeys officers, or refuses to be handcuffed. . . . But when a suspect is ‘compliant or ha[s] stopped resisting,’ the law is clearly established that using a taser constitutes excessive force. . . . This case does not fit cleanly into either camp. Officer Barr arrived on the scene to respond to emergency calls reporting an assault. He did not personally witness any violence. But following the officers’ arrival, Thomas walked away from the officers without saying a word. The dash-cam video shows that Officers Barr and Menzer told Thomas to ‘get on the ground’ several times prior to tasing him. . . . And though Thomas claims he never heard the officers’ commands, we review only those facts that were ‘knowable’ to Officer Barr at the time of the incident. . . . Officer Barr’s commands were clearly audible, and Thomas’s purported inability to hear him was not knowable. So we are left to consider whether, under the circumstances as they appeared to Officer Barr, clearly established law made it unreasonable for him to tase Thomas. . . . On the one hand, Thomas was not verbally or physically aggressive toward Officer Barr. So this case differs from the active-resistance cases in which we found that tasing the suspect did not constitute excessive force. On the other hand, the facts indicate that Thomas was not entirely compliant either: He appeared to ignore police commands to get on the ground and instead walked away. Thomas’s actions thus fall somewhere in the middle. We do not stand in this gray area alone. In Cockrell, this court concluded that nonviolent flight does not fit neatly into the active-resistance camp. . . . One might argue that Thomas was not fleeing—he was simply walking in a direction opposite the officers. But a suspect who ignores an officer’s order to stop and walks away can ‘reasonably’ be considered to flee, even where the suspect does not run. . . . So even though Thomas’s actions may not look like flight in the ordinary sense of the word, they constitute ‘flight’ under the law. And this court has not yet addressed whether tasing a suspect in flight violates his clearly established rights. . . . This unresolved question provides all the answer that we need: How the law applied to this set of facts was not ‘beyond debate’ in May 2013. . . . Thomas argues that Officer Barr should have warned him prior to deploying the taser. But however prudent it may have been for Officer Barr to warn Thomas, no clearly established law required him to do so. . . . And in the absence of clearly established law, Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The law is not clearly established that an officer cannot tase a suspect who refuses to comply with a police officer’s commands and walks away. We cannot say then that ‘every “reasonable official would have understood”’ that tasing Thomas under these circumstances would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.”)

Smith v. City of Wyoming, 821 F.3d 697, 714 (6th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e have found no cases holding that preventing the closure of the door to a home to briefly extend a consensual interview violates the Constitution. Smith cites no case law that clearly establishes this proposition. Surveying the opinions of our sister circuits, we have found only one—loosely—analogous case. . . . We disagree that existing Supreme Court precedent clearly establishes the law on this question. The relevant cases deal with intrusions that were unauthorized ab initio, not those that prolong an otherwise consensual encounter. . . And while an ‘occupant ... may refuse to answer questions at any time’ during a knock-and-talk, . . . Officer Riggs did not persist in questioning Smith after she attempted to close the door. Further, the facts of the Tenth Circuit case are starkly different from those here. In Dalcour, an officer kept her foot in the doorway of a home despite the occupant repeatedly attempting to slam the door shut, long enough for reinforcements to arrive. . . Here, by contrast, Smith’s own deposition testimony shows that the entire encounter was consensual until Officer Riggs ‘put his foot in the door,’ causing Smith to ‘pause[] briefly,’ before Riggs removed his foot and allowed the door to close. Hence, we need not decide whether a police officer briefly prolonging a consensual ‘knock and talk’ by placing a foot in a doorway offends the Fourth Amendment. It is sufficient to hold that, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Smith, Officer Riggs did not violate clearly established law, and he therefore was protected by qualified immunity. Appellee was entitled to summary judgment on this claim.”)

Goode v. Berlanga, 646 F. App’x 427, 430-31 (6th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e define the question this case presents as whether at the time of the incident it was clearly established that the Eighth Amendment forbids a prison guard, who had observed a prisoner sleeping in his bunk only minutes earlier, from delaying five to seven minutes in checking on that prisoner after being asked by other inmates to attend to the prisoner because he appeared to be seriously ill. Because neither Supreme Court precedent, our precedents, nor those of our sister circuits would have put every reasonable officer on notice that Berlanga’s conduct violated the Eighth Amendment in April 2011, we hold that Berlanga is entitled to qualified immunity even if he did act with deliberate indifference to Goode’s serious medical condition. We need not decide the separate ‘deliberate indifference’ question.”).

Peatross v. City of Memphis, 818 F.3d 233, 240-47 (6th Cir. 2016) (“Courts have discretion to decide which prong of the analysis to address first, Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236, and the plaintiff ‘bear[s] the burden of showing that a clearly established right has been violated and that the official’s conduct caused that violation,’ Essex v. Cty. of Livingston, 518 F. App’x 351, 357 (6th Cir.2013). For the purposes of this appeal, we find it appropriate to first address whether Armstrong’s conduct violated Vanterpool’s constitutional rights. . . . Although Officers Dunaway and McMillen shot Vanterpool, the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable in his individual capacity under a claim of supervisory liability. It is important to note at the outset that a § 1983 individual-capacity claim differs from a § 1983 official-capacity claim. . . . [fn. 3 Since Iqbal, the circuits have grappled with the precise contours of § 1983 supervisory liability, and while the claim of supervisory liability has not been altogether eliminated, the requirements for sustaining such a claim vary by circuit]. . . . We have long held that supervisory liability requires some ‘active unconstitutional behavior’ on the part of the supervisor. . . However, ‘active’ behavior does not mean ‘active’ in the sense that the supervisor must have physically put his hands on the injured party or even physically been present at the time of the constitutional violation. . . . ‘[A] supervisory official’s failure to supervise, control or train the offending individual is not actionable unless the supervisor either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.’ . . We have interpreted this standard to mean that ‘at a minimum,’ the plaintiff must show that the defendant ‘at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.’ . . . As part of this inquiry, this court also considers whether there is a causal connection between the defendant’s wrongful conduct and the violation alleged. . . . A close reading of § 1983 affirms this point. The statute states that every person acting under color of law who ‘subjects, or causes [a person] to be subjected’ to deprivation of constitutional rights ‘shall be liable to the party injured[.]’ 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added). Accordingly, where an official’s execution of his or her job function causes injury to the plaintiff, the official may be liable under the supervisory-liability theory. . . . In the instant case, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong violated Vanterpool’s constitutional rights because: (1) the facts plausibly allege that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job function; . . . and (2) the facts plausibly allege that there is a causal connection between Armstrong’s ‘acts and omissions’ and Vanterpool’s death[.] . . . Taken as true, these facts and the inferences drawn therefrom . . . support the plausible inference that in the execution of his job functions, Armstrong at least knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of Officers Dunaway and McMillen. . . . For the foregoing reasons, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong ‘at a minimum, knowingly acquiesced’ in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job functions. . . . [fn. 6 To be clear, we do not suggest that every time an MPD officer violates the constitutional rights of a citizen, Armstrong can be held liable for the conduct in his individual capacity. Qualified immunity is a fact-intensive analysis and will, therefore, turn on the particular circumstances of each case. Here, the Complaint sufficiently pleads that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced to the conduct that proximately caused the injury alleged, and we have long held that this behavior is enough.]. . . . [T]he Complaint here alleges that Armstrong essentially allowed the officers to ‘do whatever they want, whenever they want, to whomever they want, irrespective of the United States Constitution.’ It alleges that Armstrong was involved at least in part in creating and enforcing all department policies; that he did not punish officer misconduct, including the use of excessive force; that he failed to take action in the face of the growing use of excessive force by officers and admonishment from the Mayor on the issue; and that he ‘rubber stamped’ officer misconduct. . . . Armstrong’s alleged conduct of ‘rubber stamping’ the behavior of officers who shot and killed individuals with increasing frequency ‘could be reasonably expected to give rise to just the sort of injuries that occurred’—Vanterpool’s unfortunate death. . . . Accordingly, the Complaint sufficiently pled a causal connection between Armstrong’s acts and omissions and Vanterpool’s death. . . . We next examine whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. As an initial matter, Armstrong argues that the Estate failed to allege a clearly established right because the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable under a theory of supervisory liability, and Vanterpool did not have a constitutional right to additional police training. Armstrong’s argument evinces a misunderstanding of this prong of the qualified immunity analysis. The Estate need not show that Vanterpool had a constitutional right to additional training or adequate supervision from Armstrong; it need only show that the right that Officers McMillen and Dunaway violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Armstrong admits that Vanterpool’s ‘Fourth Amendment rights are clearly established insofar as the alleged misconduct of Officer’s Dunaway and McMillen are concerned.’ . . . Based on Armstrong’s concession, which is consistent with this court’s precedent, see Smith v. Cupp, 430

F.3d 766, 774 (6th Cir.2005), the right is clearly established. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to the Estate and accepting the facts and drawing all reasonable inferences from those facts in favor of the Estate, the Complaint ‘adequately alleges the commission of acts that violated clearly established law.’ . . . In discussing what is now known as § 1983 in the late 1800s, Congressman Hoar of Massachusetts summed up the need for a ‘duty of protection’:

[For example,] [i]f every sheriff in South Carolina refuses to [hold persons accountable for wrongs allegedly committed against] a colored man and those sheriffs are kept in office year after year by the people of South Carolina, and no verdict against them for their failure of duty can be obtained before a South Carolina jury, the State of South Carolina, through the class of officers who are [tasked with affording] the equal protection of the laws ... has denied that protection.

The words of Congressman Hoar capture the essence of the issue before the Court today, well over a century later. This fact is both ironic and disappointing. There is no doubt that several cities in this nation today are in a state of crisis regarding civilian and police relations. Here, we have allegations that a government official with supervisory responsibility ratified the conduct of officers who shoot first and make judgments later, evincing a brazen disregard for human life. Ratification of such conduct is abhorrent. It not only flouts accountability, but it undermines the integrity of our justice system. Where internal investigations repeatedly yield only ‘rubber stamps’ of approval for unconstitutional conduct, it sends the message that human beings are not being killed by accident—they are being killed by design. The law simply does not allow government officials to use qualified immunity to escape liability for such wrongs. At this stage of the proceedings, it is not known whether the Estate will be able to sustain these allegations, but it is clear that the facts alleged in the Complaint set forth a plausible claim of supervisory liability. The sufficiency of the complaint requires rejection of Armstrong's claim of qualified immunity at the dismissal stage. Importantly, the law does not impose too heavy a burden on the litigant at this early stage of the proceedings. It would be a perversion of justice to allow a person who might be crippled by officials acting under color of state law to then be crippled by the courts during the infancy of his or her case.”)

Pennington v. Terry, 644 F. App'x 533, 544-47 (6th Cir. 2016) (“The issue thus becomes whether Pennington had a clearly established right as of March 2, 2012 not to be tased when, on the one hand, he did not threaten the officers, was not resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee, but on the other hand, was attempting to destroy evidence, disobeying police orders to spit out the pills, and potentially putting himself at risk of harm. As the district court observed, Sixth Circuit precedent clearly establishes that using a Taser on a non-resistant, non-threatening person violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . The district court, however, identified two governmental interests making the use of a Taser constitutional in this case: (1) prevention of a potential drug overdose, and (2) preservation of evidence. While we reserve judgment on the constitutional question, an examination of controlling and persuasive case law demonstrates that it was not clearly established as of March 2, 2012 that using a Taser in furtherance of these two legitimate governmental interests violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . No Sixth Circuit case or lower court case within the Sixth Circuit . . . has addressed the specific balance between a subdued, non-threatening individual’s right not to be tased and the governmental interest in preventing a potential drug overdose. One lower, out-of-circuit case has ruled, on facts similar to this case, that multiple applications of a Taser to force a suspect to spit out a bag of cocaine was a reasonable use of force to thwart a potentially fatal overdose. . . . Several lower courts and at least one state supreme court have also upheld law enforcement's use of force, including Tasers and mace, to prevent the destruction of evidence. . . . Other courts have found use of a Taser to prevent destruction of evidence objectively unreasonable, particularly where the facts featured multiple tasings or where the destruction of evidence was unlikely. . . . But as of March 2012, no Sixth Circuit cases, and only one unpublished district court case within the Sixth Circuit, had addressed whether any measure of force was objectively reasonable to preserve evidence in the process of being destroyed. The case at hand implicates both of these legitimate governmental interests: preventing a potential drug overdose and preserving evidence. . . . The dearth of Sixth Circuit precedent and case law in general addressing—much less condemning—the use of force to prevent a drug overdose or to preserve evidence would not put a reasonable officer on notice that discharging a Taser to accomplish these goals violated constitutional rights. Without deciding the underlying constitutional issue of whether tasing Pennington constituted excessive force, we hold that it was not clearly established as of March 2, 2012 that tasing an arrestee attempting to swallow illegally possessed drugs constituted excessive force. Because we cannot say every reasonable official would have known it was excessive force to tase an individual attempting to destroy evidence and potentially endangering him or herself in the process, Sergeant Harris and Officer Long would be entitled to qualified immunity even if there were a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Sergeant Harris tased Pennington.”)

Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 844-48 (6th Cir. 2015) (“In Pearson, the Supreme Court detailed a range of circumstances in which courts should address only the clearly established prong. . . . Several of those circumstances apply here. First, ‘it is plain’ that the constitutional right that Barber seeks to enforce is not clearly established but it is ‘far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . Second, because the question of qualified immunity arose at the pleading stage, ‘the parties have provided very few facts to define and limit any [constitutional] holding.’ . . . Third, Barber’s briefing on the constitutional question lacks clarity and detail, posing a risk that we will decide the issue incorrectly. . . . We therefore confine our inquiry to the clearly established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . We find that J.B.’s Fourth Amendment right to avoid warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers on suspicion of child abuse not to have been clearly established in January 2011, when Miller interviewed J.B. . . . Andrews and Kovacik instruct that, by 2008, social workers entering a home without a warrant violated no clearly established rights, but those removing a child from a home without a warrant did. Inasmuch as both decisions turned on the greater constitutional concerns surrounding government intrusion into a citizen’s home, . . . they offer Barber little support in arguing that the in-school interviews violated J.B.’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In the end, Barber falls short of demonstrating that J.B.’s Fourth Amendment rights in the context of warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers on suspicion of child abuse were clearly established in our circuit at the time of the interviews. Given the lack of guidance in this area, we are hard pressed to say that a ‘reasonable social worker, facing the situation in the instant case, would have known that [his] conduct violated clearly established law.’ . . . Accordingly, Miller enjoys qualified immunity from these Fourth Amendment claims. . . . Barber points to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case law clearly establishing J.B.’s right to avoid removal from school under the circumstances here. And his reliance on Kovacac again proves unhelpful. The social workers there effectuated a warrantless removal of the children from their home. . . . In contrast, Miller obtained a court order before removing J.B. from school. Barber’s general assertions that ‘the Fourth Amendment was violated as to J.B. when he was seized pursuant to the order’ that he claims ‘was based on false statements and otherwise lacked probable cause’ invoke no clearly established right.”)

Ondo v. City of Cleveland, 795 F.3d 597, 608-10 (6th Cir. 2015) (“First, Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the state action of which they complain burdens a fundamental right. When the Supreme Court held that state laws against sodomy violate the Due Process Clause, it did so using the language of rational-basis review, rather than any form of heightened scrutiny. See Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 574–78 (2003). The Court did not hold that the Constitution includes a fundamental right to homosexual conduct. Whether the Court’s recent decision in Obergefell v. Hodges, 135 S.Ct. 2584 (2015), recasts engaging in homosexual acts as a fundamental right is irrelevant, because the decision by the police relevant here does not impair Plaintiffs’ ability to engage in such conduct. Nor can Plaintiffs establish that homosexuals are a suspect or quasi-suspect class. The Court has never held that homosexuals satisfy the criteria for such classification. . . . The Court has further explained that the rationale underlying these factors is that heightened scrutiny may be justified if a group requires ‘extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process.’ . . . The Supreme Court has not recognized any new constitutionally protected classes in over four decades, and instead has repeatedly declined to do so. Moreover, the Court has never defined a suspect or quasi-suspect class on anything other than a trait that is definitively ascertainable at the moment of birth, such as race or biological gender. In Obergefell, the Court was explicitly asked by the petitioners and various amici to declare that homosexuals are a specially protected class, and thus that government actions that disfavor homosexuals are subject to heightened scrutiny. . . . But the Court held only that the Equal Protection Clause was violated because the challenged statutes interfered with the fundamental right to marry, not that homosexuals enjoy special protections under the Equal Protection Clause. . . . We have always applied rational-basis review to state actions involving sexual orientation. . . . Under the law-of-the-circuit doctrine, an issue decided by a panel of this court can be reconsidered only by the full court sitting en banc, or if there has been a supervening decision by the Supreme Court. . . . Plaintiffs have not offered any argument as to why heightened scrutiny should apply to state actions involving homosexuals, and indeed failed even to explore the relevant cases. And as we have already explained, Obergefell did not abrogate those prior cases. We therefore have no basis for reviewing Plaintiffs’ equal-protection claim on any basis more stringent than rational-basis review. Applying the rational-basis test here, viewing the admitted evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and drawing all inferences in their favor, we hold that a police officer’s decision to keep Plaintiffs in their boxer shorts does not violate the Constitution. Plaintiffs have not shown that our precedents recognize as an equal-protection violation the decision to keep suspects in their current state of dress—including boxer shorts—so long as the person is attired such that his appearance is not obscene and the police officer provides an explanation that satisfies the rational-basis test. Sergeant Galmarini’s explanation here of concern for officers’ safety—whether subjectively true or not—is presumed valid and rationally related to a legitimate public interest. Therefore Plaintiffs’ grievance regarding being kept in their boxer shorts until the police could issue them jumpsuits, even if motivated in part by sentiments regarding homosexual behavior, still does not violate the Constitution.”)

Pollard v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 780 F.3d 395, 402-04 (6th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 217 (2015) (“Because we conclude Bynum’s constitutional rights were not violated, we reach only step one of the analysis. . . .Ultimately, her claim fails because she assumes Bynum was shot to prevent his escape. But as the officers explain in affidavits and deposition testimony, their concern was not that Bynum would escape. To the contrary, the officers knew Bynum would not escape, given his injuries and the damage to the Cadillac. . . . They shot because, after Bynum repeatedly made a shooting gesture, they thought he had a gun and considered him a threat. . . .Here, the totality of the circumstances clearly gave the officers probable cause to believe Bynum threatened their safety. The officers knew from police radio that Bynum was wanted on serious rape charges and was potentially armed, and they were told he had a concealed-carry permit. That Bynum was actually unarmed and did not have a permit is beside the point; what matters is the reasonableness of the officers’ belief as they ‘did not and could not have known’ otherwise. . . .Because the undisputed record shows the officers had probable cause for believing that Bynum posed a threat of serious harm, the use of deadly force was constitutionally permissible. Accordingly, we reverse the district court’s denial of qualified immunity.”)

Occupy Nashville v. Haslam, 769 F.3d 434, 441-46 (6th Cir. 2014) (“[W]e agree with the State Officials that the claimed right must be defined as one of indefinite occupation of a public park, and that, even if the Protesters had a First Amendment right to occupy the Plaza indefinitely, that right certainly was not, and is not, clearly established. . . .To avoid potentially ‘difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case,’ . . . and being mindful of the unusual circumstances under which we preside [All of the judges of the Sixth Circuit have recused themselves in this appeal], . . . we will focus on Saucier’s second step—whether the alleged constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the Use Policy’s adoption. . . .The State Officials here define the right claimed by the Protesters as a ‘24-hour occupation’ of the public square, which they argue is not a ‘right’ at all. . . .The Protesters, by contrast, argue that the constitutional right at issue is not a right to ‘occupy’ the Plaza, but a ‘clearly established First Amendment right to be present on the Plaza to air their grievances against the government.’ . . .The more specific and accurate framing of the issue is the one provided by the State Officials. . . .It was neither ‘plainly incompetent’ . . . nor was it ‘beyond debate’ . . . to read Clark as permitting a curfew and to take steps to implement that policy. Then and now, the Supreme Court’s analysis can be read that way. The Clark Court’s ‘serious[] doubt’ about the kind of right claimed here is the antithesis of being ‘clearly established.’ The few precedents available are generally contrary to the existence of the ‘right’ at issue. . . .In light of the sanitation problems, the violent assaults, the damage to state property, and the generally unsafe and deteriorating conditions, the State Officials were not objectively unreasonable in believing that they could promptly adopt a 10:00 p.m. curfew that would allow them to clean the Plaza and ensure the safety of the public in general and the Protesters in particular. The State Officials are thus entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. Our qualified immunity conclusion also necessarily extends to the Protesters' claims that their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated. Again, the most that can be said for the Protesters' argument is that it is unclear whether they had a right to indefinitely occupy the Plaza for their demonstration. It is therefore also unclear that the law forbade their arrest and that they had any liberty interest that could be infringed by an alleged failure to provide adequate procedural protections.")

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 621, 622 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To the extent the failure to disclose this evidence can be attributed to appellees, as it must be, . . . their alleged misfeasance was in failing to inform the prosecutor of Brady material in their possession before the prosecutor made the disclosure. On this score, appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. Whatever rights appellants had to receive exculpatory evidence prior to entering their pleas was not clearly established. The Supreme Court recently stated that 'the contours of a right are sufficiently clear [where] every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Ruiz established that impeachment material need only be disclosed for trial. . . Appellants contend that the evidence at issue was exculpatory and therefore not covered by the rule set forth in Ruiz. We have not yet had occasion to determine whether Ruiz applies to exculpatory Brady material, a question that has caused some disagreement among our sister circuits. [collecting cases]Nor does our own caselaw support appellants' argument that they had a clearly established right to receive exculpatory Brady material prior to plea bargaining. We have held that '[i]n general, the principles announced in Brady do not apply to a tardy disclosure of exculpatory information, but to a complete failure to disclose. If previously undisclosed evidence is disclosed . . . during trial, no Brady violation occurs unless the defendant has been prejudiced by the delay in disclosure.' . . . Therefore, every reasonable officer in appellees' positions would know that they were under an obligation to present Brady material to the prosecutors 'in time for its effective use at trial.' . . . And in Campbell v. Marshall, we held that a prosecutor's failure to disclose arguably exculpatory Brady material prior to plea bargaining did not render the defendant's guilty plea involuntary where a factual basis for the plea was established at the plea proceeding. . . . Accordingly, we hold that appellees were under no clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining. We do not decide whether appellants have a constitutional right to receive exculpatory Brady material from law enforcement prior to entering into a plea agreement.")

Bray v. Planned Parenthood Columbia-Willamette Inc., 746 F.3d 229, 236-39 (6th Cir. 2014) ("For the reasons that follow, the marshals' alleged actions violated the Brays' Fourth Amendment rights, but the marshals are nonetheless protected by qualified immunity. . . . Under a 'scrupulous' application, the Fourth Amendment was violated by the detention of Michael Bray for four hours with no access to outside communications while armed, flak-jacketed U.S. Marshals worked with an organization Mr. Bray despised to seize his books and manuscripts (including books and manuscripts of insignificant market value) for the ostensible purpose of satisfying a debt. . . . Adding further support to the conclusion that the marshals' actions violated the Constitution, the presence of multiple unauthorized representatives of PPCW served no valid purpose under the writ. Although the Fourth Amendment does not require that all conduct by an officer within a home be expressly authorized by a court order, it does demand that actions relate to the lawful objectives of the order. . . PPCW had no articulated expertise in satisfying the ostensible purpose of the writ, identifying valuable goods to satisfy a monetary judgment. Moreover, because the presence of additional representatives of PPCW was not authorized, and because the writ made no provision for the use of a camera, it was a violation of the Fourth Amendment to permit the organization to film the home. . . . Nonetheless, the officers are protected from suit by the doctrine of qualified immunity, because these constitutional rights were not clearly established at the time of the violations. . . . Because the legal and factual scenario presented in this action is not identical to any the Sixth Circuit or the Supreme Court has previously addressed, the rights the marshals violated were not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct, and a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was lawful. For one thing, the prolonged detention of Michael Bray might have been permissible in the distinct but more common context of executing a warrant for criminal contraband. The Supreme Court has approved of confinement by officers of the occupants of a house to minimize the risk of bodily harm during the execution of a criminal warrant, to facilitate the orderly completion of the search, and to prevent flight and the improper disposal of evidence. . . The right to detain in the somewhat analogous, albeit different, case of a search for contraband, is 'categorical,' with no relationship to the 'quantum of proof justifying detention or the extent of the intrusion to be imposed by the seizure.' . . Moreover, although the Supreme Court has questioned whether detention is permissible in the context of a search for evidence other than contraband, . . . the Court has not examined the Fourth Amendment implications of a search or a seizure under a civil writ of execution. It is true, though, that our court has held in the civil judgment enforcement context that absolute quasi-judicial immunity may apply if detention is specifically authorized in a valid court order. . . Accordingly, in the absence of specific guidance to the contrary, a reasonable officer could have interpreted existing precedent to permit the detention of Michael Bray. The marshals might also reasonably have believed that it was acceptable to invite additional representatives of PPCW to join the raid, because outside involvement in the execution of a court order is sometimes permissible. . . . Although here the writ of execution identified the number of PPCW representatives who were authorized to be present, a marshal might nonetheless have concluded that it was permissible to invite additional representatives of PPCW to execute the writ, because officers may sometimes seek the aid of third parties in executing court orders. Further buttressing this conclusion, the marshals' actions in seeking outside assistance were distinct from those in which this circuit has recognized a possible constitutional violation. . . . An officer who was unaware that the additional representatives of PPCW were not authorized to be present might also have reasonably concluded that the individuals could film the home. Other circuits have assumed without deciding that videotaping the execution of a valid search warrant is lawful. . . In addition, several circuits have held that warrantless filming does not violate the Constitution if the cameramen are authorized to be present in the home. . .

Although here the cameraman was not authorized to be present in the Brays' home, reasonable officers who were mistaken about the lawfulness of inviting additional representatives of PPCW to join the raid might likewise have been mistaken about whether those representatives could film the home, particularly in light of the camera's utility in capturing the condition of the property prior to its sale. Therefore, the rights the marshals breached were not clearly established at the time of the violations.")

T.S. v. Doe, 742 F.3d 632, 635-41 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To restate the plaintiffs' constitutional argument as a basic syllogism, they assert the following: Every reasonable officer should know that it is unconstitutional to conduct suspicionless strip searches of adult detainees held on minor offenses. Every reasonable officer should also know that juveniles enjoy the same, if not greater, protection under the Fourth Amendment than adults. Therefore, every reasonable officer should know that it is unconstitutional to conduct suspicionless strip searches of juvenile detainees held on minor offenses. To prevail, the plaintiffs must establish that both the major and minor premises of this syllogism were clearly established as of June 2009. . . . The reasoning of our prior holding in Masters contemplates that prison officials must do exactly what the Supreme Court held they need not—screen out detainees from a blanket strip-search policy based upon the seriousness of their offense. It is simply not possible to square our decision in Masters with that in Florence. Masters is therefore abrogated. . . . Were the searches of J.S. and K.S. to occur today, the defendants would certainly be entitled to immunity. Setting aside misgivings that juvenile and adult detainees are subject to the same rules, see infra section III.D, the major premise of the plaintiffs' argument is clearly and unquestionably wrong. They argue, however, that we must put on judicial blinders and ignore Florence because it was rendered nearly three years after the conduct at issue and, thus, cannot displace the prevailing law of June 2009. We admittedly face a unique situation. If this case involved adult detainees, Florence clearly holds that there would be no constitutional violation. Here, however, Florence does not squarely address the constitutional issue, so that we could dispose of the merits of this case with nothing more than a citation. In the interest of avoiding an advisory constitutional ruling, we should first look to whether the rule that the plaintiffs advocate here was clearly established at the time, so as to trigger liability for any potential constitutional violation. . . . This raises a question that we have not addressed before: In a § 1983 qualified-immunity case, may officials benefit from a subsequent Supreme Court case that would cause a reasonable official to have at least a good-faith doubt that a given practice is prohibited? The law can have a good deal of arbitrariness in its temporal development. Courts may not resolve a legal question until it is presented in a real case or controversy. Thus, neither we nor public officials have any control over when a particular rule is clearly established or (in this case) clearly rejected. We note, however, that the touchstone of qualified immunity in general, and the clearly-established-law inquiry in particular, is objective good faith. . . . For the purpose of establishing that an official has acted in objective good faith, the most recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the issue will often serve as the best analytical starting point, regardless of when the case was decided. Florence provides an excellent example of this. . . . Citation to Florence is, in large respect, a shorthand for the fundamental shift in the law that has taken place over the past three decades and that so weakened the foundation of Masters as to bring about its final collapse in Florence. By June 2009, a reasonable official could have consulted the numerous Supreme Court opinions cited above, or the more recent opinions of our sister circuits, and, in objective good faith, concluded that Masters was no longer good law. Florence did nothing more than articulate this fact. It is thus wholly consistent with the principles of qualified immunity to give the defendants the benefit of the Court’s ruling. Accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against the plaintiffs’ federal claims. . . . In sum, the plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden of demonstrating that every reasonable official in June 2009 would have known that conducting a suspicionless strip search of a juvenile detainee during his or her intake into a detention facility violated the Fourth Amendment. Without this, their federal claims cannot survive the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity. We need not, and do not, opine on the constitutionality of the strip searches. The district court erred in denying summary judgment to the defendants on the plaintiffs’ § 1983 claims, and we therefore reverse.”)

Ortega v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 737 F.3d 435, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2013) (“A transfer from home confinement to prison confinement, it seems to us, amounts to a sufficiently severe change in conditions to implicate due process. . . .What process is due will vary from setting to setting and may well turn on the notice given to the individual before he was allowed to serve a prison sentence at home. Happily for us, we need not answer these more difficult questions today. In a qualified-immunity case, a court may reject the constitutional claim on either of two grounds—either because no such constitutional right existed or because the constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .A clearly established constitutional violation requires on-point, controlling authority or a ‘robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.’. . . As of March 2011, no controlling authority or consensus of persuasive authority established that Ortega had a liberty interest in remaining on home confinement. The relevant Supreme Court precedent at the time dealt only with traditional confinement and probation or parole. . . . Ortega’s case falls somewhere between traditional confinement and probation/parole, and the Supreme Court has not addressed such a case. The Sixth Circuit has not addressed an in-between case like Ortega’s either. The closest case, Ganem v. U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 825 F.2d 410 (6th Cir.1987) (per curiam) (unpublished), hurts rather than helps Ortega’s cause. It involved a federal prisoner whose prison classification changed because of an immigration detainer. The court held that a ‘detainer which adversely affects a prisoner’s classification and eligibility for rehabilitative programs does not activate a due process right.’. . . Even then, Ganem does not speak to the question here—whether a home confinee should be thought of as a prisoner without a liberty interest in avoiding a transfer to prison or as a probationer/parolee with such a liberty interest. In the absence of Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit authority, Ortega points to three cases as evidence of a ‘robust consensus’ of persuasive authority establishing a liberty interest in home confinement. [discussing cases] These three cases are neither robust in their relevant analyses nor evidence of an on-point consensus. The decisions from both circuits undermine the central premise of Ortega’s claims by noting that today’s question—whether initial home confinement gives rise to a protected liberty interest—is an open one.”)

Ortega v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 737 F.3d 435, 439, 441-43 (6th Cir. 2013) (Keith, J., dissenting) (“Because I disagree with the majority’s view that Ortega did not have a ‘clearly established’ liberty interest in home confinement, I respectfully dissent. . . . The facts of this case are such that the unlawfulness of Metro Defendants’ conduct is readily apparent, even in the absence of clarifying case law. Metro Defendants seized Ortega, an American-born, United States citizen, from his home and took him to jail for four days, based upon an improper detainer, without a warrant or any semblance of process. In doing so, Metro Defendants did not allow him to produce any documentation that he was an American citizen. . . . Not only should the officers have known that removing someone from their home and taking them to jail requires a certain minimum level of process, but in my view, the relevant case law clearly establishes that criminal defendants have a constitutional due process right to remain in home confinement. . . . Clearly established rights include not only those specifically adjudicated, but also those that are established by general applications of core constitutional principles. . . . Here, the core constitutional principle—that an officer must provide some process before seizing an individual from his home and taking him to jail—is unquestionably enshrined in our case law. Admittedly, the Supreme Court and this Court have only explained this principle in the probation and parole contexts. . . . Surely, however, the test for determining whether a constitutional right was clearly established does not require a plaintiff to demonstrate that ‘the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in the light of preexisting law the unlawfulness must be apparent.’. . . Indeed, in this case, the unlawfulness of Metro Defendants’ actions clearly was apparent. The majority’s cursory dismissal of analogous cases from the First and Seventh Circuits, see Gonzales-Fuentes v. Molina, 607 F.3d 864 (1st Cir.2010); Domka v. Portage Cnty., 523 F.3d 776 (7th Cir.2008); and Paige v. Hudson, 341 F.3d 642 (7th Cir.2003), as ‘neither robust in their relevant analyses nor evidence of an on-point consensus’ misses the point. At a minimum, those decisions firmly establish that an individual serving a sentence outside of prison is entitled to some minimum amount of process before being arrested and taken to jail. . . . The majority’s holding allows an officer to blatantly violate the Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights of an American citizen—so long as it was done in a manner that neither this Court nor the Supreme Court has directly opined on before—with impunity. This cannot be the intent of the qualified immunity doctrine.”)

Yoder v. University of Louisville, No. 12–5354, 2013 WL 1976515, *6 (6th Cir. May 15, 2013) (“We exercise our discretion to focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether, assuming Yoder had a First Amendment right to post the Blog that was violated by her dismissal from the SON [School of Nursing], this right was clearly established. . . . We find dispositive the absence of controlling authority that specifically prohibits Defendants’ conduct. Because neither the Supreme Court nor a panel of our circuit has considered whether schools can regulate off-campus, online speech by students, Yoder relies on Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage School District, where the Third Circuit held that ‘the First Amendment prohibits the school from reaching beyond the schoolyard to impose what might otherwise be appropriate discipline.’. . . We first observe that Layshock was not decided until June 2011—over two years after Yoder’s dismissal—and thus cannot stand as clearly established law at the time of the incident. . . More important, other circuits have come to conflicting conclusions and permitted schools to regulate off-campus, online student speech where such speech could foreseeably cause a material disruption to the administration of the school. . . Indeed, Yoder herself acknowledges that student internet communications present an ‘enigmatic issue, since these are communications available on campus, off campus, or anywhere else.’ In addition, both parties rely heavily on Supreme Court cases that govern student speech standards, . . . none of which considers the unique circumstances posed here. Yoder has not identified any case—nor are we aware of any—that undermines a university’s ability to take action against a nursing (or medical) student for making comments off campus that implicate patient privacy concerns. Defendants have legal and ethical obligations to ensure that patient confidentiality is protected, and that nursing students are trained with regard to their ethical obligations. . . Yoder gained access to the Patient through the SON’s clinical program, and patients allow SON students to observe their medical treatment in reliance on the students’ agreement not to share information about their medical treatment and personal background. Under such circumstances, Defendants could not ‘fairly be said to “know” that the law forb [ids] [discharging a student under these circumstances].’”)

Hearring v. Sliowski, 712 F.3d 275, 279 (6th Cir. 2013) (“In this case, as we explain below, ‘it is plain that a constitutional right [wa]s not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.’ . . . Because the constitutional-interpretation question of whether B.H.’s Fourth Amendment rights were violated ‘will have no effect on the outcome of the case,’ we need not resolve it. . . Accordingly, we will assume that Hearring has alleged a violation of a Fourth Amendment right and address whether that right was clearly established. . . . The district court concluded, following the strip-search cases, that ‘the fundamental dignity of a young person’s body is so obvious’ that school officials had fair notice that a strip-search of a student ‘without justification’ is improper. . . We do not disagree. Nonetheless, a critical factor distinguishes this case from the more typical strip-search cases: namely, it is clear that Sliowski’s visual inspection of B.H.’s genital area was not an investigation for contraband, but rather was an attempt to assess B.H.’s medical condition. . . And what is not obvious from existing authority is whether this kind of medically motivated visual examination constitutes a search subject to the Fourth Amendment standards developed in the strip-search case law. This legal question, whether a visual examination conducted for medical purposes by a medical professional falls within the definition of ‘search’ for Fourth Amendment purposes, is critical, because the Fourth Amendment’s protections are not triggered until a search occurs. . . Accordingly, we must determine whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment applies to the actions of a school nurse when she attempts to provide medical care to a student. There is no Supreme Court precedent directly answering the question of whether the Fourth Amendment applies to school nurses in their provision of medical care. This court has not taken a definitive position on whether the Fourth Amendment’s protection against unreasonable searches applies to the provision of medical services by government-employed health-care professionals. . . . Given that there is no direct precedent from this court holding that the Fourth Amendment applies to visual examinations conducted by medical professionals for medical purposes and some precedent indicating that the Fourth Amendment does not apply in such circumstances, we cannot say that it is clearly established under our precedent that the conduct of a school nurse giving medical aid to students is subject to the standard of reasonableness imposed by the Fourth Amendment. . . . In sum, existing precedents did not give Sliwowski fair warning that her medical assessments were subject to the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement, and accordingly the right at issue was not clearly established. . . . Sliwowski is thus entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether her conduct amounted to a violation of B.H.'s Fourth Amendment rights, and we express no opinion as to whether there was a constitutional violation in this case.”)

Embodly v. Ward, 695 F.3d 577, 581, 582 (6th Cir. 2012) (“Noting that state law authorized him to carry this gun in the park, he argues that temporarily disarming him necessarily was a ‘per se Second Amendment violation.’ . . . But § 1983 claims are designed to vindicate federal law, not state law. He offers no explanation why the officers’ alleged failure to comply with state law itself violates the United States Constitution in general or the Second Amendment in particular. . . . To the extent Embodly means to argue that the Second Amendment prevents Tennessee from prohibiting certain firearms in state parks (and thus prohibited Ward from detaining Embodly on suspicion of possessing an illegal firearm), qualified immunity is the answer. . . . No court has held that the Second Amendment encompasses a right to bear arms within state parks. . . . Such a right may or may not exist, but the critical point for our purposes is that it has not been established—clearly or otherwise at this point. That suffices to resolve this claim under the Court’s qualified-immunity precedents. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009).”)

Hagans v. Franklin County Sheriff’s Office, 695 F.3d 505, 508-10 (6th Cir. 2012) (“This qualified-immunity case, like all qualified-immunity cases, presents two questions: (1) whether the officer (Ratcliff) violated the claimant’s (Hagans’) constitutional (Fourth Amendment) rights (by repeatedly tasing him after he actively resisted arrest); and, if so, (2) whether that constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the incident (in May 2007, when the tasing occurred). The first question raises some complications. The second one does not. We opt to answer the easier of the two questions, saving the harder one for another day. [citing Pearson] In deciding whether a right has been clearly established, the Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly’ warned lower courts not to define the right at ‘a high level of generality.’ . . . Hagans proposes a lofty definition of the right (‘the right to be free from excessive force,’ R. 63 at 9), one floor down from the words of the Fourth Amendment itself (‘the right to be free of ‘unreasonable ... seizures’ “) and two floors down from the highest level of generality possible (‘the right to be free from a constitutional violation’). Yet these types of inquiries do little to answer the question. . . . It is sometimes worse than that: If a court does not carefully define the right, it risks collapsing the two qualified-immunity inquiries into one, permitting the constitutional-violation inquiry always to answer the clearly established inquiry. Precedent demands instead that we go down the stairs of abstraction to a concrete, particularized description of the right. Though not too far down: just as a court can generalize too much, it can generalize too little. If it defeats the qualified-immunity analysis to define the right too broadly (as the right to be free of excessive force), it defeats the purpose of § 1983 to define the right too narrowly (as the right to be free of needless assaults by left-handed police officers during Tuesday siestas). . . . Defined at the appropriate level of generality—a reasonably particularized one—the question at hand is whether it was clearly established in May 2007 that using a taser repeatedly on a suspect actively resisting arrest and refusing to be handcuffed amounted to excessive force. The answer is no. Cases from this circuit and others, before and after May 2007, adhere to this line: If a suspect actively resists arrest and refuses to be handcuffed, officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment by using a taser to subdue him. . . . One decision bucks this trend—kind of. In two consolidated cases, the en banc Ninth Circuit held that officers used excessive force by tasing suspects who offered minimal resistance. Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir.2011) (en banc). . . . Whatever glimmer of hope the Ninth Circuit’s holdings on the constitutional issue offer Hagans is closed by the reality that the court held the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established at the time of the encounters. . . . If it did not violate clearly established law to tase a pregnant mother who refused to sign a traffic citation in November 2004, how could it violate clearly established law to tase an out-of-control, shirtless man strung-out on drugs who was thrashing about with two officers on the ground in May 2007? Hagans has not shown any changes in the law over that period or for that matter any law specific to the Sixth Circuit that would clearly establish the illegality of this far more reasonable use of a taser.”)

Hoover v. Walsh, 682 F.3d 481, 500, 501 & n. 57 (6th Cir. 2012) (“We resolve Mr. Hoover’s § 1983 claim on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that his constitutional rights were not violated because the officers acted with the requisite justification at all stages of their encounter with Mr. Hoover. Consequently, Mr. Hoover’s § 1983 claim cannot survive summary judgment. . . . Because we resolve the issue of qualified immunity by concluding that there was no constitutional violation, we need not address the second prong of the analysis to determine whether Mr. Hoover’s rights were clearly established.”)

Cockrell v. City of Cincinnati, No. 10–4605, 2012 WL 573972, at *4-*7 & n.6 (6th Cir. Feb. 23, 2012) (not published) (“[W]e define the question this case presents as whether a misdemeanor, fleeing from the scene of a non-violent misdemeanor, but offering no other resistance and disobeying no official command, had a clearly established right not to be tased on July 3, 2008. Because neither case law, nor external sources, nor ‘[t]he obvious cruelty inherent’ in taser use. . . . would have put every reasonable officer on notice that Hall’s conduct violated the Fourth Amendment in July 2008, we hold that Hall is entitled to qualified immunity, even if he did use excessive force. . . . Because we resolve this case on the ‘clearly established’ element of qualified immunity, we express no opinion on the constitutionality of Hall’s actions. . . . Cases addressing qualified immunity for taser use fall into two groups. The first involves plaintiffs tased while actively resisting arrest by physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers. In the face of such resistance, courts conclude either that no constitutional violation occurred, or that the right not to be tased while resisting arrest was not clearly established at the time of the incident. [collecting cases] In the second group of cases, a law-enforcement official tases a plaintiff who has done nothing to resist arrest or is already detained. Courts faced with this scenario hold that a § 1983 excessive-force claim is available, since ‘the right to be free from physical force when one is not resisting the police is a clearly established right.’ [collecting cases] This case does not fit cleanly within either group. At no point did Cockrell use violence, make threats, or even disobey a command to stop. [footnote omitted] He simply fled. Yet flight, non-violent though it may be, is still a form of resistance. . . Neither line of cases, then, dictates a particular result in this scenario; both apply in some measure. The most we can draw from today's case law, in summary, is this: in no case where courts denied qualified immunity was the plaintiff fleeing, and in at least some of these cases, the court specifically referred to the fact of non-flight. . . By contrast, in all cases where a plaintiff fled from police, the court held that qualified immunity was appropriate, and some courts referred specifically to the plaintiff's flight. . . . These broad principles do not establish the contours of the right Hall allegedly violated so clearly that every reasonable officer would know his actions were unconstitutional, even today. It certainly did not do so in July 2008. . . . Finally, there is no 'obvious cruelty inherent' in the use of tasers . . . which would render Hall's conduct objectively unreasonable. . . . In short, it is not clear whether tasing a suspect who fled from the scene of a nonviolent misdemeanor constituted excessive force, as of July 2008. Nor is there consensus that taser use is categorically improper, unsafe, or cruel. We cannot, therefore, say that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what [Hall was] doing' violated Cockrell's Fourth-Amendment rights.")

Cockrell v. City of Cincinnati, No. 10-4605, 2012 WL 573972, at *7 (6th Cir. Feb. 23, 2012) (Cole, J., concurring) (not published) ("I am persuaded that Cockrell, as of July 3, 2008, did not have a clearly established right not to be tased for fleeing from a non-violent misdemeanor. I write separately because, given the totality of the circumstances, I believe that Officer Hall's use of force was excessive. In several of the cases cited by the majority, in which courts found that the use of a taser against a resisting arrestee constituted excessive force, the courts placed great weight on the officer's failure to warn the suspect prior to deploying the taser. [citing cases] Likewise, the City of Cincinnati's use-of-force policy advises officers to 'give the subject a verbal warning that the TASER will be deployed unless exigent circumstances exist that would make it imprudent to do so.' Here, Hall does not allege that he warned Cockrell of the impending use of his taser—or even that he ordered him to stop—nor does he allege that exigent circumstances prevented him from doing so. Thus, I would find that his use of a taser under these circumstances violated Cockrell's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force.")

Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 938-40 (6th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e can hold that an official is entitled to qualified immunity without determining whether a constitutional violation has actually occurred. . . This is exactly what we do here. Even assuming that Wirth violated Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights, Wheeler has not shown that it was a clearly established violation for Wirth to rely on the warrant issued to search Wheeler's apartment. . . . [W]e can assume for the sake of this qualified-immunity analysis that Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights were violated when officers seized items that were identified in the warrant but not supported by probable cause in the warrant affidavit. . . . Regardless, such a deficiency is unusual, and thus it was reasonable for Wirth to fail to recognize it, especially considering the fact that the warrant affidavit and the warrant were drafted by a prosecuting attorney and that the warrant was approved by the state magistrate. Much of the problem Wheeler alleges here is not with the warrant, but with the warrant affidavit. Moreover, unlike in most cases dealing with a defective warrant affidavit, this affidavit is clearly not deficient in establishing probable cause to search, and Wheeler acknowledges that the affidavit obviously provides such probable cause. Instead, the deficiency alleged is in establishing probable cause to seize certain items listed in the warrant, an error that would not be apparent to the reasonable police officer. . . . The basis for the warrant, in Wirth's view, was the commission of the home invasions in both Ingham County and Eaton County. Thus, it was reasonable for him to believe that, as long as the search warrant established probable cause for the search, which it clearly did, he could seize any items he encountered that constituted evidence of the commission of the home invasions, which stolen property clearly does. Wirth is thus entitled to qualified immunity from this aspect of Wheeler's Fourth Amendment claim. Even though Wirth urges us to determine whether the warrant affidavit failed to establish probable cause for the seizure of certain items in the warrant, we need not do so for purposes of granting qualified immunity and do not have jurisdiction to do so for purposes of Wirth's cross-appeal. In his cross-appeal, Wirth challenges the district court's determination that Wirth violated Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights, even though the district court ultimately held that he was immune from suit pursuant to this violation. Because Wirth was ultimately successful in his motion for summary judgment, we lack jurisdiction to consider this cross appeal. There is generally no appellate jurisdiction when the appellant does not seek a change in the relief ordered by the judgment appealed from. . . . We acknowledge the Supreme Court's recent holding in Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2032 (2011), that the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review a lower court's holding that a party violated the Constitution even though the party prevailed on qualified immunity grounds in the lower court. The Court based this conclusion on the fact that the lower court's ruling would be considered to settle a question of constitutional law and thereby guide the conduct of officials in the future. . . . The 'purpose and effect' of such a ruling, the Supreme Court reasoned, permits its being reviewed at the behest of the prevailing immunized official. . . . The Court emphasized in Camreta, however, that its holding 'adresse[d] only [the Supreme Court's] authority to review cases in this procedural posture.' . . . It did not address whether lower courts of appeals must hear appeals brought by similarly prevailing parties. Moreover, the Court recognized that 'the considerations persuading [it] to permit review of petitions in this posture may not have the same force as applied to a district court decision,' because such decisions by a district court are not binding precedent in any future matters. . . . In light of this difference, at least one court of appeals has noted that prevailing immunized parties cannot appeal a district court's 'newly declared constitutional right in the higher courts.' Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 247 (2d Cir.1999); but see Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 96 (D.C.Cir.2000) (assuming that when plaintiffs in Bivens cases appeal adverse immunity rulings, 'the winning officials can cross-appeal the ruling against them regarding the constitutionality of their actions'). Permitting review of a prevailing party's claim creates tension with Article III's prohibition against issuing advisory opinions. . . . This is because the prevailing party has already obtained a judgment in his or her favor, and thus is not asking the court to review the lower court's judgment on appeal but instead a basis or reason for that judgment. 'The duty of this court ... is to decide actual controversies by a judgment which can be carried into effect, and not to give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare principles or rules of law which cannot affect the matter in issue in the case before it.’ Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651, 653 (1895). This consideration, and the fact that the district court’s decision below does not present the sort of concern with the creation of precedent that the Supreme Court confronted in Camreta, lead to the conclusion that we are without jurisdiction to review Wirth’s cross-appeal. Further, as explained above, we need not determine on Wheeler’s appeal whether the warrant affidavit failed to establish probable cause for the seizure of certain items in the warrant in order to hold that Wirth is entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, we state no opinion as to whether a constitutional violation occurred from the execution of the warrant with respect to items not identified as stolen in the crime descriptions supporting the existence of probable cause.”)

Holzemer v. City of Memphis, 621 F.3d 512, 519, 520, 527, 528 (6th Cir. 2010) (“Although we are not bound to follow the sequence of this inquiry, see Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 813 (2009), we believe that this case would benefit from the traditional sequence outlined in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), and Feathers. Because of the nature of the constitutional right at issue, ‘there would be little if any conservation of judicial resources to be had by beginning and ending with a discussion of the “clearly established” prong’ because it would be ‘difficult to decide whether a right is clearly established without deciding precisely what the constitutional right happens to be.’. . . Therefore, we first address whether Holzemer’s conversation with Peete constitutes constitutionally protected petitioning, and, finding that it is, we then examine whether that right was clearly established at the time the events took place. . . . We find that requesting assistance from a city councilman—whether in writing or in person—constitutes petitioning activity entitled to the protection of the Petition Clause of the First Amendment. Consequently, Holzemer and Downtown Buggy have a right to be free from retaliation for exercising that right. Because we find no constitutional distinction between an oral and written petition for redress, we also find that a reasonable city official would have known that retaliation for seeking such assistance from a local, elected official is unlawful. . . . We find that the case law of this court and of the Supreme Court demonstrates that the right to petition a local, elected representative for assistance in dealing with local government agencies was clearly established at the time that the relevant events took place and that a reasonable local official would have known that retaliating against a citizen exercising that right is unlawful. Moreover, a reasonable city official would have known that the Constitution prohibits retaliation for a citizen’s exercise of his First Amendment right to Free Speech, whether that speech takes written, oral, or another form.”)

Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 863 (6th Cir. 2010) (“Until recently, courts used the two-step sequential inquiry set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), to address an assertion of the qualified immunity defense. Under Katz, a court first asked whether, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the facts show that the officer’s conduct violated a constitutional right. . . If the answer to this first question was ‘no,’ the analysis proceeded no further and the officer need not even seek the protection of qualified immunity. . . If, however, the pleadings establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to a violation, Katz mandated that the next step was to determine whether the constitutional right was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the violation. If not, the officer would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . Under the ‘clearly established’ inquiry, the question is whether the right was ‘so “clearly established” that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . Previously, this Court has included a third inquiry to ‘increase the clarity’ of the Katz analysis: ‘whether the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional rights.’ . . . However, in Pearson v. Callahan, ___ U. S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), the Supreme Court recently abandoned Katz’s requirement that courts must address the qualified immunity inquiries sequentially. . . . However, because Pearson left in place Katz’s core analysis, all pre-Pearson case law remains good law.”)

Stanley v. Vining, 602 F.3d 767, 771 (6th Cir. 2010) (“We understand that a pro se prisoner is unlikely to understand the complexity of federal law regarding prisoner rights, and hence we read a prisoner’s complaint liberally. . . . Having done so in this case, we are unable to derive from the complaint any set of facts or legal theory that would give rise to a valid, federal, § 1983 cause of action. Although Stanley does not specify with clarity what constitutional provisions—Due Process, First Amendment, or Sixth Amendment—his claims rest on, we have treated his allegations under all reasonable theories we can imagine. Our dissenting colleague melds together and confuses several theories and comes up with a theory that seems to depend on local differences in how prisons internally interpret a wide variety of regulations from state to state. Our ruling here is that there must be uniform federal constitutional theory from state to state as to each constitutional provision and that no constitutional provision flatly prohibits as unlawful censorship a prison from opening and reading a prisoner’s mail unless it can be shown that the conduct interferes with the prisoner’s right to counsel or access to the courts or violates his rights of equal protection or procedural due process. We find no per se constitutional rule that such conduct automatically violates a broad, general rule prohibiting censorship, as our dissenting colleague seems to imagine.”)

Stanley v. Vining, 602 F.3d 767, 771 (6th Cir. 2010) (Cole, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Plaintiff-Appellant Aubrey Stanley alleges that Defendant-Appellee Randy Vining violated his constitutional rights by reading his legal mail on two separate occasions. Although I concur in the majority opinion to the extent that it affirms the dismissal of Stanley’s retaliation and supervisor-liability claims, I respectfully dissent from the rest of the majority opinion because I believe Stanley has made out a cognizable legal-mail claim.”)

Binay v. Bettendorf, 601 F.3d 640, 647, 652 (6th Cir. 2010) (“Because the Saucier sequence is appropriate here, we first ask whether, under the facts that Plaintiffs have alleged, a constitutional violation occurred. Specifically, the relevant question is whether Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to show that Defendants violated Plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights by using excessive force in the execution of a valid search warrant at Plaintiffs’ apartment. The use of excessive force in the execution of a search warrant constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . [T]he law is clearly established that the authority of police officers to detain the occupants of the premises during a proper search for contraband is ‘limited’ and that officers are only entitled to use ‘reasonable force’ to effectuate such a detention. Thus, based on the caselaw that existed on January 10, 2007, the date of the alleged use of excessive force in executing the search warrant, Defendants were on notice that their detention of Plaintiffs during the search using means that were more forceful than necessary would constitute a Fourth Amendment violation.”)

Koubriti v. Convertino, 593 F.3d 459, 472 (6th Cir. 2010) (“Whether Koubriti’s allegation, when characterized as a more general due process claim, amounts to a constitutional violation has not been developed in the lower court record, nor has it been briefed to this Court. Therefore, it would be improper to reach the merits of this question. . . Since the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson v. Callahan, however, we are no longer required to address the constitutionality of the alleged conduct first and can resolve the issue by determining whether such a violation was clearly established. . . In the instant case, even if the claim were to be characterized as one alleging that Convertino violated Koubriti’s right to due process by ordering agents not to memorialize the Hmimssa interviews, we could not say that it was clearly established that such behavior is unconstitutional. . . . Here, we can find no case law to support the conclusion that a reasonable official would have understood that the complained of action violated Koubriti’s rights. Although Convertino’s directive may be questioned, it cannot be said that its unlawfulness is apparent, particularly when reviewing the existing case law. While such behavior is in tension with the policy judgments underlying Brady, . . . it would indeed go well beyond the reasonable limits of the Brady non-disclosure doctrine to say that it also requires memorialization of interviews. Additionally, cases analyzing sets of facts more similar to the instant case than those in Brady have suggested that it is not a constitutional violation. . . Thus, Convertino’s behavior, were it to be ruled as a constitutional violation, was not clearly established as a violation at the time Convertino acted.”).

Jones v. Byrnes, 585 F.3d 971, 975, 978 (6th Cir. 2009) (“[I]n Pearson v. Callahan, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), the Supreme Court recently abandoned Katz’s requirement that courts address all qualified immunity inquiries sequentially. . . The Court recognized that the lower courts had complained that the sequential mandate was cumbersome and often forced courts to decide constitutional questions unnecessarily, and also recognized that the sequential mandate was impossible to force on any given judge’s thought process. On the other hand, the Court found that the Katz inquiry was still appropriate and a correct statement of the test for qualified immunity. . . . However, because Pearson left in place Katz’s core analysis, all pre-Pearson case law remains good law. . . . Neither side has cited any case, from any circuit or district court, in which an officer’s actions in a police chase have ultimately been found to shock the conscience, nor are we aware of any such case. . . As a result, although Lewis established in 1998 that an officer’s conduct in a police chase could theoretically shock the conscience, there have been no examples of what specific kinds of conduct rise to that level. The ‘clearly established’ inquiry ‘must be undertaken in consideration of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition....’ Katz, 533 U.S. at 201. Thus, at present, it would be exceedingly difficult for an officer to be aware of what specific actions violate the clearly established general right of suspects and third parties to be free from arbitrary deprivation of life and liberty in police-pursuit scenarios. Certainly Officers Lentine and Byrnes had no guidance from this Court or the Supreme Court on what would shock the conscience, just what would not. The officers, therefore, would be entitled to qualified immunity even had we found that their actions shocked the conscience.”)

Jones v. Byrnes, 585 F.3d 971, 978-80 (6th Cir. 2009) (Martin, J., concurring) (“I concur in the Court’s disposition of this case. Mr. Jones’s death, though truly terrible, was not the result of a constitutional violation. I write separately, however, to discuss a troubling problem highlighted by this case and to suggest an approach to apply in future cases that addresses this problem. As the Court notes, neither party has cited a single example of a case, from any circuit or district court, in which an officer’s actions in a police chase have ultimately been found to shock the conscience, and I am aware of no such case. Thus, it appears that the set of examples of constitutionally impermissible police-pursuit behavior is currently an empty one. Although surprising, this was not especially troubling under the mandatory analytical regime set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Under Katz, even if a given police-pursuit case did not amount to a constitutional violation, the court would still have to go through the exercise of explaining why the police officer’s actions did not shock the conscience. However—at least in theory—sometime in the future a district court will find, and an appellate court will agree, that a police-pursuit case transgressed the Fourteenth Amendment threshold. . . And if Katz still controlled, the court confronted with this future case would, as a matter of law, have to confront the constitutional question head on, finally establishing a positive data point announcing that this police action, whatever it is, crosses the line. But Katz is no longer the law of the land; Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), is. Under Pearson, courts are now generally free to address the two questions set forth in Katz in whichever order they deem appropriate in a particular case. In practice, this means that a court may avoid deciding whether a constitutional violation occurred if the court is of the belief that, even assuming a violation, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that the officer’s actions crossed whatever constitutional line is at play in a given case. Usually, traditional constitutional avoidance policies would counsel in favor of doing just that. These avoidance policies are why the Supreme Court’s decision in Pearson makes sense now. In short, Katz generally served its purpose—in most section 1983 cases there are now sufficient data points to define the scope of constitutionally impermissible behavior. Thus, there is less of a need to continue developing the body of constitutional precedent, so the constitutional avoidance policies can come back into play. However, police-pursuit cases do not fall within the group of section 1983 cases for which Katz accomplished its goal of developing constitutional precedent because the set of examples of impermissible police-pursuit behavior remains empty. I am therefore concerned about applying Pearson in future police-pursuit cases. Except in the most overwhelmingly egregious case, an officer that crosses the Fourteenth Amendment’s threshold likely still would be entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that his specific actions were of the kind that crossed the line. Under Pearson, the court confronted with this officer’s actions could avoid the constitutional question entirely and resolve the case on the clearly established prong. And so too could all subsequent courts. This, of course, results in a self-perpetuating cycle in Fourteenth Amendment police-pursuit cases: district courts will skip the constitutional inquiry in favor of disposing of cases on the ‘clearly established’ prong, so there will never be an actual finding that an officer’s conduct shocks the conscience, so courts will continue to be able to dispose of cases on the “clearly established” prong, and so on. We could see a string of cases with the same refrain: ‘Even if the officer violated the Fourteenth Amendment in continuing this pursuit, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that his actions violated plaintiff’s constitutional rights. We therefore pass on the question whether a constitutional violation actually occurred, because we have discretion to do so under Pearson, and find that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.’ The set of conscience-shocking fact patterns could remain empty, and no body of case law will develop to define the parameters of what police conduct in a pursuit case could shock the conscience. This is a troubling potential because reflexive exercise of Pearson discretion in police-pursuit cases could result in essentially writing that cause of action off the books. Thankfully, I believe Pearson anticipates this very scenario and provides a safeguard against the extinction of difficult, but nonetheless valid, constitutional tort claims. As I understand Pearson, the Supreme Court merely lifted the requirement that lower courts implement the Katz analytical sequence in all qualified immunity cases. However, Pearson ‘continue[d] to recognize that [the Katz protocol] is often beneficial.’ 129 S.Ct. at 818. Furthermore, Justice Alito’s opinion explicitly addresses this very situation, where the body of constitutional law is thin or non-existent: ‘In addition, the Saucier Court was certainly correct in noting that the two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’ Id. (emphasis added). I therefore read Pearson to encourage and support continued development of the constitutional law using a more targeted approach in small subsets of qualified immunity cases, such as police-pursuit cases, where the body of law still needs fattening. . . I believe this to be the proper approach and applaud the Court’s decision to address the constitutional question in this case even though not required under Pearson. I further encourage the district courts and future panels of this Court to follow suit in these kinds of cases by continuing to employ Katz’s analytical sequence.”).

Chappell v. City Of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 916 (6th Cir. 2009) (“In sum, plaintiff has failed to present a genuine issue of material fact on her claim that defendants violated McCloud’s Fourth Amendment right to freedom from unreasonable seizure. At best, plaintiff has presented grounds for speculation that defendants misread her grandson’s innocent intentions when he came out of the closet and advanced toward them with knife in hand. Yet, qualified immunity protects officers from liability for mistakes of law and fact. Plaintiff has failed to adduce facts demonstrating that defendants, in potentially misinterpreting McCloud’s actions, were plainly incompetent or deliberately violated his rights when they acted in self-defense. Plaintiff has thus failed to carry her burden under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis of demonstrating that defendants violated McCloud’s constitutional rights. She has failed to demonstrate that they are not entitled to qualified immunity. Moreover, there being insufficient evidence of a constitutional violation, defendants, in effect, have no need of qualified immunity and are actually entitled to summary judgment as matter of law.”).

Waeschle v. Dragovic, 576 F.3d 539, 544, 550 (6th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion) (“Our qualified-immunity analysis that follows does not resolve the merits of Waeschle’s constitutional claim. Doing so is unnecessary because, as will be shown, Waeschle's purported constitutional right is not clearly established. . . . In sum, Michigan law regarding the rights of the next of kin in their relative's body parts removed for forensic examination during an autopsy is at best equivocal. Not a single case instructed Dragovic to treat the brain in any manner other than the way he did. Nor did any Michigan statute unambiguously instruct Dragovic on how to dispose of individual body parts retained for forensic examination as opposed to dealing with the body as a whole. Waeschle's alleged constitutionally protected property right to her mother's brain is therefore not clearly established because the underlying state-created property interest is not "sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." . . . [W]hether to recognize such a right is a task that the Michigan legislature and courts are better equipped to handle than this court, which is why we are exercising our discretion under Pearson to not further explore the first prong of the qualified-immunity test as set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001).")

Grawey v. Drury, 567 F.3d 302, 309 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Some panels of the Sixth Circuit have employed a third step requiring the court to determine whether the plaintiff has offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right. . . . In excessive force cases, however, because the defendant's conduct must have been objectively unreasonable to find a constitutional violation, Graham v. Connor, 409 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), the third step is redundant. Thus, qualified immunity in excessive force cases is a two-step analysis. . . . While excessive force qualified immunity claims should proceed under a two-step rather than a three-step analysis, we note that the Supreme Court, in Pearson v. Callahan, 128 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009), recently granted lower courts the discretion to conduct their two-step analysis in the manner most appropriate to the case before them. We will apply the traditional analysis, examining first whether Grawey has presented evidence of an excessive force constitutional violation and then whether the constitutional right violated was clearly established at the time of the incident.").

Dominguez v. Correctional Medical Services, 555 F.3d 543, 549, 552 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Determining whether the government officials in this case are entitled to qualified immunity generally requires two inquiries: 'First, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, has the plaintiff shown that a constitutional violation has occurred? Second, was the right clearly established at the time of the violation?' . . . cf. Pearson v. Callahan, No. 07-751, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 591, (Jan. 21, 2009) (holding that the two-part test is not longer considered mandatory; thereby freeing district courts from rigidly, and potentially wastefully, applying the two-part test in cases that could more efficiently be resolved by a modified application of that framework). . . . As applied to this case, Dominguez's right to adequate medical care has long been clearly established. Therefore, we conclude that Dominguez has satisfied both requirements for overcoming Fletcher's qualified immunity defense.")

clear whether that right was violated by being served a non-kosher meal on a single occasion. We therefore assume without deciding that it was, and proceed to determine whether Tomberlin is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson, 2009 WL 128768. . . . Here, there is no evidence that Tomberlin acted knowingly in serving Weinberger a non-kosher meal. The evidence tends to establish instead that FCI Manchester was an accredited provider of kosher meals and that Tomberlin was not personally involved in food preparation. Therefore, Tomberlin held a reasonable belief that the Passover meal presented to Weinberger was kosher. Likewise, there is no evidence that Tomberlin was incompetent. Accordingly, Tomberlin was entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court correctly concluded.”)

K.K. v. Clark County Board of Education, No. 5: 19-005-DCR, 2020 WL 734473, at *6-7 (E.D. Ky. Feb. 13, 2020) (“The Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have held school strip searches to be unconstitutional in some instances. But unlike K.K.’s suit, these cases tend to focus on the reasonableness of searches conducted to determine whether students have committed a crime or possessed contraband. E.g., Safford Unified School Dist. #1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364 (2009) (involving a strip search for contraband pain relief pills); Knisley v. Pike Cty. Joint Vocational School Dist., 604 F.3d 977 (6th Cir. 2010) (involving strip searches for allegedly stolen money and a credit card); Beard v. Whitmore Lake School Dist., 402 F.3d 598 (6th Cir. 2005) (involving strip searches for allegedly stolen cash). The Sixth Circuit clearly indicated in Hearring that this line of cases does not control prong two of the qualified immunity analysis when, as here, the search that allegedly violated a plaintiff’s constitutional rights was not conducted for the purpose of ascertaining whether the plaintiff had broken the law or possessed contraband. . . In Hearring, the plaintiff’s mother asserted that the defendant school nurse had violated her six-year-old daughter’s constitutional rights by examining her genital area in response to the student’s complaints about irritation. . . The Sixth Circuit declined to determine whether a constitutional violation had occurred but found that the nurse had qualified immunity because the applicable precedent on strip searches did not demonstrate that any right to be free of such a medical examination was clearly established. . . Here, the defendants’ conduct was aimed at investigating whether K.K.’s body evidenced signs of physical abuse. The plaintiff has not cited any precedent addressing such searches and it does not appear, based on Hearring, that the Court should find a clearly established right to be free from the defendants’ conduct because it was not undertaken to determine whether K.K. had committed a crime or possessed contraband. Further, as the defendants point out, it appears that only one other circuit has found there to be a constitutional violation when state personnel examine schoolchildren’s bodies to assess allegations of child abuse. See Tenenbaum v. Williams, 193 F.3d 581, 606 (2d Cir. 1999). Others have found that similarly-situated defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because there was no clearly established law on the matter without explicitly considering whether constitutional violations occurred. E.g., Doe v. Woodward, 912 F.3d 1278, 1293-96 (8th Cir. 2019); Landstrom v. Illinois Dept. of Children and Family Services, 892 F.2d 670, 675-78 (7th Cir. 1990). There is no consensus on this issue that would ‘leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct, if challenged on constitutional grounds, would be found wanting,’ and even if there was, it would not be ‘clearly foreshadowed’ by Sixth Circuit authority. . . Therefore, out-of-circuit precedent fails to show that Boyd and Creteau are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As noted previously, the Court may address the second prong of the immunity analysis before the first, and in this case it is clear that K.K. has failed to carry her burden and demonstrate that Boyd and Creteau's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right. The caselaw also suggests that no right was clearly established. Thus, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the federal claims asserted against them in their individual capacities.”)

Long v. Cnty. of Saginaw, No. 12-CV-15586, 2014 WL 5460630, at *9 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 27, 2014) (“In summary, existing precedents did not give jail officials fair warning that their surveillance of Long’s meeting with his client was subject to the Fourth Amendment’s reasonableness requirement, and accordingly the right at issue was not clearly established. . . Sixth Circuit precedent has indicated that visual surveillance may constitute a Fourth Amendment search, but never has it addressed the more specific issue of whether visual surveillance of an attorney-client meeting in prison may violate the Fourth Amendment. Officer Federspiel is thus entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether the jail officials’ conduct amounted to a violation of Long’s Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, Sheriff Federspiel’s motion for summary judgment with respect to his individual liability will be granted because he is immune from suit.”)

Perrea v. Cincinnati Public Schools, 709 F.Supp.2d 628, 649, 650 (S.D. Ohio 2010) (“This Court already has determined that if the facts alleged are true then Hahn violated Perrea’s right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. . . The issue, therefore, is whether the right was clearly established. . . . In this case, it would not have been sufficiently clear to a reasonable person that Hahn violated Perrea’s equal protection rights if she surplussed Perrea on the basis of the staff racial balance provisions. The staff racial balance provisions in the collective bargaining agreement arose out of the Bronson v. Board of Education of Cincinnati, No. 1:74-cv-205 (S.D. Ohio), school desegregation case. The staff racial balance provisions previously had been upheld by the Sixth Circuit in Jacobson v. Cincinnati Board of Education, 961 F.2d 100 (6th Cir.1992). This Court has concluded that today the Sixth Circuit would apply strict scrutiny analysis and find that the provisions are unconstitutional, but no court had so found in February 2008 when Perrea was surplussed. For these reasons, the Court concludes that Hahn did not violate a clearly established right and she is entitled to qualified immunity on Perrea’s equal protection claim.”)

New v. Perry, No. 2:07-cv-723, 2009 WL 483341, at *4, *12 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 25, 2009) (“Although Saucier also held that the questions must be decided in this exact order, the Supreme Court recently retreated from that requirement and now allows the lower courts to decide the questions in either order. [citing Pearson] However, the Supreme Court recognized that this framework will often continue to be beneficial in many cases involving qualified immunity. . . Here, the Court sees no reason to depart from the traditional approach. Accordingly, the Court will first turn to whether the facts, as alleged by the plaintiffs and taken in the light most favorable to them, show that one or more of the defendants violated a right protected by the Fourth Amendment. . . . Mr. New’s allegations concerning his being dragged to the lab, kneed in the back, and slammed to the ground create a triable issue of fact concerning whether the force used was reasonably related to the goal of having his palms printed. Having found that Mr. New has asserted a viable constitutional violation, the Court must determine whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. Generally speaking, a suspect has a clearly-established right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . Reasonable officers would have been aware that this level of force could not be justified solely on the basis of the officers' perceived right to take Mr. New's palm prints, especially given the fact that he was not under arrest for a crime at the time the force was applied.").

Hysell v. Thorp, No. 2:06-cv-170, 2009 WL 262426, at *14 n.11, *20, *21 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 2, 2009) ("The Supreme Court very recently held that courts are no longer required to consider these two questions in this particular order. Pearson v. Callahan, __ S.Ct. __, 2009 WL 128768, at *9 (U.S. Jan. 21, 2009). However, it also noted that this sequence is still 'often appropriate.' Id. In this case, the Court sees no reason to vary the standard approach. . . . To summarize, the Court finds that Sergeant Carson violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights when he used the arm bar hold and leg sweep to take Plaintiff to the ground. The Court also finds that Sergeant Carson and Deputy Kimble violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights when they subsequently forced Plaintiff's arms up behind his back in order to handcuff him. Having found that these officers engaged in excessive force, the Court turns next to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, i.e., whether the constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, Plaintiff was accused of committing two misdemeanors. He was not actively resisting arrest and posed no immediate threat to the officers or anyone else. . . . It is clearly established that when an arrestee is not violent and poses no immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, officers are not entitled to inflict unnecessary pain. . . . In the Court's view, the law of this circuit, as it existed on the date of Plaintiff's arrest, put Defendants on fair notice that their conduct in effecting his arrest was unlawful. Because the law was clearly established, the Court concludes that Deputy Kimble and Sergeant Carson are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Haro v. Porter County, Indiana, 129 F.4th 992, 997-99 (7th Cir. 2025) ("On appeal, Haro concedes that the anomaly on the scan gave rise to reasonable suspicion of concealed contraband and justified the initiation of a strip search. She objects, however, to the scope of the search, arguing that reasonable suspicion dissipated the moment Officer Bradley had the opportunity to observe the metal snaps on the body suit. After this point, Haro argues, it was unreasonable for Officer Bradley to proceed with the most intrusive and humiliating steps of the search (the visual inspection of Haro's naked body and body cavities). We are unaware of any case in which a court has found that reasonable suspicion was dispelled partway through a strip search. Acknowledging that this is likely a novel factual scenario, Haro analogizes to reasonable suspicion cases from other contexts and relies on the general principle that 'the purposes justifying a police search strictly limit the permissible extent of the search.' . . . But the cases on which Haro relies are inapposite. Haro cites multiple district court cases in which reasonable suspicion of contraband dissipated after a preliminary search turned up empty. By contrast, the cavity inspection conducted by Officer Bradley was not a secondary or separate search—it was simply one part of a single strip search. And the body cavity inspection was in no way untethered to the original justification for the strip search. The scan gave rise to reasonable suspicion that Haro was concealing contraband in a body cavity, and it was reasonable to perform the visual cavity search to confirm or dispel that suspicion. . . . Officer Bradley did not exceed the permissible scope of the search by completing every step of the strip search process, including the visual cavity inspection. Nor is there any suggestion that Officer Bradley otherwise carried out the search in an unreasonable manner: it is undisputed that she conducted the search in a private area with no one else present, that the inspection was visual only, and that she moved through the steps of the search swiftly—particularly the body cavity inspection, which lasted only 10 to 20 seconds. Of course, even the most efficient strip search is still a significant invasion of privacy, and we do not minimize what was undoubtedly a distressing and unpleasant experience for Haro. But given the facts presented here, no rational jury could conclude that Officer Bradley’s actions violated the Fourth Amendment. Because Officer Bradley’s actions were not unconstitutional, we need not consider her qualified immunity defense. And in the absence of any underlying constitutional violation, there is no liability for the Porter County Sheriff’s Department under Monell.”) Sabo v. Erickson, 128 F.4th 836, 843-48 (7th Cir. 2025) (en banc) (“The second element of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether existing law clearly established the right Sabo alleges Hicks and Haley violated—decides this appeal. Accordingly, we begin and end our analysis there. . . . [W]here the reasonableness of an officer’s actions depends on the circumstances, as it does here, plaintiffs must define clearly established law with much more specificity. [citing Mullenix] The dissent objects that Mullenix, a Fourth Amendment case, has little to say in the Eighth Amendment context. This misstates the law. The Supreme Court has explained that qualified immunity’s ‘clearly established’ requirement protects ‘officials accused of violating “extremely abstract rights.”’ . . . So, where a plaintiff alleges the violation of an abstract right, as Sabo has done here, ‘[t]he Fourth Amendment provides an example of how qualified immunity functions.’ . . . Moreover, our court does not break new ground when defining clearly established Eighth Amendment law with specificity. The Supreme Court, too, has demanded factual particularity in the Eighth Amendment context. See Taylor v. Barkes, 575 U.S. 822, 825–26 (2015) (unanimously rejecting the existence of a clearly established right ‘to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols’ where ‘[n]o decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening’). In short, qualified immunity protects ‘all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . . To determine whether clearly established law prohibited the defendant’s conduct, we must frame the asserted right ‘in terms granular enough to provide fair notice.’ . . . In Campbell v. Peters, our court imported the deliberate indifference standard into cases where plaintiffs alleged that correction officials incarcerated them beyond the term of their sentence. . . . We remarked that ‘[a]t a general level,’ unlawfully extended incarceration, if ‘the product of deliberate indifference,’ could violate the Eighth Amendment. . . . Our court has subsequently reaffirmed that precept. . . . Sabo relies upon these general principles to contend that Hicks and Haley violated clearly established law when they did not take corrective action after discovering they had reviewed thousands of judgments of conviction, including Sabo's, under an erroneous probation standard. . . . When we compare the precedent Sabo cites in support of this allegation against the facts of his case, three crucial differences immediately surface. These differences preclude a finding that the alleged unlawfulness of Hicks and Haley's conduct 'follow[s] immediately' from clearly established law. . . . First, Hicks and Haley lacked notice of Sabo's erroneous sentence. Sabo's attorney never brought the error to their attention. Nor did a corrections staff member, probation agent, court official, or anyone else. Yet, notice to the defendants was the linchpin of our court's decision in Figgs. . . . Second, Hicks and Haley were not the source of the error that injured Sabo. The error derived from an unlawfully long term of probation imposed by his sentencing judge. . . . Holding Hicks and Haley liable for not correcting a judicial error would require an expansion of our precedent. . . . We therefore reject the contention that existing law clearly establishes that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they do not intervene to correct a sentencing judge's error. Third, the error within Sabo's judgment of conviction sentenced him to an unlawfully long term of probation, not incarceration. In previous cases, the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the risk that the plaintiff was unlawfully incarcerated. Here, the risk was a level removed. Hicks and Haley knew that among the tens of thousands of sentences they reviewed, some probationers may serve an unlawfully long term of probation. But those affected would only face unlawful imprisonment if they violated a term of their probation and the state pursued that violation. True, probation is a form of custody. . . . We do not suggest that sentencing a defendant to an excessive term of probation is anything less than serious. Nevertheless, we frame our qualified immunity inquiry with granularity so as to provide fair notice. Correctional officers are not lawyers, and '[i]t is sometimes difficult for an officer to determine how the relevant legal doctrine ... will apply to the factual situation the officer confronts.' . . . We cannot say, then, that all but the 'plainly incompetent' would deduce from existing law that constitutional liability extends to records keepers who show deliberate indifference to an excessive term of probation. . . . With these differences in mind, we conclude that existing precedent is not so clear that 'every reasonable official would interpret it to establish the particular rule the plaintiff seeks to apply.' . . . As such, Hicks and Haley are entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.")

Sabo v. Erickson, 128 F.4th 836, 852-53, 856-57 (7th Cir. 2025) (en banc) (Jackson-Akiwumi, J., joined by Maldonado, J., dissenting) ("The majority would effectively require litigants—at the pleadings stage, no less—to establish not just that they seek to enforce a clearly established right but that the right has an almost perfect analog in existing case law. Here, that means that even though John Sabo was unlawfully held in custody and even incarcerated as a result, he cannot ask a factfinder to hold the responsible officials accountable. I cannot agree with such a narrow gateway for § 1983 litigants (or, conversely, such a wide window for defendants to avoid the specter of liability), so I dissent. In Part I, I counter the majority's view of what plaintiffs must do to overcome the defense of qualified immunity, and I emphasize the low bar for plaintiffs to state a claim for relief. In Part II, I explain why the differences between this case and our existing precedents are slight ones that do not warrant granting Wisconsin state officials Sheri Hicks and Debra Haley qualified immunity at this juncture. . . . Today the majority concludes that Sabo, as plaintiff, needs to cite clearly established law 'with much more specificity' than usual to show that qualified immunity does not apply. . . Precedent does not support this conclusion. The majority relies on Mullenix v. Luna, in which the Supreme Court observed that Fourth Amendment cases are so particularly fact-dependent that specificity is ‘especially important.’ . . The Mullenix Court did not, as the majority suggests, impose a heightened standard for plaintiffs to overcome qualified immunity, let alone in an Eighth Amendment case. In support of this heightened standard, the majority also cites Ziglar v. Abbasi—again outside the Eighth Amendment context—in which the Supreme Court imported from Mullenix a need for factual specificity ‘with respect to abstract rights’ when defining clearly established law. . . Sabo’s asserted right is far from abstract. The right not to be held in state custody for an unlawfully long period as the result of deliberate indifference is specific and well-defined, as I explain below. . . Additionally, the majority acknowledges, . . . but fails to apply, the principle that the defendants’ assertion of qualified immunity does not increase Sabo’s pleading standard. Sabo must provide only a ‘short and plain statement’ of a plausible claim. . . He need not anticipate nor overcome affirmative defenses like qualified immunity in his complaint. . . Under these well-known pleading standards, Sabo adequately stated a claim. Taking his factual allegations as true, he was kept on probation for an unlawful period, and he was even incarcerated because he violated probation conditions that should have ended months earlier. Hicks and Haley were responsible for checking and revising sentences that did not comply with the law—state law, to be sure, but I will address that red herring separately. When they reviewed the sentence here, they were incorrect about what the law permitted for convictions like Sabo’s. No one—Sabo included—considers this kind of mistake to violate the federal Constitution. But when Hicks and Haley learned that the law did not permit a category of sentences that they had approved in the exercise of their official duties, they were then certain that they had failed to correct at least some overly long terms of probation. In other words, Sabo has pleaded, they had actual notice of this fact. Hicks and Haley also had the ability, at a minimum, to notify someone of their error, and potentially could have personally discovered the names of probationers with unlawful sentences. (To assume their inability to do so is to draw inferences in the defendants’ favor rather than Sabo’s.) What they did instead was nothing at all: They consciously disregarded a known risk that one or more persons who had served out a full sentence remained in the custody of the state with liberty significantly curtailed. These allegations state a claim that the defendants violated Sabo’s rights under the Eighth Amendment (a finding the majority opinion avoids but casts serious doubt on). And these allegations describe a violation of a clearly established right. Sabo’s account of the facts warrants at least discovery to uncover the context for Hicks and Haley’s failure to act. . . . What are the consequences of the analytical framework the majority has adopted? Using such slight distinctions between Sabo’s allegations and the prior cases to deny that the constitutional right in this case is clearly established prevents plaintiffs from enforcing their rights in all but the most oft-repeated scenarios. Yet the Supreme Court has consistently reminded us that it ‘is not necessary, of course, that the very action in question has previously been held unlawful’ and that ‘an officer might lose qualified immunity even if there is no reported case directly on point.’ . . Viewing the slight distinctions between Sabo’s allegations and the prior cases as dispositive differences does nothing to ensure that defendants are on notice of their constitutional obligations. See Joanna C. Schwartz, Qualified Immunity’s Boldest Lie, 88 U. Chi. L. Rev. 605, 610 (2021) (showing that officers are not trained to make decisions based on granular factual scenarios, but on broad principles). Further, the early stage of the proceedings in this case makes the majority's narrow definition of 'clearly established' even more burdensome. To avoid dismissal, need a plaintiff map his factual assertions wholesale onto those described in prior judicial decisions? We seem close to imposing such a requirement. (The majority insists that this case does not closely depend on factual determinations, making it proper to address qualified immunity at the pleadings stage, but this is belied by its reliance on factual distinctions to show that this case is purportedly unlike any other.) There are sound reasons, which I need not repeat here, why courts ought not to decide most affirmative defenses, and especially qualified immunity, on the pleadings. . . Although untimeliness, for example, can be evident from the face of a pleading, qualified immunity, with its fact-specific nature, is different. The Supreme Court's instruction to decide immunity 'at the earliest possible stage in the litigation,' . . . cannot mean we should reject a plaintiff's well-pleaded complaint, much less raise the pleading standard to do so. Separate from the question of whether the right we have all been discussing is 'clearly established,' there is obviously the question of whether the right exists at all. That matter ought to be settled. We have frequently decided that a defendant's actual notice of a group of prisoners at risk of a constitutional violation creates an obligation to do something to prevent it, if in the position to do so. . . Here too, Hicks and Haley had notice that a group of people in state custody were at risk of a constitutional violation and, though Hicks and Haley were able to take action to abate the risk, they did not. It is not clear why the standard widely used in other prison contexts would not also apply here. . . Correctional officials in records departments, like their counterparts within prisons, are accountable when they turn a blind eye to constitutional violations that they are informed of and have the power to correct. In deciding that Hicks and Haley are entitled to qualified immunity before any facts are developed, the majority simultaneously (1) requires Sabo to assert a right with too much granularity and (2) prevents him from acquiring enough facts to satisfy the majority's narrower formulation of the right. (For all we know, Hicks and Haley had a spreadsheet with the names of all affected probationers; only discovery would reveal this.) The majority's moves restrain the practical availability of a remedy under § 1983 by expanding the textually untethered defense of qualified immunity. . . This, in turn, dilutes the statute's ability to 'interpose the federal courts between the States and the people, as guardians of the people's federal rights.' . I would vacate the district court's dismissal of Sabo's deliberate indifference claim against Hicks and Haley. I respectfully dissent.")

Tousis v. Billiot, 84 F.4th 692, 696-702 (7th Cir. 2023) ("To summarize, for the purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, the material undisputed facts demonstrate that Agent Billiot pulled in front of Tousis shortly after Tousis engaged in a reckless, high-speed flight from police officers after leaving a suspected drug house; that Billiot exited his car and ran toward Tousis, placing himself fewer than two car lengths from the front of Tousis's car, shouting commands to turn off and exit the vehicle; that Tousis, turning his wheels to the right, began to move forward; and that Billiot then fired the fatal shot, fearing both for his own safety and for that of the public if Tousis resumed his reckless flight. That brings us to the basis for the appeal: Aleia Tousis sued Billiot under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that Billiot violated her father's rights under the Fourth Amendment when Billiot used excessive force to effect a seizure of her father. Billiot moved for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The district court denied the motion, and Billiot appeals. . . . We exercise our discretion to focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity test in deciding this issue: whether Billiot's use of deadly force in this situation violated clearly established law. . . . As in Tolliver, Billiot was immediately in front of Tousis's car, much less than two car lengths away, when the vehicle began to move forward. That the wheels were turned to the right does not change the calculus. First, in a very small space, even a car maneuvering to the right poses a serious danger to a person standing in front of it. Cars making turns do not proceed horizontally; they follow an arc, and the undisputed evidence establishes that Billiot was standing very close to the front end of Tousis's car when it began to move forward and to the right. Indeed, Aleia repeatedly faults Billiot for placing himself in the zone of danger. . . . Second, Billiot had no way of knowing whether Tousis would change direction or accelerate. As in Tolliver, a reasonable officer in these circumstances would be in fear of being hit by the moving vehicle. . . . Tousis had engaged in a lengthy, reckless flight at speeds in excess of 114 miles per hour, weaving in and out of traffic as he fled officers who were forced to abandon the pursuit in the interest of public safety. By Aleia's own admission, at the time that Billiot fired the shot, Tousis was maneuvering to the empty right lane in order to evade the police once again. A reasonable officer could have concluded both that Tousis was intent on resuming his flight and that he would again pose a serious danger to public safety. In light of Tolliver and Plumhoff, Billiot's actions thus did not violate clearly established law; in fact, established law holds to the contrary that the officer's actions were objectively reasonable in substantially similar situations. Aleia's arguments to the contrary do not withstand scrutiny. Because we have elected to decide the case on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we need not engage the appellant's arguments related to the first prong, whether Billiot violated Tousis's Fourth Amendment rights. We consider instead only Aleia's arguments related to whether Billiot violated clearly established law by using deadly force in these circumstances. On the issue of the use of deadly force when there is a danger to the officer, Aleia relies on Estate of Starks v. Enyart, 5 F.3d 230 (7th Cir. 1993). She contends that Starks clearly established that deadly force could not be used against a non-threatening individual when the officer created the encounter that ostensibly permitted the use of deadly force. . . . Under Starks, she contends, an officer may not step into the path of the vehicle and unreasonably create the threat that then justifies the use of deadly force. But her contention is missing an important word that distinguishes Starks from this case: Starks hints only that an officer may not step into the path of a moving vehicle and then justify the use of deadly force by claiming to be threatened by the use of the car as a deadly weapon. In this instance, Billiot exited his car to stand before a stationary vehicle that was initially blocked in by traffic. Billiot did not create the danger; Tousis did when he began to move forward toward the officer. Starks thus did not place the constitutional question confronted by Agent Billiot beyond debate. . . . He was not on fair notice that the use of deadly force was unreasonable in these circumstances, and he was therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In sum, in the circumstances presented here, Billiot had an objectively reasonable belief that his own life and the lives of the public were at risk when he fired the shot that killed Tousis, and there was no case law warning Billiot that his actions under those circumstances amounted to excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Billiot was therefore entitled to summary judgment on his claim of qualified immunity.") McGee v. Parsano, 55 F.4th 563, 572-75 (7th Cir. 2022) (“We begin and end with step two of the qualified-immunity inquiry: whether the unlawfulness of the officers’ conduct was clearly established at the time of Carter’s death. We choose this path in light of the Supreme Court’s instruction that ‘lower courts “should think hard, and then think hard again,” before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim.’ . . . For a right to be clearly established, ‘existing precedent must ... place[] the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . . Put differently, every reasonable officer must have understood that deferring to the judgment of medical staff in these circumstances was unlawful. . . . Here, our caselaw points decidedly in one direction, but it does so in favor of the officers’ reasonableness. We therefore hold that the corrections officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . King controls our decision here. Simply put, it dictates that corrections officers are not constitutionally obligated to override the judgment of medical professionals unless they have reason to know that an inmate is receiving inadequate treatment. This remains true even when an inmate is in obvious distress and even when the medical staff has misdiagnosed an inmate—or worse, accused him of faking a very real illness. Our cases since King have affirmed these principles. [citing Miranda and Estate of Perry] Importantly, King was decided at step one of the qualified-immunity inquiry. In other words, it affirmatively established that a corrections officer may trust jail medical professionals to provide inmates with appropriate medical care. There is accordingly no legal basis for McGee’s contention that at the time of Carter’s death, the law was clearly established in her favor. Still, McGee attempts to distinguish King and its progeny. She contends that both Carter’s medical distress and the inadequacy of Nurse Bates’s medical treatment was, or should have been, obvious to the corrections officers. But the obviousness of Carter’s deteriorating health—McGee’s first point—has minimal relevance under our caselaw. Instead, the appropriate inquiry for a medical-care claim is whether the officers ‘ha[d] a reason to believe (or actual knowledge)’ that the medical staff was ‘mistreating (or not treating)’ an inmate. . . . To the extent the obviousness of Carter’s condition has any relevance, we have found that corrections officers are entitled to defer to the medical staff in circumstances far more obvious than these. For example, in King the inmate experienced severe shaking and foaming at the mouth. Carter’s symptoms—lethargy, incoherence, and labored breathing—were more subtle. We thus constrain our analysis to McGee’s second point: whether Nurse Bates provided Carter with obviously inadequate medical treatment. And we do so with the qualified-immunity standard in mind. Under that standard the key question is whether Bates’s treatment was so obviously inadequate that every reasonable officer would have known that he could not rely on her medical judgment. . . . In hindsight we know that Carter was experiencing symptoms of diabetic ketoacidosis. But like in King, the lay corrections officers lacked the requisite medical training to either identify or treat Carter’s medical condition. Similarly, they ‘lacked the capacity to judge whether [Nurse Bates] made an inappropriate diagnosis.’ . . . And they later observed Bates attempt to treat what appeared to be a diabetic-related illness. In short, McGee has presented no evidence, other than her own sheer speculation, that the officers knew or had reason to know that Nurse Bates was providing inadequate care. McGee emphasizes that at least two officers—Page and Wallar—thought that Carter appeared sick and disagreed with the decision to move him out of the medical unit. But recognizing that someone is sick is not the same as knowing that he is receiving inadequate care from a trained medical professional. Additionally, McGee’s evidence is insufficient to clear the qualified-immunity hurdle. To prevail, McGee must show that every reasonable officer would have understood that relying on Nurse Bates’s medical judgment was unlawful. Simply put, she has not done so. To reiterate, this case concerns only whether the five corrections officers who transported Carter from the medical unit to the disciplinary unit are entitled to qualified immunity. Under our caselaw, corrections officers may reasonably rely on the judgment of jail health professionals, and the qualified-immunity doctrine protects officers from reasonable mistakes when they do so. Accordingly, the corrections officers here are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Gaddis v. Demattei, 30 F.4th 625, 632-33 (7th Cir. 2022) (“Gaddis’s argument boils down to a claim that officers violated—if not the letter, at least the spirit—of the Payton rule by raising the possibility of further charges if he exercised his undisputed right to stay inside his home and demand that officers procure a warrant for his arrest. There are cases recognizing the possibility that officers may violate Payton by engaging in behavior to coerce an occupant out of his home. . . . Critically though, that same line of case law notes that circuits are split between a narrow reading of Payton requiring actual entry into the home for a violation and those recognizing the kind of ‘legal fiction of constructive or coercive entry’ described above. . . . Notably, our circuit has to date limited Payton to its literal holding that non-exigent warrantless arrests inside the home violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Given this, it is axiomatic that there is no ‘clearly established law’ in our circuit establishing what officers may permissibly do to encourage an occupant to come outside within the limits of the robust Fourth Amendment protections forbidding warrantless routine arrests inside the home as recognized by Payton and its progeny. . . . Because Gaddis cannot identify the required clearly established law, we need not inquire whether the officers here violated the constitution. (Although we note that our failure to reach the issue should in no way be read as sanctioning the use of threats or deception to ‘encourage’ a suspect to step out of his home.) It is enough that at the time of Gaddis’s arrest, it was not clearly established that such a statement, followed by an ostensibly consensual choice to exit one’s home and face arrest, would violate the Fourth Amendment’s prohibition on routine warrantless arrests inside the home.”)

Calderone v. City of Chicago, 979 F.3d 1156, 1162-63 (7th Cir. 2020) (“The district court correctly held that the individual defendants are immune from Calderone’s Second Amendment claim. Calderone argues ‘there is absolutely a clearly-established right to carry and possess a firearm for self-defense in this jurisdiction.’ However, the defendants did not fire Calderone for possessing a firearm in self-defense; they ‘fired her for shooting Selene Garcia about the body.’ Therefore, Calderone must demonstrate there is a clearly established right to discharge a gun under these circumstances, not to simply possess a gun in public. . . . [T]he parties have not provided—nor have we located—a single decision considering the circumstances in which discharging a firearm constitutes self-defense for purposes of the Second Amendment. Lacking any discernible standard, the scope of the right remains a matter of first impression. Qualified immunity is particularly appropriate in this situation. . . . Furthermore, judicial restraint counsels in favor of bypassing the constitutional question presented. . . . The parties have not adequately briefed the contours of the right Calderone asserts, namely, (1) the circumstances under which a gun may be discharged in self-defense under the Second Amendment, or (2) whether such a right applies to Calderone's conduct. Calderone did not propose the contours of the right beyond her general assertion that Moore means it exists. On appeal, the City argued the 'right to armed self-defense codified in the Second Amendment is limited to the two narrow forms of common-law self-defense recognized when that Amendment was adopted' and that 'Calderone was not engaged in either of the two narrow forms of self-defense falling within the scope of the Second Amendment.' However, the City did not raise either argument at the district court below. 'In civil litigation, issues not presented to the district court are normally forfeited on appeal.' . . . The prudent approach, therefore, is to decline to address whether Calderone's supervisors violated her constitutional rights. Calderone broadly declares that 'there is absolutely a clearly established right to carry and possess a firearm for self-defense' under the Second Amendment. The Supreme Court has repeatedly cautioned us to not identify a constitutional right at too high a level of generality. . . . At the proper level of generality, just about the only thing that is clear about this case is that existing precedent did not establish whether Calderone's shooting of Garcia was constitutionally protected. The individual defendants are immune from suit on the Second Amendment claim.")

Siler v. City of Kenosha, 957 F.3d 751, 758-60 (7th Cir. 2020) ("In the case before us, we believe that our obligation to provide further guidance to the bench and bar and to the law enforcement community counsels that we employ the Saucier sequential protocol and address the merits of the constitutional question presented. . . . Law enforcement officers on the scene do not have the luxury of knowing the facts as they are known to us, with all the benefit of hindsight, discovery, and careful analysis. Officers must act reasonably based on the information they have. We must always keep in mind that encounters in the field require officers to make split-second decisions of enormous consequence. If a reasonable officer in Officer Torres's shoes would have believed that Mr. Siler posed an imminent threat of serious physical harm, or that he had committed a crime involving serious physical harm and was about to escape, the Officer's use of force was reasonable. . . . The obligation to consider the totality of the circumstances in these cases often makes resort to summary judgment inappropriate. . . . Nevertheless, if a careful examination of the papers reveals that the material facts are undisputed, and if a court draws all inferences from those facts in favor of the nonmovant, reasonableness is a pure question of law. . . . Of course, when material facts are disputed, a jury must resolve those disputes and determine whether the officer acted reasonably. . . . From the Officer's perspective, Mr. Siler was a significantly larger and younger man who had a reputation for physical violence. He had refused every opportunity to surrender during the chase, and, critically, had decided to change the status quo of a standoff. Despite the fact that the Officer had his service revolver in his hand, Mr. Siler chose to become the aggressor. To Officer Torres, the possibility of being overcome, or at the very least disarmed, was a real one. To have someone in Mr. Siler's aggressive state of mind—recall that Mr. Siler had just dared the Officer to shoot him—gain possession of the service revolver and be able to use it against the Officer or the two bystanders in the garage was, to put it mildly, an unacceptable outcome. The Officer had the right to protect himself and the bystanders through the use of deadly force. . . . Because his use of force was reasonable, Officer Torres did not violate Mr. Siler's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Torry v. City of Chicago, 932 F.3d 579, 586-88 (7th Cir. 2019) (“Qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages as long as their actions do not violate ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . Thus, to win, the plaintiffs must show not only that the stop was unlawful, but also that the unlawfulness of the stop was clearly established at the time that it occurred. Because the plaintiffs cannot make the latter showing, we need not consider whether the stop violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . The plaintiffs do not contend that this is the rare case in which the facts establish a blatant violation of Terry’s rule even though there is no case on point. . . . Instead, they identify two cases that they say clearly established the illegality of this Terry stop: Gentry v. Sevier, 597 F.3d 838 (7th Cir. 2010), and United States v. Packer, 15 F.3d 654 (7th Cir. 1994). . . . Neither Gentry nor Packer speaks to a situation like this one, where the plaintiffs partially matched the description of suspects involved in a drive-by shooting. When the officers in this case stopped the plaintiffs, they knew that three black men in a grey car were suspected of committing a nearby shooting earlier that day. The plaintiffs matched this description in number, race, and car color. . . . The plaintiffs argue that the reasonableness of the officers’ suspicion was nevertheless undermined in two ways: first, the descriptions that the officers relied on identified the suspects’ vehicle as an SUV, but the plaintiffs were in a sedan; and second, the shooting occurred too far away (half a mile) and too long before (four hours) to justify the stop. But while these discrepancies may weigh against the officers’ suspicion, they don’t clearly overcome it. . . . Taking all of this evidence together, a reasonable officer could have concluded that the investigative Terry stop of the plaintiffs comported with the Fourth Amendment.”)

Dale v. Agresta, 771 F. App’x 659, ____ (7th Cir. 2019) (“We agree with the district court that Agresta is entitled to qualified immunity because Dale did not have a clearly established right to a seatbelt. True, the Eighth Amendment protects inmates from prison officials knowing of and disregarding excessive risks of future harm. . . . But that principle is too general to defeat qualified immunity. . . . Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ruled that transporting an inmate without a seatbelt creates an intolerable risk of harm. . . . Moreover, other circuits have concluded that, without reckless driving or other exacerbating circumstances, failing to seat-belt a shackled inmate does not pose a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Dale lacks evidence that Agresta did anything to increase the risk of harm beyond transporting him in a van without seatbelts. Because we conclude that Dale did not have a clearly established right to a seatbelt, we need not consider whether Agresta violated that right. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009).”)

Mason-Funk v. City of Neenah, 895 F.3d 504, 507-10 (7th Cir. 2018) (“We have discretion to choose which prong to address first, . . . and since the second prong is dispositive here, we address only whether the right at issue was clearly established. . . . [S]ince these two decisions, the Supreme Court has made clear that ‘Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.’ . . . Mason-Funk argues that existing case law put Officers Hoffer and Ross on notice that their conduct and use of deadly force was unconstitutional. More specifically, she contends that the officers were on notice (1) that they had a constitutional obligation in hostage situations to protect innocents and distinguish between the suspect and innocents; (2) that Funk's conduct did not create an imminent threat justifying the use of deadly force; and (3) that deadly force may not be used without providing a warning, except in extraordinary circumstances. We first examine Supreme Court precedent and precedent from this Circuit to determine whether a right was clearly established at the time of violation. . . . Mason-Funk relies on Garner for the second and third propositions above—deadly force is only permissible when the suspect poses a threat of imminent harm to the officers or others, . . . and deadly force may be used to prevent an escape only 'if, where feasible, some warning has been given.' . . . But Mason-Funk admits that Garner alone does not create clearly established precedent and that this is far from the obvious case where it might create such precedent. . . . No existing precedent squarely governs the facts and circumstances that confronted Officers Hoffer and Ross. . . . Consequently, the officers were not on notice that their use of deadly force on an armed individual, without warning in a dangerous and chaotic hostage situation, violated any clearly established right. Funk fails to cite to any precedent, outside of a vacated Ninth Circuit opinion and a handful of district court cases, which involved a hostage situation. On this basis alone, the remaining cases cited by Funk are factually distinct and incapable of giving the officers any fair warning that they violated a clearly established right. In the circuit cases cited by Funk, the individuals armed with guns did not pose an imminent threat to the officers based on the context of those confrontations. However, the backdrop here to the officers' use of deadly force was an active and dangerous hostage situation, one in which they had been shot at by the hostage-taker. These circumstances, absent in Garner, Weinmann, Cooper, or Baker, posed a unique and serious threat to the officers, undermining comparisons to the aforementioned cases. To drive home the point, it is worth recounting what occurred in the short span of six minutes. Flatoff had continuously made threats that he would kill the hostages, which prompted the hasty team to act. When the hasty team encountered Flatoff inside the shop, Officers Hoffer and Ross were met with a barrage of gunfire, including a shot that struck Officer Hoffer's helmet in what he believed was not a hostage situation, but rather an ambush. Within minutes of being shot at, the officers heard more gunfire coming from the rear entrance. When Funk appeared in their line-of-sight holding a gun, the officers, in a matter of seconds, concluded that Funk was one of the people inside the shop who had shot at them only minutes ago. Simply put, the facts in this case and existing precedent failed to put Officers Hoffer and Ross on notice that their use of deadly force, without a warning, on an armed individual in a dangerous hostage situation, was unlawful. The officers did not violate a clearly established right and they are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Sebesta v. Davis, 878 F.3d 226, 234-35 (7th Cir. 2017) (“As the plaintiff, she bears the burden of showing that there is a case ‘on point or closely analogous’ that allows us to conclude that a reasonable government employee would or should know that her conduct is unlawful. . . . Sebesta cites multiple cases to support her position that the three individual defendants should have known they were violating Sebesta’s right to familial integrity. But, as is often the case, these cases fail to meet the specificity criteria that the Supreme Court has established. . . . Though earlier decisions need not be ‘directly on point,’ . . . a look at the four cases on which Sebesta relies demonstrates that none would have alerted a reasonable official to the possibility that her conduct in the situation she confronted was unlawful. . . .Sebesta needed to show that ‘it would have been clear to [Davis, Childs, and Bean] that the alleged conduct “was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted.”’. . . She has not done so. Brokaw, Doe, and Dupuy II establish only that the state actors needed evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion of abuse or neglect in order to report, investigate, and ‘indicate’ Sebesta. Nothing in these cases would have put Davis, Childs, or Bean on notice that their suspicions were unreasonable or their actions unlawful. To the contrary, Davis, Childs, and Bean had a significant amount of evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion of future harm to the baby. . . . Because Sebesta presents no cases clearly establishing that Davis, Childs, and Bean knew that they were acting unlawfully by reporting, investigating, and ‘indicating’ her, we need not consider whether there was any violation of her constitutional right to familial integrity. The individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on her claim under section 1983.”)

Howell v. Smith, 853 F.3d 892, 897-900 (7th Cir. 2017) (“We may rest our decision on either prong of the qualified immunity doctrine. . . . Here, in the hope that our decision will provide meaningful additional guidance to police officers operating in the field, we address the first prong and determine whether Mr. Howell suffered a deprivation of a federal constitutional right. . . . Although the record is replete with evidence of Mr. Howell’s earlier difficulties with his shoulder and of his difficulties after this encounter, we must focus on what Officer Smith knew at the time of the incident. During the arrest, and while placed in handcuffs, Mr. Howell at most told Officer Smith that he recently had surgery that limited the mobility of his arm; he never stated explicitly that he was in pain or actively suffering in any way. . . . The crux of the matter is that, from Officer Smith’s perspective, he was dealing with an individual suspected of committing a felony involving the discharge of a firearm on the public way. . . . Although ‘[a] person has the right to be free from an officer’s knowing use of handcuffs in a way that would inflict unnecessary pain or injury,’ that right is tempered by the attendant ‘risk of flight or threat of injury.’ . . . Here, although Officer Smith had a duty to consider the information that Mr. Howell had given him about his condition, . . . he had very little information to evaluate. That information, moreover, clearly did not outweigh the very concrete information about the crime and the circumstances under which it was allegedly committed. Officer Smith’s decision did not violate the Fourth Amendment.”)

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 759-66 (7th Cir. 2016) (“In some situations, adherence to the traditional two-step approach is appropriate. . . . Nevertheless, the circumstances of the present case make it advisable to avail ourselves of the latitude now afforded us. . . . Indeed, there are several reasons that counsel that we not address definitively the constitutional issue. First, the underlying administrative directive is no longer operable. Secondly, the appropriate analysis for claims of detained individuals not subject to sentences of incarceration is a difficult question, and it is easy for an intermediate appellate tribunal to lose its footing on the shifting sands of present-day case authority. For a long time, we have recognized that the treatment of a detained person not serving a sentence of incarceration is governed by the Due Process Clause, . . . but we often have borrowed Eighth Amendment standards as a rule of decision. . . . We also have recognized, of course, that a person serving a sentence of probation or parole has a limited liberty interest in his freedom that cannot be curtailed without the procedural protections of notice and hearing. . . Yet, when confronted with the failure to release a person because of an error in the computation of his sentence, we have relied on the principles of the Eighth Amendment. . . Other circuits have employed a variety of approaches invoking Eighth Amendment and due process protections. . . Recently, however, the Supreme Court held that the treatment of a pretrial prisoner is governed by the substantive standards of the Due Process Clause. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). . . . Another consideration further convinces us that we should not attempt to reconcile these governing principles here. Mr. Werner has presented the due process argument to us solely as a matter of procedural due process, but we think that Kingsley, McNeil, and Baker suggest that substantive due process principles are implicated here. Rather than resolve definitively that question in a case in which counsel has not squarely raised the issue, we believe the proper course is to focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry and to determine whether the contours of the right involved were clearly established at the time of the defendants' actions. . . . For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that a reasonable official would not have known that detaining Mr. Werner pursuant to AD 02-10 was legally impermissible. . . . The Wisconsin Supreme Court's reasoning in Riesch confirms that Olson and Allen had not put the precise situation addressed by AD 02-10 'beyond debate' in Wisconsin. . . Riesch marked the first time that a Wisconsin court had focused on the inherent conflict between a sex offender's right to timely release to supervision and the rules and restrictions governing that release. The Wisconsin Supreme Court's treatment of this dilemma demonstrates that 'the right's contours were [not] sufficiently definite that' the defendants in this case would have been on notice that AD 02-10's procedure was unlawful. . . Riesch made clear that the DOC's inability to locate appropriate housing does not afford it a blank check to detain indefinitely an individual set for release from imprisonment. However, the Wisconsin Supreme Court was cognizant of the practical difficulties that can arise when release itself conflicts with the 'substantial discretionary authority' that DOC has 'to develop the rules and conditions for releas[ing]' a person to supervision. . . Rather than prohibit absolutely the DOC from detaining individuals caught in this predicament, Riesch endorsed a narrow exception: 'Where inmates violate these terms immediately and simultaneously with their scheduled mandatory release dates, the DOC should be able to maintain continuous custody.' . . Riesch therefore can be read plausibly as acknowledging that, under Wisconsin law, the DOC may 'maintain continuous custody' in the unique circumstance where release from imprisonment to a lesser level of restraint would violate the terms of release due to an inability to make practical arrangements for the implementation of that lesser restraint. . . Here, although Mr. Werner's probation violation was not, in strict terms, 'immediate [] and simultaneous[],' it was, as a practical matter, an imminent certainty. . . And although his infraction was not, like Riesch's, the product of his recalcitrance, releasing Mr. Werner to probation equally would have 'elevate[d] form over substance' to require 'a ritual where the DOC releases [noncompliant] inmates just outside the prison walls on their mandatory release dates before subsequently' detaining them. . . To be sure, the length of deferral of release from imprisonment in this case may well have been a fairly aggressive reading of Riesch. . . However, given the lack of clarity with respect to Riesch's outer limits, 'we cannot say that only someone plainly incompetent or who knowingly violate[s] the law would have ... acted as [the defendants] did.' . . . Because clearly established law at the time would not have notified the defendants in this case that the procedures set forth in AD 02-10 were unlawful, we conclude that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Werner's claims.")

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 766-70 (7th Cir. 2016) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from my colleagues' decision to grant qualified immunity to the policy-making defendants, Hamblin, Snyder Spaar, and Symdon. They adopted and enforced Administrative Directive 02-10. That policy was unconstitutional as applied to someone like Werner, who had reached his mandatory release date and who, through no fault of his own, was unable to find housing that satisfied both local laws and state parole officials. Pursuant to that policy, Werner spent 54 weeks in a county jail when that custody was clearly not authorized by state law. Werner was deprived of his liberty without due process of law. . . . For more than a year neither Werner nor anyone helping him could find lawful and suitable housing for him. Werner was kept in custody pursuant to the policy that the defendants adopted and enforced. That policy was unconstitutional and contrary to state law even when it was issued in 2002. To extend qualified immunity to these defendants, though, the majority errs by relying upon a more recent decision by the Wisconsin Supreme Court, State ex rel. Riesch v. Schwarz, 692 N.W.2d 219 (Wis. 2005). As explained below, the state court in Riesch took care to distinguish its decision from cases like Werner's, in which offenders who reach their release dates are cooperative with efforts to supervise them. Plaintiff Werner committed serious crimes and was punished severely for them. As a plaintiff, he is singularly unsympathetic. He earned his designation as a 'Special Bulletin Notification' offender by committing multiple sex offenses against children. Both during and after the period in question here, he has repeatedly violated the law. He is now back in prison after another crime. Nevertheless, the legal issues in his case extend beyond Mr. Werner and his crimes. Under the state law governing his conviction and punishment, when Werner reached his mandatory release date, he was entitled to be released from custody, subject to conditions of parole. As the majority opinion recounts, he was not released but was instead locked up in a county jail. He was kept in jail 148 out of 168 hours each week. The remaining 20 hours he was allowed to leave the jail with a chaperone to accomplish the nearly impossible job of finding housing that would comply with all the local laws applicable to convicted sex offenders and with the state's conditions of parole. More than a year after his initial 'release' to the county jail, he finally found housing that satisfied all the criteria. . . . Werner's continued custody in the county jail—and 'custody' is the only way to describe those 148 hours per week—was not authorized by state law or by a court judgment after due process of law. He was quite simply deprived of his liberty without due process of law. Executive branch officials are not authorized to lock people up indefinitely without prior court authorization. The ability to seek a writ of habeas corpus later does not mean the initial deprivation occurs with due process of law. And even a parolee, whose liberty is conditional and constrained, cannot have his parole revoked and his liberty taken away without due process of law. . . . I recognize that the combination of local laws in Brown County and the needs of effective parole supervision placed the defendants at all levels of the Wisconsin parole system in a tough spot. If they had faced Werner's situation without guidance from state law, a defense of qualified immunity would have more merit. But the slate was not clean. Similar problems had arisen before. The state courts had squarely rejected the solution of keeping offenders like Werner in custody past their mandatory release dates. . . .The Wisconsin Court of Appeals held not only that Allen had stated a claim for violation of his constitutional rights but that the violation was so clearly established that defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity: ‘We agree with Allen that Woods and Olson clearly established’ that Allen was entitled to release on parole on his mandatory release date. . . .The Allen court then rejected a further qualified immunity argument that is echoed in this case. The argument is that because some cases found unauthorized continued custody violated the Eighth Amendment while others found it violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the controlling law was not ‘clearly established.’ The Wisconsin Court of Appeals correctly found in Allen that the unlawfulness of the continued custody was clearly established in 2000 despite doctrinal arguments about whether it violated one or both amendments. The application of two basic liberties does not weaken the case. It strengthens it. The Allen court concluded, as we should, ‘that no reasonable public official could have believed that such continued detention was constitutionally permissible.’. . .The qualified immunity presents an unusual wrinkle here. Qualified immunity doctrine often indulges in the legal fiction of assuming that official defendants are aware of applicable court decisions. Here, there was no fiction at all. The policy-making defendants issued AD 02-10 after both Woods and Olson had been decided. The policy even cited both decisions, yet purported to authorize continued custody in the teeth of those decisions. To avoid reversing the judgment for the policy-making defendants, the majority invokes qualified immunity based on the Wisconsin Supreme Court’s 2005 decision in Riesch, 692 N.W.2d 219, or, more precisely, based on what the majority generously calls ‘a fairly aggressive reading’ of Riesch. A qualified immunity defense is supposed to be based upon objectively reasonable interpretations of existing law. . . .Using Riesch as a qualified immunity lifeline for the policy-making defendants is not objectively reasonable. The majority first overlooks the critical distinction drawn by the Riesch court itself and then attributes to the Wisconsin Supreme Court in Riesch an internal contradiction and confusion that simply are not present. In fact, Riesch expressly agreed with Woods and Olson and took care to distinguish Riesch’s case on grounds that apply directly here. It is no surprise that neither the district court nor the defendants, in their brief to this court or in letters to plaintiff, relied on Riesch to justify qualified immunity. Like Werner, Riesch was a sex offender who was nearing his mandatory release date. Unlike Werner, though, Riesch did not cooperate with the release and supervision process. He announced that he would not participate in the sex offender treatment program that was required as a condition of parole. He refused to provide medical information or his signature on his fingerprint record. His behavior was such that the assigned parole agent was unwilling to meet with him unless he were shackled, and he refused. Riesch had his parole revoked without ever actually leaving state custody. In his challenge to the revocation, he relied on Woods and Olson to argue that he had never actually been paroled, so that his parole could not be revoked and he should be released. The Wisconsin Supreme Court affirmed the denial of relief, but on narrow grounds that distinguished both Woods and Olson on grounds that apply directly here. The Riesch court explained: ‘Woods and Olson are unlike the present case because the inmates in those cases did nothing to warrant their continued detention at the time of their mandatory release date. In contrast, the inmate in the Macemon cases, like Riesch, violated the conditions of his parole immediately and simultaneously with his mandatory release date.’ . . .At least after Woods, Olson, and Allen, and certainly in light of the distinction drawn in Riesch, reasonable policy-making officials could not have believed that they were authorized to keep offenders like Werner in jail after their mandatory release dates. Instead, they doggedly stuck to the policy, even telling Werner that ‘Case law upholds the procedures’ of AD 02-10, without identifying the case law. . . The policy-making defendants should have known that AD 02-10 would result in unconstitutional deprivations of liberty in cases like Werner’s, where the parolee did not deliberately fail to comply with parole conditions. I would allow the qualified immunity defense for the local parole agents and their supervisors who had been ordered to implement AD 02-10, but we should reverse for trial on the claims against the policy-making defendants.”)

See also Murphy v. Madigan, No. 16 C 11471, 2017 WL 3581175, at *7-8 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 18, 2017) (“Werner acknowledged, but never resolved, the ‘difficult question’ as to whether the treatment of detained individuals not subject to sentences of incarceration, like the Plaintiffs in this case, is appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment or substantive due process. . . For example, an error in the computation of a sentence implicates the Eighth Amendment while treatment of a pretrial prisoner is governed by substantive standards of Due Process. . . Ultimately, the appellate court found defendants were entitled to qualified immunity and never attempted to reconcile the constitutional tension. Nevertheless, Werner contemplates that the same factual nucleus might raise both Eighth Amendment and substantive due process principles. Certainly at this early stage of litigation, Plaintiffs’ claims are not sufficiently developed to determine whether the claims fit more properly under substantive due process or the Eighth Amendment. A plaintiff is allowed to plead duplicative claims or claims in the alternative: ‘[a] party may set out 2 or more statements of a claim . . . alternatively or hypothetically, either in a single count . . . or in separate ones.’ Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(d)(2). The argument the claim is duplicative holds no water and Plaintiffs’ may proceed on their substantive due process claims. . . According to the Complaint, Defendants knew that Plaintiffs did not have financial resources to find housing, that there are no halfway houses that take sex-offenders in Illinois, and still rejected proposed host sites leading to indefinite incarceration. Based on these allegations, it is hard to envision an acceptable host site for an indigent prisoner: to find a house in 2017 without a smart phone is in it of itself a near impossible task. Taken together with the wide discretion Defendants have in making their housing determinations, the rejections of host sites which results in Plaintiffs’ indefinite incarceration may constitute deliberate indifference. . . These allegations are therefore sufficient to support their Eighth Amendment claim.”)

Dibble v. Quinn, 793 F.3d 803, 807, 814 (7th Cir. 2015) (“We have discretion to decide a case under the second step ‘without resolving the often more difficult question whether the purported right exists at all.’ . . We take that approach here. . . Here, we have found no case clearly establishing that motive is relevant to determining whether a validly enacted statutory amendment eliminating an employee’s property interest complies with procedural due process requirements. While Schulz suggested that such a pretext inquiry might be appropriate for a ‘purportedly legislative decision,’ it did not grapple with Bogan or cases like it, which tend to bar this type of judicial inquiry because of the special nature of legislative action. The dictum in Schulz falls well short of placing the ‘constitutional question beyond debate.’ .None of this is to say, however, that there is no support for a distinction between bona fide legislation and an adjudicative determination dressed up in legislative clothing. Drawing this line can be difficult and can have broad implications. . . .We express no view on whether a plaintiff in other circumstances might be able to make out a constitutional claim. We hold only that plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate a clearly established right that was violated by legislation ending their six-year terms as arbitrators. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Locke v. Haessig, 788 F.3d 662, 667-73 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Here we take the unusual step of beginning with the second prong because our discussion of the state of the law in 2007 and 2008 provides helpful context for analysis of later developments in the law. . . . If we accept the facts asserted by Locke, Haessig’s actions violated clearly established law at time of the violation. In 2007 and 2008, when the events took place, it was well established that sexual harassment by a state actor under color of state law violated the Equal Protection Clause and was actionable under § 1983. Valentine v. City of Chicago, 452 F.3d 670, 682 (7th Cir.2006); Bohen v. City of East Chicago, 799 F.2d 1180, 1185–86 (7th Cir.1986). It was also clear that a supervisor could be held liable for a subordinate’s sexual harassment if the plaintiff could show either intentional sex discrimination or a conscious failure to protect the plaintiff from abusive conditions created by subordinates amounting to intentional discrimination. Valentine, 452 F.3d at 683–84; Bohen, 799 F.2d at 1187; see also T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 588 (7th Cir.2010)By 2007, we had recognized that males who were sexually harassed could bring equal protection claims if they could show intentional discrimination on the basis of their sex. We reversed a grant of summary judgment where a male plaintiff presented evidence that school officials ignored his complaints of sexual harassment by male classmates but consistently punished the harassers when similar complaints were made by girls. Nabozny v. Podlesny, 92 F.3d 446, 454–56 (7th Cir.1996). It was also well established in 2007 and 2008, however, that a supervisor was not liable under a respondeat superior theory for constitutional torts committed by a subordinate. . . . And a merely negligent failure to intervene was not enough to show discrimination that violated the Equal Protection Clause. . . . A reasonable official in Haessig’s position would have known that her alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . . Accepting Locke’s version of the facts, Haessig was more than merely negligent. She failed to intervene or investigate in response to Locke’s complaint, and she then threatened to retaliate against him for complaining of harassment. . . . As in Valentine, a jury could infer that Haessig had ‘consciously chosen not to protect’ Locke from the sexual harassment and on that basis hold Haessig liable for intentional sex discrimination. . . . After Valentine, it should have been clear to a reasonable officer that Haessig’s alleged conduct was unlawful in this situation. . . . Haessig cannot claim the protection of qualified immunity on the ground that she had no notice that her actions were unlawful. . . . Haessig could still be entitled to qualified immunity if the undisputed facts show that her conduct violates no constitutional right under current law. In other words, if developments in constitutional law since 2008 mean that Haessig’s conduct did not violate any constitutional right, she would be entitled to summary judgment even if her conduct was unlawful under prevailing law in 2008. Haessig contends that her conduct violated no constitutional right because the facts show that she did not have the intent to discriminate that Ashcroft v. Iqbal, decided in 2009, now requires for supervisory liability for constitutional violations. . . . For discrimination claims like those at issue in Iqbal and here, where the state of mind of purposeful discrimination is an element of the violation, a supervisor is liable only if she had the specific intent to discriminate. . . . For these claims, the plaintiff must show ‘more than “intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences.”’. . . . The supervisor is liable for undertaking a course of action only because of, not merely in spite of, the action’s adverse effects upon an identifiable group. . . . Although Iqbal involved a claim of invidious discrimination, the Court’s discussion shaped the law of supervisory liability for constitutional violations more generally. Before Iqbal, most circuits required that a supervisor act (or fail to act) with the state of mind of deliberate indifference to be liable, no matter the underlying constitutional violation. . . . After Iqbal, we re-examined the state of mind required for supervisory liability for sexual harassment in T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583 (7th Cir.2010). . . . Haessig argues that Iqbal and Grindle together mean that there is a constitutional difference between action and inaction—that purposeful discrimination may be inferred from the former but not the latter. She contends the district court erred as a matter of law in holding that a jury could find Haessig liable for an equal protection violation for purposefully ignoring Locke’s complaint of harassment. . . . We have doubts about this argument. For one, there is little support in these cases for a distinction between action and inaction. Haessig points us to the Supreme Court’s statement that purposeful discrimination ‘involves a decisionmaker’s undertaking a course of action because of ... the action’s adverse effects upon an identifiable group.’ . . . Haessig seizes on one phrase, ‘course of action,’ as implying that a supervisor who takes no action cannot, as a matter of law, intend discrimination. We reject such an expansive reading of Iqbal. Haessig’s argument conflicts with the principle that a supervisor could be liable for ignoring complaints from one identifiable group while acting on similar complaints from those of another group. . . . Short perhaps only of a confession of intentional discrimination, selective inaction can be strong evidence of discriminatory intent. In any event, Locke has provided evidence that tends to show that Haessig’s response was more than mere inaction. A reasonable jury could infer that Haessig had the requisite intent to discriminate because she threatened to retaliate against Locke after he complained of sexual harassment. . . . Locke may submit his evidence to a jury and can prevail if he can convince the jury that Haessig treated Locke’s complaint differently because he was a man complaining of sexual harassment. Locke does not need to prove that Haessig was motivated solely by his sex in the way that she responded to his complaint, but he must show that she chose her course of action at least in part because of his sex.”) Gerhartz v. Richert, 779 F.3d 682, 687-89 & n.10 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Following Schmerber, several courts read the Supreme Court’s decision as endorsing a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases—that is, that the natural dissipation of alcohol from the blood constitutes a per se exigency. . . . Notably, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin was among those that took this view, declaring in State v. Bohling, 494 N.W.2d 399 (Wis.1993), that the exigency identified in Schmerber ‘was caused solely by the fact that the amount of alcohol in a person’s blood stream diminishes over time.’ . . The Supreme Court rejected this understanding of Schmerber in McNeely. In McNeely, the Court clarified that, ‘while the natural dissipation of alcohol in the blood may support a finding of exigency in a specific case, as it did in Schmerber, it does not do so categorically.’ . . Thus, the Court explained, ‘[w]hether a warrantless blood test of a drunk-driving suspect is reasonable must be determined case by case based on the totality of the circumstances.’ . . Mr. Gerhartz contends that the district court awarded summary judgment based on the same per se exigency theory rejected in McNeely and that, under McNeely, summary judgment was improper because there existed a genuine dispute as to whether exigent circumstances were present. In response, Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson contend, as they did before the district court, that their decision to order a blood draw on Mr. Gerhartz was lawful and that, in any event, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, because of the undeveloped nature of the factual record, we start (and end) our analysis with the clearly-established prong. During the parties’ briefing of this case, we decided a similar issue. In Seiser v. City of Chicago, 762 F.3d 647 (7th Cir.2014), we held that, prior to the Supreme Court’s decision in McNeely, the law was not clearly established on the issue of whether the natural dissipation of alcohol from the bloodstream constitutes a per se exigency. . . In arriving at this conclusion, we noted that, prior to McNeely, courts were split over this issue and that many jurisdictions—like Illinois, where the search in Seiser took place—had adopted a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases. . . Given these circumstances, the court determined that a reasonable officer in the defendant’s position ‘would have believed ... that so long as there was probable cause to justify a breathalyzer examination, there was no need to consider seeking a warrant first.’ . . Although the intrusiveness of a search is certainly relevant to its reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment, Mr. Gerhartz has not identified any clearly established authority that would have put the defendants on notice that their decision to order a warrantless blood draw (as opposed a breathalyzer test) was unlawful. Nor could he. At the time McNeely was decided, the law regarding exigent circumstances in blood-alcohol cases was just as unclear with regard to blood draws as breathalyzer tests. Indeed, both McNeely and Schmerber concerned warrantless blood draws rather than breathalyzer tests. . . .Rather, we conclude that Seiser is controlling in this case. Here, the search at issue took place in Wisconsin on February 16, 2006. At this time, approximately seven years before McNeely, Wisconsin case law recognized a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases. See Bohling, 494 N.W.2d at 402. . . Thus, Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson faced the same lack of clearly established law that confronted the defendants in Seiser. As such, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Having decided that Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson’s conduct did not contravene any clearly established law, we need not decide whether their actions in fact violated Mr. Gerhartz’s Fourth Amendment rights. Because the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, the judgment of the district court is affirmed. . . .In highlighting the defendants’ reasonable reliance on State v. Bohling, 494 N.W.2d 399 (Wis.1993), we do not mean to suggest that a state supreme court decision always will prove sufficient to demonstrate the absence of clearly established law. Crucially, at the time of the defendants’ actions in this case, neither this court nor the Supreme Court had addressed whether Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), created a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases.”)

Mordi v. Zeigler, 770 F.3d 1161, 1165-67 (7th Cir. 2014) (“There was a time when lower courts were required to follow a prescribed sequence when they considered the two questions pertinent to qualified immunity, always deciding first if the alleged facts described a legal violation, and only if they did, moving on to the question whether the law was clearly established. . . The Court thought better of this requirement in Pearson, however, and it is now permissible to reach the second question first, if that is more efficient. . . The present case, we conclude, is one that benefits from the flexibility afforded in Pearson. We thus move directly to the question whether Officers Zeigler, Chance, and Healey should have realized that, by failing to inform Mordi of his Article 36 rights, they were violating his rights. . . .At a high level of generality, one might think that federal, state, and local officials all should know the laws of the United States, including its treaties, and thus all should be held accountable if they fail to discharge ‘known’ duties like this one. But the Supreme Court has told us that this is not the correct perspective. Instead, for purposes of the present case, we must ask at least the following more specific questions: (1) does Article 36 impose a duty on an arresting officer like Zeigler to ascertain nationality at the moment of arrest; (2) does it require an arresting officer like Zeigler to notify the arrestee of possible Convention rights before it is necessary to give Miranda warnings, or before he knows whether the arrestee is from a Convention country; (3) does the treaty require an Article 36 notification prior to booking, by any and all officers who have contact with the arrestee; and (4) does the treaty require notification before an interview can take place? A common theme runs through these questions: what does it mean to inform someone ‘without delay’? A second general issue relates to personal responsibility. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that section 1983 ‘will not support a claim based on a respondeat superior theory of liability.’. . . Do Convention responsibilities attach to persons like the Officers here, who simply arrested, transported, and briefly interrogated the suspect? If so, then liability is at least possible; but if not, then these defendants cannot be held vicariously responsible for the failure of another party (perhaps the booking officer or the arraigning magistrate) to convey the required information. Existing opinions do not offer much guidance on the answers to the questions we just posed. It appears, however, that ‘without delay’ does not mean ‘instantly.’. . .It is impossible, in light of all this, to say that the law that Officer Zeigler faced was ‘clearly established’ such that he should have known that he had a personal duty to ascertain Mordi’s citizenship and then to notify Mordi about his right to consular notification under Article 36 of the Convention at the moment of arrest, or at least by the time he delivered Mordi to the police station and left him in the interrogation room. . . .Officers Chance and Healey’s role was different, but the bottom line is the same. . . . If Mordi had sued the booking officers, we might need to consider this question in greater detail, but they are no longer in the case. The interpretation and implementation of the Convention touch on the diplomatic relations of the United States, and so we think it prudent to tread carefully here. All we need to say to resolve this case is that the details of how to implement the Article 36 duty to inform the arrestee of his rights without delay have yet to be fixed. There is no clearly established law that the three Officers before us violated, and thus they are entitled to qualified immunity from suit.”)

have not yet answered important questions about this subsection, such as whether the type of conduct at issue here is ‘carrying’ or ‘going armed’ or is more properly categorized as unprotected conduct punishable under the disorderly conduct statute. . . . We think it would be imprudent to base our decision on speculation about the appropriate scope of the Wisconsin statute. In our view, the second section of the disorderly conduct statute poses significant interpretative problems that are best answered by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Including the conduct at issue here within the scope of subsection 947.01(2) would no doubt have significant ramifications on issues of state and municipal governance in matters of public safety. In this age of ‘road rage’ and similar motorist misbehavior, an individual’s driving around at a high speed while holding an unholstered weapon in plain view of other motorists raises serious issues of public safety. Whether such activity constitutes merely ‘carrying[] or going armed’ should be decided, if at all possible, by a state court far more familiar with the exigencies of state and local governance and far more familiar with the legislative practice of its state. If it were necessary to construe the problematic statutory language in order to resolve this case, we well might consider using the certification privilege accorded to us by the Wisconsin legislature. . . . However, such a necessity is not upon us since the second prong of the established qualified immunity analysis affords a solid basis for decision. ‘[I]t is apparent that the alleged right at issue [was] not clearly established’ at the time Officer Lomas acted. . . . We are convinced that Mr. Gibbs did not meet his burden of refuting Officer Lomas’s qualified immunity defense either by ‘identifying a closely analogous case or by persuading the court that the [officer’s] conduct [wa]s so egregious and unreasonable that, notwithstanding the lack of an analogous decision, no reasonable officer could have thought [s]he was acting lawfully.’ . . . Instead of identifying an analogous case, Mr. Gibbs—like the district court—points to an informal Advisory Memorandum by the Wisconsin Attorney General. . . . The Advisory Memorandum is not, of course, the sort of definitive statement of the law by the courts that would make a constitutional violation ‘clearly established.’ . . . Nor is this the sort of case where Officer Lomas’s conduct was so egregious as to be recognized universally by law enforcement officers as unlawful. Rather, as we have suggested earlier, a reasonable police officer—indeed, a reasonable court—could believe that, under the facts described above, far more than the statutorily exempted activity of ‘loading, carrying, or going armed with a firearm’ was taking place. Despite Mr. Gibbs’s repeated contentions that he was ‘just driving,’ he obviously was doing more than that. Indeed, his conduct also was sufficient for a reasonable officer to conclude—in the absence of any guidance from the Wisconsin courts—that a criminal or malicious intent was present, thus removing any protection that subsection 947.01(2) would otherwise have given Mr. Gibbs. . . . Based on the facts known to Officer Lomas about Mr. Gibbs’s behavior, it would have taken no more than an adjustment of his hand position before the gun was pointed out the window of his vehicle or even at himself. A reasonable officer in Officer Lomas’s shoes could have interpreted Mr. Gibbs’s conduct as motivated by an intent to harm himself or others. In sum, even if Officer Lomas was mistaken in believing that she had probable cause to arrest Mr. Gibbs, such a mistake was reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances of this case and in light of the undeveloped case law regarding subsection 947.01(2). Consequently, contrary to the conclusion of the district court, Officer Lomas was entitled to qualified immunity for her arrest of Mr. Gibbs.”)

White v. Stanley, 745 F.3d 237, 241, 242 (7th Cir. 2014) (“[P]olice who simply smell burning marijuana generally face no exigency and must get a warrant to enter the home. But the lack of an exigency does not end the inquiry in this case, for the deputies still prevail if the right they violated was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The necessary inquiry in this case is whether it was clearly established on March 9, 2010 that the smell of burning marijuana, standing alone, was no exigency. During the court’s discussion of whether or not the smell of burning marijuana established an exigency, it noted that ‘courts who have addressed [the issue] have answered that question in varied and conflicting ways, and there does not appear to be a universal, or even majority, approach to this question.’ The district court was right—federal and state courts have been all over the map on this issue. . . . In light of this fractured case law, we cannot say that ‘at the time of the challenged conduct, the contours of [White’s] right [were] sufficiently clear’ such that ‘every reasonable official would have understood’ that entering the home after smelling the burning marijuana violated the right. . . . It follows that the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity. Future police officers faced with a situation like the one confronting Stanley and Morrison should not feel emboldened to act as the deputies did here. Henceforth, officers who make a warrantless entry under the circumstances found in this case should expect no shelter from liability.”)

Findlay v. Lendermon, 722 F.3d 895, 899, 900 (7th Cir. 2013) (“Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242–43 (2009), encouraged courts to begin with the substantive constitutional violation, but we remain free to consider first whether the right is clearly established if doing so will conserve judicial resources. We find it economical to do so here and thus consider only whether Findlay has shown that the alleged constitutional violation—tackling a suspect under the circumstances presented in this case—was clearly established. . . . Because he has neither identified a sufficiently analogous case nor adequately explained how Lendermon’s actions were so plainly excessive that any reasonable officer would know it violated the constitution, he cannot defeat Lendermon’s qualified immunity defense. . . . In reaching this conclusion, we do not suggest that no ‘plainly excessive’ argument could ever be made from the facts as Findlay presents them. But the burden to make this showing rests squarely on Findlay. He has not done so and therefore cannot prevail.”)

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 249–51 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) (“Lyttle was acquitted of the offense of disorderly conduct, but the question is not whether he violated the ordinance, it’s whether an officer at the time could reasonably believe he was committing an offense. To require dispersal under subsection (d), officers had to reasonably believe that three or more persons in the immediate vicinity were causing disorderly conduct likely to cause substantial harm or serious inconvenience, annoyance or alarm. We don’t have to decide whether officers had probable cause to arrest, however, because we find that they had arguable probable cause to order dispersal and arrest Lyttle for his failure to comply. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 235–36 (2009) (holding that we do not need to address whether a constitutional right was violated before addressing whether the right in question was sufficiently well established). . . . We further find that although it is questionable whether officers had probable cause to arrest Lyttle, they are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. Lyttle denies that he pushed any officer or blocked the sidewalk and at the time he was arrested, there was no indication that other protestors were attempting to follow him; in fact, most of the protestors had started dispersing in the other direction, and the sidewalk was clearing. No city ordinance requires a permit for an individual to walk down the sidewalk with a protest sign. Officer Chiczewski and Officer Killackey even testified that there was nothing illegal about people walking down Michigan Avenue carrying signs and that the protestors could disperse in any direction. Cf. Weiss, 281 N.E.2d at 315 (officers could order defendant to disperse in certain direction when attempting to block a group of 3,000 demonstrators from marching into a densely populated area). The officers, however, did not violate clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would have known. Officers could reasonably (again, even if mistakenly) believe that based on their announcements and conduct in forming a line to advance the crowd west that protestors were prohibited from breaking through the police line. In fact, most protestors at the time obeyed by heading west. Lyttle was part of the group of protestors ordered to disperse and Officer Killackey could reasonably believe that Lyttle heard the dispersal order. Cf. Vodak, 639 F.3d at 746. When Lyttle attempted to cross the police line, he was told he could not continue and he responded that he had the right to proceed. A reasonable officer under this chaotic and fluid situation could have believed that Lyttle was failing to follow their orders. Officers did not have to wait for Lyttle to actually break through the police line. At the time of Lyttle's arrest, the officers were still trying to manage the crowd; forming a police line and ordering dispersal toward the permitted location of the march was the most logical way to accomplish this goal. . . . Under these circumstances, we cannot find that it would have been clear to every reasonable officer that no probable cause existed to arrest Lyttle for disobeying their order. . . . The existence of arguable probable cause to arrest Lyttle is an absolute bar to his § 1983 claim for unlawful arrest and false imprisonment.”)

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 252, 253 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) (“Thayer does not dispute that Officer Chiczewski had probable cause for his arrest. Probable cause, if not a complete bar to Thayer’s First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, provides strong evidence that he would have been arrested regardless of any illegitimate animus. See Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2095–97 (2012); see also Hernandez v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff’s Office, 634 F.3d 906, 915 (7th Cir.2011) (“[E]vidence of probable cause may act as highly valuable circumstantial evidence that the complained-of conduct would have occurred even without a retaliatory motive.”) (quotations omitted). The record shows that Thayer’s refusal to disperse, not his speech, was the ‘but for’ cause of his arrest. But even if the record permitted a competing inference in favor of Thayer, Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The case law is unsettled on whether probable cause is a complete bar to First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims. The Supreme Court has said that it is a bar to retaliatory prosecution claims. See Hartman, 547 U.S. at 261. We have not resolved the issue, see Hernandez, 634 F.3d at 915 (citing a 2002 case from this circuit), and other circuits are split, see, e.g., Skoog v. Cnty. of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 & n. 31 (9th Cir.2006) (setting forth circuit split). . . . Based on the Court's decision in Reichle, Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . As the Supreme Court held in Reichle, the 'clearly established' standard is not met in this case because neither our circuit nor the Supreme Court has 'recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.' . . . Lyttle similarly argues that Officers Killackey and Shields arrested him in retaliation for exercising his free speech rights to march down the sidewalk of Michigan Avenue with an anti-war sign. We found that the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Lyttle under subsection (d) and we see no reason to distinguish Reichle on that basis. In any event, the record is void of evidence showing that the officers acted with retaliatory animus in arresting him.")

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 254-56 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) ("Unfortunately, the class-of-one standard in this circuit is in flux. Thayer must show that he was intentionally treated differently from other similarly situated individuals and that there was no rational basis for this difference in treatment. . . . But some of our cases also require a showing of improper motive (sometimes referred to as 'illegitimate animus'). . . . Our recent attempt to clarify the standard in Del Marcelle v. Brown Cnty. Corp., 680 F.3d 887 (7th Cir.2012) (en banc) resulted in a tie vote with no controlling opinion. We therefore remain divided over the appropriate standard for a class-of-one equal protection claim against law enforcement personnel. . . . We do not need to decide what standard announced in Del Marcelle is correct because we find that Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. As we have already alluded to, this protection gives officers 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments, and protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.' . . . We ask whether every reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violates that right. . . . Even considering all the facts in favor of Thayer, we cannot conclude that every reasonable officer would have understood that by arresting Thayer, the perceived 'chief' of the group, and not Massey and Jakes that Officer Chiczewski was violating Thayer's right to equal protection. . . . Given the uncertainty in the law and the unique factual situation at issue here, the constitutional question was not beyond dispute. . . . Rather, a reasonable officer could have believed that arresting Thayer was the most effective way to gain compliance with the dispersal order.")

Miller v. Harbaugh, 698 F.3d 956, 962, 964 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We are . . . free to decide first whether the right that Miller has alleged was clearly established. In undertaking this analysis, it is critical to find the correct level of specificity. It is not enough, for instance, to say that it is clearly established that those operating detention facilities must not engage in cruel or unusual punishment. The way that the right is translated into the particular setting makes a difference. The plaintiff must show that the contours of the right are 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' . . . Even if IYC St. Charles's decision to use the metal bunk beds in rooms occupied by mentally disturbed, but not imminently suicidal, residents amounted to deliberate indifference, and thus amounted to a violation of Jamal's constitutional rights, the law in this area was not clearly established enough to defeat the supervisory defendants' claim of qualified immunity.”)

Alexander v. McKinney, 692 F.3d 553, 555, 557 & n.2, 558 (7th Cir. 2012) (“[T]he district court found that McKinney was entitled to qualified immunity because Alexander did not allege that he was deprived of a cognizable constitutional right. The only constitutional right that Alexander identified, his ‘due process rights to not be deprived of his liberty premised upon manufactured false evidence,’ was insufficient to state a claim under our circuit’s case law. . . . On appeal, Alexander argues that the district court erred in finding that McKinney was entitled to qualified immunity because his complaint adequately alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right, namely that the manufacturing of false evidence resulting in his arrest and charges being brought against him deprived him of liberty in violation of his substantive due process rights. . . For the following reasons, we disagree. . . .In both Zahrey and Whitlock, the alleged liberty deprivation came not from the initial arrest, but from the time spent in confinement after arrest—the eight months Zahrey spent in jail after having his bail revoked and the numerous years Whitlock and Steidl spent in prison after being wrongfully convicted. . . Zahrey and Whitlock are inapposite because the only liberty deprivation Alexander alleges stems from his initial arrest—he was released on bond that same day. . . . Nor does the burden of appearing in court and attending trial, in and of itself, constitute a deprivation of liberty. [citing cases] It would be anomalous to hold that attending a trial deprives a criminal defendant of liberty without due process of law, when the purpose of the trial is to effectuate due process. . . .The Fourth Amendment, not the due process clause, is the proper basis for challenging the lawfulness of an arrest. . . . Alexander cannot recast his untimely Fourth Amendment claim, thereby circumventing the statute of limitations, by combining it with a state law malicious prosecution claim and simply changing the label of the claim to substantive due process.”)

Paine v. Cason, 678 F.3d 500, 509, 510 (7th Cir. 2012), as amended on denial of rehearing and rehearing en banc (May 17, 2012) (“[W]e need not and do not decide whether—and, if so, when—there is a constitutional right to have custody prolonged so that more or better medical care may be provided. This is a qualified-immunity appeal, and the critical question is whether plaintiff’s claim rests on a ‘clearly established’ right. See Messeschmidt v. Millender, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 1244–45 (2012). Paine relies principally on decisions such as Farmer and Ortiz that concern medical care during custody. She has not cited, and we did not find, cases establishing (clearly or otherwise) a right to be kept in custody, beyond the time when release otherwise would occur, so that medical care can be provided. . . . We arrive at Paine’s third theory. The police arrested Eilman at Midway Airport, where she was safe, and let her go 7.3 miles away, just before nightfall, in a dangerous neighborhood. Data in the record show that sexual assaults are 15 times more common, per capita, in the precinct where Eilman was released than around Midway Airport. . . . It is clearly established that state actors who, without justification, increase a person’s risk of harm violate the Constitution. . . . A detainee does not have a clearly established constitutional right that release be delayed pending mental-health treatment, but it is clearly established that the police may not create a danger, without justification, by arresting someone in a safe place and releasing her in a hazardous one while unable to protect herself, and it is also clearly established that police must arrange for medical treatment of serious conditions while custody continues.”)

Gonzalez v. Village of West Milwaukee, 671 F.3d 649, 658-60 (7th Cir. 2012) (“Officers Krafcheck, Donovan, and Young were acting at a time of significant legal uncertainty about how to draw a difficult constitutional line; as such, qualified immunity applies. . . . Although Gonzalez vigorously argues to the contrary, the right to openly carry a firearm was hardly well established under the state constitution at the time of his arrests. Until the 2011 amendment to section 947.01, the legal landscape was uncharted. Gonzalez also relies on the Second Amendment, but this argument is not well developed. Invoking District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 595 (2008), he argues that the core Second Amendment right to bear arms for self-defense must include the right to openly carry a holstered handgun. But Heller was decided after Gonzalez’s arrest in West Milwaukee. And McDonald, 130 S.Ct. at 3050, which applied the Second Amendment to the States, was decided after both arrests. Whatever the Supreme Court’s decisions in Heller and McDonald might mean for future questions about open-carry rights, for now this is unsettled territory. . . . The ‘clearly established’ inquiry in qualified-immunity analysis asks whether the unlawfulness of the officer’s conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in light of pre-existing law. . . . Here, the most that can be said is that the officers failed to make a sensitive judgment about the effect of the state constitutional right to bear arms on the disorderly conduct statute and failed to predict Heller and McDonald. To the extent that any mistakes about probable cause were made, they were entirely understandable; state law was in flux, and the meaning and application of the Second Amendment was then under consideration by the Supreme Court. . . . Because open-carry rights were not clearly established under the state or federal constitutions at the time of Gonzalez’s arrests, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.” footnotes omitted)

Marcavage v. City of Chicago, 659 F.3d 626, 636 (7th Cir. 2011) (“Although the constitutionality of the Policy remains in question, the arresting officer’s objectively reasonable reliance on the permit requirement in effect at the time of the arrest is sufficient to shield him from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity.”)

Van den Bosch v. Raemisch, 658 F.3d 778, 786, 787, 789-91 (7th Cir. 2011) (“The Supreme Court has made clear that courts are free ‘to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.’ . . . In this case, we need only reach the question of whether the relevant facts ‘make out a constitutional violation at all.’ . . . We hold they do not.” Court went on to hold that (1) officials’ decision to bar distribution of newsletter to prisoners did not violate the First Amendment; (2) officials’ refusal to deliver copies of article that state prisoner had written to newsletter did not violate prisoner’s First Amendment rights; and (3) DOC policy restricting prisoner’s access to third-party mail did not violate First Amendment.)

Brooks v. City of Aurora, Ill., 653 F.3d 478, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2011) (“Courts often have held that it is reasonable to use pepper spray against a suspect who is physically resisting arrest; . . . conversely, when the use of pepper spray is gratuitous or unprovoked, courts often have considered it excessive. . . As we have stated, a reasonable police officer could have believed that Mr. Brooks was resisting arrest. Although, at this stage of the litigation, we must believe Mr. Brooks when he says that he had communicated his willingness to submit to arrest, his actions readily could be construed to belie his words; indeed, Mr. Brooks employed a number of moves designed to thwart Officer Lill's attempts to take him into custody. Additionally, given the unique risks that effecting an in-home arrest warrant poses to the arresting officers, Officer Lill had a recognized interest in taking Mr. Brooks into custody outside his apartment. . . An officer, faced with a suspect fleeing toward his home and ignoring police commands, is not obliged to give that suspect an opportunity to retreat into his home and, perhaps, to fortify himself or to escape before the officer employs reasonable means of incapacitation. . . Mr. Brooks contends, however, that the pepper spray was not applied until he had ceased backtracking and was passively facing the officers, and this description of events at least arguably squares with the video. According to Mr. Brooks, pepper spray therefore was not needed to effect his arrest. We need not decide whether a constitutional violation occurred because we believe that it would not have been obvious to a reasonable police officer in Officer Lill's position that the application of pepper spray was unlawful. To be sure, whether and how much force is reasonable in a given situation can change as the situation develops, and what is appropriate at one point may be unnecessary later on. . . Yet controlling law would not have communicated to a reasonable officer the illegality of applying pepper spray to an arrestee who has ceased active, physical resistance for a couple of seconds but has not submitted to the officer's authority, has not been taken into custody and still arguably could pose a threat of flight or further resistance. Prior cases have charted only clearer waters.")

Hernandez v. Cook County Sheriff's Office, 634 F.3d 906, 915, 916 (7th Cir. 2011) ("We are able to determine as a matter of law, based purely on the undisputed facts presented to the district court, that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the plaintiffs' claim of retaliation based on workplace complaints. As noted, the district court reviewed the facts and concluded that based on the undisputed facts, the plaintiffs were acting as public employees when they complained about unsafe conditions at the jail. Specifically, in complaining about overcrowding, the lack of supervision and the need for Plexi-glas, the plaintiffs were acting pursuant to their duties as set forth in the CCSO's General Orders. Therefore, consistent with Spiegla I. . . the district court concluded that the plaintiffs did not enjoy First Amendment protections. The conclusion based on undisputed fact that the plaintiffs acted as public employees in complaining, which the district court found to be dispositive of the merits, is equally dispositive of the qualified immunity question that the district court might have been asking. The district court properly determined that there was no violation of a constitutional right; therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim as a matter of law.")

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 829 (7th Cir. 2011) ("[T]here is no need to decide in this case whether there might be a constitutional entitlement to a judicial hearing in cases of alleged mistaken identity of parole violators. For even if the question were answered in the plaintiff's favor, it would not warrant any relief. The question is novel, and the defendants therefore protected

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832, 833, 837-39 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I join the majority opinion in affirming the dismissal of Atkins’ claims regarding his arrest and the conditions of his detention. I would resolve differently, however, Atkins’ due process claim against the individual state officials. In my view, Atkins alleged sufficiently that he was deprived of liberty without due process of law when he was held by the state for more than 48 hours without a hearing before a judge. He was entitled to a hearing in which he could have shown that he was not the same William Atkins sought on the parole violation warrant or, if perhaps he was indeed the William Atkins sought (we cannot tell from the sparse record), that he was no longer on parole at the time of the alleged violation. I agree with my colleagues, however, that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on that claim because the law was not and still is not sufficiently clear to impose individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. I therefore concur in the judgment to affirm dismissal of the claim. . . . My colleagues ultimately decline to decide the merits of Atkins’ due process claims but rely on the defense of qualified immunity to affirm the dismissal. I agree that qualified immunity applies and therefore concur in that portion of the opinion and in the judgment. But I believe that we should address the merits, for both substantive and procedural reasons. The substantive reasons are those I have explained above. My colleagues suggest, however, that we should know more about the relative merits of judicial and administrative decision-making before reaching the conclusion on the merits. After all, perhaps these identification issues are straightforward and suitable for administrative decision-making. Both judges and parole officials can make mistakes. The same argument could have been made in Gerstein and McLaughlin, however. The Supreme Court weighed the relevant constitutional interests in Gerstein and McLaughlin, and it chose judicial decision-making for good reasons. Gerstein and McLaughlin tell us that persons in the United States cannot be held in custody for more than 48 hours without requiring executive branch officials—like police or parole officers—to convince a judicial officer that there is good reason to hold the person. That rule does not disparage the abilities of executive decision-makers. The rule simply insists that executive branch actions to deprive a person of basic liberty must be subject to immediate and independent review. The rule recognizes human and institutional fallibility, as well as the value of review and accountability. . . . If my conclusion on the merits of Atkins’ claim is not correct, then an innocent, law-abiding person could be sent to prison without ever having a fact-finding hearing before a judge, let alone a jury trial. . . . There are also sound procedural reasons for deciding the merits before deciding qualified immunity here. After Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), we are not required to decide the merits before we decide qualified immunity, but the choice is left to our sound discretion. . . . Unless and until this view of the merits is accepted, law-abiding citizens who are not on parole remain vulnerable to lengthy deprivations of liberty without due process of law and without effective remedy. Individual defendants will be protected from damages liability by qualified immunity, while state governments are protected from damages liability by the limits of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and the Eleventh Amendment. . . . For these reasons, although the district court’s dismissal was correct based on qualified immunity, I would also hold that Atkins alleged sufficiently that his right not to be deprived of his liberty without due process of law was violated when he was held for so long without being brought before a judge to determine whether there was probable cause to believe he was in fact on parole and wanted under the parole violation warrant.”)

Estate of Escobedo v. Bender (Escobedo I), 600 F.3d 770, 778-80, 783, 786 (7th Cir. 2010) (“Up until the day before this case was argued, Saucier v. Katz maintained a sequential procedure for considering whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Supreme Court recently reconsidered Saucier and decided ‘that while the sequence set forth [in Saucier] is often appropriate, it should no longer be regarded as mandatory.’ [citing Pearson] Here, the Defendants limit their argument on appeal to the second prong of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis, that is: whether the law was clearly established as of July 19, 2005, that the use of tear gas and flash bang devices in these unique circumstances violates an individual’s Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . They do not contest the district court’s finding that taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Estate, a reasonable jury could find that their decision to use tear gas and flash bang devices against Escobedo, a suicidal, armed, barricaded person, was an excessive use of force under the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, for purpose of the present appeal, we turn to the second prong of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis and assume that a reasonable jury could conclude that the Defendants’ conduct violated Escobedo’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The Defendants claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established on July 19, 2005, to place them on notice that the use of tear gas and flash bang devices in these particular circumstances was unconstitutional. The Estate has the burden of establishing that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established. . . . The Estate can demonstrate that the right was clearly established by presenting a closely analogous case that establishes that the Defendants’ conduct was unconstitutional or by presenting evidence that the Defendant’s conduct was so patently violative of the constitutional right that reasonable officials would know without guidance from a court. . . . Based on controlling precedent from this Circuit and the clear trend in the law from our sister circuits, the clearly established law as of July 19, 2005, established that the use of tear gas is unreasonable when: (1) attempting to subdue individuals as opposed to mass crowds; (2) when the individual does not pose an actual threat; (3) when the individual is not holding hostages; (4) when the individual has not committed a crime and the officers are not in the process of attempting to make an arrest; (5) when the individual is armed but merely suicidal as opposed to homicidal; (6) when the individual is not attempting to evade arrest or flee from the police; and (7) when the individual is incapacitated in some form. . . . Based on the pre-existing case law, it was clearly established as of July 19, 2005, that throwing a flash bang device blindly into an apartment where there are accelerants, without a fire extinguisher, and where the individual attempting to be seized is not an unusually dangerous individual, is not the subject of an arrest, and has not threatened to harm anyone but himself, is an unreasonable use of force. Therefore, taking the facts as presented to us from the district court, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity and the issue of the officers’ decisions must be presented to a jury.”)

Estate of Escobedo v. Bender, 600 F.3d 770, 787 (7th Cir. 2010) (Manion, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Although I question whether the cases cited by the court clearly established that the officers’ use of tear gas violated the Fourth Amendment, I do believe that reasonable officials would have known that using twelve times the incapacitating quantity of tear gas to extricate a person at home alone who had only threatened to harm himself and was not suspected of committing a crime ‘was unconstitutional without guidance from courts.’ . . . For that reason, I concur with the court’s conclusion that the defendants’ use of tear gas was not protected by qualified immunity. I disagree, however, with the court’s conclusion that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for their use of the flash-bang devices. The majority opinion holds that on the date of the incident it was clearly established that the defendants’ employment of the flash-bang devices was an excessive use of force. In reaching its conclusion, the court relies upon six cases that involved the use of such devices by law enforcement. But as explained below, those cases neither separately nor collectively clearly established that the defendants’ conduct was unconstitutional. And because the defendants’ use of the flash-bang devices—unlike their use of the tear gas— was not obviously in violation of the decedent’s constitutional rights, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this issue.”)

Whitlock v. Brown, 596 F.3d 406, 408 (7th Cir. 2010) (“Under Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), we are permitted to skip directly to the second question, and we do so here. Although it is clearly established Fourth Amendment law that an officer may not intentionally or recklessly withhold material information from a warrant application, it is not clear under Indiana law that the information Brown allegedly withheld was material to the probable-cause determination for a charge of criminal conversion. Brown is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Given the breadth of Indiana’s criminal-conversion statute and the apparent absence of an implied-consent defense, the Whitlocks’ excuse was irrelevant to the probable-cause determination—or at least of such questionable relevance that Brown is entitled to qualified immunity. At best, Indiana law is undeveloped in this area.”).

Hanes v. Zurick, 578 F.3d 491, 496 (7th Cir. 2009) (“But under any view we have taken, arrests motivated by personal animus are unconstitutional. Second, the officers argue that the right announced in Hilton is dicta. Hilton states, ‘If the police decided to withdraw all protection from Hilton out of sheer malice, or because they had been bribed by his neighbors, he would state a claim under Olech.’ Hilton, 209 F.3d at 1007. Although we described that statement as dicta in a later case, . . . even dicta may clearly establish a right, see Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987). When a court holds that certain conduct violates a constitutional right but that the right was not clearly established, the constitutional ruling is arguably dicta, see Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818, but it still may clearly establish the law for future conduct, id. at 819. As Judge Calabresi has explained, ‘lucid and unambiguous dicta concerning the existence of a constitutional right can without more make that right “clearly established” for purposes of a qualified immunity analysis.’ Wilkinson v. Russell, 182 F.3d 89, 112 (2d Cir.1999) (Calabresi, J., concurring). Hilton’s statement could not be more lucid and unambiguous. Since the conduct alleged here is almost identical to the requirements set out in Hilton, a reasonable officer was on notice that such conduct violates the constitution.”).

Chaklos v. Stevens, 560 F.3d 705, 711, 716 (7th Cir. 2009) (“Deciding the constitutional question first is beneficial when courts are able to clarify or elaborate on the law in a manner that promotes its development. . . . But where ‘the constitutional question is so fact-bound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases,’ a forced resolution of the constitutional question is neither necessary nor prudent. Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 819. This case presents a paradigmatic example of such a case. As discussed further below, the quirky facts of this case complicate the constitutional inquiry. It is far from obvious whether the speech in this case is constitutionally protected and we do not think resolving the First Amendment issue serves any jurisprudential purpose. Because defendants did not violate clearly established law, we do not decide whether the facts established a constitutional violation. . . . Should it have been sufficiently clear to defendants that they could not punish Chaklos and Wist for their letter without violating the Constitution? We think not. It is clear, as plaintiffs maintain, that a public employer may not retaliate against an employee who exercises his First Amendment speech rights. . . . But, as this discussion demonstrates, the letter’s entitlement to First Amendment protection is not obvious. If the letter’s only purpose was to lodge a complaint against the no-bid contract, we would have no difficulty concluding, in this case, that defendants should have known their actiopostrns were unconstitutional. But in light of the unusual circumstances of this case, which include the dual nature of the letter at issue, the State’s split-the-baby approach toward secondary employment, and defendants’ questionable enforcement of the State’s policies, we think it unnecessary to determine whether this letter is constitutionally protected, and thus whether defendants’ actions were unconstitutional. In so holding, we emphasize that plaintiffs did not need to present a case involving a ‘protest/proposal letter.’ The question is not whether there is a prior case ‘on all fours’ with the current claim. . . . But plaintiffs’ cases regarding the impropriety of First Amendment retaliation in general do not provide fair warning to defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional.”)

Akande v. Grounds, 555 F.3d 586, 590 n.3, 592 (7th Cir. 2009) (“The Supreme Court has recently clarified that the Saucier sequence is not an inflexible requirement. See Pearson v. Callahan, ___ U.S. ___, ___ S.Ct. ___, 2009 WL 159429, *9 (Jan. 21, 2009). However, courts are still free to follow the Saucier protocol where, as here, it facilitates the expeditious disposition of a case. . . . Because Akande has failed to show that he was subjected to a constitutional deprivation, we need not inquire whether the right he invokes was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.”)

Posey v. Miro, 11 CV 5660, 2014 WL 3843940, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2014) (“This case may be one of those ‘closer calls’ where a government actor could violate substantive due process and shock the conscience even though his culpability follows from something less than intentional conduct. Miro was not involved in a high-speed chase, and may have had time to make an unhurried judgment (indeed, he claims he was driving conservatively). Miro testified that when traveling the wrong way on a one-way street, he would normally turn on his lights or siren, and that there is no reason not to do so. . . But he didn't do so here. . . A dispute exists as to how fast he was traveling at the time of impact. . . And a dispute exists as to whether he saw K.M. before impact and had time to stop. . . These facts, like those in Carter v. Simpson, 328 F.3d 948 (7th Cir. 2003), would allow a reasonable jury to find the officer's conduct to have been 'willful and wanton,' meaning that it 'show[ed] an utter indifference to or conscious disregard for the safety of others.' . . I need not decide whether Miro's conduct, if it were unintentional, violated K.M.'s due process rights because (as explained next) no such right was clearly established at the time, and Miro is entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236 (courts may resolve qualified immunity on the second step, without resolving the first step). . . According to Posey, (dicta in Lewis clearly establishes that 'deliberate indifference' shocks the conscience in all situations in which deliberation is practical. . . Given the 'close calls' and 'exact analyses' that Lewis prescribed, I disagree. Summary judgment is therefore granted on Count III, on the basis of qualified immunity.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Dimock, Trustee for Heirs of Dimock-Heisler v. City of Brooklyn Center, 124 F.4th 544, 550-52 (8th Cir. 2024) ("This court need not decide whether the officers' conduct here actually violated constitutional rights. . . Instead, this case is resolved by answering the question of whether the rights asserted were clearly established. . . . Because use of excessive force is an area of the law 'in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case,' qualified immunity applies 'unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.' . . No precedent of the Supreme Court or this circuit squarely governs the specific facts of this case. Kobe was holding a knife, so this case is distinguishable from cases where the person shot was unarmed. . . Dimock cites cases where it was unreasonable for an officer to use deadly force against a person holding a gun when that person had not yet pointed the gun at anyone or taken some other 'menacing action.' . Dimock argues that the same analysis applies to Kobe's holding of the knife because a knife is less dangerous than a gun. Viewing the facts most favorably to Dimock, Kobe did not take a menacing act with the knife. But a person at close distance holding a knife, even if not directing the blade at another person, could still cause 'serious injury or death in a matter of seconds by repositioning himself and the knife.' . Dimock argues that Kobe's mental health and fear of hospitalization should influence the reasonableness of the officers' use of deadly force against him. . . But the reasonableness of an officer's use of deadly force does not always differ based on what the officer knows about a person's mental state. . . An officer has probable cause to believe that a man poses an immediate threat of serious physical harm when the man has a knife, ignores repeated orders to drop the knife, stands up 'with the knife pointed downward and his arm at his side,' and raises his right leg as if to take a step toward an officer who is at most 12 feet away. . . Dimock tries to distinguish the facts here from Estate of Morgan v. Cook, spotlighting that Kobe's body position was away from the officers rather than toward them. But Kobe was facing his grandmother as he stood up, and to run out of the room Kobe would have had to face at least one of the officers. Kobe was within a few steps of his grandmother and each of the officers. . . It is undisputed that Kobe moved with the knife in his hand. It is undisputed he had struggled with the officers. It is undisputed that Officers Turner and Akers knew he stabbed himself earlier that year. Even with the disputed facts construed most favorably to Dimock, not all reasonable officers here would have known that they lacked probable cause to believe Kobe ‘posed an immediate threat of serious physical harm’ to his grandmother or to themselves. . . Dimock emphasizes that the officers never warned Kobe that they would use deadly force if he did not drop the knife. Officers did tell Kobe multiple times to ‘Get down on the ground.’ . . But, although failure to feasibly warn does “‘exacerbate the circumstances ‘ and mitigates against finding use of deadly force objectively reasonable,’ it does not “‘automatically” render use of deadly force unreasonable.’ . . Precedent did not clearly establish that the officers’ failure to explicitly warn Kobe made their use of deadly force against him unreasonable. Dimock concludes that a reasonable jury could find a violation of Kobe’s Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable use of deadly force. But even if the officers’ use of force was ‘over the line of reasonableness,’ that does not mean the right they violated was clearly established. . . The ‘right’s contours’ were not ‘sufficiently definite’ at the time of the shooting that ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating it.’ . . Not every reasonable officer would have understood that the use of deadly force here violated the Fourth Amendment. The right was not ‘clearly established.’ . . The district court correctly granted qualified immunity on the officers’ use of deadly force.”)

Davis v. City of Little Rock, 122 F.4th 326, 330 (8th Cir. 2024) (“This court need not determine whether the detectives violated Davis’s rights because the alleged right was not clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. See, e.g., Z.J. by & through Jones v. Kansas City Bd. of Police Commissioners, 931 F.3d 672, 687 (8th Cir. 2019) (avoiding the unnecessary question whether the detectives’ decision to use the SWAT team to execute a warrant violated the Fourth Amendment because the law was not clearly established). In Z.J., this court held as of 2010, it was not clearly established that ‘using a SWAT team to execute a search warrant,’ without reason to believe a SWAT team was necessary, violated the Constitution. . . Davis does not identify any law clearly establishing that as of September 2017, it was unreasonable to execute a no-knock warrant using a SWAT team. Detectives Bell and Ison are entitled to qualified immunity as to the execution of the no-knock warrant.”) Beard v. Falkenrath, 97 F.4th 1109, 1117 (8th Cir. 2024) (“Just like our analysis of the Equal Protection Clause, we can assume without deciding that there was a violation and still conclude that there was no clearly established right. Take gender-identity-conforming clothing. No case establishes that an all-male prison must allow an inmate to wear a miniskirt. . . .[A] plaintiff always bears the burden of showing ‘that a reasonable official would [have understood] that what he [was] doing violate[d]’ a constitutional right. . . And here, Beard cannot point to anything specific enough to clearly establish that prisons must allow inmates to wear gender-identity-conforming clothing. . . The same goes for the use of preferred gender pronouns. It is well-settled that insulting or derogatory comments are not actionable, in part because the speaker has a right to make them. . . If the Constitution offers no protection against an insult or vulgar language, then how can it extend to the misuse of a pronoun? The answer is it cannot. The guards may have been rude to Beard, and their statements humiliating, but the Constitution does not require prison officials to speak in a way an inmate prefers.”) Saunders v. Thies, No. 21-2180, 2022 WL 4127211, at *1–2 (8th Cir. Sept. 12, 2022) (not reported) (Grasz, J., with whom Smith, C.J., joins, dissenting from denial of reh’g and reh’g en banc) (“Because I believe this case presents important issues that should be addressed by the court sitting en banc, I would grant the petition for rehearing. One issue is the applicable standard for equal protection claims alleging selective law enforcement based on race. When the district court granted summary judgment to the defendants on the plaintiff’s equal protection claims alleging racially discriminatory law enforcement it did so by relying on and applying a test that requires the challenged enforcement action to have been undertaken ‘solely on the basis of race.’ I question whether this is an erroneous standard. Long before Clark v. Clark, 926 F.3d 972 (8th Cir. 2019) and Gilani v. Matthews, 843 F.3d 342 (8th Cir. 2016), this court held that claimants must only show the challenged enforcement action was ‘motivated by a discriminatory purpose.’ United States v. Bell, 86 F.3d 820, 823 (8th Cir. 1996). See also Johnson v. Crooks, 326 F.3d 995, 1000 (8th Cir. 2003); United States v Brown, 9 F.3d 1374, 1376 (8th Cir. 1993). Not only does this test pre-date the more recent formulation, but it seems to be consistent with Supreme Court precedent. See Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266 (1977); United States v Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 465 (1996). The formulation of the applicable standard is of material importance to claimants. The difference between ‘solely on the basis of race’ and ‘motivated by’ race could be game-changing. When it comes to qualified immunity analysis, the first prong of the analysis requires identification of a constitutional violation and the second entails a determination of whether the right alleged to have been violated is ‘clearly established.’ If race must be the ‘sole’ basis of allegedly discriminatory law enforcement, an equal protection claim will rarely ever succeed. As in a Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim, all that a rogue officer motivated by race would need to do is identify some other objectively sufficient justification for a stop—perhaps a small crack in a windshield or a defective license plate light bulb. See United States v. Benitez, 613 F. Supp. 2d 1099, 1101 (S.D. Iowa 2009) (“[E]ven if the decision to initiate a traffic stop was based upon a defendant’s race, no Fourth Amendment violation has occurred so long as probable cause existed for the stop.”). The ‘sole basis’ test would appear to improperly morph equal protection analysis into something akin to Fourth Amendment review. The question may be asked whether this is the ideal case in which to address this long-festering issue. Maybe not. But if not now, when? This uncertain[t]y has gone unaddressed by our court for far too long, leaving both the public and the district courts to guess what the law is. Some might also point out this has all-to[o]-familiar consequences for the second prong of qualified immunity analysis. How can the law ever be clearly established if we refuse to clarify the correct legal standard? From the public’s perspective this may produce a cynical perception that the law is a ‘heads I lose, tails you win’ game. This has a necrotizing effect on the rule of law. Our court should give no credence to the notion that—however rare—selective enforcement of the law for ‘driving while black’ is in any way tolerated or systematically protected by qualified immunity. Perhaps there is some very reasonable response to all this. If so, I say that is all the more reason the case should be re-heard and the issues resolved in a reported en banc opinion.”)

Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, 38 F.4th 684, 686, 690-92 & n.3 (8th Cir. 2022) (on remand from Supreme Court), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 2419 (2023) (“On remand, the Supreme Court directed us ‘to employ an inquiry that clearly attends to the facts and circumstances’ of the incident between Gilbert and the officers in considering ‘whether the officers used unconstitutionally excessive force or, if they did, whether Gilbert’s right to be free of such force in these circumstances was clearly established at the time of his death.’ . . . We now conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because the right in question was not clearly established at the time of Gilbert’s death and the City is not liable for a policy of deliberate indifference in the absence of a clearly established constitutional right. . . . Although we decided the initial iteration of this appeal on the grounds that Lombardo failed to demonstrate a violation of a constitutional right, we now resolve this appeal by relying on the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis.”³ [fn. 3: Although we decide this appeal on the clearly established prong, we note that this Court has never held, nor do we now hold, that ‘the use of a prone restraint— no matter the kind, intensity, duration, or surrounding circumstances—is per se constitutional so long as an individual appears to resist officers’ efforts to subdue him.’ See Lombardo, 141 S. Ct. at 2241. Instead, in each case, we engage in a fact-intensive inquiry, paying ‘careful attention to the facts and circumstances of each particular case.’] The Supreme Court has cautioned that ‘[i]n general, courts should think hard, and then think hard again’ before deciding a constitutional question that need not be resolved to dispose of a case. . . . Given the intensive factual nature of this case, and the ‘longstanding principle of judicial restraint ... that courts avoid reaching constitutional questions in advance of the necessity of deciding them,’ we consider only whether the right was clearly established because it is dispositive to this appeal. . . . The Supreme Court has never addressed whether prone restraint generally, or a particular use of prone restraint, more specifically, is unconstitutional. And the Supreme Court has never answered the question of whether a right may be clearly established without a Supreme Court case specifically recognizing it. . . . Thus, assuming, as the Supreme Court has, that a court of appeals decision may constitute clearly established law, the precedent in this area is insufficient to demonstrate that the facts in this case show a violation of a clearly established right of a detainee to be free from prone restraint while resisting. Far from being a constitutional question beyond debate, ‘[t]his court has not deemed prone restraint unconstitutional in and of itself the few times we have addressed the issue.’ . . . It thus follows that, in this Circuit, the right to be free from prone restraint when resisting was not clearly established in 2015 when the incident with Gilbert occurred. Further, as we recognized in Hanson, there is no robust consensus of persuasive authority that would render the right clearly established. Decisions from sister circuits finding specific uses of prone restraint to be a violation of a clearly established right involve differing factual scenarios, rendering them inapplicable to the specific right at issue here. [discussing cases] Because these cases all have significant distinctions from the facts at issue here, they cannot serve as a robust consensus of persuasive authority rendering the right to be free from prone restraint while resisting clearly established. Given the foregoing, Gilbert’s right to be free from prone restraint while engaged in ongoing resistance, even where officers applied force to various parts of his body, including his back, was not clearly established in 2015 when the incident with Gilbert occurred. Because the right at issue was not clearly established, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. The district court thus did not err in granting the officers’ motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.”)

[See Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 141 S. Ct. 2239, 2241-42 (2021) (granting cert, vacating judgment, and remanding) (“Although the Eighth Circuit cited the Kingsley factors, it is unclear whether the court thought the use of a prone restraint—no matter the kind, intensity, duration, or surrounding circumstances—is per se constitutional so long as an individual appears to resist officers’ efforts to subdue him. The court cited Circuit precedent for the proposition that ‘the use of prone restraint is not objectively unreasonable when a detainee actively resists officer directives and efforts to subdue the detainee.’. . . The court went on to describe as ‘insignificant’ facts that may distinguish that precedent and appear potentially important under Kingsley, including that Gilbert was already handcuffed and leg shackled when officers moved him to the prone position and that officers kept him in that position for 15 minutes. . . . Such details could matter when deciding whether to grant summary judgment on an excessive force claim. Here, for example, record evidence (viewed in the light most favorable to Gilbert’s parents) shows that officers placed pressure on Gilbert’s back even though St. Louis instructs its officers that pressing down on the back of a prone subject can cause suffocation. The evidentiary record also includes well-known police guidance recommending that officers get a subject off his stomach as soon as he is handcuffed because of that risk. The guidance further indicates that the struggles of a prone suspect may be due to oxygen deficiency, rather than a desire to disobey officers’ commands. Such evidence, when considered alongside the duration of the restraint and the fact that Gilbert was handcuffed and leg shackled at the time, may be pertinent to the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used, the security problem at issue, and the threat—to both Gilbert and others—reasonably perceived by the officers. Having either failed to analyze such evidence or characterized it as insignificant, the court’s opinion could be read to treat Gilbert’s ‘ongoing resistance’ as controlling as a matter of law. . . . Such a per se rule would contravene the careful, context-specific analysis required by this Court’s excessive force precedent. We express no view as to whether the officers used unconstitutionally excessive force or, if they did, whether Gilbert’s right to be free of such force in these circumstances was clearly established at the time of his death. We instead grant the petition for certiorari, vacate the judgment of the Eighth Circuit, and remand the case to give the court the opportunity to employ an inquiry that clearly attends to the facts and circumstances in answering those questions in the first instance.”) and Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 141 S. Ct. 2239, 2242-44 (2021) (granting cert, vacating judgment, and remanding) (Alito, J., joined by Thomas and Gorsuch, JJ., dissenting) (“I cannot approve the Court’s summary disposition because it unfairly interprets the Court of Appeals’ decision and evades the real issue that this case presents: whether the record supports summary judgment in favor of the defendant police officers and the city of St. Louis. The Court of Appeals held that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment because a reasonable jury would necessarily find that the police officers used reasonable force in attempting to subdue petitioner Lombardo’s son, Nicholas Gilbert, when he was attempting to hang himself in his cell. In reaching this conclusion, the Court of Appeals applied the correct legal standard and made a judgment call on a sensitive question. This case, therefore, involves the application of ‘a properly stated rule of law’ to a particular factual record, and our rules say that we ‘rarely’ review such questions. . . But ‘rarely’ does not mean ‘never,’ and if this Court is unwilling to allow the decision below to stand, the proper course is to grant the petition, receive briefing and argument, and decide the real question that this case presents. That is the course I would take. I do not think that this Court is above occasionally digging into the type of fact-bound questions that make up much of the work of the lower courts, and a decision by this Court on the question presented here could be instructive. The Court, unfortunately, is unwilling to face up to the choice between denying the petition (and bearing the criticism that would inevitably elicit) and granting plenary review (and doing the work that would entail). Instead, it claims to be uncertain whether the Court of Appeals actually applied the correct legal standard, and for that reason it vacates the judgment below and remands the case. . . . Without carefully studying the record, I cannot be certain whether I would have agreed with the Eighth Circuit panel that summary judgment for the defendants was correct. The officers plainly had a reasonable basis for using some degree of force to restrain Gilbert so that he would not harm himself, and it appears that Gilbert, despite his slight stature, put up a fierce and prolonged resistance. . . On the other hand, the officers’ use of force inflicted serious injuries, and the medical evidence on the cause of death was conflicting. . . We have two respectable options: deny review of the fact-bound question that the case presents or grant the petition, have the case briefed and argued, roll up our sleeves, and decide the real issue. I favor the latter course, but what we should not do is take the easy out that the Court has chosen.”)]

City Union Mission, Inc. v. Sharp, 36 F.4th 810, 817-18 (8th Cir. 2022) (“Here we begin with the second prong, asking whether, in 2016, City Union Mission’s right to provide services to Affected Persons in a building located within 500 feet of a park with playground equipment was clearly established ‘such that “every reasonable official would understand that what he is doing is unlawful.”’. . . When determining whether a right is clearly established, we do not view the law with a high level of generality but instead ‘look for a controlling case or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority. There need not be a prior case directly on point, but “existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.”’. . . City Union Mission does not direct us to any case that clearly establishes its constitutional right to provide services to Affected Persons within 500 feet of a park with playground equipment. In its brief in this Court, City Union Mission begins by citing two Supreme Court cases, Sause v. Bauer, — U.S. —, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 201 L.Ed.2d 982 (2018), and Nieves v. Bartlett, — U.S. —, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 204 L.Ed.2d 1 (2019), for the proposition that ‘[t]he right to engage in First Amendment religious activity in a private building ... is clearly established.’. . . City Union Mission then directs us to cases like City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 119 S.Ct. 1849, 144 L.Ed.2d 67 (1999), and Fields v. City of Omaha, 810 F.2d 830 (8th Cir. 1987), for the proposition that loitering, absent any criminal activity, is constitutionally protected. However, these cases are not instructive. We are not tasked with deciding whether the right to engage in First Amendment religious activity in a private building or to loiter is clearly established. Instead, the at-issue right is more complex: Section 566.150 is intended to protect children from Affected Persons by prohibiting Affected Persons from loitering within 500 feet of Margaret Kemp Park; Affected Persons wish to engage in religious activity and to receive services at City Union Mission; and two of City Union Mission's properties are within 500 feet of Margaret Kemp Park. Sheriff Sharp was necessarily required to weigh these competing interests and determine how to apply § 566.150, and we can find no 'controlling case' or 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' that would have notified Sheriff Sharp that Affected Persons had a clearly established right to seek City Union Mission's services in a building located within 500 feet of a park containing playground equipment. . . We do not decide whether City Union Mission has stated a plausible claim for a violation of a constitutional right because, even assuming that it has, Sheriff Sharp is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity. . . And, finding that Sheriff Sharp is entitled to qualified immunity, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment.")

N.S. by & through Lee v. Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners, 35 F.4th 1111, 1114-15 (8th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 2422 (2023) ("We can skip directly to the second question. The Supreme Court has explained that 'the focus' of the clearly-established-right inquiry 'is on whether the officer had fair notice that [his] conduct was unlawful.' . . Here, 'judged against the backdrop of the law at the time of the conduct,' a reasonable officer would not have had 'fair notice' that shooting Stokes in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Central to our conclusion is Thompson v. Hubbard, 257 F.3d 896, 898 (8th Cir. 2001), which involved 'a report of shots fired and two suspects fleeing on foot from the scene of an armed robbery.' One of the suspects climbed over a short fence and fell to the ground. . . When he stood up, he 'looked over his shoulder at [an officer], and moved his arms as though reaching for a weapon at waist level.' . . When the suspect's arms continued to move despite an order to 'stop,' the officer fired a single shot into the suspect's back and killed him. . . No weapon was found. . . Even so, we concluded that the officer's 'use of force ... was within the bounds of the Fourth Amendment.' . . Critical to our decision was the idea that '[a]n officer is not constitutionally required to wait until he sets eyes upon the weapon before employing deadly force to protect himself against a fleeing suspect who turns and moves as though to draw a gun.' . . Even under the plaintiff-friendly version of the facts, Officer Thompson faced a similar choice here: use deadly force or face the possibility that Stokes might shoot a fellow officer. And just like in Hubbard, Officer Thompson could only see the suspect from behind, which obscured his view and required a 'split-second judgment[]—in circumstances that [we]re tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.' . It is true that there are some differences here. For one thing, the suspect in Hubbard was fleeing from the scene of an armed robbery, . . . a much more serious crime than stealing a cell phone. For another, Officer Thompson remained silent in the face of possible danger, whereas the officer in Hubbard shouted 'stop' before using deadly force. Despite these differences, a reasonable officer in these circumstances 'might not have known for certain that [his] conduct was unlawful,' particularly given that Stokes had just accessed the inside of an unknown vehicle before raising his hands. . . This uncertainty, a by-product of Hubbard, means that Officer Thompson did not violate a clearly established right. . . None of the cases discussed by the family are any closer than Hubbard. Tennessee v. Garner . . did not involve the same level of potential danger because the minor suspect in that case was busy climbing a fence when an officer shot him. In another case, Nance v. Sammis, 586 F.3d 604, 607

(8th Cir. 2009), plain-clothed officers confronted two children after dark who were walking toward an apartment complex. They shot one of them without warning after seeing what turned out to be a toy gun in the child's waistband—a different situation than we have here. . . Finally, Ngo v. Storlie, 495 F.3d 597, 600–01 (8th Cir. 2007), involved an officer-on-officer shooting, not an officer who fired at a fleeing suspect. At most, these cases would create uncertainty for someone in Officer Thompson's shoes. To prevail, however, the family had to establish that 'the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' . . 'Existing precedent,' in other words, 'must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.' . . In light of Hubbard, it did not.")

Central Specialties, Inc. v. Large, 18 F.4th 989, 996-98 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Although CSI asserts that the district court made factual findings to determine that no constitutional violations occurred, we need not address that argument because our inquiry begins and ends with the clearly established prong. 'A clearly established right is one that is "sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."' . . In determining whether a right is clearly established, the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly' cautioned courts ' "not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality." The dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established." This inquiry "must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition."' . . CSI simply presents no case that comes close to demonstrating that the rights it alleges were violated were clearly established. Under the unique circumstances of this case, we cannot say that it was clearly established that Large, a county engineer tasked with oversight of all county roads, could not prevent trucks that he had reason to believe were operating above the posted weight limit from passing over and damaging the roadway or could not call law enforcement to investigate compliance with the new, reduced weight restrictions. The dissent argues that by finding that any alleged constitutional violation was not clearly established, we have, in effect, sanctioned the deputization of county engineers to perform traffic stops. The record does not bear this out. Although Large impeded the CSI trucks' progress on the highway, Large did not conduct a traffic stop or detain the drivers. . . . Nor was it clearly established that the defendants could not change the weight restrictions in response to CSI's stated intention to use the CSAHs despite the lack of designation as a haul road or that Large could not seek law enforcement's assistance in investigating CSI's trucks' weights after the weight limit change and CSI's stated intention to use the roads despite the reduction in weight limit. To find that a right is clearly established, we must find 'controlling Eighth Circuit authority placing the question beyond debate, [] or a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority."' . . Far short of this standard, we find no cases considering this issue, or even cases considering remotely similar facts. We thus find that there was no clearly established right, and we therefore conclude that the district court properly granted summary judgment to Large on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Manning v. Ryan, 13 F.4th 705, 707-08 (8th Cir. 2021) ("After reviewing the law, we have determined that our case law up to now has not necessarily made clear that the MCJ officials violated Manning’s constitutional rights by enforcing the blanket prohibition on visitation with minor children, and so qualified immunity was appropriate to protect the defendants from liability. To that end, we affirm the decision of the district court. The time is ripe, however, to clearly establish that such behavior may amount to a constitutional violation in the future. In Turner v. Safley, a case involving inmate marriage, the Supreme Court held that prisoners retain a limited constitutional right to intimate association, and any limitations must be ‘reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.’ . . . Years later, in Overton v. Bazzetta, the Supreme Court explained that, consistent with Turner, limitations on visitation privileges may be unconstitutional if ‘applied in an arbitrary manner to a particular inmate,’ but not if imposed ‘for a limited period as a regular means of effecting prison discipline.’ . . . With those decisions in mind, we join the Seventh Circuit in holding that prison officials who permanently or arbitrarily deny an inmate visits with family members in disregard of the factors described in Turner and Overton have acted in violation of the Constitution. . . . Notwithstanding our holding above, in this case it is unclear whether reasonable officials would have known that their conduct was even arguably unlawful. Accordingly, we affirm the decision of the district court.”)

Buckley v. Hennepin County, 9 F.4th 757, 761-62 (8th Cir. 2021) (“The paramedics were acting as medical responders, not as law enforcement officers, when they sedated Buckley after she had been seized and was being transported to a hospital. State law authorized the paramedics to ‘take a person into custody and transport the person to a licenced physician or treatment facility if the officer has reason to believe ... that the person is mentally ill ... and in danger of injuring self or others if not immediately detained.’ . . . Buckley does not dispute the legitimacy of the medical hold. Hennepin County’s Emergency Medical Services Advanced Life Support protocols provided that ‘[a]ll patients transported on a Transport Hold should be restrained during transport’ and a patient who is severely or profoundly agitated should be sedated. In two quite similar cases where paramedics administered emergency medical treatment either after seizure or to a person who did not object to seizure, our sister circuits reversed the denial of qualified immunity and dismissed Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. In Peete v. Nashville and Davidson County, paramedics physically restrained an unconscious boy who had experienced an epileptic seizure without ensuring he could breathe, resulting in his death. . . . The Sixth Circuit concluded the paramedics were not acting to enforce the law, deter, or incarcerate. ... They were attempting to help him, although they badly botched the job according to the complaint. ... The plaintiff’s excessive force claim thus looks like a medical malpractice claim rather than a Fourth Amendment or Due Process violation. . . . In Thompson v. Cope, 900 F.3d 414 (7th Cir. 2018), the Seventh Circuit reversed the denial of qualified immunity and dismissed Fourth Amendment claims against paramedics who administered a sedative to a mentally disturbed person whom police had restrained and arrested. The court observed that ‘Fourth Amendment restrictions are almost wholly alien to [a] situation, where paramedics are subject to a distinct set of professional standards and goals aimed at responding to medical emergencies.’ . . . ‘[S]edating the arrestee -- who appear[ed] to the paramedic to be suffering from a medical emergency -- before taking the arrestee by ambulance to the hospital’ did not violate the arrestee’s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Otherwise, the court observed, paramedics would face a ‘kind of Catch-22 ... treat the arrestee or don't treat him, but face a lawsuit either way.' . . We agree with these decisions. The courts in these cases considered excessive force claims pleaded under the Fourth Amendment and applied its well-established objective reasonableness standard, as the district court did in this case. On appeal, Buckley argues her status was akin to that of the involuntarily committed patient in Andrews v. Neer, 253 F.3d 1052 (8th Cir. 2001), and therefore her excessive force claim 'should be analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment pretrial-detainee objective reasonableness standard.' We see this as a distinction without a difference. Under either standard, 'liability for negligently inflicted harms is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.' [citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson] . . . It was not objectively unreasonable for paramedics to administer medical aid to an intoxicated, suicidal, semi-conscious woman who needed medical intervention. The 'reasonableness inquiry in an excessive force case is an objective one' and looks only to whether the official's actions were 'objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them, without regard to their underlying intent or motivation.' . . There is no constitutional right to be sedated with a particular medication. Whether Buckley needed to be sedated, and if so with what sedative, are questions of appropriate medical care that must be resolved in a medical malpractice action under state law. The district court properly dismissed her excessive force claims.") Buckley v. Hennepin County, 9 F.4th 757, 766-68 (8th Cir. 2021) (Gruender, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("The question is whether the paramedics are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that their conduct—including their decision to sedate an already-restrained and semi-conscious Buckley—amounted to excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. 'Qualified immunity shields government officials from liability in a § 1983 action unless the official's conduct violates a clearly established constitutional or statutory right of which a reasonable person would have known.' . . In determining whether the immunity applies, we consider whether (i) the defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional or statutory right and (ii) that right was clearly established at the time of the defendant's misconduct. . . The 'application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure.' . . It was objectively unreasonable to sedate Buckley with ketamine. She was about as restrained as a person can be, strapped down on a gurney. She was not and had not been resisting. She was not suspected of a crime. And, by the paramedics' own observations, she was already almost unconscious. . . In these circumstances, the decision to sedate her with a potent and dangerous drug was 'gratuitous and completely unnecessary' and thus objectively unreasonable. . . In concluding to the contrary, the court relies on the fact that the seizure involved paramedics (not police) who were there to provide aid. . . But the Fourth Amendment is not limited to police. . . Indeed, we very recently applied the Fourth Amendment to a mental-health seizure. Graham v. Barnette, No. 19-2512, — F.4th —, —, —, 2021 WL 3012338, at *5-6 (8th Cir. July 16, 2021). Neither the paramedics' status nor their purpose immunizes them from constitutional scrutiny. . . And this makes sense. The Fourth Amendment's text is facially agnostic as to the who or the why of a government intrusion. . . Whether the government sent someone in an ambulance or a squad car to seize Buckley is irrelevant. . . Relatedly, the court says that Buckley's claim involves 'questions of appropriate medical care that must be resolved in a medical malpractice action under state law.' . . Not so. Her claim is not that she received inadequate medical care; her claim is that a government official used a tranquilizer to seize her. . . Finally, the court says that ‘[t]here is no constitutional right to be sedated with a particular medication.’ Maybe not. . . But Buckley did not bring a § 1983 suit because she favors a different brand of sedative. Rather, she claims that, under the circumstances here, she had the right to not be forcibly sedated at all. I nevertheless concur in the judgment regarding Buckley’s excessive-force claim because she has not demonstrated that this right was clearly established at the time of the violation. To be clearly established, the contours of a right must be ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official’ would have understood that his conduct ‘violates that right.’ . . Because ‘excessive force is an area of the law in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case,’ ‘existing precedent [must] squarely govern[] the specific facts at issue.’ . . Here, Buckley has not pointed to any decision that resembles this one. Accordingly, I concur in the court’s judgment granting the paramedics qualified immunity concerning Buckley’s excessive-force claim.”) Pollreis v. Marzolf, 9 F.4th 737, 744-49 (8th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 904 (2022) (“Here, after Sergeant Kirmer ordered Officer Marzolf to detain the boys, Officer Marzolf reasonably chose to wait for backup to complete the stop’s mission. Five undisputed facts, in particular, support this conclusion: (1) potential physical danger—Officer Marzolf had good reason to believe that one of the suspects was armed; (2) the location—the boys were on foot near where the four suspects had fled the car wreck; (3) the time—night; (4) the conditions—it was raining with low visibility; and (5) a matching description—the boys matched a vague description of two of the suspects. Given these facts, identifications from two people claiming (rightly in this case) to be the boys’ parents did not lessen Officer Marzolf’s reasonable suspicion to the extent that he could not detain the boys until his backup arrived so that he could complete the stop’s purposes. . . Thus, we conclude that the district court erred in holding that triable facts remain on whether Officer Marzolf unlawfully prolonged the investigative detention of the boys. We also conclude that Officer Marzolf should receive qualified immunity on the prolonged-investigative-detention claim. . . . Here, the district court concluded that triable facts barred summary judgment on the illegal-arrest claim. While the district court recognized that the detention was significantly shorter than those in Waters and Chestnut, it noted that this interaction was more ‘intense’ because the boys were handcuffed (like the other cases) and ordered to lie face down surrounded by officers. And, unlike Waters, the boys complied with all orders. Ultimately, we disagree with the district court. The boys were handcuffed for less than two minutes here. This stands in stark contrast to Waters and Chestnut, where the handcuffing lasted ten times longer. . . The entire encounter here lasted seven minutes, while the boys were handcuffed at most for two minutes. In addition to the short time frame, the video clearly shows that immediately before Officer Marzolf handcuffed and frisked W.Y., the boy moved his left hand behind his back and touched his waist. Considering that hand motion together with what Officer Marzolf heard before the encounter about one of the male suspects usually carrying a gun, he reasonably used handcuffs briefly ‘to control the scene and protect [officer] safety.’ . Unlike in El-Ghazzawy, where no facts indicated that the suspect was dangerous or had a weapon, here Officer Marzolf had two such indications: (1) W.Y.’s hand-to-waist movement; and (2) the tip that a male suspect usually carried a weapon. True, the boys were mostly compliant, unlike in Waters (handcuffing held not an arrest). . . But the individual in Chestnut (handcuffing also held not an arrest) was also mostly compliant as well. . . The juxtaposition between Waters and Chestnut is a good reminder that compliance is only one factor, albeit an important one, in the totality-of-the-circumstances analysis. Based on the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that the investigative detention did not become an arrest here because Officer Marzolf only used handcuffs briefly (under two minutes) when he had two indications that one of the boys may have been armed. Thus, Officer Marzolf is also entitled to qualified immunity on the de-facto-arrest claim. . . . We have held that it is unreasonable to point a gun at a compliant suspect for an unreasonably long period of time after the police have taken control of the situation. . . The district court relied on Wilson and Rochell to deny Officer Marzolf qualified immunity—concluding based on those cases that ‘the right not to have a gun pointed at a compliant suspect was clearly established by at least February 2016’ in the Eighth Circuit. More recently in Clark v. Clark, we discussed the factual contexts of Wilson and Rochell: ‘[Those cases] involve[d] incidents where guns were pointed at suspects for unreasonably long periods of time, well after the police had taken control of the situation.’. . Clark distinguished its facts from Wilson’s and Rochell’s by pointing out that, even though the Clark suspect showed his hands to the officers, they were justified in believing the situation was not fully under control until [the suspect] had been removed from the vehicle, patted down, and restrained. When [the suspect] stopped his vehicle, officers knew [he] had a weapon, were aware that he had been the only identified person present in an area where shots had reportedly been fired, and had reason to believe he might be a suspect attempting to evade capture. . . Like in Clark, here Officer Marzolf pointed his gun at the boys before the situation was under control (e.g., suspects restrained, patted down, and definitively identified). Officer Marzolf, who was initially all alone with the two suspects, used his gun during the encounter before he had secured and patted down the boys when he suspected the boys may be two of the suspects based on their (1) number—two; (2) appearance—one shorter than the other; (3) proximity to the crime—within the police perimeter; and (4) the low visibility—night and raining. And as in Clark, Officer Marzolf knew that the suspects being sought might be armed and dangerous. This case is more like Clark than either Wilson or Rochell. In Wilson, the officers continued to point their guns at Wilson and his minor son even after realizing he was not the suspect that they wanted based on their personal knowledge. . . They also continued to point their weapons at Wilson after frisking him and searching his truck. . . . In Rochell, the officer pointed his gun behind a compliant suspect’s ear and said, ‘I’ll blow your fg brains out if you ever approach me like that again.’. . We concluded in both Wilson and Rochell that the officers’ gun pointing constituted excessive force. . . Here, unlike in Wilson, Officer Marzolf lacked the personal knowledge to rule out the boys as suspects (despite their parents’ attempts to identify them during the encounter), and he did not continue to point his gun at the boys after they were frisked. And unlike in Rochell, Officer Marzolf did not point his gun behind either boys’ ear. Nor did he threaten to blow their brains out. We see this case as more like Clark because Officer Marzolf only pointed his gun at the boys before the situation was under control (e.g., suspects restrained, patted down, and definitively identified). We conclude that Officer Marzolf did not use unreasonable force when he pointed his gun at the boys while he waited for backup and before the situation was under control. And we conclude that he should receive qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. Because we conclude that Officer Marzolf did not violate the boys' constitutional rights during the encounter, we need not decide whether these rights were clearly established when the alleged violations occurred. . . . Although it may be of little consolation to Pollreis and her children, it bears emphasizing that neither W.Y. nor S.Y. did anything wrong, nor anything deserving of such a harrowing experience. The boys simply happened onto the stage of a dangerous live drama being played out in their neighborhood because of criminals fleeing police nearby. W.Y. and S.Y. acted bravely, respectfully, and responsibly throughout the encounter, and their family would rightly be proud of them. Likewise, their family acted responsibly and respectfully during what would have undoubtedly been a frightening experience. In this situation, though, Officer Marzolf was doing his job protecting the people of Springdale from fleeing criminal suspects under challenging conditions. For the reasons already stated, we reverse that part of the district court's order denying qualified immunity to Officer Marzolf on the four remaining claims against him and remand the case for the entry of an order granting summary judgment to him on these claims.") Pollreis v. Marzolf, 9 F.4th 737, 749-54 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 904 (2022) ("Officer Marzolf may have been justified in his initial decision to stop W.Y. and S.Y. and even in his use of some force against them as he determined whether they posed a threat to his safety and the safety of others. But I disagree with the court's conclusion that at no point over the course of their detention did he violate their Fourth Amendment rights. I write separately because I believe that the stop escalated to an arrest without probable cause; that Officer Marzolf unlawfully searched W.Y.; and that he used excessive force by continuing to point his gun at W.Y. and S.Y. as they lay on the ground. I would therefore affirm the district court's ruling. . . . Like the court, I see Officer Marzolf's decision to handcuff W.Y. and S.Y. as they lay face down on the ground as a turning point in the interaction. But I believe that the handcuffing escalated the stop into an arrest. . . . Officer Marzolf did not have probable cause to arrest W.Y. and S.Y. Even in the initial moments of the encounter, the only evidence that W.Y. and S.Y. had committed a crime was that they were walking in the same neighborhood as fleeing suspects and seemed to match the suspects' general description (male, wearing hoodies, and different heights). . . . Considering the information available at the time, a reasonable officer in Officer Marzolf's position would not have believed that there was a 'fair probability' or 'substantial chance' W.Y. and S.Y. had committed a crime. Because he arrested them without probable cause, Officer Marzolf violated W.Y. and S.Y.'s Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful seizure. . . . Once W.Y. and S.Y. were lying on their stomachs with their arms by their sides, as Officer Marzolf instructed (and especially once other police cars began to arrive on the scene), Officer Marzolf no longer had reason to believe that W.Y. and S.Y. 'pose[d] an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others.' . . . Because he continued to point his weapon at W.Y. and S.Y. past this point, he violated their Fourth Amendment rights. . . . As the court observes, Officer Marzolf's conduct may not have been as extreme as that of the officers in Lamp and Rochell. But the Fourth Amendment does not proscribe only extreme conduct. A reasonable officer in the same position would have realized a few minutes into the stop that W.Y. and S.Y. were 'not threatening and not resisting,' . . . and did not 'pose[] an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others[.]' . .

Because the threat W.Y. and S.Y. appeared to pose is the central consideration in determining whether Officer Marzolf's use of his weapon constituted excessive force, I would conclude that it did. . . In the court's view, on the night of January 8, 2018, Officer Marzolf was simply 'doing his job protecting the people of Springdale from fleeing criminal suspects under challenging conditions.' I am sympathetic to the difficult, uncertain position Officer Marzolf was in when he encountered W.Y. and S.Y. But that initial difficulty did not allow him to 'ignore changing circumstances and information that emerge[d] once [he] arriv[ed] on scene,' . . . and it did not authorize him to handcuff and continue to point his weapon at W.Y. and S.Y. once it was clear they were compliant, nonthreatening, and likely not the suspects he was looking for. Because I believe Officer Marzolf's conduct over the course of W.Y. and S.Y.'s detention violated their Fourth Amendment rights, I respectfully dissent.")

Graham v. Barnette, 5 F.4th 872, 886-87 (8th Cir. 2021) (on remand from Supreme Court) ("[W]e now make explicit that which has long been implicit in our case law and align our circuit with the unanimous consensus in all other circuits. We conclude that only probable cause that a person poses an emergent danger—that is, one calling for prompt action—to herself or others can tip the scales of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness balancing test in favor of the government when it arrests an individual for a mental-health evaluation because only probable cause constitutes a sufficient 'governmental interest' to outweigh a person's 'interest in freedom.' . . . Second, we again conclude that the probable-cause standard was not clearly established in our jurisprudence, meaning the officers may still be entitled to qualified immunity even if they seized Graham without probable cause of dangerousness. . . . Here, Graham cannot point to existing Eighth Circuit precedent that clearly establishes the probable-cause standard because of the ambiguity in our case law highlighted above. Indeed, in her briefing, Graham conceded as much, arguing that Pirch clearly established the standard of probable cause but noting that our case law 'does create confusion.' And during oral argument, Graham's counsel specifically asked this court to 'make clear' that probable cause is required in this circuit because 'there hasn't been a case that has directly stated what the requirement is for a mental health hold.' A right is not clearly established by 'controlling authority' merely because it may be 'suggested by then-existing precedent.' . . . Neither is this an instance in which every reasonable officer would have known that his conduct was unlawful due to a robust consensus of authority from other circuits. Though, at the time the officers seized Graham, several other circuits had determined that probable cause was the constitutional standard required to justify a mental-health arrest, our case law was not merely silent on the issue; instead, we had created ambiguity concerning the answer, suggesting that reasonable belief might be sufficient to satisfy the demands of the Fourth Amendment. . . . 'No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read' our precedent 'beforehand, that officer could not know that' the conduct at issue would violate our circuit's 'test.' . . . This determination is enough to resolve this issue as the officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless the right is established 'beyond debate.' . . . Third, we again conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because their actions did not violate clearly established law under the more lenient reasonable-belief standard that some of our precedents had suggested was the requisite standard governing warrantless mental-health seizures.")

Jacobsen v. Klinefelter, 992 F.3d 717, 722 (8th Cir. 2021) (“Tatum does not clearly establish that Klinefelter’s use of force was unreasonable. Unlike the shoplifter in Tatum, Jacobsen shoved the deputy and physically resisted the deputy’s efforts to remove him from the premises. Only after Jacobsen used force against Klinefelter did the deputy deploy the pepper spray. Jacobsen then seized the spray canister, and Klinefelter reasonably feared for his safety. Jacobsen eventually pinned Klinefelter to a wall before the arrest was completed. A reasonable officer could have believed that it was reasonable to strike the resisting Jacobsen in the head and take him to the ground for handcuffing. Jacobsen cites no authority in comparable circumstances that clearly establishes a right to be free from Klinefelter’s use of force. Accordingly, Klinefelter is entitled to qualified immunity on Jacobsen’s claim under the Fourth Amendment.”)

Jacobsen v. Klinefelter, 992 F.3d 717, 723 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., concurring) (“Even viewing the record in Jacobsen’s favor, our precedent supports the conclusion that Klinefelter’s use of force was not ‘objectively unreasonable’ in light of the particular circumstances of this case. . . . Because there was no Fourth Amendment violation, I would not reach the question of whether the particular right Jacobsen is asserting was clearly established at the time of the incident.”)

L.G. through M.G. v. Columbia Public Schools, 990 F.3d 1145, 1147-49 (8th Cir. 2021) (“We often describe the resolution of a qualified immunity issue as involving two questions—whether the official’s conduct violated a constitutional or statutory right, and whether that right was clearly established. . . . We may take up either question first, . . . and in this case we opt to consider whether any right violated here was clearly established, a matter that L.G. bears the burden to show. . . . We’ve identified three ways in which a plaintiff can show that law is clearly established. She may identify existing circuit precedent involving sufficiently similar facts that squarely governs the situation. Or a plaintiff may point to ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ establishing that the facts of her case make out a violation of clearly established right. Finally, a plaintiff may show, in rare instances, that a general constitutional rule applies with ‘obvious clarity’ to the facts at issue and carries the day for her. . . . The principle at the heart of these approaches is that state actors are liable only for transgressing bright lines, not for making bad guesses in gray areas. . . . We first consider whether existing circuit precedent squarely governs this case. The district court seemed to think so, but we disagree. In holding that Edwards had violated L.G.’s clearly established rights, the district court, relying on Stoner v. Watlington, 735 F.3d 799, 804 (8th Cir. 2013), explained that it is clearly established that the Fourth Amendment protects the right not to be arrested without probable cause. That is certainly true in a general sense. But the Supreme Court has frequently cautioned lower courts of late not to define rights at issue ‘at a high level of generality’ because that ‘avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances.’ . . . The right must be described with a “high degree of specificity” to take into account the particular circumstances that the officer faced. . . . Specificity is ‘especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.’ . . . Mindful of the Court’s directive to define rights with specificity, we conclude that the district court minimized two features of this case that serve to distinguish it from Stoner and that could have significantly influenced a reasonable officer in Edwards's position. First, her involvement in the alleged seizure was relatively minimal and ministerial. Unlike the two officers who questioned L.G., Edwards merely escorted L.G. to a room and closed a door. Though we agree with the district court that the simple 'fact that Edwards did not herself question L.G. does not mean that she cannot be sued for unconstitutional seizure,' we do believe that her nominal role in the incident could well affect whether a reasonable officer in her position would think that she, as opposed to the other officers, had seized L.G. We point out, moreover, that many of the circumstances we look for to determine whether a seizure occurred were not alleged to be present while Edwards interacted with L.G. For example, the complaint does not allege that Edwards positioned herself to limit L.G.'s movements, displayed a weapon, touched L.G., used language or tone indicating compliance was necessary, or retained L.G.'s property. . . . Though it's possible Edwards seized L.G., we are unwilling to say based on Edwards's incidental role and these other circumstances that every reasonable officer in Edwards's position would have known that she was doing so. There is another distinguishing feature of this case. While it is generally true (as the district court observed) that police officers may not arrest someone without probable cause, that general truth doesn't provide much guidance to an officer in the public-school setting. . . . So actions outside the schoolhouse that clearly violate the Constitution do not necessarily do so inside it. . . . Even though students have some Fourth Amendment protection, an officer in Edwards's situation would not know, without more guidance, whether her escorting L.G. to a room with other officers and closing a door constitutes a seizure. . . . We respectfully disagree with the district court that it was clearly established that the school setting makes no difference for Fourth Amendment purposes when the seizure occurs at the behest of police. In support of its view, the district court cited some district court opinions from Minnesota and Florida as well as our opinion in Cason v. Cook, 810 F.2d 188 (8th Cir. 1987). In Cason, we considered whether a search performed at a school without a warrant violated the Fourth Amendment. We held it did not, but along the way we pointed out that '[t]here is no evidence to support the proposition that the activities were at the behest of a law enforcement agency.' . . . From that, the district court seemed to infer that the school setting doesn't matter for officer-initiated searches. Perhaps so. But an equally reasonable inference is that the Cason court was merely noting that an officer-initiated search would present a closer question than the case it actually confronted. The crucial point is that Cason provided only a hint, rather than a holding, that the school setting doesn't matter in cases involving officer-initiated searches. Hints do not create bright-line rules. . . . Given Edwards's minimal involvement and the public-school setting, we do not think existing circuit precedent, such as Stoner and Cason, would have alerted every reasonable officer in Edwards's position that she was violating L.G.'s constitutional rights.")

Turning Point USA at Arkansas University v. Rhodes, 973 F.3d 868, 879-81 (8th Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom Hoggard v. Rhodes, 141 S. Ct. 2421 (2021) ("[W]e find that the Tabling Policy, as applied to Hoggard, is unconstitutional. We defer to the defendants' judgment about the importance of establishing a space serving as the campus 'living room,' as well as their determination that students should feel comfortable in the space in which they eat, meet, and socialize. But this legitimate university interest bears no rational relationship to the distinction between registered student organizations and individual students when it comes to using the Union Patio. . . . The ultimate success of Hoggard’s § 1983 claim, however, depends on whether it was ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood’ that, by preventing Hoggard from Union Patio tabling, he or she was violating the First Amendment. . . . That is, we must determine whether the right violated by the defendants was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the violation. . . . The rights at issue here — Hoggard’s rights under the First Amendment — were not clearly established. . . . In short, Hoggard failed to identify ‘controlling authority’ or ‘a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority’ that ‘placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate at the time of the alleged violation.’ . . . Her First Amendment right to access a limited public forum, which she was unjustifiably denied, was not ‘clearly established’ at the time. Granting qualified immunity was therefore appropriate. . . . We find that the Tabling Policy, as it was enforced against Hoggard, violates the First Amendment. The defendants’ restriction of Union Patio access to registered student organizations has no rational relationship to their proffered justification. As such, the Tabling Policy’s enforcement against Hoggard on October 11, 2017, was unreasonable and unconstitutional. But the defendants may reasonably have not understood this at the time. We find the defendants were properly granted qualified immunity and we therefore affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment.”)

Shelton v. Stevens, 964 F.3d 747, 752-55 (8th Cir. 2020) (“Relevant circumstances in this case include that police were attempting to arrest Shelton for his role in a brutal beating, and that Shelton fled from officers at high speed for several miles while armed with a handgun and ammunition. When officers finally reached Shelton after a foot chase, he was eventually pinned under five officers, but he refused to surrender his hands. Officers reasonably believed that Shelton’s position posed a threat to officer safety, because at least one of his hands was unrestrained in an area of his body where weapons could be concealed. Shelton did not present evidence that officers had secured his hands before Stevens’s disputed use of force. Because the unresolved situation still posed a threat to officers, there was a legitimate interest in restraining Shelton further when Stevens approached. . . . While Robinson’s use of force is not directly before us in this appeal, we conclude in analyzing Stevens’s action that it was objectively reasonable for officers to apply some amount of supplemental force in order to gain control of Shelton’s hands and to restrain him. . . . Whether Shelton’s undisputed posture reasonably justified an application of additional force is a legal question that we answer in the affirmative. The particular question here, then, is whether the amount and type of force that Stevens used was objectively reasonable under the circumstances taken in the light most favorable to Shelton. How much force was reasonable presents a fact-specific judgment call, and there may be a fine line between employing a brief chokehold that rendered Shelton unconscious, striking Shelton in the head with a radio, and stomping on Shelton’s ankle. Under all the circumstances, however, we conclude that Stevens’s alleged use of force was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. A stomp on the ankle with sufficient force to break it was excessive when the legitimate objective was to facilitate restraint of Shelton’s hands while he was pinned to the ground by several officers. Although the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment does not require an officer to pursue the least aggressive or most prudent course of conduct, . . . the availability of lesser measures is relevant to the inquiry. . . . There were other means, short of the force employed, to distract Shelton from his efforts to avoid restraint and to assist with apprehension of the arrestee while still maintaining officer safety. The force used by other officers on the scene, for example, likely was sufficient to produce the desired outcome without causing serious injury to Shelton. Even allowing for the rapidly evolving situation, and eschewing the temptation to evaluate police conduct with perfect hindsight, we conclude on balance that Stevens's stomp, under the assumed facts, constituted an unreasonable use of force. Even so, to defeat Stevens's defense of qualified immunity, Shelton must demonstrate that his right to be free from this particular use of force was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . We think Stevens's action falls within the zone described as the 'sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.' . . . The district court's treatment of three officers suggests the haziness: Robinson and Lansing were granted qualified immunity for a blow to Shelton's head and a brief chokehold, respectively, because they were trying to 'subdue a non-compliant, potentially armed suspect.' But the court reasoned that Stevens's stomp, no more than two seconds later, violated a clearly established right because 'Shelton was being restrained by at least five other officers' who 'appeared to have Shelton substantially under control.' As we see it, all three officers confronted a suspect who was being restrained by several other officers, and all three were trying to subdue a non-compliant, potentially armed suspect. Is it obvious that a chokehold with its potential for asphyxiation, or blunt force to the skull with the attendant risk of head injury, is more suitable to the situation than a hard step on the talus? As it turned out, given how the officers applied the tactics here, Shelton was able to resume breathing after the choke, did not suffer brain injury from the blow to the cranium, but assumedly sustained a fractured ankle from Stevens's act. Some use of force was reasonable, and constitutional distinctions among a chokehold, a radio-bang to the head, and an unreasonable ankle-stomp—all objectively designed to prompt Shelton to surrender his hands—are hazy enough to warrant qualified immunity for Stevens. The circuit precedent identified by Shelton and the district court is insufficient to place the reasonableness of Stevens's action beyond debate. . . . Shelton . . . was an accused violent felon who was potentially armed and not fully subdued or handcuffed, and a reasonable officer could have believed that he posed a threat until he surrendered his hands. Even though several officers were on top of Shelton, he continued to 'turtle up' so that at least one hand was free and potentially available to access any weapon that might be concealed in his midsection. Our closest decision on point held that a prone suspect's refusal to surrender his hands justified the use of a taser. . . . Shelton has identified no other decision that addresses how much additional force is reasonably used to subdue a suspect under these or similar circumstances. Nor is this the 'rare obvious case' in which the unreasonableness of a seizure is clearly established without a prior decision on comparable facts. . . . A number of the relevant factors supported the use of force, so reasonableness was a matter of degree, and qualified immunity protects officers from the specter of lawsuits and damages liability for mistaken judgments in gray areas. . . . For these reasons, the order of the district court denying qualified immunity to Stevens is reversed.")

Boudoin v. Harsson, 962 F.3d 1034, 1039-43 (8th Cir. 2020) ("In this case, we take up the Supreme Court's invitation in Pearson v. Callahan and first consider whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established on August 27, 2017. . . . We disagree with both the district court's characterization of the right at issue as well as its analysis of whether a genuine dispute of material fact precluded qualified immunity. . . First, we resist any implication that a single taser shock constitutes ‘deadly force.’ . . And second, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Boudoin, we do not believe that only a ‘plainly incompetent’ officer would have thought using a taser under the circumstances complied with the strictures of the Fourth Amendment. . . Regardless of whether Boudoin was actually attempting to flee, Harsson could reasonably conclude that he was based on the information provided to him by other officers and the undisputed actions he observed. . . And, as we explain below, because Harsson could reasonably conclude Boudoin was attempting to flee, Harsson did not violate clearly established law by deploying his taser against Boudoin. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Boudoin, we conclude a reasonable officer could have believed that Boudoin was attempting to resume flight. . . Next, we are not prepared to say the crime at issue was not serious. . . Although Boudoin was charged with misdemeanor fleeing, . . fleeing by means of a vehicle is a Class D felony if the person attempts to flee in a manner ‘manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life[.]’ . . Once Boudoin was in handcuffs, Harsson asked Boudoin, ‘what’s wrong with pulling over and taking a speeding ticket?’ and told Boudoin that because he instead chose to flee, ‘you caught yourself some felony charges today.’ Though he was eventually only charged as a misdemeanant, we think there can be little doubt but that a reasonable officer could conclude that fleeing from four other officers at speeds exceeding 100 miles per hour in evening traffic demonstrates an extreme indifference to the value of human life. . . For similar reasons, because Harsson believed Boudoin had fled from no fewer than four other officers, traveling at speeds exceeding 100 miles per hour in evening traffic, he could reasonably conclude that Boudoin posed an ‘immediate threat to the safety of the officers [and] others.’ . . Harsson could reasonably believe that had Boudoin successfully fled, he would have risked his safety and that of other drivers and the officers as they pursued him. And we will not ‘lay down a rule requiring the police to allow fleeing suspects to get away whenever they drive so recklessly that they put other people’s lives in danger.’ . . Given these circumstances, none of the decisions relied on by Boudoin supports denying Harsson qualified immunity. . . . [T]he correct question in this case is whether it was clearly established that the use of a taser, without warning, against a suspect reasonably perceived as attempting to flee constitutes excessive force. Brown does not speak to that question, and thus it cannot ‘squarely govern[] the specific facts at issue.’ . . Boudoin points us to no other cases that clearly establish that Harsson’s actions constituted excessive force under the circumstances, and we have not found any based on an independent review. Nor do we believe that there is ‘obvious cruelty inherent’ in the use of a taser that would have put every reasonable officer on notice that Harsson’s actions were unreasonable. . . . Though, ‘with the 20/20 vision of hindsight,’ one may determine it was preferable for Harsson to warn Boudoin before deploying his taser, we think it clear that ‘the nature and quality of the intrusion’ did not violate clearly established law given ‘the countervailing governmental interests at stake.’ . . Given the lack of any contrary instruction that squarely governs the circumstances of this case, it was not clearly established on August 27, 2017 that it constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment to use a taser, without warning, against a suspect perceived as attempting to flee from officers. . . Even if Harsson should have attempted to apprehend Boudoin without deploying his taser or should have given a warning, his actions fall along the ‘hazy border between excessive and acceptable force.’. . Harsson is thus entitled to qualified immunity on Boudoin’s § 1983 excessive force claim.”) Anderson v. City of Minneapolis, 934 F.3d 876, 881-84 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 110 (2020) (“Because Anderson has failed to show the violation of a clearly established right, we resolve this case on that ground. . . . Here we must ask whether, in December 2013, it was clearly established that the Fourteenth Amendment is violated when:

- fire department employees check the vitals on a hypothermia victim and declare him dead despite the fact that he is cold in a cold environment;
- paramedics and the medical examiner do not conduct their own assessment of a hypothermia victim after earlier responders declare the victim dead;
- police officers do not conduct their own medical assessment of a hypothermia victim and treat the scene as a crime scene after earlier responders declare the victim dead.

We have never identified the right that Anderson asserts was violated. Anderson claims that Freeman v. Ferguson, 911 F.2d 52 (8th Cir. 1990) and Ross v. United States, 910 F.2d 1422 (7th Cir. 1990) show that the right he identifies is clearly established, but neither case defines a specific right that is applicable here. . . . Unlike in Ross, no one intentionally or arbitrarily cut off emergency services to Jacob. Once the fire department defendants declared him dead the emergency response did not end but it changed. The defendants in this case may have performed their duties poorly, but if so, they made an error in judgment of the sort that qualified immunity protects. . . . They did not intentionally deny emergency aid to someone they believed to be alive. The situation presented by this case is unique and the constitutional rule recognized in Ross does not apply to these facts. . . . The defendants in this case did not place Jacob out in the cold. Despite the tragic consequences that Anderson argues followed from their alleged failures, the defendants did not violate a clearly established due process right. . . . Anderson’s argument that the regulations directing first responders to begin CPR and rewarming even where a hypothermia victim appears dead should be treated as evidence of a clearly established constitutional duty therefore fails because Hope itself was based on much more than the existence of a regulation. But even if Anderson were correct about what Hope means, we do not think that Hope’s rationale necessarily applies outside of the prison context. While it seems likely that the contours of a regulation regarding punishing prisoners will be informed at least in part by the Eighth Amendment, there is no reason to think that medical guidelines for first responders enshrine duties arising out of the Fourteenth Amendment. That the medical guidelines were not followed here could possibly be the basis for a negligence suit, but it is not the basis for a constitutional one.”) Kelsay v. Ernst, 933 F.3d 975, 987-88 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Grasz, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2760 (2020) (“Like the other dissenting judges, I believe any reasonable officer would have known his conduct in this case violated Ms. Kelsay’s constitutional rights under existing case law. That is simply a disagreement with the majority on the application of precedent. Beyond this, however, I do take exception to the court’s opinion in one important respect. At oral argument, the absence of judicial opinions in this circuit addressing the specific facts here, including the precise take-down maneuver used on Ms. Kelsay, was used to counter the arguments of her counsel. Yet, the court now declines to address whether the maneuver used on Ms. Kelsay violated her constitutional rights. Instead, the court relies solely on the second (“clearly established”) prong of qualified immunity analysis. While this is allowed by governing precedent, Pearson v. Callahan, . . . it is, in my view, inappropriate in this case as it perpetuates the very state of affairs used to defeat Ms. Kelsay’s attempt to assert her constitutional rights. See Zadeh v. Robinson, 928 F.3d 457, 479-80 (5th Cir. 2019) (Willet, J. concurring in part, dissenting in part) (“Section 1983 meets Catch-22.”). The Supreme Court indicated in Pearson that the option for courts to skip to the second prong of analysis would not necessarily stunt the development of constitutional law. . . . The court’s opinion belies that expectation, at least in the context of excessive force claims. This situation has much broader implications than Ms. Kelsay’s broken collar bone. In the context of violations of constitutional rights by state officials, application of Pearson in this manner imposes a judicially created exception to a federal statute that effectively prevents claimants from vindicating their constitutional rights. The law is never made clear enough to hold individual officials liable for constitutional violations involving excessive force as Congress authorized in 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Importantly, while Pearson authorizes this analytical approach, it does not require it. There is a better way. We should exercise our discretion at every reasonable opportunity to address the constitutional violation prong of qualified immunity analysis, rather than defaulting to the ‘not clearly established’ mantra, where, as here, such analysis is not an ‘academic exercise,’ . . . and where it is ‘difficult to decide whether a right is clearly established without deciding precisely what the existing constitutional right happens to be.’ . . . While implementation of this approach may or may not have brought relief to Ms. Kelsay in this court, it would help ensure this sad situation is not repeated. The protection of civil rights and the preservation of the rule of law deserves no less.”) Schaffer v. Beringer, 842 F.3d 585, 592 (8th Cir. 2016) (“[W]e need not decide whether the officers had actual probable cause. Rather, following Habiger v. City of Fargo, we need only address whether the officers had arguable probable cause and are thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Because a determination that the officers had arguable probable cause would end the inquiry, we will assume that Callissa was arrested when she was placed in handcuffs. . . . The legal drinking age in South Dakota is twenty-one. . . . South Dakota’s general DUI statute prohibits anyone from operating a motor vehicle if their BAC is .08 or higher. . . . However, South Dakota’s minor DUI statute prohibits drivers under the age of twenty-one from operating a motor vehicle with a BAC of .02 or higher. . . . Thus, the legal BAC limit for drivers under the age of twenty-one is significantly lower than the permissible level for drivers over twenty-one. Notably, no judicial decisions have addressed what circumstances would provide officers with probable cause to arrest a driver under the age of twenty-one for a violation of the minor DUI statute. In qualified immunity cases, this ‘absence of judicial guidance can be significant.’ . . . Given the totality of these circumstances, the relatively low .02 BAC limit under the minor DUI statute, and the absence of judicial decisions interpreting that statute, we find that the officers had at least arguable probable cause to believe that Callissa Schaffer had violated SDCL § 32–23–21. Because the officers had arguable probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. . . .

. [W]hen officers have ‘at least arguable probable cause’ to perform an arrest, they cannot be held liable for performing a search incident to that arrest. . . . Because we have already determined that the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Callissa, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim as well.”)

Shultz v. Buchanan, 829 F.3d 943, 950 (8th Cir. 2016) (“We may assume for the sake of analysis that Shultz has presented a genuine issue of fact concerning whether Buchanan’s use of the Taser was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. As of March 2011, however, it was not clearly established that an officer violated the rights of an arrestee by applying force that caused only de minimis injury. LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155, 1158 (8th Cir. 2013); Chambers, 641 F.3d at 908. Before our June 2011 decision in Chambers clarified the analytical distinction between de minimis force and de minimis injury, ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.’. . . Although a Taser has a ‘unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, “we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury.”’. . . The evidence presented by Shultz about consequences of the tasing are consistent with effects that we have characterized as de minimis injury. Shultz sustained temporary marks on his arms and legs, but suffered no permanent scarring. He did not miss any work. Shultz argues that he experienced anxiety, nervousness, and distrust of the police as a result of the incident, but acknowledged that he had not seen a doctor or taken any medication for these symptoms. Accordingly, Shultz has not shown that he suffered more than de minimis injury as a result of Buchanan’s actions.”)

Greenman v. Jessen, 787 F.3d 882, 887-90 (8th Cir. 2015) (“The district court addressed whether it was clearly established at the time of Greenman’s arrests that a reasonable police officer would have known that probable cause did not exist to arrest an intoxicated person operating a Segway for DWI. But we choose to address the defendants’ alternative argument: that they are entitled to qualified immunity because there was probable cause, or at least arguable probable cause, to arrest and prosecute Greenman on all three occasions for operating his Segway in violation of Minnesota traffic laws other than DWI. . . . If the officers had probable cause to arrest, then Greenman has failed to ‘make out a violation of a constitutional right’ in the first instance. . . . Officer Jessen had probable cause to arrest Greenman both the first and second times Greenman was operating his Segway on a roadway. Accordingly, we conclude all three police officers—Officer Jessen, Sergeant Nelson, and Chief Belland—are entitled to qualified immunity in connection with both the August 17, 2010, and the February 4, 2012, arrests. Regarding the third and final arrest, Greenman contends Sergeant Nelson did not have probable cause to believe that Greenman was operating a Segway without due care because Sergeant Nelson did not actually observe him driving the Segway but instead found him lying on the sidewalk next to his Segway shortly after 8:00 p.m. Greenman asserts the evidence supported his explanation that a ‘crater’ in the sidewalk, rather than his lack of due care, caused the crash. Even if Greenman is correct that a fault in the sidewalk caused him to crash his Segway, the statute requires, ‘[e]very person operating an electric personal assistive mobility device on a ... sidewalk ... [to be] responsible for becoming and remaining aware of the actual and potential hazards then existing on the ... sidewalk and [to] use due care in operating the device.’ . . That Greenman failed field sobriety tests after being found on the sidewalk only adds to the ‘totality of circumstances’ that would lead a reasonable person to determine Greenman was not operating his Segway with due care prior to crashing. . . Sergeant Nelson had at least arguable probable cause to arrest Greenman for failing to operate his Segway with due care.”)

De Boise v. Taser Int’l, Inc., 760 F.3d 892, 896-98 (8th Cir. 2014) (“Courts have discretion to decide which part of the inquiry to address first. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009). Here, we begin with second inquiry. Though the outcome of this encounter was tragic, and even if the reasonableness of the officers’ actions was questionable, Appellants cannot defeat the officers’ defense of qualified immunity unless they are able to show that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the officers’ conduct violated a clearly established right. . . . Although we have determined that non-violent, non-fleeing subjects have a clearly established right to be free from the use of tasers, . . . we have yet to determine whether a violent subject, acting aggressively toward officers, has a clearly established right to be free from multiple tasings. . . . And, Appellants point to no previous case that could be said to have clearly established the unconstitutionality of the officers’ actions here. Accordingly, the state of the law would not have placed ‘an officer on notice that he must limit the use of his taser in certain circumstances, even though the subject continues to struggle and resist.’ . . Although Oliver and the case before us both involve the tasing of an emotionally disturbed individual, the facts of the two cases are not sufficiently aligned. Similar to Oliver, De Boise suffered from a mental illness of which the officers were aware. However, unlike in Oliver, the officers in this case observed De Boise aggressively approaching one of the officers, his continued noncompliance with the officers’ instructions to lie on the ground, and his violent and aggressive behavior, which included kicking and swinging his arms at the officers once they approached to subdue him. These important distinctions lead us to conclude that no reasonable officer, observing De Boise’s behavior, would have understood the actions taken to be so disproportionate and unnecessary as to amount to a violation of De Boise’s rights.”)

De Boise v. Taser Int’l, Inc., 760 F.3d 892, 899, 900 (8th Cir. 2014) (Bye, J., dissenting) (“First, construing the facts in the light most favorable to De Boise, I would find a sufficient showing has been made to present to a jury whether the officers violated De Boise’s constitutional rights by continuing to tase him until his eventual death. The use of a taser is not unlimited in scope when dealing with a suspect, even one who is actively resisting. De Boise disobeyed officers’ orders and made some threatening moves. However, De Boise was not carrying a visible or concealed weapon, did not make advances at the officers, and was naked. A jury could conclude, with six armed officers at the scene, it was an unreasonable use of force to continuously tase De Boise rather than handcuff him during the time period De Boise was debilitated during and after each tase. Particularly because De Boise did not have shod feet or any other weapon, a jury could conclude the officers were unreasonable to not make further effort to handcuff De Boise, even if he were swinging his arms or kicking his legs. Second, I would find the officers were put on notice in 2008 that continuously tasing a suspect until his death was unlawful. . . .In this case, the officers were on notice they should have attempted to handcuff De Boise as a safer alternative to tasing De Boise with fifty seconds of electrical shock in just over two minutes of time. It would be clear to a reasonable officer that failing to seize De Boise with reasonable force was unlawful. Because the officers' actions are not protected by qualified immunity, I would remand this case for trial where a jury can determine whether it was reasonable the officers continued to tase De Boise until his death and seemingly without taking the available opportunities to handcuff and restrain De Boise.”)

Gladden v. Richbourg, 759 F.3d 960, 967, 968 (8th Cir. 2014) (“Gladden’s level of intoxication is the dispositive issue in this case. If Gladden appeared to the officers to be sober enough to walk to the guard shack and make a rational, informed decision, then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. But they are not so entitled if Gladden was so intoxicated that Richbourg and Imhoff, in leaving Gladden at the Remington Road exit, acted recklessly in conscious disregard of an obvious risk of harm to Gladden such that their actions evince deliberate indifference to Gladden’s constitutional rights. It is not enough under this analysis that Gladden be mildly or even moderately intoxicated; he must have been so intoxicated that it would have been obvious to the officers that he was incapable of walking to the guard shack at the factory or of making decisions for himself. . . .In short, Gladden’s mild signs of intoxication were not enough to alert the officers to the possibility that Gladden might not be able to make decisions for himself and might not be able to find his way to a guard shack a short distance away from where Richbourg dropped him off. While it may have been negligent for the officers to leave a mildly intoxicated man at a rural intersection on a cold night, their conduct in doing so was not so reckless that it shocks the conscience of the court. Because of our conclusion that Richbourg and Imhoff did not violate Gladden’s constitutional rights, we need not reach the question whether these rights were clearly established at the time of their alleged violation.”)

Peterson v. Kopp, 754 F.3d 594, 600, 601 (8th Cir. 2014) (“The defendants argue, and the district court held, that even if pepper spraying Peterson was unreasonable under the circumstances, Kopp is entitled to qualified immunity because Peterson only suffered ‘de minimis injury’ as a result. . . . [U]ntil our June 2011 decision in Chambers, it was ‘an open question in [the Eighth Circuit] whether an excessive force claim require[d] some minimum level of injury.’ Chambers, 641 F.3d at 904. Because Peterson’s arrest occurred two months before we decided Chambers, Kopp could have reasonably believed his actions were constitutionally permissible as long as they did not cause more than de minimis injury. In short, Kopp would be entitled to qualified immunity if Peterson’s injuries were de minimis. Though we agree the use of force here may have been unreasonable, and acknowledge that Peterson described being pepper sprayed as a painful experience, Peterson has not presented sufficient evidence that he suffered more than de minimis injury. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peterson, he was sprayed directly in the face with pepper spray for just a few seconds, and suffered some pain, discomfort, and peeling under his eyes for several days after the incident. He did not seek medical care and his injuries resolved themselves without medical intervention. We do not make light of the use of pepper spray nor ignore the discomfort and skin irritation Peterson endured; nonetheless, we have not held that the use of pepper spray necessarily causes more than de minimis injury.”)

Bishop v. Glazier, 723 F.3d 957, 962 (8th Cir. 2013) (“As of December 2010, when Glazier encountered Bishop, ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Even if we assume for the sake of analysis that Glazier grabbed Bishop by the throat for 45–60 seconds, and that Bishop’s breathing and speaking were restricted during that time, Bishop’s only injury was a ‘light cut’ on his neck that did not bleed and for which he did not seek any treatment. The amount of force that Glazier allegedly used did not cause more than de minimis injury. . . . Glazier is thus entitled to qualified immunity, because he did not violate Bishop’s then clearly established constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment.”)

LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155, 1157-59 (8th Cir. 2013) (“Determining the question of qualified immunity involves a two-part inquiry: whether the facts shown by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional or statutory right, and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct. . . . We have discretion to decide which part should be addressed first . . . and have decided to address the latter. In Chambers v. Pennycook, we considered whether a plaintiff’s showing of ‘only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment[,]’ and concluded that it did not. . . . We determined that ‘[t]he appropriate inquiry is “whether the force used to effect a particular seizure is ‘reasonable.’” So although a de minimis use of force is insufficient to support a claim, a de minimis injury does not necessarily foreclose a claim. . . . The distinction between de minimis force and de minimis injury, however, was not clear until Chambers was decided. In September 2006, when Mark deployed his Taser, ‘a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . LaCross has not set forth sufficient evidence to show that Mark’s application of the Taser caused more than de minimis injury. Accordingly, Mark is entitled to qualified immunity because he did not violate LaCross’s then clearly established constitutional rights. LaCross contends that the Taser is different from other implements of force in that it can cause excruciating pain without lasting physical effects. Because it is different in kind, the argument goes, the Taser should not be judged by the physical injury it causes. LaCross argues that our post- Chambers opinion in Shekleton v. Eichenberger, 677 F.3d 361 (8th Cir.2012), establishes that ‘de minimis injury is effectively irrelevant where an officer uses a taser on a nonresistant misdemeanor suspect.’ . . . In other words, he argues that Chambers does not apply to excessive force claims involving Tasers. We disagree. Shekleton did not consider the extent of the plaintiff’s injuries, beyond noting that the plaintiff sustained minor head injuries and was treated at a hospital. . . . The decision thus did not address whether the plaintiff suffered only de minimis injury, and if so, whether that injury is viewed differently because it was caused by a Taser. . . . While mention has been made of ‘the unique nature of this type of weapon[,]’ McKenney v. Harrison, 635 F.3d 354, 361 (8th Cir.2011) (Murphy, J., concurring), we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury. In Chambers, we said that ‘the nature of the force applied cannot be correlated perfectly with the type of injury inflicted.’ . . . This observation may be of special relevance regarding Taser-inflicted injuries, some of which are only minor in nature, but others sometimes severe and unexpected. . . . Though it offers no aid to LaCross, the degree of injury is not dispositive after Chambers, and it is now clearly established that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if his use of force is excessive in the circumstances, even if the injury inflicted was minor.”)

Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 359, 360 (8th Cir. 2012) (“Our sister circuits disagree over whether pretrial detainees such as Livers and Sampson have a right to disclosure of exculpatory evidence. The Fifth Circuit concluded a police officer’s ‘deliberate failure to disclose ... undeniably credible and patently exculpatory evidence to the prosecuting attorney’s office’ violates a clearly established constitutional right, Sanders v. English, 950 F.2d 1152, 1158, 1160–62 (5th Cir.1992). The Fourth Circuit reached the opposite result in Taylor v. Waters, 81 F.3d 429, 435–37 (4th Cir.1996). The Fourth Circuit determined a police officer’s failure ‘to disclose exculpatory evidence after a determination of probable cause has been made by a neutral detached magistrate’ neither violates the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause nor ‘render[s] the continuing pretrial seizure of a criminal suspect unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment.’ . . . Given the split of authority, we cannot say a pretrial right to disclosure of exculpatory evidence, if it exists, was clearly established in 2006. . . . Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity on Livers’ and Sampson’s claims based on any failure to disclose evidence. . . . A law enforcement officer who knows another officer is using excessive force has a duty to intervene. . . . We have not recognized a duty to intervene to prevent other constitutional violations. Though other circuits have recognized a duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context, see Randall v. Prince George’s Cnty., Md., 302 F.3d 188, 204 (4th Cir.2002); Reid v. Wren, Nos. 94–7122, 94–7123, 94–7124, 1995 WL 339401, at *2 (10th Cir.1995) (unpublished); Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 285 (7th Cir.1994); Anderson v. Branen, 17 F.3d 552, 557 (2d Cir.1994), the Eleventh Circuit refused to find a clearly established duty to intervene to stop other constitutional violations, see Jones v. Cannon, 174 F.3d 1271, 1286 (11th Cir.1999). . . . Assuming law enforcement officers have a constitutional duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context, such a duty was not clearly established in 2006. Where, as here, the federal circuits disagree on whether conduct violates the Constitution, and our court has not addressed the question, that conduct does not violate clearly established law because ‘it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.’ Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999). Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity on Livers’ failure-to-intervene claim.”)

Burke v. Sullivan, 677 F.3d 367, 372 (8th Cir. 2012) (“Because the instant matter concerns a claim of qualified immunity, not a motion to suppress evidence, we need not reach the issue of whether the officers violated the dictates of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Based on the several facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for them to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke’s home was lawful under either the emergency aid exception or the community caretaker exception. Jay had become highly intoxicated. Jay refused to leave the neighbor’s party. Jay would not cooperate with Burke when she tried to take him home and was verbally abusive to Burke. Jay forcefully pushed Burke against a wall. Jay was involved in a physical altercation with one of the party guests, seriously biting him. Jay kicked and broke a table. Jay was known to use illegal drugs and may have been under the influence of illegal drugs. Jay went into Burke's house across the street immediately before the officers' arrival. There was no response when the officers attempted to contact Burke by knocking on her door, shouting, shining a flashlight inside, and telephoning the residence. Burke, who had been thrown against a wall by Jay, was now in the home alone with a violent suspect. When viewed collectively, these facts could lead a reasonable police officer to conclude there was either a threat of violence or an emergency requiring attention. . . . Contrary to Burke's assertion, Smith v. Kansas City, Mo. Police Department, 586 F.3d 576 (8th Cir.2009) does not dictate a different result. In Smith, we determined a police officer was not entitled to qualified immunity when the officer entered the home of an unarmed domestic violence suspect without a warrant. . . . In reaching our decision, we gave significant weight to the fact the officer had no information any victim or potential victim was inside the home. . . . In Burke's case, the officers had specific information a potential victim, Burke, was inside the home with Jay, the violent suspect, whose erratic behavior generated the domestic disturbance call. Jay had already been involved in violent encounters with Burke and LaRose. Given these facts, it was reasonable for the officers to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful. . . . In addition, our court did not decide Smith until November 2009, over four months after the officers entered Burke's home. As such, Smith was not part of the established law when the officers entered Burke's home.")

Harrington v. City of Council Bluffs, Iowa, 678 F.3d 676, at 679, 680 (8th Cir. 2012) ("If malicious prosecution is a constitutional violation at all, it probably arises under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The dispositive issue on appeal is whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the appellees' Fourth Amendment claims based on malicious prosecution. . . . Our sister circuits have taken a variety of approaches on the issue of whether or when malicious prosecution violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . We need not enter this debate now. . . . Assuming a Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution exists, such a right was not clearly established when the appellees were prosecuted in 1977 and 1978.")

Sisney v. Reisch, 674 F.3d 839, 844, 847 (8th Cir. 2012) ("We think it is clear the district court granted qualified immunity because it found Sisney had failed to allege violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established. We therefore find it prudent to begin our qualified immunity analysis at the second prong. . . . [W]e cannot agree that it was apparent the contours of a prison inmate's right to reasonable dietary and meal accommodations extended to the use of a succah. As a result, the SDSP Officials did not have fair notice it was unlawful to deny Sisney's project applications. We therefore conclude the district court did not err in granting these Officials qualified immunity on Sisney's claims for denial of his 2004, 2005, and 2006 project applications.")

Bernini v. City of St. Paul, 665 F.3d 997, 1004-06 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[A] reasonable officer could have concluded that the individuals at the intersection were acting together and that they intended to break through the police line in an attempt to access downtown St. Paul. It was reasonable, therefore, for an officer to believe that the group, as a whole, was committing one or more offenses under state law, including third degree riot and unlawful assembly. . . We thus conclude that the police did not violate the clearly established rights of sixteen plaintiffs who were both present at the intersection and arrested at the park. . . . The walk from Jackson Street to the park caused the group to expand and enveloped people who were not present at the intersection. But unlike the officer in Barham v. Ramsey, 434 F.3d 565 (D.C.Cir.2006), who directed an indiscriminate mass arrest of about 400 persons in a park based on the unlawful acts of a small group of protestors, the police in this case attempted to discern who had been part of the unit at the intersection and released approximately 200 people, including seven of the plaintiffs, at the park. The police did not violate the clearly established rights of the seven plaintiffs who were among those released at the park. These people were detained only while the officers sought to determine who were the members of the group at the intersection. . . . The nine remaining plaintiffs allege that they were arrested and taken into custody even though they were not present at the Shepard–Jackson intersection. They further contend that the group at the intersection numbered no more than thirty to forty people, and that the officers did not have probable cause (or even arguable probable cause) to arrest more than this number. The video footage, however, shows that the group was much larger. Approximately fifty people clustered closely together directly across from the officers. Another fifty or so people can be seen standing on either side of the group, along the sidewalk. Qualified immunity ‘protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.’ . . In the circumstances of this case, we conclude that the arrest of 160 people in the park (including the nine plaintiffs) was within the range of objectively reasonable police conduct in light of the law that was clearly established and the information available to the officers. It was reasonable for the officers to believe they could arrest those who were acting as a unit with the protestors who attempted to break through the police barrier at the Shepard–Jackson intersection. The videos depict approximately 100 people present at the intersection. The eleven officers were positioned under an overpass, making it difficult for them to see how far the crowd extended to the west. From the officers’ vantage point, it appeared as if “people were continuously arriving from the west.” The officers, especially without the benefit of the videos, could not have been sure of the precise number. They did release approximately 200 people at the park in an attempt to avoid custodial arrests of innocent bystanders. Given the situation at the intersection, the officers’ allegedly mistaken belief at the park that 160 people were part of a unit that had gathered to enter downtown at the Shepard–Jackson intersection was objectively reasonable. We therefore affirm the district court’s conclusion that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity for the seizures. . . . We conclude . . . that Henry is entitled to qualified immunity. In our view, the use of force was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. At a minimum, it was not objectively unreasonable for Henry to authorize the force deployed in light of clearly established law. The circumstances led officers reasonably to believe that a growing crowd intended to penetrate a police line and access downtown St. Paul. Henry’s use and authorization to use non-lethal munitions to direct the crowd away from the intersection and toward a park where the crowd could be controlled did not violate clearly established rights. The plaintiffs contend that it was unreasonable for the officers to continue to use force as the crowd moved west on Shepard Road, because the crowd was ‘complying with the movement of the officers and posed no threat to the officers.’ The video footage reveals, however, that some people would not leave the roadway and that some turned east and faced the officers. It was reasonable for the officers to deploy non-lethal munitions to keep all members of the crowd moving west. Some plaintiffs assert that they were directly targeted by officers—one, for example, testified that an officer sprayed a chemical irritant on his face, neck, ears, and back. But there is no evidence that Henry authorized this type of force against a compliant individual. His implicit authorization occurred at the intersection and involved force deployed against a noncompliant crowd. The plaintiffs have not identified any defendant who used gratuitous force. The evidence, therefore, does not support the conclusion that Henry or any other defendant violated clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. The district court properly granted summary judgment on this claim.”)

Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 901, 904-09 (8th Cir. 2011) (“We now conclude that a citizen may prove an unreasonable seizure based on an excessive use of force without necessarily showing more than de minimis injury, but we hold that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity, because their alleged actions did not violate clearly established law. . . . While we have discretion to decide which question should be addressed first, . . . we think it best in this case to start with the constitutional question. This court has said several times, over the course of more than fifteen years, that ‘[i]t remains an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury.’. . . Continued postponement of that question has resulted in uncertainty about the rights of citizens and the responsibilities of law enforcement officers under the Fourth Amendment. One aspect of the recurring ‘open question’ is squarely presented in this case: whether a plaintiff must demonstrate greater than de minimis injury to establish a use of excessive force that violates the Fourth Amendment. Resolution of that issue will give guidance to officials about how to comply with legal requirements and will allow an avenue of redress for wronged citizens in appropriate circumstances. The question is unlikely to be resolved in the context of a criminal case or in litigation over municipal liability. . . . And none of the factors that typically counsel against a decision on the constitutional question are present here. . . . Having thought hard twice about how to exercise our discretion, see Camreta v. Green, No. 09-1454, 2011 WL 2039369, at *9 (U.S. May 26, 2011), and having ordered supplemental briefing and devoted substantial resources to considering the constitutional question in this case, we will proceed to decide it. . . . We are not convinced. . . . that evidence of only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The dispositive question is whether the officer’s conduct was objectively reasonable under the circumstances, as judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene at the time the force was applied. . . . The gratuitous use of force alleged by Chambers was not reasonable under the circumstances. . . . The second step in the qualified immunity analysis is to determine whether the right that was violated was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the defendant’s alleged misconduct. . . . It was not clearly established . . . that an officer violated the rights of an arrestee by applying force that caused only de minimis injury. . . . Given the state of the law in August 2005, a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We reject in this decision a constitutional rule that turns on the arrestee's degree of injury, but given the law prevailing at the time of the incident, we conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Baribeau v. City of Minneapolis, 596 F. 3d 465, 474, 478-80 (8th Cir. 2010) (“The Supreme Court recently made it clear that we are allowed to exercise our ‘sound discretion’ to decide which qualified immunity prong we address first, ‘in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.’ Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818. In this case, we find it most beneficial to first address whether the facts, when considered in the plaintiffs’ favor, establish a violation of the plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [B]ecause the plaintiffs’ conduct was expressive conduct and did not amount to fighting words, their conduct clearly did not fall within the narrowed reading of the disorderly conduct statute. Thus, there was no probable cause to believe the plaintiffs’ expressive conduct violated the statute. Accordingly, we hold that Merkel and Weber violated the plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [A]n objectively reasonable person would not think probable cause exists under the Minnesota disorderly conduct statute to arrest a group of peaceful people for engaging in an artistic protest by playing music, broadcasting statements, dressing as zombies, and walking erratically in downtown Minneapolis during a week-long festival. Merkel and Weber arrested the plaintiffs in 2006—well after the Minnesota Supreme Court’s decisions in S.L.J. and Machholz. Thus, the Minnesota Supreme Court’s cases in S.L.J. and Machholz provided Merkel and Weber with a fair warning that the arrests were unconstitutional. . . . The Minnesota Supreme Court has not interpreted this [the WMD] statute. . . . We agree with the district court that there was no probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs for displaying simulated WMD. However, we do not agree that arguable probable cause existed to arrest the plaintiffs. . . . [T]he facts in this case did not require officers to parse code language. As a part of their artistic anti-consumerism protest, the plaintiffs carried four bags of sound equipment. The bags contained an iPod, a radio transmitter, an antenna, a wireless phone handset, radio receivers, and speakers. Some of the sound equipment, including wiring and an on/off switch for the music, was visible on the outside of the bags. The plaintiffs were clearly using this equipment to broadcast anti-consumerism statements and music. Though we recognize the seriousness of WMD offenses, we cannot say that displaying and using portable sound equipment for its natural purpose—i.e., to transmit and broadcast sound waves—even remotely satisfies the statute’s definition of displaying simulated WMD. Therefore, even if the WMD statute did not require the plaintiffs to display biological, chemical, or radioactive elements, a reasonable person would not have believed probable cause existed to arrest the plaintiffs for displaying simulated WMD. Accordingly, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because they violated the plaintiffs’ clearly established rights when they arrested the plaintiffs without arguable probable cause that the plaintiffs had displayed simulated WMDs.”).

Baribeau v. City of Minneapolis, 596 F. 3d 465, 474, 478-80 (8th Cir. 2010) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)(“The defendant police officers Timothy Merkel and Roderic Weber had probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs for a violation of the Minnesota disorderly conduct statute, Minn.Stat. ‘ 609.72, subd. 1. Nonetheless, the majority reverses the district court’s grant of qualified immunity to these officers on the plaintiffs’ Fourth Amendment claim, holding that the officers acted contrary to a ‘narrowing construction’ of the disorderly conduct statute—a construction that has never been adopted by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, and that has been expressly rejected by the Minnesota Court of Appeals. The majority’s decision, therefore, is contrary to established principles of qualified immunity, which ensure that public officials are not subjected to suit unless they are on notice, through clearly established law, that their conduct is unlawful. I would affirm the judgment of the district court in its entirety.”).

Norman v. Schuetzle, 585 F.3d 1097, 1111 (8th Cir. 2009) (“Existing caselaw in 2005 did not sufficiently put Wrolstad on notice that his actions of showing the kites to other inmates put Norman at a substantial risk of harm from other inmates. Norman fails to cite to cases other than the snitch labeling cases to support his claim that it was clearly established that Wrolstad’s actions violated his constitutional rights. As in Pearson, we look to the specific actions of the officer to determine whether it was clearly established that his actions violated the inmate’s rights. We conclude that whether or not it violated Norman’s right to be protected from harm when Wrolstad showed his grievances to other inmates under the circumstances of this case, it was not clearly established at the time that doing so would have violated Norman’s rights.”).

Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522, 528, 531-34 (8th Cir. 2009) (8th Cir. 2009) (en banc) (“We conclude that it is appropriate in this case to start with the question of whether the allegations and evidence, when considered in Nelson’s favor, establish any constitutional violation. . . . Having determined that there is sufficient evidence in the record to permit a reasonable factfinder to determine that Turensky’s actions violated the Eighth Amendment, the question remains whether such a constitutional right was clearly established in September 2003. . . . A reasonable factfinder could determine from the record in this case that Officer Turensky, like the Hope officials, was not facing an emergency situation but nevertheless ‘subjected [Nelson] to a substantial risk of physical harm, to the unnecessary pain caused by the [shackles] and the restricted position of confinement ... [and] created a risk of particular discomfort and humiliation.’. . . The general responsibilities of state officers with regard to an inmate’s medical needs were also clearly established before September 2003. In 1976 the Supreme Court had decided Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976), a leading case in the development of Eighth Amendment law. Estelle was a § 1983 action brought against prison officials for providing an inmate inadequate medical care. . . The Court concluded that either interference with care or infliction of ‘unnecessary suffering’ establishes deliberate indifference in medical care cases in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Moreover, the precise issue under consideration here was decided years ago by a federal district court in the District of Columbia. In 1994 that court held that ‘[w]hile a woman is in labor ... shackling is inhumane’ and violates her constitutional rights. Women Prisoners of D.C. Dep’t of Corr. v. District of Columbia, 877 F.Supp. 634, 668-69 (D.D.C.1994), modified in part on other grounds, 899 F.Supp. 659 (D.D.C.1995). . . . Since Nelson produced sufficient evidence to demonstrate that Officer Turensky violated her clearly established Eighth Amendment rights by shackling her during labor, ‘the basic concept underlying the Eighth Amendment [being] nothing less than the dignity of [wo]man,’ Hope, 536 U.S. at 738 (quotation omitted), the judgment of the district court denying Officer Turensky qualified immunity is affirmed.”).

Howard v. Kansas City Police Dept., 570 F.3d 984, 988, 991 (8th Cir. 2009) (“In the instant case, we elect to proceed under the traditional framework and decide first whether the facts demonstrate a violation of Howard’s constitutional rights before determining whether such rights were clearly established. . . . We have already concluded the Officers used excessive force in seizing Howard because they acted unreasonably in responding to the dangers posed by the hot asphalt. We similarly conclude a reasonable official would understand that such conduct constitutes excessive force.”)

Mussa v. Abdulkadir, No. 11–CV–1967 (PJS/JJG), 2013 WL 4780955, *2 (D. Minn. Sept. 5, 2013) (“Abdulkadir argues that, because he inflicted only de minimis injuries on Mussa, he is entitled to qualified immunity on Mussa’s excessive-force claim under Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011). In Chambers, the Eighth Circuit held that a plaintiff need not show more than de minimis injuries in order to prevail on a claim of excessive force. . . . But because the Eighth Circuit’s previous case law had not been clear on this point, the police officers who had been sued in Chambers—and who had inflicted only de minimis injuries on the plaintiff—were found to be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Abdulkadir argues that, because the incident in this case took place before Chambers was decided, and because he inflicted only de minimis injuries on Mussa, he too is entitled to qualified immunity. The Court agrees. This case is squarely controlled by Chambers. Mussa does not dispute that Abdulkadir had the right to detain him for not having a light on his bicycle. Because Abdulkadir had the right to detain Mussa, he had the right to use some degree of force. . . . This sets Mussa’s case apart from cases in which, under the plaintiff’s version of the facts, the officer did not have the right to make an arrest or otherwise detain the plaintiff. . . . Mussa argues that, even though Abdulkadir had the right to detain him, Abdulkadir had no right to use force against him once Mussa was handcuffed and secured in the squad car. The problem with this argument, though, is that the very same situation was present in Chambers. After Chambers was handcuffed and on the floor, an officer kicked him and pressed his foot on Chambers’s back. . . . Chambers was then placed in a squad car, where another officer choked him and kicked the back of his seat. . . . The officers also adjusted Chambers’s seat so that Chambers’s head was nearly touching the dashboard and then drove erratically so that Chambers was jerked back and forth (presumably causing Chambers’s head to hit the dashboard). . . . All of this happened after Chambers had been handcuffed and brought under control. Yet the Eighth Circuit nevertheless found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In short, the fact that Mussa was handcuffed and in the squad car does not distinguish this case from Chambers. So long as Mussa’s injuries were de minimis, Chambers dictates that Abdulkadir is entitled to qualified immunity.”)

NINTH CIRCUIT

K. J. by & through Johnson v. Jackson, 127 F.4th 1239, 1244, 1248-51 (9th Cir. 2025) (“We write today to stress what has long been clearly established: public school officials must comply with Goss when imposing a suspension, including an extension of an existing suspension based on new allegations or new evidence of misconduct. We agree with the district court that Defendants violated K.J.’s due process rights in extending his suspension without giving him an opportunity to be heard on the charges and evidence against him. . . . Even if Defendants violated K.J.’s constitutional rights, they would be entitled to qualified immunity and shielded from personal liability unless their actions violated ‘clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.’ . . . We hold that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because the unlawfulness of their conduct was clearly established in Goss. The district court held that Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because there were no precedential cases governing these facts. It held that ‘Goss does not explicitly address the more precise issue in this case, which is whether students are entitled to a second round of due process protections if an initial suspension is extended.’ Similarly, Defendants suggest that there is no clearly established ‘legal obligation to allow Appellant to retell his story a second time.’ Setting aside that ‘officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances,’ . . . Goss clearly governs these facts. . . . Under Goss, K.J. was entitled to hear the new accusation, learn the basis for that accusation, and be given an opportunity to explain his version of the facts as to that accusation. . . . A suspension extension is still a suspension from school, and a suspension extension based on new allegations or new evidence is effectively a second suspension. It is irrelevant that the suspension and suspension extension arose from the same event. . . . In sum, K.J.’s rights were ‘sufficiently definite’ under Goss such that ‘any reasonable official in the defendant’s shoes would have understood that he was violating [them].’ . . . Because Goss clearly requires ‘the student first be told what he is accused of doing and what the basis of the accusation is,’ and it is clear that K.J. never had an opportunity to be heard regarding the new charge underlying the suspension extension, Defendants violated his clearly established rights under Goss . . . We therefore reverse the district court’s grant of qualified immunity.”) Olson v. County of Grant, 127 F.4th 1193, 1195, 1198-1203 (9th Cir. 2025) (“We agree with the district court on the outcome and agree there was no clearly established law. We conclude, however, there was a constitutional violation. This case presents a troubling example of the intrusion on Fourth Amendment rights that can occur with respect to highly sensitive cell phone data. More specifically, this circumstance involved a law enforcement agency accessing highly sensitive cell phone data from another jurisdiction in the absence of a warrant, consent, or even any investigation or suspicion of criminal activity on the part of a suspect. Although we affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment because Olson’s right to be free from Carpenter’s search was not clearly established at the time, we take this opportunity to conclude that there was a constitutional violation. . . . We now turn to the more nuanced question presented by this appeal and one of first impression in this circuit: Whether Carpenter’s review of the cell phone extraction—without consent, without a warrant, and without even a suspicion of further criminal activity by Olson or even Smith—violated Olson’s Fourth Amendment rights. Under the circumstances presented here, we conclude that Carpenter’s review of the cell phone data was an unreasonable search. . . . The privacy interests recognized in Riley are just as pressing here. An ‘extraction’ or a ‘phone dump’ is typically an exact replica of the data contained on a cell phone at the time of extraction, easily searchable and reviewable by law enforcement. . . . Put differently, it is the functional equivalent of Olson’s phone at the moment she consented to the search by Idaho law enforcement. . . . The privacy interests in the cell phone are precisely the same as those in an extraction, and treating the two differently would introduce a gaping loophole in Riley’s warrant requirement. . . . A plain reading of the consent form also confirms that Olson’s consent in Idaho did not extend to a search by a different law enforcement agency, in another state, for evidence of her boyfriend’s theoretical misdeeds. . . . The form does not reserve, for the Idaho police, the right to share phone data with other law enforcement agencies for purposes unrelated to any criminal investigation, nor does the form consent to a search by Oregon police. And, unsurprisingly, no Oregon law enforcement authority claimed to act as an agent for the Idaho State Police. Palmer was ‘curious’ about whether Olson’s phone might reveal misconduct on Smith’s part, and Carpenter was interested in reviewing the phone for possible Brady material in cases where Smith might testify. But neither Palmer’s curiosity nor Carpenter’s improbable search for Brady material for some hypothetical future investigation justifies expanding the consent form’s express scope. . . . We have no difficulty concluding that Carpenter’s search was unreasonable. . . . The government interests here are not plausible, let alone urgent, and its behavior was wholly indiscriminate. Accordingly, we hold that Carpenter’s warrantless search of Olson’s cell phone constituted a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Olson does not cite to any Supreme Court or Ninth Circuit authority that places the constitutional violation as ‘beyond debate’ and none have ‘clearly established the rule on which [Olson] seek[s] to rely.’. . . Riley v. California, the case upon which Olson primarily relies, held that police may not invoke the doctrine of search incident to arrest to search the contents of an arrestee’s phone without a warrant. . . . But Riley says little about the consent issue central to this case. The ‘sweeping language’ both this court and the Supreme Court have used ‘to describe the importance of cell phone privacy,’ . . . does not itself suffice to create clearly established law in an entirely different context. . . . Although we have the option to avoid the constitutional question and reach only the ‘clearly established law’ prong of the qualified immunity analysis, we undertake the two-step Saucier analysis because ‘develop[ing] constitutional precedent’ in this area would be helpful. . . . This case presents a question which ‘do[es] not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable’ and thus use of the two-step procedure is ‘especially valuable.’. . . Because it is important to lay down a marker for future cases, we heed the Court’s call in Pearson to develop constitutional precedent and conclude that Carpenter’s search infringed on Olson’s Fourth Amendment rights. . . . However, we affirm the district court’s decision to grant qualified immunity to Carpenter because the law was not clearly established at the time he undertook the search of Olson’s phone records.”)

Olson v. County of Grant, 127 F.4th 1193, 1203-04 (9th Cir. 2025) (Bress, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“I agree that the claims against Sheriff Palmer fail because there is no evidence he exercised supervisory control over County Prosecutor Carpenter. I also agree that Carpenter is entitled to qualified immunity because any constitutional violation was not clearly established. These points are sufficient to resolve this appeal, and I would end the analysis there. The majority takes a more expansive approach, finding in Part II.A that Carpenter violated Olson’s Fourth Amendment rights. I join only Parts I and II.B of the court’s opinion. Because Carpenter is entitled to qualified immunity based on the lack of clearly established law, it is not necessary to decide whether Carpenter violated the Fourth Amendment. There may be instances in which it is helpful to the development of the law to answer the underlying constitutional question even when the defendant prevails on qualified immunity grounds. But this is not such a case. The reasons are several. We received limited briefing on the constitutional questions that the court unnecessarily resolves today. The district court did not reach these constitutional questions. The facts of this case are unusual, providing an infirm foundation for constructive exposition of the law. And the issues are more complicated than the majority allows, raising questions about when law enforcement agencies may share information among themselves, why it violated the Fourth Amendment for Carpenter to review information provided to him by an Idaho prosecutor, whether Carpenter should be charged with knowing about the scope of Olson’s consent, and whether fault more properly lies with the Idaho authorities, who are not defendants here. There was no need to get into these issues, and this case provided a poor platform for doing so. In my respectful view, prudence here dictated that we decide only what we needed to decide.”) Cuevas v. City of Tulare, 107 F.4th 894, 899-902 (9th Cir. 2024) (“The district court held that no case clearly established that the officers could not return fire at Castro, collaterally hitting Cuevas. We agree. And because ‘we find the clearly established prong dispositive,’ we ‘exercise our discretion to resolve [the] case only on’ that ground. . . Cuevas relies on several cases to argue that her rights were established when the officers, returning fire at Castro, also shot her. None of them have facts similar enough to ‘clearly establish’ that the officers used excessive force. . . . In short, none of Cuevas’s cases clearly establish that officers violated her rights when they shot her while defensively returning fire during an active shooting. Cuevas has not carried her burden. . . . Although it was not clearly established that the officers’ force was excessive, that does not end our analysis. Cuevas also argues that the constitutional violation was obvious. We are not persuaded. Although the Supreme Court has recognized that some constitutional violations are so obvious that qualified immunity is inappropriate, it has only done so in Eighth Amendment cases. See generally Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 734–38, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002); Taylor v. Riojas, 592 U.S. 7, 141 S.Ct. 52, 208 L.Ed.2d 164 (2020) (per curiam). And while our court has found an obvious constitutional violation in an excessive-force case, it did so only where officers killed a man who posed ‘no immediate threat.’ . . . As we have already explained, the officer in Estate of Aguirre obviously violated the Constitution when he ‘shot and killed a suspect holding a baseball bat because the suspect was not facing the officer, was holding the bat pointed downwards, and was not threatening anyone else when he was shot.’ . . . But the fact that officers cannot kill a man who is not a threat says little about what they can do in the myriad cases where a suspect does pose a threat. The Supreme Court has instructed us that ‘[t]he calculus of reasonableness must embody allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’ . . . Indeed, ‘[w]e have noted that “this obviousness principle, an exception to the specific-case requirement, is especially problematic in the Fourth-Amendment context.”’ . . . A categorical statement that conduct obviously violates the Fourth Amendment ‘is particularly hard to make when officers encounter suspects every day in never-before-seen ways,’ including ‘countless confrontations ... that yield endless permutations of outcomes and responses.’. . For this reason, in excessive-force cases where police officers face a threat, the obviousness principle will rarely—if ever—be available as an end-run to the requirement that law must be clearly established. With this understanding in mind, the officers’ returning fire was not obviously unconstitutional—even though they collaterally hit Cuevas. The alternative would be untenable. Officers would have to either not defend themselves or risk liability if they accidentally hit a bystander when they return fire. The officers are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . No case clearly established, and it was not obvious, that the officers could not return fire after Castro killed their police dog and shot K-9 Officer Garcia. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.”) Scanlon v. County of Los Angeles, 92 F.4th 781, 807-10 (9th Cir. 2024) (“The only surviving portion of our decision in Greene is that the Fourth Amendment ‘right of minor children to be free from unconstitutional seizures and interrogations by social workers [w]as not ... clearly established’ as of August 2015. . . We have not gone so far since Greene. . . . Dees suggests that a different set of facts could transform a social worker interview into a Fourth Amendment seizure, but it does not firmly establish that principle. At least three circuits, the Sixth, Seventh, and Tenth, have weighed in on this question, but we think that the results are a mixed bag. [court discusses cases] We cannot discern a clear rule from these decisions, and the plain import of our own is that Olarte is entitled to qualified immunity as to claims stemming from her schoolhouse interview of G.X. . . . Our decisions are inconclusive. That conclusion is only reinforced by our review of decisions from other circuits. The only one with language broad enough to constitute some warning to Olarte is the Sixth Circuit’s decision in Schulkers—decided three years after the events in this case. In a case where we conclude that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity because the constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of the events, we have the discretion to reach the constitutional question to ‘promote[] the development of constitutional precedent.’. . As the Court has observed, ‘if the policy of avoidance were always followed in favor of ruling on qualified immunity whenever there was no clearly settled constitutional rule of primary conduct, standards of official conduct would tend to remain uncertain, to the detriment both of officials and individuals.’. . Nonetheless, this matter is left to our ‘sound discretion.’. . At oral argument, counsel for the Parents candidly urged us to address the merits of the constitutional claim, even if only to provide future guidance. Although we are sympathetic, we decline the invitation to resolve the Fourth Amendment contours of social worker interviews of children at school. There are a number of factors that have to be balanced in these cases. . . These include: the age of the child; whether the child suffers from any cognitive or emotional conditions; where the interview took place; whether the parents knew in advance of the interview and consented or objected to the interview; the nature of the claim being investigated, including whether the claim may result in criminal charges; whether the nature of the claim is such that the child may be in physical danger; whether the child is considered a possible victim, a perpetrator, or a witness; the length of the interview; whether law enforcement is present; whether the child is allowed to have present a trusted adult, such as a teacher, counselor, or other school administrator; whether the child felt coerced or intimidated; and whether the child has the option of stopping the interview. . . Some of the facts in this case are troubling, while others point to the reasonableness of the interview. . . . Although Olarte’s interview of G.X. doubtlessly effected a seizure, we would want additional facts before we concluded that it represented an unreasonable one. Given the range of views on this question, . . . we will not address the Fourth Amendment question on this record. We therefore affirm the district court’s grant of judgment on the pleadings as to the schoolhouse interview of G.X.”) Martinez v. High, 91 F.4th 1022, 1028-32 (9th Cir. 2024) (“Because this court may consider either prong first, it need not decide the first prong if the second is dispositive. . . . But deciding both prongs is ‘often beneficial’ because it ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent.’. . . That is true here. For one thing, the constitutional question is ‘in an area where this court’s guidance is needed.’. . . Indeed, our application of Martinez I in this case will guide future courts when addressing due process questions in similar contexts. What’s more, the parties have repeatedly briefed the constitutional question in the district court and this court. Thus, we address both prongs to ‘best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition of [this] case.’. . . Though Ms. Martinez established a constitutional violation, Officer High is entitled to qualified immunity because existing case law in 2013 did not make clear that Officer High’s conduct violated Ms. Martinez’s substantive due process rights. . . . The district court relied on Okin when it first denied Officer High qualified immunity. And Ms. Martinez relied on Okin again on remand. In that case, the Second Circuit held that police officers violated a domestic violence victim’s due process rights when they emboldened the abuser ‘by fostering the belief that his intentionally violent behavior will not be confronted by arrest, punishment, or police interference.’. . . But we held in Martinez I that Okin did not clearly establish Ms. Martinez’s due process rights because it had not ‘been “embraced by a ‘consensus’ of courts.”’. . . Martinez I established only ‘[g]oing forward’—but not in 2013—that an officer violates a victim’s due process rights when the officer engages in affirmative conduct much like Officer High’s. . . . Like Officer High, Officer Hershberger told Mr. Pennington about Ms. Martinez’s confidential report of his prior abuse while also disparaging Ms. Martinez. . . . We held that this conduct violated Ms. Martinez’s due process rights by provoking and emboldening Mr. Pennington to retaliate against her later that day, but we granted Officer Hershberger qualified immunity because the constitutional violation in ‘this context was not apparent to every reasonable officer at the time the conduct occurred.’. . . That holding applies equally to Officer High. . . . Although Kennedy involved a police officer disclosing a report to an alleged perpetrator, it did not involve sufficiently ‘similar circumstances’ to put the constitutional violation ‘beyond debate’ here. . . . The officers in Kennedy not only told a violent perpetrator about the plaintiff’s allegations without giving her ‘a reasonable opportunity to protect her family’ despite promising to do so, but they also misrepresented the level of danger by assuring her they would patrol the neighborhood. . . . This ‘was an additional and aggravating factor’ that made the plaintiff and her family ‘more vulnerable to the danger.’. . . Given the officers’ specific false assurances that affected the plaintiff’s choices, we cannot say that ‘every reasonable official would have understood’ from Kennedy that an officer violates the constitution by disclosing a report to a violent perpetrator. . . . Indeed, this court relied on Kennedy in Martinez I, yet it did not hold that Kennedy clearly established Ms. Martinez’s due process rights. . . . At bottom, our precedent dictates that no existing authority gave Officer High sufficient notice in 2013 that her conduct violated due process. . . We affirm the district court’s summary judgment granting Officer High qualified immunity because Ms. Martinez’s constitutional right was not clearly established in 2013. But we now clarify that right going forward. An officer is liable under the state-created danger doctrine when the officer discloses a victim’s confidential report to a violent perpetrator in a manner that increases the risk of retaliation against the victim.”)

Martinez v. High, 91 F.4th 1022, 1033 (9th Cir. 2024) (Bumatay, J., concurring in the judgment) (“To decide this case, it is sufficient that everyone agrees that no clearly established law existed at the time of the incident between Martinez, Officer High, and her abuser. As the majority admits, we need not decide the first prong of qualified immunity if the second prong is dispositive. . . And here, the district court did not rule on the first prong of whether there’s a constitutional violation. No party argued that there was a constitutional violation in their initial briefing. It wasn’t until prodded at oral argument by our court and forced to file supplemental briefing did the parties raise any arguments about a constitutional violation. It was unwise to reach the constitutional violation question under these circumstances. For these reasons, I concur only in the judgment of the court.”)

Sabbe v. Washington County Board of Commissioners, 84 F.4th 807, 819-29 (9th Cir. 2023) (“Principles of constitutional avoidance demand that we ‘think hard, and then think hard again’ before reaching constitutional questions, but reaching them can be necessary to ‘give guidance to officials about how to comply with legal requirements,’ especially when resting our decision solely on the ‘clearly established’ prong of qualified immunity would ‘frustrate “the development of constitutional precedent” and the promotion of law-abiding behavior.’. . This appeal—and particularly the officers’ use of the V150—exemplifies the circumstances in which it is important to provide guidance. It is now common for law enforcement agencies to possess and use armored vehicles, many of which have been decommissioned from military service, and we have never addressed the degree of force involved in the use of these vehicles in a civilian setting. The mismatch between the ubiquity of these vehicles and the paucity of case law concerning their use is illustrated by the facts of this case. Washington County publicly reported deploying its armored vehicles over 100 times in the first eight months of 2021 alone—about once every two to three days. . . Yet Sergeant Braun testified that the officers had received no training on how to use an armored vehicle to execute a PIT maneuver because it was ‘not conceivable’ and ‘not something we’ve ever addressed under policy.’ Because armored vehicles are now frequently employed by civilian law enforcement agencies, acknowledging the quantum of force at issue when they are used to conduct PIT maneuvers will provide guidance as agencies formulate policies and train officers to use armored vehicles in ways that promote public safety without exceeding constitutional bounds. . . Having thought hard and then thought hard again, we consider the constitutional implications of the V150 PIT maneuvers before deciding whether April Sabbe’s § 1983 claim based on these alleged violations is barred by qualified immunity. . . . While it appears this first PIT maneuver damaged Sabbe’s truck more severely than might have been expected had it had been executed with a regular police cruiser under similar circumstances, it is not clear that a reasonable jury could find it constituted deadly force. . . However, we respectfully disagree with the district court’s determination that a jury could not find that the second PIT maneuver presented a substantial risk of at least serious bodily injury. The video shows that Sergeant Braun executed a second PIT maneuver by driving the V150 into the passenger side of Sabbe's truck, after Sabbe had come to a complete stop and was trying to exit the truck from the driver's door. . . The impact caused the door to swing shut on Sabbe's leg and pushed his truck sideways across the field. The force from the second PIT maneuver was enough to spin the truck on its axis about 270 degrees. . . Under our case law, a jury could decide that the second V150 PIT maneuver constituted the use of deadly force because it created a substantial risk of serious bodily injury. . . . Though Defendants had reason to believe that Sabbe was armed and intoxicated, that he may have discharged a weapon on his property approximately an hour and forty minutes earlier in a manner that threatened public safety, and that he intentionally rammed the V150, there is no indication he had fired from the pickup or pointed a gun in the direction of the V150 until after the officers executed both PIT maneuvers. Viewing these facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that Sabbe did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or the public by the time they executed the PIT maneuvers. . . . The record indicates that noise from the helicopter interfered to some extent with the officers' ability to hear each other on the radio, but a reasonable jury could decide that, after the BEAR got stuck in the mud, it was unreasonable to first use potentially deadly force instead of requesting communications equipment, waiting for it, and then attempting to communicate with Sabbe. . . The officers' failure to warn or provide direction to Sabbe before using potentially deadly force weighs against them. We have repeatedly recognized that 'an officer must give a warning before using deadly force "whenever practicable."' . . . Because a reasonable jury could decide that Sabbe did not pose an imminent threat to the officers or to others at that point, and that the balance of the other factors also favors Plaintiff, a jury could decide that the second PIT maneuver constituted the use of excessive force within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We conclude that qualified immunity shields Defendants from Plaintiff's claim that the officers used excessive force when they used the V150 to collide with Sabbe's truck. . . . We are unaware of any Supreme Court or federal court of appeals decision quantifying or characterizing the degree of force involved in using an armored vehicle to execute a low-speed PIT maneuver, let alone any precedent that would have clearly established that the officers' use of the V150 under these circumstances was unconstitutional. Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity 'simply because "the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful,"' but we are still required to find that the facts of a prior case would have made it 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . Plaintiff argues that Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for their use of the V150, citing our decisions in Villanueva, 986 F.3d at 1158, Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2021), and Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d at 1189. She also cites the Supreme Court's decision in Torres, 141 S. Ct. at 989. None of these cases assist her cause. With the exception of Harris, each of these cases was decided more than two years after the events in this case took place, so they could not have put Defendants on notice of clearly established law. . . . The circumstances underlying these cases are materially distinguishable from the circumstances presented by the confrontation between Sabbe and the officers who entered his field. Plaintiff does not show how these cases articulate a constitutional rule that applies with such obvious clarity that it should have put Defendants on notice that their use of the V150 to execute PIT maneuvers could constitute the use of deadly force, or that the use of deadly force was excessive under the circumstances presented here. Having canvassed our own case law, we are similarly unable to locate any such precedent. We had not recognized before today that the use of an armored vehicle to execute a low-speed PIT maneuver could constitute the use of deadly force. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the V150 PIT maneuvers were unconstitutionally excessive. . . . April Sabbe also argues the officers violated her husband’s Fourth Amendment rights when they shot and killed him. In Plaintiff’s view, the record does not establish that Sabbe shot or pointed a gun at the V150 such that objectively reasonable officers would believe that Sabbe posed an immediate threat to their safety. Plaintiff maintains Sabbe neither pointed nor fired a gun at the V150. Defendants say he did both. Given the standard of review, we resolve the ‘who shot first’ dispute in Plaintiff’s favor, but whether Sabbe actually fired his rifle at the officers is immaterial to our qualified immunity analysis. . . . In our circuit, ‘the relevant question for purposes of qualified immunity’ is not whether Sabbe actually threatened the officers, but whether they ‘could reasonably have believed that [he] posed such a threat.’ . . . Our case law is clear that when a suspect reaches for a gun or aims a weapon at officers, responding with deadly force does not violate the Constitution. . . . In arriving at our conclusion, we are also mindful that our law ‘embod[ies] allowance for the fact that police officers are often forced to make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving—about the amount of force that is necessary in a particular situation.’ . . . On the facts of this case, the district court correctly ruled that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity for shooting and killing Remi Sabbe.”) Sabbe v. Washington County Board of Commissioners, 84 F.4th 807, 842-43 (9th Cir. 2023) (Berzon, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“The majority holds . . . that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the PIT maneuver excessive force claim, on the ground that there is no specific precedent ‘quantifying or characterizing the degree of force involved in using an armored vehicle to execute a PIT maneuver’ or ‘that would have clearly established that the officers’ use of the V150 under these circumstances was unconstitutional.’ . . . I cannot agree. We must, to be sure, be ‘mindful of the Supreme Court’s repeated admonition not to define the right at issue at a high level of generality.’ . . . Thus, a plaintiff can most easily show that an officer’s conduct was clearly established as unlawful by pointing to ‘[p]recedent involving similar facts.’ . . . However, in ‘obvious case[s],’ . . . officials “can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances[.]” . . . A ‘general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though the very action in question has not previously been held unlawful.’ . . . Otherwise, law enforcement behavior that is unprecedented precisely because it is so obviously dangerous that no law enforcement entity has previously attempted it becomes insulated from liability, leaving citizens to bear their own losses from obviously high risk and unjustified uses of force. The officers here stated that the force they administered by repeatedly ramming the V150 into Sabbe’s vehicle was unprecedented. Braun testified at his deposition: ‘I don’t know of anywhere in the nation where a piece of armor has been used to do a PIT maneuver, except for [here]. It’s not conceivable, not something we ever thought of, not something we’ve ever addressed under policy.’ That Defendants’ conduct was ‘not conceivable’ is indicative of the perfectly obvious risks of deadly force presented by such a tactic. Any reasonable officer would have understood that using an extremely large and heavy armored tank to immobilize a moving civilian vehicle by repeatedly striking it ‘creates a substantial risk of causing death or serious bodily injury.’ . . . Affirming the grant of qualified immunity in this case with regard to the second PIT maneuver does ‘not further the purpose of qualified immunity—to balance the competing need to hold public officials accountable ... and the need to shield officials from harassment, distraction, and liability.’ . . . To the contrary, it exonerates officers for obviously unlawful conduct, so long as that particular conduct is so extreme and unprecedented that it is not contemplated by policy and has never been attempted before. I would reverse the grant of qualified immunity as to the Defendants’ PIT maneuvers using the V150.”)

Johnson v. Barr, 79 F.4th 996, 1004-05 (9th Cir. 2023), amending opinion and denying reh’g and reh’g en banc (“The rationale of the Pearson Court in changing the rigid two-step procedure adopted in Saucier v. Katz, . . . guides our analysis in this case. . . . We hold that regardless of whether there was a violation of Johnson’s constitutional rights, Johnson did not show that the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the case. We have recognized that ‘[i]n the context of a § 1983 action, a Fourth Amendment violation occurs when a person is arrested “without probable cause or other justification.”’ . . . In applying the qualified immunity analysis to claims of unlawful arrest, we have summarized the two-step qualified immunity inquiry as ‘(1) whether there was probable cause for the arrest; and (2) whether it is reasonably arguable that there was probable cause for arrest—that is, whether reasonable officers could disagree as to the legality of the arrest such that the arresting officer is entitled to qualified immunity.’ . . . We hold here that although a reasonable jury could find that Defendants lacked probable cause to arrest Johnson, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because, even construing all facts in Johnson’s favor, the law did not clearly establish that probable cause was lacking. This reasonable officer standard for qualified immunity differs from the prudent person standard guiding our probable cause for arrest analysis. . . . Although officers might seem to lack probable cause under the prudent person standard, especially when we evaluate their actions post hoc, a reasonable officer on the ground might perceive the situation differently. An officer would not be on notice that his or her action was unreasonable unless ‘all reasonable officers would agree that there was no probable cause in this instance.’ . . . In so holding, we do not put aside our responsibility to determine unlawful and unconstitutional behavior, but rather recognize the purposes for which qualified immunity exists and Johnson’s failure to meet the burden required to defeat qualified immunity under Supreme Court and circuit precedent. . . . Here, Johnson did not sufficiently show how her arrest violated a clearly established right to be free from an unlawful arrest when the undisputed evidence (under the probable cause analysis) presented before the district court does not show that every reasonable officer would be on notice that these actions were unconstitutional.”)

Alexander v. Nguyen, 78 F.4th 1140, 1144 (9th Cir. 2023) (“This court tends ‘to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent in an area where this court’s guidance is ... needed.’. . . Because the law governing pretrial detainees’ claims of inadequate medical care and other dangerous conditions of confinement is still developing in the wake of the Supreme Court’s decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), we address the first prong, which is decisive here. We need not discuss qualified immunity separately. Alexander argues that he can prove that Dr. Nguyen denied him appropriate medical care in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights under the test set forth in Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2018). Dr. Nguyen argues that the proper inquiry is whether Alexander was deprived of safe conditions under the test in Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982). These tests differ only slightly. Both ask whether Dr. Nguyen’s conduct was reasonable, and both require Alexander to show that Dr. Nguyen’s conduct was worse than negligent. The undisputed facts show that Alexander cannot meet this burden under either phrasing.”)

Grabowski v. Arizona Board of Regents, 69 F.4th 1110, 1123-24 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2023) (“We begin our qualified immunity analysis, as we may, ‘by considering whether there is a violation of clearly established law without determining whether a constitutional violation occurred.’. . . A due process violation requires a deprivation of a constitutionally protected liberty or property interest. . . Plaintiff maintains that he has a property interest both in his place on the track team and in the accompanying athletic scholarship. But the caselaw fails to demonstrate that either asserted right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Plaintiff cites two cases in which we assumed, without deciding, that a property interest in an athletic scholarship exists. In Rutledge v. Arizona Board of Regents, 660 F.2d 1345 (9th Cir. 1981), aff’d on other grounds sub nom. Kush v. Rutledge, 460 U.S. 719, 103 S.Ct. 1483, 75 L.Ed.2d 413 (1983), the plaintiff sued his university for violations of his civil rights after they demoted him from a first-string position on the football team and refused to allow him to ‘red shirt’ or transfer to another school after an injury. . . That refusal effectively cancelled the plaintiff’s athletic scholarship. . . We held that the plaintiff did not have a protected interest in his first-string position on the team. We cabined our holding to the alleged right to a particular status on a team and did not rule on general membership on the team. . . We also ‘assume[d], without deciding,’ that NCAA rules prohibiting the cancellation or revocation of a scholarship except for good cause ‘create[] an interest in “property” within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.’. . . We made that assumption again in Austin v. University of Oregon, 925 F.3d 1133 (9th Cir. 2019). . . Neither Rutledge nor Austin established the legal principle that Plaintiff asserts because they merely assumed the property interest arguendo. . . Caselaw from other courts likewise does not support the proposition that Plaintiff had a clearly established property interest in his athletic scholarship.⁷ [fn. 7: In November 2022, the Second Circuit held that a ‘one-year athletic scholarship—because it was for a fixed period and only terminable for cause, and because [the plaintiff] reasonably expected to retain the scholarship’s benefits for that set period—created a contractual right that rose to the level of a constitutionally protected property interest.’ Radwan v. Manuel, 55 F.4th 101, 125 (2d Cir. 2022). But Radwan was decided well after the conduct in question here, so it cannot affect our conclusion that Plaintiff’s asserted right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Moreover, Plaintiff’s complaint alleges no facts about the terms of his athletic scholarship. We express no view on the underlying legal issue.] The Defendant Coaches are therefore entitled to qualified immunity as to the due process claim under § 1983. The dismissal of that claim is affirmed.”)

Estate of Strickland v. Nevada County, 69 F.4th 614, 622-23 (9th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 559 (2024) (“We note that the facts here differ significantly from other cases when we’ve held it unreasonable for officers to use lethal force when encountering a replica or toy gun. In Nicholson v. City of Los Angeles, 935 F.3d 685 (9th Cir. 2019), for example, we denied qualified immunity to an officer who shot a suspect with a similar plastic, orange-tipped airsoft gun, but we did so because of the officer’s failure to deliberate. . . In that case, the officer saw a group of teenagers in an alley with what looked like a gun. . . He immediately ran down the alleyway without consulting his partner and fired his weapon toward the suspect, ultimately striking an innocent bystander. . . We did not find it dispositive that the gun turned out to be a ‘toy’; instead, it was conclusive that the officer did not see the suspect ‘point it at anyone’ and nothing suggested the suspect ‘was likely to harm anyone.’ . . So our decision didn’t hinge on the misidentification of the gun. Likewise, this case differs from Estate of Lopez v. Gelhaus, 871 F.3d 998 (9th Cir. 2017). In that case, whether a suspect with a toy gun posed an ‘immediate threat’ was in dispute, which precluded qualified immunity at summary judgment. . . There, an officer saw a teenager walking with a toy gun, which looked like an AK-47. . . The officer yelled at the teenager to ‘drop the gun’ one time from behind. . . As the teenager was turning toward the officer, the officer fired eight shots in quick succession at him. . . And the parties disputed key facts: whether ‘the gun was pointed straight down at the ground, [whether] the barrel . . . rose at any point to a position that posed any threat to . . . the officer, and ‘if [the teenager’s] finger was on the trigger.’ . . Once again, our decision didn’t turn on the mistaken identification of the gun. Rather, we determined that a reasonable jury could conclude that the teenager did not pose an immediate threat and that the use of deadly force was not objectively reasonable. . . Here, under the totality of the circumstances, it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe Strickland posed an immediate threat. In the light most favorable to Strickland, he was carrying a replica gun, disregarded multiple warnings to drop it, and pointed it at the officers. . . While the misidentification of the replica gun adds to the tragedy of this situation, it does not render the officers’ use of force objectively unreasonable. . . . Because we agree with the district court that Strickland’s Estate failed to state an excessive force claim, we do not address Appellees-Defendants’ qualified immunity arguments.”)

Vanegas v. City of Pasadena, 46 F.4th 1159, 1166-67 (9th Cir. 2022) (“[N]o California case clearly establishes that Officer Klotz should have known he lacked probable cause to arrest Vanegas for failing to identify himself in the course of the stalking investigation. Indeed, multiple district courts, including the one here, thought Officer Klotz could make the arrest. [citing cases] And so did we. See Kuhlken v. Cnty. of San Diego, 764 F. Appx 612 (9th Cir. 2019). Thus, even if Vanegas’s failure to identify himself did not provide probable cause to arrest under § 148(a)(1)—a question we need not and do not decide—Officer Klotz had ‘breathing room’ to make the purported mistake of law and he and the other officers are entitled to qualified immunity for Vanegas’s arrest.”)

Vanegas v. City of Pasadena, 46 F.4th 1159, 1169-70 (9th Cir. 2022) (Bumatay, J., concurring) (“I welcome Judge Bress’s spirited disagreement with my analysis of California law. Such debates, I hope, will help clarify the law. I make just a few points in rebuttal. First, I am truly agnostic on whether § 148(a)(1) should permit the arrest of a person who fails to identify themselves to investigating officers. My concern here is that federal courts may have gotten out ahead of California courts in interpreting the law. Second, I agree with Judge Bress that the Fourth Amendment protects officers who make reasonable mistakes about whether the law supports an arrest. . . But it promotes the law to clarify whether a mistake was made in the first place. Third, contrary to Judge Bress’s view, this question was squarely presented in this appeal. Deciding this case on other grounds doesn’t make the issue irrelevant. And finally, if Judge Bress is right that California law is so clear, it should have been an easy task to come up with California caselaw supporting his view. The lack of any should give us all pause.”)

Vanegas v. City of Pasadena, 46 F.4th 1159, 1170-71 (9th Cir. 2022) (Bress, J., concurring) (“The majority opinion holds that the officers should receive qualified immunity for any arrest under § 148(a)(1) because it was not clearly established that they lacked probable cause to make an arrest on that basis. . . That is true as far as it goes, which is what allows me to join the majority opinion in full. Of course, this holding is itself merely an alternative ground for decision because officers had probable cause to arrest Vanegas for violating § 415(2), as the majority opinion earlier concludes. So, this is an easy case: Vanegas violated at least two California criminal laws, there was probable cause to arrest him under either or both, and at the very least the officers get qualified immunity. Judge Bumatay’s concurrence nonetheless opines on whether ‘the failure to identify oneself to an officer during a police investigation—without more—furnishes probable cause to arrest under § 148(a)(1)’ (by more,’ I take the concurrence to mean ‘more’ than refusal to provide identification in response to a valid Terry stop, see Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868, 20 L.Ed.2d 889 (1968)). . . There is no reason to opine on that issue here because even if ‘more’ is required for a violation of California criminal law, we have the ‘more’ here, namely, the earlier violation of § 415(2), for which there was already independent probable cause to arrest Vanegas. We cannot disaggregate the sequence of events here into the earlier harassment and the later refusal to provide identification; the latter was directly connected to the former. As a matter of federal constitutional law under the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court’s decision in Hiibel . . . resolves that a person can be lawfully arrested for failure to provide identification during a valid Terry stop, if the request for identification is reasonably related to the stop. There is no question that officers here at the very least had reasonable suspicion to stop Vanegas under Terry (indeed, the majority opinion holds they had probable cause to arrest him under § 415(2)). So the only point on which Judge Bumatay’s concurrence is separately opining is whether California’s substantive criminal law in § 148(a)(1) should be interpreted more narrowly than the nearly identically worded Nevada law that the Supreme Court addressed in Hiibel. That question of California law is not only not presented on the facts of this case, deciding it would be unnecessary even with the right facts. With sufficient supporting information, officers are entitled to make arrests based on reasonable, even if ultimately mistaken, views of the law. . . Even if the facts presented it in this case, we still would not need to resolve whether California law would criminalize a failure to provide identification in response to a valid Terry stop, or whether something ‘more’ would be required. Why? Because the officers’ belief that they had probable cause to arrest in that situation would at least be a reasonable interpretation of California law. And because it is reasonable, ‘we need not decide exactly what [§ 148(a)(1)] means.’ . . . The majority opinion winds up in essentially the same place by resolving the § 148(a)(1) question under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis.”)

Sabra v. Maricopa County Community College Dist., 44 F.4th 867, 886-92 (9th Cir. 2022) (“While conceding that there is no case law clearly establishing the unconstitutionality of Damask’s conduct, Plaintiffs argue that this case presents the rare circumstance in which ‘the constitutional violation is so ‘obvious’ that prior case law is not needed.’ . . . Because we conclude that the ‘clearly established’ prong is dispositive in this case, we need not address whether, under the facts alleged in the Complaint, Damask violated Sabra’s constitutional rights. . . . As we explain below, we have never held that actions like the ones challenged in this case constitute a violation of the Establishment Clause or Free Exercise clause. Nor is this the exceptional case where the alleged constitutional violation is so obvious as to obviate the need for a case on point. The context of this case weighs heavily against any argument that the violation is obvious. In support of their defense, Defendants present arguments based on ‘long-held protections of academic freedom,’ again starting on page one of their Answering Brief. There are powerful forces on both sides of this debate. Finally, while courts sometimes hesitate to dismiss a plaintiff’s claims based on qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage, the concerns that might ordinarily justify such hesitancy are absent in this case. . . . [W]hile the analysis prescribed by Kennedy marks a shift in the Court’s Establishment Clause jurisprudence, it does not alter the conclusion of our qualified immunity analysis in this case, which is concerned with ‘the state of the law at the time of [the alleged constitutional violation].’ . . . Here, for reasons already discussed, the law did not clearly establish that Damask’s actions violated the Establishment Clause at the time Sabra was enrolled in his course. Although Plaintiffs concede that there are no cases clearly establishing the alleged violation in this case, they argue that Damask is not entitled to qualified immunity for two different reasons. First, they argue that this is one of the exceptional cases in which a prior case (or body of case law) is not needed to clearly establish the right in question. We have recognized that there are ‘rare cases in which the constitutional right at issue is defined by a standard that is so “obvious” that we must conclude ... that qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.’ . . . But we have repeatedly emphasized that such cases are few and far between, . . . and thus, we are hesitant to find a right clearly established without a body of relevant case law. Contrary to Plaintiffs’ assertion, this is not the exceptional case in which the alleged constitutional violation is ‘obvious’ despite the absence of relevant case law. As an initial matter, Plaintiffs’ argument frames the relevant constitutional right at too high a level of generality. In their briefing below and on appeal, Plaintiffs have described the constitutional right in question as Sabra’s right to be free from messages that are ‘disapproving’ of his religion. The Supreme Court has ‘repeatedly stressed,’ however, ‘that courts must not define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.’ . . . Here, Plaintiffs’ ‘overbroad proposition, “cast at a high level of generality,” is just the sort of sweeping statement of the law that is inappropriate for assessing whether qualified immunity applies.’. Plaintiffs’ argument also overlooks several contextual factors that make the alleged violation less than obvious. For example, the challenged content was not only taught in a college course, but also made up a fragment of a single module that was itself just one-sixth of the course. Moreover, the offending content did not arise in a vacuum. It was part of a module that sought to explain the phenomenon of Islamic terrorism. . . . To be clear, in concluding that Damask is entitled to the benefit of qualified immunity, we do not express agreement with or endorse the substance of his teaching, but he is protected by qualified immunity against the Establishment Clause allegations stated in Plaintiffs’ Complaint. . . . Plaintiffs’ Free Exercise claim fares no better under the ‘clearly established’ prong of our qualified immunity analysis. To state a claim under the Free Exercise Clause, a plaintiff must show that a government practice ‘substantially burdens a religious practice and either is not justified by a substantial state interest or is not narrowly tailored to achieve that interest.’. . . Again, though, we have never held under comparable circumstances that a test requiring students to select answers in conflict with their personal religious convictions (or risk losing points) imposes a substantial burden on religious practice. Indeed, the most instructive authority we have identified goes the other way. . . . As with their Establishment Clause claim, Plaintiffs concede that there is no case, or body of case law, that clearly establishes Sabra’s right not to be subjected to a quiz like the one in this case. The absence of such authority is an inescapable feature of this case, and one that dooms Plaintiffs’ Free Exercise claim under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Although the dissent tries to find a way around this problem, the solution it lands upon is to frame the clearly established law at a high level of generality, an error against which the Supreme Court has cautioned repeatedly. . . . Without a case or body of case law clearly establishing the constitutional right in question, Plaintiffs resort to arguing that the violation was so obvious as to eliminate the need for such authority. But this is not one of those ‘rare cases.’. . . Even accepting as true the allegations in Plaintiffs’ Complaint, the purpose and effect of the quiz are susceptible to interpretation. Although Plaintiffs argue that it ‘forced Sabra to disavow his faith and adopt’ views ‘antithetical’ to his religious convictions, it is also plausible to interpret the quiz as the district court did. . . . The district court concluded that Sabra ‘was not required to adopt the views expressed by Dr. Damask or the authors Dr. Damask cited to in his course, but only to demonstrate an understanding of the material taught.’ Regardless of whether the quiz violated the Free Exercise clause—a question we need not decide to resolve this claim under prong two of the qualified immunity analysis—any such violation was far from ‘obvious.’ Accordingly, we conclude that Damask is also entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs’ Free Exercise claim.”)

Stewart v. Aranas, 32 F.4th 1192, 1195 (9th Cir. 2022) (“Although Hamby puts forward a two-prong test that first asks whether officials violated a constitutional right, we need not analyze both prongs. Both parties expressly acknowledge that this case turns on the second prong of Hamby, not the first, so only examination of the second is necessary. It is recognized that a qualified immunity analysis may be confined to only the second prong of Hamby when doing so will not hamper the development of precedent. Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3d 592, 602 (9th Cir. 2019). Such is the case here. . . . Here, the prison officials claim that no clearly established law barred their ‘wait and see’ treatment plan for Stewart’s enlarged prostate. It is true that we have not found a case on all fours with the factual context presented here. But it has been established that ‘deny[ing], delay[ing], or intentionally interfer[ing] with medical treatment’ can violate the constitution. . . . At some point ‘wait and see’ becomes deny and delay. Stewart’s condition sharply deteriorated during his last few years at SDCC. Yet prison officials never deviated from their ‘wait and see’ treatment plan. As a result, Stewart alleges he developed stage 3 kidney disease, erectile dysfunction due to the prostate tissue cavity, urine build up, and some pain from the prostatectomy. A delay in treatment can violate the constitution if it results in injury. . . . Besides, the prison officials knew that they violate the constitution when they persist in a treatment known to be ineffective.”)

Riley’s American Heritage Farms v. Elsasser, 32 F.4th 707, 719 & n.7, 729-30 (9th Cir. 2022) (“We begin with the first prong, and determine whether the Riley plaintiffs raised a genuine issue of material fact that their First Amendment rights were violated.”⁷ [fn. 7: Because we must consider the merits of the Riley plaintiffs’ constitutional claim in light of their request for injunctive relief, . . . judicial efficiency counsels us to begin with the first prong of the qualified immunity framework[.]] Because there is a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the School defendants violated the Riley plaintiffs’ First Amendment rights (the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry), we now turn to the second prong, whether the defendants violated a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . The right to be free from First Amendment retaliation cannot be framed as ‘the general right to be free from retaliation for one’s speech.’ . . . Rather, the right must be defined at a more specific level tied to the factual and legal context of a given case. . . . Where the plaintiff is a public employee or contractor, existing precedent must establish that the plaintiff’s free speech rights outweighed the government employer’s legitimate interests as a matter of law. The question whether a public employee or contractor ‘enjoyed a clearly established right to speak’ depends on ‘whether the outcome of the Pickering balance so clearly favored [the plaintiff] that it would have been patently unreasonable for the [government] to conclude that the First Amendment did not protect his speech.’ . . . Not surprisingly, there will rarely be a case that clearly establishes that the plaintiff is entitled to prevail under the fact-sensitive, context-specific balancing required by Pickering. . . . Applying these principles here, we ask whether in September 2018, when these events occurred, it was clearly established that a school district could not cease patronizing a company providing historical reenactments and other events for students because the company’s principal shareholder had posted controversial tweets that led to parental complaints. . . . We conclude that there was no case directly on point that would have clearly established that the School District’s reaction to parental complaints and media attention arising from Riley’s tweets was unconstitutional. Rather, the School defendants had a heightened interest, and thus more leeway, in taking action in response to the Riley plaintiffs’ speech to prevent interruption to the school’s operations. . . . The Riley plaintiffs have not pointed to any opinion that placed the constitutional inquiry here ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Because the right at issue was not clearly established, the School defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the Riley plaintiffs’ damages claims. We therefore affirm the district

Saved Magazine v. Spokane Police Dep’t, 19 F.4th 1193, 1198-1201 (9th Cir. 2021) (“We find the “clearly established” prong dispositive here, and so we do not address whether, under the facts as alleged, Officer Doe violated Plaintiffs’ constitutional rights. This case is appropriate for resolution on the second prong of Pearson because it is difficult to identify the precise constitutional violation Plaintiffs allege in their complaint. Plaintiffs’ briefing focuses heavily on their First Amendment right to freedom of the press. In particular, they allege that Officer Doe violated that right when he prevented Yaghtin, acting as a journalist, from ‘engaging in dialogue with a protester’ under threat of arrest. There is no question that news gathering is protected by the First Amendment. . . Generally, however, a journalist’s First Amendment rights are no more extensive than those of ordinary members of the public. . . Therefore, Yaghtin’s First Amendment rights were coextensive with those of any other member of the public within the counterprotest zone, and so our inquiry more properly concerns the scope of First Amendment speech rights within that zone. Plaintiffs argue that their clearly established rights were violated because any officer would know that censoring what someone can say in a public space raises serious First Amendment issues that we must review applying strict scrutiny. Plaintiffs’ arguments rely on abstract formulations of First Amendment law that define their rights ‘at a high level of generality.’. . As the Supreme Court explained, however, ‘clearly established law must be “particularized” to the facts of the case.’. . . It is of course true that government officials may not exclude persons from public places who are engaged in ‘peaceful expressive activity solely because the government actor fears, dislikes, or disagrees with the views those persons express.’. . The question for our purposes, however, is much narrower: Was the right asserted by Yaghtin so ‘clearly established’ that ‘a reasonable officer would have known that his conduct violated’ that right? . . . Applying a typical First Amendment framework to Plaintiffs’ claim leaves us with the proverbial task of trying to fit a square peg in a round hole. In most cases where restrictions on speech are challenged pursuant to the First Amendment, we ask whether a legislative act, such as a city ordinance or permit scheme, unconstitutionally infringes on speech. . . But Plaintiffs do not challenge a city ordinance or permit scheme, and they expressly do not challenge the Spokane Police Department’s use of separate protest zones. Instead, Plaintiffs’ challenge is directed at Officer Doe’s enforcement of these zones. We are not aware of any precedent that would alert Officer Doe that his enforcement would violate clearly established First Amendment law. . . .Considering the lack of any precedent to the contrary, it was not unreasonable for Officer Doe to believe that it was lawful for him to examine the substance of Yaghtin’s speech in order to enforce the separate protest zone policy. . . The fact that there was an underlying, uncontested governmental scheme distinguishes this case from others where officers acted entirely on their own initiative and arbitrarily restricted speech. . . Consequently, Officer Doe is entitled to qualified immunity on the second prong of the Pearson analysis.”)

Ohlson v. Brady, 9 F.4th 1156, 1158-59, 1165-66 (9th Cir. 2021) (“When a report on an individual’s blood sample was requested, the Department policy was to report the result for that individual. Ohlson, however, believed defense attorneys could better evaluate the accuracy of the result if the samples of the individual in question were reported along with the results for the entire batch of samples with which that individual's samples were tested. Contrary to his superiors' orders, he said so, both in communications within the Department and with defense attorneys, and in court hearings. He was disciplined and eventually forced to retire. There is no dispute that the plaintiff's advocacy led to the employer's action against him. Nor is there any serious dispute that what he was speaking about—the manner in which forensic evidence is produced and presented in court—is a matter of public concern. The only serious dispute is whether his speech should be treated as that of a private citizen exercising the right protected by the First Amendment to criticize the government, or as that of a government employee subject to discipline for undermining agency administration and public confidence in agency operations. The district court concluded that the speech was protected expression but entered judgment in favor of the government on grounds of qualified immunity. The district court's conclusion that Ohlson spoke as a private citizen, and therefore that his speech was protected, was based in large part on the fact that Ohlson spoke against his supervisors' orders. In the district court's view, this was strong evidence that the speech should be protected. We disagree with this aspect of the district court's reasoning. Protecting speech because it violates a supervisor's order would make it difficult for an agency to enforce any rules, even those necessary to preserve proper agency administration. . . The district court looked to the Supreme Court's decision in Pickering, insofar as it calls for a balancing of the First Amendment interests of the plaintiff with the interests of the government. The district court emphasized that Ohlson spoke out against Department procedures when he was a witness in court proceedings. The district court concluded that because all citizens have a duty to testify when subpoenaed to do so, Ohlson was speaking in court as a citizen rather than as an employee. We have some doubts about this conclusion as well, because testifying in court was part of Ohlson's job duties. He was not called upon to testify as a private citizen. Whether testimony given as part of a government employee's job duties is protected speech is a question the Supreme Court has left open. . . In weighing the First Amendment interests of the plaintiff against the interests of the state, the district court said that the state agency had not identified any particular injury to the state, so the scales tipped strongly toward Ohlson. Our analysis comes out somewhat differently. Ohlson was advocating, in the course of his employment duties, for a different and, in his view, better way the agency should report results. At least conceivably, this could have adversely affected confidence in the accuracy of the results as well as in the agency that was reporting them. The Department was duly licensed and accredited. Its operations, including the manner of reporting test results, were in accord with industry standards. We cannot say that the defendants failed to identify any possible injury. With respect to liability, the district court held that the defendants were entitled to judgment because the defendants had not violated any clearly established law. We agree with that conclusion, and affirm the district court's judgment in favor of the defendants. . . . The only relevant Supreme Court decision bearing on whether court testimony is protected is Lane[.] . . That case, however, involved testimony of an individual who had been subpoenaed as a fact witness at a criminal trial of another employee. . . As we have noted, the witness in Lane was not required to testify as part of his job duties. Whether testimony given pursuant to the duties of a government job is protected by the First Amendment was an issue explicitly left open in Lane. In holding the testimony in that case was protected, the concurrence emphasized that the Lane holding did not apply to individuals, such as ‘laboratory analysts,’ who testify pursuant to job duties. . . Ohlson is one such laboratory analyst. His case is therefore the one Lane pointedly did not decide. Thus, the opinion and concurrence in Lane, together with the lack of authority on the matter since Lane, compel us to conclude that there is no clearly established law protecting the testimony that Ohlson gave in the course of performing his duties as a laboratory analyst for the state. We deal with it as an issue of first impression. To the extent Ohlson contended in the district court that his testimony concerning batch production was spoken as a private citizen because he was speaking in defiance of orders, the district court seemed to agree. We believe the district court’s ruling in this regard was founded upon a misunderstanding of our opinion in Dahlia[.] . . There, in providing some ‘guiding principles’ to determine when the employee’s speech was within the scope of his duties, we stated that ‘no single formulation of factors can encompass the full set of inquiries relevant to determining the scope of a plaintiff’s job duties.’ . . Importantly, we decided Dahlia before we had the benefit of Lane, where the Supreme Court went out of its way to leave open the question of whether testimony pursuant to job duties can be protected speech. In Dahlia, we were writing in the aftermath of Garcetti, which had proven problematic in that it had compelled a panel of our court to apply a rigid rule that expression within the scope of an employee’s job duties was never protected. . . We held in Dahlia that Garcetti called for a more practical approach. . . The most important factor in Dahlia was that the employee reported the misconduct ‘outside his chain of command.’ . . The subject matter of the speech was also important, with routine incident reports falling within the scope of duties, and concerns about ‘corruption or systemic abuse’ likely falling outside. . . Third, we said that when a public employee ‘speaks in direct contravention to his supervisor’s orders, that speech may often fall outside the speaker’s professional duties,’ especially if the speaker is threatened or harassed by superiors. . . Dahlia does not stand for the proposition that speech in defiance of orders is always a strong indication that an employee is speaking as a private citizen and the speech protected, although that appears to have been the district court’s interpretation. Such an interpretation could lead to protecting not only those government employees exercising First Amendment rights to speak freely about matters of public concern, but also to protecting those employees defying legitimate orders aimed at deterring employee misconduct. This would incentivize insubordination and make government administration more difficult. Dahlia laid down no hard and fast rules, and could not do so in light of Pickering’s balancing test that requires weighing the interests of both sides. The district court decided the case on summary judgment without considering evidence of the scientific merit to both parties’ positions, or the full administrative impacts of Ohlson’s advocacy on the Department. We believe further proceedings on those issues would be required for an actual balancing of interests. We recognized in Eng that, while the balancing inquiry is a legal requirement, it often comes down to factual disputes about the value of competing interests. . . We do not attempt to resolve any such dispute or engage in the weighing of interests here. We do know that Ohlson was a qualified professional employee, and the procedures used by the Department met applicable standards. With these two opposing interests, this case is not like Lane or Dahlia, where the speech in question was exposing corruption and held to be protected. This case is also unlike Pickering, where the employer had no greater interest in the content of the speech than if the speech was that of a member of the general public rather than of a government employee. . . Ohlson’s testimony was given as an expert explaining the testing process, and, as we have seen, would have a much greater potential impact on public perception and confidence in laboratory procedures than would views expressed by a lay member of the public. On the basis of the record before us, we express no opinion as to whether the interests of Ohlson, in publicly expressing his views on better laboratory procedures, outweighed the interests of defendants in the administration of their duties. We see the balancing inquiry as more difficult than the district court perceived it, and disagree with its view on summary judgment that the balance clearly favors Ohlson. What is abundantly clear to us, as it was to the district court, is that the law is not clearly established, and the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Gordon v. County of Orange (Gordon II), 6 F.4th 961, 972-73 (9th Cir. 2021) (“The gravamen of the action against Deputy Denney is whether, as a pretrial detainee, Gordon had a constitutional right to direct-view safety checks when he was known to require medical attention. It has long been held that ‘a prison official who is aware that an inmate is suffering from a serious acute medical condition violates the Constitution when he stands idly by rather than responding with reasonable diligence to treat the condition.’. . . However, we are not aware of any precedent expressly recognizing a detainee’s right to direct-view safety checks sufficient to determine whether their presentation indicates the need for medical treatment. At the time of the incident, some lower courts had recognized a right to direct-view safety checks even where medical attention was not required. [noting cases] Nevertheless, Deputy Denney is entitled to qualified immunity because the due process right to an adequate safety check for pretrial detainees was not clearly established at the time of the incident. We now hold that pre-trial detainees do have a right to direct-view safety checks sufficient to determine whether their presentation indicates the need for medical treatment. . . It is undisputed that upon admission into the general population, Gordon’s identification module card notified jail officials that he required medical attention. Because Deputy Denney is entitled to qualified immunity, whether he in fact conducted an adequate safety check will not be decided in this case. However, law enforcement and prison personnel should heed this warning because the recognition of this constitutional right will protect future detainees.”)

Nov. 19, 2021) (“[T]he Ninth Circuit’s recognition of a right (any right) for purposes of clearly establishing that right for future qualified immunity defenses does not automatically establish the substantive elements of the claim to be pleaded in the first instance. The consequence of Gordon II’s right recognition is that state actors assigned to monitor pretrial detainees will not be able to succeed with a qualified immunity defense if sued for constitutionally inadequate safety checks, where their omission occurred after July 26, 2021 (the date of Gordon II’s publication). The Ninth Circuit took pains to expressly recognize the right to direct-view safety checks in order to further ‘the development of constitutional precedent,’. . . by clarifying the law for future qualified immunity cases. . . However, ‘the affirmative defense of qualified immunity is distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's constitutional claim.' . . The qualified immunity defense is objective by nature. . . '[E]ven where the clearly established legal standard requires [subjective] deliberate indifference, the qualified immunity inquiry should concentrate on the objective aspects of the constitutional standard.' . . Therefore, in marking pretrial detainees' right to direct-view safety checks as clearly established, the Ninth Circuit was not applying all elements of a deliberate indifference claim—especially not an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. Thus, Gordon II does not change the requirement that litigants when first bringing a case plead facts plausibly satisfying each element of their deliberate indifference claim—which, for convicted inmates, still includes pleading actual subjective awareness of a substantial risk of harm.”)]

Evans v. Skolnik, 997 F.3d 1060, 1066-71 (9th Cir. 2021) (“[D]espite acknowledging circumstances when defining constitutional rights is ‘beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials,’ the Court has made clear that ‘[i]n general, courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones’ by resolving a constitutional question despite the plaintiff’s inability to establish a violation of a clearly established right. . . We have likewise relied on this principle. [citing O’Doan v. Sanford] . . . In considering what constitutes ‘clearly established’ law for purposes of qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has taken a narrow approach. A government official ‘violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, [t]he contours of [a] right [are] sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . Although the Supreme Court ‘does not require a case directly on point for a right to be clearly established, existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . In determining whether this standard is met, the Court considers whether there are ‘cases of controlling authority’ in the plaintiffs’ jurisdiction at the time of the incident ‘which clearly established the rule on which they seek to rely,’ or ‘a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.’ . . Under this rule, our analysis is straightforward if ‘the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or this Circuit.’ . . Where such binding precedent exists, ‘our inquiry should come to an end.’ . . If such binding precedent is lacking, we have considered other sources ‘including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts.’ . . The Supreme Court has not clarified when state and district court decisions could place a ‘statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . Rather, as the Supreme Court has pointed out, ‘district court decisions—unlike those from the courts of appeals—do not necessarily settle constitutional standards,’ because ‘[a] decision of a federal district court judge is not binding precedent in either a different judicial district, the same judicial district, or even upon the same judge in a different case.’ . . We have been somewhat hesitant to rely on district court decisions in this context. . . . In this case, we exercise our discretion to consider only the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether Baker’s conduct in ‘initially screening and occasionally “checking in” on [Witherow’s] legal calls’ with an attorney not representing him in a criminal matter, . . . violated a Fourth Amendment right that was clearly established at the time. We conclude it did not. Witherow has not cited any precedent that has ‘placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’ . . There is no Supreme Court case considering whether a prison official's monitoring of an inmate's legal calls in this manner violates the inmate's Fourth Amendment rights. Nor has Witherow pointed to any Ninth Circuit precedent holding that monitoring the beginning of an inmate's calls to ensure their legal character and then intermittently checking on those calls to confirm their continuing legal character violates a prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Because we hold that Baker is entitled to qualified immunity, we decline to address the merits of Baker's Fourth Amendment claim. . . . Our discretion to 'determine the order of decisionmaking that will best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition of each case' makes further explanation unnecessary. . . . Nevertheless, we briefly respond to the concurrence's argument that Witherow's claim warrants a merits decision even though such a decision cannot affect this case's outcome. The Supreme Court has rejected the concurrence's position that '[u]nless a decision on the [merits] would provide "little guidance for future cases," courts should ... continue to develop constitutional precedent.' . . . To the contrary, the Court has 'left this matter to the discretion of lower courts, and indeed detailed a range of circumstances in which courts should address only the immunity question.' . . . Many of those circumstances are present here. First, this case is highly factbound and would provide 'little guidance for future cases.' . . . Baker's alleged conduct was specific to the disciplinary segregation unit in the prison and the lack of technology available at the time. . . . Moreover, it involved merely the 'practice of initially screening and occasionally checking in on [Witherow's] legal calls,' . . . rather than the more common conduct of recording or monitoring entire phone calls. Whether a constitutional violation occurred will be 'heavily dependent' on these facts, . . . and there is little reason to think such facts will repeatedly occur. Witherow was released from prison in 2010 and the Nevada State Prison where he was incarcerated has since closed down. Prison officials stopped monitoring attorney-client calls in the manner alleged sometime before the prison closed, and there is no indication that other NDOC officials are engaging in similar conduct. Technology has changed, and prison officials are not likely to pass portable telephones into jail cells. Nor has Witherow presented us with any judicial decision, from any court, describing similar conduct. In sum, it is uncertain whether a merits ruling here will ever prove helpful in a future case. Second, addressing the merits of Witherow's Fourth Amendment claim may result in 'confusion rather than clarity.' . . . Witherow failed to develop the basis for his theory that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated by the initial screening and occasional checking of his calls with his attorney, who was assisting Witherow to bring civil lawsuits. We have considered prisoners' communications with their attorneys 'under various constitutional principles, including the First Amendment right to freedom of speech and the Fourteenth Amendment rights to due process and access to the courts,' and adopted the rule that prisoner-attorney communications relating to the prisoner's criminal case are 'within the scope of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.' . . . But Witherow's failure to provide any reasoned basis for why the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches applies here weighs against reaching the merits. . . . Our prior unpublished decision, on which the concurrence relies, . . . provides no support; it stated only that Witherow's Fourth Amendment rights were 'implicated,' which has no defined meaning in this context. . . . Witherow's reliance on evidentiary rules protecting a client's communications with his attorney from being introduced into evidence are likewise misplaced, as such a common law privilege is not protected by the Constitution. . . . As Pearson makes clear, we should not address an avoidable constitutional issue when the briefing is inadequate. . . Otherwise, we waste our resources in resolving issues with ‘no effect on the outcome of the case.’ . . Finally, the circumstances mentioned by the Supreme Court that weigh in favor of deciding a constitutional issue are not present here. . . First, we can resolve the qualified immunity question without delineating the contours of the constitutional right at issue. . . Given the failure of the parties to cite any applicable case, it is easy to conclude that there was no clearly established Fourth Amendment right that Baker violated. Second, this is not a case involving questions unlikely to arise except when qualified immunity is available, . . . because prisoners may bring actions for declaratory and injunctive relief to challenge prison conduct alleged to violate their Fourth Amendment rights. . . Were Witherow currently incarcerated and subject to a call monitoring policy like the one before us, he could seek such relief. A prison term is not inherently transitory such that every prisoner’s demand for injunctive and declaratory relief would ‘run the same high risk of mootness as occurred with Witherow’s declaratory and injunctive claims here,’ as the concurrence claims. . . We conclude that Baker is immune from Witherow’s suit for damages based on the Supreme Court’s admonition that qualified immunity attaches unless we identify precedent placing the constitutional right at issue ‘beyond debate’ at the time of the challenged conduct. . . And we decline to address the merits of Witherow’s constitutional claim based on the Supreme Court’s instruction that we ‘think hard, and then think hard again’ before doing so.”)

Evans v. Skolnik, 997 F.3d 1060, 1072-74, 1076 (9th Cir. 2021) (Berzon, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part, and concurring in the judgment) (“I write separately because I believe that, before addressing the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, we should hold that Baker’s monitoring of Witherow’s legal calls did violate his constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . Indeed, unless a decision on the first prong would ‘provide[] little guidance for future cases,’ courts should, I strongly believe, continue to develop constitutional precedent, to give better guidance to officers of the law so that they may better avoid violating rights guaranteed by the constitution. . . Otherwise, the lack of clearly established law becomes perpetual, as does the lack of incentive to avoid violations of constitutional rights in circumstances—such as this one—in which the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule has little or no application. . . . The majority contends that ‘[t]he Supreme Court has rejected’ an approach that forwards the development of constitutional precedent. . . That is not the Supreme Court law or the law in this circuit. Although Pearson held ‘that the Saucier protocol should not be regarded as mandatory in all cases,’ it explicitly ‘continue[d] to recognize that it is often beneficial.’ . . For several reasons, I disagree with the majority’s conclusion that this case presents circumstances under which we should ‘address only the immunity question.’ . . First, the constitutional question does not depend on the particular technology used in the disciplinary segregation unit and is thus not ‘so factbound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases.’ . . The underlying constitutional question on which the rest of this case depends is whether prisoners have a Fourth Amendment privacy interest in the content of attorney-client telephone calls related to civil cases. Both Baker’s initial screen, which consisted of either waiting for the parties to identify themselves or listening for language Baker judged to ‘remotely sound[] legal in nature,’ and the periodic checks to determine whether the prisoners were ‘still making a legal call,’ included listening to at least some of the content of Witherow's calls. The specific phone system Baker used for monitoring is not relevant to the analysis of whether Witherow had a Fourth Amendment privacy interest in that content. The majority further contends that 'Witherow failed to develop the basis for his theory that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated,' noting that our prior precedents have discussed prisoner-attorney communications under the First, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments, but not the Fourth. . . But Witherow argues that both this Court's protection of the attorney-client privilege for prisoners under other Amendments and our case law supporting the privilege's 'special place in the hierarchy of privacy expectations and Fourth Amendment protections' gave him a reasonable expectation of privacy in his phone calls with his attorney. Witherow's inability to cite precedent squarely on point for his specific circumstances is relevant to the 'clearly established' analysis in the second Saucier prong, but cannot be sufficient to make his briefing 'woefully inadequate' to the extent that it weighs against deciding the first prong at all. . . Finally, the issues here 'do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable,' weighing in favor of addressing both Saucier prongs. . . A prisoner's Fourth Amendment privacy interest in attorney phone calls about civil cases is unlikely to be raised in those civil cases themselves. Any information gleaned from the phone calls may or may not be admissible under the rules of evidence, but the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule would rarely, if ever, apply, and courts are thus unlikely to reach the constitutional issue. . . Although the majority puts weight on the potential for prisoners to bring actions for declaratory or injunctive relief, such actions run the same high risk of mootness as occurred with Witherow's declaratory and injunctive claims here, as prisoners are often transferred between institutions and institutional practices vary. Pearson granted courts discretion; it did not require that no other avenues be available before we address the first Saucier prong. . . Given the unsettled nature of prisoners' privacy rights in phone calls with their attorneys, such guidance is needed here. We therefore should address the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry in this case. Bound by precedent, we correctly hold that Baker is entitled to qualified immunity because of the lack of 'precedent placing the constitutional right at issue "beyond debate" at the time of the challenged conduct.' . . Nor does any precedent since the time of the challenged conduct squarely establish a constitutional violation in this case, although the current caselaw points squarely in that direction. We can and should provide clarity on the scope of inmates' rights moving forward. I would address whether Witherow had a Fourth Amendment right in properly placed legal calls to his attorney and conclude that he did. . . . It bears repeating that if courts routinely decline to reach the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry, the development of constitutional precedent will be hamstrung. The resulting absence of clearly established law can allow for repeated civil rights violations with no accountability or guidance for state actors. Although Pearson permits courts deciding qualified immunity issues to decline to decide the constitutional issue raised, that permission is best exercised in fact-specific cases, not where, as here, a generic and broadly applicable issue of constitutional law underlies the disputed issues. This panel should make clear to prison officials, going forward, that monitoring the substance of an inmate's properly placed legal calls is a constitutional violation.")

O'Doan v. Sanford, 991 F.3d 1027, 1036-37, 1040, 1043-45 (9th Cir. 2021) (“In the exercise of our discretion, and with the Supreme Court’s admonitions in mind, we resolve this case only on the ‘clearly established law’ prong of the qualified immunity framework. With the benefit of a 360-degree view of the facts and the luxury of reviewing the officers’ actions from an armchair rather than a chaotic Reno street or an emergency room, there are some aspects of the officers’ actions we can find commendable. In other instances, greater care may have been warranted. Our task, however, is not to serve as a police oversight board or to second-guess officers’ real-time decisions from the standpoint of perfect hindsight, but to ask whether the officers violated clearly established law. Under the qualified immunity framework the Supreme Court has forcefully articulated and reaffirmed, the answer is clearly no. . . . Evaluating the facts of this case against the applicable body of Fourth Amendment law, we have little difficulty concluding that, at the very least, Officer Sanford did not violate clearly established law when he executed a reverse reap throw on O’Doan. Officers were called in to a ‘Code 3’ situation, a request for immediate police assistance for a ‘violent’ individual. They arrived to find O’Doan naked and moving quickly on a busy street. O’Doan repeatedly resisted officers’ commands to stop and then turned to the officers in a threatening manner, with his fists clenched. O’Doan’s failure to follow ‘lawful commands, and [his] actions’ in making threatening gestures ‘risked severe consequences.’ . . . The officers therefore acted reasonably in deciding to bring O’Doan under control. Indeed, their efforts to do so may well have prevented O’Doan from harming himself or those around him. . . . O’Doan identifies no precedent that would suggest the force used here was excessive, much less that excessiveness was clearly established on these facts. . . . [I]t cannot be said that Sanford and Leavitt violated clearly established law in concluding they had probable cause to arrest O’Doan. . . . The officers’ awareness that O’Fria or O’Doan had reported O’Doan having a seizure or epilepsy do not change the equation. Supreme Court precedent is clear that ‘probable cause does not require officers to rule out a suspect’s innocent explanation for suspicious facts.’ . . . Here, the facts were not merely suspicious of potential criminal wrongdoing but reflected conduct that on its face violated Nevada law. The Supreme Court has acknowledged case law recognizing that ‘it would be an unusual case where the circumstances, while undoubtedly proving an unlawful act, nonetheless demonstrated so clearly that the suspect lacked the required intent that the police would not even have probable cause for an arrest.’ . . . Nothing in clearly established law would have indicated to Sanford and Leavitt that this was such an ‘unusual’ case. What this means is that no clearly established law required the officers to credit O’Fria and O’Doan’s explanation and deem true a possible defense, namely, that O’Doan lacked the wherewithal to be responsible for unlawful conduct. . . . The dissent’s repeated contention that we have not abided by the summary judgment standards is therefore simply wrong. We have faithfully applied those standards and have not ‘ignore[d]’ O’Doan’s evidence, as the dissent mistakenly claims. It is the dissent that reflects an unwillingness to apply the standards that govern the qualified immunity analysis—standards the Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized in reversing lower courts for failing to follow them. . . . Finally, we must reject O’Doan’s (and the dissent’s) contention that O’Doan’s arrest was unconstitutional because this is ‘an “obvious case” where “a body of relevant case law” is not needed.’ . . . The situations where a constitutional violation is ‘obvious,’ in the absence of any relevant case law, are ‘rare.’ . . . That teaching resonates even more powerfully in the Fourth Amendment context. As we have explained, the ‘obviousness principle, an exception to the specific-case requirement, is especially problematic in the Fourth-Amendment context.’ . . . The obviousness principle thus has ‘real limits when it comes to the Fourth Amendment,’ . . . and we decline to transgress those limits here. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to O’Doan, officers were placed in an emergency situation involving a person acting dangerously and unlawfully. While it was unclear what prompted O’Doan’s wrongful behavior, nothing made it obvious that officers had to accept O’Doan’s explanations and conclude on the spot that O’Doan was not responsible for his actions. . . . O’Doan’s reliance on the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Taylor v. Riojas, 141 S. Ct. 52 (2020), is unavailing. There, the Supreme Court held it was obvious that keeping an inmate in a cell ‘teeming with human waste’ for six days, and forcing him to sleep naked in raw sewage, violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . Taylor only highlights the level of blatantly unconstitutional conduct necessary to satisfy the obviousness principle. Suffice to say, this case bears no reasonable comparison to Taylor. We therefore hold that the district court properly granted qualified immunity to Sanford and Leavitt on O’Doan’s § 1983 wrongful arrest claim.”)

O’Doan v. Sanford, 991 F.3d 1027, 1046-48, 1054 & n.4 (9th Cir. 2021) (Block, J. Senior District Judge, dissenting in part) (“The majority’s opinion is a textbook example of highly skilled craftsmanship and spot-on articulation by my talented colleagues of the legal principles governing qualified immunity for police officers in the performance of their duties. If not for one principal flaw in the application of these principles, I would wholeheartedly cast the third vote for affirmance. Surely, based upon the majority’s recitation of the facts, summary judgment would be warranted. But the problem with the majority’s opinion is that there are clearly material factual disputes and credibility determinations that are for a jury – not judges – to resolve. Accordingly, I dissent from those parts of the opinion granting summary judgment for the police officers on O’Doan’s § 1983 false arrest and due process claims, as well as on his ADA claim. . . . The core issue here is whether the police knew or should have known they were arresting a criminal or an epileptic. On this record, this is a quintessential question for a factfinder, not a judge. No one disputes, nor rationally can, the obvious: you do not put an epileptic in jail. . . . The majority’s palpable failing is that it credits all the testimony of the police and the emergency personnel and ignores all the contrary documentary and testimonial evidence that places their credibility in serious doubt. . . . I have chosen to write a somewhat unconventional dissenting opinion to dramatize the value and importance of our jury system and that we should be circumspect in allowing judges to be factfinders. . . . It hopefully will have the added virtue of serving as a cautionary tale that the concept of qualified immunity has its limits – especially in the sensitive area of alleged police misconduct. . . . Recent events have placed qualified immunity in the public spotlight. Judges and the public alike are criticizing what is perceived as tantamount to an absolute bar on police accountability. See Hailey Fuchs, Qualified Immunity Protection for Police Emerges as Flash Point Amid Protests, N.Y. TIMES, Jun. 23, 2020, at A16 (“Once a little-known rule, qualified immunity has emerged as a flash point in the protests spurred by [George] Floyd’s killing and galvanized calls for police reform.”); see also Circuit Judge James A. Wynn Jr., Opinion: As a judge, I have to follow the Supreme Court. It should fix this mistake., WASH.

POST, Jun. 12, 2020, <https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/2020/06/12/judgei-have-follow-supreme-court-it-should-fix-this-mistake/> (Qualified immunity “prevents plaintiffs from pursuing their claims ... and excuses ever more egregious conduct from liability”). Justice Sotomayor has criticized the ever-expanding doctrine of qualified immunity as ‘an absolute shield for law enforcement officers.’. She aptly describes the Supreme Court’s ‘unflinching willingness’ to reverse denials of qualified immunity, while rarely intervening in wrongful grants of qualified immunity, as ‘gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment.’”)

Hernandez v. Town of Gilbert, 989 F.3d 739, 743-45 (9th Cir. 2021) (“The Court may address the two prongs in any order. . . We consider only the second prong here. ‘A clearly established right is one that is “sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.”’. . While we do not require a case on all fours, ‘existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.’. . Qualified immunity ‘protects “all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.”’. . ‘[O]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.’. Hernandez argues that both the initial deployment of the canine and the duration of the bite violated clearly established law. . . To defeat qualified immunity, Hernandez must show that the state of the law as of May 5, 2016, gave a reasonable officer ‘fair warning’ that using a police dog on a noncompliant suspect, who had resisted lesser methods of force to complete his arrest, was unconstitutional. . . . The record here does show that the officers employed an escalating array of control techniques, none of which were effective in getting Hernandez to surrender, before deciding to release the police dog. Because the facts are so dissimilar, Mendoza does not clearly establish that Officer Gilbert’s conduct in eventually deploying Murphy was unconstitutional.”)

Nunes v. Arata, Swingle, Van Egmond & Goodwin (PLC), 983 F.3d 1108, 1113-14 (9th Cir. 2020) (“ We acknowledge that this case presents a different scenario than those where officers are forced to make ‘split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.’. . But the underlying question remains the same: Did Defendants’ conduct violate a clearly established constitutional right of the Plaintiffs?Accordingly, we, like the district courts, conclude that the opaque opinion in Gonzalez did not clearly establish a constitutional privacy right in juvenile records. Gonzalez did not explain what right was at issue or what constitutional source it flowed from. It did not even explain whether that unnamed right was violated by the attorney’s conduct, stating instead only that it could have been. . . Such an opinion, which leaves fundamental questions unanswered about the origin, nature, and scope of the right at issue, cannot place the constitutional issue ‘beyond debate.’. . We cannot conclude that every reasonable official acting as Defendants did would have known they were violating the constitutional rights of Plaintiffs based on Gonzalez, the only authority on which Plaintiffs’ rely. . . We do not decide whether the Constitution provides a privacy right in juvenile records; rather, we decide only that no such right was clearly established at the time of the Defendants’ alleged conduct. Therefore, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Nunes v. Arata, Swingle, Van Egmond & Goodwin (PLC), 983 F.3d 1108, 1114-15 (9th Cir. 2020) (Hunsaker, J., joined by Silver, District Judge, concurring) (“I write separately to emphasize one point—our en banc court should reconsider Gonzalez v. Spencer, 336 F.3d 832 (9th Cir. 2003), and address in earnest whether there exists a constitutional right to privacy in juvenile records. We carefully dodge this issue today by focusing on the clearly-established-law prong of qualified immunity given the dearth of reasoning and guidance in the Gonzalez decision. But Gonzalez will continue to stymie district courts and litigants. . . . The question here, whether there is a constitutional right of privacy that protects against disclosure of juvenile records, was answered in Gonzalez like an overconfident yet underprepared student—casually, without explanation or supporting authority. We should do better. And until the en banc court performs the analysis that Gonzalez neglected, our law on this issue will remain unclear.”)

Cates v. Stroud, 976 F.3d 972, 978-85 (9th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 135 (2021) (“If a constitutional violation is established, satisfying the first prong, the second prong of a qualified immunity analysis asks whether the law prohibiting the action was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the incident in question. . . . The function of the inquiry under the second prong is to ensure that officials are subject to suit only for actions that they knew or should have known violated the law. . . . Law is ‘clearly established’ for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis if ‘every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.’ . . . An official can be on notice that his conduct constitutes a violation of clearly established law even without a prior case that had ‘fundamentally similar’ or ‘materially similar’ facts. . . . In the analysis that follows, we address both prongs. . . . We agree with the Sixth, Seventh and Eighth Circuits. Our agreement with our sister circuits follows naturally from our precedent on prison searches and on screening measures in sensitive facilities more generally. In upholding a blanket policy requiring strip searches of admittees to the county jail in Bull, we specifically noted that we were not ‘disturb[ing] our prior opinions considering searches of arrestees who were not classified for housing in the general jail or prison population.’ . . . Our rationale in Bull, like the Supreme Court’s rationale in Bell, . . . was based on the jail’s security interests within the jail. . . . We specifically noted in Bull that ‘searches of arrestees at the place of arrest, searches at the stationhouse prior to booking, and searches pursuant to an evidentiary investigation must be analyzed under different principles than those at issue today.’ . . . Because the ability of prison officials to conduct strip searches of visitors based on reasonable suspicion is premised on the need to prevent introduction of contraband into the prison, a search of a visitor who no longer intends to enter the portion of the prison where contact with a prisoner is possible, or who was leaving the prison, must rely on another justification. Ordinarily, a visitor cannot introduce contraband into the prison simply by appearing in the administrative area of the prison. If prison officials have reasonable suspicion that such a visitor is carrying contraband, the prison’s security needs would justify a strip search only if the visitor insists on access to a part of the prison where transfer of contraband to a prisoner would be possible. If the visitor would prefer to leave the prison without such access, the prison’s security needs can be satisfied by simply letting the visitor depart. . . . We have concluded, in agreement with three of our sister circuits, that Laurian violated Cates’s rights under the Fourth Amendment by subjecting her to a strip search without giving her an opportunity to leave rather than be subjected to the search. We hold, however, that prior to our decision in this case the contours of the right in this circuit were not ‘sufficiently clear [such] that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right,’ and accordingly extend qualified immunity. . . The Supreme Court and our court have addressed strip searches of detainees. But when Cates was subject to the strip search at issue in this case, there was no case in this circuit where we had held that a prison visitor has a right to leave the prison rather than undergo a strip search conducted on the basis of reasonable suspicion. While we ‘do not require a case directly on point, ... existing precedent must have placed the ... question beyond debate.’. . Cases allowing strip searches of detainees support a holding that Cates’s rights under the Fourth Amendment were violated primarily based on their differences from, rather than their similarities to, Cates’s case. Additionally, while ‘in a sufficiently ‘obvious’ case of constitutional misconduct, we do not require a precise factual analogue in our judicial precedents,’ we have noted that this ‘exception ... is especially problematic in the Fourth-Amendment context’ where officers are confronted with ‘endless permutations of outcomes and responses.’. . Existing case law has already clearly established that a strip search of a prison visitor conducted without reasonable suspicion is unconstitutional. We do not reach the question whether there actually was reasonable suspicion that Cates was carrying drugs on her person. But, for purposes of a qualified immunity analysis, it was not unreasonable for Laurian to have believed that there was reasonable suspicion, given that a search warrant (though unexecuted) had been issued for a search of Cates’s ‘person’ for drugs. However, prior to our decision in this case, there has been no controlling precedent in this circuit, or a sufficiently robust consensus of persuasive authority in other circuits, holding that prior to a strip search a prison visitor—even a visitor as to whom there is reasonable suspicion—must be given an opportunity to leave the prison rather than be subjected to the strip search.”)

Sampson v. County of Los Angeles, 974 F.3d 1012, 1023-25 (9th Cir. 2020) (“Here, Sampson complains that Obakhume sexually harassed her by commenting on her appearance and marital status, urging her to end her marriage, inappropriately touching her, and attempting to coerce her into riding in his vehicle. The district court found the constitutional right not to be sexually harassed by public officials providing social services was not clearly established outside of the workplace or school contexts. . . Although we reluctantly agree that this right was not clearly established at the time of Obakhume’s conduct, and therefore Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity in the instant case, we hold that the Equal Protection Clause protects the right to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of public officials providing social services. To ‘ “promote[] the development of constitutional precedent” in an area where [our] guidance is sorely needed,’ we first address whether Sampson asserts a violation of a constitutional right. . . We have broadly held—on multiple occasions—that ‘[w]ell prior to 1988 the protection afforded under the Equal Protection Clause was held to proscribe any purposeful discrimination by state actors, be it in the workplace or elsewhere, directed at an individual solely because of the individual’s [sex].’ . . Here, a male social worker subjected Sampson to sexualized comments and unwanted physical advances because she is a woman. The only difference with prior cases is that Sampson’s harassment was at the hands of a social worker assigned to her case, rather than a coworker, supervisor, classmate, or teacher. That difference is inconsequential because the Equal Protection Clause prohibits public officials, including social workers like Obakhume, from ‘deny[ing] to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.’ . . . Obakhume’s conduct denied Sampson, because she is a woman, the right to seek legal guardianship of her niece and related services without being subjected to hostile sexual harassment. Simply put, if she were a man, Sampson would not have experienced this harassment in seeking services from Obakhume, and that discrepancy fundamentally offends the equality and fairness principles embodied in the Equal Protection Clause. . . . The right under the Equal Protection Clause to be free from sexual harassment by public officials in the workplace and school contexts is clearly established by our prior case law. . . . However, as Sampson acknowledges, these cases are factually distinguishable, and we have never held that the Equal Protection Clause protects private individuals who suffer sexual harassment at the hands of public officials providing them with social services. Thus, we cannot say that the question raised by Sampson’s claim was ‘beyond debate’ when the conduct as issue occurred here. . . . Although we find that Sampson has plainly alleged a constitutional violation here, for purposes of analyzing qualified immunity, we must heed the Supreme Court’s repeated admonitions ‘not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,’ . . . because ‘doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced[.]’ . . . Therefore, because we cannot find a case with sufficiently similar facts, we cannot say that Sampson’s right to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of a social worker was clearly established under the Supreme Court’s impossibly high bar. . . . Unfortunately, the Supreme Court’s exceedingly narrow interpretation of what constitutes a ‘clearly established’ right precludes us from holding what is otherwise obvious to us—that the right of private individuals to be free from sexual harassment at the hands of public officials outside of the workplace and school contexts was clearly established under the Equal Protection Clause at the time of Defendants’ conduct. Although we are prevented from denying qualified immunity in the instant case, we want to make it abundantly clear moving forward—if it was not already—that State public officials violate our Constitution’s promise of equal protection when they sexually harass the people they serve.”) Martinez v. City of Clovis, 943 F.3d 1260, 1270, 1272-77 (9th Cir. 2019) (“Even in difficult cases, our court tends “to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the ‘two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent’ in an area where this court’s guidance is ... needed.” . . . Because guidance is necessary to promote the development of constitutional precedent in this area, we elect to begin with the first part of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . [T]he record . . . reveals that Hershberger told Pennington about Martinez’s testimony relating to his prior abuse, and also stated that Martinez was not ‘the right girl’ for him. A reasonable jury could find that Hershberger’s disclosure provoked Pennington, and that her disparaging comments emboldened Pennington to believe that he could further abuse Martinez, including by retaliating against her for her testimony, with impunity. The causal link between Hershberger’s affirmative conduct and the abuse Martinez suffered that night is supported by Martinez’s testimony that Pennington asked Martinez what she had told the officer while he was hitting her. That Martinez was already in danger from Pennington does not obviate a state-created danger when the state actor enhanced the risks. . . . Because a reasonable jury could infer that Martinez was placed in greater danger after

Hershberger disclosed Martinez's complaint and made comments to Pennington that conveyed contempt for Martinez, the first requirement of the state-created danger doctrine is satisfied. . . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Martinez, a jury could reasonably find that Sanders's positive remarks about the Penningtons placed Martinez in greater danger. The positive remarks were communicated against the backdrop that Sanders knew that Pennington was an officer and that there was probable cause to arrest. . . which the jury could infer Pennington, as a police officer, understood. A reasonable jury could find that Pennington felt emboldened to continue his abuse with impunity. In fact, the following day, Pennington abused Martinez yet again. Under these circumstances, the first requirement of the state-created danger doctrine is satisfied. . . . Given the foreseeability of future domestic abuse here, a reasonable jury could find that disclosing a report of abuse while engaging in disparaging small talk with Pennington, and/or positively remarking on his family while ordering other officers not to make an arrest despite the presence of probable cause, constitutes deliberate indifference to a known or obvious danger. . . That Pennington was already under investigation by the Clovis PD for allegations of abuse against an ex-girlfriend also suggests that future abuse was a known or obvious danger. By ignoring the risk created by Pennington's violent tendencies, the officers acted with deliberate indifference toward the risk of future abuse. We hold that a reasonable jury could find that Hershberger and Sanders violated Martinez's due process right to liberty by affirmatively increasing the known and obvious danger Martinez faced. . . . We next turn to the question whether, at the time of the challenged conduct, the law was sufficiently well defined that every reasonable officer in the officers' shoes would have known that their conduct violated Martinez's right to due process. We conclude it was not. Qualified immunity therefore applies. . . . To deny immunity, we must conclude that every reasonable official would have understood, beyond debate, that the conduct was a violation of a constitutional right. . . We begin by looking to binding precedent from the Supreme Court or our court. . . Without binding precedent, 'we look to whatever decisional law is available ... including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts.' . . The precedent must be ' "controlling" —from the Ninth Circuit or the Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a "consensus" of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction.' . . Without binding precedent from our court or the Supreme Court, we may look to decisions from the other circuits. . . But we cannot rely on Okin, because it has not been 'embraced by a "consensus" of courts.' . . Notably, the Seventh Circuit has stated that Okin may be 'in tension with' DeShaney and the Supreme Court's decision in Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales[.] . . In light of this muddled legal terrain, we cannot hold that 'every reasonable official would have understood ... beyond debate,' that the officers' conduct here violated Martinez's right to due process. . . Hershberger and Sanders are entitled to qualified immunity because the due process right conferred in the context before us was not clearly established. Although the application of the state-created danger doctrine to this context was not apparent to every reasonable officer at the time the conduct occurred, we now establish the contours of the due process protections afforded victims of domestic violence in situations like this one. . . Significantly, 'it is the facts' of this case 'that clearly establish what the law is' going forward. . . We hold today that the state-created danger doctrine applies when an officer reveals a domestic violence complaint made in confidence to an abuser while simultaneously making disparaging comments about the victim in a manner that reasonably emboldens the abuser to continue abusing the victim with impunity. Similarly, we hold that the state-created danger doctrine applies when an officer praises an abuser in the abuser's presence after the abuser has been protected from arrest, in a manner that communicates to the abuser that the abuser may continue abusing the victim with impunity. . . . Going forward, the law in this circuit will be clearly established that such conduct is unconstitutional.”)

Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3d 592, 599-602 (9th Cir. 2019) (“We may ‘exercise [our] sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.’ . . . Here, we begin with the second, ‘clearly established’ prong, for reasons that will appear. . . . Under Ninth Circuit law at the time of the incident, Fourteenth Amendment claims that officers acted with deliberate indifference to the medical needs of a pretrial detainee were governed by the same ‘deliberate indifference’ standard as Eighth Amendment claims for failure to prevent harm to convicted prisoners. . . . That standard provided that an officer was liable for deliberate indifference only if he ‘kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety’ — that is, if he was ‘aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists’ and actually drew the inference. . . . Two principles inform our clearly established law inquiry in this case. First, the qualified immunity inquiry ‘must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’ . . . It is therefore critical whether our case law had, at the time of the events in this case, sufficiently clarified when a detainee’s imminent risk of suicide was substantial enough to require immediate attention. Second, in Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, we recognized that deliberate indifference claims ‘depend in part on a subjective test that does not fit easily with the qualified immunity inquiry,’ which is an objective inquiry. . . . Estate of Ford concluded that even where the clearly established legal standard requires deliberate indifference, the qualified immunity inquiry should concentrate on the objective aspects of the constitutional standard. That is because ‘a reasonable prison official understanding that he cannot recklessly disregard a substantial risk of serious harm, could know all of the facts yet mistakenly, but reasonably, perceive that the exposure in any given situation was not that high.’ . . . We held that ‘[i]n these circumstances, [an officer] would be entitled to qualified immunity’ under the deliberate indifference standard. . . . Thus, Horton must show that, given the available case law at the time of his attempted suicide, a reasonable officer, knowing what Officer Brice knew, would have understood that failing to check on Horton immediately after the phone call with Yvonne presented such a substantial risk of harm to Horton that the failure to act was unconstitutional. We turn to the directly applicable case law now, which is sparse. At the time of Horton’s incident, we had held that officers who failed to provide medical assistance to a detainee should have known that their conduct was unconstitutional in two instances, neither of which resemble the facts in this case. . . . The facts of Clouthier and Conn do not at all resemble this case. . . . Officer Brice did know that Horton, according to his mother, had been suicidal two weeks before the incident and that his mother thought he remained a suicide risk. Based on these facts, which are taken in the light most favorable to Horton, a reasonable officer would not have known that failing to attend to Horton immediately would be unlawful under the law at the time of the incident. Horton did not attempt suicide in the presence of Officer Brice, as the detainee did in Conn. . . . Nor, as was the case in Clouthier, had he attempted suicide multiple times and been deemed such a risk that medical specialists placed significant suicide prevention measures in place, measures removed by the defendant. . . In short, whether or not Officer Brice was in fact deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk that Horton would attempt suicide in the time before he was checked, there was no case law at the time of the incident clearly establishing that a reasonable officer should have perceived the substantial risk. . . In short, applying Estate of Ford, the case law at the time of Horton’s attempted suicide was simply too sparse, and involved circumstances too distinct from those in this case, to establish that a reasonable officer would perceive a substantial risk that Horton would imminently attempt suicide. We therefore reverse the district court’s denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity as to Officer Brice. . . . Since the incident in this case took place, this court has announced a new liability standard governing Fourteenth Amendment failure-to-protect claims by pretrial detainees. Castro v. County of Los Angeles held that, in light of the Supreme Court’s decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), Fourteenth Amendment failure-to-protect claims must be analyzed under a purely objective standard. . . Under Castro, we ask whether there was ‘a substantial risk of serious harm to the plaintiff that could have been eliminated through reasonable and available measures that the officer did not take, thus causing the injury that the plaintiff suffered.’. . There is no separate inquiry into an officer’s subjective state of mind. We have recently recognized that Castro’s objective deliberate indifference standard extends to Fourteenth Amendment claims by pretrial detainees for violations of the right to adequate medical care. . . This objective standard would therefore guide our analysis of whether a constitutional violation occurred here, were we to reach that question. But it has no direct bearing on the question of whether Officer Brice would have known that a failure to immediately check on Horton violated a clearly established right at the time of the incident. As the pre-Castro standard is no longer applicable, no purpose would be served for future cases from delineating the application of that standard to the constitutional merits of this case. The two-step qualified immunity procedure ‘is intended to further the development of constitutional precedent,’ and we may decide ‘whether that procedure is worthwhile in particular cases.’. . We therefore tend to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the “two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent” in an area where this court’s guidance is ... needed.’. . Here, Castro and Gordon have established the law going forward, and further delineation of the pre-Castro standard would serve little purpose, as it is no longer applicable. We therefore confine our inquiry to the second qualified immunity prong — whether the constitutional right at issue was ‘clearly established’ at the time of the alleged violation.”) Hines v. Youseff, 914 F.3d 1218, 1229 (9th Cir. 2019) (“The courts below did not decide whether exposing inmates to a heightened risk of Valley Fever violates the Eighth Amendment. Neither do we. Instead, we go straight to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether a right to not face a heightened risk was ‘clearly established’ at the time. A right is clearly established if it was ‘sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would [have understood] that what he is doing violates that right.’. . That is, the issue must have been ‘beyond debate.’. . In determining what is clearly established, we must look at the law ‘in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.’. .Applying those principles to the cases at hand, we conclude that the specific right that the inmates claim in these cases—the right to be free from heightened exposure to Valley Fever spores—was not clearly established at the time. A reasonable official could have concluded that the risk was not so grave that it violates contemporary standards of decency to expose anyone unwillingly to such risk, or that exposure to the risk was lawful.”)

Whalen v. McMullen, 907 F.3d 1139, 1146, 1150-53 (9th Cir. 2018) (“Because of the important questions presented in this case, we address both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. We first discuss whether McMullen’s warrantless entry into Whalen’s home under false pretenses was an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment, and we then turn to consideration of whether it was clearly established that such an entry was a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . McMullen’s purpose was to gather evidence for the fraud investigation, which he did by making observations and video recordings of Whalen and her home. Because he entered the home while using a ruse and not while undercover, it is immaterial that he stayed within Whalen’s presence in the home and did not conduct a broader search. He did not have consent to be in the home for the purposes of his visit. . . . And he did not have consent—under any terms—to videotape Whalen or her home. By observing and videotaping Whalen inside her home without her consent, McMullen conducted a ‘search’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . McMullen searched Whalen’s home without a warrant to gather evidence for an investigation of her potentially fraudulent application for benefits. Thus, even if this was an ‘administrative’ search, it served general law enforcement purposes and not a ‘special need.’. . . For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that McMullen’s entry into Whalen’s home without consent or a warrant in the course of a CDIU civil fraud investigation related to Whalen’s benefits claim was an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Although we conclude that McMullen’s warrantless ruse-entry into Whalen’s home was an unreasonable search, we cannot say it was clearly established that his conduct, in the context of a civil or administrative investigation related to a determination of benefits eligibility, was a search or was unreasonable. Whalen does not have to identify a controlling case finding a constitutional violation on the exact facts of her case for her asserted right to be clearly established, but she relies only on Bosse and other criminal ruse entry cases. In light of Wyman and Sanchez, Bosse would not have provided McMullen with notice that his actions—which were common practice for CDIU investigators—violated the Fourth Amendment. McMullen knew he was conducting a civil investigation, not a criminal investigation, and that it was related to Whalen’s eligibility for social security benefits. Additionally, McMullen did not initially seek to enter Whalen’s home but rather to engage her in front of her house; Whalen limited her constitutional challenge to McMullen’s actions once he crossed the threshold. As the district court noted, there was no authority requiring McMullen to retreat from [Whalen’s] home’ as the conversation moved inside, nor was there authority ‘clearly proscribing McMullen’s conduct in this situation.’ We agree that it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct, in the context of this civil investigation related to a determination of benefits eligibility, was unlawful. The right Whalen asserts was not clearly established, and McMullen is entitled to qualified immunity from this suit.”)

Ioane v. Hodges, 939 F.3d 945, 950-51, 953, 956-57 (9th Cir. 2019) (as amended) (“While we have discretion to begin our analysis with either part of the test, . . . it is nevertheless beneficial to begin with the first part of the test because it ‘promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.’ . . . While the Ninth Circuit never has articulated a standard for when an officer’s intentional viewing of an individual’s naked body is constitutionally permissible under the Fourth Amendment, ‘[t]he touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness.’ . . . Weighing the scope, manner, justification, and place of the search, a reasonable jury could conclude that Agent Noll’s actions were unreasonable and violated Shelly’s Fourth Amendment rights. Agent Noll’s general interests in preventing destruction of evidence and promoting officer safety did not justify the scope or manner of the intrusion into Shelly’s most basic subject of privacy, her naked body. . . We therefore affirm the district court on this issue. . . . The second part of the qualified immunity test requires us to determine whether, at the time of Agent Noll’s actions in June 2006, the law was clearly established. . . . Taken together, the holdings from York, Grummett, Sepulveda, and Ybarra put the unlawfulness of Agent Noll’s conduct beyond debate. . . . In sum, a reasonable officer in Agent Noll’s position would have known that such a significant intrusion into bodily privacy, in the absence of legitimate government justification, is unlawful. . . . We therefore conclude that Agent Noll is not entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Ioane v. Hodges, 939 F.3d 945, 957-62 (9th Cir. 2019) (as amended) (Bea, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (“I agree with the majority that this case does not extend Bivens to a new context and that the district court did not err in denying Agent Noll’s motion for summary judgment regarding Shelly Ioane’s claim that Agent Noll violated Shelly’s clearly established constitutional rights. However, because I disagree with the majority’s holding that Agent Noll’s actions violated Shelly’s clearly established right to bodily privacy, I write separately. . . . Here, the majority concludes that Agent Noll was not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, in part because Agent Noll violated Shelly’s clearly established Fourth Amendment right to bodily privacy when Agent Noll searched Shelly and viewed her naked body during the course of executing a search warrant at the Ioanes’ residence. In order to reach that conclusion, it is necessary for the majority to hold that a female law enforcement officer violates a clearly established right to bodily privacy when she unreasonably views the naked body of a female suspect. The majority cites three of our prior cases regarding bodily privacy to support the existence of such a clearly established right. But the cases cited by the majority are distinguishable from the instant case in significant ways. Most problematically, none of the cases cited by the majority state that there is a constitutional right to bodily privacy that is violated by same-sex observation. . . . Most notably, the majority asserts (in a footnote) that, although every bodily privacy case this circuit has decided involved cross-sex observation, ‘gender was not central’ to the analysis in any of those cases. . . . Thus, the majority concludes, ‘[the fact t]hat Agent Noll and Shelly both are women does not change that Agent Noll violated Shelly’s privacy rights.’ . . . Gender is not central? It is impossible to square this conclusion with our precedent. Every bodily privacy case cited by the majority involved cross-sex observation and every case noted that the cross-sex nature of the observation was a significant part of the court’s analysis. No case cited by the majority discusses whether same-sex observation is subject to the same sort of analysis or scrutiny. In fact, language from York and Sepulveda—and the result from Grummett—strongly suggest that same-sex observations are not subject to the same sort of scrutiny as cross-sex observations. The majority is likely correct that Agent Noll’s actions were unreasonable, and Agent Noll may have violated Shelly’s constitutional right to bodily privacy during the search. But the existence of a constitutional violation alone is insufficient to deny qualified immunity—we must find that the right at issue was ‘clearly established.’ Our precedent at the time of the alleged violation in this case did not put the issue of whether same-sex observation violates the right to bodily privacy ‘beyond debate.’ . . . The majority could have used this case to clarify the law regarding the right to bodily privacy and announced that the right applied in both same-sex and cross-sex situations alike. Perhaps that is the correct result. But the majority cannot, in one fell swoop, both announce for the first time that the scope of the bodily privacy right includes same-sex observations and, at the same time, hold that the right was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Nonetheless, I concur in the majority’s ultimate conclusion that the district court did not err in denying Agent Noll’s motion for summary judgment. Drawing all factual inferences in favor of Shelly, as we must, Agent Noll’s actions violated Shelly’s Fourth Amendment rights under the Supreme Court’s decision in Ybarra v. Illinois. . . . Agent Noll had no individualized probable cause to search Shelly. Consequently, there was no basis to conduct an evidence search of Shelly’s person. Additionally, Agent Noll likely lacked any reasonable belief that Shelly was armed and dangerous. Although Agent Noll knew there were firearms in the house, those firearms did not belong to Shelly and there was no other basis on which to conclude that Shelly was armed and dangerous. Regardless, even if Agent Noll had a reasonable basis to believe Shelly was armed and dangerous, her actions in this case plainly exceeded the limits of the sort of weapons pat-down authorized by the Supreme Court in Terry v. Ohio. . . . As a result, I would hold that Agent Noll’s actions violated Shelly’s Fourth Amendment rights as clearly established in Ybarra.”) Recchia v. City of Los Angeles Dep’t of Animal Servs., 889 F.3d 553, 559-60 (9th Cir. 2018) (“If all the birds maintained by Recchia had been unhealthy or sick in appearance, we think their entire seizure would pose no significant constitutional issue, and clearly would not offend the Fourth Amendment because of the scope of the emergency exception to the warrant requirement and the need to seize the birds to end their suffering and prevent transmission of illness. However, the crux of the problem here is that not all of the birds appeared to be sick, in fact eight birds appeared outwardly healthy. And so we are confronted with a factual issue about whether the exigent circumstances exception applies as to the seizure of the healthy-looking birds kept by Recchia in this case. . . . We hold that there is a genuine factual dispute about whether the healthy-looking birds posed any meaningful risk to other birds or humans at the time they were seized. Therefore, although we affirm the dismissal in part as to the seizure of the birds that appeared sick, we vacate and remand in part as to the seizure of any birds that were wholly healthy in outward appearance. . . . On remand, we instruct the district court to consider in the first instance whether the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity for any potential constitutional violation because it was not ‘clearly established’ at the time of the seizure that the warrantless seizure of the birds could be a

Isayeva v. Sacramento Sheriff's Dep't, 872 F.3d 938, 945-53 (9th Cir. 2017) (“In Maropulos v. County of Los Angeles, we encouraged district courts to help us evaluate our jurisdiction by ‘articulat[ing] the basis upon which they deny qualified immunity.’ . . . Here, the district court stated in its order denying summary judgment that genuine disputes of material fact existed regarding whether the tasing and shooting were reasonable uses of force, and that those disputes of fact precluded ruling that Deputy Barry was entitled to qualified immunity. Then, in an order certifying this appeal as frivolous, the district court characterized its summary judgment ruling as resting on the determination that there are genuine issues of material fact, and concluded that Deputy Barry’s appeal was frivolous. But the district court misapplied the law on qualified immunity. We must accept the district court’s determination that there is a genuine dispute as to the circumstances under which Deputy Barry tased and shot the decedent. But, contrary to the district court’s reasoning, the existence of a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer’s use of force does not preclude granting qualified immunity or eliminate any basis for an immediate appeal of denial of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 446 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc). Qualified immunity involves two questions: (1) whether the defendant violated a constitutional right, and (2) whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . Thus, as we recently explained, an officer may be denied qualified immunity at summary judgment in a Section 1983 case ‘only if (1) the facts alleged, taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting injury, show that the officer’s conduct violated a constitutional right, and (2) the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the incident such that a reasonable officer would have understood [his] conduct to be unlawful in that situation.’ . . . Either prong can be adjudicated on appeal by taking the facts as most favorable to the plaintiffs and applying the pertinent legal standards to those facts. . . . Deputy Barry contends that his use of both (a) the taser, and (b) deadly force, against Tereschenko did not violate clearly established law. We assume the facts most favorable to the plaintiff, and have jurisdiction to address (1) whether Deputy Barry violated clearly established law when he tased Tereschenko; and (2) whether Deputy Barry violated clearly established law when he fatally shot Tereschenko. . . . Here, Deputy Barry stresses the second prong, whether Tereschenko’s rights not to be subject to the tasing and to the shooting were ‘clearly established’ on February 18, 2013. We address that prong first and, given our conclusion, need not address the other. . . . The dispositive question is ‘whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.’ . . . This question must be answered ‘not as a broad general proposition,’ but with reference to the facts of specific cases. . . . As of February 18, 2013, the date of the incident, three key published cases from the Ninth Circuit established when the use of a taser was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]either Brooks nor Mattos clearly established on February 18, 2013 that tasing Tereschenko would violate the Fourth Amendment. Nor do the two cases in combination with each other or with Bryan put the constitutionality of Deputy Barry’s actions ‘beyond debate.’ . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff Isayeva, we hold that Tereschenko did not have a clearly established right violated by Deputy Barry’s use of the taser. Deputy Barry is therefore entitled to qualified immunity for the tasing. We need not and do not reach the first prong of qualified immunity, asking whether Deputy Barry's use of the taser was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . It is sufficient for purposes of qualified immunity merely to conclude that no clearly established law was violated by Deputy Barry in connection with his use of a taser against the resisting Tereschenko. . . .The standards from Garner and Graham 'are cast at a high level of generality,' so they ordinarily do not clearly establish rights. . . .Rather, it is the facts of particular cases that clearly establish what the law is. . . .There is an exception to the rule that the Garner standard does not clearly establish the law governing when the use of deadly force is lawful. In an 'obvious case,' Garner's general test can ' "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.' . . .Unlike in Hughes, here we conclude that Deputy Barry's use of force was not obviously unlawful. Indeed, construing the facts in Isayeva's favor, there are strong reasons to believe that Tereschenko posed a risk of death or serious injury to the officers or to the family members in the home. . . .Isayeva cites only one case from our circuit where an officer was involved in hand-to-hand combat with an individual, the officer used deadly force, and we held that the force used was excessive. See Hopkins v. Andaya, 958 F.2d 881 (9th Cir. 1992), as amended (Mar. 24, 1992) (per curiam). In Hopkins, when the record was construed in favor of the plaintiff, the fight involved the decedent hitting the officer once or twice to the arm or head, and the officer suffering only a minor cut on his arm and bruises on his elbow, back, and leg. Yet, without warning, the officer shot the decedent. . . . We concluded that the officer 'was never in any serious danger' and that the use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . . Unlike the present case, the decedent in Hopkins at no point had the upper hand in the fight, and the officer never came close to passing out. The decedent in Hopkins posed a much lesser threat to officer and citizen safety than did Tereschenko. Hopkins, like Garner, does not clearly establish that Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was unlawful. The above discussion shows that not only was it not obvious that Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was excessive, but that there are strong reasons supporting the reasonableness of the shooting. We conclude that under the circumstances of this case, Garner does not clearly establish Tereschenko's right to be free from deadly force by Deputy Barry. Though our analysis discussed factors relevant to whether Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was reasonable, we reach no conclusion on that issue. . . . Instead, we rest our holding on the second prong of qualified immunity, that Tereschenko held no clearly established right not to be shot by Deputy Barry. . . .We hold that Deputy Sean Barry is entitled to qualified immunity for the tasing and fatal shooting of Paul Tereschenko.”)

C. V. by & through Villegas v. City of Anaheim, 823 F.3d 1252, 1256-57 (9th Cir. 2016) (“A reasonable jury could draw the following factual conclusions: (1) the officers, responding to a call about a suspected drug dealer armed with a shotgun and loitering in the visitor parking area of an apartment complex, came upon Villegas already holding a long gun; (2) Villegas was ordered to put his hands up, and as he was complying, the officers ordered him to drop his gun; (3) without providing a warning or sufficient time to comply, or observing Villegas pointing the long gun toward the officers or making any move toward the trigger, Bennallack resorted to deadly force. Viewing the facts in this light, deadly force was not objectively reasonable. Thus, the district court erred in holding that Bennallack's use of deadly force was justified as a matter of law and in granting summary judgment on that basis. Our court has rejected summary judgment in cases involving similar degrees of apparent danger, and we must do the same here. That ruling does not end our inquiry. Under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, we ask whether the alleged violation of Villegas’s Fourth Amendment right against excessive force ‘was clearly established at the time of the officer’s alleged misconduct.’ . . . We agree with the district court that it was not clearly established on January 7, 2012, that using deadly force in this situation, even viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, would constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. Bennallack is therefore immune from liability under section 1983 for his use of deadly force, so we affirm the grant of summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim.” [footnotes omitted])

Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 871 (9th Cir. 2016) (“We address whether a law enforcement officer has reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry frisk, searching a suspect for weapons, based solely on the perceived domestic violence nature of the investigation. We hold that, although the domestic violence nature of a police investigation is a relevant consideration in assessing whether there is reason to believe a suspect is armed and dangerous, it is not alone sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion. We therefore hold Dillard violated Thomas’ Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure by detaining him for the purpose of performing a Terry frisk. Because it was not clearly established at the time that the perceived domestic violence nature of an investigation was insufficient to establish reasonable suspicion, however, we hold Dillard is entitled to qualified immunity. We further hold Dillard used excessive force when he tased Thomas in order to force him to submit to the Terry frisk against his consent. Given the frisk was unlawful and unnecessary, Dillard used unreasonable force. Nonetheless, given the unsettled state of the law regarding the use of Tasers at the time, we again hold Dillard is entitled to qualified immunity. Given the Supreme Court’s instructions that we may not define clearly established law at too high a level of generality, it was not clearly established at the time of Dillard’s actions that an officer who mistakenly but reasonably believed he had the right to conduct a Terry frisk could not deploy a Taser in dart mode to overcome a suspect’s resistance to the frisk. Accordingly, without in any way endorsing Dillard’s actions or overlooking the indignities those actions caused Thomas to suffer, we reverse the order of the district court and hold Dillard is entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.”)

Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 900-01(9th Cir. 2016) (Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In my view, the nature of a domestic violence call justifies an officer’s formulation of a reasonable suspicion that a suspect may be armed (in the absence of mitigating circumstances). Indeed, a law enforcement officer should feel a moral duty to protect victims of domestic violence. And while an officer of course cannot shadow an abuser forever to ensure no future violence befalls the victim, he can at least make sure that the ‘scene is secure’ from possible violence with weapons before he leaves the victim with an abuser. Given that domestic violence assaults account for nearly two-thirds of all fatal shootings of female victims in the United States, see Violence Pol’y Ctr. Report, supra, I would find that the relatively small incursion on bodily dignity of permitting a Terry frisk based on the domestic violence nature of a police call is far outweighed by the strong law enforcement interest—indeed, the broader societal interest—in saving the lives of domestic violence victims. We achieve this interest by assuring that abusers are not armed before the police officer leaves the scene of a domestic violence encounter. Yet the majority today requires a law enforcement officer to face potential liability unless he leaves a domestic violence scene without any assurance that the abuser is not armed and will not again inflict violence on the victim—only next time, with a gun. I cannot endorse a legal rule that places law enforcement officers in such a stressful dilemma. Thus, while I agree with the result reached by the majority today, I cannot join my colleagues to the extent they deny law enforcement officers a tool—the Terry frisk—vital for ensuring their own safety, as well as the safety of the domestic violence victims they have a duty to protect.”)

Mitchell v. Washington, 818 F.3d 436, 446-47 (9th Cir. 2016) (“Because we hold that strict scrutiny applies, Dr. Bell is required to demonstrate that the use of race in his medical decision was narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. . . It is not difficult to imagine the existence of a compelling justification in the context of medical treatment. . . Because, however, Dr. Bell failed to offer any compelling justification for the racial classification, let alone a justification that was narrowly tailored; instead, arguing only that Mitchell's equal protection claim fails because race was not the ‘primary’ consideration in denying treatment, Dr. Bell failed to meet his burden under the strict scrutiny standard. Thus, the district court erred in concluding that no constitutional violation occurred. . . .Despite the fact that we hold that the violation of a constitutional right occurred, Dr. Bell is entitled to qualified immunity if it was not ‘clearly established’ that his actions would violate Mitchell’s constitutional rights. . . .Mitchell ‘has not brought to our attention, and our independent research does not reveal, case law involving the particular circumstances presented by this case.’ . . Here, the ‘particular circumstances’ are the use of race-related success-of-treatment data as a factor in making a medical treatment decision. As a result, it was not clearly established that a reasonable official would understand that the use of race-related success-of-treatment data as a factor in a medical treatment decision would be unconstitutional. Dr. Bell is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.”)

Mitchell v. Washington, 818 F.3d 436, 447, 454 (9th Cir. 2016) (Clifton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (“This court has never addressed whether the Constitution forbids a doctor from considering credible scientific evidence that individuals of a certain race respond poorly to a particular treatment. Nor have we addressed what standard of scrutiny would be used to evaluate such a claim. We do not need to address those questions in order to resolve this case, and I would not do so. . . .I concur in the judgment affirming the district court’s summary judgment in favor of Defendants. I agree with the specific conclusions of the majority opinion that the Eleventh Amendment does not bar Mitchell’s claim for damages against the Defendants in their individual capacities, that his claims for injunctive and declaratory relief are moot, that the summary judgment dismissing his claims for damages against Kelly Cunningham was appropriate, and that Dr. Bell is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim for damages against him. I would not take up the question of whether Mitchell’s constitutional rights were violated, but if required to do so, conclude that they were not. I thus concur in part with the majority opinion and concur in full with its judgment.”)

Sjurset v. Button, 810 F.3d 609, 615, 618-19 (9th Cir. 2015) (“We . . . have discretion to apply the second prong of the Saucier test at the outset in order to determine whether the law governing the Stayton officers’ conduct was clearly established. If indeed the Stayton officers did not violate clearly established law, then we can determine that qualified immunity is appropriate and may thus dispose of the case without undertaking an analysis of whether a constitutional violation occurred in the first instance. In sum, we will heed the Supreme Court’s admonition against prematurely attempting to define the particular constitutional violation in question in this case. . . . Wallis falls short of clearly establishing that reasonable officers in the Stayton officers’ situation would have understood that they had a constitutional responsibility to second-guess DHS’s protective-custody determination. Such second-guessing would have required the officers either to disrupt or to refuse to take part in the entry and removal of Sjurset’s children. To be sure, if the Stayton officers had participated in the decision to take protective custody of Sjurset’s children, then our precedent in Wallis and similar cases would clearly establish that the officers could not do so without a reasonable basis for believing that the children were in imminent danger. . . . But here the police officers did not participate in such a decision; they instead relied on DHS’s determination. Sjurset further contends that the Stayton officers’ role as ‘integral participants’ in the entry and removal is enough to trigger their liability for any violations of Sjurset’s constitutional rights. To support this theory, Sjurset relies on Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773 (9th Cir.2004). . . . But Sjurset’s reliance on Boyd is misplaced both factually and legally. As a factual matter, the officers in Boyd acted as a collective team and were carrying out a preplanned search operation. . . . In contrast, no facts in this case suggest that the Stayton officers were privy to any discussions, briefings, or collective decisions made by DHS in its protective-custody determination. . . . Boyd . . . involved a collective decisionmaking process among the officers, with the result that all of them could be considered ‘integral participants’ in the execution of the plan. . . . It does not squarely address the case at hand, wherein an entirely separate agency—DHS—made a protective-custody determination over which the Stayton officers had no input. . . . In sum, neither Wallis nor Boyd clearly establishes that the Stayton officers violated Sjurset’s constitutional rights when they acted in reliance on DHS’s protective-custody determination. We must therefore look elsewhere to decide whether the officers were on notice that their conduct violated clearly established law. Neither statute nor precedent, however, squarely addresses the circumstances of this particular case.”)

Shinault v. Hawks, 782 F.3d 1053, 1058-60 & n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) (“Given Shinault’s substantial interest, the risk of erroneous deprivation, and the ability to provide a hearing without compromising a significant government interest, we hold that a state must provide a hearing prior to freezing a significant sum in the inmate’s account. . . . Thus, we conclude that Shinault received insufficient due process as the result of Oregon’s actions. . . . Given the absence of precedent establishing a state’s obligation to provide a pre-deprivation hearing in these circumstances, the right was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. Quick is distinguishable enough from this matter, and several decisions from our sister circuits have held that post-deprivation process suffices, even for final withdrawals of assets. . . . The most recent appellate court decision on point required a pre-deprivation hearing, but that case was decided long after ODOC officials froze Shinault's assets. Montanez v. Sec'y Pa. Dep't of Corr., 2014 WL 5155040, at *7–8 (3d Cir. Aug. 15, 2014).”)

Powell v. Slemp, 585 F. App'x 427, 427-28 (9th Cir. 2014) (“Here, the district court defined the clearly established right at issue too broadly, without reference to Sgt. Slemp's particular actions in this case. Unless existing law would have made it ‘sufficiently clear’ to a reasonable officer in Sgt. Slemp's position that attempting to restrain Powell with his gun drawn violated her Fourth Amendment rights, Sgt. Slemp was entitled to qualified immunity. See Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 639–40 (1987). Because no such case law exists, and because the illegality of his actions was not otherwise ‘beyond debate,’ al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, Sgt. Slemp must prevail on his motion for summary judgment. Exercising our discretion under Pearson v. Callahan, we decline to reach the question whether Sgt. Slemp's actions violated Powell's Fourth Amendment rights.”)

Brown v. Oregon Dept. of Corrections, 751 F.3d 983, 989-90 (9th Cir. 2014) (“Although we conclude that a [twenty-seven month confinement in the IMU] without meaningful review may constitute atypical and significant hardship, our case law has not previously so held, and we cannot hold defendants liable for the violation of a right that was not clearly established at the time the violation occurred.”)
